As a result of the Canadian Wheat Board's ongoing sales efforts, there will be very good grain movement from now through to the end of February.

Delivery opportunities for western Canadian grain producers have increased greatly in recent days. The Canadian grain industry is now in a good position this crop year to exceed exports that were achieved in the last crop year.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Colin Kenny: Hounourable senators, I have in my hands a petition from the Peterborough area. It is from a group of people who are upset with the goods and services tax. They refer to themselves as "IRATE Citizens". "IRATE", I am told stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess". These people are principally from the Peterborough area.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Simard: Could you speed it up a little bit, please? Would that be too much to ask?

Senator Frith: Yes, it is too much to ask. Our experience has been that you are very slow learners, so Senator Kenny is trying to accommodate you.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Kenny: I am doing my best; however, I fear I have lost my place so I should go back.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Simard: I have a question for the senator. I understand Liberal senators are outside reading names of people from New Brunswick. Do we have the "B" team inside here and the "A" team outside?

Senator Kenny: This is the first team speaking. We don't hit home runs, we hit singles.

Senator Doody: You better start again, I have lost the thread.

Senator Kenny: Thank you, Senator Doody. I find it difficult to get to the top of the page but I will get there.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Petten: Is that the same Peterborough where there is a bridge which goes up and down?

Senator Kenny: Honourable senators, there seems to be some uncertainty about this petition. It is from a group of people who are very unhappy with the GST. It is from the Peterborough area, where there is a boat lift that goes up and down. It is from a group of citizens who refer to themselves as IRATE. I am told that IRATE stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess."

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Simard: Would you like a pill or something to cheer you up?

Senator Kenny: I am sorry?

Senator Simard: Do you need a pill to cheer you up?

Senator Kenny: You made me lose my place again. I shall have to go back to the top of the list.

Senator Simard: We could arrange to give you a vitamin B12 or something.

Senator Kenny: I was nearing the bottom of the petition and I was very close to tabling it, but I feel obliged to start again. Where were we?

Senator Kinsella: Eva Smith, Rural Route No. 4, Lakefield, Ontario.

Senator Kenny: Who?

Senator Kinsella: She is just before Marie Fish, 17 Stewart Street, Peterborough.

Senator Kenny: You must be reading from a different petition.

Senator Kinsella: I am reading from notes I took on what you were reading.

Senator Kenny: I will read my petitions, and you can read your petitions.

Senator Frith: In fairness, let us give Senator Kinsella a few points for listening.

Senator Kenny: I am sorry.

Senator Frith: Won't you give him any points?

Senator Kenny: I have lost my place and I feel obliged to go back to the top of the list.

Senator Simard: Even Senator Robichaud is not listening.

Senator Robichaud: Sure I am, but I can do two things at the same time.

Senator Kenny: I take a certain comfort in knowing that Senator Simard is listening. I am relieved to know that he is with me and that I have him in the palm of my hand. In any event, I shall have to start again.

This is a petition from a group of citizens who are upset with the goods and services tax. They are exercising their right to petition Parliament, and they refer to themselves as IRATE Citizens and IRATE, I am told, stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess." The first name at the top of the list is:

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Perrault: Don't rush now.

Senator van Roggen: Not too quickly, now.

Senator Kenny: I am sorry?

Senator Doody: You have lost his place again.

Senator Kenny: I would ask honourable senators to please bear with me. It is a difficult task but someone has to do it.

Senator Doyle: You are doing very well.

Senator Kenny: Thank you, Senator Doyle. That is the first kind word you have passed my way in some time.

Honourable senators, I have here a petition from the people in the Peterborough area who are unhappy with the goods and services tax, and they are exercising their right to petition Parliament. They are members of a group called IRATE Citizens. "IRATE" stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess." The first name on the list is:

(Names of signatories read)

• (1600)

That completes the 27 names on this particular petition.

I have here, honourable senators, another petition containing 27 names. These are people from the Peterborough area and they are exercising their right to petition Parliament. These people are very unhappy with the proposed goods and services tax. They feel it is unjust and they would like the Senate of Canada to do what it can to stop the tax from going forward. They belong to a group called IRATE. I am told that IRATE stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess."

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Lewis: Could I ask a question?

Senator Kenny: Certainly.

Senator Lewis: Is the name Rushton the same as the author's name?

Senator Kenny: It could be, although the address may not be the same. I don't think the author's address is known at this time.

Senator Lewis: I am sorry to have interrupted. I did not want to put you off.

Senator Kenny: That is all right. That is the top name on the list.

Senator Kinsella: Senator Kenny, perhaps it would be helpful for the honourable senator to note that that Rushton lives in Peterborough, Ontario, and so he is obviously not the author, who is living in the United Kingdom.

Senator Frith: That author's name is Rushdie.

Senator Kenny: It is possible, since we don't know where the author is staying now, that on this particular occasion he could have been at that location. That may not have occurred to honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should give a Notice of Inquiry.

Senator Simard: Order, Senator Frith. Order, please. Don't filibuster your own member. Show some discipline.

Senator Frith: You think this doesn't take discipline?

Senator Petten: Well said.

Senator Kenny: It occurs to me we may have lost track of where we are. I feel obliged to remind honourable senators that we are reading petitions. I have a petition here from some citizens in the Peterborough area who are unhappy with the goods and services tax, and they are exercising their right to petition the Senate in the hope that we will stop this tax from coming forward.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1610)

I have the name of E. Fawm, 27 Scriven Boulevard, Port Hope. Then I have Leah Evan from Smiths Falls, Ontario.

Senator Cools: I think Senator Kenny is reading too quickly.

Senator Frith: Senator Cools says you are reading too quickly, and I say it is a long way from Port Hope to Smiths Falls. It is approximately seven stops on VIA.

Senator Kenny: It is. It is far enough to force me back to the top of the petition if we are not careful.

Senator Frith: You will not have any trouble with me.

Senator Kenny: You will have to bear with me. I am doing my best.

(Names of signatories read)

That concludes the 27 names on this petition.

Honourable senators, I have here a more substantial petition with 50 names on it. It is from people in the Peterborough area who are upset with the goods and services tax. They are members of a group that calls itself IRATE Citizens. I am told that IRATE stands for "I am rebelling against tax excess." These folk are also from the central part of eastern Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

I have only two more names on this petition.

● (1620)

Senator Ottenheimer: That is interesting.

Senator Kenny: Well, I can start over if necessary.

(Names of signatories read)

I will have more petitions at a later date.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have the privilege to present a petition from the City of North York, which in October endorsed a unanimous resolution requesting that the government reject the goods and services tax or defer its implementation. This resolution bears brief recitation. It is important—indeed, compelling. It states:

● (1630)

> WHEREAS the Federal Government is determined to impose its Goods and Services Tax despite the public outcry;
> AND WHEREAS it is widely believed that public opinion has swelled to 80% of Canadians opposed to the G.S.T.;
> AND WHEREAS Canadian taxpayers feel as though they are being taxed to death;
> AND WHEREAS North York taxpayers and the Corporation of the City of North York will be adversely impacted by the G.S.T.;
> AND WHEREAS the Federal Government will be spending over $260 million in 1990-91 alone for salaries and promotion to implement the G.S.T. which is an outrageous waste of our tax dollars;
> AND WHEREAS the Country is on the verge of a serious and deepening financial recession which will be seriously aggravated by this untimely tax;
> THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that North York Council inform the Federal Government and the Prime Minister's office that it strongly opposes the implementation of the Federal Goods and Services Tax at this time;
> AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the Clerk forward North York Council's Resolution to all 4,400 municipalities in Canada as quickly as possible and urge all municipal councils to endorse our Resolution and voice their concern in the strongest terms possible to the Prime Minister and Federal Members of Parliament;
> AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the Clerk request all the municipalities to provide North York with a copy of their Council's Resolution respecting the G.S.T. and the date on which it was sent to the Federal Government;
> AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that the Federal Government be requested to take the necessary action, including the substantial cutting of Government programs, to eliminate the Federal deficit and thereby eliminate the need for this new and burdensome tax.

There is attached to this resolution an endorsement by the rural municipality of Kindersley, Saskatchewan, signed by Mr. Empey, the Administrator. This resolution was moved by Messrs. Lastman and Yuill, the mayor and senior councillor of the City of North York.

As honourable senators will recall, I represent metro Toronto. The City of North York is one of the great cities that compose the family which in turn makes up Metropolitan Toronto. This resolution is of importance to me and to other senators present since some senators not only represent the same region but also live in the area. I believe that Senator Stanbury resides in North York. My mother who for years lived in London, Ontario, is now living in North York. A large number of my family live in North York. All of them have said to me in the course of the past few months that we, as senators, should do all in our power to bring the wishes of these hard working citizens and taxpayers to the attention of the Senate and, hopefully, to the Government of Canada, to reject the GST.

I started my political career in North York in the riding of York Centre. At the time, Senator Stanbury was the President of the York Centre Riding Association. The candidate, who was later elected, was the late and very distinguished James Walker who became the whip of the Liberal federal caucus and who was beloved by members on all sides. North York is a place of special importance to me since, when I first got married, I resided in that area for several years. Part of my law training took place within the confines of North York.

I think it is important, honourable senators, to note that this is not a partisan resolution of the City of North York. The City of North York is composed of members of all parties—Conservatives, Liberals and the New Democratic Party. It is a telling point that members of all parties at the municipal level have combined in a unanimous fashion to plead with the federal government in light of the economic circumstances and the concern taxpayers have with the rise in taxes to suggest that this tax be deferred.

In recent days we have had some very disturbing news from metro Toronto. It is that wage rates are now higher in the greater metropolitan Toronto area for the first time than wages in equivalent communities in the United States.

In addition, the further disturbing news is that taxes, real estate, municipal or provincial, are now causing inflation. This makes it very difficult for citizens to respond to the request of the Central Bank to curb their inflationary impulses when the problem, as we currently see it in Canada which is causing the cost push, is not because of the efforts, the ambitions or greed of individual taxpayers but is due to inflation caused by taxes imposed by various levels of government.

As we consider third reading of this bill are honourable senators opposite concerned with economic policy and with introducing the appropriate economic measures that would bring economic health back to the economic body politic of Canada? Clearly, they must keep in mind the fact that the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada are impressed by the notion that the GST rather than diminishing inflation will add yet another cost push to feed the monster inflation they are trying to curb.

One of the largest cities in Canada, the City of North York, is now in the throes of a serious economic recession. It is pleading with the Senate, and with the government, that the GST, a government-made measure, be deferred. I do not know how one can react in a neutral way to this resolution. I do not know how honourable senators opposite, including those recently appointed to represent the region of the province of Ontario, can stand in their place to vote for this measure when there appears to be near unanimity on the part of the populations and the public which they represent and who admonish them to defer this rather monstrous economic measure which will so undermine the economic health of the communities that have made Canada such a great place.

I should point out that the other disturbing news from Metropolitan Toronto this week which should be of concern to senators on all sides, is the dramatic increase in crime. For the first time we see figures on Metropolitan Toronto that robberies and break-ins are increasing at such an alarming rate that the municipality of Metropolitan Toronto is now being called upon to increase its police budget. Surely there is a direct connection between economic recession and civil unrest and crime in the streets.

We in greater Metropolitan Toronto have always been proud of the fact that our city was safe and sound and worked. Clearly this economic recession is ripping and destroying the good foundations that have made Toronto such an important engine of growth, not only for Ontario but for all of Canada. These figures represent horrible, awesome signals. They are directly related to the economic circumstances by which Canadian taxpayers have become victims of their government, and that is why they are imploring governments to reverse the trend. Surely if the government does not look at these economic factors, if the Minister of Finance, who represents an area of Metropolitan Toronto, does not understand these circumstances and if the Bank of Canada does not understand that this bill directly increases the tax load, costs and burden of Canadians, and that it will result in further civil unrest, then they are misleading themselves and they are misleading the public.

So I implore honourable senators to take this unanimous resolution of the City of North York into consideration. We in Toronto have a growing problem, and I think the same situation is reflected in other parts of the country as well. Surely we cannot leave this situation as it is without doing everything in our power to try to correct it as quickly as possible.

The GST will harm the hoped-for and anticipated economic revival of Metropolitan Toronto, Ontario and the rest of Canada. So, with all the persuasion that I can bring to bear, I would ask honourable senators, particularly those opposite, who share the same statistics as I do and, I am sure, share the same concerns, to look at these issues and the nature of this civil unrest. I am sure that honourable senators opposite will be able to divine for themselves the cost of civil unrest that inflates the budgets of the municipalities and the provinces, and that should be borne in mind as they try to increase yet another tax that will accelerate the vicious cycle of more tax, more unrest, more problems, more tax. Let us kill that cycle by rejecting the GST.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure of presenting a few petitions that have been received from the good people of Newfoundland. I have one here dated November 2. The petition is to the Senate and it is calling on the Senate to do what it can to stop the Goods and Services Tax being imposed. It goes on to say:

> Whereas the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of the Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

Senator Bonnell: Is Marystown a shipbuilding town?

Senator Lewis: Marystown has a shipbuilding yard where they hope to do a lot of work in prepararing the ships for the Hibernia oil field.

Senator Bonnell: Is there any chance that they might build a new ferry for Prince Edward Island?

Senator Lewis: If you are in the market, I would be glad to find out to whom you should address the inquiry.

Senator Bonnell: Would you have any financing to back it up?

Senator Lewis: I might put in a dollar.

Senator Petten: I will put in another dollar.

Senator Lewis: The rest will have to come from P.E.I., but any work that we get would be very helpful to the Marystown shipyard.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps we could contact the Department of Transport to see if they will build a new ship to run between Tormentine and Borden and Caribou and Wood Island.

Senator Lewis: That would be fine, and we would be glad to have the work. Unfortunately, Senator Bonnell has made me lose my place.

He is from Saint Lawrence where the fluorspar mine is.

Senator Petten: Is that mine still operating?

Senator Lewis: Yes.

Senator Bonnell: What kind of mine is that?

Senator Lewis: Fluorspar. I believe it is used in making steel and iron, but I suggest that you go and look it up. The fluorspar used to be shipped from Saint Lawrence to North Sydney.

● (1650)

Honourable senators, I have another petition with 28 names on it. This is from various places in Newfoundland. It is quite surprising that they are not all from the same area. This petition is on the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax, and although it probably should not be read in full, since it is very short I will read it:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have another short petition here containing 27 names. This petition is on the subject of the proposed national goods and services tax. These petitioners are calling upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1700)

I would ask that these three petitions be tabled. Thank you very much, honourable senators.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have many petitions from the citizens of the province I represent in this chamber, all of whom petition the Senate to defeat what they called the Conservative goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with the same message to all senators, to defeat this tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with the same message to senators.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1710)

We hope our friends opposite are listening to this. I have another petition from Toronto.

(Names of signatories read)

I have one last short petition on the same subject. It contains only seven names.

(Names of signatories read)

I would like to table these petitions, honourable senators, in the hope that our friends opposite are listening to the voices of all the Canadian people. We have hundreds more of these from people who are protesting this tax.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I, too, have petitions I would like to read into the record, largely from Albertans and British Columbians, but westerners generally. They contain the same cry: Please, we humbly pray and prevail upon the Senate to stop the GST. The first ones I will read are from Bow Island in Alberta.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1720)

The next petition is also from residents of Bow Island, as well as from residents of Saskatchewan and Medicine Hat.

[Senator Lewis.]

(Names of signatories read)

Again, I have another long list of names from Alberta. Virtually all of them are from Medicine Hat, Bow Island Or Pincher Creek. All of these people object to the GST and are asking the Senate to stop it.

(Names of signatories read)

When I see all the names of petitioners from the province I represent, I am sure that many named here voted for me in my election to the Senate. Therefore, I feel compelled to draw to honourable senators' attention the very great need to get my amendment on the floor as soon as we finish the vote on the eighth Liberal amendment. These petitioners would expect no less.

● (1730

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

(Names of signatories read)

It is especially important to me when I read the names of Albertans who are begging us to stop the GST, demanding to take some action to stop this iniquitous bill.

An Hon. Senator: Order.

Senator Waters: There is a chance that I may not get the floor to introduce my amendment. I want to urge the Speaker to notice where I am standing and to recognize that I will be standing here again at the conclusion of the vote. I expect to be recognized and to have an opportunity to introduce my amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: It is 5.45 p.m.

Senator Frith: Do I understand that Senator Waters is raising a question of privilege?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Order please. Honourable senators, it is 5.45 p.m. Pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3.(a), the Senate shall proceed to the deferred division on Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment to Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that Bill C-62 be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault, for the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Bill be amended to provide for four categories of tax rates and to grant tax-free status to books, children's clothing and non-prescription drugs,

(1) on page 65, by striking out lines 43 and 44 and substituting the following:

"equal to

(a) 7 % of the value of the consideration for the supply if the supply is not set out in Schedule VIII, or

(b) such percentage of the value of a supply as is set out in Schedule VIII in respect of that supply.";

(2) on page 131, by striking out lines 30 to 32 and substituting the following:

"Canada a tax equal to

(a) 7 % of the value of the consideration of the supply if the supply is not set out in Schedule VIII, or

(b) such percentage of the value of a supply as is set out in Schedule VIII in respect of that supply.";

(3) on page 343, by adding immediately after Schedule VII the following:

"SCHEDULE VIII

1. A supply of a passenger automobile with a retail value of $40,000.00 or more but not in excess of $50,000.00 ..... 10%;
2. A supply of a passenger automobile with a retail value in excess of $50,000.00, but not in excess of $60,000.00 ..... 15%;
3. A supply of an item of clothing with a retail value in excess of $1,000.00 ..... 20%.
4. A supply of a passenger automobile with a retail value in excess of $60,000.00 ..... 20%;

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is after 6 o'clock—

Senator Murray: —I move that the orginal—

Senator Frith: —and the Speaker must leave the Chair.

Senator Murray: —question be now put.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I move that under Rule 26—

The Hon. the Speaker: The rules here say that I have to order—that the Orders of the Day shall now be called.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: So this is your next stunt! It's absolutely disgusting!

The Hon. the Speaker: I am calling for Orders of the Day—

Senator Perrault: You're a disgrace! What's wrong with you people? You're all a bunch of crooks!

The Hon. the Speaker: —which is what the rules say.

Senator Molgat: If he wants to call Orders of the Day, all right, call Orders of the Day, and anyone who wants to get up and speak—

• (1800)

Senator Frith: It is 6 o'clock! Rule 12 requires you to leave the Chair!

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Frith: You cannot stay in the Chair. It is after 6 o'clock, and you cannot stay in the Chair. Come back at 8 o'clock.

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Lawson: That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but—

Some Hon. Senators: Sit down! Order!

Senator Waters:

—that it be amended to become effective in 1992 instead of 1991 as presently provided in the Bill and, to that end, that the necessary consequential changes be made to the various clauses of the Bill, as more particularly set out hereunder:

(1) on page 2, in line 27, by striking out "1991" and substituting "1992".

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters:

(2) on page 3,

(a) in line 25, by striking out "1990" and substituting "1991",

(b) in line 33, by striking out "1990" and substituting "1991".

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Waters:

(3) on page 4,

(a) in line 40, by striking out "1990" and substituting "1991",

(b) in line 44, by striking out "1990"—

An Hon. Senator: The sound has been cut off. I cannot hear Senator Waters.

At 9:30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I now make the motion to adjourn. This motion is made under Rule 46. Two rules apply. Under Rule 46:

No notice is required of the following motions:

(f) for the adjournment of the Senate, while a matter is under discussion;

I think most honourable senators will agree that the matter is very definitely under discussion.

Then, we have to turn to Rule P-3(e) which says:

In cases not provided for in these Provisional Rules any division requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) may be deferred for a period not to exceed 24 hours whereupon > the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to call in the Senators to be sounded and the same shall continue until the Government and Opposition Whips have entered the Chamber and indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote, but in any case the said bells shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken.

Now let us just review. In the first place, of course, that question must be put right away.

Senator Doody: There is a question already on the floor.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, honourable senators, order! order!

Senator Perrault: It has not been put. No question has been put.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Order, order, order. As acting speaker, I rule the motion out of order because, having been in this chamber previously, I heard another motion put, that being the motion of Senator Murray.

• (2140)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: You ruled it out of order before you heard any debate at all, did you?

Senator Wood: She is out of order!

Senator Perrault: She has made a ruling without any debate! There is no debate anymore.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order on what appears to be a ruling by the Chair—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order!

Senator MacEachen: —which flies in face of the facts—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Sit down!

Senator MacEachen: —and which goes to the root of the problem that we are facing at the moment. It appears to me that what has happened since six o'clock is that the occupants of the Chair have failed to observe normal events in the Senate because the present incumbent is telling us—

An Hon. Senator: You stormed the Chair! You want mob rule!

Senator MacEachen: —that there is a motion before the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Who stormed the Chair?

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: There is no motion before the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator MacEachen: There is no motion before the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Yes, there is.

Senator Frith: What is it? No motion has been put.

Senator MacEachen: Let us review the sequence of events.

Senator Doyle: Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Doyle: Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator MacEachen: Let us review the sequence of events that occurred in the Senate.

Senator Balfour: Follow the rules! Take your seat!

Senator MacEachen: I want to review those events, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: You sit down when the Speaker is standing. Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

An Hon. Senator: Oh, my. Look who is shouting now!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to review those events.

Senator Balfour: It is the great parliamentarian!

Senator MacEachen: At—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Sit down!

Senator Molgat: You cannot read that motion!

An Hon. Senator: You would not know a motion if it hit you in the face!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Sit down! Sit down!

Senator Cogger: Order!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Sit down!

The Hon. the Speaker resumed the Chair.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

An Hon. Senator: No!

Senator Murray: Sit down!

Senator Cogger: Sit down!

Senator Frith: I called the meeting—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Hatfield: Sit down at once. Can you not see that the Speaker is standing?

Senator Frith: The motion that the Senate do now adjourn must be put immediately.

Senator Petten: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Agreed.

Senator Frith: It does not matter what else is happening—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

Senator Frith: The senators can then—

Senator Murray: Sit down when the Speaker is standing!

Senator Hatfield: Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Aren't they—

Senator Perrault: Why don't you listen? Listen to this!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, having left the chamber for approximately 15 minutes—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the motion is that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to suspend the session for one hour—

Senator Murray: Order!

An Hon. Senator: No way!

Senator Frith: The motion must be put!

The Hon. the Speaker: —while I study the previous motion—

Senator Frith: That motion must be put no matter what!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to suspend the sitting for approximately three-quarters of an hour to one hour. I have been thinking about the previous question, and the motion referred to by Senator Waters. I shall retire to think about the question and motion and will then return to the chamber to give my ruling.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, the idea of—

An Hon. Senator: You can overrule them!

The Hon. the Speaker: You can overrule me; I know that. I will try to have something to—

Senator Cogger: Sit down, please, Senator Frith!

The Hon. the Speaker: Please hear me out, honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Forget it. I will not sit down!

The Hon. the Speaker: That is, unless the leaders can get together to find a solution.

Senator Frith: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that all right?

Senator Frith: I understand what you are saying. But the fact is that what is for you to consider, or for any discussion to consider, is—

Senator Cogger: What is the difference?

Senator Frith: —the question of recognizing who is to be recognized;—

Senator Robertson: Order!

Senator Hatfield: Order. Sit down!

Senator Frith: —and the question of an alleged motion to put the previous question; and another—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down! You are not the Speaker!

Senator Perrault: You sit down!

Senator Frith: He is sitting down. Why should I sit down because you are telling me to do so? He is sitting down. I have the floor.

Senator Atkins: I am sure that he knows what he has to do respecting the matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to suspend for one hour and then I will return.

Senator Cogger: Sit down now. The Speaker is standing up. Sit down!

Senator Simard: You think that you can only apply the rules that you wish to apply?

Senator Perrault: He is explaining his position. Can't you listen to it?

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 12:25 a.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of personal privilege. I can assure honourable senators that I am not embarking upon a personal filibuster. This is a matter of personal privilege.

Honourable senators, certain things have been said this evening. I have been in politics long enough to know that in the heat of battle we say things we later wish we had not said. That I understand perfectly. But I feel that I am obliged to stand up to say now that I object to what was said. It was heard by representatives of the media. The event took place in front of the Speaker's Chair. I was accused by Senator Murray, and following certain statements, he said, " Sober up, by Jesus Christ."

Honourable senators, I said at the outset that I know that we sometimes say things in the heat of battle. I have been involved in partisan politics long enough to know that. I regret that it was said, but I am simply saying what I was told was said. The accusation was totally untrue and unfair.

Furthermore, Senator Murray said, "If you want violence, you will get violence." He said, "You pig." He said, "You Goddamned son of a bitch."

Honourable senators, I have checked with my colleagues and several of them are prepared to vouch that that was said.

Having said that, I repeat that I know we can say things in the heat of battle that we should not say. I do not want to prolong this matter any further, but I would ask that Senator Murray retract those statements and apologize forthwith.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, first of all, whatever people may have thought they heard, there was no profanity used by me.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Olson: That's a lie!

Senator Murray: Yes, I did say, "Sober up." As the honourable senator suggested, that was said in the heat of an exchange in front of the Speaker's Chair when I thought that the honourable senator was attempting to usurp it. We had words. I apologize for having said that. I withdraw it unequivocally. I did not threaten violence, but I did say that we were heading to violence and I did ask, "Do you want violence?" I said many weeks ago here, in the middle of a similar situation, "The next step on the downward slope that we have been on around here is violence." What else comes after the kind of mob rule that we have been experiencing here?

Senator Buckwold: Resignation.

Senator Murray: In any case, I state that I did not use profanity. I did say, "Sober up." I did make a statement about violence—not threatening violence, but a statement about leading to violence; and if, for whatever the reason, the honourable senator found personally offensive my conduct or my words, I have no hesitation whatever in withdrawing them unequivocally and apologizing to him.

Senator Molgat: I accept that and I thank the honourable senator.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, after this long day, I suggest that we suspend the sitting until tomorrow afternoon at 2 p.m.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE

Thursday, November 22, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

On April 5, 1989, your Committee was given direction by the Senate to monitor and report on the implementation and application in both countries of the Canada—United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, as well as on any other related trade matter.

Consequently, the Committee has undertaken a series of hearings on aspects of the Agreement itself and upon related matters and has directed its staff to prepare periodic surveys of development. These meetings and the research done by the staff have attempted to track how the two governments have met their commitments under the FTA and to gather and examine evidence of the costs and benefits to Canada of the FTA. In addition, the Committee has considered the nature and impact of several other related developments in the international trading system, including the progress of the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations, Europe 1992, and the prospect for enhanced North American trade relations as presented by Mexico's trade liberalization agenda.

In March 1990, the Committee submitted its first report under this order of reference. At that time the Committee was of the view that "even though definitive conclusions about the utility of the FTA as a policy instrument, and recommendations flowing from them, will be some years in coming, enough has emerged from the work of the Committee, and from the Staff Report, after the first year under the FTA, to point to some reasonably strong conclusions on issues which demand further and continuous monitoring". To this end, the Committee made several recommendations for new or additional government action.

Since that time the Committee has continued its efforts to follow developments. This report, however, does not seek to advance any new arguments or call for any action additional to that already recommended by the Committee, but rather presents an updated report on developments prepared by the research staff. In some areas, such as dispute resolution there is much to report, while in others there is little new that can be said at this time. As well, a number of new issues are addressed. In particular, the Committee has heard from several witnesses on the problems being experienced by specific sectors of industry in Canada.

Like the earlier staff report, this report attempts to be descriptive rather than judgemental, providing a factual account of various developments. It has also tried to be as wide in scope as possible so as to provide, in one place, a compilation of the many different forces and actions at play in the international trading system. This is done, not to suggest that everything flows from or is related to the Free Trade Agreement, but to place the FTA in the context of the changing global economy. The aim is to allow the reader to assess how those other forces and developments outside the ambit of the FTA have played, and will continue to play, an important role in the process of implementation of the FTA and in the ongoing restructuring of the Canadian economy.

The Committee will continue to monitor developments and will report again as appropriate.

Respectfully submitted,

JOHN B. STEWART
Chairman

THE SENATE

[Editor's Note: Continuation of Proceedings from Issue No. 113A.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 3:55 p.m., Friday, November 23, 1990, the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry that we have again kept you waiting. All day we have been trying to find an answer to the impasse and so far we have not been successful. In view of the time of day and the fact that senators, I presume, have to catch planes or trains, I think we should suspend the sitting until 2 o'clock on Monday afternoon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have no difficulty with what His Honour has said, but I wonder whether it would be better to adjourn rather than suspend, because if we do we will be able to get our Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, and so on, for yesterday. If there is no difficulty, I would prefer to see the Senate adjourn.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think that in the past the procedure on an occasion like this has been to suspend. If it is necessary to have copies of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate, I am sure they can be made available.

Senator MacEachen: I should like to have a copy of the official record of the proceedings of yesterday so that we will have them when we meet on Monday. If we do not adjourn, we will not have that. That is the only point of my intervention. I cannot understand why we cannot adjourn.

Senator Doody: I think that can be arranged by the Table. Over the past few weeks Hansards have been issued in sections when the day's proceedings have lasted three, four or five calendar days. As a matter of fact, they are pretty well up to date now.

Senator MacEachen: If the Deputy Leader of the Government is giving the assurance that we will have the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for November 22 on Monday, I do not mind.

Senator Doody: Can that be done?

A Clerk at the Table: Unofficially, yes.

Senator Doody: Yes.

Hon. H. A. Olson: The Clerk said that it could only be done "unofficially." I am not sure if that satisfies the question Senator MacEachen asked.

Senator Doody: I have asked the Table if it is possible to get the record that Senator MacEachen is asking for, and that it be made available to the Senate on Monday. I have been told, "yes."

Senator Olson: "Unofficially" was the answer.

Senator Doody: I do not know how much more official it can be. The Table is in charge of the printing process. They manage it. I do not control the printing press personally, although perhaps I should. I have given the assurance insofar as I can.

Senator MacEachen: I have difficulty in accepting the assurance that whatever document is produced to recount the events of yesterday will be regarded as an authentic record.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Hansard is out already.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes, but I do not know why the Minutes are not.

The Hon. the Speaker: The sitting is suspended until 2 o'clock on Monday.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Monday, November 26, 1990, at 2 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—SPECIAL ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I want to apologize for the delay that we have experienced. I have held meetings with the leaders of both parties and with Senators Lawson and Waters in order to find a resolution to the problems that faced us. I believe we now have an agreement and I thank honourable senators for their patience.

I believe that Senator Doody may propose a Special Order to the house.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the agreement that His Honour the Speaker will put before the house was an agreement reached through the good offices of the Speaker with the parties mentioned.

I would be only too pleased to add my name as a mover, if that would please Your Honour, but Your Honour should tell us what is in the Special Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: I shall read the document:

SPECIAL ORDER

WITH LEAVE OF THE SENATE, with respect to Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act, it is ordered:

THAT the Honourable Senator Murray's motion "that the original question be now put" be temporarily set aside until two amendments have been disposed of by the Senate as moved by the Honourable Senator Waters and the Honourable Senator Lawson;

THAT at eight o'clock this evening the Honourable Senator Waters shall resume the debate on the motion for the third reading of the Bill, and, after not more than six hours of debate on the third reading motion, he shall move his amendment, and the question thereon shall be put after not more than six hours of debate on the amendment;

After the vote on Senator Waters' amendment has been completed, Senator Lawson shall then resume the debate on the motion for the third reading of the Bill, and, after not more than six hours of debate on the third reading motion, he shall move his amendment, and the question thereon shall be put after not more than six hours of debate on the amendment; and

THAT divisions on each of the said amendments, if required, shall be pursuant to provisional rule P-3.(a).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if we are going to proceed, we should note that it is six o'clock and, if we are proceeding past six o'clock, that we are doing so with unanimous consent.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I assume that the Speaker will ask for the motion to be accepted by the house as a house order; we shall then proceed, as the Speaker has outlined, at 8 p.m.. Is that correct?

The Hon. the Speaker: That is correct.

Senator Frith: Whose motion is it?

Senator Doody: The motion will be put in my name and Senator Kelly is prepared to second it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Doody, seconded by Senator Kelly, that the Special Order be adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make about the Special Order which has been moved by Senator Doody and seconded by Senator Kelly. It is an order which basically affects the rights of independent members and I am pleased that is it now possible to have amendments moved by Senator Waters and Senator Lawson. The Special Order provides for the conditions under which the amendments and the debate will take place.

The expression "agreement has been reached" ought to be interpreted as a series of arrangements that provide the opportunity for the independents in that sense, and not an agreement between the Government and the Opposition in the same sense as the earlier Special Order, which was negotiated directly between the two parties. If an analogy could be drawn, this would be more of an agreement between the Government or the Speaker and the independents, supported by the Opposition. My concern throughout was to ensure that the rights of the independents were respected without removing any of the normal rights of the Official Opposition.

I believe that I must make a comment so that, in future, there will be no doubt as to my understanding of the expression in the first sentence, namely, "THAT the Honourable Senator Murray's motion 'that the original question be now put' be temporarily set aside".

The procedural status of that motion is, in my view, highly dubious. One can agree that those words were uttered by Senator Murray and that he did rise and say them. However, on examining the Votes and Proceedings, which is the official record of the Senate for that day, there is no evidence that that motion was put to the Senate. There is no evidence in Hansard that that motion was put to the Senate. There is evidence, in fact, that Senator Murray uttered those words after Senator Frith had called six o'clock, and that he uttered them before the Orders of the Day were called.

Honourable senators, I am making those comments not to challenge the passage of this order—not at all—but to put on the record the view which I hold about the events which occurred last Friday, which can be verified or otherwise by honourable senators who wish to refer either to the Debates or to the official Minutes of the Senate.

I conclude by saying that, in one sense, we have moved beyond the events of Friday into what I hope will be a phase which will provide the further opportunity for members of the Senate to debate the GST.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that we on this side are also pleased that the independent senators have been given this opportunity to present their amendments.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Doody: Honourable senators have very short memories. It was Senator Phillips and Senator Kelly who first approached our friends with a view to finding a way to accommodate them, since they had been left out of the original agreement.

Senator Steuart: And who killed it? Your seatmate there and Harvie Andre. Don't try to rewrite history.

Senator Doody: We are trying to get this place back on an even keel and if you can keep your cool until January we will all succeed.

Senator Murray: Senator Steuart retires in January.

Senator Doody: I believe all honourable senators agree that the motion is indeed in order, and I believe it is quite well recorded that it has been received and has been so printed in the Minutes and in Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall suspend the sitting until eight o'clock.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the third reading of the Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, before I move my amendment to Bill C-62, which amendment is seconded by Senator Lawson, I thought that many of you might be interested in this piece of paper that was issued at about 6 p.m. today. It does not look like very much. However, I did a little statistical work on it. It represents 90 hours of work—and some 200 words. That works out to about 27 minutes per word. I thought that would be of some interest to honourable senators. At that speed it would take us a long time to get through the type of amendment I am going to move tonight.

I move, seconded by Senator Lawson:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to become effective in 1992 instead of 1991 as presently provided in the Bill and, to that end, that the necessary consequential changes be made to the various clauses of the Bill, as more particularly set out hereunder:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Waters: Absolutely.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is it his intention to read the entire amendment? Since we now have an indication of what it contains, could it be deposited as written so that we could get on to the explanation of it? That is only a suggestion.

Senator Waters: The honourable senator has caught on quickly to the format I was following. I admire that quickness, but I thought that, for the benefit of some of the slower senators, I would read the whole of the amendment. Senators will have the marvellous opportunity of hearing it yet again when the Speaker goes through it. I think they will enjoy that, as well.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Moved by Senator Waters, seconded by Senator Lawson, that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to become effective in 1992 instead of 1991 as presently provided in the Bill and, to that end, that the necessary consequential changes be made to the various clauses of the Bill, as more particularly set out hereunder:

Senator Waters, I did not quite understand the correction you wanted at page 15 of the French version of the bill. I have reached that page now. Would you please clarify that? I did not quite understand what you had in mind.

Senator Waters: At page 15, the last line, the last date. At page 314 of the bill, this amendment replaces 1991 with 1992. That is the only change in the French version.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, senator, but is that at page 15 of the French version?

Senator Waters: Page 15 of the amendments to the French version that I have refers to paragraph 61, page 314 of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: All right, I will get to that, thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to my amendment. Before doing so, I would like to thank the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition for their diligence and co-operation in finally agreeing to prepare the special order which allowed both myself and Senator Lawson the opportunity to make amendments to Bill C-62.

For the record, I would also like to direct a comment, to Senator Kelly, who I notice is not present, who was offended by a word I used in describing the efforts he had made during my press conference. Senator Kelly, I withdraw that word. It is a four letter word which is not "chaos", "debt" or "doubt" — "doubt" is a five letter word. I withdraw it, Senator Kelly, if it is upsetting you.

I would like to begin with an examination, which I believe we have not done in this chamber, concerning what the federal sales tax is about.

It is very important that we all understand exactly what the FST has done for Canada for 65 years. The FST has been included, in part and in whole, for 65 years, and raises about $20 billion a year, which is roughly 18 per cent of all federal revenues. It is the second largest source of government revenue.

What honourable senators may not understand, as we have not pressed this very hard, the federal sales tax is levied at four different rates on four different areas. It is frequently and erroneously compared as being analogous to the manufacturers sales tax, and that is not true. The Federal Sales Tax is essentially 19 per cent on all alcohol and tobacco products; it is 11 per cent on all telecommunications; it is 9 per cent on all building materials; and it is 13.5 per cent as a manufacturers sales tax. Those are the four components which make up the federal sales tax which is being replaced by the goods and services tax.

The government claims—in my opinion with some justification—that the FST is a bad tax and has been condemned for about 50 years, going right back to the Rowell-Sirois Commission in 1914, the Carter Commission, and many other studies. It is a hidden, complex tax that is charged on a very narrow base, which is also subject to many avoidance measures, and it places Canadian-made products at a disadvantage against imported goods. Therefore, there are a number of measures against it.

The key question to ask, perhaps, is simply this: If the FST is such an iniquitous tax and must be replaced, what are the real options? The bottom line on that question is to find the simplest, fairest and most effective way of funding roughly $20 billion of revenue that would be lost by removing the FST. It makes no sense to replace the bad FST with a worse tax model. There is much serious evidence to suggest that, as now written, the proposed GST would be a worse tax. The recent eight Liberal amendments—and there could have been 20 or 50—highlighted the kind of changes that should be made to improve the GST, if—and it is a very big "if"—a consumption tax is the way to go. That is not our only choice in Canada, and it would certainly not be the only choice that Mr. Wilson had.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in its report, identified at least ten alternatives and discussed very briefly the advantages and disadvantages of each. What the committee did not examine, nor was it in its mandate, was the need for expenditure reductions in federal spending which could have reduced or eliminated in part the need for either an FST or GST. That is not to say that the Senate Committee's Report was not an excellent one, and I, along with many other senators, congratulated Senator Buckwold on the report. We thought it was excellent. However, it was not the only choice.

This option, which I am going to discuss for a moment, was not in the committee's mandate. It is interesting that in this downturn business, virtually every major corporation in Canada—Imperial Oil, Domtar, Stelco, Petro-Can, Air Canada, and many others—when faced by deficits caused by shortfalls and revenues to meet expenditures, takes immediate action to correct the imbalance. What kind of immediate action do they take? They cut costs. They do not have the same choice as the government. By cutting costs they avoid insolvency and bankruptcy.

As I will point out later, the government today is very close to being an insolvent government. It seems that the government has no fat to trim, or that is what it has claimed; yet only two weeks ago the Prime Minister stated that to raise the money necessary for a military force in Iraq he would have to cut some fat from federal spending. That is a move well overdue, in my opinion, since I believe there is a lot of fat in federal spending.

One of the great mysteries in Ottawa is the fate of the Nielsen Task Force Report on government spending. That was a monumental report of some 20 volumes, prepared by a distinguished blue-ribbon committee of senior businessmen, bureaucrats and politicians, and chaired by the then Deputy Prime Minister, Eric Nielsen. The report followed the most exhaustive study of federal government spending ever attempted. The report covers 20 volumes dealing with different areas of government activity, and there is a summary volume which is volume 21. The report is available through the Queen's Printer for $475. It is heavy-going in part, but it is a most exhaustive examination of a most important subject, which is: Where is the money going; where are these vast sums of tax dollars being spent? The Nielsen Task Force committee identified hundreds of areas for remedial action with a view to achieving greater effectiveness and efficiency in government operations at lower cost. Whatever happened to that report? Why was not more action taken flowing from that report? The report was completed at the right time, and it was done for the right motives, but no real action that I can find was taken to implement the recommendations of that report. Let me turn now to a quote of James Gillies, a former Deputy Minister of Finance who is now Dean of York University. In a recent article, Mr. Gillies said the following:—

• (2130)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): With the greatest respect, Senator, I think that our friend, Jim Gillies, was never Deputy Minister of Finance or, to the best of my knowledge and recollection, ever in that department.

Senator Waters: I stand corrected. When he left the government, he partnered in a consulting business with Simon Reisman, a former Deputy Minister of Finance.

Senator Murray: He is a distinguished former member of Parliament.

Senator Waters: Distinguished former member of Parliament; he partnered with former Deputy Minister of Finance, Simon Reisman, in a consulting firm, when they both left. I stand corrected.

Senator Hastings: And adviser to the former Prime Minister.

Senator Waters: He is now dean of York University. In any case, he wrote this article and I am quoting from some of the comments he made in this article which I think are germane to our discussion on the GST. I am quoting James Gillies:

> By any standard, whether business having to use resources simply to find out how government operates, or by the number of over-lapping decision-making bodies in place, Canada is wildly over-governed. And because it is over-governed, it is poorly governed. How else is it possible to explain that a country spared the ravages of war or revolution within its boundaries and so richly blessed in resources, has managed.

1. To accumulate one of the largest per capita domestic debts of any nation,

2. To build the largest per capita international debt in the world,

3. To have among the highest personal income taxes anywhere,

4. To fail to move, in a hundred years, from an underdeveloped to a developed country and

5. To be racked with constitutional difficulties which may yet result in the breaking up of the country.

No single political party, no matter how bad, could achieve all these negative things on its own. But clearly the political decision making system of the nation has. They didn't all happen by chance.

In the last analysis the political leaders have to take the blame for these failures because none have been willing to face up to the basic task of restructuring the political process so that the country can be governed effectively and efficiently.

Anyone who has more than casual dealings with Ottawa can confirm that this is a fact.

In October of 1990, the Fraser Institute in Vancouver, a prestigious economic think-tank with which most of you are familiar, has taken the initiative to form a new and important national committee entitled the National Tax Limitation Committee. This committee is under the chairmanship of Mr. Dick Currie, who is president of Loblaws. The task of this committee is to explore the legislative and constitutional means for limiting the growth of both taxes and expenditures.

Why is James Gillies so concerned? Why is Michael Walker, who is the Executive Director of the Fraser Institute, founding a national tax limitation committee? I think it is because the fiscal crisis facing the federal government is at disaster levels. We are facing the greatest financial crisis in the one hundred and twenty-four year history of this great nation.

Let me just review some of the facts. The Tories deserve full credit for the efforts they have made in getting the operating balance, which is the difference between the budgetary revenues and the program spending, down in 1989-1990 to a positive 9 billion dollars from a negative 15 billion dollars in 1984-1985. Commendable progress, which is a remarkable turn around that was obtained only because tax revenues increased sharply by 43 billion dollars in the same period while expenditures declined much more slowly by 18 billion dollars. Nevertheless, it was the right trend but it is far too slow.

Moreover, since the Tories came into office in 1984, the 32 tax increases, which have created the much higher revenue stream, have also reached the level where taxpayer resistance and resentment are at record high levels. What you are seeing in this GST tax revolt is just one manifestation of that anger. Those of you who have been out speaking to Canadian political and business audiences have felt that anger in the country.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: We are now one of the highest taxed nations in the world, and this is having a negative effect on our individuals, corporations, investment and job creation. I think by far the most serious fiscal problem is the exploding size of the national debt, up from 160 billion dollars in 1984 to 380 billion dollars in 1990. To service the interest on this staggering debt takes nearly 40 cents out of every tax dollar of revenue raised. It has placed the government in a 60-cent-on-the-dollar strait-jacket, and that strait-jacket will continue to tighten. This seriously impairs the government's ability to maintain the current programs and policies, let alone introduce any new ones. That is the crisis in Canada.

Hartland MacDougall, chairman of Royal Trust, made a very interesting comment the other day, and I quote:

> Our gross public debt is now around 380 billion dollars. Imagine this: if Canada had saved 1/2 million dollars every single day since the birth of Christ, we would not have saved enough to pay off our public debt.

It is another measure of the magnitude, of the staggering size of this debt.

In that sweeping mandate in 1984, when the Honourable Michael Wilson became Minister of Finance, he made his first economic statement in the House of Commons on the 8th of November, 1984. He said the following and I quote:

> The mandate of the 4th of September, 1984, reflects as well a sombre judgment about the recent past. When Canadians looked back, they saw an unprecedented decade of soaring government deficits and rising unemployment, of expansive intrusive government and sluggish uncertain economic growth. For too long, the government of Canada has responded to these serious problems in our economy by dealing with the symptoms of those problems and ignoring the causes. For too long, the government has tried to substitute the judgments of politicians and regulators for the judgments of those in the marketplace through excessive regulation and by trying to buy its way, with borrowed money, out of each new problem that arises. We have suffered for too long from the growing gap between the rhetoric of reliance on the private sector and the reality of increasing government intervention.

I loved to hear those words when I was a Tory. I thought that was the right way to start. He went on to say:

> Our immediate goal is to reduce the deficit through expenditure reductions and not through major tax increases.

Honourable Senators, he has not done that.

Senator Gigantès: You believed him.

Senator Waters: I might comment that the average annual deficit from 1984-85 to 1989-90 remained at about 30 billion dollars per year and is presently forecast to be in that range for fiscal 1990-91. Granted, higher interest rates than forecast are part of the problem. A finance minister must deal with both fiscal policy and monetary policy plus economic reality.

To go back to Mr. Wilson for that quote he made in November of 1984:

> At a time when Canadians are being asked to accept reductions in government programs and services, it is appropriate that Cabinet and Parliament also contribute. Ministerial pay of the Prime Minister and Cabinet members will be reduced by 15 per cent and 10 per cent respectively for the year beginning 1 January 1985. Parliament will also be asked to reduce its expenditures.

In retrospect, I sometimes feel that this was the high point in the Tory mandate. Whatever happened to this commendable commitment to austerity? At the risk of oversimplification, let me try to summarize the salient highlights of the fiscal crisis facing the federal government and, indeed, all Canadians.

Despite 32 tax increases in six years, the deficit has remained on average, roughly the same every year, at about $30 billion. The public debt, which was about $160 billion in 1984, has more than doubled to $380 billion. Servicing the interest only on the public debt—something like having a mortgage on one's future and ones country—is draining about 40 cents of each tax dollar of revenue raised.

Despite many highly publicized statements concerning spending controls, expenditures are up over that same six-year period by 30 per cent. To give it credit, the government has got the operating balance to a positive $9 billion, but only through sharply increased taxation.

Let me quote from an October 11, 1990, joint statement—the first I have ever seen—on the national economy prepared by the Business Council on National Issues, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. They are all prestigious organizations, and liberally laced with Tories. I think these are absolutely shocking statistics, and one measure of the fiscal crisis that we face.

The first point in their joint statement is that the combined federal-provincial government debt now stands at a staggering $450 billion. That tells us that the provinces of this country have a $70 billion debt. The fastest growing debt in the provinces was in the Province of Ontario.

They also point out that among the seven leading industrial nations Canada has the second largest government debt burden, equivalent to more than 70 per cent of our gross national product. Only in Italy is the burden of government debt higher. Despite seven consecutive years of positive economic growth, Ottawa's budget deficit was still close to $30 billion in 1989-90, which is equivalent to 4.7 per cent of the gross domestic product—far too high given the current state of the business cycle, which is in a downturn.

The government spends $95 million every day in interest costs alone. It is something to contemplate what one could do with $95 million a day if the government were debt free.

Increasing taxes is not a realistic solution to the deficit debt problem. The average Canadian family already spends 50 cents of every dollar of cash income on various kinds of taxes: income taxes, sales and excise taxes, school taxes and property taxes. The three levels of government in Canada—and we are vastly over governed—fail to recognize that there is only one taxpayer who funds every level of government. The burden is excessive. The burden is crushing. The burden will bring Canada to its knees. We should not forget that we are not immune to the inexorable law of economics. The burden is becoming too great to bear. Most of us probably forget that the average family now pays more in taxes than it does on food, clothing and shelter combined. In the old days of economics a family worried about providing food, clothing and shelter. Now, the greatest burden on any family is the tax burden. This is one of the reasons that the GST is getting such a hostile reception across the country.

My final point from the joint statement is a serious one. It is that Canada is borrowing more and more from foreigners, in large part because of our government's insatiable appetite for debt. Net foreign indebtedness has jumped from $137 billion in 1983 to $230 billion last year. Canada and the U.S. are now the world's two biggest debtor nations.

I have taken considerable time to highlight what I consider to be the major components in the fiscal crisis facing Canada as a backdrop for a more specific examination of this brand new consumption tax. The federal government has claimed that the elimination of the FST, and its four components which I mentioned earlier, and its replacement by the GST, is a fundamental part of a new economic strategy. It is an extension of its master plan for tax reform. The government claims, among other things, that the GST is a fairer tax, that it is more visible, revenue neutral, administratively and technically simple, progressive and non-inflationary. The Senate committee found little evidence to support these extravagant claims and, frankly, nor have I.

On the contrary, the more one looks at Bill C-62 and the more one listens to the concerns of hundreds and hundreds of Canadians and hundreds and hundreds of organizations in Canada, the more convinced one becomes that this is a bad tax being imposed upon us at a bad time.

I attended one of the hearings of the Senate committee in Edmonton. I found the views expressed there illustrative of the attitude of most Canadians. The people who testified before the committee were angry. I believe there was only one person who appeared before the committee in Edmonton who supported the GST—and he was a member of the current government. The sad thing is that it is very hard to find supporters of the GST. If you want to hear the other side of the argument, it is very difficult to find someone to express it. As the majority of the members of the Senate committee became more and more convinced that the bill was seriously flawed and that it would not fulfil either the government's promises or its expectations, it became clear that, despite the overwhelming evidence which was persuading the majority of the Senate committee that this was a bad bill, those on the committee who support the government were not in agreement. They could not be deaf. They are intelligent, dedicated Canadians who heard the same arguments. They were not listening. They, of course, were then not in agreement with the concluding recommendation that Bill C-62 should not be passed but should be proceeded with further in the Senate.

As a personal observation, I found it a great pity and very sad that such an important review, and one which is a secular change in Canadian taxation policy as significant as the introduction of income tax in 1917, should have split the committee largely on political party lines and not on the merits of a consumption tax versus those who argued against it.

Moreover, I think it is extremely important to note the growing opposition to the GST by Canadians from all parties and all walks of life, despite the fact that the federal government has spent nearly $40 million to inform the public and to try to sell it on the merits of the GST. This monumental and expensive effort has failed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: Over 80 per cent of Canadians are rejecting the GST. Why does the government not listen?

Honourable senators, we are part of this nation. We have an important role to play as a part of this nation. Why are we not listening in the Senate? Many honourable senators recognize the serious flaws in the GST and the unprecedented public opposition. Some rationalize their positions in support of the GST by claiming that a rejection of this money bill in the Senate would be the kiss of death to an elected and responsible Parliament. I do not share this view.

The rejection of this bad tax legislation would not be an abrogation of the rights of the House of Commons but, rather, a reaffirmation of the constitutional responsibility of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: In a real sense, in light of the current extremely high level of opposition to the GST, the Senate has become the last democratic hope for millions of Canadians. We have laughed in this chamber together while petitions have been presented, but anyone who has ever tried to go around and get a petition signed will know that it involves a lot of work. I did not see any that were tear stained, but they could have been. Over two million, some estimate as many as three million, Canadians have taken the trouble to write senators objecting to the GST. This cannot be taken lightly. This can only be taken seriously. Many of the names have been read into the record during those painful reading periods. I do not think we should fail these Canadians, who are turning to us as their last hope to stop the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: As a final consideration, since the government introduced Bill C-62, which passed in the House of Commons back in April of 1990, the economic health of Canada has suffered serious setbacks. We are now in the midst of a full-fledged recession, with soaring bankruptcies, growing unemployment, continued high interest rates, an abnormally high Canadian dollar and increased inflation, all of which are contributing to great economic uncertainty, placing pressure on and creating an atmosphere of fear for the average family as it looks for security in this very unstable economic environment.

A delay in the introduction of the GST can be clearly justified on many grounds, not the least of which is that business is not yet ready. In my judgment, the government is not yet ready. We heard the debate on that point the other day. Anyone can pick up the phone to call one of these hotlines and ask a question about the GST and see what he gets. And the complex transitional costs of the tax are so high that it is almost unbelievable. The only people who are really going to profit from this are tax accountants and tax lawyers, in the short term, and most of us, whom I consider bo be reasonably intelligent men and women, will find that in the literature being issued by the Government of Canada to explain how to operate a drug store or a grocery store under the new tax regime, the instructions are extremely complicated.

I would simply like to conclude by repeating the thrust of my amendment, which moves that the GST be delayed by 12 months. I hide not my ulterior motive. My ultimate objective, of course, would be to use the one-year delay to convince the federal government to reconsider its decision to go ahead with the GST. Honourable senators, this is a bad tax replacing a bad tax. It should be stopped, and stopped here in the Senate.

Finally, honourable senators, I repeat my usual admonition: The Senate must be reformed.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is with a sense of relief that I take the opportunity to speak on the amendment of Senator Waters to delay the implementation of the goods and services tax until January of 1992. I say it is with relief because once again this house teetered on the brink of dissolving into chaos as the Speaker and the government last Thursday put aside our rules for the purpose of pushing through a measure which has produced a visceral anger in the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: The people see it as yet another piece of evidence of the personal will of a Prime Minister who has forgotten those who put him in his job and those whom he is supposed to serve with some basic sense of fairness and decency.

Last Thursday night, with almost a grim determination, the Speaker of this chamber chose to ignore the rights of Senator Waters to move his amendment and, indeed, recognized the Leader of the Government—

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Fairbairn: —Senator Murray, in his effort to facilitate the final passage of the GST, in spite of very open, loud and clear notice from Senator Waters and, indeed, from Senator Lawson, that they intended to move amendments as soon as those presented by the Liberals on this side of the house had been voted upon.

Senator Waters was very loud and clear in giving his notice. He is a military man and he tends to be very loud and clear. There was no doubt in the minds of anyone in this house that he would be up and running in order to move his amendment last Thursday night. However, after four days of what I suspect was rather fundamental pressure, the Speaker and the government have reconsidered and have decided to recognize the rights of Senator Waters and his Independent seat-mate, Senator Lawson, in this house. I think it did not escape the notice of senators on this side that there was a certain reluctance this afternoon on the part of Senator Doody and Senator Murray to admit the parenthood of this motion for a house order to cover the amendments. In fact, so reluctant were they that Senator Doody suggested that this house order had indeed been born within the chamber of His Honour, the Speaker, and encouraged him to take responsibility for it.

At any rate, honourable senators, these have once again been black days for the Senate. More than that, last Thursday was really a black day for the democratic process in this country as the rules of our parliamentary law in this house were given another swift kick by the government. Senators on this side and I, too, will probably have more to say about that at a later date, but for the moment I would like to consider Senator Waters's amendment.

I should make it clear that the proposition of postponing the GST for a year is certainly not my goal, any more than it really is the goal of Senator Waters. We want this tax killed now. It is wrong, it is hurtful and it is unfair, particularly to Canadians and to regions that are least able to protect themselves from its bite. One of the reasons that Senator Waters's amendment, however, is critical at this point is that it does represent a last-ditch effort to get the Prime Minister and his government to step back and take a long, hard look at the stress they are about to impose on the workers, the businesses and the individuals in this country who are already under extreme economic pressure.

The statistics that have been rolling out of the government and private sector sources tell us not just that Canada is in a recession—I believe we all know that. Only those locked in the isolation of the four walls of government, such as Finance Minister Michael Wilson and the Prime Minister, have just found out that hard times have been upon us for many months and Canadians in the real world have been trying to cope with that every day. The statistics tell us how deep our troubles really are. I would like to add a few statistics to the record tonight to fill out that picture.

The latest statistics on the gross domestic product of Canada, which is the value of all goods and services produced, fell by 0.5 per cent in August. This was the largest monthly decline since March of 1986.

There is more bad news. The price of raw materials reflecting the rise in world oil prices soared by 10.3 per cent in August, which is the largest monthly increase since the index was introduced in 1977. In a separate report produced at approximately the same time, the Department of Energy and Natural Resources reported that national gasoline prices had risen by almost one cent a litre, leaving them six cents a litre higher than they had been prior to the Persian Gulf crisis.

Money traders were reported as saying that, because the threat of higher consumer prices meant it was unlikely that interest rates would fall in any demonstrable way, they would expect only a marginal decline in the Bank of Canada rate.

Following this, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs released the bankruptcy figures. They reported that 5,922 consumers and businesses declared bankruptcy last month, which was up by almost 61 per cent from October of 1989. The figures also showed a sharp increase in bankruptcies in the month of September. In the first ten months of 1990, 33,938 consumers and 9,407 businesses went bankrupt in Canada, which is a 40 per cent rise over the figures for the same period of 1989.

Another indicator from Statistics Canada said that factory shipments fell. They were 0.8 per cent in September, and the new orders which generate future shipments fell by 1.6 per cent from August. It was the third consecutive month of decline for the two key indicators of how the manufacturing sector is faring.

Further to that, Statistics Canada released a report saying that the high negative levels of opinion in the manufacturing industry in Canada were similar to those in January of 1982, which was the last time Canada moved into a very tough and deep recession. Another area that we have to be concerned about is pay hikes in our labour force. It was reported in the Financial Post earlier this month that employers who were surveyed by that newspaper indicated they would only increase their workers' salary by up to an additional one per cent in the coming year, which would fall short of demands generated by the GST.

The statistics tell us that this recession is going to be longer and tougher than had been anticipated. One reason for this, which could have not have been anticipated a year ago, is the threat of war in the Persian Gulf. That has not only forced up the price of oil and gasoline in Canada, but also has initiated heavy military expenditures to try to enforce a blockade and sanctions against Iraq. That kind of pressure is something that every government in the so-called coalition is having to face and deal with under similar and tough circumstances in their own economies.

Another reason for the fears and anxieties of Canadians in the months ahead is the effects of the GST. Honourable senators, that could have been anticipated. The government could have understood that, as economic clouds were gathering over virtually every sector of our economy, this was not the time for a goods and services tax that would eat into every individual's pocketbook each day of the year. To put it mildly, it was and is the wrong tax at the wrong time. Everyone in Canada knows that except the Prime Minister and his government.

Canadians do not need this extra hardship. Honourable senators, government ministers are insulting in their constant claims that everybody but them is living beyond their means and must tighten their belts. Canadians have been tightening their belts. Certainly the people I talk with in southern Alberta have been tightening their belts for years through droughts and other man-made disasters such as the grain subsidy war, which has threatened the trade talks at GATT and may bring those talks to their knees. These Canadians are prepared to tighten their belts and their budgets in the face of a worldwide recession. They are responsible people in terms of their own personal lives and their contribution to our country. However, they are asking for some sense of reality from their government. They are saying, "For God's sake, rethink this tax."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: As Senators Waters has so clearly set out, there are other ways of raising money without penalizing every single Canadian who was already contributing to the national cause through taxation at every level of our complex political system.

I should like to turn to my hometown newspaper, The Lethbridge Herald, which told us in headlines earlier this month that the GST will add $200,000 to city costs. That caused shudders to go through the city. This is an area which has been under severe stress because of the situation in the farm community. They had not been anticipating this kind of additional expense. As well as the other demands that are being made in the city of Lethbridge, now they have the GST in the amount of $200,000 on their budget.

In addition to the daily costs, the GST will add what many are estimating as high as 2.5 per cent to the inflation rate in the next year, which automatically keeps interest rates high. The government has said that the increase in inflation will be only 1.5 per cent, but no one believes that estimate. That estimate was quickly rejected by economic forecasters who live in the real world and outside the Department of Finance.

The government also noted that the GST would be revenue neutral, but nobody believes that either. I will use, as Senator Hastings did earlier in this debate, some very interesting comments, and refer to the comments made by our colleague Senator Finlay MacDonald, when the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was travelling this summer in Whitehorse, on August 3, 1990. I presume there had been some bantering back and forth in the committee—if "bantering" is the word I should use—Senator Buckwold raised this question of revenue neutral.

Senator Frith: That is the way the sportscasters describe it when there is a "dust-up" in the NHL. "The lads are mixing it up a bit."

Senator Fairbairn: Senator MacDonald said this, and I quote:

> I do not think we should be conning the witnesses or the people who are here to hear us. It was said a second ago that it has been admitted that this tax is not intended to reduce the deficit.
> I admit it. I admit it as one member of this committee. With all due respect to my leader, I admit that this is the most screwed-up thing that the Government of Canada, my government, has done.

Senator Frith: And they have done a lot, so that is something.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Hastings is recorded here as saying, "Hear, hear!"

Senator MacDonald went on to say:

> The government has come out with revenue neutrality and they try to explain what it is. They do so after talking about laying this big burden on our grandchildren. They go through all of this performance. Then they say it is revenue neutral. They say it will help reduce the deficit. Well, how in the name of God can it help reduce the deficit if it is to be revenue neutral?

Senator Buckwold: That was an honest member of the committee.

Senator Fairbairn: He continued:

> I said yesterday that I did not think this was misrepresentation on the part of the government. It was just a dumb mistake in communications. They didn't know what on earth they were doing . . . Everyone knows that this tax will be a windfall, and that it is intended to get at the deficit. Therefore let us be done with these gags between ourselves about "revenue neutral" and such things as that.

Senator Frith: Let us hear it for Finlay MacDonald!

Senator Fairbairn: Now the Prime Minister indicates that he will reduce the tax once it is in place. Maybe he will take it off the books.

Senator Frith: And there is a cheque in the mail.

Senator Fairbairn: There are no promises on that. Perhaps that excess revenue, or windfall, as Senator MacDonald mentioned, will be used in fact to reduce the deficit. There is no real undertaking there either.

Senator Frith: "I am from the government and I am here to help you."

Senator Fairbairn: Perhaps all that revenue will result in a lower tax rate. Well do not bet the farm on that type of false seduction.

Everywhere the value added tax has been levied it has increased dramatically, and there is nothing in the history of this government's taxation record to even suggest anything different.

I believe there is another problem with this tax, which is that there is no confidence among the people that the government itself knows how the tax will work. That is almost understandable because the more you dig into it the less sense it makes.

I quote from one of the business columnists in the Lethbridge Herald who had attended a seminar at which an accountant, who had been trained to talk about the GST, had attempted to take this explanation to seminars in our city:

> Take sweetened baked goods. If you buy less than six doughnuts, you pay GST. Six or over; you don't pay. The reasoning is that you can't eat six doughnuts at once. Understandably, this is known as The Pig Rule. Sellers of the world famous bucket of chicken will be thrilled when people buy the cold bucket GST-free and mike it at home.
> Another question to consider: Are your cattle in the food chain? If you sell your cattle to a feedlot and they're fed as the lot's own cattle, they're still food products. But if you board them at a feedlot, the service of feeding them is taxable.
> Farm-grade machinery is zero-rated. Irrigation equipment, thus far, is not. As Hall-Buckland understates, a centre pivot is extremely expensive.
> Landlords are not allowed to collect GST. But they're required to pay it on their costs. You know what that means.
> Non-profit day cares will not be charged GST. For-profit ones will.

On and on it goes. It is little wonder that when the hot-lines cannot easily explain these anomalies to Canadians who call in, this in itself erodes the confidence that the people of this country have in the government's ability to administer the tax. That confidence, I am sure, took a rather severe drop a few days ago when we learned that the cost of administering the tax and distributing the material is estimated up over $400 million.

Senator Waters is asking this house to force postponement of the tax for a year, in the clear hope that an alternative will be developed. Over the last three weeks our Liberal opposition has offered other suggestions which would have provided a fairness to those who cannot manage the extra burden. I realize that some of these amendments struck a positive chord in some of the senators on the government side, even though they were not in a position to vote affirmatively.

Briefly, I would just like to remind the senators what the amendments called for. The first one called for a zero rate of tax on reading material. This was an amendment to ensure that all reading material, including books, magazines, newspapers, and Bibles, be subject to a zero rate of tax, similar to the treatment of basic groceries. In fact, these materials have never been taxed in Canada.

The next amendment dealt with electricity and home-heating fuel, such as oil and natural gas, in that they would not be subject to the proposed GST.

The next amendment dealt with discrimination against the cooperative movement across Canada.

The next amendment sought full inflation indexation of GST credits for low-income families in this country.

The next amendment dealt with Canadian consumers and an effort to help them benefit from fairer transitional relief measures to industry.

The next amendment would have broadened the tax-exempt status for health care and educational services.

• (2220)

The next amendment, and this was perhaps one of the best debates in the Senate during consideration of this bill, was to have the north become a GST free zone. Finally, the last amendment last Thursday called for a higher rate of tax on luxury goods. Tonight, the ninth amendment by Senator Waters is asking for a one year delay in the implementation of the tax.

Honourable Senators, I am delighted that Senator Waters has had a full opportunity to participate with his amendment, and I hope it passes. In spite of government attempts to derail the independents or to curtail their debating time,— Senator Simard: Deliberately agreed to curtail, is better.

Senator Fairbairn: —we recognize that they have equal rights in this house and each of us has a responsibility to protect those rights.

Honourable Senators, I would like to conclude my remarks tonight with a slight digression. Senator Waters is considered by some to be an independent because he sits over there with the other independents. Honourable Senators, the fact is that Senator Waters is not at all an independent.

Senator Simard: No?

Senator Fairbairn: He is a member of the Reform Party of Canada. In the national polls, the Reform Party has been coming uncomfortably close to the same percentage of voter support as the governing party.

Hon. Senator: Thirty per cent in Alberta.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you being seduced?

Senator Fairbairn: The Reform Party is a national party that initially was borne out of the mess in which the Conservatives found themselves in western Canada.

Like Senator Hastings, Senator Olson, Senator Hays, Senator Twinn, and myself, Senator Waters represents the views of Albertans in this house.

Senator Simard: You will have to do better than that to get Senator Frith's job.

Senator Frith: You do not have to do anything to get it. Just sign a letter requesting it and it will be fine.

Senator Simard: You will have to do much better than that.

Senator Frith: In fact, do not even bother with a letter; just ask.

Senator Fairbairn: Among them are tens of thousands who have signed up to join the Reform Party.

An Hon. Senator: Resign and run; resign and run.

Senator Fairbairn: Like all of us, Senator Waters was appointed to the Senate by a Prime Minister. In his case, the combination of himself and Brian Mulroney can only be described as the odd couple, but Senator Waters came to that appointment by a route that was as unique as it was historic.

In case any one in this chamber has forgotten, I would like to remind you of how Senator Waters came to be here.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, my God!

Senator Fairbairn: That is right. Honourable senators will recall an event that occurred in the province of Alberta over a year ago which really focused the attention of Canadians on this chamber in a way unlike any other time in the past.

On October 16th, 1989, under the provisions of the Senatorial Selection Act of the Province of Alberta, a candidate was chosen to fill a Senate vacancy in that province. That had never before happened anywhere in the country and, indeed, election has never figured as an element in the appointment of a Canadian Senator. It was seen by many people in western Canada as a potentially important influence in forcing a serious effort at constitutional reform of the Senate.

Now, because of the unprecedented nature of this political development, I want to give honourable senators a little of the background of the process as it progressed through Alberta leading to the election of Senator Waters.

Senator Hastings: Would the three stooges over there listen for awhile.

Senator Fairbairn: Senate reform has for some time been a major issue in the political life of my province and, indeed, it may be the only issue which generates political agreement in Alberta. It goes back to 1985, specifically when a special committee of the Alberta legislature put forward a report entitled, "Strengthening Canada: Reform of Canada's Senate", which recommended a new form of Senate that would be elected and would contain an equal number of Senators totalling 64, sic representing each province and two representing each territory. The Senate would have substantial powers to provide an effective regional balance in our federal Parliament.

There were many other interesting proposals but those three were at the core of the report, which was adopted unanimously by the Alberta legislature in May 1985. It flushed out the slogan, "Triple E", which has been heard a great deal across the country and in this house during the last three years, and which slogan the government of Alberta, and many people in the province, have promoted ever since.

As Senator Hastings will know, before Meech Lake was even a twinkle in the eye of Canada's first ministers, Nick Taylor, the former leader of the Liberal Party in Alberta, proposed that future Alberta senators should be elected. Indeed, it will interest honourable senators opposite to know that Mr. Taylor, who was and is always an outspoken public figure in our province, has encouraged all of us from Alberta to resign on the spot and run.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Who said "Hear, hear"?

Senator Fairbairn: To set an example. As discussions on constitutional changes began again in 1986, through the introduction of Quebec's five-point agenda to facilitate its signature on the Constitution, the profile of Senate reform began to take on a sharper edge in Alberta. Bit by bit an awareness of concern about the Senate spread through the west and into other parts of the country with varying degrees of interest.

Then came Meech Lake and its commitment to place Senate reform at the top of future constitutional agendas and to change the method of appointment of Senators until reform was achieved.

Senator Simard: Which you people killed.

Senator Fairbairn: The Alberta Minister of Federal and Intergovernmental Affairs, Jim Horsman, was encouraged by the government and by Senator Murray to discuss proposals for Senate reform with provincial counterparts across the country.

At the same time, in May of 1987, Lloyd Axworthy, one of our Liberal members of Parliament, put forward another proposal, that from now on Senators filling vacancies should be elected by a public electoral process by each party in each province. This was followed up by a number of people. One person who did not accept that view was—

Senator Frith: Can we make that retroactive to the section 26(8), and do you so move?

Senator Fairbairn: It is interesting to note that one person who did not support that idea, in May of 1987, was none other than Premier Don Getty, who publicly said that the idea of electing nominees was an ad hoc suggestion that simply did not stand up.

At any rate, in Alberta the issue received a specific focus with the resignation of the late Senator Donald Cameron in September of 1987. That vacancy provided a clear target. Premier Don Getty then changed his mind and decided to test the new appointment system as agreed at Meech Lake.

Back in Alberta, after Meech Lake, there was considerable consternation that Premier Getty had let down the side by agreeing to the proposals and putting Senate reform on the back burner for a very long time.

There was one rather lilting column at the time written by Don Braid, who is a columnist for the Edmonton Journal. He wrote:

• (2230)

> Alberta Premier Don Getty is the Vanna White of Canadian politics—amiable and not bad looking, but the more we see of him the more we wonder why anybody takes him seriously.
> Getty went into the April 30 constitutional talks vowing to fight for Senate reform, then agreed to an astonishing deal that set Alberta and the West back 20 years.

At any rate, Premier Getty definitely had some work to do to restore his own credibility. Instead of sending the Prime Minister a routine list of candidates, something which had been done by two of his fellow premiers, he gave the process a new twist and proposed a province-wide election. A bill providing for that election was placed before the legislature in February of 1989. It was not passed because there was a provincial election. The Conservative government was returned to power. It reintroduced the bill after the election and passed it in August of 1989.

Premier Getty opted for a provision in the bill that would allow the Senate selection process to take place along with a municipal election province-wide. Thus, on October 16, 1989, along with mayors, councillors, school boards, hospital boards, fluoridation, Sunday shopping, and heaven only knows what else, Albertans also chose a senatorial candidate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What was the percentage turnout?

Senator Fairbairn: I am just getting to that.

The winner selected by the province was Stanley Waters. He was one in a field of six candidates, five men and one woman. Three of the candidates represented the political parties: the Reform Party, the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party. Three were independent. Each person seeking nomination was required to produce no fewer than 1,500 names of electors, each witnessed by another elector who was required to sign an affidavit. Each person seeking nomination was also required to deposit $4,000. So these were not trivial undertakings for those who wished to be a candidate.

Some 40 per cent of Alberta's eligible voters, totalling more than 614,000 persons, cast their ballots. Senator Waters was chosen by 259,570 Albertans. That was about 42 per cent of the total Senate vote. He was substantially ahead of his nearest rival, another outstanding person who happened to be the Liberal candidate, William Code.

Senator Steuart: Where did the Tories place?

Senator Fairbairn: They ran third.

Senator Stanbury: In Alberta?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. The signs were out then.

Senator Buckwold: How far behind were they?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not want to get into that, it is too painful.

Senator Steuart: Poor Getty.

Senator Fairbairn: Exactly. After the initial shock of seeing the Conservative candidate come in third, Premier Getty rallied behind the winner. He provided the Prime Minister with the list of six senatorial candidates with the number of votes they had received and clearly recommended the appointment of Mr. Waters as the winner under the Selection Act. His letter arrived in Ottawa and promptly sank to the bottom of the Prime Minister's "in" basket.

Yet, I want Senator Waters to know that his cause was fought here in the Senate. He was elected in Alberta on October 16, 1989, and the questioning began on October 17 here in this house. I asked Senator Murray a simple question. At that point he was able to say that it was a hypothetical question since no letter had been received from Premier Getty. The next opportunity to ask a question was the next day on October 18. At that point in time, I believe Senator Waters was coming to Ottawa to take a look at the place. As I understand it, he did not meet with Senator Murray at that time.

The questioning continued on October 25. By this time the letter to the Prime Minister had arrived in Ottawa. Apparently, the Prime Minister was out of the country at the time, so he did not have time to send a response. By October 31 the Prime Minister had returned. We were told that the letter was in his hands and that he was giving it earnest consideration and would be announcing a decision in due course.

The questioning continued on November 7 and 8, December 12, 20 and 21. This is when the matter became very interesting in that Senator Murray indicated to us at that time that the federal government all along had considered the process in Alberta to be unconstitutional and, indeed, had a legal opinion to that effect. This had been communicated to the Government of Alberta. There had been discussions back and forth. Letters had been written and the suggestion had been made that the two governments have a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to clear up the confusion or the disagreement. That did not go anywhere. The answer, in fact, was Premier Getty's decision to call an election. All through this period when people were getting ready to put up money to run as candidates and get their organizations going, no one knew that this process was being considered unconstitutional by the federal government.

At any rate, the questioning continued in January. It then became quite clear that nothing was going to happen until the run up to Meech Lake was concluded one way or another. That is exactly what happened.

Honourable senators, it is not surprising that the rights and the well-being of Senator Waters were not uppermost in the minds of Senator Murray and the government. The government did not believe in the manner by which he was chosen by the people of Alberta. The Prime Minister clearly did not want to appoint him, but did so on June 16 as a favour to Premier Getty for his strong support throughout the Meech Lake process. Tonight is a bit of history in the making since this was Senator Waters' first speech since he entered this chamber on June 19.

I have to say that I was honoured to help escort him into this chamber along with Senator Doody. I am glad that he is here. I hope that in the future he and others who enter this place either as individuals or as Independents will be able to join fully and freely in Senate proceedings without the kind of disruption that has been a feature of our proceedings in the last few days.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (2240)

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to participate in this debate.

Senator Buckwold: That should be better than a sleeping pill!

Senator Phillips: I should begin by commenting on Senator Waters's remarks. I will tell him what my wife always tells me about my speeches. She says: "When you go on too long, you lose your audience." And she is perfectly right. I sometimes lose my audience before I have begun, especially when I speak at this late hour, but I would suggest to Senator Waters that although some of his remarks were interesting, insisting on having the amendment read by the Speaker again was really an insult to the system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: I should like to refer to a part of the speech in which Senator Fairbairn seemed to be very interested. The honourable lady is an expert political contortionist and distortionist, and she really excelled this evening trying to create the idea that it was the Grits who had given the Independents an opportunity to speak.

Let us go back to the anarchy and rioting that took place in this chamber before the house order was negotiated. Who were the negotiators? They were the Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. And who came out as entitled to move amendments? The Leader of the Opposition and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition were entitled to move eight amendments. No one else was mentioned. These two honourable senators, acting as Independents, allowed unanimous consent for the house order. They voted for it. The record of the Senate shows that the motion was carried with unanimous agreement. The record also shows that both honourable senators were present on that day. The two Independent senators agreed with the Grits, as they had been doing all along, and they agreed to exclude themselves. That may have been naiveté on their part—in fact, it must have been rather naive, because they trusted Senator Frith, and anybody who would do that is really naive.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Phillips: The house order adopted today is almost identical to the offer made by Senator Murray in Question Period last Thursday, in which he indicated clearly that he was prepared to accept two amendments from the Independent senators. That offer was made prior to the riot of last Thursday. That offer was repeated again Thursday night, Friday and again today. The hold up was the Leader of the Opposition, so don't give me all of this hypocrisy about wanting to hear from the Independents. Senators opposite tried to avoid that and came very close to succeeding. I must give them credit for that.

Senator Buckwold: It took you four days to get out of the mess you were in!

Senator Hastings: And you had to get the Government Leader up there to get you out of it!

Senator Phillips: Would my honourable friend contain himself now? He should take his report back to the bathroom, or do anything, but I would ask him please not to interrupt me.

I should now like to turn to the amendment proposed by the Honourable Senator Waters. It is an amendment in line with the Reform Party policy, I have to give him credit for that. Preston Manning in Alberta says that he believes in visible taxation, in people seeing the taxes they are paying. I agree with that, but here is the problem: Senator Waters does not agree with it because repeatedly in this chamber he has voted to retain the federal sales tax, which is an invisible tax.

I wish my honourable friend would discuss this with his leader. I wish they would get together. It is sort of confusing for those of us from the east coast to see his leader in Alberta saying one thing while he votes another way here. Perhaps Deborah Grey has a better way. She does not say anything, and that would probably be much better here.

The honourable senator's amendment does very little except defer the tax. Instead of coming into effect January 1 of next year, it will come into effect January 1 a year from now. Honourable senators, what is going to happen in that year? I can just see Senator Waters campaigning in the foothills, telling the people there, "Look, we have changed our minds. Now we think it is a good tax, but we have to have a year to explain our change of minds." Senator Waters could have started this evening to explain his change of mind. Why waste two hours of time in the chamber this evening when he is going to change his mind a year from now?

Honourable senators, the Reform Party has not yet even developed its manifesto, but already Senator Waters is watering it down. Now, Maritimers have a habit, sometimes, of watering down drinks if you don't watch them, but we do not water down our political platforms. I hope the honourable senator will adopt that policy throughout the debate.

Honourable senators opposite have complained that the tax is regressive, that it is going to destroy the economy. Let us just have a look at a few statistics, if I may present them, honourable senators. The economy of the province of Newfoundland will expand by $150 million in today's dollars. Clyde Wells would not accept Meech Lake, but I am certain that he would accept an expansion of $150 million in the provincial economy.

Senator Simard: I don't think he will.

Senator Phillips: You do not? I am quite sure of that. My colleague seated to my left has been telling me that for some time.

The economies of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick will each experience an expansion of $200 million. I like to give credit to a premier where credit is due. Despite what honourable senators opposite say, the provinces have caught on to the fact that welfare recipients are going to receive more income under the GST than they presently do. The first premier to say that he would not cut back on the incomes of welfare recipients because of the GST rebate was Premier McKenna of New Brunswick. Five other premiers, while admitting that welfare recipients will be better off under the proposed GST than they are under the present federal sales tax, have yet to decide whether they will reduce the welfare cheques.

The economy of the province of Quebec will expand by $1.6 billion. The economy of Ontario will expand by $3 billion. The new socialist premier of Ontario was not able to come up with any expansion like that, yet honourable senators from that province complained that this tax will destroy the economy.

As a matter of interest, let us just turn to the economy of Alberta. It is estimated that that economy will expand by $2 billion.

• (2250)

Senator Hastings: That is why Alberta is taking you to court. They really want to expand.

Senator Phillips: You must have influenced the provincial government.

Senator Hastings: I do not influence Tory governments.

Senator Phillips: I am sure if they understood the benefits they would support this.

The province of British Columbia will expand their economy by $1 billion.

Senator Hastings: That is why they are going to court.

Senator Phillips: These are rather interesting figures, honourable senators. The province of Alberta gets 22 per cent of the expansion. If you combine Alberta and B.C., that is $3 billion out of the anticipated $9 billion expansion. Yet, honourable senators opposite say that this Mulroney government neglects the west.

Senator Hastings: What does the premier of Alberta say?

Senator Buckwold: What does the government of British Columbia say?

Senator Phillips: One-third of the proposed benefits of this tax goes to the two western provinces. I am sorry my honourable friend objects to that amount going to the west. Perhaps he would rather it go somewhere else.

Senator Buckwold: This is all conjecture. These are the same kind of figures we heard with free trade.

Senator Phillips: My honourable friends opposite have to admit that this tax is fair to the western provinces.

Senator Waters pictures himself as a twentieth century Cato. Cato was asking in his speeches that Carthage be destroyed. We, on this side, have a few discussions of a political nature with those opposite, and we have come to think of you people as Carthaginians. I would like to point out to Senator Waters that Cato did not desert to Carthage. He remained loyal to Rome.

Here in this chamber, the Alberta Cato—the reformed Cato—has deserted to the Grits. This did not begin this evening. This began with the desk-thumping and bell-ringing episode. At that time I looked around and there was our honourable friend red-faced and embarrassed, but stupidly pounding his desk with the rest of you opposite. That is when he joined the Carthaginians. However, he has been very successful since joining the Carthaginians. The first convert was Senator Fairbairn. You saw evidence of that tonight.

Senator Fairbairn arranged an afternoon tea party in her office and invited Senator MacEachen and Senator Waters. It was a miniature Mad Hatter's tea party. That is when the amendment was drafted, and they worked on it for an hour and a half. Senator Waters came out of the meeting smiling and saying that he had won. He did win and I will tell you why. Tomorrow night's vote is going to be very interesting. The Liberals have wrapped themselves like boa constrictors around Senator Waters ever since he came here. Tomorrow night they will have to decide who swallows whom. Are my friends opposite going to swallow Senator Waters or is he going to swallow them? That is the point that has to be decided tomorrow night.

My friends opposite have been saying that the GST will never pass. Tomorrow night they will either have to hang Senator Waters out to dry or vote with him. I would like to know what many of them are going to do.

Senator Hastings: I am not going to vote with you. Never!

Senator Phillips: We now know that Senator Hastings is going to swallow himself and vote with Senator Waters.

The other day I was impressed when Senator Watt, a long-time resident of Montreal, brought a large group from the North into the chamber. Both galleries were filled. Honourable senators, it was interesting to watch senators opposite speak. When they said the letter "G" they looked up at the north gallery; when they said the letter "S" they looked down at their notes; when they said the letter "T" they looked up at the south gallery.

Senator Watt, are you going to tell the people in the North that you have changed your mind, that this tax is perfectly acceptable provided it is implemented on January 1, 1992? Are you going to swallow yourself tomorrow night? Tomorrow evening there will be an awful lot of Pepto Bismol used in this chamber. There will be a lot of indigestion when people vote tomorrow night.

Honourable senators opposite complained viciously when the Canadian dollar went from 82 cents to 86 cents. It went up to 86 cents because of the good financial management of this government. They were saying that we are destroying the economy because the exporters are losing the advantage of 4 cents on the dollar. However, honourable senators opposite insist on retaining 13 cents on the dollar. Honourable senators opposite have been paying too much attention to the economic theories of Senator Gigantès. Be realistic and do not believe that nonsense any more. Remove the federal sales tax and give our exporters an opportunity.

I would like to turn to the real reasons for much of the determined opposition that honourable senators opposite are expressing at this time of the year. What disturbs honourable senators opposite is that 8 million low-income families are going to receive rebates. Senator Waters was asking tonight for many cuts in federal expenditures. I believe there are a number of people in Canada and in this chamber who would agree with that. I would ask Senator Waters if he would eliminate the expenditure to the 601,000 Albertans who are going to receive $51.6 million four times a year? Is that one of the expenditures that Senator Waters would like eliminated? He wants that postponed and he does not want the economy of Alberta to expand by $2 billion.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is called reform.

Senator Phillips: That is the political reform of Senator Waters, Preston Manning and Deborah Grey. There is an awful lot to come out yet. Wait until that manifesto is published and then we will really discuss the Reform Party.

Honourable senators, I was in Alberta this summer with the GST Committee. I stayed there to visit two children and five grandsons. While I was there I talked to many people. I will not mislead you and say that the GST is popular in Alberta. It is not, but the attitude I found was that many people recognize it is necessary to change the tax system in order to give our exporters a chance. They said, "If need be we will pay that tax, but we want the national debt—the deficit—reduced."

Senator Hastings: It is revenue neutral.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am passing the message on to the Minister of Finance tonight that the Albertans said they would pay that tax but they do not want it used for financing new spending programs.

• (2300)

Senator Sparrow: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Phillips: If I could just finish my remarks, then I can think about it. Somehow or other I do not find your questions very interesting at this time of the night. Ask me tomorrow.

Senator Sparrow: All right.

Senator Phillips: I would just like to close. I will not be like Senator Fairbairn who took twenty minutes to close. I will just make a very brief plea to the honourable senators opposite to be sensible, get on with the debate, finish the vote, and let businesses out there know what is going to happen. We have firms with catalogues published. They bought the equipment necessary for collecting this tax. What is more important, is the fact that many of them have already given quotes on large orders in which they were able to reduce their price by thirteen and one half per cent.

Now let us not fool around in this chamber. Let us not charge the Speaker's chair and create anarchy. There are people out there waiting to take advantage of this opportunity. Let us give them that opportunity, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Phillips, speaking on behalf of the government, has tried to slither their way back into a position of champions of the right of the Independents to make amendments, and rather than prolong a debate on that question, it seems to me that the best answer for us, and for anyone looking at the record trying to understand what really did happen, we should leave that to the Independents to describe who it was that stood up for them and their right to propose amendments. I hope we will hear from them on that subject. They surely should be the judge of that question, rather than Senator Phillips.

Senator Murray: Senator Lawson is already noted on the record on that matter.

Senator Frith: I am sure he will get on the record.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable Senators, you will be relieved to know that I am not going to make a speech. However I promised Senator Murray that I would give him some statistics that were correct, issued by the Department of Finance, during our trip as a committee, on the impact of sales tax reform by province, in millions of dollars.

I believe it is time we ensured that this record is straight. I think Senator Phillips, it might be wise if you sat and listened to some of the facts, rather than the kind of information that you have been passing on. I might say to you, Senator Phillips, that you should organize not a reform party, but a new one for you personally, called "The Chloroform Party", because that is the way you affect us with some of your speeches.

May I just give you the figures?

Senator Murray: Excuse me, what is the honourable senator placing on the record?

Senator Buckwold: The impact of the sales tax by reform, by provinces, 1991, millions of dollars. A document issued by the Department of Finance.

An Hon. Senator: Why do you not dispense and table it?

Senator Buckwold: You do not want to hear it, but it is the opposite of everything that we have heard both from Senator Murray and other senators, and of course from our friend, Senator Phillips, who went on at some length about the great economic advantages to the various provinces. I am only wishing to put this on the record, as I promised to Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: I appreciate that. I just would like to know whether the honourable senator is placing on the record the projected impact on the provincial economies or on the provincial government treasuries or what exactly—

Senator Buckwold: The impact on the individual citizens of the country on what they presently pay out in goods and services under the GST, as against the FST. In other words, under the federal sales tax they pay so much and—

Senator Frith: This is the impact on the people, they are not interested in that.

Senator Buckwold:— under the goods and services tax, they pay so much. I might indicate that there are some provinces that gain and some provinces that lose. This includes the impact of sales tax reform on the indexation of transfer payments, and the income tax systems, as well as the changes to the refundable sales tax credit, large corporation tax, high income surtax, and the specific levies on alcoholic beverages and tobacco products.

This was given to us by the Department when it suited their case, as it did in a few provinces. Let me read them out so you have them on the record. Then we will not have to go through this nonsense all the time, hearing about the great advantages. You will see why some provinces are taking the government to court.

Senator Simard: What are you talking about?

Senator Frith: You already asked him what he said, and he already answered you. Read it again, Syd.

Senator Buckwold: Starting at the other end of the country, the people of British Columbia will pay $30 million more in the GST than they did under the FST.

Senator Simard: One billion dollars lower in production though.

Senator Buckwold: We are not talking of production, we are talking about tax.

Senator Frith: We are talking about tax on the people, which you are not interested in.

Senator Buckwold: Do not talk about the production. This is the actual tax.

Senator Frith: You do not want to hear their petitions or anything about them.

Senator Buckwold: The British Columbia citizens will pay out $30 million more —

An Hon. Senator: Let us adjourn this debate in view of the nonsense.

Senator Buckwold: The Province of Alberta will pay out $30 million.

Saskatchewan will pay out $50 million more. That is the residents of poor Saskatchewan, a province which I think is as bankrupt under Tory administration as any province in the country.

Senator Frith: Do not say "province", it is the citizens.

Senator Buckwold: It is the people who are going to be paying. This is not what the economy is going to gain because of some Department of Finance increase in production. This is out of their pockets.

On the other hand, Manitoba will gain $15 million. The people will be paying less tax than they did under the federal sales tax. Fifteen million dollars they gain in Manitoba.

The interesting thing is that in Ontario—this is one of the reasons they are so against it—the residents of Ontario will pay out $130 million more.

Quebec, and this is perhaps one of the reasons that they are a little more receptive, will gain $115 million, more than all the rest of the provinces put together. Interesting. New Brunswick will in fact—

Senator Frith: The New Brunswick citizens, you mean.

Senator Buckwold: The New Brunswick citizens will gain $20 million.

Nova Scotia will gain $10 million. Small gains in those areas. I am giving you all of the facts so that it is on the record and we do not have to go through this again.

Poor Prince Edward Island breaks even.

Newfoundland has a gain of $35 million.

When you add all of those up —

Senator Simard: What is the figure for Newfoundland?

Senator Buckwold: Would you mind letting me finish?

Senator Simard: What is the gain for Newfoundland?

Senator Buckwold: Sit down. Sit down. After I am finished you can ask me any stupid question you want to ask me.

All I am saying to you, honourable senators, is that this is how the government comes up with the "revenue neutral."

• (2310)

Honourable Senators, all I am saying is, this is how the government gets the revenue neutral. If you add up all the gains that are made and all the losses that are paid by the citizens of each province, the answer ends up zero.

Senator Simard: That is what revenue neutral is all about.

Senator Buckwold: Oh, so that is what it was!

Senator Frith: Tell that to Senator Finlay MacDonald.

Senator Buckwold: The government ends up saying —

Senator Simard: You finally got it right.

Senator Frith: Explain that to Senator Finlay MacDonald.

Senator Buckwold: Senator Phillips just said that the objective of the tax is to have a deficit reduction. We just heard that two minutes ago. This is how the government gets their zero rating.

Senator Frith: Tell Senator Finlay MacDonald and Senator Phillips.

Senator Buckwold: This is how the government gets to "revenue neutral." I just want to get it on the books so that you have it there. These are the figures supplied by the Department of Finance. I want to let you know, so that we do not hear the nonsense again that we get perpetually by the other side.

An Hon. Senator: We will, we will.

Senator Waters: Honourable Senators, I found it faintly amusing but highly inaccurate—

Senator Doody: Senator, are you asking a question?

Senator Waters: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Senator Doody: Senator, you have already spoken once in the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The Chair reminds Senator Waters that if he speaks here, he will have the effect of closing—

Senator Frith: No. I think he is rising on a question of privilege on a question raised by Senator Phillips.

Senator Doody: Maybe he wants to ask Senator Phillips a question.

An Hon. Senator: He is not rising to close the debate.

Senator Frith: The debate is closed only on a substantive motion or a second reading. This is not a substantive motion; it is an incidental motion. He is entitled to rise on this question of privilege as a result of something that Senator Phillips said.

Senator Cogger: You can stand because he says so.

Senator Frith: He yielded to me; he was up.

Senator Waters: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Oh, come on. You do it yourself all the time.

Senator Waters: May I rise on a question of privilege to respond to Senator Phillips. He had warned me some days ago that he was going to take advantage of whatever opportunity arose to attack me and the Reform Party—

Senator Simard: As he should.

Senator Waters: —on the rather successful policies we have adopted which have made the federal Tories a fringe party in Alberta.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Waters: I thought, perhaps I do not share in the same love of lobsters, although I do eat them; I do not get the same glamour or hallucinations out of them that Senator Phillips does, because he has raised points that are palpably false. The reason I was puzzled is this: Why do we, one hundred or fifteen senators, think we are so clever and ten million Canadians are so dumb when they oppose the GST.

Senator Fairbairn: Hear, hear

Senator Waters: There are more Canadians opposing this legislation than any legislation in the history of this country. Honourable Senators—

Senator Simard: Order, order.

Senator Waters: —Senator Phillips is kind of pooh-poohing that and saying, well, does that really matter? Of course it matters, and it is one of the reasons that parties like the Reform Party are capturing your Tories, whom you once cherished and of which I am one. The point of my question of privilege is that you are making statements that are inaccurate. I am not anti—

Senator Frith: Keep going; pay no attention.

Senator Waters: Honourable Senators, Senator Phillips was suggesting that what I have done is to torpedo the leader of the Reform Party by contradicting his policy—

Senator Simard: Order, order.

Senator Waters: —in opposing the FST. What I did say in my remarks, which I thought I did with unmistakeable clarity was that the FST is a lousy tax and the GST is worse. It is Hobson's choice. A Phillips' choice, perhaps.

What we are suggesting to correct these inaccuracies, and the rather unfortunate remarks, is that there are, in fact, ten or eleven other options. What I am really stressing is that all of those options were not explored to the fullest. The question of privilege I am raising is that I believe you have inaccurately and unfairly maligned me.

An Hon. Senator: Let us debate.

Senator Waters: Well, do you mind if I finish my speech, Senator? Then you can get up and speak. You are a great talker sitting on your butt.

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order.

Senator Waters: And you are the same Senator who was trying to cut me off before with a kleenex.

Senator Frith: Yes, hear, hear; that is the man.

Senator Waters: I find that an unfortunate attitude, highly immature and irresponsible. If you are playing that game, you are playing the wrong game with me. Senator Phillips, I would like to close by saying—

Senator Simard: Follow the rules.

Senator Waters: —that I found it faintly amusing but grossly distorted. Just look at the figures. The Reform Party is growing and your party is dying.

Senator Hastings: It is dead; it is dead.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I would like to say, as a long time Conservative, and one who still is—

An Hon. Senator: One of the few.

Senator Phillips: —that I remember similar figures on the free trade issue. I do not know what the honourable senator's views were on the free trade issue, or even if he had any views on the matter. I rather anticipate that shortly there will be a change in the polls. That is why I am anxious, Senator Waters, for you people to bring out your manifesto and let us have a look at it. Let us see what you stand for, where you are going to make your cuts. You have not supported any cuts that the government has made here to date. Why? Is it because you would have to desert your Carthaginian friends if you did? Do not pat yourself on the back that you have been accurate. Honourable Senators—

An Hon. Senator: Is this the late show, the late night comedy act?

Senator Phillips: Senator Waters has been anything but accurate and he has been false in raising a false question of privilege.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable Senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3.(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable Senators, I move that all remaining orders, inquiries and motions stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is agreed, Honourable Senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from the citizens of the province of Ontario, who are calling on the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a second petition also protesting the introduction of this tax, organized by the "IRATE" citizens of Peterborough.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1410)

Honourable senators, I have another petition here with 22 names, as follows:

(Names of signatories read)

• (1420)

I have another petition. This one was not organized by the "IRATE" citizens of Peterborough. It was organized by Mr. Dan Heap, MP, House of Commons, Ottawa. It also calls on the Senate to defeat the tax. It is signed by the following:

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition. This one only has two signatures on it.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition. All of these are from streets in Mr. Heap's riding.

(Names of signatories read)

All of those Canadians are protesting the introduction of the goods and services tax.

• (1430)

I have another petition which is signed by the following:

(Names of signatories read)

I have a very short petition signed by the following persons:

(Names of signatories read)

All of these petitioners call upon the government to withdraw the tax and ask us to defeat this bill.

(Translation)

Senator Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have a petition fresh out of yesterday's mail from the Canadian Paperworkers Union, Local 3067, 282-First Avenue, Office B, Amos, Abitibi. There are 340 names. These people humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevent implementation of the Goods and Services Tax proposed by the Government of Canada.

Since they are all from Amos and I have any number of petitions to table, I will just read the names and forget about the addresses. These are all people from Amos, all members of this union.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Of course you get used to hearing petitions read in this Chamber. However, I don't know whether we all realize that everyone of these sheets was probably first given to a member of the union on a nice Saturday or Sunday afternoon, and they had to go from door to door to canvass for the signatures and addresses of residents who object to the GST. I am not saying they had a lot of trouble convincing these people. It must have been very easy. However, it does take a certain amount of physical effort and conviction to go from door to door for hours, sometimes days, to canvass for hundreds of signatures. That is why everyone of these names should make us stop and think about what people are asking us to do.

(Names of signatories read)

That was the list of 340 members of the Canadian Paperworkers Union in Amos, Quebec. They made it clear, in no uncertain terms, that they were against the GST and they ask the Senate to prevent this bill from being enacted.

Honourable senators, I have another petition signed by 1,200 residents of the Montreal area, who ask the Senate to reject the GST bill.

(Names of signatories read)

This a Latin American neighbourhood.

(Names of signatories read)

She was visiting Montreal, probably her son-in-law on 14th Avenue. In any case, it didn't take her two seconds to sign this petition against the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

This is in Montreal, in Saint-Michel. You can tell by the numbers. I can just see the volunteers going from door to door, up the steps to 7714, going up and down the stairs and so forth—

(Names of signatories read)

—probably of Asian origin—

(Names of signatories read)

That was the group from Montreal. Excuse me, there are also some people from Sutton. Let's hear it for them! They are against the GST, which is all right with us. There hasn't been anyone in favour of the GST from that area.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1440)

Now back to Saint-Michel. We can understand that this man was a volunteer walking up and down the streets in Saint-Michel, then came the weekend. He went for a short drive to Sutton where he did not want to waste his time so he got a few more signatures. He went back to Saint-Michel and continued his door-to-door canvassing.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Now we are in Saint-Georges-de-Beauce. This man is always on the road! He left Saint-Michel for a short trip to Saint-Georges-de-Beauce. He got the signature of Rita Roy, 625, 13th Avenue, Saint-George-de-Beauce, then came back to Saint-Michel and canvassed some more.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Now on to Saint-Urbain. A new municipality altogether.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: I am sure that all senators—at least on this side—are glad to hear the names of all these brave people who support us and are fighting right along with us.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Go on, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: Yes, do not worry, Senator Haidasz, I will continue.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Musset Street residents are really serious in their fight against the GST. I think I must have walked Musset Street in Montreal from one end to the other.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1450)

[English]

Senator Buckwold, I hope it is of comfort to you to hear all these names from the citizens of the city of Montreal who are encouraging us to continue our battle against the GST.

Senator Buckwold: It is a great privilege to hear them.

Senator Hébert: Well, I will continue with the names:

[Senator Hébert.]

(Names of signatories read)

● (1500)

Senator Hébert: Louis Dupire, Montreal, Quebec. Louis Dupire is a former editor's secretary at Le Devoir. He organized a campaign for the development of the Montreal Botanical Garden in the eastern part of the city.

(Name of the signatories read)

Mario Tonipiazzali, 5621, Henri-Bourassa, Montréal. Obviously, those were Italian friends. They are not all from the same place.

(Name of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Senator Wood will present petitions while I open my mail and get more petitions.

RESOLUTION FROM TOWN OF MOUNT ROYAL TABLED

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, before tabling my petitions, I have the honour, to table a resolution from the Town of Mount Royal, Office of the Town Clerk. I should like to read it. The object is the federal goods and services tax. It is a resolution adopted by the Council of the Town of Mount Royal at its general sitting of 1990, at which were present Vera Danyluk, Pierre Brisebois, Neil Jones, Sidney Margles, Harry Schwartz and Gil St-Cyr. The resolution reads:

> being a quorum of Council
> RESOLUTION NO. 90-1016
> THE FEDERAL GOODS AND SERVICES TAX
> It was moved by Councillor St-Cyr, seconded by Councillor Schwartz and unanimously resolved:
> THAT the Council of Town of Mount Royal endorses the Resolution dated 1990-10-03 from the City of North York;
> THAT the Council of Town of Mount Royal strongly urges the Prime Minister and Members of Parliament to take the necessary action, including the substantial cutting of Government programs, to eliminate the Federal deficit and also eliminate the need for the burdensome Goods and Services Tax proposed for 1991; and
> THAT copies of this Resolution be forwarded to Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, Federal Finance Minister Michael Wilson, Senator Dalia Wood, Mount Royal MP Sheila Finestone, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and the City of North York.

It was signed by Josée Katz, Town Clerk. I will now table that resolution.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions on behalf of 64 citizens in Sutton, Quebec.

I should like to read into the record what they state. The petition reads:

TO THE HONOURABLE THE SENATE OF CANADA, IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient right and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefor provide a remedy,

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the new universal 7% federal Goods and Services Tax adopted by the Conservative government will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians;

WHEREAS the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of the Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

WHEREFORE, the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new Goods and Services Tax.

I shall now read their names.

The next petition comes from Sutton in the federal constituency of Brome-Missisquois. It has a small population of 1,200 people, half of whom are anglophone Canadians and the other half are franco Canadians. That is interesting, because 50 per cent voted Liberal and 50 per cent voted Conservative in the last election. I now table that petition.

I have another petition containing 60 names. This petition comes from Victoriaville, part of the riding of Lotbinière. Maurice Tremblay was the last Conservative MP in that riding. There were 21,000 people in that area. Half of them voted Conservative; half of them voted for the Liberals. I do not know what will happen in the next election.

● (1520)

I have a petition from the region of Melbourne, Quebec, which is part of the federal constituency of Drummond, with the representative by the name of Jean-Guy Gilbault. The petitioners are as follows:

(Names of signatories read)

The region of Melbourne is comprised of several small towns which are all in the same constituency of Drummond. Melbourne has a population of 151; St. Adrien, 126; Richmond, 1,039; Danville, 336; and Asbestos, 3,000. I will table the petition.

I have another petition from the region of Lévis-Lauzon.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1530)

That petition involves the small towns of St. Etienne de Lauzon, Lévis-Lauzon, and Charny, which is the one I could not read before. I presented the three petitions.

I have a petition from St. Théodore d'Acton and Actonvale, two small communities in the St. Hyacinthe area.

(Names of signatories read)

These are 56 people from IRATE. I will also table these.

● (1540)

I have a petition containing 181 names again from the region of Rouyn-Noranda. I will read you their names.

● (1550)

I have one more petition that I would like to present today, and then I will allow another colleague to proceed. This petition represents a number of small towns, such as Saint-Bruno, Saint-Luc, Longueuil, and so on. The petitions are from my area. Perhaps I should have read them first.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1600)

Honourable senators, I would now table these petitions.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a number of petitions signed by 2,873 different persons. The petitions have come to me from Mr. Robert D. Nault, the MP for Kenora-Rainy River. Those who are familiar with western-northern Ontario will realize that Kenora-Rainy River is almost a part of Manitoba. We Manitobans certainly feel a particular connection with that region. For a long time that region was represented in this house by a distinguished senator, the Honourable William Benedickson, who, unfortunately, is no longer with us. I am sure honourable senators will remember him well. There is now no representative from that region in this chamber, so the MP for the constituency has sent me these petitions.

I realize, honourable senators, that our rules do not provide for the printing of the names, but I would like to have recorded the names of the various towns from which the petitions come, so that the residents in those areas who have gone to the trouble of expressing their objections to the GST will know that their petitions have been presented here in the Senate and that, hopefully, they will have some effect on senators opposite when we come to the final vote.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: May I interrupt? Senator Molgat said that these petitioners were petitioning against the GST. Are they petitioning against the totality of the GST or some aspects of it, such as delaying the implementation of the GST or the tax on books? What is their specific concern?

Senator Molgat: As a matter of fact, there are two sets of petitions. Two thousand, three hundred and seventy-three petitioners are generally objecting to the GST. This part of northern Ontario is, in many ways, isolated. A number of these settlements have connections only by air. In many instances, people have to travel long distances to schools and for medical purposes. They do have substantial travel problems. The first group is objecting generally to the GST.

However, another group of petitioners is objecting particularly to the GST being applied to electricity and, generally, heating costs. Because of the long, hard winters, people, by necessity, must use a great deal more of these products that will be taxed. In my view, there will be a specific discrimination against these people, through no fault of their own, because they live in that particular geographical area.

I have tried to break these petitions down to the various areas which I have listed alphabetically. I will name the towns involved. I have a list which may be of assistance to the reporters.

The first two town names are Atikokan and Barwick. The town of Cambridge, which is the third town listed, is not in that area. I believe it is in western Ontario. Then the list continues with names of towns in that constituency. I have Devlin, Dinorwic, Dryden, Dunnville—and I cannot guarantee that that town is in this constituency—Eagle River, Ear Falls, Emo and Fort Frances. The next two towns, Georgetown and Hamilton, I believe, are not in the constituency. Coming back again to the Kenora-Rainy River constituency, I have listed Hudson, Ignace, Kakabeka Falls, Keene, Keewatin, Kee-way-win, Kenora, Minaki, Mine Centre and Minnitaki. I see another town here which is not in the region, namely Mount Forest; but the next town, Oxdrift, is in the constituency. Then I have another town, Peterborough, which is not in the constituency. The next towns are in the constituency and I am sure that some honourable senators will recognize them from the weather forecasts which we hear through the course of the year. A number of these areas are isolated and they provide a good deal of the weather information which we receive. I am speaking of places like Pickle Lake, Pikangikum, Pinewood, Rainy River, Redditt, Sandy Lake, Savant Lake, Shoal Lake, Sioux Lookout, Sleeman and Stratton. I then have on my list Thunder Bay, which is not in the constituency but in the same general geographical area.

Senator Corbin: May I ask a question? Is it not a fact that that area relies, to some extent, on the tourist trade, in particular, hunting and fishing, and that, quite probably, some of the people from areas you have named, such as Thunder Bay and other points south and east, could well be vacationing sports people and tourists who happened to be there at the time the petition was passed around? Would that not be a correct assumption?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I think your assumption is probably absolutely on target. It is, indeed, a major tourist area. I would think the main employment in the region is still forestry but, next to that, tourism would be very important. Places like Minaki and Kenora are known throughout the country as major tourist areas.

Senator Corbin: The GST is going to devastate tourism.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Molgat: It is going to be particularly hard on the tourism industry, because many of the people who use the tourist facilities in that region come from the United States. That is the main source and, of course, this will be an entirely new tax that has not existed before on the tourism industry. Yes, Senator Barootes?

• (1610)

Senator Barootes: In respect to that last statement, that it will be such a hardship on Americans and other tourists, is there not some arrangement for recompense and refunding of the GST for those who are visiting from foreign areas, both available at ports of entry and ports of exit, as well as, by means of forms, almost immediate refund?

Senator Molgat: That may be, Senator Barootes, but it is the same old problem of having to fill out forms and go through all the mechanical things that people do not like to do and which the businessmen who are operating these tourist facilities now do not have to do. It is simply another complication in their lives.

Senator Corbin: Senator Molgat, I hope you do not mind my interrupting you again.

Senator Molgat: No, no. I am delighted to see that there is that much interest in petitions from this area of Ontario which is really considered isolated by many Canadians.

Senator Corbin: Well, that area of Ontario, from the description, happens to be similar to my area, and one of the problems in this country is that some people always put policies across in terms of Toronto, Montreal and the Quebec/Windsor corridor, and maybe a few big cities out west or one big city down east. I think that Senator Barootes has missed the point as to how this tax will affect the tourist trade. In many cases, if one is an American looking at a tourist destination, a fishing destination, or a hunting destination, the fact that he would know there is an extra cost in the form of a goods and services tax would be sufficient for him to say, "Oh no, I will go somewhere else this year, and next year and the year after. I will not set foot in Canada again."

The administrative accommodation to which Senator Barootes refers is more a nuisance. Many tourists, even if they do come to Canada, knowing there is that tax, will not even bother applying for it. They will just say, "To hell with it. I am not coming back here next year." It has a detrimental impact on choices even before those choices are determined; and that is the negative aspect of the GST. What do you think?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I share your concern. There is also the problem insofar as Canadian tourists are concerned. Let us take, for example, the case of Senator Barootes who might, under normal circumstances, want to fish in the Kenora or Minaki area. As a Canadian he will, of course, have to pay the GST. But, if he goes across the line into Minnesota or northern Wisconsin, which has the same type of terrain, the same lakes and forests, he will not have to pay the GST. So there will be an incentive for Canadians to go to tourist areas other than Canada—

Senator Barootes: Compare that to going to England at 15 per cent.

Senator Molgat: —particularly when one considers that transportation will be taxed within Canada, but not outside of Canada.

So, to complete my list of these delightful spots—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Senator Barootes, England has an added advantage nowadays.

Senator Barootes: You do not have the floor. Senator Molgat has the floor.

Senator Gigantès: He gave me the floor, did you not, Senator?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: He has given me the floor.

Senator Frith: Will you guys try to get along.

Senator Gigantès: Do you not realize that there is an added advantage to going to England these days to hear Thatcherites bemoaning at what happened to her? That is a great pleasure for those of us who are not Thatcherites. It makes us dream.

Senator Barootes: I didn't get the question.

Senator Molgat: To continue my list of these delightful towns in this part of western Canada, and for those honourable senators who have not been in that region, I strongly encourage them to do so. It is indeed a pleasant area of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: To continue, I have Vermillon Bay, Wabigoon, Waldhof and Whitedog. It now turns out—and this follows what Senator Corbin was saying, that obviously some of those who signed these petitions are tourists, because some of them gave addresses in other areas. I have some from Brandon, Manitoba; Creston, B.C.; and Flin Flon, Manitoba. Here is one from Glasgow, Scotland. The others are Canadian. They are from Melville and Regina, Saskatchewan.

Senator Barootes: That would invalidate that petition, would it not?

Senator Molgat: No, I do not believe it would. I think it is probably someone who has suffered under the VAT in the U.K. and who recognizes what we are now imposing on Canadians and wants to help us protect ourselves against that.

Senator Frith: Let it be known that Senator Barootes wants to invalidate the whole petition, wipe it out.

Senator Molgat: He would like to invalidate the presentation of these people?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Carrying on to other points—and please note, Senator Barootes—there is a Regina, Saskatchewan signature in here also.

Senator Barootes: Lost in the woods.

Senator Molgat: There are petitioners from Roland, Manitoba; Silver Ridge, Manitoba; Smeaton, Saskatchewan; Victoria, B.C., and Winnipeg, Manitoba. That is a total of 54 different localities; but while I mention these other towns—and there may be one or two signatures from those—the bulk of those 2,873 signatures are directly from this region of Ontario.

I repeat that these people have a very specific and particular problem, and if they feel there is discrimination in this tax, they know why, because it will weigh much more heavily upon them from every aspect. In many cases they are unable to obtain services in that region; they have to go outside the region for the services, and they are then faced with extra transportation costs. Even the services that they can obtain are generally more expensive than they are in the big centres, because the individuals who provide services have the same old problem: high transportation costs, and not the same availability of services as elsewhere. So they are petitioning the Senate and asking honourable senators to do what they can to stop this tax.

I hope that my friends opposite will start paying attention to what it is that Canadians are saying. There is another poll out today showing that 75 per cent of Canadians do not want this tax. Why are my friends opposite not prepared to listen? Why are they not prepared to proceed and accept the amendment on which we will be voting in a little more than an hour from now—an amendment that would postpone this tax for a year, while our preference obviously would be to cancel the tax completely. At least if it were postponed for a year, as the amendment proposes, it would give Canadians and the government a chance to revise the tax or to kill it completely and find a new one, recognizing that if we are going to get away from the manufacturers' sales tax, we have to substitute it with something else, and if not to completely cancel it, at the very least to amend it so that it will not be unfair to regions like the one represented by Robert Nault, MP, who has sent me these petitions. I hope that honourable senators on the far side will listen to the plea of Canadians.

Senator Corbin: Senator Molgat, before you sit down, you gave us the total count of names of petitioners. Have you done a breakdown on the basis of localities, towns, and what have you?

Senator Molgat: No, I am sorry, Senator Corbin, I have not had the time to tell you how many there are from each town. I did go through the list and selected towns to show how widespread is the feeling in the constituency. I know the vast majority of these towns, and I know that they are representative of the whole of the Kenora-Rainy River constituency. A am sorry, I cannot tell you specifically how many petitioners are from each town.

Senator Corbin: Senator Molgat, do you have any objection to reading the names of one of the petitions selected at random from the very thick pile you have there, so that we could have an idea of the source of these signatures in terms of towns. I am sure that they are not all from Dryden and Kenora. Take any list of names at random so that we can have a good sampling of the widespread discontent with the GST.

• (1620)

Senator Molgat: The first sheet that I have here lists names from Kenora, which happens to be the closest town to where I presently live in Winnipeg. It is 110 miles away.

(Names of signatories read)

On the next page I find signatories from Hawk's Drift, Ontario, and quite a few names from Dryden.

(Names of signatories read)

To mention other locations, there are some names from Dinerwic, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

There are also some names from Vermilion Bay and Wabigoon.

(Names of signatories read)

We are back to the Kenora region for the other names on this petition. Honourable senators will know that Kenora and Dryden are two of the larger centres in this far-flung constituency.

There are quite a series of names from Pikangikum. There are several pages from Pik.

(Names of signatories read)

The areas are quite widespread.

Senator Corbin: Thank you very much.

PERSIAN GULF

UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTION ON USE OF FORCE—CANADIAN COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask a number of questions about the proposed resolution that is to be dealt with on Thursday at the Security Council of the United Nations, and which has been talked about by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The draft resolution that has been circulated, if accepted, will authorize member states to adopt "all necessary means"—I think that was the expression—to implement a previous resolution of the UN that requested the Iraqis to move out of Kuwait.

I should like to know what is the attitude of the Government of Canada to the resolution and what meaning it attaches to the expression "all necessary means".

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, first, I should state that the Right Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs is on his way back to Canada, having visited a number of countries in Europe and the Middle East. I expect that he will report to the House of Commons tomorrow. On Thursday he will attend the meeting of the United Nations Security Council in New York.

The draft is still circulating. It is quite possible that changes will be made to it. Canada believes that it is important to demonstrate the resolve and seriousness of the international community's effort to convince Iraq of the need to withdraw peacefully from Kuwait.

It appears that there is sufficient support for the draft to be adopted and that that support will be broad. But final positions, including our own final position, will only be taken on the final text.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that the text is virtually agreed upon, with the exception of differences between the Soviet Union and the United States on a date—that is, whether it is to be January 1 or January 15 for possible action to be taken.

I doubt whether the Government of Canada's formulation of views is so tentative that it does not have any position on whether or not it will support that part of the resolution referring to "all necessary means."

To make the question more pointed, what meaning does Canada attach to that expression? If Canada supports that resolution, will it mean that the Government of Canada is committing itself at a certain point to a defensive action in the Gulf; or is that a decision will be taken later and that support of the resolution at this point does not necessarily commit Canada to offensive action?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator talks about "offensive" action. The rules of an engagement for our forces relate to a defensive posture for Canadian forces in the Gulf.

• (1630)

The statement of the government with regard to the resolution and the dates that have been suggested for withdrawal—the dates the deadlines that have been suggested for the resolution—is that we think that the United Nations, having already demanded in one of its earlier resolutions the immediate withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait, providing now what the Soviets, I think it is the Soviets, call a "goodwill pause" of four to six weeks, is indeed making quite a magnanimous gesture, and it has proved that the international community is taking every possible effort to secure a peaceful resolution to the problem.

So far as military action is concerned, our position is that adoption of the draft resolution would not necessarily mean that the Iraqis would be engaged militarily, but the international community, acting through the U.N., will have recognized and implicitly endorsed that possibility, if it becomes necessary.

Senator MacEachen: At one point I understood that Canada would not, by supporting this resolution, commit itself to any future offensive action, that that would require a separate decision depending upon events or circumstances at that time. I believe the sense of the debate in this chamber last week was to the effect that Canada should be very cautious about committing itself to offensive action at this stage and that considerable patience should be exercised. I hope that the government will take that into account, so that by endorsing the resolution, which in itself could have a very positive effect, it would not be seen to be taking an offensive military posture. However, we can return to that at a future time.

Another question I want to ask, which is in a sense directly related to any decision on military action, has to do with the sanctions. Can we find out whether these sanctions are working? And if they are working, of course, it puts military action in a different light. I understand that Senator Sam Nunn in Washington today expressed the opinion that the sanctions were working, but we don't know. Can we find out? Let us hope we will find out before we are asked to go any further with respect to commitments in the Persian Gulf.

Senator Murray: With regard to the sanctions, they are working in the sense they have very, very broad support, but they have not, obviously, had the desired effect. I do not know what more I can add to that. That probably would take somewhat more time.

I can only tell the honourable senator that with regard to any offensive action, as I indicated, the rules of engagement the Canadian Forces have there deal exclusively with self-defence and with the enforcement of the U.N. sanctions. We are not going to become automatically involved in war initiated by other countries.

Senator MacEachen: Well, that is even more elusive. I forgive the Honourable Leader of the Government his tentative replies because I know it is a sensitive matter and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs is not in the country, but I would hope that later in the week we would have clear-cut answers to clear-cut questions, and I would draw to his attention his own statement that sanctions are working. Well, that is very encouraging, and if they are working, it means that the economy of Iraq is being damaged very seriously and that patience may produce the results without following the American timetable.

However, I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Government of Canada will give consideration to having included in the draft resolution, which is now being circulated, a request to the Secretary General of the United Nations that a report go to the Security Council on or before January 15, 1991, and the purpose of that request would be to have at that time an assessment by the Secretary General of, first of all, the question of sanctions and, second, the diplomatic situation in the Persian Gulf. If at that time, based upon investigations, a report was available, it might be much easier to determine what action should be taken.

I would like the Leader of the Government to give some thought to that suggestion as a positive one which might be included in the draft resolution which is now being circulated.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will certainly see that the honourable senator's comments are drawn to the attention of my colleague, Mr. Clark.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ESTIMATE OF REVENUE GAINS—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question on another matter and maybe I should finish off now instead of coming back. I asked several days ago whether the government could provide me with its estimates of revenue to be derived from certain sectors of the economy as a result of the imposition of the Goods and Services Tax. I had in mind reading materials, cooperatives and heating costs in certain parts of Canada.

I wonder, if that information is not available now, if it could be made available at an early date, and any other sector revenues that could be identified?

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

URUGUAY ROUND—PROGRESS OF DISCUSSIONS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government if he has an answer today, or if he is prepared to give any indication of what may happen with respect to the Uruquay Round of trade discussions that are going on now? He will realize that there is less than two weeks left, even though the discussions have been going on for, I believe, four years. Apparently a whole group of matters were going to be discussed—I think they said there were fifteen categories of trade matters under discussion—and apparently they are all going to fail now because they are unable to get an agreement on the agriculture sector.

● (1640)

The other day I asked the honourable senator if there was some hope, substantially more hope I might say, than the Honourable John Crosbie has indicated in recent weeks. He seems to be very pessimistic about reaching a satisfactory conclusion.

I believe I also asked the Leader of the Government about whether or not the government of Canada was involved in any other discussions that might result in some relief from these severely depressed prices, particularly with regard to the international grain market, in the event that these talks break down, which Mr. Crosbie seems to think is inevitable.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have any further information today. We had a discussion on this topic some days ago during Question Period. I can only repeat that agriculture is the main stumbling block at the moment to a successful Uruguay Round. I do not think that it should necessarily be taken for granted that the problems we are facing in the agriculture negotiations will result in the failure of the entire negotiations.

With regard to the other matters—that is to say, what Canada is doing elsewhere—I tried to give some indication the other day of the efforts that we have been making through the Cairns Group, through the group of seven industrialized nations and so forth. An inquiry has gone forward, and if there is further information on this matter I shall certainly bring it in.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I did ask if some other action was being taken, or at least contemplated. I know that there have been reports that the focus of the talks has been on agriculture and that there are some logjams in some of the other fourteen areas under negotiation. Some of these logjams involve Asian countries with which we share some pretty important trading considerations such as access to markets in Japan, Korea, and so on. Can the minister not give us any hope at all that some other action is being taken, so that the collapse of these talks will not mean that nothing is being done to provide some relief to a terribly depressed international grain market?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Mr. Crosbie will be attending the meetings next week in Geneva, and we may have something to report at that time. As for efforts that are being taken outside GATT negotiations, I shall inquire as to whether there is anything new to report and, if so, I shall do so.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN SUBSIDIES—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. H. A. Olson: There have been some discussions between the two levels of government in Canada to find some way of giving some reasonable relief to some of the grain producers in various parts of the country. I understand that, indeed, one or two agreements have been reached. I believe that it was announced yesterday that an agreement was reached between Canada and the Government of Quebec on some $30 million in subsidies. I realize, of course, that the grain sector in Quebec is somewhat smaller, relatively speaking, than it is, for example, in Saskatchewan or Alberta. Are any discussions under way between the federal government and the provinces to find some relief for this severely depressed sector in the event that we cannot hope for any relief in the international market?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, discussions have been going on for some considerable time between my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister, and the Minister of Agriculture and the provinces concerning what might be called the safety net for farmers both in the long term and with the short term problems that we face. I do not have a report from Mr. Mazankowski on that matter today, but I shall ask him for one and bring it in at an early date.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the safety net is one thing, and we have known about that for some time. The safely net, as it is now being discussed, requires contributions to the funding from the federal government, provincial governments and producers. Does the government believe that that safety net will be sufficient to meet the situation that we face today? For example, is nothing to be done to relieve the problem farmers face with regard to debt service charges, which is the real killer that is dragging these people deeper into a morass of debt that they simply cannot handle? I am tempted to go into that area of questioning about whether the government intends to do anything through its monetary policy and consequent high interest rates, but I shall not. Specifically with regard to the agriculture sector, are we to assume from the minister's reply that the only thing that producers can look forward to is some kind of agreement on a so-called safety net, from which, under the present proposals, the benefits could not possibly be made available for several years? They need it now.

Senator Murray: As I have indicated, I shall obtain a report from Mr. Mazankowski and bring it in at an early date.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

APPLICABILITY TO INDIAN RESERVES—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is a follow up to a question I asked the minister on November 20. It is with regard to whether or not the GST will apply on Indian reserves. If it is in the delayed answers, I am prepared to wait.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there are two delayed answers to questions asked by the honourable senator, one asked on November 6 with regard to the GST and one on November 8 on another matter that is not related to the GST.

Senator Molgat: I asked the Leader of the Government on November 20 whether the GST would apply to goods sold on Indian reserves. I pointed out that in my province the rule with the provincial tax is that if the store is on the reserve no tax is charged to a reserve resident, and that if a resident buys goods outside the reserve, he or she must pay the tax and apply for a rebate. I had been asked this question by someone who is in business on a reserve. The minister replied, "That is exactly the kind of question that I would want to obtain a prepared reply on, and I will do so immediately." I wonder if the honourable senator has that reply.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I recall the exchange very well, and it is the type of question to which it should be possible to obtain an answer without delay. I shall attempt to do so.

THE ENVIROMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—REIMBURSEMENT OF GOVERNMENT FUNDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, another matter on which I have been awaiting an answer is with regard to the $10 million that the federal government had advanced to the Province of Saskatchewan in order that the province would not proceed with the Rafferty-Alameda Dams. Since the province has now gone ahead, will the federal government be getting the $10 million back?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have no information on that matter today.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SOVIET UNION—REQUEST FOR SUPPLIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the Soviet Union's request of Canada for food and necessities. I gather from press reports that President Gorbachev met with Prime Minister Mulroney in Paris and that further discussions have taken place with officials of the Soviet Union and Canada respecting the Soviet Union's need for immediate help in foodstuffs, medical supplies and other necessities. What is the position of the Government of Canada on this matter, what quantity of supplies are being considered, and when would they be shipped?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have that kind of information. All I can tell the honourable senator today is that following the meeting between the Prime Minister and President Gorbachev the government has been urgently determining the availability of the goods requested; that is, a range of food commodities. I can tell the honourable senator that President Gorbachev made it clear during the meeting that the Soviets are seeking a commercial transaction with Canada, not aid, and that Canada is prepared to respond to the Soviet request in a positive manner. As for the rest of the question with respect to the precise financing conditions on the quantities of goods, these are now being negotiated with the Soviet authorities.

QUALIFICATIONS OF RECIPIENTS OF REBATE—ORIGIN OF FUND FOR REBATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. A short while ago the Minister of Finance made a statement, which I will quote in part:

> Seven million poor and moderate-income Canadians will not get their GST rebate cheques until the Senate passes the tax legislation, Finance Minister Michael Wilson warned Wednesday.
> But by the same token, Wilson admitted that he won't be able to collect the tax until it is passed, though he added "we're going to get this thing through."
> "If the current partisan obstruction in the Senate is allowed to go on too long, the Liberal senators will jeopardize the first payment of $600 million to seven million low- and moderate-income Canadians who have qualified for the refundable GST credit", Wilson said in a speech to chartered accountants.

According to this, it seems that people have qualified for a credit on a fund that is non-existent. First, what are the qualifications of the recipients of the rebate; and, second, where is the money coming from to pay those people who have qualified, or who have certain qualifications, on which I put a question mark?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The qualifications relate to the income situation of those people. They qualified by filling in a form, which, as I recall, was sent out with the last personal income tax returns. Mr. Wilson is correct that the legislation would have to be passed. It is a GST tax credit for lower income Canadians, and, of course, the first of those cheques would go out in December; but the bill would have had to have been passed by the Senate and have received Royal Assent before that could be done.

Senator Robichaud: I have a supplementary question. How can they qualify to collect money or to receive money from a fund that does not exist? Of course the GST is not law. How can they qualify to collect money from a fund that is non-existent, unless the government goes into the consolidated revenue fund and uses money from other funds?

Senator Buckwold: They just ask for supplementary funds.

Senator Robichaud: The law does not exist.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the fund as such is not provided for in the legislation, as I recall. That is done through the appropriations procedure of Parliament. The cheques would be sent out, but the authorization for spending the money is contained in Bill C-62, which would have to be passed and receive Royal Assent before the cheques could go out.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL POLLUTION IN THE GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—SOURCE OF POLLUTION—DEATH OF SEABIRDS ON PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND BEACHES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, over the last weekend on Prince Edward Island 90 seabirds died on the beaches of the north shore of the island. Apparently there has been a heavy oil spill in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Could the minister inform me if the department feels that this oil is coming from the Irving Whale, which sAnk on September 7, 1970? Is that where the oil is coming from that is killing the birds?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have no information on that matter today. I shall have to make inquiries.

CONDITION OF SUNKEN VESSEL IRVING WHALE—PROVISION OF MOST RECENT STUDY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Could the Leader of the Government provide information as to the last study that has taken place on the Irving Whale? I would like to know the condition the vessel is in, how much oil is leaking from it, at what rate, and if the oil they are finding on the shores of Prince Edward Island is the same type of oil? I would like to know where this oil is coming from.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, at the same time as I make inquiries with respect to Senator Bonnell's first question, I shall send those questions forward as well.

GREEN PLAN—REMOVAL OF WATER PROTECTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I notice that in the green plan, which the government is supposed to release soon, a chapter protecting Canada's lakes, rivers, oceans and groundwater has been gutted and other measures in the plan have been weakened. Is that correct? Has there been a big cut in the green plan, which protects the environment?

CONSEQUENCES OF THE LIBERAL FILIBUSTER

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that these past few months, the Liberal Opposition in the Senate has been telling us that 85 per cent of Canadians are against the GST, that the Montreal Gazette and the La Presse daily published this morning the results of a recent Crop and Environics poll which indicate that the opposition to the GST is now down to 72 per cent, that even 53 per cent of Liberal voters think that Jean Chrétien would keep the GST if ever he came to power and that only 35 per cent believe that he would scrap the GST as he promised, does the Leader of the Government expect to see clear indication within the next few hours or days that the filibuster conducted in the Senate over the past few months will finally come to an end. As I said, 53 per cent of Canadian Liberals believe that if Jean Chrétien came to power he would not scrap the GST as he said he would. Are you confident, Senator Murray, that once the independent senators have had an opportunity to rise and move their motions in amendment—as it has always been our policy and intention on this side of the house—that the former Liberal majority, now reduced to a minority, will now come to its senses and allow the government to implement the GST in such a way that Canadian businessmen and others will not suffer untold harm because they are ready for its implementation on January 1, 1991?

[Senator Bonnell.]

That is my question to Senator Murray. I may have another question for him later on.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Of course, honourable senators, I fully share the sentiments which Senator Simard has just expressed. I will only repeat that the Rules of the Senate allow him to raise such a question concerning the Business of the Senate. You are entitled to direct this question to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

Senator Simard: I have also the right to expect a reply from the Leader of the Government. Perhaps Senator Frith could give me his reply or his view, or even the Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen, or even Senator Fairbairn.

So, Senator Murray, you are confident that the people opposite could indicate to Canadians that the time for this foolishness is over.

● (1700)

[English]

Perhaps Senator MacEachen would like to answer that question, keeping in mind that 53 per cent of Liberal Canadians feel that Mr. Chrétien would keep the GST in place if Liberals ever formed the government—God forbid!

Senator Frith: You'll soon be able to ask him! He'll be in the House of Commons shortly!

Senator Simard: Do you not feel that the time has come to end your filibuster? I know that questions usually go from your side to this side, but since you are being creative lately and you are telling the world that you may have a few more things up your sleeve, perhaps you would want to tell Canadians that the time for your foolishness, such as storming the Chair, has come to an end.

Senator Olson: Where is Senator Kelly? He might want to raise a point of order about this.

Senator Simard: Will the real leader stand up?

Senator Corbin: If Senator Murray and Senator Simard wish to come to this side to put questions, we will gladly sit on that side. Do you want to make the change now?

Senator Frith: Yes. Let's start by putting in a new Speaker!

TAX CREDIT CHEQUES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which follows on from Senator Robichaud's question, but before I put the question, I would just like to comment.

[Translation]

We are now in the midst of a Conservative remote-control election campaign. They chose not to run a candidate against Jean Chrétien, but they send the Prime Minister to Saint John and dispatch Finance Minister Wilson to Edmonston, New Brunswick. They use Senator Simard to take pot shots at Mr. Chrétien, but they did not have the courage to put up a candidate against him. This kind of foolishness has gone on long enough.

Senator Simard: Even Mr. Chrétien agreed with that arrangement.

Senator Corbin: I am not afraid for Mr. Chrétien, you will see!

[English]

Senator Robichaud asked Senator Murray if there existed a fund from which the government would take money to send GST rebate cheques to qualified taxpayers, and Senator Murray replied that it is based on the information gathered from the income taxes levied in the previous year. However, an Ottawa Citizen article of October 18, 1990, quotes Mr. Wilson as follows:

> "If the current—

as he calls it—

> —partisan obstruction in the Senate is allowed to go on too long—

I guess he is prepared to see it go for some length of time—

> —the Liberal senators will jeopardize the first payment of $600 million to seven million low- and moderate-income Canadians who have qualified for the refundable GST credit," Wilson said in a speech to chartered accountants.

I do not think any chartered accountants believed him in the first place, but what I want to draw to the attention of honourable senators is the fact that he used the word "jeopardize." "Jeopardize" means to endanger. I think the Minister of Finance is bluffing. There cannot be jeopardy if there is no tax, and there can be no credit refunds if there is no tax. I think it is all a bluff on the part of Mr. Wilson. It is an attempt to blackmail Liberal senators. He is using the poor, at Christmastime, to put pressure on senators on this side of the house to let the bill go through.

Senator Olson: Shame!

Senator Barootes: A bunch of Scrooges!

Senator Corbin: We are not Scrooges. The whole thing is a farce. It is a concoction, and one of the most cynical farces invented by any Tory government—and at Christmastime! Taxpayers know there is no refund if they do not pay tax. They would rather not see the GST. What kind of tune are you attempting to get the Canadian taxpayers to dance to? If that is jeopardy, Mr. Wilson's words are blackmail and nothing else.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): It is not a refund; it is a tax credit, as I recall, that is being provided.

Senator Olson: They will have to pay the tax later on.

Senator Murray: The bill provides that the tax credit is to be paid out in advance, in instalments each year. The first such advance, between $600 million and $700 million to seven million lower-income Canadians, was due to be sent out during the month of December. That is the schedule. The credit would be advanced periodically in the course of the year. I do not know why the honourable senator is so scandalized about that. I would hope that he would, after all this time, ensure that this matter is brought to a speedy vote so that we could get on with it.

Senator Corbin: On the contrary, I am going to do my best to see that it does not come to the kind of conclusion the government wants, for the simple reason that people in this country do not want the GST. They would rather have you stuff your credit and see the GST dead. That is what Canadian people are saying today.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—INCLUSION OF GST TAX CREDIT

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, may I ask the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate a related question? Recently, there was tabled in the House of Commons a set of Supplementary Estimates, Supplementary Estimates (B). Do those Estimates contain an appropriation related in whole or in part to the tax credit that the honourable Minister has just now been discussing.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would have to refresh my memory by consulting the Supplementary Estimates. In any case, they will be here in due course.

Senator Doody: They were tabled today.

Senator Murray: They were tabled today, and they will be referred, I take it, to the appropriate committee in due course.

Senator Stewart: May I ask the honourable Minister, if Bill C-62 were to become law, would those credits be payable even though at that time, let us say the present date, the bill based on Supplementary Estimates (B) had not been enacted?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I shall make inquiries.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATEMENT BY MINISTER—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I noticed in the Charlottetown Guardian of Thursday, November 22, that the Honourable Elmer MacKay states that a federal series of compromises could clear the way for a fixed-link crossing between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Could the Minister tell me what the compromises might be?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the only information I have on that subject relates to a matter that we discussed in the Senate some time ago. I refer to the environmental report and, in particular, the problems raised by the panel concerning delay in ice-out.

• (1710)

Mr. MacKay has announced that the Government of Canada and, I believe, the governments of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia—but certainly the Government of Canada—will be working with a group of ice experts with a view to meeting the concerns expressed by the environmental panel on that subject; in particular, the recommendation of the panel that the design of the fixed-link crossing be such as to permit no more than two days' delay in ice out every 100 years. A group of experts will be working with the governments on this matter in an attempt to satisfy the concerns expressed by the panel. They will report in due course and, as the minister, Mr. MacKay, has indicated, any further initiative on this project, of course, depends on its being environmentally sound.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I notice in this article the minister states that the final report will be available by the spring of 1991. He states that there have been a series of federal compromises. Apparently, it is more than just a matter of considering ice and how much the ice will come into play every 100 years.

Perhaps the minister could look into this matter and bring a report to the chamber as to what other compromises might be involved. Perhaps he could also tell us who is on this panel which is to study the ice flows in the strait.

I do not know why the province of Nova Scotia would be involved in this as much as the province of New Brunswick because the fixed link is supposed to go from Tormentine, New Brunswick.

Senator Murray: I am glad to have the opportunity to state that the province of New Brunswick is involved as are the provinces of Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia. These governments were asked to examine the report of the environmental assessment panel and to provide their views.

The environmental panel sets out a specific criteria that could enable the federal government to take the next step in the process. As I indicated, the government is going to develop, in consultation with a committee of ice experts, a procedure to ensure that the panel's principal concerns—and one of its principal concerns was the maximum ice-out delay—can be met by the developers before continuing with the screening stages of this project.

There are, of course, other broader concerns that the governments, federal and provincial, must take into account. There is the livelihood of the fishermen and of the ferry workers, and our commitment to pursue compensation and severance payment arrangements if the project eventually proceeds.

I want to emphasize, however, as did Mr. MacKay, that the government would proceed with this project only if environmental concerns are met and the project can be shown to be financially viable. Senator Bonnell may still have some time left to decide whether he is for or against it.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

ASBESTOS CONTAMINATION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am all for a clean environment.

An article in the Ottawa Sun of November 22 indicated that the buildings here on Parliament Hill are contaminated with asbestos and that the south block on Wellington Street is in even worse condition. Apparently, this has been covered up for some years.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us what the Government of Canada is doing to remove this asbestos from the south block and the buildings on Parliament Hill?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I cannot and do not accept the characterization that has been placed upon this matter by the honourable senator. However, I shall see whether any information can be brought forward on this matter at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SUGGESTION OF PRIVATIZATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, this morning in the Ottawa Citizen Marjorie Nicholls had a column in which she suggested that the CBC should be privatized. I believe that the Prime Minister went on record some years ago as saying that he would never privatize the CBC, that the CBC is a national institution which will be protected. Is that still the policy of the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators. There is no consideration being given and none has been given to privatizing the CBC.

Senator Davey: There was another story in the newspaper this week which suggested that the government in its various budget cuts would either cut away at or even destroy CBC Newsworld. Is that a possibility?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must say I have no idea what steps the management and directors of the CBC may be contemplating, faced, as they are—as we all are—with financial constraints. I had not heard that report until the honourable senator mentioned it today.

Senator Olson: You have to decide whether you are going to fund it or not.

AGRICULTURE

JAPANESE TARIFFS ON CANOLA SEED—GOVERNMENT POSITON

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question to the minister is with regard to an industry in western Canada which is in serious trouble. I am referring to the canola-crushing industry.

Some years ago there were great hopes that we could build up a very important and diversified industry in the west by crushing the canola seed in the west and shipping the oil. However, some very serious problems have developed. For example, I have here a report in the Winnipeg Free Press of Monday, November 12, 1990, which states:

> Canola crushers in Western Canada are watching their industry disappear—the victim of national, international and even provincial subsidies and trade policies.

I know that a number of processing plants have closed, that others are operating only part-time, and that all are losing substantial sums of money.

I have here, in this article, a direct statement from Mr. Al Huffman, the chief executive officer of CSP Foods Ltd., which owns two plants in Manitoba and one in Saskatchewan. He said:

> . . . politicians claim to want more value-added processing in Canada, but their actions don't back up their words. They're not really interested in processing although they mouth the words.

Mr. Gregg Arason, chief executive officer of the Manitoba Pool, which owns half of CSB Foods Ltd., said that the industry faces some tough decisions and that there will likely be more closings. According to this article, he said:

> I think we're open to any kinds of discussions that will improve the viability of the crushing industry, . . .
> I think if we don't look at it from that perspective we're in danger of losing the whole crushing industry in Western Canada because it doesn't appear that any of us are viable on our own.

Honourable senators, some of the problems deal with the federal government's policies on transportation subsidies but one of the main problems is Japanese tariffs. The Japanese market is a big buyer of raw seed and they crush it in their own plants. For example, last year they took from Canada alone 1.9 million tonnes of canola in seed form. That accounted for 90 per cent of Canadian export sales. On the other hand, all they bought from Canada in the form of oil was 19,000 tonnes. In other words, they bought 1,000 times more seed than oil.

The problem is caused by a very high Japanese subsidy on this product. On the other hand, here we are importing large numbers of Japanese automobiles.

Is it not possible for the Canadian government to sit down with the Japanese government and come to an arrangement? Here we have an industry which could be based in western Canada and which would give diversification yet, because of this specific tariff by the Japanese, we are excluded from that market. Would the minister indicate whether the Canadian government is prepared to sit down with the Japanese government and negotiate a better deal with the canola industry, or would they consider some changes in automobile tariffs?

• (1720)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I think the honourable senator will realize that I must take that question as a representation and ask my colleague, Mr. Crosbie, whether he wishes to provide some comment on it.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. One of Canada's largest canola crushing plants located at Lloydminster, Saskatchewan, on the Alberta-Saskatchewan border, has closed. The company spokesmen are blaming the Free Trade Agreement and the failure of multinational trade talks. The people running these plants and who know where the markets are have some idea of what the problem is, and they say that if we do not have access to the United States market, if we have been shut out of that market—and they do say we were shut out of the offshore markets and the U.S. market—we cannot live on the domestic market alone. That is what they say, and they are the people who know because they have been running the plant.

Senator Balfour: Do you agree with that?

Senator Olson: I agree with them until I hear anything different. I know that when we were in government, when we received messages like this from the people who were in the marketing system, we did something about it.

Senator Murray: You gave them the finger.

Senator Olson: Pardon me?

Senator Murray: You gave them the finger.

Senator Olson: I never did, and I would like to know if the Leader of the Government is going to take some action to make sure that the Free Trade Agreement is going to allow a Canadian product to get into the United States market on the same basis that we have been relaxing with respect to a whole lot of trade and various commodities coming this way. There is a whole lot more that could be said about how serious this is, and I hope the minister will take the matter seriously because at that one plant alone 75 people have been put out of work, and they don't know for how long. Probably hundreds of farmers used to market their canola there who no longer have access to that market. I wonder if the minister, when he is making the representations he said he was going to make, would have a look at how much damage the Free Trade Agreement has done to that industry.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my information is that the prospects for this Canadian industry are actually quite good. In any case, I shall obtain some notes on the subject. As a matter of fact, I had a note a week or two ago on this industry that is closed. I do not have it with me now, but I shall try to retrieve it and read from it at an early date.

Senator Olson: I would like to know when I report to the people who are interested in this, what the minister means when he says that the prospects for this industry are very good—that is what he just said—when they know that one plant after another is being shut down, including one of the largest in Canada, the one at Lloydminster. There mut be some new meaning to these words, if you are telling people that prospects are quite good when only a week ago a plant was closed. I don't think they will understand that kind of talk. Could you give us some new definition of the words that you are using?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I told the honourable senator that I had a note on this matter the other day which I shall have to retrieve. When I have done so, I shall enlighten my honourable friend as to the basis of the statement I have just made.

Senator Olson: You just said that the prospects for that industry are quite good. Could you give some substance to that comment so I can convey it to the people who are interested?

Senator Murray: Yes, I think I can, and I shall.

JUSTICE

EXTRADITION PROCEDURES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Paul Lucier : Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I was encouraged by the Justice Minister's statement that she is looking for an opportunity to streamline Canada's extradition procedures. That is something that certainly is needed. Sometimes we try for years to send an alleged criminal back to the country of his origin. There has been a great deal of talk about Mr. Ng in Calgary who has been charged with 13 sex crimes in California, and it seems almost impossible to get him out of Canada. I am just wondering if the Minister of Justice has a timeframe in which this review will be done? Are we looking at a particular timeframe or is it just something that will be done sometime in the future?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have notes on the matter, but my clear impression is that this will take a year or more to complete.

THE SENATE

DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Earlier today when we arrived at our places in this chamber we found on our desks a news release from the Minister for International Trade, numbered 276, dated November 26, 1990, entitled, "Government Increases Agricultural and Fish Commodities Insurance to Cuba".

Honourable senators, I do not know why this type of material is distributed in the Senate when it has nothing to do with the business at hand. This is getting to be a habit. Any person can now come to the door of the Senate, it seems, and put material in the hands of pages and request that it be distributed to honourable senators. We have postboxes and a messenger service both of which have been put to very good use in the past, for distributing material, and so I would hope that this sort of practice in the chamber would stop immediately.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Corbin: It is being abused and I think that no paper should be distributed unless it is authorized by the proper authorities and officers and officials of this chamber. I would like to refer this whole matter to the Rules Committee for consideration.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I was as puzzled as my honourable friend to find the document, which is a one-page document, on my desk in the Senate. As the honourable senator points out, there is a mail service and a messenger service here. I do not know how this happened, who arranged it, or who authorized it. I have no objection, of course, if the honourable senator wishes to ask the Rules Committee or some other body of this house to consider the general question of what documents can be circulated in the chamber and by whom.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions, and I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ELIMINATION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX—CALCULATION OF REFUND—DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WHOLESALERS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990 by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding the GST—Elimination of Federal Sales Tax-Calculation of Refund—Discrimination against Wholesalers—Government Response.

(The answer follows:)

> The existing Federal Sales Tax is levied at the manufacturer's level. As a result, when the GST is scheduled to take effect, vendors will have inventories for resale on which the current tax has already been paid. The purpose of the rebate program is to remove this tax from inventories in order to avoid double taxation on resale under the GST.
> Throughout the summer and fall of last year, Revenue Canada—which is responsible for administering the GST—conducted extensive consultations with the business community on the Federal Sales Tax inventory rebate program. In the course of those consultations, it became evident that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for most businesses to identify the actual Federal Sales Tax content of their inventories. Consequently, a tax-factor approach was adopted to simplify the claiming and administration of the rebate program.

The current Federal Sales Tax does not apply to such things as transportation costs and subsequent mark-ups by distributors and wholesalers. In most cases, these costs lower the effective tax rate on vendors' inventories well below 13.5 per cent. The comprehensive work that has been done in this area indicates that 8.1 per cent is a fair overall approximation of the Federal Sales Tax embedded in inventories.

The inventory rebate will apply to goods on which the Federal Sales Tax component is clearly visible, and to those where it is not. The 8.1 per cent rebate was adopted to increase fairness between these two types of goods—a difference caused solely by the complexity of the current Federal Sales Tax.

VIA RAIL

FREQUENCY, ROUTING AND DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICE—REQUIREMENT TO FILE APPLICATIONS RESCINDED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 8, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Molgat, regarding Via Rail—Frequency, Routing and Discontinuance of Service—Requirement to File Applications Rescinded—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

When announcing the new VIA network last year, the Minister of Transport stated:

"VIA will continue to provide service to truly isolated communities with no alternative means of transportation. However, over the course of the next year, I will be examining options for more cost-effective means of transportation for these truly isolated communities."

The review process is underway in consultation with all provinces concerned.

There has been no report and no decisions have been taken on the information being gathered through these studies.

Any decision with regard to the future of rail passenger service to Churchill will be taken by the Minister of Transport and Cabinet, so the NTA decision will not affect the route in any way.

PERSIAN GULF

UNITED STATES MILITARY MANOEUVRES—INVOLVEMENT OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Grafstein, regarding United States Military Manoeuvres—Involvement of Canadian Personnel.

(The answer follows:)

There has been no change to the role of the Canadian Forces in the Gulf area. Their mission continues to be one of assisting in the deterrence of further Iraqi aggression, and to contribute to international efforts to ensure strict implementation of the United Nations economic sanctions against Iraq.

Canadian Forces in the region have used every opportunity to train with other forces in the area to ensure that allied forces have the capability to work together.

Canadian Forces participation in Exercise IMMINENT THUNDER was strictly limited. Canadian Forces were not participating in the landing exercise. However, by occasionally playing the role of defender, our forces were provided with the opportunity to test and practice procedures.

Canadian CF-18 aircraft continued to conduct Combat Air Patrols over the Persian Gulf. During Exercise IMMINENT THUNDER, Canadian aircraft were engaged in exercises wherein they simulated opposing forces for those aircraft providing air coverage for the amphibious operations.

Canadian ships in the region, while practising escorting duty for the United States Naval Hospital Ships COMFORT and MERCY, were, at the same time, continuing to monitor international shipping.

This is the extent of the limited nature of the Canadian Forces participation in Exercise IMMINENT THUNDER, and it does not represent a change in the role of the Canadian Forces in the Gulf area.

ENERGY

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—PROPOSED SALE OF INTEREST BY GULF CANADA RESOURCES LTD.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the fourth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Corbin, regarding Energy—Hibernia Development Project—Proposed Sale of Interest by Gulf Canada Resources Ltd.—Government Position.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I would ask that the answer to my question be read.

Senator Doody: We have time under the rules if the Senate will allow me. The answer reads as follows:

It is inappropriate to speculate at this time on the impact on Canadian ownership and control of Hibernia since this would depend on the nationality of the eventual buyer.

With regard to the recent announcement by Gulf Canada Resources that it may sell up to 12.5 per cent interest in the Hibernia project, honourable senators are reminded that the federal government retains the right to review any transfer of interest in the project under the terms of the Hibernia Financing Agreements and the Canadianization requirements under the Canada Oil and Gas Land Regulations. This would be done before the transfer took place.

Honourable senators should also be reminded that any potential change in ownership would not change the flow of industrial benefits to Canada as agreed to under the Hibernia Development Project Act.

Further speculation, at this time, on whether this will have an impact on Canadian ownership and control of Hibernia would be inappropriate since the eventual buyer could indeed be Canadian.

THE ECONOMY

STUDY BY BCNI—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the fifth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Marsden, regarding The Economy—Study by BCNI—Government Participation.

(The answer follows:)

The Report, cited by the Hon. Senator, to be prepared by Professor Michael Porter of Harvard University regarding a study on the competitiveness of Canadian industry will indeed be made public.

The form of funding of the project is legally between Professor Porter and the Business Council on National Issues (BCNI). The Canadian Government will support the project through a legal agreement with BCNI. The attached BCNI communiqué lists the government departments involved and further explains the project.

The study will be completed by May 1991.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DELAY IN RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Kenny, regarding Business of the Senate—Delay in Response to Questions—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

[Senator Corbin.]

In response to a further inquiry from the Honourable Senator, it was indeed the Final Report of the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills Response Capability that was tabled on November 20, 1990. Unfortunately the record stated the "Interim" Report by mistake.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the third reading of the Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Stan Waters:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to require that the excess revenues derived from the goods and services tax be applied to reduce the public debt of Canada, by adding on page 278, immediately after line 27, the following new clause and renumbering the subsequent clauses of the Bill accordingly:

Application of Excess Revenues

"18. Beginning with the fiscal year that ends on March 31, 1992, such of the revenues derived under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act in each fiscal year as exceed 21 thousand million dollars shall be applied forthwith to the purchase for cancellation of securities of Canada within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act."

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Hon. Edward M. Lawson, seconded, by Hon. Stan Waters, that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to require that the excess revenues derived from the goods and services tax be applied to reduce the public debt of Canada, by adding on page 278, immediately after line 27, the following new clause and renumbering the subsequent clauses of the Bill accordingly:

Application of excess revenues

"18. Beginning with the fiscal year that ends on March 31, 1992, such of the revenues derived under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act in each fiscal year as exceed 21 thousand million dollars shall be applied forthwith to the purchase for cancellation of securities of Canada within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act."

Honourable senators, it is your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment.

[English]

Senator Lawson: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to move an amendment. It appeared for a long time that we would not have such a right. I would like to take a moment to attempt to straighten out the record as to the sequence of events.

The previous week, discussions were initiated by senators on the government side for the independent senators to have the right to move amendments. Unfortunately, those discussions were unsuccessful. Subsequently, the Speaker initiated discussions with Senator Waters and me in the hope of trying to achieve the opportunity to move amendments. The government said that what we were seeking was unreasonable, and those negotiations failed.

Last Thursday, when the eighth and final Liberal amendment was voted upon, it appeared that the Speaker was going to recognize Senator Murray on behalf of the government to move the previous question. If that had proceeded, we would not have had the opportunity to move amendments. I must acknowledge that the intervention by the Leader of the Opposition and members of the Opposition in the finest British tradition of swarming the Speaker, resulted in further negotiations taking place. If that had not happened, Senator Waters and I would have been stripped of our opportunity to move an amendment and left standing naked before you. You would have discovered very quickly, honourable senators, that all senators are not created equal.

I do want to acknowledge sincerely the role of the government, the role of the Opposition, the role of the government in its sober second reconsideration, the role of the Opposition in its intervention, and the Speaker for the role that he played.

In conclusion, never have so many laboured so long and fought so hard to restore to so few the rights that belonged to them in the first place.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lawson: Why propose an amendment? I have a musician friend who was touring South America. When he was there he discovered a giant talking bird that spoke five languages, including French. He thought this would be a wonderful gift for his mother, who lives alone in Victoria, that it would be company for her and help her with her language skills. He bought the bird for $3,500 and shipped it home. When he finished the tour a couple of months later he visited his mother and asked if she received the bird. She said, "Yes, I did." He said, "How was it?" She said, "It was delicious." He said, "Delicious! Mother, I paid $3,500 for that bird and it spoke five languages." She said, "Well, it should have said something."

The reason I am here is that I felt I should say something about the amendment. As many of you know, the Government of British Columbia publishes a magazine and a headline in the most recent one stated, "GST! This is war." Therefore, the government of the province I represent is waging war. I understand the court case will be heard on December 17 on the right of the federal government to invade provincial jurisdiction on taxation. Senator Perrault reported that during the civic election a poll was taken and 85 per cent of the people stated that they were opposed to the GST. It seems to me that it cries out for residents of British Columbia to say something about what is taking place.

In British Columbia there is a Supreme Court judge, a mutual friend of some of us from British Columbia, who is noted for his compassion and concern when dealing with matters from the bench. In one of his most recent cases there appeared before him a bank robber who had been in and out of jail for all his adult life. However, during the most recent robbery he was carrying a gun, and this compassionate judge had to sentence him to 14 years. He asked the bank robber if he had anything to say before he was taken away. He said, "Yes, judge. I am 70 years of age. I just can't do 14 years." The judge said, "That's different then. Just do as much as you can."

I get the feeling that is the same compassion that we are receiving from the government on the GST issue. The point is raised, the amendment is put forward that it is wrong to have GST on books and on the Bible, and the government says, "That's different, you are right. You don't want to pay the GST; just do as much as you can. Just pay 7 per cent." The question is raised and an amendment is put forward, on the high cost to northerners for fuel, electricity and other things; and the government, with a soul and heart full of compassion, says, "Do you think that is too high and there is too much of a burden up north? It is $200 instead of $20 a year. That is different. You can't pay that; just pay as much as you can. Just pay 7 per cent."

• (1410)

Honourable senators, that troubles me somewhat and I know how difficult it must be for the government. Everybody has a different and better way of doing things. Everybody has his own idea as to how to deal with taxes and how to deal with the recession. Senator Waters and I have a mutual friend in Alberta; in fact, he is a Conservative. He is a successful entrepreneur, a successful businessman; he has a large house with servants and so on. In light of the recession we are now involved in, he said to his wife: "This recession affects everybody, including you. If you would just learn to cook, we can fire the cook and save $15,000 a year." She said: "Is that so? If you could learn to make love, we could fire the chauffeur and save $20,000 a year."

Everyone has his own way of dealing with the recession, but it may not be that your idea is any better than mine. It seems, however, that there should be some consistency.

The thrust of what I am talking about in this amendment is: What happens to the surplus money? At this point I may interject by quoting from something I received from the library. This should explain the terms of this amendment. It states:

> The imposition of the GST has been described by the federal government as being "revenue neutral" or "deficit neutral". After taking into account the payment of credits to low income Canadians, the housing rebate and rebates to charities, non-profit organizations and other public sector bodies, the government is proposing to generate about the same amount of money in 1991 from the GST as it would have from the FST. From time to time, the government has stated that the GST will be important to deficit reduction.
> Some would argue that the government has underestimated the amount of revenue that can be expected from the GST. Citing the New Zealand experience, they note that more taxpayers than were originally anticipated registered for the tax and that revenues per point of tax exceeded initial expectations. Moreover, international experience has shown that in other countries rates for similar taxes not only have been higher on introduction but also have been increased substantially.
> The amendment would ensure that all revenue generated from the GST above $21 billion (the amount of revenue currently estimated to produce approximately the same amount of money that the FST would generate and to pay for the various credits and rebates associated with the tax) would be earmarked for deficit reduction. This would allay fears that the GST will be a "cash cow". The government would be obligated to use this excess revenue to purchase outstanding government securities. For greater certainty the amendment refers to the definition of securities found in the Financial Administration Act. This definition includes bonds, notes, deposit certificates, debentures, treasury bills, treasury notes and other security representing part of the public debt.

Honourable senators, I am not unmindful of what Senator Waters said in his speech as to the need for such an amendment, the need for legislative guidance. I recall that during his speech Senator Waters talked about this government's having had 32 tax increases in six years. Obviously, none of that additional tax revenue found its way to the debt because the debt increased during the same six years from $160 billion to $380 billion. It is obvious that we need some legislative guidance similar to that which they have in the United States so as to guide this government on what to do with any surplus moneys that may be acquired if this bill should pass.

To respond to the bill itself, I shall touch upon a number of points. As senators know, my background is in the labour movement. I represent an organization, the Teamsters Union, that has 100,000 members across the country. I have had a lot of association with the Canadian Labour Congress, which represents 2.3 million workers across the country. Collectively, they have put together a number of points which I adopt as my own views, and I would like to touch on those.

The GST is supposed to replace an existing but hidden federal sales tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, or MST. In theory, this means that prices will fall before the new 7 per cent GST is added and that the overall impact on prices will be modest. But there is no guarantee that prices will fall before the new tax is added. Business may just pocket some of the savings from the elimination of the MST rather than pass them on to the consumer.

Experience shows that price reductions rarely reflect the full tax reduction. Many goods and all services which will be subject to the new 7 per cent GST are not directly taxed under the current MST and will then increase in price by close to the full 7 per cent. Electricity, home heating fuels, clothing and footwear will all be subject to federal sales tax for the first time.

The statistics I am about to recite show forecast price changes for a range of goods and services under a 7 per cent GST as calculated by the economic consulting firm, Informetrica. Senators will note that these estimates are a "best case scenario". They assume that price savings from the elimination of the "buried" MST are passed on to consumers.

Forecast price changes under the GST, if it is implemented, are as follows. Prices of furniture and carpets will fall by 1 per cent; for new cars, prices will fall by 2.2 per cent. Prices of laundry and dry cleaning will rise by 6.9 per cent; prices of hotel accommodations will rise by 5.6 per cent; those of household services will rise by 6 per cent; those of auto-related services will rise by 5.2 per cent; those of recreation services will rise by 7.5 per cent and those of restaurant meals will rise by 7 per cent. The price of clothing will rise by 5.6 per cent; that of shoes will rise by 4.7 per cent and that of books and magazines, by 5.2 per cent. The price of electricity will go up by 6.6 per cent; that of home heating fuels will rise by 7 per cent and that of household supplies will drop by 1.7 per cent.

The government claims that a 7 per cent GST is "revenue neutral"—that it will raise no more money than the manufacturers' sales tax which it will replace. That is wrong.

In fact, government figures show that a 7 per cent GST will raise at least $20.7 billion in 1991, or $2.1 billion more than the projected revenue from the MST. Revenues from a new GST in other countries have been much higher than originally forecast.

Most important, once in place the GST will be hiked again and again to raise revenues because the GST rate can be bumped up without raising business costs. From the government point of view, this is a big advantage over the existing MST.

The government record shows that it likes to raise regressive sales taxes, not progressive income taxes. Since 1984, sales taxes have jumped from 19 to 25 per cent of total federal government revenues. This year an average family will pay $628 more in federal sales taxes than in 1984.

Government high interest rate policies are driving up the cost of servicing the public debt. This stops the deficit from falling in spite of higher tax revenues and cuts to government spending. Rather than change course on interest rates or hike taxes on the wealthy and large corporations, the government will likely hike the GST in the future to maintain its deficit-reduction target.

The experience of any other countries clearly demonstrates that GST rates move only way—up.

The GST is a clear consequence of the free trade agreement with the United States. The Free Trade Agreement eliminates tariffs on manufactured goods imported from the U.S. These tariffs are used to cushion Canadian manufacturers against the slightly higher—1 to 2 per cent—costs imposed on them by the structure of the existing manufacturers' sales tax. Given free trade, said the government, we must eliminate the "competitive disadvantage" caused by the MST.

Free trade means that federal tariff revenues must be replaced from other sources. The Free Trade Agreement means that businesses will move where costs are cheapest. I will go into that in a little more detail later. Given free trade, says the government, we must replace the MST with the GST—a tax which will not apply to business purchases.

If Canadians insist on better public services than Americans, says the government, then they will have to pay for them through an unfair sales tax.

• (1420)

The Free Trade Agreement has been accompanied by a deliberate high interest rate and high Canadian dollar policy. This is intended to help the U.S. reduce their trade deficit with Canada and thus prevent the toothless Free Trade Agreement from being put to the test by U.S. protectionism. High interest rates have driven up the cost of servicing the public debt and have driven the economy to the brink of a recession. Confronted with a rising deficit, the government plans to raise the tax burden through the GST.

Let me talk about the prospect of companies moving to cheaper areas. In the current issue of Maclean's magazine there is an interesting article written by Peter Newman. He is not known as a spokesman for the labour movement, but is an objective, fair reporter. He touches on a concern that I know many of us have, including myself, that relates directly to what we are talking about.

The title of his article is "Danger lies south of the Rio Grande." I will read only a few paragraphs, but honourable senators may find it interesting to read the entire article. It says:

> The house organ of American capitalism, Business Week, is already proclaiming the birth of "THE NEW NORTH AMERICA—population, 356 million; gross national product, $6.6 trillion!" It would be the world's most humongous trading bloc—even gaining a trillion dollars or so, when its commercial flows are calculated in Canadian dollars. The magazine celebrates the vision of a new trading bloc "stretching from Anchorage to Acapulco," with new trade and financial flows "touching off a decade or more of rapid economic growth fuelled by a surge of investments to restructure industry on a continental scale."

The article goes on to say:

> In Canada we're being reassured by Ottawa and such advocates of the potential deal as the Business Council on National Issues that we have nothing to fear from cheap Mexican goods flooding our domestic market under continental free trade, because, although 80 per cent of Mexican imports already come in duty free, the annual total is still less than $1.5 billion. That's true. But it's not the point. As the Canadian novelist and current head of PEN John Ralston Saul warned at the time the Mulroney government was negotiating free trade with the Americans, because of the maquiladoras sweatshops . . .

Senator Perrault has made a number of speeches in the past year about those sweatshops. I am also familiar with those because we deal with them on the American side. I do not think the term "sweatshops" is descriptive enough when you see the conditions under which those workers have to work. There are paper and tin shacks; for their drinking water they use 45-gallon barrels that have been used to haul chemicals. Those are the kinds of conditions that these workers work under. If we are a part of this, we are going to be encouraging that kind of exploitation.

I should like to continue with what Peter Newman says:

> . . . our already tottering secondary-manufacturing sector will become terminally vulnerable under the proposed arrangement. At least a North American trade deal would stop our manufacturing plants from fleeing to the United States. They'll move to Mexico instead.
> Canada's main flash point for any North American trade deal will be the continued viability of the U.S.-Canada Auto Pact. Once free trade with Mexico is a fact, there would be little reason for any car manufacturer to stay in Canada, no matter how heavily his company has invested here. Half a dozen Canadian autoparts manufacturers have already opened Mexican plants and others are in the process of moving there. The wage differentials in what remains a labor-intensive industry are just too wide to be bridged. Unskilled assembly-line workers in Ontario average $14.71 an hour, compared with Mexico's $1.20.

You may ask, "What does this have to do with the GST?" The government's largest source of tax revenue is picking the pockets of working people—organized and unorganized. You cannot expect to accomplish that if you are going to create hundreds of thousands of more unemployed. Unemployed workers pay very little tax. Fully-employed workers will make the kind of tax contributions that will assist the government with the financing of its programs and the reduction of the debt.

The last paragraph of Peter Newman's article says:

> With no benefits due to us, we should stay out of any free trade arrangement with Mexico. Facing the dangers of a North American common market, we should adopt Ramon Hnatyshyn's slogan when he was federal energy minister. "Free trade," he warned, "is like wife-swapping with a bachelor."

More important than that, it will cost hundreds of thousands of jobs. If you are not concerned about that as a moral issue, you should be concerned about that as a financial issue because you cannot generate revenue from people who are not working.

The GST will significantly raise the price of many goods and services which are not now subject to a federal sales tax. The result will be reduced consumer demand and a resulting loss of jobs. The Institute for Policy Analysis at the University of Toronto estimates that a 7 per cent GST may cost 25,000 jobs when it is introduced in 1991, rising to 148,000 lost jobs by 1994.

The impact upon employment will be particularly severe in the labour-intensive consumer services and tourism sectors, such as restaurants, hotels, and amusement and recreational services. These sectors were a major source of new jobs in the 1980s. A 7 per cent price hike for most consumer services will sharply depress demands and jobs.

I have much involvement in the trucking industry. Canadian truckers are already reeling from the impact of free trade and deregulation, which forces them to compete with an American industry that benefits from built-in advantages—from cheaper fuel to lower taxes. That is before the 7 per cent, which will now apply to the purchase of trucks which did not apply before. They will be faced with a double penalty.

Equally hard hit will be the construction industry. New housing will be subject to a tax rate of 4.5 per cent. It will be more on expensive homes priced about $350,000. This will depress new construction activity and add to the impact of high interest rates. Major price hikes for construction materials will also depress the home renovation market.

The imposition of the GST will negatively impact on manufacturing sectors which are not currently taxed, including clothing, footwear, and printing and publishing.

A forecast drop in retail sales as a result of higher prices will cut jobs in stores and warehouses. These negative job impacts will take place in an economy that is already grinding to a halt because of high interest rates, an over-valued Canadian dollar, and cuts in government spending.

A concern of the government should be creation of jobs. Workers on unemployment insurance are not going to make major contributions to tax revenue. Certainly workers under the revised Unemployment Insurance Act, where they have to work longer to collect benefits for a lesser period of time, will not help. I am not satisfied that this $800 million set aside for training will be the answer. If you train labourers to be plumbers and there are no jobs for plumbers, what have you accomplished? You may have increased the intellectual level of the unemployed, but you have not put a single worker on a job. It seems to me that the thrust and direction is aimed incorrectly.

The government promised, but failed, to protect low-income individuals and families from the GST. The existing sales tax credit is $140 for an adult and $70 per child with households with an income of less than $18,000. The new GST will be slightly higher—$194 an adult and the first child in single-parent families, and $100 per child for households with an income of less than $24,800. Single adults can qualify for an extra credit of up to $100. That sounds good at first, but this is what it really means: a single taxpayer with an income of $12,500 will pay about $630 in GST, but will get a credit of just $290. A single parent with two children and an income of $15,000 will pay about $735 in GST but will get just $580 in GST credits.

Figures produced by the government attempt to show that the increase in credits will at least be greater than the increase in sales taxes. But the government assumes that all of these savings from the elimination of the old federal sales tax will be passed on to consumers before the new 7 per cent GST is imposed. They will not be. Businesses will pocket some of the savings. Some of the provincial governments are talking about pocketing the rest.

Also, the government figures are only for the first year of the new system. This is an important point, and was raised as the subject of one of the amendments that was rejected. The new credits will not be fully indexed to inflation, but will fall by 3 per cent in real terms each and every year. Prices will rise, but GST credits will fall.

It gets worse. Fewer families and individuals will qualify for the new credits with each year that passes. That is because incomes will increase above the $24,800 level from which credits are phased out, because it is not fully indexed to inflation. Even a lower-than-inflation wage increase will result in lower GST credits.

In short, the new credits do not protect low- and middle-income taxpayers from the GST. Progressive taxes bear most heavily upon higher income taxpayers and the least heavily upon low income taxpayers, while regressive taxes bear most heavily upon low-income groups.

● (1430)

The burden of sales taxes like the GST is greatest upon low-income groups. This is true for two reasons: First, the tax rate is the same for all taxpayers, regardless of their income. A single parent on social assistance will pay the same 7 per cent GST on electricity or clothing as will a wealthy executive.

Second, lower income people spend a higher proportion of their income on goods and services. Only higher income groups can afford to save and invest a significant share of their income. Taxing spending rather than income or wealth thus favours higher income groups.

The following table, which is based on the Department of Finance estimates, shows that the burden of a 7 per cent GST is greatest for lower income groups, and lowest for high income groups. The actual amount of GST that is paid increases with income, since spending increases with income. The percentage of income taken by the GST falls as income rises.

A simple, clear table shows that someone earning $20,000 will pay $952 GST, or 4.8 per cent of his income; someone earning $30,000 will pay $1,288, or 4.3 per cent of his income; someone earning $50,000 will pay $1,953, or 3.9 per cent of his income; and someone earning $100,000 will pay $3,619, or only 3.6 per cent of his income.

Unlike the existing federal sales tax, the GST will not be charged on purchases of goods and services by business. They will be able to receive a 100 per cent credit for all GST paid on their "inputs"; including raw materials, rent, telephone charges, office supplies and so on. Credits will also be given for GST paid on business meals and entertainment.

While business is being relieved of all of their share of the federal sales tax burden, the not-for-profit sector will continue to be taxed. Municipalities, school boards, universities, colleges, and hospitals will pay 7 per cent GST on their purchases. Partial tax rebates will be periodically paid out by the federal government, but the formula has not yet been announced. At a minimum, these public sector bodies will pay at least as much as they now do under the current sales tax system.

Registered charities, as well as non-profit organizations receiving 40 per cent or more of their budgets from government, will only qualify for a 50 per cent rebate of the GST that they pay on their purchases. Many non-profit organizations, including trade unions and advocacy groups such as women's, native and peace organizations, will not qualify for any rebate and will be charged the full 7 per cent GST on office rent, electricity, mailings, telephone calls, et cetera.

Most public services, including education, health care, child care, recreational services for children, et cetera, are "tax exempt". This means the GST will not be added to tuition fees or user fees. The GST will be charged on purchases, so costs and fees will increase because of it. Thus, the GST clearly discriminates in favour of the business sector, while adding to the cost of public services.

A truly progressive personal income tax, one which takes a higher percentage of income from high-income taxpayers than from low-income earners, would be the centerpiece of a fair tax system. However, the government has already made an already flawed income tax even more unfair. I will indicate how this has been done:

Tax credits and tax brackets are not fully indexed to inflation. This means that the real value of the new credits introduced in 1987 falls by 3 per cent each year, and thus an individual may be pushed into a higher tax bracket, even if his income has not increased in real terms.

Tax reform, as we know, cuts the number of tax brackets from ten to three. Federal tax of 17 per cent is now paid on the first $27,500 taxable income, 26 per cent on the next $27,500, and 29 per cent on every dollar of taxable income above $55,000. On the other hand, the top tax rate, which applies to those with incomes of $70,000 or more, was cut from 34 per cent to 29 per cent, resulting in a major tax cut for the wealthy.

"Tax reform" left many loopholes untouched. For example, the first $100,000 of capital gains income is completely tax free. Additional capital gains, dividends, and all kinds of investment income, are taxed at much lower rates than income from wages or salaries.

The share of taxes paid by corporations fell in the 1970s and 1980s because of the proliferation of special write-offs, tax breaks and loopholes. Investment "incentives" became so generous that many large, profitable companies were able to completely avoid taxes. Today, the corporate income tax rate which is levied on company profits accounts for 11 per cent of all federal revenues. That is approximately half the level that it was 20 years ago.

In 1987, 118,162 profitable companies, with a total of $25 billion in profits, paid no tax at all. In other words, one in every three profitable companies, together accounting for 28 per cent of all corporate profits, paid no tax. Another 114,737 corporations with $27.4 billion in profits paid tax at a rate of less than 20 per cent. In total, in 1987, profitable companies paid federal and provincial corporate income tax of $15.5 billion—just 17.7 per cent of total corporate profits of $87.7 billion.

In my experience, working people have an inborn sense of fairness. They are quite prepared to assume their share of the liability, or their share of the sacrifice. Working people will pay not only their fair share, but will pay more than their fair share if it takes care of the people who are less fortunate, and if it takes care of seniors. However, they are very angry when they read these kinds of statistics about tens of thousands of corporations making billions of dollars in profit who do not pay a five-cent piece of tax.

If you are wondering where the hostility and anger comes from across this country, it is from these kinds of people who are aware of this information due to the television age that we live in, and they are very angry about this kind of unfair treatment.

What I predict will happen, as others have predicted, is that the underground economy will become larger and larger as people find ways and means on their own of competing with the special consideration corporations get from the federal government, which they deem to be unfair, and is unfair.

One major reason for tax avoidance by profitable companies is the system of "fast write-offs". Under current rules, investment in capital equipment can be deducted from taxable income at a rate of 25 per cent per year, even though the equipment will be written off on the company books at a much slower rate. Fast write-offs mean that companies get tax deductions up front and, in theory, pay higher taxes in later years. In 1986, the total of such "deferred taxes", which is equivalent to an interest-free loan from the government, was $33.9 billion. The cost in lost revenues is about $3 billion per year. In other words, we could reduce the GST from 7 per cent to 6 per cent on the strength of that item alone.

The companies in the resource and financial sectors continue to get special breaks on certain investments. All companies pay tax on only 75 per cent of their capital gains income, and are able to reduce their taxable income by "carrying forward" losses from previous years.

Corporations involved in mergers and buyouts can deduct the cost of borrowed money from their taxable income in full, even if the merger is completely unproductive. As we have all witnessed in watching the American scene, most of those mergers or take-overs involve hundreds of millions and billions of dollars, whether it be RJR Nabisco or Michael Milken and the ten year penalty, which probably was not enough. All of this seems to go on, involving billions and billions of dollars, but not contributing one job or one five-cent piece to the treasury.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Lawson: These loopholes remain despite the government's tax reform of 1987. Those loopholes which were removed or scaled back were compensated for by a reduction in corporate tax rates. The general corporate rate was cut from 36 per cent to 28 per cent, and the small business rate was reduced from 15 per cent to just 12 per cent. "Tax reform" has yet to result in a significant increase in corporate tax revenues. The existing federal sales tax or MST is, indeed, a flawed, economically damaging and regressive tax which should be abolished or, at a minimum, substantially scaled back. The government claims that its GST, or drastic cuts to our social programs, are the only alternatives. In truth, the government has failed to examine a wide range of other options which include: A 3 per cent cut in interest rates. This is something about which I know Senator Waters and others feel very strongly. A 3 per cent cut in interest rates would cut the cost of servicing the public debt by $4.8 billion per year, rising to $10 billion per year within four years as the existing debt was refinanced. Such a cut would still leave Canadian interest rates above U.S. levels. An interest rate cut would also indirectly increase revenues by stimulating a slowing economy.

• (1440)

An end to the special treatment of capital gains income would raise $500 million. At least an equivalent amount could be gained by ending special treatment of dividend income and by restricting the deduction of interest costs from investment income. Restoration of the pre-1988, 34 per cent, top federal personal income tax rate—applicable on incomes of about $70,000 or more—would raise $1.5 billion. Still higher rates could be imposed on the very wealthy.

Tax breaks for interest paid to finance unproductive mergers and fast write-offs on investment should be scaled back for a revenue gain of at least $1 billion. A minimum tax of 20 per cent on profitable corporations, such as presently exist in the U.S., would raise at least another billion dollars. A substantial increase on corporate taxes would be more than justified by reduction or elimination of the MST which adds to current business costs.

Canada is one of the few industrial countries with no tax on wealth. A tax on large inheritances, identical to that now in force in the U.S., would raise $2 billion. The richest 5 per cent of Canadians own 50 per cent of all personal wealth. A small annual tax on large holdings of wealth could raise substantial revenues—for example, on net worth above $1 million. Such wealth taxes exist in many European countries.

If you tally this up, we are now down to a possible 3 per cent or 4 per cent reduction.

What I am really saying is that, clearly, there are alternatives to the GST. What is needed is the political will to design a fair tax system. Do we have that will?

I was thinking, as a labour negotiator who has reviewed what has gone on here for the last number of weeks and who has listened to the proposed amendments, "If you were trying to save the government, trying to save the Prime Minister from being Thatcherized, trying to save the government for the future, or, more importantly, if you were sitting as an independent, neutral observer, how best could you salvage this situation?"

It seems to me that if I were advising the government, I would be saying that the view of Canadians across the country is that you have a very badly flawed tax bill. The eight proposed amendments would make it a better bill. Why do you not adopt those amendments? If you say it is going to take some time to adopt them, the answer is simple; adopt Senator Waters' amendment and take the time.

During the last few days I read a report which says that 50 per cent of Canada's companies have not registered for the tax, in any event. With Minister Jelinek handling the equipment and preparing for the collection of GST, and so on, if his foul mouth is any indication of his business acumen, it will probably be six months or a year to establish an efficient and smoothly run operation. Let us take the time.

Further, I would adopt the amendment that is before honourable senators today. If we did so, we would have a decent tax bill that had a heart and soul and ears which listened to the Canadian people. Instead of a tax bill angrily opposed by the majority of Canadians, we would have a tax bill that would probably be accepted with a guarantee of surplus revenues used to reduce the debt; we would have a fairer tax bill and one which would probably be supported by the majority of Canadians. Honourable senators, I urge your support for the amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, this is a very commendable amendment, just as was the amendment proposed yesterday by the Honourable Senator Waters. Two constructive, non-contentious positive amendments, which appealed not only to the consciences of honourable senators but to their logical processes.

[Senator Lawson.]

Senator Lawson, who has a deserved reputation as one of North America's very able labour leaders, has placed an amendment before us today which cannot, in conscience and logic, be opposed by honourable senators. I speak with great sincerity when I say this.

This is an amendment which should be adopted by the government. It could be dealt with speedily in the House of Commons. I think it would give credibility to the statements made on successive occasions by spokesmen for the government that the intent of the bill is to attack the problems of debt and deficit.

This afternoon I would like to review some of the checkered incidents which have occurred in the history of this bill since its introduction was first mooted in 1987. One of the most misleading statements coming from the government these days is the allegation that Canadians should not be surprised by this initiative because fair warning was sounded in 1987 that we would have a fundamental reform of the tax system. This statement has been made by honourable senators on the other side and certainly by the Right Honourable Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. The statements are made again and again that there is legitimacy to this government initiative because it was, indeed, an integral part of the 1988 platform.

The suggestion here is that in 1988 the government was given a mandate to introduce the goods and services tax and that this contention by the government legitimizes the effort and, in fact, renders illegitimate the efforts of the Senate to attempt to amend or to oppose the bill in its present format.

Now, this is a distortion of what really occurred, and I want to put this on the record this afternoon. In 1987, in very vague terms, in its tax reform documents of the time, the government indicated its intention to replace the manufacturers' sales tax with a new sales tax. There is not a party in Canada which supports the present manufacturers' sales tax. Some of us are surprised by the fact that, despite the condemnation of the manufacturers' sales tax on so many occasions, with such a sense of outrage by so many Conservative speakers, it still was a tax thrice increased since 1986 from just over 9 per cent to over 13 per cent.

Some of us have been rather baffled by the fact that the Conservatives, who years ago identified this tax as a so-called bad tax, continued to raise the taxation rate. In the campaign of 1988, the government was absolutely silent on this subject.

Hon. Pat Carney: Not true.

Senator Perrault: We have yet to see a comprehensive speech made by any Conservative Party spokesman stating that a goods and services tax at 7 per cent or 9 per cent would be introduced.

• (1450)

Senator Carney: That's not true.

Senator Perrault: If honourable senators disagree, let them put documentation on the record to disprove what I have said.

The new tax was only to benefit a small segment of the population, primarily the manufacturers who are mostly located in central Canada, who have long disliked the existing sales tax and who would very much enjoy a lighter burden under the GST. Indeed, at that time it was estimated that some $4 billion of the sales tax burden was to be transferred from the corporate sector to the household sector, but very little was said about this impending tax.

So the government—and understandably because taxes are not popular—saw no particular advantage in mentioning the new tax in that 1988 campaign. I searched the newspapers of British Columbia, and I saw no major speeches or statements about the impending GST, nor did Senator Waters in Alberta nor Senator Lawson, another British Columbian. I suppose the government felt that that was bound to raise suspicion that the tax would be used to soak additional revenues out of the public for the continuing war against the deficit.

Understandably, political campaigns being what they are, the government decided to accentuate the positive. There were no references to the ominous nature of the debt; no statements about impending doom and gloom if we did not cut back on social services. On the contrary, the single mothers of Canada were promised a daycare program that has never seen the light of day. The seniors were promised that their incomes would never be reduced by this "sensitive Conservative government." There was no mention of the clawback then. There was no talk about dismantling Canada's very commendable network of social security programs. There was no mention then of the government abandoning unemployment insurance in following the American model, and I am sure that Senator Lawson could tell us something about the unemployment insurance program in the United States. No; the Conservative Party decided to emphasize the positive and not mention any of Canada's basic problems.

Of course, there was no advantage in turning the goods and services tax into an election issue. Everyone who likes the tax—manufacturers and a minority of business economists and tax experts—already knew about it; the rest were better kept in the dark. It is an example of the mushroom philosophy of the Conservative Party, that with regard to the Conservative platform, things grow best if the people are kept in the dark. So the government was very happy to let that issue slumber throughout the campaign. There was no mention of it, even though it is obvious now that the GST was to be the major economic thrust in the government's post-election policy, and that is beyond argument.

However, if this tax was to be the central part of the government's program and policy, should it not have been their responsibility, in all conscience, to sound some prior warnings or give advance notice? In fact, the government set the wheels in motion for this tax measure as soon as the votes were counted. A diversion was created by speaking almost exclusively on the subject of the free trade deal and how free trade would usher in a bonanza of employment coast to coast.

Senator Simard: Be careful now.

Senator Perrault: One of the first companies to close down was in the area the honourable senator represents, so he should not talk too much about free trade. The people who are on the unemployment lines in New Brunswick today should be asking a few questions of the honourable senator, who defended the free trade deal when it was first introduced, and perhaps he should remind the 160,000 industrial workers who have lost their jobs that it will not be a good Christmas for them.

Senator Simard: That is not because of the free trade deal.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Blenkarn, who headed the committee of the other place for the government, was not programmed properly. Honourable senators will remember that, during the campaign, he stumbled around on the subject of tax reform.

Senator Simard: That's old stuff.

Senator Perrault: As honourable senators know, he has been the Conservative chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee. In the early days of the election campaign he was scheduled to make what promised to be one of his dullest appearances, a speech before a tax conference at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. Actually, the event did not have very much to do with the election, as it had been booked well beyond the calling of the election.

However, in the course of that day-long session, Mr. Blenkarn brought to the deliberations much more candour than other conservatives were able to muster. He told the audience of economists and tax experts that the government planned to collect billions in additional revenues through the GST. That is on the record. People were startled. They could not believe it. They had not heard about this great Tory caper to take still more money out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers.

At the same time there happened to be a reporter in the hall next to this very dull seminar on tax reform. Mr. Blenkarn's comments about the additional revenue-raising potential of the tax were reported the next day on the front pages of Canadian newspapers. The cat was out of the bag. Despite all the speeches of honourable senators opposite during the course of this debate, in which they have self-righteously proclaimed that the Canadian people knew that this tax was coming, Canadians, in fact, did not have a clue that it was coming at all. The increase that only experts were supposed to know about was now in the hands of the electorate.

So there needed to be some damage control. I do not know whether Senator Kelly was one of the damage controllers, but I know that he is close to Conservative strategy.

Senator Frith: Considering that strategy, he might want to renounce that association.

Senator Perrault: There was panic in the Tory streets. If the government had been fair with the Canadian people at that time, they would have said, "Yes, Mr. Blenkarn is right. The new tax will raise considerable extra revenue and it is necessary for deficit reduction." If they had said that, they might have more credibility today. If they had said candidly to the Canadian people, "The debt is unacceptably high"—the statistics cited by Senator Waters yesterday were certainly frightening enough—and if they had come clean with the Canadian people and said, "We need more money and we intend to raise it. We will all have to make sacrifices if we want to get that debt and the deficit down", things might have been different.

Senator Simard: You will have to do more than that to be convincing.

Senator Perrault: This is the reason that the Conservative Party is at 14 per cent in the polls, and why their public support today is in freefall.

Prime Minister Mulroney and Finance Minister Michael Wilson were quick to deny the accuracy of Mr. Blenkarn's statement. They said that Mr. Blenkarn did many things but that he did not speak for the Conservative Party. Is that the kind of candour that we might have expected from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister? Is that the kind of truthfulness that Mr. Wilson was able to muster at the time? Is that the best that they could do? There was an immediate attempt to divert public attention from the taxation issue. Distance was placed between Mr. Blenkarn and the Conservative Party. He was made a olitical pariah by that party because he had dared to speak out; because he had dared to tell the truth.

We then saw the statement, "Ontario Treasurer Robert Nixon said Ontarians would find themselves paying a lot more sales tax". The government repeatedly denied that the new tax would raise any additional revenue, and isisted that if the tax did does anything it would be revenue neutral, "But not let's talk about that; let's talk about free trade".

One of Canada's outstanding and well-known leaders said, "The GST is wrong in every possible way. It is a consumer tax which will hurt the economy. It will fire up the flames of inflation, create unemployment, impede economic development and therefore hurt and reduce provincial revenues, and that will hurt services. I am dead against it." That statement was made by Senator Buchanan who has voted for this measure in lockstep with the official Tory line despite the fact that, obviously, he harbours some other deeply-held views. He condemned the GST and this type of tax.

Some of us have a right to ask what kind of credibility a political party can have if, on the one hand, it states that the measure will be revenue neutral and that it is not serious at all, while on the other hand some of its spokesmen stand up and condemn it. One wonders why the Conservative Party has a credibility problem.

After the election, Mr. Wilson became more frank. He was interviewed on the CBC and told his interviewer Peter Gzowski, "The GST will raise additional revenues for deficit reduction". He said that after denying for months and months and months that it would be revenue neutral. Mr. Gzowski said, "But I thought it was revenue neutral". Mr. Wilson replied, "Well, no, no, it helps us get the deficit down". So much for Conservative candour and truthfulness on the election trail. After denying it during the campaign, as soon as the election was over, members of the government admitted that this tax was supposed to reduce the deficit.

Government spokesmen argue almost with ferocity that the GST is really the only option for reducing the deficit. That is not true at all. At least a dozen alternative ideas that I know of have been advanced. Senator Lawson introduced some new ideas today. A number of excellent ideas were introduced during the course of the debate. Leading academics say that taxation should be based on ability to pay. Economists after economist has pointed out that this tax does not meet the three major conditions of a good tax. First, in order for a tax to be good it must be fair, as well as seem to be fair; second, it must be economical to collect; third, it must be productive of revenue. This measure will be productive of revenue all right. There is a basic appeal in Senator Lawson's amendment which states:

> Beginning with the fiscal year that ends on March 31, 1992, such of the revenues derived under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act in each fiscal year as exceed 21 thousand million dollars shall be applied forthwith to the purchase for cancellation of securities of Canada within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act.

Honourable senators opposite have stated that the money will be used to reduce the deficit. Now, Senator Lawson and other senators are saying, "Put up or shut up". If they really mean what they say, then let us get the deficit down. However, I suspect that there is another game plan in operation. It is to milk the tax cow as much as possible and, when the election is called, to spend money on megaprojects from coast to coast in a desperate attempt to save their political hide and to become re-elected.

If senators opposite really care about Canada, if they are really concerned about the future of this country, then they should vote for this amendment and provide reassurance to the Canadian people who are deeply suspicious about their motives because of their track record in explaining this measure to them.

Senators opposite say there are no alternatives to this tax. We had one from Neil Brooks of Osgoode Hall who has attracted nation-wide support for his proposal—

Senator Barootes: That's nonsense!

Senator Perrault: —to abolish regressive sales taxes altogether and to raise the lost revenues through modest increases in income tax. Senator Barootes may disagree with Neil Brooks. His proposition may not be the best alternative, but there are a dozen others out there.

Senator Barootes: Horse feathers!

Senator Perrault: The way you are condemning my argument makes me believe that it has a great deal of merit. This option, which the government has refused even to consider, would save Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars in administrative costs alone. Senators will remember during the course of the hearings this summer that we were told that to administer the GST and to hire the hundreds of retired policemen to supervise the collection of the tax, along with chartered accountants, would cost approximately $250 million per year. The figure now being mentioned in the media is over $400 million per year. Does that meet one of the basic conditions for a good and efficient tax?

It is true that we have come a long way in this debate. We have heard a great many speeches. I thought we would have heard more speeches from government supporters to justify their unwillingness to consider amendments to this bill. For example, I would have appreciated having had the rationale extended to all of us as to why it is necessary to tax books when in Great Britain they are exempt. We hoped to hear some logical explanation from some government supporters as to why Senator Waters' suggestion that the implementation of this tax be postponed for a few months in order to work out some of the problems could not have been accepted.

As far as other amendments relating to the north are concerned, I know some honourable senators on the other side well enough to know that some of them have real qualms of conscience about certain parts of this bill. No one with any degree of sanity could possibly defend the discriminatory treatment of northern Canadians and those living in remote areas, and the proposal to slap on a 7 per cent tax on transporting certain essential goods, appliances and other merchandise to these remote areas. It cannot be justified.

I think word has gone out to the government side that we have to speed this measure through and hold our noses while we vote for it, despite the fact that it is bad. Why not give some credibility to your decision by accepting just one amendment? At least tell the Canadian people that however we raise the money, despite the concerns of the opposition, there are features of this measure which are discriminatory and wrong, and that amendments have been proposed on the floor of the Senate. Tell Canadians that we do not intend to break faith with them but that we will use the revenues derived from this increased new tax to reduce the debt and the deficit.

Rather than explaining the basic illogic in the proposed goods and services tax, the Conservatives have been concentrating their fury on the so-called evils of a Senate minority desperately trying to work for the Canadian people. Canadians have never endorsed the GST, not now and not during the election campaign. Those who serve on this side of the chamber are not blocking the will of the people. Indeed, some people are writing to say, "Thank God you are there." The mail I have received from trade unionists to leading executives is almost frightening in its dimensions. I think Canadians are nearing a tax revolt. How can senators opposite flaunt this bad tax, a tax which has the support of less than 14 per cent of the Canadian people; and if some of the 14 per cent understood the GST better, public support would likely plummet to 1 per cent. How can senators opposite continue to advance this tax in such a bullheaded and stubborn way and not expect massive discontent?

A few weeks ago, the Right Honourable Prime Minister said, "Of course we are open to amendments." He was on an open-line show and sounded like the ultimate democrat. "Of course we will look at amendments," he said. "If they are good amendments, certainly this government will certainly keep an open mind." An open mind? There has not been one five-minute period given to recognizing the validity of the amendments from members of the Opposition. I challenge any senator on the government side to say that these amendments were politically motivated or politically coloured. They were good amendments.

Tell us what was wrong with our amendment with respect to northern Canada? Tell us what was wrong with the proposal not to tax books? Quebec has now taken the tax off books. Senators from Quebec, is it a bad idea to take the tax off books? Are you going to enter your objections and hold press conferences denouncing the action of the Quebec government in taking tax off books? If it is good to keep the provincial tax off books in Quebec, why is it that a federal government is imposing a book tax on the province of Quebec? This is the question we ask.

Surely this type of acquiescence, without even a murmur of discontent, is not becoming to the Conservative Party? I say to Conservatives opposite that your names will go down in history. Let those names go down in an honourable fashion. Let successive generations know that when a basic tax reform was introduced you were not in lock-step support of a measure which you clearly knew was wrong or deficient in some respects. You are not members of the Don Cossack Choir, you need not sing in unison on every issue.

Senator Buckwold: They should be.

Senator Gigantès: Their voices are not good enough.

Senator Perrault: I want to read a letter from a retired major of the Canadian army, Major G.B. Dionne, a decorated soldier of Canada's wars. The letter states:

> The writer is a senior citizen who has served his country in both war and peace for nearly seventy years. Now retired, my wife and I have lived frugally and carefully during the forty-eight years of our marriage, in order to assure a comfortable retirement. Neither we, our three adult children and six grandchildren, nor anyone connected with our family have ever accepted any government "hand-outs"— with the solitary exception of OAS which we paid for through a special surtax commencing in 1951—and we have always paid (God—how we've paid!) our income and other taxes in full and on time.
> Now—we feel betrayed!
> A lifetime Conservative, I finally recognized some four years ago that the man for whom I voted was an egocentric, power-hungry, self-serving, dictatorial individual who, since coming to power, has broken every solemn promise and who is presiding over the disintegration of our beloved country.

Do senators opposite wonder why those impressions are being formed? I is because of a Prime Minister who stated in 1987 that there was not going to be any type of draconian and unfair tax, and as soon as the election was over the GST was introduced. You cannot lie to the Canadian people and expect any credibility. The letter states further:

> The proposed GST, like many of the 1989 federal budget proposals, is an abomination.

That is from one of your own, not a Liberal.

> The "clawback" on Old Age Pensions coupled with the partial de-indexation factor, jeopardizes the future welfare of every Canadian who saved and planned for a stable retirement. In my considered opinion, the GST, as proposed, will prove to be a "cash cow" which will do nothing to reduce the burgeoning national debt but will only permit the Prime Minister to promise more goodies before the next election.

He is a Conservative; he should know.

> It will only lead to ever-higher taxes, greater spending and more waste.

What is Major Dionne's main concern in this letter? That it will do nothing to reduce the burgeoning national debt. Restore this man's faith by voting for this amendment and saying "Yes, we are going to reduce the deficit and the debt." Give that assurance that the government will do that. It is not a partisan issue and you could get the amendment through the House of Commons in jig-time.

Senator Gigantès: We promise to pass it immediately.

Senator Perrault: We will pass it immediately. You might even get some one back in the Conservative Party again. Major Dionne continues:

> The GST is regressive, inflationary, extremely costly to administer and will hurt business.

He is right on all counts.

> Above all, it is unfair, especially to middle and lower-income Canadians and to seniors who have no way of overcoming the ravages of inflation.

Are senators opposite going to disagree with that?

> Shockingly, according to figures just released by the Department of Finance, taxes on old age pensions and the "baby bonus" boosted Ottawa's revenue from personal income taxes in April, May and June of this year by 34.3 per cent over the same period of 1989. Equally shocking is the fact that Revenue Canada applied the "clawback" provisions of the April 1989 budget proposals to that year's income tax returns even though, to this date (which was September 28, 1990) the corresponding legislation has not been passed by Parliament.

The letter continues and attacks the government for allegedly packing the Senate. Major Dionne also states that the Minister of Finance, in a speech to the Chamber of Commerce, blandly announced that his February budget figures were wrong and that the expected deficit for the current year will come in higher than anticipated. Major Dionne concludes:

> I am reminded of Oliver Cromwell's address to Parliament some three centuries ago: "You have sat here too long for any good you have been doing. Depart, I say, and let us have done with you. In the name of God, go!"

[Senator Perrault.]

It is too bad that we do not have a referendum process in Canada whereby we could go to the polls now and have the people decide. The Leader of the Government is laughing. He is living in what is described as a "fool's paradise." He is not in touch with reality, and it is dangerous when that condition develops.

We talk about the other jurisdictions where allegedly this tax has been such a roaring success. The other day the Prime Minister of New Zealand was tossed out on his ear together with his government. This week, Mrs. Thatcher, having introduced a vastly unpopular poll tax, quit with only 24 per cent popular support. Yet, Canada's Prime Minister, who is in a free-fall condition, is down to 14 per cent with not very far to go to 0 per cent.

Senator Stanbury: Three per cent in Alberta.

Senator Perrault: He has 3 per cent support in Alberta. Are senators opposite happy with that?

It seems to me that a political party, in the face of such statistics, would realize it must be doing something wrong. One would expect them to say, "Let us sit down and discuss what we are doing that is annoying the people." At 3 per cent support in Alberta, even some relatives of the Tory MPs are not going to vote for them at the next election.

Let us put the experience of New Zealand on the record, because many times it has been said that we are following the lead of the other countries in the world. In October 1986 the consumption tax was 10 per cent. On July 1, 1989, the consumption tax was 12.5 per cent. In New Zealand it requires 5,500 bureaucrats to administer a tax on 2.2 million taxpayers. Four hundred of those bureaucrats are auditors looking for fraud and evasion. No wonder the government was thrown out.

• (1520)

What happened to Senator Hatfield's thinking down the line? He suddenly became a proponent of the tax instead of an opponent. A moment ago I read some statements that were made by Senator Buchanan, but we have heard other of his devastating comments on the inequity of the tax, on its regressive nature. On April 26 he stated:

> We oppose the federal sales tax. It is an intrusion into a matter that has been, historically, provincial.

That was stated by Premier Buchanan, who has been standing up these past few weeks as Senator Buchanan, speaking in favour of the GST. On August 11, 1989, he stated:

> We certainly aren't in favour of the tax; we're opposed to it.

In Nova Scotia on April 25, 1989:

> We do have some serious concerns about a new "federal sales tax". Our concerns are, of course, that a lot of that tax may be on commodities which at present are not taxed.

What kind of agonizing process does a premier or provincial politician go through to come to see the Tory "light"? These conversions rival St. Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus.

New Zealand exempts from its value-added tax only rents and financial transactions. Many people hold New Zealand up as an example of a country that accepted such a tax. They accepted the tax initially because big ticket items were already being taxed at 50 per cent. Income tax fell, welfare and family benefits increased. New Zealand has no provinces. It is a unitary state, unlike Canada, which has three levels of government. If this tax is implemented, we will be the first nation in the world to collect two retail sales taxes at the same level.

In 1986, when the 10 per cent New Zealand tax was introduced, inflation jumped from 11 to 18 per cent. Senators realize what we are now looking at: On January 1, 1991 we are going to see legalized robbery committed against every Canadian citizen. The government admits that there will be inflation and predicts an increase of "only" 2 per cent. Well, tell that to Murphy. People who believe these statistics would also buy the Brooklyn Bridge. By the government's own admission, on January 1, 1991 the government will be stealing two cents out of every savings and every other dollar. That is the impact of inflation. Senator Hatfield is smiling. I suppose he welcomes the prospect. Together with other inflationary factors plus the 7 per cent this is legal robbery of the Canadian people, most of whom cannot afford to pay any more than what they are paying now.

The rich will not feel any of this impact. That is why so many of them are supportive of the tax. The poor, however, will feel the impact. I have said this before, and I repeat, that church organizations say that the credit system cannot be operated efficiently. Many people falling into that category are illiterate—transients and senior citizens who cannot even fill out a cheque or a form. The government will save some money there, too—perhaps that is part of the plan.

Unemployment in New Zealand went from 7.8 per cent in July of 1984 to 14 per cent in March of 1989. Emigration is up dramatically as people move out of New Zealand. In 1975, 18 per cent of its population were below the poverty level. By mid-1987, 30 per cent were below the poverty line. Is it just possible that the value-added tax in New Zealand had something to do with that statistic? The New Zealand VAT seems to be part of the same agenda we are looking at in Canada: privatization, major spending cuts to social programs, free trade and tax reforms favouring the rich. That was the agenda in New Zealand and that is the agenda in Canada right now.

The impact on the New Zealand economy has been strongly negative. Economic growth was 4.2 per cent in 1984, 0.7 per cent in 1985, minus 2.0 per cent in 1986, 0.2 per cent in 1987 and 1.0 per cent in 1988. Is that the sort of dynamic growth that the government thinks the GST will trigger in Canada?

Honourable senators, I keep receiving letters from small business people who say they are going to get out of business, that they can no longer afford to stay open. It is safer for them to invest their money in Canada Savings Bonds. Their free enterprise spirit is being destroyed.

In the United Kingdom the VAT started at 7 per cent. It is now 15 per cent and runs as high as 38 per cent on some goods. Is it possible that the British may have a better sense of fair play than we have in Canada? While our federal government wants to put a 7 per cent tax on babies' clothes and a 7 per cent tax on a brand new Ferrari, in Great Britain, at least they have the common sense to tax luxury items at a higher rate so as to give a break to the poor. Do senators opposite defend what the government is doing here? In the U.K. in 1979, when the VAT was raised to 15 per cent, inflation jumped from 8 to 20 per cent in one year. Inflation in Britain is now around 10 per cent. Is the British Tory agenda the model for Canada? Taking the pound at 100 pence in 1974, its purchasing power fell to 27 pence in 1987. At least they had the common sense to get rid of their Tory leader.

In Britain there is a growing underground economy, using cash deals with no invoices so as to evade the VAT. This has affected the government's ability to measure and control its progress and has resulted in misleading economic statistics. In 1988, $66 million worth of evasion and fraud was uncovered. Undiscovered fraud is probably triple that, according to economists. Britain spends $451 million on VAT collection, including fraud investigation. On a per capita basis, their collection costs are probably more efficient than our projected fees, if the $400 million a year for Canada is accurate. Distinguishing between products that are exempt and those that are not exempt from the VAT has kept government authorities tied up in courts for years. It is one of the most profitable sources of income for the litigant lawyers. Do senators opposite think we will be free from that process? The Mulroney government will create high employment in at least one sector of the Canadian economy—that in which the chartered accountants, certified general accountants and lawyers are involved.

As a result of the VAT, most prices rose 4 per cent from the VAT alone, despite Mrs. Thatcher's predictions that that would not be the case. Many small business people in Britain just closed up shop. We all have lists of companies in our own areas that are doing precisely the same thing.

Based on the British experience, John Kay, Director of Britain's Institute for Fiscal Studies, told a Canadian conference on taxation that a Canadian VAT should be set up at between 15 to 20 per cent to make it worthwhile, because it is such a costly tax to administer.

Britain's VAT only became an efficient money-maker when it reached 15 per cent. This is the concern Canadians have. The GST will start at 7 per cent and, just as soon as the government is able to do so, it will be boosted to 10, 12, 15 or 20 per cent. It is feared that GST revenues are not going to be targeted towards reducing the deficit or the debt. This, again, is one of the most persuasive reasons why this constructive and helpful amendment that has been moved by Senator Lawson should be supported by all honourable senators. It should not be a matter of disputation. We should see that this is keeping faith with the taxpayers. Let us make sure that there are no hidden spending agendas.

Some Conservative senators shook their heads in disagreement when I said that companies were going out of business. I should like to read into the record a letter from a firm called Silva Ecosystem Consultants in Winlaw, British Columbia. It states:

> We are a small forestry consulting forestry firm employing four people. We wish to advise you that we will be adversely affected by the proposed goods and services tax. We will be required to collect the tax on the professional services we provide.
> The rates we charge our clients cannot be reduced because we barely meet our overhead costs as it is. Our firm does not make a profit.

• (1530)

Is the Conservative Party now adopting the philosophy that there is something sinful about a company making a profit? The letter goes on to say:

> Our clients, mostly communities and native groups, will not be able to afford a 7% addition to our fees. If the Goods and Services Tax is implemented, we anticipate that we will not be able to remain in business.
> We urge you, as a Senator from British Columbia to vote no on the Goods and Services Tax. If you do not vote no, we wish to hear from you the reasoned arguments you have developed to support the GST.

I will refer that letter to someone opposite because I cannot find any "reasoned arguments" from the opposite side in support of the GST.

A working man from Westbank, British Columbia, says:

> This brief note is to inform you of my opposition to the GST as it stands before you now. A government that increases bureaucracy to increase taxes to this extent is not one that I would re-elect. A tax grab of this magnitude and in this manner is not I feel in the best interest of Canada. Yes we must reduce our deficit but let's do it like we do in our own home, cut our spending first and then look for alternate income.

That is a lot of wisdom that comes from a so-called "little" taxpayer, although no taxpayer is really a little taxpayer. He goes on to say:

> The effect of this proposed GST is more far reaching than I realized at first. In the next 12 months it will have cost me about 15% My labour is contracted out, so my yearly raise of about 6% will be lost and used to compensate my present contract. This in addition to the 7% tax on almost everything and regular inflation will put us in a much lower standard of living. I can afford to handle this load but many cannot. I urge you to vote no! to the goods and services tax.

Does this strike a sympathetic chord in anyone opposite? This working man from Westbank, British Columbia is seriously concerned. He is facing a 15 per cent diminution of income and has a mortgage to pay. Do you think that this is sufficient grounds to hold this tax up for a few months and try to solve some of the problems?

I have never in my life seen a perfect tax bill. There are many imperfections here which have been identified even on the government's own admission. Let us fix up the GST bill and do a better job.

I have a letter here from a Mr. Schulenburg of Victoria, B.C., the capital of British Columbia. He says:

> It is my desire to urgently impress upon you that you, as my representative from British Columbia and as my representative as a Canadian in the Senate will employ all your capacities and facilities of integrity, honesty and intelligence to effectively oppose and reject the Federal Government's proposed Goods and Services Tax.

Mistaken or not—you can say he is wrong—that is the impression out there. That explains your free-fall in the polls. The letter goes on to say:

> We all know by now that, contrary to official pronouncements, this tax > will be an enormous burden on our financially weaker fellow citizens,

This has been confirmed by many churches and social welfare organizations in the country. He goes on to say:

> it will allow our present and future governments to continue with more uncontrolled and useless expenditures in areas which are absurd and unnecessary for the well-being, the security and the economical health of Canadian tax payers . . .

Again I say that if everyone supports Senator Lawson's amendment, we can allay Mr. Schulenburg's fears and concerns that the revenue derived from the GST will not be used to reduce the debt and deficit. He goes on to say:

> it will not effectively be used for the reduction of Canada's accumulated debt . . .

Let us show him today that reduction of the deficit is where the money is going to be deployed. I am sure we can work out an agreement with the parties in the other place to send this bill back expeditiously and have this amendment accepted. He goes on to say:

> it will increase Canada's annual deficit,
> it will promote cheap, imported goods from the United States which are not saddled with a similar tax . . .

That is of particular concern in southern B.C.

I should like to give you a startling statistic. Twenty per cent of all the fresh milk consumed in the lower mainland area of British Columbia is purchased in Washington State. Under the proposed GST food is not subject to tax, but buying in the United States is a trend which merchants are facing in southern British Columbia. Shopping centres are being built just across the Canadian border to attract Canadian customers, not American customers. The merchants are saying, "After January 1 it will cost 7 per cent more to shop in Canada, so come on down to the friendly United States. We need you. We have credit cards for you." Is that the type of message that we want to send out to Canadian retailers who are struggling to stay alive?

Senator Corbin: Senator Perrault, may I ask a question?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Corbin: Is Sunday shopping allowed in Washington State?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Corbin: The State of Maine has authorized, by referendum, the opening of stores on Sundays. That is a big drawing card for Canadians.

Senator Perrault: I am glad that Senator Corbin has raised that point. There is Sunday shopping, as well, in Washington State along the British Columbia border. Gasoline in the U.S. costs approximately 50 per cent less in Canada. What is the 7 per cent GST going to do to merchants in Canada? That is the very serious concern. What is it going to do to the travel agents in our province, some of whom are facing advertising from companies just across the border saying, "Buy your tickets down here and then you do not have to worry about that additional 7 per cent."

The proposed GST needs to be thought through before you inflict this tax on Canadian taxpayers. This writer goes on to say:

> it will promote cheap, imported goods from the United States which are not saddled with a similar tax and which, in addition, are increasingly freed from import duties, courtesy of the Canadian Government's agreed terms of the FREE Trade Pact, read: Courtesy of the Canadian tax payers, and it will, as a consequence of the last mentioned effect of the Goods and Services Tax, increase Canadian unemployment with all its attendant costs of personal misery, distress, anger, and will cause more public expenses, shortfalls of revenue and the demolition of our social structure of health, educational and economical security.

There is a lot of wisdom out there. Public opinion can be wrong, at times, but we tend to underestimate the public. This chap has done some thinking about this. He goes on to say:

> Terms like "suspect motivation, blatant nonsense, ridiculous justifications, desperate lies, high treason, moral bankruptcy and intellectual helplessness" come to mind.
> Who wants to be part of such a travesty and betrayal?

That is a strong letter from a working person in the city of Victoria. Do we want to be part of that travesty and betrayal, honourable senators?

I say to our Tory friends, "Do you think a moral and intellectual case can be made to postpone this bill for a few months?" We on this side are opposing this bill and we want an alternative tax plan. However, in the spirit of compromise, we are suggesting that, as a minimum, a postponement would be better than nothing.

As John Foster Dulles said, there are grounds for an agonizing reappraisal of your position.

I have a press release from Toronto Mayor Art Eggleton, which was read previously by an Ontario senator. It says:

> "I'm mindful of the fact that it would be an unprecedented action for the Senate to defeat the GST," said Mayor Eggleton. "But let's face it, the GST is an unprecedented tax grab . . . an unprecedented boondoggle . . . an unprecedented assault on Canadians. And the Senate has the constitutional right, and the moral obligation, to kill it."

The press release goes on to say:

> Eggleton said that the added burden of the GST on Toronto taxpayers, "amounts to taking money out of both their pockets at once." And he added that by joining the court challenge, and encouraging other cities to join, "we would add an important municipal aspect to the challenges."

Senator Lawson has given us the Vancouver statistics registering in excess of 85 per cent opposition to the proposed GST.

I have a letter from The Corporation of Delta, in the Province of British Columbia. It is signed by the Mayor. It says:

> The Council of The Corporation of Delta continues to oppose the proposed Goods & Services Tax.
> The GST will significantly impact local government. Every municipal department will be affected. The accounting for GST will be complex, and additional personnel will be required to monitor and control the tax at a time when our country is facing an uncertain economy.
> We appeal to you and your colleagues to do everything in your power to defeat implementation of the GST legislation.

A copy of the letter has been sent to Dr. S. Wilbee, Conservative Member of Parliament, who recently spoke publicly in opposition to the government's actions. Dr. Wilbee asked for a meeting recently with the Prime Minister to discuss his concerns and alarm.

• (1540)

We then have a letter from Ms. Gerber, who says:

> I am strongly opposed to the G.S.T. and urge you to exercise whatever powers you have to oppose the bill. It is not that I am opposed to the concept of taxation, for as a Canadian citizen, I am more than willing to pay my fair share of taxes. However, I fear that the introduction of the G.S.T. will open the gate for increased taxes that are beyond the boundary of fair. We need only look at European versions of the G.S.T. to see what the future holds in store for us.

This is another very persuasive reason to support the amendment. This person, as did so many others during our committee hearings across Canada indicated, "I will pay my fair share. I know there is a debt out there. I too agree that it is unsatisfactorily large, but I simply am concerned about this bill. There is a suggestion here that the funds will be diverted to another purpose."

Let us support this amendment. Let us give that guarantee to Ms. Gerber on West 15 Avenue in Vancouver, British Columbia, that the money will be used to reduce that debt. That should be beyond dispute.

Ms. Gerber continues:

> As a middle class person who is paying an increasingly larger proportion of her paycheck to Revenue Canada, I have become far more sensitive to the expenditure and collection of my hard earned dollars by the Government of Canada, and what I can simply not understand is; if the majority of Canadians are opposed to the G.S.T., and Canada is a democracy, then why is the government attempting to force the G.S.T. upon us?

That is another good question. If you had even 50 per cent of the support of the country by the polls, or even 40 per cent, that might provide some moral basis for your actions. But support has deserted you here. You have all the mayors and premiers against you, excepting the ones that have been appointed to the Senate.

Continues Ms. Gerber,

> The purpose of the Senate is to function as a check and balance to the House of Commons in order that a move such as this can be thwarted. I urge you to listen to the people of British Columbia and oppose the G.S.T.

Here are a couple of nice words about the government. Let us read them all; let us not discriminate.

> Please listen to the population of this great country who are objecting so strenuously to this unpopular and patently stupid legislation of the G.S.T.
> I feel the government has to set an example curtailing spending before the ordinary people are asked to pay more taxes.

Obviously it can be presumed that this person is supporting some of the cutbacks that you have made.

> This is a costly and cumbersome tax that needs to be reviewed and streamlined, not pushed at us as though there is no other alternative.
> Please Senator, represent the views and feelings of your fellow Canadians on this matter.

I have a letter from Mr. Laskowski, who writes:

> As a taxpayer and small businessman of British Columbia, I urge you to exercise your responsibility as a senator and vote NO to the proposed Goods & Services Tax.
> Admittedly tax reform is desperately needed in this country, however the proposed G.S.T. reform is not the answer.

These are the letters that are arriving in disturbingly large numbers. Other senators must be receiving the same kind of mail.

> In its present form the G.S.T. will effectively put my office out of business resulting in unemployment for at least 2 persons who will then need to be absorbed into other areas of the work force or sit on unemployment insurance for a time.

Case after case is coming to the attention of senators.

> The Senate is the watchdog of our country. Hundreds and thousands of bills are passed into law without amendment by the Senate, but periodically the powers of this body are our last defence against the bad judgement and politicking of the elected government. Please use your sober judgment and vote NO to the GST.

We then have a letter from another Vancouverite, Mr. Norman Ho who writes:

> I urge the Senates of Canada to say no to GST.
> I am a realtor in Vancouver. The GST do affect our business. Think about investors from off shores. There is already too much taxes for investors in Canada. The addition of GST add further burden to them. It makes our business opportunities less attractive comparing with other countries.

I thought we were supposed to become lean and mean and competitive in this new Conservative vision of Canada? Mr. Ho indicates that you are making it a less competitive country.

> People will think about other alternatives. We lose and the other countries gain. Our people suffer.
> We understand we have great debt to pay. Can the Government of Canada thinks about some ways to cut down expenses instead of raising taxes which hurt our country. The taxation in Canada is already too HIGH! This GST will frighten off investors who will bring us job opportunities.
> As a Senator of Canada, Please help to save our country! Tell the Torry Government not to add further tax to the people and ruin our country. You are the only one to stop it!

These are further arguments to support the Lawson initiative here, and the Waters initiative of yesterday.

We then have a letter from Stephen Williams. Mr. Williams writes:

> I urge you to reconsider the Conservative Party's adamant stand on the proposed G.S.T.

It is for the Conservatives to consider.

> I am now a middle income tax payer, having spent much of the last while in school, and I was horrified at how much I had to pay in personal income tax in my first full working year. Adding a general sales tax on top of that seems outrageous.

Again and again we hear this theme:

> I don't mind paying my share of taxes when things are going "good", but when the Canadian economy is in a difficult situation and government spending doesn't seem to be curtailed, I baulk at the thought of paying 7% more for most things I purchase.

Again and again the theme comes through that the tax should be based on the ability to pay, and that there should not be this regressive type of sales tax. It does not matter what arguments are invoked, a sales tax , both historically and traditionally, is regressive. These taxes are borne disproportionately by those least able to pay them. All of us in this chamber know that. Do not try to put some other interpretation on this tax. The tax is reactionary and regressive.

As I have mentioned so many times before, your Dalton Camp said correctly that this tax is "unlovely and regressive." Let us be frank. Government senators do not like to hear that quote. Mr. Camp said: "It is an unlovely and regressive tax, but the people have short memories, and by the time the next question comes around, they will forget about it." I hve news for our Tory friends opposite, the Canadian people will not forget about it. They will not forget this time!

Senator Simard: Pardon?

Senator Perrault: Mr. Williams continues:

> The GST will hurt the lower income earner the most. Granted there are going to be tax rebates/subsidies/etc. but the person earning a low to moderate income is going to feel the impact of the GST more than anyone else.

That is correct.

> There are overwhelming predictions that the proposed GST will be an inflationary tax.
> What bothers me the most is that this tax will be extremely expensive to administer.

That is also correct. The three principles of a good tax are not met in any sense by the GST.

> The size of our government is far too big at the moment. And the present state of the government spends far more than it should.
> Before I'll be willing to pay more in taxes (personal or GST) I want evidence that my government is committed to decreasing $%their$% spending. I'm not seeing that at this point in time.

It was a former finance minister of France, Jean-Baptiste Colbert, who said that the art of successful taxation is plucking as many feathers from the goose as possible with the least possible hissing. This government has more than one gaggle of geese hissing at this proposal. There are millions of them and those geese out there are very intelligent. They have called your number on this bill. They see the hidden motives, the hidden agenda: Get as much tax out of the pockets of the taxpayers as possible and we will have a real political fighting fund for 1992, but by the time the next election rolls around they will throw the money around as if it is going out of style.

I ask honourable senators, with candor and sincerity, to support this amendment proposed by Senator Lawson. Let us all stand up and demonstrate to all of Canada that, yes, we agree that the money should be used to reduce the deficit. By so doing the government would win back thousands of supporters across the country who now believe there is a very serious credibility problem. Vote yes to this amendment. Perform one correct act in this debate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Claude Castonguay: Honourable senators, since this is my first real intervention in this House, I would have preferred to do it in French, my mother tongue, for many reasons. However, since I address my remarks for the most part to Senator Lawson, in responseto his proposed amendment, I will have the courtesy to speak English. I will come back to French in the second part of my speech, where I will take this opportunity to make certain comments of a more general nature.

• (1550)

[English]

Senator Lawson's amendment proposes that any excess income under the GST be applied toward reduction of the deficit or payment of the public debt. Firstly, let me state clearly that we on this side of the chamber are totally in agreement with the objective of reducing the government deficit and the public debt of Canada.

Senator Gigantès: However?

Senator Castonguay: I have listened to you very patiently for two months and I have heard many things, so today let me say what I have to say.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Castonguay: When I am finished, if you have questions, I will try to answer them.

Senator Austin: Senator Simard, please do not interrupt here.

Senator Hébert: Tell that to Senator Simard because he interrupts us all the time.

Senator Castonguay: After having heard Senator Waters last night express his concerns with respect to the economy, and also hia search for solutions, it is refreshing this afternoon to discuss an amendment which is also intended to deal with one of the important problems facing this country. That problem is our exceedingly high debt which results from a level of expenditures which for many years has been too high and continues to be so. We are in a situation in which the government has to borrow in an unstable and very volatile marketplace. Any measure which reduces the uncertainty, and reassures the market will go in the right direction. Obviously, excess revenues applied toward the reduction of the deficit or the debt would go in that direction.

We know that the high level of the debt generates high levels of interest charges which add to the deficit and create, to a certain extent, a vicious circle. Fortunately, during the last few years, significant progress has been achieved in the reduction of the level of the deficit. Part of the reduction has come from increased taxes, as has been mentioned, but part has also come through reduction of the level of expenditures.

I would like to quote some figures to show the extent of the effort which has been made. Over the past five years, the government has restricted the growth of government spending to 3.6 per cent per year. This is well below the inflation rate and well below the rate of increase of the level of expenditures of provincial governments. This is well below the rate of increase over the 10 to 15 years before this government came to power. There was a consistent rate increase exceeding 10 per cent per year for each five-year period under the previous Liberal administration.

Spending restraint has been pronounced on government-owned operations rather than on program spending, as obviously was the direction to take. The cost of government operations in 1990-1991 is $100 million less than in 1984-85. This is a considerable reduction, when we take into account the fact that, since then, on a cumulative basis, we have experienced a rate of inflation of 30 per cent. In other words, in constant dollars, taking into account the rate of inflation, the cost of maintaining government operations would require an additional $3.5 billion in the current budget. That indicates the extent of the effort that has been made.

While in 1984-85, when this government took over, there was an operating deficit of $16 billion, there is now an operating surplus of $9 billion. These figures are definitely impressive by any standard. On the part of the Prime Minister and the government, these figures indicate a continuous and high level of commitment to the objective of reducing the level of the deficit and the level of the public debt. The Prime Minister has clearly reaffirmed his intention to use any excess revenue through the GST to reduce the deficit or to decrease the rate of the GST, which would be another option.

I will quote here what the Prime Minister said on a recent visit to Edmonton, as reported in the Edmonton Journal of November 14.

> If the GST throws off any more money than anticipated this money will not go to more program spending. If there is a modest or even a large windfall, I will give you the formal undertaking that we will either reduce the rate on the GST or we will take that money and apply it against the deficit.

I also quote the Minister of State (Finance), the Hon. Gilles Loiselle, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of April 7:

> If we have any additional revenue from the GST, well, of course, it will be applied naturally , to the deficit.

With the record of the government on this specific question of reducing the deficit, we on this side of the house have no hesitation in accepting the commitment of the Prime Minister and the government, and I think the opposition should do the same.

Senator Gigantès: Will you explain, eventually, why we should do so?

Senator Castonguay: When I conclude, if you wish.

Senator Hébert: Don't disturb him.

Senator Castonguay: Senator Perrault talked about the experiences of some countries and, in particular, he talked of New Zealand. He did not talk of the vast majority of countries that have introduced value-added taxes over the years. In many cases, it is true to say that these new taxes have generated more revenue than anticipated. One of the reasons for this is the fact that under the current system there is a possibility of tax evasion which will be considerably reduced, and the forecast on VAT is much more accurate than it is under any system of manufacturers' sales tax.

[Senator Castonguay.]

With the recession and the fact that at the moment so many components in the economy are changing, it is difficult to make an accurate forecast. This is why, based on the best estimate at present, confirmed by an objective and neutral organization such as the Conference Board, from a revenue point of view the GST should be neutral in the first year.

Now, Senator Perrault has again questioned that. He obviously forgets or does not wish to recognize the fact that the GST is not applied for only one year. When the Prime Minister and other senators here have indicated that the GST will eventually help reduce the deficit, this will be in year two, year three and the following years. It will come because the GST, as has been indicated, will help the growth of our economy.

Now, the level of taxation in Canada has reached a point where the effort at deficit reduction must continue to be directed toward the expenditure side. This is obvious and it si something with which we agree. In my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, there is still room to do so. There is room to do so without penalizing the lower income groups, if you look carefully at the way the budget is allocated and the areas of expenditure. There is also room to do so without weakening the safety net. As has been mentioned on a number of occasions, it is important to maintain the safety net. It can also be done in a way that will not endanger essential government programs. So to conclude on this very specific question, I believe that we should all support the government in its efforts to reduce the deficit instead of looking exclusively, as has been the case with all the amendments and all the arguments brought forward by the opposition, at ways of increasing the burden that taxpayers have to support.

● (1600)

We agree with the objective sought by Senator Lawson. However, we do not believe that the approach taken through this amendment is the appropriate one. The proposed amendment would, if adopted, constitute an appropriation of monies for a very specific purpose, that of the reduction of the deficit. The means to make such an allocation in our system is through the budget put forward by the Minister of Finance and not through an amendment in the Senate or on a bill approved by the House of Commons. This is a basic principle in our parliamentary system that cannot suffer any exemption.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here.

Senator Castonguay: Actually I believe that we could have argued that this amendment was non-receivable, but we did not do so because both sides of this chamber, and particularly this one, wanted to give the honourable senator and his colleague an opportunity to present amendments and debate this Bill.

Let me add that if allocations of funds could be made through specific pieces of legislation, the freedom of the government would gradually be restricted. Such an approach would become counter-productive with the passage of time and with changing priorities. Also in periods of emergency it would shift the responsibility of the budgetary process from the hands of the government to the House of Commons and to the Senate. During the last few weeks the system in the United States has given us a good demonstration of the inefficiency of such an approach. The President has been in the position of not being able to have a budget approved, let alone his own budget, by Congress.

As far as the probability of the rate of the GST being increased in the future, any increase or decrease will have to be seen in the context of the overall taxation system and not in isolation. An increase in the GST coupled with corresponding decreases in other taxes is a different thing than a straight increase or decrease. Again, these changes should be introduced through the well-established process of the budget.

I do not agree whatsoever with Senator Lawson when he claims that the GST is a result of the Free Trade Agreement. Proposals to replace the federal sales tax or the manufacturer's sales tax were made long before the question of free trade with the United States or with Mexico ever came about. So I will not discuss this question and the implications or the relationship between the GST and free trade, particularly with the United States.

For these fundamental reasons, while we agree in general with the objective of the proposed amendment, we cannot agree with the way of achieving it. Again, given the record of the government on this particular question, we accept without hesitation, the commitment of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of Finance and of the government, and we ask honourable senator to support their efforts, as you obviously wish to do so.

[Translation]

Before I finish, I would like to add some general comments about the GST and recall certain facts.

During the past few weeks, the Opposition has made a habit of overlooking a number of aspects of the GST. This afternoon, I was listening to Senator Perrault, and my reaction was the same as it has been for the past two months.

The Opposition almost always neglects to say that many prices will be adjusted downward when the GST is introduced.

It neglects to say that the federal sales tax hits goods produced in Canada much harder than imports and that for this reason, it should be replaced, once and for all.

The Opposition neglects to say that the federal sales tax deprives Canadians of a large number of jobs. They told us about jobs that disappeared as a result of all the changes that are taking place in our economy, but they never mention the new jobs that will be created by the Goods and Services Tax, for instance.

The Opposition neglects to say that the present tax puts a disproportionate part of the burden on the manufacturing sector, the motor of our economy.

The Opposition neglects to say that investment costs will go down at least 4 per cent, according to very objective estimates, and that investments, as we all know, are practically the only source of job creation, so important in the present circumstances.

They mentioned the opportunities for tax evasion under the GST. However, they neglected to say those opportunities are far greater and more obvious with the current federal sales tax, while as far as the GST is concerned, all this is pure speculation on the part of our colleagues opposite.

They forgot to say that the amounts expected to be generated by the GST will be far more stable, which will make it easier for the government to provide for sound financial administration, and this includes reducing the deficit.

The Opposition stressed the fact that unions and consumers spoke out against the GST. Of course, it would have been surprising if they had not. What the Opposition neglected to say is that all organizations representing business—I am referring to the businesses that create wealth and employment in this country—spoke out in favour of the GST.

The Opposition tabled a whole series of amendments. There was some reference to these amendments this afternoon. Interestingly, analysed one by one, every one of these amendments would have had the effect of increasing the tax burden or reducing revenue. Today, they are arguing, as Senator Perrault just did, in favour of an amendment that would require any excess revenues raised by the GST to be applied to the deficit.

How does one reconcile these positions? I am sure I cannot. Clearly, a lot of Canadians are facing the same problem, and that is probably what can be concluded from recent polls which show Canadians do not believe that the Liberals, if they were elected—which is entirely hypothetical—would eliminate the GST as their leader said he would. Most Canadians don't believe this statement because of all these contradictions.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Stick to your text and spare us your political conclusions!

Senator Castonguay: The Opposition has forgotten, as it did during the years it was in power, that a society like ours must consider its means as well as well its needs. It is easy to talk about the needs of all groups and every individual in our society, as the opposition has done, but there comes a time when we must also consider our means. And the reason this country is in such poor financial shape is that this requirement has been neglected for too long. Much of the blame can be put squarely at the door of the previous Liberal government.

Personally, I deplore the fact that since September 25, we have never been given a chance to consider—at the appropriate time, not today, at the appropriate time and with proper notice, not just a couple of hours—how legislation as important as this bill could be improved. We are of course aware there is room for improvement.

Since September 25, I never heard, in all my parliamentary experience . . .

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You told us there were no amendments of any substance. I find that surprising, coming from you, Senator Castonguay.

Senator Castonguay: Since September 25, never in all my experience of public life have I heard people talk so much about democracy and freedom of speech and respect for the views of Canadians. And all this because many Canadians are against the GST, as if we could actually be in favour of a tax, especially if it is poorly explained or knowingly misinterpreted. Never, in all the years I spent in the Quebec National Assembly, did I ever see the kind of spectacle I saw within these precincts. I never before heard such language in a parliamentary assembly. If you don't mind my saying so, I think there is absolutely no justification for what we saw and heard.

What is worse is, that the public saw and heard this as well. It used to be that an appointment to the Senate was considered an honour, but today, it is almost embarrassing to admit that we sit in this assembly, after the events of the past few weeks.

The Senate is setting a very negative example for Canadians. At a time when unemployment is high, the country is in a recession, and it is vital to boost investor confidence and reduce the present climate of uncertainty, debate has been paralysed here for weeks by readings of petitions and all kinds of dilatory tactics to obstruct a bill that has already been passed by the House of Commons. These tactics prevent us from exercising rights as fundamental as free speech and the right to vote, which is as important as our right to speak, so abused during the last few months.

Free speech is of course fundamental, but our duty to speak out and to vote is just as important if not more so. We cannot use freedom of speech to deprive the majority—because we are the majority—of its right to vote. That is an abuse of freedom of speech. It is an abuse of democracy.

In the course of the interventions made on the other side of this chamber in recent weeks, someone compared the hatchet job done on the GST to the hatchet job done on the Meech Lake Accord. They even congratulated themselves on the fact that the dollar did not drop and the markets did not falter after the Meech Lake fiasco.

I heard those words quite clearly on a number of occasions. That reveals a very limited knowledge of what is going on in the markets. If interest rates are so high now, with all the consequences that this involves, it can be traced back to the climate of uncertainty created by events such as those we witnessed here in the Senate, to the uncertainty which hangs over Canada and to the high interest rates which just will not come down.

People seem to ignore the fact that because of the Meech Lake failure, engineered by the federal Liberals, most Quebecers have lost faith in Canada's ability to find them an acceptable and honourable place. Yet it was Canada's last chance, as it is now structured, to integrate Quebec in the constitutional fold under those conditions. This opportunity was missed because a minority did not want to accept the will expressed by the Canadian Parliament and eight legislatures, plus the commitment of all First Ministers who, as we know, had signed the Meech Lake Accord.

• (1610)

The GST has been adopted by the House of Commons. It is an essential element of the government's program. It must not be blocked by an unelected minority, even if this minority is made up of Liberal senators.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have a few questions for Senator Castonguay. One of the ministers of this government, Mr. John Crosbie, said during the 1979 election campaign that if his party were to tell the truth it would never be elected. Nobody in his party attempted to deny that statement. Why do you want us to believe you?

And when Prime Minister Mulroney was on the hustings, after sticking a knife in Mr. Clark's back, he said, as did Mr. Wilson, that free trade with the United States would be a disaster for Canada and that he would never approve such a deal. They forced us to accept it. Why do you think we can believe them?

You are saying that we should not earmark taxpayers, money for a specific use. Yet, the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund operates on the same principle: They take the pension money they get from taxpayers and it is designated for a specific purpose. You claim you want to reduce the national debt and all we are asking you is to accept an amendment which would force you to keep your word for once.

I have several studies which I will show you later. You have given no evidence that the GST will create jobs. The fact is that in all the European countries where the GST was implemented, unemployment rose, and each time the GST rate was increased, so did unemployment.

How can you say that the tax on manufactured goods is robbing Canadians of jobs when it is clear to everybody that they lost 165,000 jobs in the manufacturing industry since the implementation of the Free Trade Accord and the high interest rate policy?

The tax on manufactured goods existed before. Canadians did not lose their jobs; now they are losing them.

You are saying that Senator Perrault agrees with Senator Lawson. Yet, we the Liberal senators, moved amendments which would have reduced the amount you will collect with this tax and you see some inconsistency in that. We wanted to reduce the impact of this tax during this recession period. We wanted to ease the tax burden on low income people. If you insist on ramming it through, we want you at least to feel compelte to tell the truth for once and to use this money for its intended purpose. Could you answer these questions? Then, I will have other questions for you, Senator Castonguay.

Senator Castonguay: Honourable senator, I will deal first with your question concerning the contributions paid to the Quebec Pension Fund which are directed to the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund.

As a matter of fact, this money is not paid into the general revenue account of the government. They are not taxes, but contributions to a very specific plan. These contributions do not go through the Consolidated Revenue Fund but are paid directly to the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund to be invested for the payment of annuities.

At the present time, the GST is paid into the government's general revenues with other types of revenues and it is the Minister of Finance's responsibility, through the process of budget expenditures, to divide this money among the various spending envelopes.

That is the accountant's point of view. You draw lines and make neat columns. Everything in its place, and so forth. The fact is that money is taken out of taxpayers' pockets. That is the problem. Accountants give us labels. It is more convenient for Mr. Wilson not to put a specific label on a specific amount of money, but we have this accountant's attitude that is doing a great deal of harm in all Western democracies. If we could get rid of this attitude, if we could just remove those vertical lines in the ledger to have the kind of flexibility we need, we would be much better off.

Senator Castonguay: Come now, Senator Gigantès, you know perfectly well that under our system of government the responsibility for making those choices lies with the government. We call those choices the Budget. That responsibility does not lie with the House of Commons or the Senate through all kinds of legislation.

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon. The Minister of Finance could say: "I will take this money and apply it to the debt." That's all. He can say so. He can say so in his Budget. He can draw another line in his great ledger in the sky, and do it just like that, just promise to do it and tell the truth, for once.

Senator Castonguay: That is what he did. That is what the Prime Minister promised.

Senator Gigantès: We can't trust your prime minister.

Senator Castonguay: And now for your second question about generating jobs. If your book contains the kind of arguments you just made, I am afraid it won't sell very well, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: This was in a study made by the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses and the U.S. organization. They analysed the impact of the GST in Europe, and they said no jobs were created. They said it, I didn't.

Senator Castonguay: Those who looked into the matter, including your leader when he looked into this in the past, have concluded that as a result of the GST, goods manufactured in Canada will be cheaper. This will promote exports and discourage imports. Furthermore, investment costs will be cheaper, which will also promote job creation in this country.

In your third question, you said that Mr. Crosbie spoke out against a tax on goods and services in 1979. First of all, only stupid people never change their minds. Since Mr. Crosbie is an intelligent man, during the past ten years he has had a chance to reconsider. Today, he supports the GST, and speaking of 1979 and the fact that people don't always trust what politicians tell them, that reminds me of what happened that year. The Clark government proposed a per litre like tax on gas at the pump. The Liberals condemned this tax and the government was defeated on this question. Shortly afterwards, once the Liberals were elected, they introduced a tax on gas that was much higher. That is why Canadians do not always trust politicians or believe what they say.

Senator Hébert: He knows his catechism!

• (1620)

[English]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, like all senators, I am very much in favour of a reduction in the deficit. I do not have to go over the arguments that have been well postulated in this chamber up to now. However, I do have one view that is perhaps a little different for the reason that we should do virtually everything in our power to reduce the budgetary deficit.

In Canada at the present time we are relying on foreign borrowing to a very heavy extent. I believe something in the order of $230 billion is borrowed from foreign sources. That represents 28 per cent of the outstanding debt. In order to encourage borrowing by foreign sources, we have had to keep interest rates very high, and we have had to keep our exchange rate vis-à-vis the United States higher than a proper parity price. That has seriously interfered with our export industries. It has created competition in Canada from imports and this has exacerbated the situation we are in today, and by that I mean a recessionary situation. Presumably it will be reported in the next day or so that Canada is in fact in a recession.

If there has been a slow down in the economy, this gives us an opportunity to reduce the reliance on foreign borrowing. In order to do that, it will take a reduction in our deficit. If that happens, we will be able to reduce the reliance on foreign borrowing. We will be able to reduce our interest rates. We will be able to allow the Canadian dollar to achieve a level that makes us more competitive.

One must remember that, over the last ten years, Canadian competitiveness vis-à-vis the United States has dropped by some 15 per cent. Now, clearly, with a recession on, that competitiveness might well improve, but it is a slow and long process. And we do not really have the time.

I do not know whether senators saw the article that appeared the other day in the Globe and Mail about a manufacturer who said that he has to move his operations to Buffalo. Upon reading it, one is hard pressed to say: "Well, those facts are not correct. It is different from what he says it is." When he lists the very things that he has to deal with as a manufacturer in Canada exporting to the United States, one asks oneself why he is waiting to move. Why has he not made the move? It is clear that if he is going to survive he has to make that move.

What is absolutely necessary at this stage is that we take action to reduce the deficit. I, personally, have some feeling that this government has done a reasonably good job in respect of program spending. As Senator Castonguay pointed out, since 1984 it has held the increase in program spending to 3.6 per cent, less than the rate of inflation. From a deficit in program spending of some $16 billion in 1984, we find ourselves now with a $9 billion surplus, and perhaps it is even a little higher than that. That surplus goes to reduce the cost of servicing the national debt, and that debt today is in the neighbourhood of $380 billion.

If we must reduce the deficit, then it means that either we have to reduce spending or we have to find new revenues. I, for one, like many people in this house, I think, would favour a reduction in spending. But in the political climate in Canada I have some serious doubts that there would be great success in reducing spending in government. Oh, I know it is very much the vogue on the hustings to say: "We will make government more efficient. We will see that it spends less." But I have spent my life in this chamber, in the years that I was Chairman of the Finance Committee, looking into this problem of the reduction in government spending.

I have no doubt that government can be run a great deal more efficiently, but if you really want to talk about reducing spending, you have to cut into programs. There is no alternative to that. Spending cannot be reduced other than by incremental amounts, other than by taking on programs. Then you must ask yourself: What programs should be taken on? Would anyone want to take on the business of universality? Would anyone want to take on extra billing by doctors?

The point is that it becomes extremely difficult to do that. That is not to say that it should not be attempted, that we should not be trying to reduce our expenditures, that we should not be saying to those people who can afford it, "You pay the costs so that the people who cannot afford it have better coverage." But the fact of the matter is that reductions in government spending are hard to achieve. We are not going to lick this deficit on reductions in government spending. We are going to have to face the reality that we must raise taxes. There is no alternative to that. If it is as important as I suggest to senators that it is, there is no alternative now to the raising of taxes. And if we refuse to do that, then it seems to me that it is only a matter of time before we create the most pernicious of all situations, and that is borrowing to cover a deficit that arises not out of spending but out of the cost of servicing the public debt.

Senator Lawson has suggested other modes of raising taxes. To me, a consumption tax is a tax that is missing in Canada because it gives us the opportunity to balance revenues from consumption with revenues from income. If I understand him correctly, Senator Lawson has said that we should raise the progressive income tax to a greater extent. Well, we know the result of that. We know that decisions are skewed then in favour of taxation. We know that people leave the country because they can get a better tax deal somewhere else. There is a level beyond which you cannot go. Socialists will say that you can go forever. And what did they get into in Britain at one time? They taxed 98 per cent of income. Where is the incentive to produce? Where is the incentive to invest if you are paying 98 per cent of your income in taxes?

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Lawson went on to say that corporations should not be allowed fast write-offs, should not be allowed to offset previous losses and should not be allowed to deduct borrowing costs on acquisitions. That may be a fact, but do not forget that most of the reductions in corporate rates are there because we have created incentives, and corporations are taking advantage of them. They are not loopholes. We say: "Here is an incentive for you to modernize your machinery. Here is an incentive to do this or that." Corporations say: "We will take advantage of that incentive." If we want to take away all of those incentives and tell the corporations they must pay tax and that is all there is to it, then we can do that, but let us understand that corporate Canada is not going to direct its investment in the way in which the government wants it directed. As long as we are willing to live with that, then there is no problem. But I have often wondered why we blame the corporations for doing what we in government and Parliament ask them to do.

Senator Lawson then says that there should be wealth taxes. Well, there are wealth taxes. There is a deemed capital gain on death which means that 75 per cent of that gain is brought into income and taxes are immediately exigible. That is a fairly major wealth tax.

I have a real problem in not accepting the concept of a consumption tax. It has worked elsewhere and I think it will work here.

Senator Frith: It has not worked at double levels.

Senator Everett: Senator Frith has said that it has not operated at double levels. If we look at the situation that is probably going to obtain in Canada, we are talking about a 7 per cent federal sales tax and probably less than a 7 per cent provincial tax.

Senator Petten: Not in Newfoundland.

Senator Everett: Not in Newfoundland, but it will not be as egregious as some of the projections I have heard. Certainly in my province of Manitoba you would find that probably the total tax, because it is extended to services from goods, will be in the neighbourhood of 13 per cent. And that has been the average of the VAT throughout the world. I do not, therefore, see the problem with the integration. I think it will take place and I think it will be a good thing. We will have one administration of the tax. My guess is that the tax will be in the neighbourhood of 12 to 15 per cent.

● (1640)

This is an opportunity to have a tax that balances consumption with income and allows a reasonable level of tax throughout the whole system. This keeps us competitive and keeps us from skewing decisions in the wrong direction.

I happen to think that one terrible mistake was made by this government when they got the idea in their minds that this was a revenue-neutral tax. I do not know if they believe that. I recall making a speech last May in which I said that you can call the tax revenue-neutral, but the experience in New Zealand and elsewhere is that far more people registered for the tax than had been assumed. Contrary to what Senator Lawson says, it reduces the incidence of the underground economy; it does not enhance it. That has been the experience throughout the world. It was clear from the outset that this tax might well be revenue-neutral because of the cost of introduction in the first year, although I doubt even that, but certainly in other years it will throw off an increasing and substantial surplus.

Had the Minister of Finance said at the outset that the government was going to put in this tax and use it to reduce the deficit because that is in the best interest of Canadians, it is my contention that many Canadians would have bought that idea and supported it. The change of mind—the idea that it was going to be revenue-neutral, then they were not so sure, then they thought it was going to reduce the deficit—has left Canadians rather confused about the whole issue.

The fact of the matter is that this tax is going to throw off a surplus over the years which should be used to reduce the deficit. I have a problem with Senator Lawson's motion because that is what I want to see happen. I want to see the debt or the deficit reduced. Senator Lawson has used $21 billion as the threshold in his amendment. I wrote a note to him and, if it is all right with you, Senator Lawson, I will read it.

Senator Lawson: Yes.

Senator Everett: I said, "Can you tell me why you used $21 billion as the threshold in your amendment?" He replied, "Research said the cost of payouts under the legislation plus cost of collection make this a realistic threshold." I suspect that the revenues over the year will exceed that. It is clear that they should go towards the deficit. It does not matter whether they go to the debt or the deficit because it amounts to the same thing.

I would have preferred Senator Lawson to say a reduction in the deficit, but he said, "Let us retire the debt." As I have said, that amounts to the same thing. I do not have a problem with that and I do not have much problem with his motion in that regard. I want to see the GST passed because I believe it is the right thing to do, it is the sound thing to do and it is the proper thing to do for Canada. I want to see the GST excess revenues used to reduce the deficit and, perhaps, if it is necessary, to use it to retire the debt.

Senator Castonguay raised a good point. I am not sure that this amendment is even proper in the sense that I do not know that it is within the competence of Parliament to tell the government how to spend its revenues. The Prime Minister has said that any excess revenues will be used to reduce the tax or reduce the deficit. I would be happier if the Minister of Finance said that. It is not that I disbelieve the Prime Minister, but the Minister of Finance is the person who is in charge of fiscal arrangements. If he makes that statement, it is on the record. I would encourage the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask the Minister of Finance before this night is out to make a clear statement on what he is going to do.

I find myself in a dilemma. On the one hand, I am not certain that we should be telling the government how to allocate its revenues; yet, on the other hand, there should be a clear undertaking from the government that they will use the revenues to reduce the deficit.

I do not know how I am going to vote on this amendment. I am going to agonize over it. I invite senators to think about it. I certainly am going to think about it. This does not change my view of the tax. It is an essential tax. I do have a concern as to how effective the amendment will be in ensuring that the excess revenues will be spent to reduce the deficit.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Senator Everett, would you permit a question?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Senator Stewart: Senator Everett has told honourable senators that he wants a clear commitment from the Minister of Finance that any new revenue produced by the proposed tax would be used to reduce the deficit from year to year. I have a problem with his proposal, and my problem has two prongs.

We have had experience with these commitments by ministers as to the meaning that clauses in bills will have. The example that comes to mind at the moment is the very clear undertaking given in 1958 by a Minister of Finance with regard to the use of special warrants. That undertaking was given many years ago. In 1989, however, the government said that they could use the section concerning special warrants according to a black-letter interpretation of the law. How good is a ministerial undertaking?

The second point is this: Presumably at some point the present Minister of Finance will go on to more peaceful things. Conceivably after the next election, the New Democratic Party, the Liberal Party or another party will form a government. How binding will be the commitment made by Mr. Wilson on a Progressive Conservative, New Democrat, Liberal or Reform Party Minister of Finance? Can Senator Everett be satisfied with a commitment from the present minister? Would you rest content with an undertaking from the minister in a matter of such great importance?

Senator Everett: Yes, indeed I would. My reason is this. If this resolution were to pass, then it would mean that the revenues from the GST in excess of $21 billion would be used to reduce the debt. However, if that resulted in a greater deficit, then that deficit would be used to increase the debt. You can pass the resolution but there is no guarantee that anything is going to happen.

A Minister of Finance can say, "I have $5 billion extra revenue from the GST so I will retire $5 billion of the debt." But at the same time, if the deficit goes up by $5 billion, the debt also goes up by that amount. The net result could well be zero.

There is no guarantee of anything happening in this resolution. In many ways it is a motherhood resolution. It is about as useful as the Minister of Fiance saying, "It is my intention to use the excess revenues to reduce the deficit."

I would say one more thing. What is really important in this whole process is the control of program spending. The debt is there and we have to service that debt. We are subject to whatever interest rates obtain at the time. What is important is some sort of undertaking by the Minister of Finance that program spending would go down, or certainly, as it has over the last six years, increase at a rate lower than the rate of inflation. That would really be something worthwhile.

• (1650)

You could put in this language, as is suggested by Senator Lawson's amendment, and it could be overridden by the Minister of Finance. For that reason, I would rather see the Minister of Finance, at this stage, endorse what the Prime Minister said and come out clearly right now and say, "If it would be our intention as a government to reduce the deficit with the excess revenues from the GST." I think if that were done it would be a great step forward.

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I would like to speak briefly to support the amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Waters: I would like to address Senator Castonguay's remarks first, because I think he made a very constructive and important contribution to this debate, but it is postulated on a premise that I find very difficult to accept. The premise is simply this, that you must trust the Prime Minister and the finance minister to do the right thing. That is very difficult for me to accept.

I spoke a few days ago and read out many of the promises made by the finance minister in the House of Commons in November of 1984, and they have all been broken. Those promises were either ignored or broken. So, to rely heavily on a promise from the Prime Minister or the finance minister, or, as Senator Everett is trying to get, the kind of statement would give him some comfort that surplus funds were going to be applied to the deficit or the debt.

I liked Senator Castonguay's remarks. I believe they were constructive and positive, except for the reliance on someone that the Canadian people are not trusting any longer.

When Senator Perrault said that Prime Minister Mulroney's popularity in Alberta was 3 per cent, I was surprised to hear that it is that high. People are not trusting his judgment. That is why to put something like this in legislation is the only way you will give comfort to the taxpayers of this nation, and convince me and many others, that there will be something done if the GST generates surplus funds. Whether it is applied to the deficit or debt, it does not matter, because if one goes down, or the other goes down, those insufferably heavy interest payments are relieved. That is what is going to be coughed up for deficit reduction, and to allow us to maintain the programs we have now.

It would worry me very much if that surplus money—and most people think in time it will be surpluss either through increasing the 7 per cent to 15 per cent, or through some other means—should go into new programs that generate more debt and deficit. That is what Canadian taxpayers are worrying about.

I found Senator Everett's remarks very confusing. I recognize that he is in agony, but he is in agony because he is indecisive. And you are a businessman. You know it does not matter whether you have a deficit this year or a debt that has been built up for 20 years. One moves to the other. In this year, Canada's deficit of $30 billion will move over and become part of that debt of $380 billion. We share those numbers. So you have to tackle one or the other or both. It really does not matter. The interest rates that are csting so much money, in fact the interest rate on the $380 billion which we are servicing, is taking about $42 billion a year. Anything that we do to reduce that helps the program, helps the equation, and helps bring us in fiscal balance.

We do share one thing, Senator Everett, we are very concerned about the debt/deficit. So is Senator Castonguay. So, I think, is every responsible senator. In that sense, we share a lot. I am pleased on that basis that we are sharing it. It is the method of bringing some discipline into the handling of what surplus funds may be generated from the GST that is causing the difference.

Senator Frith: Get it in writing.

Senator Waters: Senator Castonguay believes the Prime Minister when he says "trust me". Frankly, I can't do that.

You are suggesting, Senator Everett, if Mr. Wilson makes a commitment. He has made a commitment to that effect, but as we have just heard, commitments by ministers and Prime Ministers made in the heat of battle, or in the Commons, or for political reasons, don't carry much weight, a year hence, six months hence, and people change, as has been pointed out.

Senator Everett: Senator Waters, so it is clear where I stand on this, I am saying it doesn't matter whether you retire the debt, as Senator Lawson suggests, or whether you have a commitment to reduce the size of the deficit, it comes to the same thing, as you say. My only point is, do we have the right to interfere with the allocation of the government and its budgetary revenues?

Senator Waters: Honourable senators, I don't know if we have the right or not. We have the responsibility. We have seen what is happening when there is no control on expenditures, and no control on taxation. Senator Everett, you may have missed my speech the other night, and I was hoping as an Independent you would be here, but the point has been made that we have had 32 increases in taxation in six years. That is enough. The Canadian people are saying that is enough.

May I just digress for a moment, while the Speaker is in the Chair? Senator Lawson made a comment about the great difficulty of being heard from this corner, and more important, perhaps, of hearing others speak. Very often I cannot hear an honourable senator when he is addressing the house. I might draw to your attention, which Senator Lawson did not do, that I am sitting next to a telephone booth. Those conversations intrude on my sovereignty here in my seat. I am trying to listen to telephone conversations and listen to the profound words of some honourable senator. I don't mind listening to telephone conversations, but I object that this window, which looks like a mirror, is a two-way mirror and they can look out and those behind it are reading all my priceless prose that I am trying to protect. So I suggest, Your Honour, that you might want to do something about that.

Let me just address honourable senators on this side because I do not see how anyone can object to this amendment. It is in harmony with everything we believe in to bring some order in this incredibly debt-ridden government. How can we not support something that suggests surplus funds should go to reducing the deficit/debt? It is worth stressing again that by doing that you indirectly free up a lot of the interest payment money. The government has not suggested how it is going to use that. That is one of the reasons I believe there should be a control on any surplus funds. If the GST produces a flow of surplus dollars, remembering there is also a reduction in interest payments, why not direct how it should be paid until such time as this country is deficit-free and debt-free? Honourable senators, it seems to me that no one can disagree with this as a principle.

● (1700)

If you wanted to have some suspensive date on that, why not take a look at that aspect? Let us make sure that all this increased tax revenue that people are talking about, if it occurs, is directed to the important cause of deficit and debt reduction and not to new, wasteful, spending programs. How can any honourable senator object to such a course of action? It might even help freeze taxes at current levels, and that would be a very positive statement. Current taxes are high enough for all Canadians.

Another point worth mentioning is that the adoption of an amendment of this nature will ease the fears of many taxpayers and many voters in this country who are concerned that the imposition of the GST will allow the government to take its eye off the debt-deficit ball and start looking at new, creative, wasteful spending programs, and we will be much worse off in the long run.

Frankly, I am getting a little tired of the comparisons to VAT and to New Zealand. I do not know how many of you have lived in those countries. I have lived in those countries with VAT. In my experience, without exception, all of those countries are unitary states and VAT was the first imposition of a sales tax. We are not. This is a bicameral country and nine of the ten provinces already have heavy sales taxes. All this will do is double up that tax program. We should be very careful about that. The present tax load is very high. You are suggesting we will make it higher. If we do that, let us put some control on that. The control that Senator Lawson suggests in this amendment, which I think all honourable senators should support, is that surplus funds should go to the number one priority of reducing that deficit.

Senator Perrault made a comment about the art of taxation is to pluck the goose feathers with a minimum of hiss.

Senator Barootes: That is a Liberal art.

Senator Waters: Certainly the Canadian taxpayer is getting well plucked, and I use that expression carefully.

If tax reform, which is one of the government's objectives, is to be meaningful, and if this government is really committed to fiscal sanity and responsibility, then the passage of this amendment will comfort all Canadians; all Canadians from all political parties. They will then believe that there is a specific, sincere dedication to tackling the burden of debt.

As I have stressed so many times, the debt is not only an enormous mortgage on honourable senators, but it also falls on your children, your grandchildren and your great grandchildren. You are imposing this burden on them. It is a mortgage on which we are paying only interest. There are no principal payments being made. This amendment will start the payments of principal. It is extremely important this amendment be passed. I am having some difficulty understanding why the honourable senators on this side are so reluctant to vote for this amendment.

I have one last point I wish to make. The other argument that has not been raised today in relation to this amendment is, in addition to earmarking the surplus funds from the GST to debt reduction, why not talk about trying to freeze it at 7 per cent? All of us on both sides of the house have expressed great concern that the 7 per cent is just the point of the start line and it will become 9 per cent, 10 per cent and 15 per cent. Compounded with the provincial sales taxes, we will be in a very, very serious over-tax situation. We are moving into that situation while Canadians face a recession, a possible depression, jobless rates of record levels, soaring inflation and very high interest rates.

I am delighted Senator Everett raised the point of the Canadian dollar. Not enough attention is being given to the impact of the very high Canadian dollar on the economy. It is one of the most dangerous features of keeping the interest rate high. Our monetary policy is hurting us as well as this inept and irresponsible fiscal policy. I say this over and over again, that the combination of the two are bringing this country to its knees. Nothing will prevent us from sliding down that slippery slope to oblivion, like the Argentinians, like the Mexicans, like the Israelis, like the Germans after World War I.

We are not immune to the inexorable laws of economics. Honourable senators, I urge you to be committed to supporting Senator Lawson's amendment.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I found quite interesting many of the comments made by previous participants in the debate. Possibly I will refer to those comments before I complete my remarks, which are directed principally to this question which has emerged time and time again as to whether the goods and services tax will be revenue neutral, or what impact it will have on revenues. Will it enhance revenues and what impact will it have on the deficit and on debt reduction?

I am pleased that Senator Kelly is in his place because I intend to refer a number of times to his comment; not in any argumentative way but to illustrate the somewhat contradictory signals that have been sent out by the government spokesman and by statistics issued by the government on this question of the revenue impact of the goods and services tax.

Taxes are, of course, meant to raise money. The purpose of the proposed amendment to clause 18 of Bill C-62 is designed to make good use of that money for the purpose of reducing the national debt. That is a worthy objective. It contains a signal which we all appreciate and, for that reason, it is worthy of support.

I do not find the difficulties in the support of this amendment which have been outlined principally by Senator Castonguay. If accepted, what it will do is give a very strong signal of support to the objective of the reduction of the debt and the reduction of the deficit. In my view, these are separate although quite related; but not the same thing, as argued by Senator Everett.

The question I want to ask is whether the government, with the enactment of the goods and services tax, will have more revenue to reduce the deficit. In what circumstances will it have more revenue and in what year? I find it very difficult to give answers to those questions based upon the information that has been made available.

We have been told by the Minister of Finance that the goods and services tax is revenue neutral. At the same time, we have been told that the same tax will make a contribution to deficit reduction. I understand that the Minister of Finance made the first point as recently as September 21, 1990, in a letter addressed to Senator Buckwold. The Minister of Finance stated in that letter that after taking into account the consequential impact of the sales tax reform or the related fiscal actions associated with the GST package, the GST will provide the government with the same level of revenues as the current system. It was not qualified with respect this year next year or subsequent years. I think Senator Buckwold would support that conclusion.

However, and this is where Senator Kelly comes in, I remember that he said in this chamber in May of this year that the GST will not be revenue neutral. He said, "With the GST in place, by 1994 or 95 at current rates of economic growth the government will be in a position to buy back outstanding Treasury bills." I must say that we are not helped in our analysis by the fact that the relevant figures released by the government and upon which we must base any analysis to answer these questions are found in technical documents of August 8, 1989, December 1989 and February 20, 1990 budget papers, a set of documents which are clearly out of date, and acknowledged to be out of date by the Minister of Finance himself, since February 20, 1990. Therefore, my argument is that it is difficult, if not impossible, to answer with any certainty or assurance the question whether the government will have more revenue to reduce the budget deficit.

We know that the February budget papers are clearly out of date. Let me take one illustration from those budget papers. The minister said that growth is expected to rebound in the latter half of 1990 and in 1991. Well, we are currently sinking deeper and deeper into a recession. Obviously, the forecast upon which Mr. Wilson based his prediction of interest rates and GDP growth has implications for the calculation of revenues. So we are working with out-of-date statistics and out-of-date projections that clearly have been overtaken by events since February of this year.

However, let us look at revenue from the federal sales tax. According to the public accounts, the actual revenue figure for the fiscal year 1989-90 was $17.6 billion. For 1990-91 an estimate of $18.5 billion is made in the December 1989 technical paper at page 14, and for the fiscal years 1991-92 and 1992-93, estimates of $16.9 billion and $20.4 billion respectively, given as the cost of eliminating the federal sales tax, were made in this year's budget paper. So we do have the best available source indicating the revenue of the federal sales tax for those fiscal years. I understand that the last two years include miscellaneous excise taxes eliminated by the reform. However, they are not net of federal sales tax rebates which, on the basis of budget paper figures, are estimated by the government to be of the order of $1.1 billion yearly.

Our best estimates of net federal sales tax revenue from FST and excise taxes are therefore $17.8 billion from 1991-92 and $19.3 billion from 1992-93. If I am incorrect in any of my conclusions, I would appreciate it if Senator Kelly would provide me with better figures from a better source. I think what I have are the best that is available and they do set a valuable bench mark for measuring whether the GST is revenue neutral.

Let us look at the forecasts for tax income from the GST that are contained in this year's budget papers. For fiscal year 1991-92, the first full fiscal year under the tax, revenue is expected to be $20.7 billion and for 1992-93, $21.9 billion. These figures are net of rebates to public sector institutions, universities, charities, non-profit institutions and libraries. They are also net of the housing rebate. However, they are not net of GST credited to low income Canadians, estimated at $2.4 billion yearly for fiscal 1991-92 and fiscal 1992-93.

That, however, is not the whole story. We have to deduct from these figures both of the consequential impacts of the tax reform—that is, the administration costs—the indexation impact and the transitional impacts—that is, the FST inventory rebate payments and the small business transitional grants. Once you get this far, you must be wondering, as I am wondering, how you make these comparisons and how do you answer the question accurately and with confidence that I posed at the beginning of my remarks. These further deductions that I have enumerated amount to $2.6 billion in 1991-92 and $1 billion in fiscal 1992-93. Therefore, the net revenue forecast under the GST for 1991-92 is $15.7 billion and for the fiscal year 1991-93 it is $16.5 billion. If we now compare these figures on a revenue forecast for the GST with those for the federal sales tax, we get, with the introduction of the goods and services tax, a revenue reduction of $2.1 billion in the fiscal year 1991-92 and $800 million for the fiscal year 1992-93. I would ask Senator Kelly to correct me if I am wrong. I should point out that all of these calculations are based on figures provided by the government. I have given the government the benefit of the doubt and assumed they were valid figures based on economic assumptions made about one year ago. If they are right, then for the next two fiscal years both the Minister of Finance and Senator Kelly are wrong. The sales tax reform is not revenue neutral. The government will lose revenue with the introduction of the goods and services tax. I think Senator Kelly is also wrong, at least until 1993, when suggesting that the goods and services tax will help to reduce the budget deficit.

My conclusion from an examination of these statistics is that the change-over to the goods and services tax would add $2.9 billion to the deficit over the next two fiscal years. This is the only conclusion that can be supported by the government's own figures. They would look a great deal worse if the economic assumptions were updated. The fact that the change-over to the GST adds $2.1 billion to the deficit in the next fiscal year and $800 million in the following fiscal year had to be—may I use the word—camouflaged by the Minister of Finance. These gaping holes, as it were, had to be plugged; and the way it was done is clear to see if one looks at the statements to which I have been referring.

The Minister of Finance will raise this needed cash to plug the gaping holes by increasing taxation elsewhere and will tie these tax increases to sales tax reform by calling them "related fiscal action". Those who are examining the matter should not be misled by these terms of the art. According to my figures, the Minister of Finance through the introduction of the goods and services tax will be punching a new gaping hole in his budget for the next two fiscal years and will be raising additional revenue to plug it, mostly from income tax and excise taxes.

The new revenue implications were already worked out in the December, 1989 technical paper. The elimination of middle-income tax reduction, the increase in the high income surtax, the increase in the large corporations tax, the elimination of the small business administration fee and the adjustments in product and excise taxes are expected to yield $2.5 billion each fiscal year on a mature system basis. If added revenue from these tax increases is compared with revenue lost in fiscal year 1992-93, because of the adoption of the GST at a $2.5 billion gain against a $800 million loss, there is a net revenue increase of $1.7 billion from related fiscal action, and not from the goods and services tax.

Here, again, the Minister of Finance on the basis of his own economic assumptions is wrong and Senator Kelly is right. The GST, plus the so-called related fiscal actions, are not revenue neutral. They produce a revenue increase of $1.7 billion in fiscal year 1992-93. However, Senator Kelly is also wrong because he tied his remarks to the GST alone, while the plus in terms of revenue comes from other tax increases.

I do not want to be too hard on Senator Kelly.

Senator Frith: He is better than the Minister of Finance.

Senator MacEachen: In all justice to Senator Kelly, his remarks were probably addressed to the medium term. He rightly flagged two factors which may have an impact on goods and services revenue. They are tax evasion and distortions in the economy. As one might expect, no estimate has been released by the government of revenue increases from the reduction of tax evasion. Presumably, tax evasion did occur under the federal sales tax, but almost by definition the consequential revenue loss cannot be documented. So, we do not give Senator Kelly a demerit for his failure to produce an estimate of this. It would, of course, be even more difficult to assess how much evasion could occur under a goods and services tax regime as we have absolutely no experience of it in Canada. I think we might all agree that evasion from indirect taxation will always be difficult to track down, and its intended elimination can hardly provide solid revenue figures for building a fiscal policy.

Senator Kelly talked about the removal of economic distortions by the adoption of the goods and services tax. As far as that is concerned, its scope and its effects can only be judged on the basis of a series of economic assumptions which are affected by the business cycle or the trade cycle. The forecast of $1.3 billion of cumulative revenue gains by 1995 was provided by Finance and Economic Council officials during the Senate hearings on Bill C-63. Spread over four fiscal years, the average is about $325 million per year. This is a rather modest gain, and it would take several years to build up revenue from the goods and services tax on its own to a revenue-neutral position. Therefore, it will take a good number of years for the proposed amendment to become operative. If the government is going to buy back outstanding Treasury bills by 1994 or 1995, all else standing equal—and that has to be the assumption—it will take income and excise tax increases if the GST rate remains at 7 per cent, or it will take a hefty increase in the goods and services tax before these dates.

In his statement of May 1, Senator Kelly wisely referred to current rates of economic growth when making his predictions of GST revenue. That is clearly out of date. We have since entered a period of what economists call negative growth, but what the country knows to be a recession. I believe that the least the government could have done before enacting the GST is to rework entirely its economic assumptions and their effects on goods and services tax revenue.

Honourable senators, I take exception to the fact that in a reply to a letter of August 30, 1990 from Senator Buckwold requesting information on the revenue impact of its fiscal measures, the Minister of Finance in a reply dated September 21, 1990 is referring him to his February budget and the December, 1989 technical papers which have been clearly overtaken by the recession. Thus, it is not possible to answer very definitively the question: Is the goods and services tax revenue neutral? I thought Senator Castonguay stated that revenue reduction would occur in year two of the GST. If he said that, and I may have misheard him, then that, of course, is clearly not supported by what is contained in government documents.

Senator Simard: You have it wrong again.

Senator MacEachen: I am not surprised if a number of honourable senators are somewhat surprised, and perhaps that is not the right word—perhaps bewildered and uncomfortable might be better—by this whole series of comparisons, assumptions and transitional arrangements. I have tried to be very careful in reading my text so that all the figures would be on the record and so that they can be challenged, if necessary, by Senator Kelly. Perhaps in order to assist the subsequent critique by Senator Kelly, I should summarize my main points.

● (1730)

The figures on which I have made my argument and upon which Senator Kelly has made his argument are so outdated as to be almost irrelevant. That is my first point. I believe that the government should revise them in the light of current economic conditions and make the rivesed figures available without delay.

During the initial two fiscal years of the GST, it will produce less net revenue than the federal sales tax, unless the estimates provided by the government are wildly misleading. That is my second point.

The question of the GST being revenue neutral is hardly meaningful in the circumstances, since the revenue implications are blurred and the government has added to the confusion by introducing the concept of related fiscal action.

I submit, honourable senators, if there is one aspect upon which the government should have been clear, and that is the point that has been made so clearly by Senator Waters, it is on the revenue impact of the goods and services tax. What we have is another piece of confusion, and that confusion may be deliberate or it may not be deliberate, but I think that the introduction of the concept of related fiscal action to raise taxes from other sources in order to assert the revenue neutrality of the GST is clearly misleading and ought not to be justified by any spokesman on the other side.

In light of the moving statistics that have been provided by the government and the changing economic circumstances, it is difficult to appraise or assess the impact of the amendment proposed by Senator Lawson. It is for that reason that its import is principally a political one which asserts the importance of using revenues to reduce the debt and decrease the deficit.

I wish to make one or two comments about the amendment itself. Here again, we are working on clearly outdated figures. According to last February's budget, gross goods and services revenue in fiscal year 1991 and 1992 will be $20.7 billion. Beginning with the same fiscal year, Senator Lawson's amendment provides that the excessive revenue over $21 billion will be applied to the retirement of the national debt. Well, of course, we know there will be no excess that year, therefore, no retirement could take place that year. I think it is important to point that out, not to take any exception to the amendment but to analyze the impact of the goods and services tax.

For fiscal year 1992-93 the revenue forecast, according to the budget, is $21.9 billion. Therefore, the excess is $900 million, but this is a gross revenue figure. In order to operate under the goods and services tax, the government has to meet the cost of rebates, of consequential impacts, and of transitional impacts. These total $3.4 billion. That has to do with fiscal year 1992-1993, so do not hold your breath, Senator Everett, that there will be funds available to reduce the deficit in 1992-93, according to the government's statistics and unless my analysis is shot down by Senator Kelly.

Assuming there is a net excess of goods and services tax revenue over $21 billion in some future years, this excess, of course, could reduce the deficit, but only if other expenditures were unchanged and other tax revenues remained precisely the same. It could not happen if tax revenues decreased from other sources. The national debt could be retired in the real world only when the deficit was totally eliminated.

These are some of the implications that arise from the valuable amendment proposed by Senator Lawson, because he has forced us to probe deeply into this question and to separate the fiction from the fact. I think the fact is very uncomfortable for those who see a fiscal rectitude and fiscal nirvana arising from the goods and services tax. It depends on a lot of unknowns which we are incapable of dealing with at the present time.

I listened to Senator Castonguay carefully, and I listened with greater interest to those analytic parts of his speech than to those that were clearly political. I found parts of his speech a tiresome repetition of the clichés we have heard from the government side, not just in this debate, but for some years now. I had hoped that the introduction of new, fresh faces into the Senate would have produced new, fresh thoughts. It is very tiresome, honourable senators, to hear once again that the federal Liberals orchestrated the defeat of Meech Lake. That is tiresome, repetitious and inaccurate. It is a characteristic of this government, and presumably of all its supporters, to take no responsibility for the events over which they have control. Why not take the responsibility for the failure of the Meech Lake Accord?

Senator Simard: We do not have to take the responsibility. You are responsible for it.

Senator MacEachen: Why shift the burden to the federal Liberals who are not in office? You have a tremendous paranoia about the Liberals. That is the first thing to which I take exception. Senator Castonguay made a brave effort in the economic field, having left his comments on Meech Lake, by praising the government for its fiscal actions which, however great, will result in a deficit in the next budget which will be approximately the same as the deficit the Minister of Finance inherited six years ago. That is the fact. Instead of recognizing the inability of the Minister of Finance to deal effectively with the deficit in the past six years and taking his responsibility, he then said, "Think of all the burdens that we inherited from those dreadful Grits." "We have been inept. We have been incapable. After two mandates we have been incapable of doing anything; so we will tell you once again: 'Blame the Liberals'."

• (1740)

May I say that I am not angry at Senator Castonguay. I just thought that, instead of repeating the tiresome, recycled arguments that have been pouring out of the research bureau of the Tory party for the past six years, he would have brought in a fresh idea. I think he was also somewhat unfair to us on this particular debate. He asked us to conciliate the fact that we had to put forward a series of eight amendments which, in one way or another, reduced the revenues to the government or had other financial consequences, with the fact that we are now supporting an amendment which is intended to exercise expenditure control through the management of the deficit and the public debt. Well, I do not think that is difficult. Each of our eight amendments was defeated by the government in a mechanical manner. We had expected that the government would have taken some interest in these amendments, and if it had accepted one of our amendments, the first or the second, I think the future course of this debate would have been entirely different.

The government, however, in each case turned the back of its hand to the Opposition and said, "No". So I say to honourable senators that it is not difficult to conciliate the two things because every one of the Liberal amendments was turned down by the government. There was no contradiction as alleged by Senator Castonguay.

The honourable senator talked about his parliamentary career and I agree that it is a significant and distinguished one. He said he had never heard or seen anything in his parliamentary life such as that which has gone on here in the Senate. Well, I agree with him. I, too, have not seen anything like it either. We are both seeing events that neither of us have ever seen before in the Senate. We at least have that item in common.

I was in the House of Commons when the bells were rung there for how many days?

Senator Fairbairn: Fourteen days.

Senator MacEachen: That was done by a party which Senator Castonguay supports. The government finally responded to the request of the Opposition and broke the energy bill into several parts, which is what Mr. Nielsen wanted. Finally, the government of Mr. Trudeau bent and showed some flexibility.

In this case, the government of Prime Minister Mulroney has shown absolutely no flexibility.

Senator Hastings: "My way or no way!"

Senator MacEachen: Would it not have been possible to have accepted the amendment on reading materials? A similar amendment is now to be adopted by the government of Quebec. Would it not have been possible to accept the amendment on the cooperatives?

Senator Barootes: Why didn't the committee submit some of the amendments?

Senator MacEachen: Would it not have been possible to have supported a number of these amendments? I have been trying for days now to find out from the government what its revenue loss would have been if it had accepted the exemption of reading materials. I have not yet had an answer. I would like to receive it before the debate on this amendment is closed.

I have asked what would be the financial consequences of dealing with cooperatives on a reasonable basis. I have not been told. I doubt whether the financial consequences would have been more than minor. That would have been the impact on the government.

If the government had chosen to be somewhat flexible, I think senators would have seen somewhat different behaviour in the Senate. But the government has been totally inflexible. It has turned a deaf ear to the representations of every single group in Canada. We are trying to give voice to those representations. In the words of Senator Castonguay, it is wrong for us, as an unelected minority, to oppose this bill. But it is all right for him, as a member of the unelected majority, to push it through against the will of the Canadian people. We do not agree with that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Castonguay: If I may, I will just make a brief statement. Senator MacEachen stated that there has been no flexibility on the part of the government respecting the GST. If I remember clearly, when it was first introduced the rate was 9 per cent. In addition to that, food was to have been taxed. If a decrease from 9 to 7 per cent and the elimination of a number of items from the application of this tax are not changes, then I do not know what changes are.

Senator MacEachen: I should like to make a brief statement to the effect that I was arguing about the Liberal amendments. There was absolutely no flexibility shown in all of those weeks of debates on those amendments. I was not going beyond that.

Senator Stollery: The bill was introduced in the Senate and it was said then that the government would accept no amendments.

Senator Barootes: Senator Buckwold did not show any flexibility when he closed debate during the meetings of the banking committee!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, like the fellow said, "Before I begin my speech, there are few things I'd like to say." The first of those is to congratulate Senator Lawson for bringing in a very important amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: Senator Lawson has crystallized the concerns of a lot of Canadians who, in fact, support the tax. They support the tax, as does Senator Everett, according to his statement. We have heard a very brilliant exposé by Senator MacEachen, based on an impeccable source—the Minister of Finance. Every statement that Senator MacEachen made was based on information passed on to me as a result of questions. The answers were signed by Mr. Wilson, and I sent them on to Senator MacEachen. You should be looking at that.

• (1750)

I should like to congratulate Senator Lawson for picking up on the question of the deficit. Let me assure Senator Everett that we all have concerns about the debt. There is no one in this country who does not worry or lose sleep about the level of the debt—not only federal, but provincial and municipal—running into astronomical figures and putting a burden on our children's children. The GST, in the eyes of many, is supported because they feel that eventually, if not immediately, it will be revenue-producing in very large amounts.

Senator Stollery: You are talking about the 20 per cent that support the tax?

Senator Buckwold: Those who quite vocally support it.

Let me read a report from the Canadian Press out of Edmonton. The name mentioned in the report may be familiar to you. It says: "Ottawa should spell out how GST will cut deficit, airline chief says". I will give you the name of the airline chief very soon. It should be quite familiar to the Tory caucus. The article says:

> Canadians must accept the federal goods and services tax in the "short and medium term" and business must stop looking for government handouts if Canada's economy is to survive, the president of Canadian Airlines International said yesterday.
> "If it takes a GST to get the deficit under control, then we should be prepared to live with a GST over the short and medium terms," Rhys Eyton told the annual meeting of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Senator Hastings: What was that name again? Please spell that name.

Senator Buckwold: R-h-y-s.

Senator Lucier: What was the last name?

Senator Buckwold: The last name is E-y-t-o-n. The article goes on to say:

> Following his speech, Eyton said he wasn't sure if it was reasonable to limit the unpopular 7 per cent tax to a specified length of time. But he stressed that a firm commitment was needed from Ottawa that the deficit would fall as a result of new revenues from the levy, which is expected to come into effect Jan. 1.
> "We must urge the federal government to give us a specific statement as to how much of the GST will go into deficit reduction and debt repayment," Eyton said.

Senator Lawson, you could have written those lines, and maybe you did. The fact is that Mr. Eyton has expressed the concern of those large-scale industrialists who, locally sometimes, support the GST because they believe it will reduce the deficit. The committee heard this time and time again. Indeed, our colleague, Senator Kelly, was honest and decent enough, as he always is, to explain in his presentation earlier that deficit reduction is important. If anyone thinks otherwise, why would this government go through the torture it is going through to bring in a tax that is opposed by 85 per cent of the people, and take the kind of beating that it is taking? In the short run, as outlined by Senator MacEachen, it will not bring in extra revenue, but in the long run it will be a gold mine for government.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is now 6 p.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I shall leave the Chair, to return at 8 o'clock.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION TO AMEND—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to advise the Senate that we now have two hours and 15 minutes of debate left on the amendment. This microphone, by the way, is just temporary. I have had complaints that I was not being heard further by all honourable senators. The regular sound system will be fixed.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, now that government senators have all had the opportunity to relax and be well-fed, perhaps you are in a more receptive mood to listen to the words of wisdom that come from this side, especially after they had been so fatigued by the presentation of Senator MacEachen who, I think, startled some our friends across the way.

I had concluded, just before the dinner hour, by confirming what Senator MacEachen had said, that the goods and services tax will, in the very short run, be a revenue-neutral tax, by which the government is going to give away almost as much as it gets. However, as I indicated in my last sentence, no government, of courst, would ever commit that kind of suicide—with such self-inflicted wounds and with such a death wish for the political party—unless there was some light at the end of the tunnel, and that light is a lot of money.

At a recent conference, a Dutch specialist in the value-added tax, whose name is Ben Terra, backed the GST, saying that the government's justification for the GST—namely, that it is fairer than the existing manufacturers' sales tax—is beside the point.

> "A GST-style tax," Terra said, "is the most perfect money machine that there is."

I think that is not a particularly debatable point. As I said earlier, I believe the government, with all its failings, has enough wisdom to realize that as an objective for the difficult time it is having. We all know that the tax rate will continue to rise. I quote again:

> Business people, with very few exceptions, expect the goods and services tax rate to skyrocket over the coming five years, a national survey of more than 2,000 companies found.
> Ninety per cent of the medium- to large-sized companies surveyed for Office Assistance, a Vancouver-based private employment agency, said the rate will rise to more than 11 per cent,— that is the federal rate—

> —while almost one in three—a third of the respondents—

> —expect the rate to rise as high as 20 per cent.
> Only one per cent expect the rate to remain the same or go lower, according to the survey, conducted earlier this year.
> "Call this the cynical factor," said Office Assistance president Barbara Rae. "It's part of the reason behind the very negative feeling companies in Canada have about the GST."

The case I am trying to make, following Senator Lawson, is that, obviously, the tax rate is going to go up, and that, combined with a provincial tax—which, in the eyes of many, will probably in due course have to be melded with the federal tax—will result in tax rates almost immediately, in Newfoundland, of nearly 20 per cent, and that is just the beginning. Other provincial rates will move up steadily as the provinces require additional funds.

So we see pressure for high taxes and higher costs. It was well discussed, when we debated Senator Waters' amendment regarding delaying the implementation of the tax, that this was hardly the time for a new tax because we are in a recession, finally admitted by the always-optimistic Mr. Wilson. Economic conditions in the country have not been worse for a very long period. The outlook is pretty dismal. It may be bad luck, I suppose, for Mr. Wilson, who always seems to bring bad luck to whatever he does, but it just seems to be the wrong time to bring in a tax which, in itself, is inflationary.

If I may, I should like now to discuss the inflationary aspect. That will result in high interest rates, which will then add to the debt and deficit problem. It is a vicious circle.

Senator Murray: How do you like Senator Lawson's amendment?

Senator Buckwold: Can I keep you waiting a little bit, with bated breath?

Senator Murray: I will wait.

Senator Buckwold: It will be very obvious, as we move along to discuss deficit reduction, because we know that interest rates respond to inflation as a result of the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada.

Our committee had appearing before it as a witness, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, John Crow. A report of his appearance was headlined in the Globe and Mail as follows:

> Bank of Canada won't accept GST as excuse for more inflation—Crow.

He went on to point out to the committee that although he was quite prepared to accept the government's anticipated inflation figure of 1.25 per cent, if it went higher than that figure he would have to respond with higher interest rates. Most members of the committee, quite frankly, think that the figure will not be 1.25 per cent—and I will talk about that in due course—because the 1.25 per cent is based on the false presumption that all of the manufacturers' sales tax, the present federal sales tax that is being charged, will disappear overnight; that everyone will just wipe it out, in spite of the policies of the government on inventory rebates and despite all the other difficulties that are being placed on the business community; and that, once it is wiped out, everyone will buy their goods minus the full federal manufacturers' sales tax.

Senator Haidasz: That's not true.

Senator Buckwold: The majority of the committee agreed, but the outlook of the government was that this would be removed from the price of everything in Canada. In addition to that, the premise of 1.25 per cent for an inflation rate was based on the fact that labour would not, in its negotiations for wages in the contracts that were coming up, try—in the words of the government, "selfishly" or "in self interest"—to take more out of the economy by higher wage settlements. We were told that that, of course, was nonsense, that labour wanted to be able to protect itself and tis purchasing power and that, indeed, the GST would be a major factor in wage negotiations, as it has been in contracts that have come up in the last few months. One of the pace setters, which has been copied by other contracts across the country, is reflected in the Financial Post of September 21 where it states, "Ford Deal Reflects Unions' GST Worry". I will not read the whole article but in summary it says that a major factor in developing a final agreement for the contract was a reflection of the cost of the GST on those in the labour force. This contract, along with Air Canada's contract and others, has been an example of the kind of inflationary pressure that will result from the passage of this bill.

● (2010)

As I say, honourable senators, the two basic principles that the government has staked its case on, by way of limiting inflation to 1.5 per cent, was the fact that the manufacturers' sales tax would come off and that labour would not ask for additional financial reward as a consequence of the GST. I submit to you that both of those premises are false; they are unfounded; and they cannot be substantiated. I am sure you will find that out—if and when—and I say "if and when" although I hope not—this tax comes into effect. You will be able to walk into your corner store and see if the prices have suddenly reflected the drop in the manufacturers' sales tax.

Added to that, of course, there is the very basic inflationary effect of a tax on services, a tax which has never before been applied. It will be a tax on the expenses of the average Canadian family which spends 60 per cent of its disposable income on services. If anyone can prove to me that that is not going to be a major inflationary factor, then I will have to admit that I am wrong. But it will be a factor.

Senator Murray has asked: What has this got to do with the deficit?

Senator Murray: No, no.

Senator Buckwold: We have to ask ourselves whether Mr. Crow will live up to his promise that the Bank of Canada will not use the GST as an excuse to increase inflation. He has also warned that his interest-rate policy will, in fact, reflect that by raising interest rates. We have to keep in mind that every time interest rates go up by 1 per cent our deficit increases by $1.7 billion. Honourable senators, that is a pretty shocking figure. Every 1 per cent increase in the bank rate is costing the government of Canada $1.7 billion. That is the reason, of course, the supplementary estimates which were tabled a few days ago, reflect a demand on Canadian taxpayers for an additional $3.5 billion. It is to cover the shortfall the government now faces because of an inadequate prediction of the effect of interest costs on the national debt.

Therefore, I do not think, Senator Murray, that there is any question of a relationship between the GST as an inflationary factor and the response of the Bank of Canada of higher interest rates. This, of course, creates an additional burden on the federal treasury leading to increased deficits. I think that even some of the dullest members of your caucus - and, if you will excuse me, I think you have quite a few - will be able to follow my reasoning.

Honourable senators we need approval by this house of a resolution, an amendment, that says that if we must pass the GST —and I hope we do not—and if there is extra money, which in the eyes of the great majority of Canadians will certainly be there, then, at least, there should be a complete, legal commitment that that extra money, those new funds, which will run into some billions of dollars, will be, by law, directed towards reducing the national debt.

I am sorry Senator Everett is not here, but I would refer to the brilliant speech that you all listened to avidly when I spent two hours telling you why the committee rejected the GST. I am sure you will excuse me for quoting such an authoritative and respected source. At that time I said:

> If the government had told Canadians in a frank and honest way that it needed this money to do something about the deficit, that it could raise $10 billion more than it could with the manufacturers' sales tax, and had committed itself to reducing the deficit, Canadians would have responded. They would have recognized the major problem facing this country and that the government had to do something extraordinary and commit every extra penny that was raised to lowering the deficit.

I think that was a very forthright statement on my part. In that statement I was even able to swallow my disdain for the legislation that we have before us by saying it could be viewed as constituting a response to a national emergency. I even referred, if you will recall, to the war years when businesses and individuals were taxed 100 per cent excess profits tax because of the then state of emergency and, believe me, in my opinion the deficit that we are now facing constitutes an emergency for this country.

We have heard a great deal about consumption versus income tax. Again, I am sorry Senator Everett is not here because he expressed his support for consumption taxes. We have a consumption tax now although it is not a visible or direct one.

I was just mentioning your name, Senator Everett, with respect.

Senator Everett: I am delighted.

Senator Buckwold: Senator Everett indicated his support for consumer taxes. I wanted to put on the record an excerpt from the Financial Post which is entitled "All these nibbles add up to one big bite." When I have finished, Senator Everett, you will find that since the Tory government took over in 1984, they have raised $5 billion extra as a result of personal income taxes. They have also raised $10 billion extra as a result of sales and excise taxes. That is the record. In spite of that and in spite of some government economies, the deficit is still estimated to be in the area of $30 billion. I believe that some people who know about the financial scene would predict that it will be considerably higher than that.

Let me review these tax increases and what they brought in to the government. In terms of personal income taxes, there was the elimination of the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plan in 1985 and the annual revenue amounted to $105 million. There were changes to marital exemptions in 1986 that amounted to $20 million. There was the elimination of the low-income federal tax reduction in 1986 that amounted to $650 million. There were temporary 5-per-cent and 10-per-cent surcharges in 1985 amounting to $500 million. There was also the de-indexation of tax brackets, family allowances and tax credits in 1986 amounting to $635 million. There was a permanent general 3-per-cent surtax—I like that phrase because it is always said to be "temporary"—in 1986 and an extra $1.3 billion went into the government coffers. Family Allowance and Old Age Security clawback, 1989, $500 million. General surtax increased to 5 per cent from 3 per cent—that is that famous temporary surtax—now up to 5 per cent prorated for 1989, a full 5 per cent beginning January 1st, 1990, in 1989 brought in $1.1 billion. High income surtax prorated for 1989, increased to the full 3 per cent on January lst, 1990, in 1989 brought in $165 million. There is an increase in high income surtax to 5 per cent from 3 per cent which will be aplied to basic federal tax over $12,500 instead of $15,000. This move, which it says here is still not law, was made to help fund the cut in the GST rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent. Honourable senators will remember the manipulation that went on in the House of Commons. In 1991 that will bring in $200 million. So if you add all those up, the government has received extra, as a result of higher taxation on personal income tax, $5 billion.

Now, let us get into the Sales and Excise Tax. Federal sales tax, 1984, raised to 10 per cent from 9 per cent, brought in $1 billion; raised to ll per cent from 10 per cent in 1986—it did not take long—$1 billion; raised to 12 per cent from 11 per cent in 1986, $1 billion; raised to 13 and a half per cent from 12 per cent, a revenue in 1989 of $1.6 billion. They have goods and services tax next, 1991.

The increase in the federal sales tax, the manufacturers sales tax, in that four-year period brought into the government $4.6 billion extra—almost as much as all the personal income tax changes. So when Senator Everett says he likes consumer taxes, believe me, he has got his belly full right there, because just the sales tax alone brought in as many billions as all the personal income tax increases, as I have pointed out.

Let us move on to the extensions of the federal sales tax to new items. This is the history of additional federal sales tax. Le tus consider candy, soft drinks, and pet foot, 1985—right from the mouths of little children. Remember the outcry about taxing candies? That brought in $400 million. Snack foods tax, 1987, $60 million; ten per cent tax on long-distance phone calls and cable service, $945 million. Almost one billion dollars came in from that nice little 10 per cent tax on long-distance phone calls and cable services. Phone cable tax raised to 11 per cent from 10 per cent. The very next year that 10 per cent went to 11, and in 1989 that brought in $110 billion.

The government then found another little source of money. It taxed paint, wallpaper, toys and handicrafts. Federal sales tax raised to 12 per cent from 8 per cent. That brought in $60 million—from the kid's toys mostly.

Then, of course, the old favourite, alcohol and tobacco, 1985 first increase, $340 million; second increase, 1986, $150 million; third increase, 1986, same year—they had a double header that year—$70 million; fourth increase, 1988, $175 million. That is the alcohol and tobacco tax. Fifth increase, 1989, $1 billion. No wonder so many of us have given up drinking.

Gasoline taxes, 1985, two cents a litre, $900 million. One cent per litre, 1987, $450 million. One cent per litre, 1987—second one—$450 million. Sales tax equalized for leaded and unleaded, 1987, $30 million. Sales tax again one cent per litre, an additional $450 million in 1988. In 1989, another one cent per litre brought in $320 million. In 1989, a one cent per litre extra on leaded gasoline brought in $35 million; and again, in 1990, another one cent per litre brought in $320 million.

Senator Everett, you like consumer taxes. That brought the government in $10 billion in extra consumer taxes, and the public is paying that tax.

Senator Everett: If honourable senator will permit a question?

Senator Buckwold: Certainly.

Senator Everett: Given that program spending has been for six years held below the rate of inflation and that the deficit in program spending of $16 billion in 1984 is now in this last fiscal year a $9 billion surplus, would he not agree that the real problem is the growth in the public debt that has been caused by the cost of servicing that debt, and would he not agree that it is very important at this time, in the state of the nation, that we take action to reduce that deficit?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you. That is exactly what I have been saying. I do not usually get such a reception from the other side. Agreed. That is the point I am trying to make, that we have a deficit that is not being reduced. It is even increasing—even in spite of the $15 billion of additional taxes—and the answer you have given is because of the interest on the national debt. A good deal of the blame for the high rate is attributed to government fiscal and monetary policy, and has resulted in a high interest regime, steadily in the last two or three years getting even higher, and still dangerously inflated as far as the rate is concerned. It has come down one per cent, one and one quarter per cent, but, as honourable senators know, we are still four or five per cent higher than our American friends, and we have that rate as Senator Everett well knows, because we have to have more money to service the debt. He is the one who pointed that out. We have to bring in foreign capital, and we buy that capital by higher pricing. Those are the kinds of things that snowball, that have created the very problem we are talking about, and the very reason that the deficit is the number one problem, because the interest is eating us up, as any family will tell you.

Senator Everett: Permit one question and I will not ask any more.

Senator Buckwold: You may ask any question you want.

Senator Everett: It seems to me that the high interest rates, as I have tried to describe in my speech, are the result of the deficit, and the quickest way to bring them down is to reduce the deficit, because the deficit is not on account of program spending, it is on account of servicing the debt, and the key to it, it seems to me, is to bring that deficit down, which will bring us lower interest rates—and, as I stated in my speech of October 25th, if we are able to bring the deficit down and enjoy lower interest rates, the deficit will fall even further as Senator Waters has said, as a result of those lower interest rates.

● (2030)

Would you not agree that the important thing is to lower the deficit and that the only clear way to do that at this stage is to increase taxes?

Senator Buckwold: That is what is happening. They are increasing taxes. My whole premise is built on the fact that I hope that this GST does not go through.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Senator Lawson's motion is based on the fact that if the GST does go through, and if it does bring in extra money, the government will take those surplus funds and do exactly what you, in your wisdom, suggest—namely, reduce the deficit. They want that to be in the law. I do think that is too much to ask even members of the government to accept.

It is not too much to say, "There is a law that says that it is absolutely essential to reduce our national debt." If we do not want to burden our children and grandchildren with a load of interest costs that will make life almost unbearable in this country—and if we are to survive financially—then it is absolutely essential to reduce the national debt.

Senator Lawson stated in his amendment that if there are extra funds as a result of the GST, then we want something that the government has never been prepared to put in writing, other than just general statements that it will try to reduce the deficit. I have a feeling that when we start to receive a few extra dollars from the tax, and when we start into the next election, there may be other uses for that money and those surplus funds. They will probably be used to help win a election.

An Hon. Senator: What about byelections?

Senator Buckwold: Yes, for byelections, too. So, Honourable senators, I have given you a reasonably understandable presentation. I am not trying to convince you not to support the GST; we have already gone through that, and we have not made any impression on you at all. I am hoping that those of you who are reasonable, along with those who are part of the large business community that has demanded, begged and cajoled the government to reduce the deficit, should at least latch on to this amendment, which states that if there are funds in surplus over and above the estimate of about $21 billion dollars that is included in Senator Lawson's amendment, those funds should be committed by law to reducing the deficit. If we do not do that, my friends, the deficit will keep growing geometrically almost to the astronomical figure that it is today.

I wish to conclude by saying that if the Tories are as committed to containing inflation as they claim to be; and if they are truly committed to reducing the deficit, then the only sensible alternative to higher interest rates is to contain the goods and services tax, or abandon it, if we want to reduce inflation. But if the bill does pass, at least have the good common sense—as well as the interest of the Canadian public at heart—to accept an amendment which states, "Please, government, if you receive any extra money, make sure that by law it is dedicated to reducing the burden that is bringing us all down, namely, the burden of the national debt."

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I have something to say to the Speaker and to my honourable colleague who has just spoken.

I am in favour of this amendment in principle, but to me it is reminiscent of the Gramm-Rudman bill in the United States Congress whose purport was linked to the congressional system of government, namely, the separation of the executive and congressional powers. There is some doubt as to how effective that has been.

What concerns me now is the constitutional validity of this amendment. Is it appropriate under the Westminster model, where the executive is responsible to the House of Commons and the Senate has constitutional limitations on its powers with respect to its authority over money bills?

I do not want to debate the principle of this amendment or the psychological effect of it, but I should like to hear from some authority as to whether we are now moving into an area that is not appropriate to our present constitutional authority.

Senator Buckwold: Senator Lang, I do not claim to be a constitutional expert. I agree that there could be a debate about the constitutionality of the amendment presented by Senator Lawson. That is possible. In any discussion that I have had that issue has not been raised; but it could be.

I now have a question for you. If you are concerned about that, would you be interested in making an amendment to the amendment?

Senator Lang: Please, god, give me time!

Senator Robichaud: Like half an hour!

An Hon. Senator: I thought you might take that.

Senator Lang: What about two weeks?

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Whether my question should properly be put directly to Senator Everett as opposed to the last speaker, I am not sure; but if that is improper, then I will put it through the last speaker.

Senator Everett, in your questions of Senator Buckwold you made a serious point that the debt is the great problem in this country. I have no difficulty in agreeing with you on that with regard not only to the deficit but also the national debt.

Some of us wonder if there is any way that you yourself can see our overcoming this mountain. You say that it can only be done with more taxes. Taxes in this country have now reached a level where we are close to a tax revolt and almost beyond the point of being able to raise sufficient additional taxes to make any meaningful impact on that debt.

You have to first eliminate the deficit before you even start working on the debt, so you are miles away from it. Rather than that, I would ask you if you would not support the proposition that this government has been totally wrong in maintaining interest rates at these extraordinary levels so as to attract foreign money, the savings of other people, to enable us to live beyond our means, and by doing that, maintaining the dollar at a ridiculously high level, probably not less than ten per cent more than it should be. If you cut out this ridiculous policy of high interest rates, and I know there is an inflationary problem on the side, and got this dollar of ours down, you could increase our exports, reduce our imports, reduce our invisible flow out of this country, reduce the enormous cost to the government of this debt service we have and begin to see some light at the end of the tunnel on this debt without bringing in this goofy tax.

Senator Everett: The honourable senator will perhaps recall a speech I made some time ago, I think in the last year, on the operation of monetary policy. I outlined how I thought monetary policy operated, I think with some correctness. I wondered whether interest rates were being administered, not in connection with a restriction in the growth of the money supply, which is really how one brings the economy to rein as far as inflation is concerned, but rather an administration of interest rates which was designed to keep foreign capital coming in, and because interest rates were high, kept the exchange rate, as you say, perhaps some ten cents over what it should have been in and indeed might well have affected our competitiveness as exporters.

I subsequently came to the conclusion that the high interest rates were really a concomitant of a tight monetary policy, and I have said from the beginning that I thought it was essential that the Bank of Canada maintain a tight rein on the growth of the monetary aggregates in order to bring inflation under control. I never did have any complaint about that. So I came to the conclusion that perhaps in the speech I made in which I speculated about the possibility of administered interest rates, that indeed I was wrong.

What I am arguing now is, I think, based on firmer ground, and that is that because there is a fall-off in demand at the present time, we are in a position to replace foreign borrowing, as you suggest, but we can only replace that foreign borrowing if we have a lower deficit, if we can finance that borrowing on our own. If we can do that, then I think it is possible to lower interest rates and to lower the exchange rates and to enjoy the deficit. However, my premise would be, my argument would be, that we cannot do it unless we lower the deficit. I know we can cast blame around and we can spend a long time doing it, but the fact of the matter is that program spending has been held under control since 1984-85. It has only been 3.6 per cent. There was a deficit of $16 billion on program spending. It is now a surplus in excess of $9 billion. So we have to face the terrible fact that our problem is the outstanding debt.

There may be reasons and we may be able to cast blame, but that doesn't do us any good. We sit here with a $380 billion debt and the only way we can deal with that debt, and get away from the horrid tax of a deficit, is to reduce that deficit. We must do that. How are we going to do that? I would love to see us do it in terms of lowering spending, but I do not see the political will in this country to lower spending. Therefore it becomes essential, albeit that taxes have gone up, to impose a new tax regimen that is utilized to lower the deficit. That is the only option that is left open to this country.

If we do that, if we have the wit to do that, then I think the concomitant, the outflow, the fall-out from that will be that interest rates will drop. We will be less dependent on foreign borrowings and the exchange rate will drop, making us more competitive, albeit within the framework of a reasonably restrictive monetary policy which we cannot give up.

I know a lot of people say to just lower the interest rates. Well, how do you lower the interest rates? You lower the interest rates by putting more money into the economy. If we do that under these circumstances we will just have a return to inflation. We have to find a way of doing it, honourable senators, without a return to inflation.

I am not talking about something I particularly enjoy or love or want to suggest. I am saying that we are in a position where we have to do it. We have no alternative. If we ignore this help, if we ignore this tax, we are just going to be at this business, only on a worse threshold, in about three or four or five years time.

Senator van Roggen: I take it from the honourable senator's answer to my question, and I do not want to get into a further debate with him, that he fully accepts the fact that the government was talking rubbish when it said this thing was revenue neutral and indeed it is designed to provide more revenue to the government so as to reduce the deficit.

Senator Everett: I sincerely hope, despite what the Leader of the Opposition says, that it is not revenue neutral and that there is an income from it and we reduce the deficit. That is what I hope and that is why I am in favour of the tax.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, at this time, I too would like to take part in the debate.

[English]

But first I want to congratulate the leadership of our party in the Senate for having gone to great lengths to ensure that the Independents are heard and are given an opportunity to present amendments. It is a well-known fact that that was the wish of all members on our side and it has been our wish for a long time.

Senator Frith: If you can say that with a straight face, it's a marvel.

Senator Simard: Senator Doody, Senator Phillips and Senator Murray, congratulations. We are very proud of the work you have done. We are particularly proud of the enlightenment you have shown.

Senator Frith: You are proud of the Chairman, too, and proud of the Speaker?

Senator Simard: As far as I am concerned, I am proud to be a Progressive Conservative Member of this House—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hastings: We want you to know that we are proud you are, too.

Senator Simard: —because obviously we are the only party that tells the truth—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: —who have the courage to present unpopular, but fair and necessary legislation.

Senator Frith: You've got to be our best stand-up comic, no question about it. At least you smile just a touch.

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Simard: I would like to begin the 15 minutes alloted to me by reading a statement made by the current leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, Jean Chrétien. It is dated April 3, 1979 and was reported in La Presse.

> It is easy to make massive tax cuts when one is not in power. When the opposition makes cuts, it has no effect on government revenues. Talk is cheap. Promises such as these are popular because no one likes to pay taxes.

This is exactly what those opposite have tried to dish up, promises and possible exemptions to Bill c-62. These promises don't cost much when you're in opposition.

Honourable Senators, since I come from New Brunswick and have a duty to represent the citizens of my district, my region and my province, I would like to read you a letter. I am authorized to do so because it is a public document a copy of which was sent to all New Brunswick senators, not to mention to all senators from Atlantic Canada. The letter is from the Clark, Chevrolet, Oldsmobile, Cadillac Company.

• (2050)

[English]

It is the oldest Chevrolet dealer in Canada. It is signed by John T. Clark of Fredericton. His grandfather was the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, and his father was an active supporter of the Liberal Party, both provincially and nationally. John T. Clark has proven to be one of the best businessmen in New Brunswick. I see Senator McElman in the gallery, and I am sure he will testify to that. So this is a letter sent by John T. Clark to the Honourable Jean Chrétien dated November 19, 1990. I quote:

> Dear Mr. Chrétien;
> I am writing to you to urge the Liberal Party of Canada to cease blockage of Bill C-62 in the Senate to allow passage of the Goods and Services Tax as soon as possible.
> As you are aware, the economy is softening considerably. New vehicle sales are down almost 10 per cent from last year, and industry sales are down almost 15 per cent over the last thirty days, compared to last year. As a small business person, employing 160 people in my Dealership(s), it is absolutely critical that I have some certainty of the economic environment over the coming months, so that I can plan inventories and staffing levels to continue to operate through this unstable period.
> I have already begun planning for the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax on January 1, 1991. I have invested in systems upgrades, revised business forms, and undertaken education and training of my staff. I have reduced inventories and advised consumers that the prices of vehicles will decrease after the implementation of the GST to help them plan their purchases. Many of my business customers are deferring purchasing or leasing new vehicles until after January 1, 1991. I have ordered significant inventories to meet the anticipated demand in January for these vehicles, which will involve substantial carrying costs if the GST is deferred. Further delay in the passage of the Goods and Services Tax will cause serious dislocation in the automotive market and has serious negative implications for my business, and for my employees.

I urge you to allow immediate passage of the Goods and Services Tax.

Yours sincerely,

John T. Clark,
PRESIDENT

That is what one New Brunsick man is telling us, telling Jean Chrétien and telling you people. He is one of several hundred thousand people in Canada who are facing the same problem due to the uncertainty you are maintaining. I thought I would read that as my kick-off.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: At this time, I would like to say a few words about my colleague, Senator Claude Castonguay. Better than anyone else in this House, given his parliamentary career, his business experience and his prestigious standing in Quebec, he has shown his commitment and the serious thought given to this issue. Better than anyone else in this House, he is able to see the positive side of Bill C-62 and to support the amendment before us. Thank you, Senator Castonguay.

Therefore, I won't have to go on at length about the potential impact of this amendment. I will, however, refer to it on occasion. At this stage in the debate, and it's important to do so at the close of the period reserved for amendments, I would like to share with you some of my impressions. I would just like to describe a few incidents and make a few comments about the actions of those opposite and other statements that were made in this Chamber, either by the independents or by other persons.

As far as the amendment is concerned, I think that if we had a lot of time, if the purpose was clear on this side of the Chamber and if it responded to a need oft-expressed by Canadians, namely that this bill be in effect by January 1, I imagine we could ask the Speaker of this House to rule on the relevancy of this amendment. Clearly, this would take many days and time is a luxury we don't have. Even if this amendment was found to be relevant, and since we don't have time to get the Speaker's opinion, I think it's a bad amendment. It's an incomplete amendment. It was drafted not for the serious reasons claimed, but rather for partisan and political purposes. It's a smokescreen, but let's not talk about that, since the 112 senators in this Chamber all want, to varying degrees, to reduce the deficit.

Apparently, the Liberals are a little less anxious to do so. That's obvious because each time a measure is announced in this House to bring down the deficit, our friends opposite have criticized it, voted against it, dismissed it, and even travelled across Canada to share their feelings with Canadians. In the National Finance Committee, none other than Senator Marsden and her other colleagues seized every opportunity to pity the lot . . .

Hon. Jacques Hébert: We were defending women and the poor!

Senator Simard: They agreed with the presentations of witnesses who invariably asked for more money for one sector or another. That's one thing we're going to have to consider after the Christmas break, when the committees will be reconstituted and when the majority will have taken its place so that, in light of the debate today and the spirit of the amendment, we can truly get down to the job of attacking the deficit and supporting the government instead of—as the National Finance Committee and its Liberal majority have done for the past six years—seizing every opportunity to spend more money. I think we are going to want to do the reverse, but we'll come to that later.

The amendment is somewhat similar to California's Proposition 13, and to the U.S. federal Graham Rothman Act, in that in both instances, these measures were introduced to control expenditures, revenues and the deficit.

To my knowledge, it has not been really successful, even in California, and even less so at the federal level.

• (2100)

[English]

I think, as Senator Castonguay told us this afternoon, any measure that imposes tax and expenditure limits introduces great inflexibility in governmental fiscal decisions and prevents rational consideration of revenue and expenditure options. Budgetary procedures can be improved without imposing arbitrary limits on tax and expenditure policies. I think our government has demonstrated great competence. Senator Everett agreed with me twice today, first this afternoon and then in answer to a question from Senator van Roggen, when he said that, yes, the government has done a fair job by limiting its growth to around 3.6 per cent since 1984. Of course, we are going to have to do more, and we can do more.

Let us hope that once this debate is over, we will have new converts—true converts—to the fight against the deficit. I am trying to enlist the support of Senator Perrault and Senator Frith, and of all those who will speak in this debate before Christmas comes. I hope you will tell the world that you are now converted to the fight against the deficit.

What Senator Lawson is trying to tell us, here on November 28, is that we should be flying by the seat of our pants in the legislature here, without having done any serious work on the implications of such an amendment. You cannot be serious, Senator Lawson. Let us take the time to do it. Let us agree that a better job has to be done and let us do it right. I do not think that we could do it in one piece of legislation. I think that we will have to do it using all the fiscal legislation. What is the use of applying the surplus revenue that will come in from Bill C-62 when other legislation will be boosting tax rates and the money thus received will be spent on programs? You have to think things through, Senator Lawson. Perhaps, after Christmas, you and I, in a more peaceful atmosphere, could do a better job. That is what I have to say on the amendment.

We do not want to lose the support of the Independents. I think we know who our friends are and I think the nation will be grateful to the three senators who have almost consistently indicated that they will support this legislation. To those independent senators, I say thank you on behalf of Canadians. To you, Senator Lawson, and to you, Senator Waters, I say that I hope that, in the next few hours—

Senator Frith: The amendment will carry?

Senator Simard: —once we have had a good, orderly debate on third reading, after the amendments are behind us, perhaps you will see the light, too—

Senator Frith: Don't hold your breath!

Senator Simard: —and support this legislation. As Senator Castonguay said this afternoon, now that the rights of the minorities have been protected, let us make sure that the rights of the majority—the rights of Canadians through the majority in the Senate—will be upheld so that this legislation will pass.

When I rose earlier, I said it was with some trepidation. Senator Robertson will remember the first words I used in my first speech in the legislature of New Brunswick some 20 years ago when I was tabling my first budget. I also said that I rose with great trepidation. Of course today it is for different reasons. I know it is late, and I know I will not be popular rising at 9:00 or 9:30 when senators have made other plans, but who said it was easy to be in politics? Who said you could be popular all the time? After all, this piece of legislation is not very popular. Why should I be more popular than the tax? I am going to finish the job.

An Hon. Senator: Resign!

Senator Fairbairn: And repent!

Senator Simard: Perhaps one should ask why we are at 14 per cent in the polls. I have the answer to that, Senator MacEachen. We used some courage and introduced the GST legislation. Unlike you and Jean Chrétien before you and Marc Lalonde after you, we did not merely talk about reforming consumer taxation. We reformed the taxation system.

Senator Perrault: You decided to sock it to the taxpayers!

Senator Simard: We are doing it and we are explaining it. It is not popular. It says that much in the book I have on Jean Chrétien here. However, we will come back to that some time.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Simard: You may ask why, but I do not have to ask myself too many questions as to why we are only at 14 per cent. It is because the Prime Minister and his government assumed leadership, both in the fields of constitutional reform and taxation reform. Yes, some votes have temporarily gone to the Bloc Québecois and the Reform Party of Canada. Some may even have gone to the NDP, as usually happens between elections, but there will come a time when people will see that this party is the only party that has the courage to stand up and fight for the rights of Canadians and fight for things that are unpopular.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: Don't start celebrating yet! I don't think Jean Chrétien should hire his moving van yet!

Senator Perrault: Why didn't you run against him?

• (2110)

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, there is another question that has to be answered, not so much by us but by the Liberals, including Liberal senators.

Senator Perrault: Why doesn't the Prime Minister resign?

Senator Simard: Why has the popularity of their leader gone down by over 20 per cent in the polls since June when the leadership convention was held? They have not made one decision. The Liberals have been skating around unable to condone the action of Liberal senators.

Senator Perrault: Are you speaking to the bill?

Senator Simard: Mr. Chrétien refused to predict what his budget speech will be in 1993 and refused to say anything against this tax. But then, in the next week, we hear him saying, "We will axe the tax."

Senator Perrault: No such thing. Don't distort the record.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, in the past when new leaders of national parties are selected they usually enjoy a 6-or 9-month honeymoon, but that is not the case with their leader.

Senator Perrault: You are totally irrelevant.

Senator Simard: I just wanted to give you some food for thought.

Naturally, honourable senators, I will vote against this amendment.

Senator Perrault: Surprise!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh!

Senator Perrault: We have been awaiting your decision.

Senator Simard: At least, in Senator Everett there is one person on the other side that thinks things through. I will vote against this amendment, but once this debate is over I will introduce a personal resolution in this house which I hope will find the support of all members of this house. I will pray that the government will continue to consider that the additional revenues to the government as a result of the passage of Bill C-62 shall be applied to the deficit.

Senator Stewart: So you really doubt it.

Senator Simard: No. I am hoping that you people will, for once, be serious and join with us and with the Independents in expressing this desire—a desire that has been expressed by many Canadians who have expressed their dislike for the tax. If they knew that any additional revenue would reduce the deficit they might be supportive of it. I will test you.

Honourable senators, we can accept the word of the Prime Minister. His word is good. We will give him extra encouragement to use the additional revenue to reduce the deficit. I hope you people do not change your minds.

Honourable senators, I could go on and give you a course in history as Senator Fairbairn did last night. Of course, I am referring to the future deputy leader, Senator Fairbairn. She gave us all the details of the process that led to Senator Waters coming to this house. She had her own conclusions. She had it all figured out. Senator Waters was not present but the record of the house will show that Senator Fairbairn is the best promoter he has in this house, if not the only one.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: She said she pleaded with Senator Murray to persuade the Prime Minister to appoint him.

Senator Thériault: Will he follow Maggie?

Senator Simard: I am sure Senator Waters can stand up and tell us what the Reform Party will do. He has talked about the deficit and the need to control it, but he has not told us anything which would indicate whether he agrees or disagrees with the official stand of his party which is to cut all social programs by 15 per cent across the board. Senator Waters failed the test last night.

Senator Perrault: Are you going to pelt him with marshmallows?

Senator Simard: I have heard some people say that we have to be careful with Independents. I am not terribly concerned about these two senators because we know that they have been siding with the Liberals from day one and that they will until doomsday. I do not have to be too careful in what I say about Senator Lawson.

I travelled with my colleague, Senator Buckwold, from coast to coast.

Senator Buckwold: How could you do that?

Senator Simard: We heard from the NDP-inspired group and we probably heard from Senator Lawson's unions too. The memberships of those unions were not concerned about deficit control; they kept asking—like most union groups in Canada do—for more money, more exemptions and lower taxes. How come Senator Lawson's tune is so different? Is he also a new convert to the concept of controlling the deficit? Perhaps he would like to elaborate on his tax reforms.

Honourable senators, I have here a document which I will table in order to save time. This document indicates that, as a result of the measures introduced to income tax legislation, in 1988 people earning less than $15,000 paid 61.9 per cent less income tax than they paid in 1987. Those in the $15,000-to $30,000-range paid 12.8 per cent less in 1988 than in 1987. It also shows that those in the $30,000-to $50,000-bracket paid 4.3 less in 1988 than in 1987. We hear mention of "progressivity" and this is what these figures indicate. We have a progressive taxation system and now, with Bill C-62, we are making our taxation system even more progressive.

Senator Frith: Boo!

Senator Simard: In the $50,000-to $100,000-range—and possibly a number of us are in that group—16.2 per cent more was paid in 1988 than in 1987. This is what progressivity in taxation is all about.

Senator MacEachen: Where is Kelly?

Senator Frith: We want Kelly.

Senator Simard: Those earning $100,000 or more paid 21.9 per cent more in 1988 as compared to 1987.

Honourable senators, we have no lesson to learn from Senator MacEachen. We know that he is devastated because he has lost his majority.

Senator Frith: We have had enough of Simard, let's have Kelly.

Senator Simard: Senator MacEachen is no longer the Minister of Finance and he is no longer in a position to influence the government. We know he is devastated, but there is nothing he can do about it. He will have to bide his time and possibly make other plans.

Honourable senators, when it comes to progressivity in taxation, we have progressive taxation. Senator Claude Castonguay, you don't have to take a lesson from Professor MacEachen like he tried to lecture you this afternoon.

Senator Frith: You find that reassuring, senator.

Senator Simard: Because we know what you did in Quebec. As we know what he did in Ottawa, and I am telling you, Senator Castonguay, I will take your record ten times over. So let's get on with third reading. Let's get on with an orderly debate. Put an end to this filibustering so that John Clark, the Liberal organizer, Liberal backbencher from New Brunswick, who employs 160 people in his car dealership in New Brunswick, can get on and sell cars, make money and pay taxes. This is what the John Clarks of the world are asking, Senator MacEachen. So, please get on with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Take it easy. Don't oversell. Senator Tarzan has spoken. We have Senator Tarzan here now, an answer to Michael Heseltine.

Senator Simard: That is what people say. Take care.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I hate to break into the enthusiasm which followed Senator Simard's speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: I think a good deal of the enthusiasm on our side was for his sitting down rather than the words he used.

Senator Frith: You got the right part. We were applauding anyway.

Senator Austin: I have only a few words which I hope will be orderly, civil and cogent in winding up the debate on this side.

First of all, I do join with Senator Simard on one thing, and that is a welcome to our former colleague, Senator McElman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: And also to Mrs. McElman.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: For those senators who were appointed to this chamber, or elevated to this chamber after Senator McElman's retirement, I want to say that they missed the wisdom, stability and support of a colleague who was available to all members of the house. He was one of our finest colleagues and his retirement saddened our side of the house, and I think all parts of the house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Austin: It is good to see him well. I am sure that he is following this debate.

Senator Hastings: He is sorry he left. He sees Maurice here.

Senator Austin: I certainly imagined that if Senator McElman was on the floor with us, Senator Simard would have received a quiet softening of words and direction, but I don't want to say to Senator Simard that I don't enjoy his enthusiasm and the energy he brings to our debate. That part of it I enjoy.

Senator Simard: May I interject?

You referred to the possibility of Senator McElman being on the floor of this house with us when I spoke earlier.

Senator Austin: I said I wish he were here.

Senator Simard: I can tell you, senator, that if Senator McElman had been here two months ago, in that period from September 25 throughout October and November, he would not have put up with you people. He respected this house much too much to have allowed allow you to participate like you did and make a mockery of this house.

Senator Frith: He respected the rules which you don't.

Senator Austin: Charlie, I told you you should not have left.

Honourable senators, we are indebted to Senator Lawson for the amendment which is before us. We are indebted in a number of ways. Specifically, I would say to you, Senator Lawson, that you have given this chamber the opportunity to debate the question of the deficit, and we have heard some very valuable debate as a result of the submission you put before us.

I particularly found useful and helpful the comments which were made by Senator Everett, specifically on the question of the deficit. Senator Everett takes a logical view and one which reflects good, solid economic training. The problem, however, is that in one real sense the comments made by Senator Everett missed the point, and the sense is not so much in the economic dimension but in the question of the Canadian Polity, the impact of economic suggestion on the community, and I am sure that Senator Everett recognizes that this is the case.

Honourable senators, we cannot run our economy in a theoretical way and we cannot run our economy in a way which is not one which is understood and accepted by the Canadian people. I would say to you, Senator Everett, that the government has failed in one of its principal missions, and that is to be candid with the Canadian people as to the nature of the economic problems which Canada is facing. I say—and I have said this previously on Bill C-62—that this failure by the government to make known the economic problems with which it is dealing and to explain its full purposes and intentions to the Canadian people have given rise to a very serious and fundamental want of credibility on the part of the government. That want of credibility runs through all proposals made by the government. It runs directly to the standing of the government in the polls and to the rejection of the Prime Minister.

Will any of us forget the very famous secret memorandum that the government had with respect to the free trade arrangement, which appeared in the press and which could not be denied by the government, which basically said that we should not debate the real issues of free trade because the people of Canada will become alarmed; we must govern not in fairness, openness and candour with the people of Canada, but secretly, behind their backs, telling them as little as possible about the public issues of today so that we can get these remedies imposed on the Canadian people.

Well, honourable senators, these are not the standards of government which are acceptable to the Canadian people, and the standing of the government in the polls demonstrates that that is the case.

On that basis, Senator Everett, if indeed you are backing the GST—you have been careful not to go the full distance—I think you are backing a measure on the same terms if you support this GST as this government is putting it to the people. It is pulling a bag over the heads of Canadians as to what is really going on. At least you have put on the record—and this is to your credit—the serious problem that relates to the deficit and foreign borrowings to deal with the deficit, which is now up to 28 per cent of our total foreign debt and rising. This becomes a serious obligation on the Canadian economy. But I suggest to you, Senator Everett, that this bill by the government is not the way to deal with the problem. It fails entirely on process, as did Meech Lake and, in my opinion, free trade.

● (2130)

Senator Castonguay put the weight of his argument with respect to the GST entirely on the creditability of the Prime Minister and his undertaking that if there were a surplus it would either reduce the rate of the GST or go to pay down the deficit.

I do not know, Senator Castonguay, whether you were in Edmonton when the Prime Minister was there in November. I was not there, but I have to rely on an editorial that appeared in The Edmonton Journal the next day. You referred to the Prime Minister's speech on November 14. I propose reading an editorial that appeared in the Edmonton Journal on November 15, 1990. I shall quote it extensively because of your remark and the significance of your conviction in the total argument that you gave us. The editorial is headed "Mulroney taxes logic," and it states:

> It's commendable that the prime minister intends to pay down the deficit, should there be any windfall revenue from the goods and services tax. Cutting Canada's enormous debt down to size is perhaps the only good reason to introduce a broadly-based consumption tax.
> Finance Minister Michael Wilson long ago dropped the pretence that the GST is part of "revenue neutral" tax reform, that it is in fact an important tool in deficit reduction.
> Now Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is reinforcing that point.
> Or is he?
> In speeches in Edmonton, and on an open-line radio show on Wednesday, Mulroney gave contradictory and confusing answers—perhaps showing once again why his credibility is in question.
> He repeated that the GST wouldn't cost Albertans a nickel more than existing sales taxes do. That implies that the tax is revenue neutral. He said the GST would be used to pay down the deficit if—and only if—it brought in more money than the current federal tax.
> But if the GST won't bring in any more money, why would it even be remotely possible that it could be used to pay off the debt? Why would Mulroney falsely raise Canadians' expectations, by saying a GST windfall might also be used to reduce the rate of the consumption tax?
> Either it's revenue neutral or it's not. Is Wilson right, or is Mulroney? We'll find out once the tax is paid. Yet the prime minister is trying to get political capital out of both scenarios. Is it any wonder Canadians tend to disbelieve him?
> When the GST was introduced, it stood at nine per cent. It was then cut to seven per cent, and Wilson warned that Canadians would have to pay somehow to make up for "lost" revenue of the tax cut.
> But now, Mulroney says a seven per cent GST is revenue neutral. Did Ottawa miraculously find the "lost" revenue of the nine per cent tax somewhere else?
> And it is irresponsible of Mulroney to talk about deficit reduction and a cut in the GST rate in the same breath.
> The debt is so huge that it would take a big jump in the GST to start paying off the accumulated deficit of governments past. There is no way that a "modest or even large windfall" can both pay off the debt and lead to a reduced rate. Mulroney, of course, doesn't say he'll do both. He says he'll do either of these things if there's more money.
> We should know which course he will choose. The two goals are not complementary.
> And Canadians should remember the experience of other countries: everywhere else, similar taxes have risen, not fallen. In some countries, there is a progressive sales tax: low on staples, high on luxury goods.
> If Mulroney wants to be credible in using the GST to cut the deficit, let him do it in legislation. Let him establish a special deficit reduction tax, to be levied for a specified number of years, and lifted when the debt is down to manageable size.
> Without that, his pronouncements amount to clever words games that can be read any number of ways.

I read the whole article, honourable senators, to show the reaction of an important newspaper, which rarely supports the Liberal side, to the Prime Minister's credibility. I read that particularly because Senator Castonguay said that the Prime Minister could be trusted when he gives an undertaking to reduce the deficit with the windfall; and to you, Senator Everett, when you say that the Prime Minister can be trusted when he says two completely contradictory things about his intentions and Mr. Wilson says a third.

I do not think the undertakings of either the Prime Minister or Mr. Wilson are credible in Canada today. Senator Lawson is making a valid amendment when he asks that the legislation be changed so that the earnestness of the government with respect to the deficit and any windfall be demonstrated. It is for the government to demonstrate that earnestness.

But if the government defeats the amendment, Senator Lawson, they are simply equivocating in the same way that the Prime Minister did before. That is all the defeat of the amendment will demonstrate, namely, that equivocation.

Honourable Senators, I will not keep you long, although I could. I have a great deal of material and there is a lot that I would like to say about the GST, but I will refrain until we come to the third reading debate, when I hope to have an opportunity to address the chamber.

There is one point made by Senator Castonguay that I find amazing from a man who has had considerable legislative experience. Senator Castonguay spoke of senators having an obligation to vote. Indeed, at some time a vote is part of our legislative process. But what is this obligation to vote that Senator Castonguay is talking about? Voting is not our primary purpose as legislators. It is our role to consider matters of public importance and in so doing to assist the public in understanding the nature of those matters of public importance. But our real role as legislators is to inform the public. We do that by debate. At times we do that by debate at length so that the public will know what issues are at stake and who the winners and losers are in the legislation imposed on the country.

Honourable senators on both sides of the house will accept the fact that this is one of the most technical, complex and difficult to understand pieces of legislation that has ever been before this legislative chamber and the other place. I cannot imagine the hurry if we are dealing thoughtfully with this type of legislation. I cannot imagine the hurry when we are taking a tax of about $20 billion additional dollars from the pockets of the Canadian people.

Senator Perrault: That is right. Do not rush it through!

Senator Austin: I cannot understand why the government has done such a poor job of explaining to the Canadian people what the role of this tax is, what its purpose is and what its impact is.

I end up where I began, honourable senators. Governing is not the business of economics or economists. Of course economics is significant, but governing is the art of social relations. Government is holding this country together and maintaining the optimism of people in the future of this country. Slamming the brakes on the economy, which this bill does, will diminish and in many cases destroy the optimism of many Canadians.

Honourable senators, there are some Canadians who are concerned about the deficit and would like to see it worked down in the immediate future. If there is a surplus, then, yes, by all means let it go to reduce the deficit.

I will support the amendment but I will not support the legislation; and I will speak about my failure to support the legislation at a later time.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: If I might have a few minutes, I would like to make a couple of corrections and provide clarification for the benefit of Senator Everett who raised the issue, as did Senator Castonguay, about whether this was a proper amendment to be before us. I think that has been answered. It would be highly improper to have a six-hour debate on a motion that was not properly before us. If it were not properly before us, there would have been a point of order and challenges, and so on. Therefore, it goes without saying that it is a proper amendment.

I want to draw to the attention of Senator Everett that when Senator Waters and I had all these negotiations with representatives of the government, they assured us that when the eight original amendments were put forward by the Liberals, that we as Independents did have the right to make sub-amendments. I can only assume that it flows from that that you, senator, would have the right to propose a sub-amendment to my amendment. If the threshold troubles you, if you would rather have the word "deficit" instead of "debt," or some combination thereof, I welcome you to jump on board and make a sub-amendment. I have no problem with that. You are welcome to do that.

The other point is that you made reference to what I had to say about business and write-offs and taxation, and so on, and you somehow took me off to 98 per cent, as they do in England. I said no such thing. I was talking about fairness and I was talking about these hundred and some thousand corporations who made billions of dollars and paid no tax. I am not talking about 98 per cent or 58 per cent; I am talking about something fair, 20 per cent, similar to what happens in the United States. It would be fair and it would be competitive. The others who paid a total of 17.7 per cent should pay 20 per cent. I am talking about something fair and reasonable, not a hundred and some thousand corporations making billions of dollars and escaping without paying any tax whatsoever.

Senator Castonguay spoke about the reference to the Gramm-Rudman legislation which mandates these kinds of cuts, and suggested it was inefficient. On the contrary, as we witnessed each year with Gramm-Rudman, it is very efficient and very effective. To suggest that it is inefficient is to suggest that democracy is inefficient.

I do not think this is so complex. It is a simple amendment. It has simple directions as to what is to be achieved. If Senator Simard is concerned that we need more time to work this thing out, he should have voted for Senator Waters' amendment yesterday. He had all year to deal with it.

The only other correction I wish to make, because I know we are in the final hour, is that Senator Perrault raised the issue of what is happening along the border with the threat of competition from the United States. It is true. I live very close to the border and there is a multi-million dollar shopping centre created with all the advertising aimed into British Columbia, looking for British Columbia business. However, in my little community of Mount Lehmen, Clearbrook, which is a strongly religious community, we have resisted Sunday shopping for years. We have not allowed it. But just recently for the first time they approved Sunday shopping, and the consensus was that the reason for this was the threat of competition from the United States and the fear and uncertainty as to what the GST would do to them. So not only are we changing the way we do business, we are changing the way we live, our way of life in that community.

The final point I want to make is directed to Senator Simard, who made an incorrect statement when he said that we were committed to support the liberals originally until doomsday. In the years before Senator Simard was here—I have been here 20 years—on those rare occasions when the Conservatives were in a correct position, I voted with them. It did not happen very often, but that is your fault. The only other thing I wanted to say is that Senator Simard was looking at me when he asked rhetorically why we are at 14 per cent. The only explanation I can offer is that 12 per cent is already taken by the Reform Party and 13 per cent is being saved for you if you pass the GST.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators', it has been moved by Senator Edward M. Lawson, seconded by Senator Stan Waters:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to require that the excess revenues derived from the goods and services tax be applied to reduce the public debt of Canada, by adding on page 278, immediately after line 27, the following new clause and renumbering the subsequent clauses of the Bill accordingly:

Application of excess revenues

"18. Beginning with the fiscal year that ends on March 31, 1992, such of the revenues derived under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act in each fiscal year as exceed 21 thousand million dollars shall be applied forthwith to the purchase for cancellation of securities of Canada within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the "Nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to Provincial Rule P-3(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 29, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the leadership has had a discussion about the procedure today respecting the order paper. In order to facilitate the schedule of Senator Murray, I understand there is an agreement to stand the Presentation of Petitions for now and to proceed to Question Period. Following Question Period at approximately 3:15 or thereabouts we will revert to presentation of petitions. I believe that is the general agreement.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes, honourable senators, it is. We have discussed that. However, there is one blip—and I do not mean that in any pejorative sense. Senator Haidasz asked me earlier whether there would be an occasion for him to raise a question of privilege. I told him that normally that would be done at the beginning of the sitting. Since then I have had discussions about proceeding with Question Period first in order to accommodate the schedule of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, after which we will proceed to Presentation of Petitions.

That is the only slight variation and I think we should proceed as agreed. Senator Haidasz has agreed that he will then raise the question he wants to raise at the end of Question Period and before Presentation of Petitions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION—PRESENTATION IN SENATE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask Senator Murray whether he has given any consideration to presenting to the Senate the resolution on the Gulf crisis which was debated in the House of Commons yesterday. That would give us an opportunity to express our views and reach a conclusion in this body on that resolution.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must confess that I had not given consideration to that due to the fact that we had an interesting and constructive debate on the Gulf crisis in this place last week. I have no objection in principle to bringing the resolution here, provided that some arrangement could be made among the house leaders to do so without distracting us from our agenda.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am thankful to the Leader of the Government for his positive reply. I think that arrangements could be made, if not for a distracting debate, for a diverting one, which may be required before we are finished the present menu.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ESTIMATE OF REVENUE GAINS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): While I have the floor, I have one other question related to an item about which I have inquired several times. Inasmuch as this may be the last Question Period we have for some days, may I jog the leader's memory once more about my request for information on the revenue gain to the government from various sectors of the economy arising as a result of the goods and services tax.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): What I have, honourable senators—and I trust it is being prepared in the form of a delayed answer—is a projected GST base for 1991, and in it there are various categories. The honourable senator, or someone, would have to multiply each of these figures by .07 to achieve the answer he is looking for. I am sure this will pose no difficulty for him.

Senator MacEachen: I will ask Senator Kelly to do that.

Senator Murray: The information that I have received does not address itself to what the revenue loss would be had we passed this or that amendment. However, in relation to the category of books, periodicals and newspapers, it does show the projected expenditure by Canadians. Therefore, simple multiplication by the 7 per cent rate would give you the anticipated revenue.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, will that also include heating oil and electrical costs?

Senator Murray: I hope to have the document here for Senator Doody to table later this afternoon. There is what appeared to me to be quite a comprehensive listing of categories. I am not sure in what category heating oil would be, but it should not be too difficult to identify the projected revenues from various sectors. In any case, the document should be here later this afternoon.

CITIZENS' FORUM

APPOINTMENT OF REPLACEMENT MEMBER

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. The Citizens' Forum has been short one member for some time now. Have their been any discussions concerning the appointment of a replacement for the person who left the forum? If so, does the Leader of the Government have any idea when that appointment will be made?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I regret to say that I have no information on that matter today. I do not expect that the appointment of a replacement for Madame Paquet-Sevigny will be long delayed.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

DELAY OF NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL SUBSIDIES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question supplementary to a series of questions asked over the last few days dealing with the GATT negotiations that are to take place in Brussels in a week's time.

A report was released yesterday indicating that the United States might let those trade negotiations drag on past December 7. Has Canada been apprised of this attitude by the United States? I understand that several hundred Canadians are going to Brussels this weekend to participate in the discussions. Until this announcement was made it appeared that the United States was not going to budge on agriculture subsidies, which would have jeopardized the whole discussion.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not aware that the United States has advised us of a change in its position. What drives the United States in terms of deadlines—and I do not have the date in my head—is the date by which the so-called fast track authority expires in the United States Congress. I am not aware that the United States has changed its position.

I have seen—as I am sure has the honourable senator—media reports within the last 24 hours indicating that there is some possible softening of the European Community's position with regard to agriculture. If that is true, it is a hopeful sign. The situation is subject to change without notice. It is a dynamic that I suppose has to be followed not just from day to day but from hour to hour. Mr. Crosbie is out of the country. It is difficult for me to bring up-to-the-minute reports into the Senate on the progress of the negotiations. Honourable senators are apt to be as well informed by following the media as they are by asking questions.

Senator Olson: I hope that is not so, because on November 28, 1990 Mr. Yeutter said:

> . . . ministers might hold "one final relatively short meeting". . .

Do we not know in advance that there will be some meaningful discussions? In other words, unless the United States and the Common Market get a little closer together on what the agricultural subsidies will be, it is all over. Are we not aware of that?

• (1410)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, staying home was never an option for Canada.

Senator Olson: I was not asking whether you were going to stay home; I was asking if you could give us some information so that the people who are going to be vitally affected by this can know what the Canadian government is doing. I hope it is not what the minister said a few minutes ago, which is that the government just simply does not know. Surely that is not the right answer.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not as well informed on the matter as the Minister of International Trade, who was there, or at least who is on his way there. This is a very complex negotiation, as the honourable senator knows. I am not in touch with developments from hour to hour, sometimes not even from day to day. I will do my best to obtain information on the progress of the negotiations as it becomes available to me and as I can report officially on behalf of the government. However, it does not do for me to speculate. Our delegation is going to Geneva for the meetings which begin, I believe, on December 3.

Senator Olson: I believe it is in Brussels.

Senator Murray: They are going to Brussels–

Senator Frith: It would be more effective.

Senator Murray: —for the meetings which begin on December 3. Canada has been taking a leadership role in those negotiations.

The honourable senator will have seen reports this morning of initiatives taken by Mr. Crosbie and the Government of Canada concerning government procurement, trade in services, intellectual property, agriculture, and many of the other complex issues that are on the agenda of the gathering of MTN, the multilateral trade negotiations. As I say, my ability to reply to questions in this house on the negotiations depends very much on obtaining solid reports from Mr. Crosbie and his department. I would not like to indulge in speculation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I accept that. I am also very accutely aware that the minister has better access to getting information than I have, and in many cases than the press has. I make this plea to him: Since there are many people who are vitally interested in what is going on, will he try to expend a little more effort, if that is what is needed, so that he can answer these questions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we do have a cabinet committee on these matters, and your humble servant is a member of that cabinet committee. However, he does not get to it very often because he is so bogged down in the business of the Senate.

Senator Olson: I never used that excuse.

Senator Frith: Is it not a little more fun here?

AGRICULTURE

REDUCTION IN FARM INCOMES—ENHANCED WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION PAYMENTS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question in the area of farm incomes.

The minister is probably aware, although he does not get to all the cabinet committees he would like to attend, that farm income is dropping disastrously this year and is expected to drop even further next year. According to a consulting firm in agricultural economics, farm incomes in Canada will drop 23 per cent this year; and, next year, as much as another 10 per cent below this year's performance. May I ask the minister whether there will be enhanced payments made to western farmers from the grain stabilization program for 1990 and whether western agriculture has been assured that those payments will be continued through 1991?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, similar questions have been asked by Senator Olson in recent days. I think I neglected to point out the other day that there was a federal-provincial meeting of agricultural ministers on November 14 and 15—

Senator Olson: In Winnipeg.

Senator Murray: —at which all provinces, with the exception of Quebec, were represented.

At that meeting, there were discussions on what I described the other day as the safety net—various programs that might be brought into being in the medium and longer term. The question that Senator Olson raised, and which I believe is alluded to today by Senator Austin, is whether some more short-term assistance is needed. That matter came up at the meeting, and the ministers agreed to meet again in February.

A communique was issued following the November 14 and 15 meeting, and I will quote one relevant paragraph:

> Ministers were briefed on the status of a federal-provincial framework paper on flexibility in payment of funds under the Western Grain Transportation Act and Feed Freight Assistance. Ministers agreed this paper, along with the Transportation Committee report released in August, should assist in reaching decisions in 1991.

Several paragraphs later,

[Senator Olson.]

> In view of the need to maintain momentum of the review,— that is, the review of the Agri-Food sector—

> —and to assess the situation following the conclusion of the GATT negotiations, Ministers agreed in principle to hold another federal-provincial meeting of Ministers in February, 1991.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Murray will know that some very substantial payments have been made to western farmers from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. For example, in 1987, $1.4 billion was paid; in 1988, $693 million was paid; and, in 1989, $176 million was paid.

What is happening to grain prices is a very effective cyclical decline in the real income of grain farmers in western Canada. Their costs have been rising; their real income is under serious pressure. The government, the Minister of Agriculture and the federal grains minister, may be meeting with prairie counterparts, but the economic situation is a serious one. I might add that a Saskatchewan provincial election is imminent.

TRANSPORT

AVIATION SAFETY—STATEMENT EMANATING FROM DRYDEN INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question to the minister is with regard to the current ongoing inquiry called by the federal government with regard to the tragic aircrash at Dryden, Ontario, where some 24 passengers died. The inquiry has been going on for some time, but recently there have been some very alarming statements made at the inquiry on which, it seems to me, we should obtain clarification.

One statement revolves around the question of the deregulation of the air industry. At that time, as was read into the record at the inquiry in 1985, a statement was made by the then minister, Mr. Mazankowski. He said then, and I quote:

• (1420)

> I want to indicate unequivocally that the government will neither propose nor permit any economic regulatory reform that might be detrimental to safety standards.

Yet recently, at the hearings of the inquiry into the Dryden crash, information was given that there was only one inspector in Canada in 1988 who was knowledgeable about the Boeing 747 aircraft. The minister will be aware that the 747 is used by Air Canada in regular service.

Even more alarming than that statement is one in a memo dated January, 1989, sent by a senior staff member of the Air Transport Department to his superiors, which states:

> Air carrier inspection is no longer capable of meeting even minimum requirements necessary to ensure safety. In fact, it is no longer able to assure the minister of the safety of large air carrier commercial services in Canada.

That is a very alarming statement. Every day there are thousands of Canadians who travel on Canadian airlines. Yet, here is a statement from a senior official from within the department who says that the department is no longer able to ensure meeting even minimum requirements of safety. Will the minister tell us what steps the government proposes to take to correct this very dangerous situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as a frequent flyer myself I understand the honourable senator's concern. However, I do not have in my notes today any information either on the inquiry at Dryden or testimony that has been given related to that inquiry. I will ask my colleague, Mr. Lewis, the Minister of Transport, to comment on the statements that the honourable senator has just read into the record.

Senator Molgat: Could the minister indicate how soon we might get an answer on what is a very serious problem in Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would assume that the minister and the department have taken note of statements of that kind as they have appeared in the media. I would not think that it should take very long for them to give us at least an initial assessment.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

CANADIAN FORCES—MONITORING BY CABINET SUBCOMMITTEE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting the Gulf crisis. I understand earlier the minister committed to having a full debate on this issue of pressing concern to all Canadians. Perhaps I might ask him several questions that have arisen in the last day or so which I think are relevant and pertinent in light of the changing circumstances in the Gulf.

First, has the government established a cabinet subcommittee to oversee the activities of the Canadian forces in the Gulf area, and the necessary support backup that might be required from time to time in order to facilitate their mission?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, among the standing committees of cabinet there is a Cabinet Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. With respect to the Gulf crisis, as respecting so many other matters that arise from time to time, there is, of course, an ad hoc committee of ministers that can be assembled on short notice to deal with matters as they arise and which monitor the situation. That is the case with the Gulf crisis.

● (1430)

APPOINTMENT OF PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I assume that the concern of most Canadians would be that if the resolution were passed by the United Nations today the situation in the Gulf would take on a heightened sense of emergency. Perhaps the government might give some consideration to establishing a permanent Cabinet sub-committee rather than an ad hoc committee that could monitor daily the events in that part of the world and elsewhere. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could discuss that with his cabinet colleagues and respond.

It seems to me that if Canadian forces are now on a mission that involves the loss or impairment of their lives, they are entitled to be confident that on the home front in Canada a committee at the most senior level of government is meeting on a regular basis to ensure that they are properly supported at all times.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not see any difference between what I call an ad hoc committee of cabinet and what the honourable senator calls a permanent subcommittee. A group of ministers is kept informed on a daily basis of developments and, more importantly, it meets as required. It can be brought together quickly to deal with situations as they arise and to monitor situations on an ongoing basis. There again, I cannot tell the honourable senator who is on that committee, because I have not been able to attend a single meeting for reasons I referred to earlier.

NATURE OF ALLIED MILITARY COMMAND STRUCTURE—ROLE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Could the Leader of the Government give us some insight, at the earliest possible opportunity, on the nature of the military command structure, those to whom the Canadian forces in the Gulf report? What role does the Canadian government have in transmitting instructions to the forces? There was a very well-defined command structure during the Korean crisis. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could inform us of the combined command structure and the manner in which Canadian interests might be articulated through that command structure.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there have in the past been exchanges on that issue in this house. However, rather than extemporize on the matter today, it would be helpful if I obtained a prepared reply from my colleague, Mr. McKnight, the Minister of National Defence.

IRAQUI ARMAMENTS—NUCLEAR CAPABILITY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: On another issue, again related to the Gulf crisis, the Armed Services Committee of the Senate of the United States several days ago received an intelligence briefing with respect to the state of the atomic or nuclear weapons program in Iraq. Obviously, this is a crucial question of concern to all nations involved in the Gulf crisis. There is some confusion with respect even to the public information available on how far Iraq is from launching an atomic or nuclear weapon. Some press reports have suggested that Iraq is months away from that capability, while others suggest that it is years away from it.

Obviously, as tensions increase in that area, it will become increasingly relevant to know what will be the aftermath of any final settlement of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. I think it would be of interest to senators on both sides of the house if a briefing could be made possible, or, failing a briefing, at least a statement on this particular issue. I think it is of concern to all Canadians.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall ascertain what information is available and what can properly be made public on that matter at this time.

CANADIAN FORCES—ADEQUACY OF MEDICAL RESOURCES—REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, the Auditor General recently made a telling criticism of the state of the armed forces. He said that the Canadian forces were not properly reinforced with medical and other resources in the Gulf area. I believe he indicated that, based on information he had received from the leading officers in the Canadian Forces, medical resources are not adequate in the circumstances.

Could the Leader of the Government advise as to whether this issue has been remedied since the Auditor General made his comments?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there were exchanges in the House of Commons between Mr. McKnight and Opposition members on the general subject of the Auditor General's report. My recollection is that Mr. McKnight and the responsible officers of the armed forces denied the statements made by the Auditor General. However, for greater certainty I will obtain a report from him and bring it to the Senate at an early date.

LAPRADE FUND

REQUEST FOR UPDATE ON UNANSWERED QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I apologize to the Leader of the Government for delaying him. I know that he has to leave for another appointment, but in view of the fact that we are establishing some records here, I thought I would raise a question that I had asked some time ago.

I wonder if he would mind if I resurrect the famous LaPrade Fund. If he thumbs through his notes, he may have a reference to it. I first asked a question about it in February of 1987. To refresh the government leader's memory, on that occasion I asked when the fund was established and for what reasons; how much money currently was in the fund; what was the original amount allocated to the fund and what criteria determined that amount; had any sums been spent from the fund and, if so, for which projects and where; was spending for the fund restricted to a particular area of Canada and, if so, what were the boundaries of the area, and how were such boundaries determined; what were the criteria, if any, for the projects eligible for funding; what changes, if any, had been made in the concept and administration of the fund since September of 1984?

Then, on June 21, 1988, I resurrected the question and mentioned that we must be establishing some kind of record here, because it was then 16 months old. I repeated the question and stated:

> I am wondering if there are any deep, dark secrets surrounding the LaPrade Fund; what is the reason that it should take more than 16 months to provide an answer?

Senator Murray responded by saying that he was sure there were no deep, dark secrets surrounding the fund. He said that he would have an inquiry go forward with regard to my question.

Then, on September 13, the question was again raised. I asked whether he could provide us with a reply. I stated:

> If he cannot provide us with a reply in the next day or two, will the Leader of the Government undertake to explain to us the difficulties in finding the answers to these questions?

Senator Murray, of course, responded that if he could find out himself, he certainly would be happy to convey the information to his friend. On September 29, 1988 the question came up again. At that time, Senator Murray said that he did not have any information at that timebut he would certainly be consulting all of his colleagues. Then, on September 30, 1988, he said:

• (1440)

> Honourable senators, I regret that Senator Graham is not here. With regard to his question on the LaPrade Fund, I can only say that the situation is as I suspected and indicated it was yesterday. The response to his question is still being processed. There had been a response produced and sent to Mr. de Cotret's office, but some inconsistencies were found in the reply, and I understand that Treasury Board is retracing the documents to correct these matters. As soon as this is done the reply will be provided in full.

And so on, and so on, and so on.

Could Senator Murray go back to the department or departments concerned and determine where those answers have gone? According to parliamentary process, in terms of questions on the Order of Paper, I understand that they died with the termination of that Parliament. Can he today provide any valid explanation of why there has been such a long delay?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, I cannot, honourable senators, except to observe that since the time of those exchanges in the Senate there have been several changes of ministers at the Treasury Board, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and perhaps other relevant departments. That may be one factor in holding up this work.

I will make further inquiries and see if we can, even at this late date, satisfy Senator Graham's curiousity regarding this fund.

In fairness and for the record, I should like to point out that since September 25 we have tabled in this place 51 delayed answers. That is something of a record in such a short time. Honourable senators continue to ask questions and we have 50 questions still outstanding. My friend, the Deputy Leader of the Government, is about to table 10 or 11 delayed answers this afternoon.

We are working very diligently to reply to questions that are placed on the record by honourable senators. This is in addition to the fund of information that I am able to provide orally.

Senator Graham: I understand Senator Murray's problem, and it may not be with him or his staff.

Senator Corbin: They're all working on the GST.

Senator Graham: They may be out collecting petitions. Perhaps Mr. MacDougall is out there now collecting more names for petitions.

Senator Molgat: He is in the gallery, so he cannot be gathering petitions.

Senator Graham: It might be useful if some research could be done for Senator Murray. However, in seeking the answer, he should know that the Auditor General was rather interested in the LaPrade Fund. In his annual report, on page 81 with respect to the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, he observed that there were several instances where initial departmental analysis with respect to the Laprade Fund indicated that projects did not meet basic program eligibility criteria and that these projects were later approved. He also observed that there were cases where the level of financial support given to a project was more than departmental analysis identified as the amount necessary for the project to proceed, and that little or no documented rationale was available to explain these decisions.

I hope that Senator Murray will take this into account in providing senators and the canadian public with a full explanation on these long-delayed questions.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend quotes from the criticism of the Auditor General that little or no documentation was available in some instances. This may be a partial explanation of our difficulty in obtaining a reply for the honourable senator. If the Auditor General cannot obtain the information, it is little wonder that I have not been able to obtain it. However, I will do my best.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

OKA INQUIRY—COMMITMENT TO HOLD PUBLIC HEARINGS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for any part he played in the Aboriginal Affairs Committee of the other place agreeing to hold public hearings on the Oka situation. The decision has been announced in the paper today. I think it is a good decision and I am pleased to see that a comprehensive inquiry is going to be undertaken.

HEALTH

THE SENATE—ANTI-SMOKING REGULATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Len Marchand: I am somewhat reluctant to raise my next question, but I raise it partly from self-preservation. I should like to ask the Leader of the Senate about the smoking policy in this place and in government buildings. Does this policy apply to the Senate, or do we have special dispensations for rules in the Senate?

I have gone into the Reading Room on a number of occasions and have seen a number of senators smoking. Is that room specially designated for smoking? If one goes to the Victoria Building and other places the policy is not being obeyed. I happen to think that the no-smoking policy in government buildings, which the government brought in, is a good one. However, is the policy no longer being enforced or implemented? If it is still in place, then senators should set an example. We should be the first ones to obey the law. Two of the most eminent scientists in this country are on the opposite side—Dr. David and Dr. Keon.

As I have said, I am a little reluctant to raise this because the honourable senators are good friends and I enjoy their company. However, I am getting fed up by the way this matter is being handled. Either we have a policy and a law that means something or we do not. If it is intended to be a farce, then let us say so.

Some of us have allergies and we sometimes have trouble breathing if we have to go into rooms where people are smoking. I believe that Dr. David and Dr. Keon will agree with me. I think the way the smoking policy is being implemented in the Senate is a farce.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I appreciate the point made by the honourable senator. To the best of my knowledge, the Reading Room is not a designated smoking area. Honourable senators should not be smoking in that room.

All I can say is that I trust a word to the wise from Senator Marchand will be sufficient in this case.

Senator Frith: The problem is not the word, it is the wise.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

USE OF EXCESS REVENUES TO REDUCE DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. When I spoke yesterday on the motion in amendment by Senator Lawson, in which he suggested that the revenues from the GST in excess of $21 billion be utilized to retire public debt, I indicated concern over that resolution, based on the concept that if excess revenues from the GST were taken out of the deficit and used to retire public debt, the effect of that would be to increase the deficit, which would, in turn, be added to the public debt; so the net effect would be a wash.

I continued on to say that the important issue for me was whether or not there was control by the government of program spending. I went on to state that I would prefer a clear statement from the Minister of Finance to the effect that the excess revenues from the GST would be used to reduce the deficit directly.

I have received such a statement today and I would like to read part of his letter as follows:

> As you are aware, the Prime Minister has indicated that should the GST result in revenues higher than those now anticipated, such revenues would be applied to the deficit or used to lower the rate. The intent of that commitment, which I clearly support, is that unanticipated revenues will not be used to fund new expenditure initiatives. Clearly, as long as the deficit continues to be such a source of concern and an obstacle to healthy economic growth, reducing it must be our first and continuing priority.

The letter goes on from there, but that is the main thrust of it, and it is signed by Michael H. Wilson, Minister of Finance.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: Better late than never.

Senator Everett: That statement more than satisfies my concern and therefore I will be voting against the amendment. For certainty, I would like to ask this question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Does he agree with the statement of the Minister of Finance that I have just read?

Senator Frith: Not too fast; think it over.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Read it again, just to be sure.

Senator Everett: Would honourable senators like me to table the letter from the Minister of Finance?

Senator Haidasz: No one would believe it.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

RELEASE OF DANGEROUS OFFENDERS—MANDATORY SUPERVISION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I hope he has occasion to continue his cordial mood.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he is aware that the National Parole Board is releasing about 60 dangerous inmates into Canadian society every year without any supervision or any support whatsoever? They are men who, the Board is satisfied, if released will commit a serious offence involving harm or death to another person. This comes as a result of legislation in this house in July 1986 when the government called a special session of Parliament because there were allegedly 12 dangerous inmates to be released on mandatory supervision. As a result of that legislation, at least 60 inmates a year, dangerous men, are being released into the mainstream of Canadian society without any supervision whatsoever. Is the government leader aware that it is a result of that legislation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am aware of Senator Hastings' interest in the field of corrections. He has, under the rubric of an oral question, made an assertion that he has not even attempted to document. All I can do under the circumstances is to ask my colleague, the Solicitor General of Canada, to obtain a report from the National Parole Board, for which he reports to Parliament.

Senator Hastings: As a supplementary, my figure of 60, along with the other figure, are completely documented in the report of the National Parole Board to the Commons committee that deals with matters concerning the Solicitor General. The government leader has merely to consult that report. It is all documented.

My supplementary question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Would he not agree that a better form of protection to society would be to have those men released into society under supervision and support by the National Parole Board, instead of being released scot-free into society, as is now being done?

Senator Murray: That is a conclusion that Senator Hastings arrives at. He also arrives at the conclusion that the legislation is faulty or should be changed.

I do not know, because I have not read the report, whether the National Parole Board would agree with Senator Hastings' conclusion, but I shall ask for their comment on that matter.

Senator Hastings: You can have their comment if you read the report of the Chairman of the National Parole Board to the House committee of the Solicitor General. The chairman of the board said that the legislation has not exacerbated reoffending, neither has it lessened reoffending; all it has done is delay reoffending.

I ask the leader again, if all we do is delay reoffending, would it not be a better public investment to release the inmates under supervision rather than free them into society without any supervision or support?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is asking important questions of policy here, and I would have to defer to a statement on the matter from the responsible minister. I shall ask the Solicitor General to report as soon as possible.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

QUEBEC—SUSPENSION OF TAX ON BOOKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, the day before yesterday, the Quebec Government, pressured by the publishing industry, suspended the provincial 8 per cent tax on books.

Quebec Finance Minister Gérard-D. Lévesque said in the National Assembly, and I quote:

> I hope the federal government will follow our example and remove the tax on books, so that we can do the same.

My question is this: Will the federal government take the advice of Minister Lévesque and follow Quebec's example?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, not today.

Senator Hébert: Tomorrow?

Senator Murray: No, not tomorrow, honourable senators.

Senator Hébert: How many bookstores and publishers will have to close shop or go bankrupt before the federal government decides to exempt books from the GST? Does the government think the publishing industry's forecasts are exagerrated?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, several amendments were proposed by the opposition. The Senate has already voted on these amendments. However, the senator is aware that Prime Minister Mulroney and several other ministers have already given some indication of their sympathy for the concerns expressed by the honourable senator and other Canadians. For the time being, we still have to pass Bill C-62. Once we have carefully examined the impact of this tax, we will in a position to make any necessary changes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADIAN FORCES BASE, CHATHAM—REDUCTION IN PERSONNEL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. By way of background information, in 1984 the government of the day decided to reduce utilization of the Chatham military air base but, in its place, had committed the establishment of a pay office that would have provided for some 450 jobs.

In the election of 1984, the happy warrior, the leader of the Conservative Party, came to Chatham and held a huge rally there boasting of the fact that he had studied at St. Thomas High School and that the air base in Chatham would not be reduced but would be made bigger and better.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: He said that as long as he was Prime Minister of this country there would be no reduction of the Chatham air base. So much for 1984.

Since 1984 there has been a constant reduction in staff employed at that base, despite the fact that a squadron of CF-5s, on the verge of being dismantled, was moved to Chatham from Bagotville, because the air craft in use at that time had become extinct. I now read in a Chatham press dispatch that the government has decided to relocate another 400 personnel from that base to some bases in Alberta. This probably means the beginning of the end.

I am sure the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware of this, at least to some degree, because discussions regarding that base were ongoing at the time between the government leader, when he was deputy minister, and the then Premier Hatfield in New Brunswick.

I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will provide the Senate, or at least me, with complete details of information regarding the present status of that base and its future. I would like to know what is happening, what decisions have been made, and what will be the end result.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As the honourable senator has pointed out, as long ago as the mid-1970s the Department of National Defence, under our predecessors, was trying to close that base. The base is not closing; there will continue to be activity on those premises.

What we are doing is moving the low-level air defence artillery school from Chatham to Alberta, and I think my honourable friend understands the reasons for that.

Senator Thériault: What are the reasons? Tell the truth.

Senator Murray: I will tell the truth. The honourable senator comes from the area.

Senator Thériault: Yes, I know.

Senator Murray: He should know very well that to have kept it there would have required expanding the Tracadie range, and there was considerable opposition in his part of New Brunswick to that proposed expansion—very considerable opposition. He knows that. It would have required extensive environmental assessments and hearings, and all the rest of it. At the end of that process there was no assurance that the government could confidently go ahead with expanding that range. For that reason, the low-level air defence artillery school is being moved.

In the last few days, Mr. McKnight has written to the premier of New Brunswick advising him of that decision, and also that we would move the Junior Leadership school and the Air Reserve National Training Centre. One of those is from Sunnyside and the other is from another part of the country. The training centres would be relocated to Chatham in an effort to cushion somewhat the loss of employment involved in relocating the Low-Level Air Defence Artillery School from Chatham.

At the same time, while I am on my feet, I may say that Mr. Valcourt and Transport Minister Lewis have announced within the last couple of months that funding assistance will be provided to the Miramichi Airport Commission in the next three years to operate the Chatham airport as a civilian facility after the Canadian Forces cease airport operations at that site.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the facts as given by the Leader of the Government are partially correct, but they are not the whole story. There was a tentative agreement for the expansion of the range at Tracadie. If the minister is not aware of that, then I will tell him.

Senator Murray: I know about that.

Senator Thériault: There was a tentative agreement and $25 million was requested by the provincial government from the federal government so that an economic structure could be put in place in the Tracadie area in order to derive some economic benefit from the expansion of that range. Suddenly that was scuttled by a big, flashy announcement by the Minister of Fisheries one night when he went overboard in Caraquet. It came as a surprise to a lot of people, but, that was done. That ended the possible expansion of that range, and ended the plans for the airport in Chatham.

However, honourable senators, I do not want the minister to get my region mixed up with the Tracadie region. I live on the Miramichi.

Senator Murray: I know that.

Senator Thériault: In any event, I am interested in that air base, especially because of the decision made by your government not to proceed with the establishment of the Pay Centre in Chathamin 1985, which would have created 450 permanent jobs. In 1984 the Prime Minister said that the government intended to expand that airport. However, it has been downhill ever since.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Thériault: I want to know whether or not this is the end of it.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not the end of it. I would like my honourable friend to document his assertion that the Prime Minister or the government ever undertook to expand operations at that base. I think he will find that he is incorrect in attributing that statement to the Prime Minister. No such undertaking was given by the Prime Minister or the government to expand the base.

Senator Thériault: He said, and I quote, that he would make it bigger and better. That is what he said, and those are his words.

Senator Frith: He was talking about unemployment.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault will no doubt bring the relevant quotation to our attention in due course, which he has not done today.

Where Senator Thériault and I disagree is on the extent of the opposition in the Tracadie area to the expansion of that range. I am well aware of the agreement that was being discussed between our two governments. I was involved in those discussions, both during and after the period when I was minister of ACOA. But $25 million or no, agreement or no, there was and is very extensive opposition in the Tracadie area to the expansion of that range, and that was something that the government could not responsibly fail to take into account.

That is what we have done; we have moved the artillery school elsewhere. We are trying to cushion the loss in some way by relocating other facilities to Chatham. That is the best that we have been able to make of a difficult situation. I think the government of New Brunswick understands that, and I hope we will have the understanding of the Honourable Senator Thériault and others who are interested in that region.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, again the situation is that your government promised a low-level air flying school for that base, without knowing that you needed expanded facilities in the Tracadie range. Did you not know that there was opposition to the range before a decision was made and before there was an announcement made to the effect that you were going to establish the school there? What kind of operation are you running?

• (1500)

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows that we were making every possible effort to maintain a certain level of activity at that base. Quite frankly, as time went on, the opposition to expanding the range increased very considerably. As I say, even if we had concluded an agreement with New Brunswick, there was no assurance whatsoever that we would have been able confidently to proceed with the expansion of the range.

Honourable senators, as Senator Doody and Senator Frith indicated earlier, I do have to leave the house now.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, last week I inquired about Question No. 56 on the Order Paper which has to do with the Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety. I also inquired about Question No. 57 which has to do with oil spills, as well as Question No. 58 which has to do with conservation and alternative energy research. Could the Deputy Leader of the Government advise me when answers to these questions will be available?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will make an inquiry, senator, and see if I can push them along for you.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: My question is directed to Senator Doody in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like a reply to the question I put yesterday, with regard to the application of the GST on Indian reserves.

Senator Doody: I have that answer.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions, and I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings. They include responses to questions by Senators Grafstein, Haidasz, Hays, Corbin, Robichaud, Fairbairn, MacEachen, Molgat and Olson.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Would Senator Doody be so kind as to read aloud the answer to my question, please.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): How are the others distributed? Are they being taken to the offices of senators now?

Senator Doody: Copies of the answers will be delivered to the senators here, yes, and the answers will be printed as well.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION—CONCLUSION OF GOVERNMENT STUDY—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Senator Corbin regarding Trans-Canada Highway—Construction of New Brunswick Section—Conclusion of Government Study—Request for Details. I will read the answer:

> The following three key studies have been completed with respect to funding the reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick;
> 1. Adequate Highways: A Key to Regional Economic Development (August, 1988).
> 2. A Highway Improvement Plan for the Trans-Canada Highway through New Brunswick (May, 1989).
> 3. National Highway Policy Study for Canada: Phases I, II and III Reports (1988-90).
> The Council of Ministers Responsible for Transportation and Highway Safety has approved a work program for Phase IV of the National Highway Policy Study for the coming year which is due to be completed in the summer of 1991.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if I may, I asked the Leader of the Government to table, or to make available one way or another, copies of those studies. Would Senator Doody pursue that matter and attempt to provide me with copies of the studies that he mentioned in his answer?

Senator Doody: I will ask that they be provided to the senator.

WORLD WAR II

INTERNMENT OF ITALIAN CANADIANS—NATURE OF COMPENSATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Senator Haidasz regarding Internment of Italian Canadians—Nature of Compensation—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

> In his speech to Members of the National Congress of Italian Canadians on November 4, 1990, the Prime Minister announced that he had instructed the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship to begin discussions with representatives of the Italian Canadian community and other aggrieved ethnocultural groups to discuss how best to symbolize our recognition of the discrimination some Canadians suffered at the hands of the Government.
> The Minister has subsequently written to the National Congress of Italian Canadians, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Chinese Canadian National Council to invite their representatives to meet with him as soon as possible to discuss an appropriate form of symbolic recognition.

WORLD WAR II

APOLOGY TO OTHER ETHNIC CANADIANS—CONSIDERATION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by Senator Haidasz regarding Apology to other Ethnic Canadians - Consideration by Government

(The answer follows:)

> In his speech to Members of the National Congress of Italian Canadians on November 4, 1990, the Prime Minister clearly stated that he intended to:
> "rise in the House of Commons and extend a formal apology to all Members of the Italian Canadian community . . . and to other Canadians who have suffered similar grievances."

AGRICULTURE

MEAT INSPECTION AT CANADA-U.S. BORDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the fourth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by Senator Hays regarding Agriculture—Meat Inspection at CanadaU.S. Border—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

> There was an undertaking by the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States and the Canadian Minister of Agriculture, to try to work toward a harmonized system of border inspection based upon the equivalency of the two inspection systems.
> However, in order for the open border policy to be implemented between the U.S. and Canada, the U.S.D.A. has to publish the proposed ruling in the Federal Register. This is followed by a comment period and, finally, the U.S.D.A., after analysis of the comments, makes a final ruling.

The U.S.D.A. feels that there is no need to amend the Meat Inspection Regulations to allow for the implementation of the open border policy. It can be done on an experimental basis for a period of up to one year after which a final decision can be made on the basis of the outcome of the experiment.

The U.S.D.A. is at the present time in the process of analyzing the comments that they have received and answering the concerns that have been raised in the submissions.

It is felt that this issue will be successfully resolved in the near future.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

AGRICULTURE SUPPORT PROGRAMS—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE—ALTERNATIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by Senator Hays regarding General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—Agriculture Support Programs—Possible Eliminiation of Crow Rate—Alternatives—Government Position.

Potential changes to the Western Grain Transportation Act and related legislation are currently under review by the Government. As part of the Agri-Food Policy Review initiated by the Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, a government-industry committee on transportation tabled its report in July 1990. This report outlined various options for the payment of the Western Grain Transportation Act Subsidy. Early in the new year the Government will be entering into consultations with the industry and provincial governments, concerning the various options outlined. This will include the Alberta Government buyout proposal. This review will go forward irrespective of the results of the GATT negotiations.

With respect to the GATT negotiations which are currently under way, Canada is prepared to negotiate reductions in our subsidy programs, including the Western Grain Transportation Act. However, Canada's willingness to do so is conditional on obtaining reciprocal commitments on the part of our trading partners to reduce their subsidies. Furthermore, Canada indicated in its offer tabled on October 15, 1990 that it will not take commitments based on an Aggregate Measure of Support (AMS). The AMS could, however, be used to monitor contracting parties implementation of their commitments.

Any commitments which Canada may make at GATT with respect to the Western Grain Transportation Act will be taken into consideration in the current review of the legislation.

[Senator Doody.]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

COMPARATIVE AGGREGATE MEASURES OF SUPPORT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by Senator Hays regarding General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade—Comparative Aggregate Measures of Support.

(The answer follows:)

The simple answer is that it is not possible to produce comparable figures on Aggregate Measure of Support amongst Canada, the United States and the European Community, based on the reports tabled at GATT.

As part of the negotiations, the GATT Secretariat suggested a format that countries use for reporting their data. While countries used this format for guidance, most deviated from the suggested approach to a greater or lesser extent. For example, Canada used 1987 data for crops rather than the recommended base of 1988, due to the drought conditions in 1988. The United States reported data as the average of 1986-88; border measures and export assistance were not incorporated into the AMS data; and general support was not allocated to commodities. The European Community reported date for 1986 only.

Countries in calculating their AMS values used not only different time frames, but also different methodological approaches. This complicates comparisons. Furthermore, the two other country lists, particularly the EC list, do not contain sufficient information to be able to convert their values to some common basis. Therefore, it is not possible to prepare completely comparable statistics, on the basis of tabled country lists. However, the Government continues to analyze the lists to see where we have concerns with the way calculations were done by the other two countries.

Currently, the only consistent method of comparing agriculture support levels between countries is to use OECD producer subsidy equivalence (PSE) calculations. As these calculations are done by one organization they are internally consistent. The OECD calculations show for the period 1986-88 the following levels of support:

Canada—$8.4 billion

United States—US—$43.2 billion—(C$57.0 billion)

European Community—ECU—$58.5 billion—(C$84.6 billion)

Agricultural programs in various countries differ in application and effect, and depending on what base period is used. No single measure or set of measures can accurately compare the level of support between countries. Government officials will use all available date including OECD data, tabled baseline data and other sources to allow negotiators to judge the comparability of commitments made by countries during the course of the negotiations.

Finally, the main point of the baseline exercise was to make transparent all programs and expenditures used by governments. In this regard, the process was successful. The important step now is to engage in negotiations based on country offers, with the baseline data as a backdrop which clarifies the process.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COST OF PROPOSED BALLET OPERA HOUSE IN TORONTO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by Senator Robichaud regarding National Finance—Cost of Proposed Ballet Opera House in Toronto—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The Financial assistance announced by the Government of Canada for the funding of the Ballet-Opera House project consists of funds committed for a specific project which the Government considers a priority, owing to its importance for the Canadian Arts Community.

The financing of the Ballet-Opera House lies in serious doubt, now that the Government of Ontario has decided not to proceed with direct funding. However, alternative plans are being explored by the Ballet-Opera House Corporation. The Government of Canada maintains its commitment while alternative solutions are being considered.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF STUDY WITH RESPECT TO APOLOGY OR COMPENSATION TO NORTHERN QUEBEC INUITS WHO WERE RELOCATED TO THE ARCTIC ISLANDS IN 1953—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by Senator Fairbairn regarding Indian Affairs—Provision of Study with Respect to Apology or Compensation to Northern Quebec Inuits who were Relocated to the Arctic Islands in 1953—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

In response to the Honourable Senator's request, I wish to table a news release from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, along with a Report, in response to a Standing Committee Report on the relocation of Inuit families in the 1950's.

AGRICULTURE

JAPANESE TARIFFS ON CANOLA SEED—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 27, 1990, by Senator Olson regarding Agriculture—Japanese Tariffs on Canola Seed—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The company has acknowledged a number of factors behind the closing.

The closing of the plant is a result in part of depressed prices in international oilseed markets caused by E.C. and U.S. subsidies.

Canada's position in the MTN would bring relief to Canadian oilseed processors in the form of reduced export subsidies.

Regarding the FTA, elimination of the U.S. Tariff on imports of Canadian Canola Oil, will in a few years, offset the impact of the removal of the WGTA subsidy for exports to the U.S. and represent a net benefit to Canadian exporters.

Canola products are being considered for accelerated tariff elimination in the current round of acceleration consultations.

I understand that an agreement has been reached between the Canadian and U.S. Industries on earlier tariff elimination. If the agreement holds, tariffs would be eliminated as early as July 1, 1991. Such an outcome would immediately offset the removal of the WGTA subsidy.

PERSIAN GULF

UNITED STATES RESOLUTION ON USE OF FORCE—CANADIAN COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by Senator MacEachen regarding Persian Gulf—United States Resolution on use of Force—Canadian Commitment—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Discussions have taken place between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary of State of the United States along with other Members of the Security Council. Canada intends to support this resolution and sees it as an important signal to Iraq and that Iraq must comply with the Security Council resolutions.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

APPLICABILITY TO INDIAN RESERVES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by Senator Molgat regarding GST—Applicability to Indian Reserves.

(The answer follows:)

Concerning Indian Reserves and the GST. The attached is a Draft Policy from the Department of Finance concerning Indian Reserves and the GST. Discussions are ongoing.

(Attachment)

GST POLICY GUIDELINES:
TREATMENT OF SALES AND PURCHASES BY INDIANS

The basis for the GST policy framework for Indian sales and purchases under the GST is the Indian Act. In particular, Section 87 of that Act exempts from taxation the personal property of an Indian or band situated on reserve, as well as their interest in reserve or designated lands.

Accordingly, the federal policy for Indian sales and purchases under the GST will be as follows:

Sales by Indian vendors will be subject to the general provisions of the GST legislation.

On-reserve purchases of goods by Indian individuals and by Indian bands will not be subject to GST. This treatment will be extended to off-reserve purchases of goods which are delivered to the reserve by the vendor or his agent.

On-reserve purchases of services, where the benefit is primarily realized on-reserve (for example, small engine repairs) will not be subject to GST.

Off-reserve purchases of services such as legal or accounting services which are purchased by an Indian band in respect of band management, or are purchased in respect of real property located on-reserve, will not be subject to GST.

Unincorporated Indian-owned businesses may purchase on the same tax-free basis as Indian individuals as they are eligible for the exemption pursuant to Section 87 of the Indian Act. In addition, for purchases of inputs on which tax is paid (e.g. off-reserve purchases), they will be able to claim input tax credits in the same manner as incorporated businesses.

Incorporated Indian-owned businesses will be treated the same as non-Indian businesses; tax will be paid on their purchases and input tax credits may be claimed subject to the provisions of the legislation.

ESTIMATES OF REVENUE GAINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 20, 1990, by Senator MacEachen regarding GST—Estimates of Revenue Gains—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Attached is a breakdown of the estimated GST Base for 1991. The information is arranged according to tax status and major classifications. This information was provided to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance in the Fall of 1989, when it was studying Bill C-62. The Department has no difficulties with you making this information available to Senator MacEachen in response to his questions.

Regarding Senator MacEachen's specific request for the amount of tax revenues generated from the taxation of books or other specific proposed amendments, that information is not available.

Generally, to derive the expected GST revenues from these categories, the base number should be multiplied by 7 per cent.

NATIONAL FINANCE

SOFTENING OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised in the Senate on November 13, 1990, by Senator Grafstein regarding National Finance—Softening of Wage Settlements—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

I know that the Government's concern with inflationary pressures—and our monetary policy response—has been a source of controversy and criticism.

However, throughout our mandate, the long-term anchor of our monetary policy has been, and remains, price stability. As the Governor of the Bank of Canada recently stated, "what we are seeing are gradual but progressive reductions in inflation that will ensure there is no doubt about the commitment of monetary policy to contribute price stability to Canada's economic well-being".

To this end, this Government set out and has followed a clear path of responsible fiscal and economic policies aimed at achieving a better balance between demand and the economy's capacity, with fewer inflationary pressures. This will set the stage for reduced interest rates and a return to a balanced, sustained expansion.

The recent weakness in the economy has resulted in the easing in monetary conditions we have seen lately. The Bank rate has fallen 180 basis points from its peak in May. Continued easing in underlying price and cost pressures will create scope for further declines in interest rates.

However, recent data show no sign of an easing in wage settlement rates. Indeed, quite the opposite has occurred: Negotiated wage increases have risen from less than 5 per cent early in 1989 to about 6 1/2 per cent in the third quarter of this year. This has occurred in both the private and public sectors.

The Federal Government, though, has set a good example of restraint in its wage negotiations. Indeed, we have held average settlement rates below that of the private sector in each of the last three years. And except for a few higher settlements imposed by arbitration in recent months, Federal settlement rates have also been held to less than the rate of inflation in the past two years.

However, of considerable concern is the recent acceleration in non-federal wage settlements. These high settlements reflect strong underlying inflation pressures, which if they persist, will push the inflation rate higher.

It is critical that all participants in our economy recognize that the Government's scope to alter monetary conditions depends directly on the continued reduction in inflationary pressures. If not dealt with, these pressures threaten to become entrenched in the economy, making their elimination that much more difficult and costly later on.

Let it be clear: this Government is not prepared to validate uneconomic wage settlements by either loose monetary or fiscal policies. The much slower pace of growth that is emerging in 1990 is necessary to wring inflation pressures out of the Canadian economy. It is also creating the conditions for permanently lower interest rates and balanced, sustained growth. The sooner inflation pressures ease, the smoother will be the transition period.

ABORTION

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable Senators, I rise on a point of privilege. On Wednesday, November 7, I raised an important point of privilege. I was very concerned that the way orders of business have been pursued without due regard for other very important legislative matters—matters which may well have profound constitutional effects—was tending to preempt timely treatment in this house of the urgent motion I had entered on the order paper to render an instruction to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee dealing with Bill C-43. The prima facie case of privilege that I raised has not received the attention it ought to have before the house. In consequence, I must raise now an adjunct privilege, that of having the former matter of privilege, including its prima facie case, discussed and settled in a Committee of the Whole, pursuant to Rule 33, without delay.

Honourable senators might be under the mistaken impression that a matter of privilege must await the definitive ruling of the Speaker. However, this matter actually devolves to discussion and settlement by the whole house, which is one of the reasons we have Rule 33 at all. The discussion and settlement of privilege takes precedence over all other business, even when matters of national security are before Parliament. That should give honourable senators a fair appreciation of how fundamental to the whole of Parliament are their individual and collective privileges.

The principle is in harmony with the other house. The standard of reference on Parliamentary Privilege, Joseph Maingot's book entitled, Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, dealing with the more restrictive rulings of the Speaker of the other house, indicates that, even there, such rulings are subject to appeal in the house. Moreover, on page 223 of that text we read: "... the Speaker is reluctant to 'allow a matter as important as ... privilege ... to fail on the ground of form'". Maingot cites the House of Commons Debates of April 19, 1977, p. 4766, in support of this point,and I was present in the House of Commons that day.

Page 230 in Maingot's book refers to the fact that a Speaker's ruling does not prevent continued recourse to matters of privilege until a remedy is satisfactory to the whole house.

It is not out of order, therefore, for me to take this opportunity to raise privilege again, focusing on several points which are pertinent to the prima facie case as I raised it on November 7.

Whereas the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has, as of Thursday, November 8, interrupted its hearings of witnesses until some indefinite time in the future, we must be especially concerned about falling into the pitfall of dereliction of parliamentary duty. A committee dealing with flawed and perverted legislation undoubtedly requires an express instruction to receive from the whole house its mandate of the fullest scope to examine every flaw and every amendment cognate to the principle of a bill that may rectify its more serious flaws.

Bill C-43, the government's abortion legislation, has very serious and far-reaching, some experts say, even seditious ramifications in law. Because it deals with a matter of life and death at the very origin of human society, it is legislation having "first class constitutional importance," to quote Erskine May. The bill, however, is publicly known now to act in such a manner as to render the offense of abortion innocuous, something to which people have a kind of entitlement, something that has never before appeared in any court of Canada, in its statutes, in common law, or in legal tradition. The bill literally begs to be condemned, and burned, or else amended very substantially indeed.

After only four short weeks of attention by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, this bill has barely even begun to receive a genuine legal assessment, let alone an assessment of its real ethical, scientific, sociological and constitutional effects. It is pertinent to the privilege of the whole house to be properly informed by our committee about the failings, the pitfalls, the far-reaching ramifications and influence of legislation so involuted and so seditious as Bill C-43 in its received form.

Honourable senators, on Wednesday, November 7, I presented well-researched responsibilities of a select committee treating legislation of first-class constitutional significance. I trust that honourable senators have had time since that date to reflect on these parliamentary responsibilities and to confirm my numerous citations of authorities, most of which were references to Beauchesne, by paragraph humbers.

In summary, committee responsibility devolves from the implicit responsibility of the whole house. An example of that fact exists in the common use of Committees of the Whole in the British House of Commons since the Second World War, and even in the first decades of Parliament after Magna Carta. To date, matters of deep constitutional significance receive the fullest committee treatment in parliamentary systems of responsible democratic governments. They also admit of extensive provisions for substantial amendment, even amendment of the objects of such bills after second reading. In Canada, this depth of treatment may not be undertaken by a select committee without the requisite instruction from the whole house. This again reflects the answerability of a committee to the implied Committee of the Whole.

It cannot be denied that Bill C-43, or any legislation on abortion, has deep constitutional significance. That is one reason why this matter of being allowed to address in full the motion to instruct a committee is one of privilege. On being prevented from at least addressing my motion, I am deterred from acting in a just manner according to my legislative responsibilities. None of us can duly instruct a committee so needy as the present Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs unless we can raise the motion and debate it. Being so long preempted from debate amounts to justice delayed, which is justice denied.

Bill C-43 is of the gravest import for the future of Canadian society, as it erodes the proper appreciation of the fact that each of us was already subject to a constitution the moment we came into existence. It does that by artificially suspending the protection that every valid constitution confers on all its subjects. No constitution is at all valid that does not envision itself as applying to each and every successive generation.

Every being that is human and conceived in the confederation of Canada is a subject of Canadian law. What else may I ask? Does a child grow up lawless until he or she signs an oath of allegiance? If children before birth are unconstituted, nothing in the act of birth can make one a subject who can be awarded damages received before birth, as is our enlightened practice today.

Moreover, "true patriot love" cannot be commanded in any son or daughter who is dispensable. Is a child from its inception a subject of law and order, or is it subject merely to anarchy? If anarchy, who dare compel the generations for whom our former sons and daughters fought and died to uphold the torch of the common good?

Honourable senators, even Lord Ellenborough, in framing the law on abortion in 1803, knew enough to call the child in the womb a subject of the monarch. Surely, a Canadian child en ventre de sa mère is a subject of the "rule of law and the supremacy of God," the very foundations of the Canadian Charter.

These are self-evident principles, as is the supremacy of God and the rule of law. The entire parliamentary system had its own germination under the protective canopy of precisely these principles. It too was subject from the moment of its conception.

Now, a Canadian Constitution cannot suffer the violence of interruption, which is bound to have far-reaching, seditious effects, in the rule of law. In abortion on request, or abortion as cosmetic surgery, or abortion for personal aspirations, the presumption of innocence is a dead letter: 'on est mort'.

• (1520)

Plaintiffs of abortion are not then considered common folk who seek to reestablish peace, but are criminalized in reverse. Even Justice Minister Campbell glowingly threatens that prosecutors of abortionists will be themselves prosecuted. This she sets out clearly in her recent letter and document to Canadian doctors.

That letter and attachment sent to doctors by the Justice Minister at the end of last month reveals a draconian design which was courageously exposed by Peter Stockland in the Ottawa Sun newspaper on Remembrance Day. Mr. Stockland noted, "Nowhere in the justice minister's 10-page philosophical whoop-whoop is 'interest in the fetus' so much as mentioned". The prosecution of those who would try to arraign abortionists is mentioned several times, and this despite the reality that two-thirds of Canadians have clearly expressed their desire for protection of the unborn from conception, and nearly three-quarters have as yet not forgotten that the unborn is in fact a human being, constituted at conception.

Mr. Stockland rightly recognizes here the fraudulent abuse of criminal law power to "expressly recognize the legality of abortions performed by doctors," to quote Justice Minister Campbell, rather than to curb the criminal act of abortion, as an entry in the Criminal Code under this section ought to do.

The bill, as presently worded, is a sham. However, the Senate committee studying this bill seems to be blinded by attempts to limit the full study of Bill C-43. It has been stated in committee that no amendments are going to be considered for report by the committee handling Bill C-43, even though it is fraught with contradictions having enormous and, as I mentioned previously, seditious, legal, and constitutional consequences. No amendments have been sought out, and the bill's real faults have barely been discussed, outside the brief witnesses of only two pro-life representations. I requested the Physicians for Life group to give us any amendments they thought should be included.

Our parliamentary duty is clear, honourable senators. The Canadian public long has clamoured for a reassertion of that "valid" and "pressing, substantial interest" the state clearly has in the lives of its citizens yet in the womb or, as the case may be, in vitro. These are the words affirmed several times by the Supreme Court of Canada in Morgentaler (1988) and earlier in Oakes (1986). Even in Daigle (1989), Parliament is expressly invited to express as a "normative task" its plenary legislative power to protect those tiny citizens yet unborn and whose very lives are being affected by Bill C-43. As I remarked on November 7, a "normative task" is a definitive task for the legislature to clarify its legislative will. If such will is misled, it must also be enlightened.

All of Canada's children are destined to engage in Parliament and seek to understand today's legislation and politics. Even the Criminal Code does not hesitate to apply the term "child" to everyone before birth. To undo now the genuine parliamentary entitlement of future subjects would be treasonous. Accordingly, it would be treacherous to permit a committee examining such things to fall so far short in its own duty by failing to instruct it, as is our duty and our privilege, honourable senators.

Let there be no mistake that Bill C-43, as it stands now, cannot be upheld by a huge population of conscientious Canadians, most of whom can only acknowledge the spirit of criminal law predicated on historical and reasonable foundations. Such law cannot so destructively crush together both the principle of the law and its "escape clause" or "exculpatory provisions," as occurs in Bill C-43. For true Christians, Orthodox Jews and members of every religion acknowledging the one God of the Canadian Charter, "exculpatory provisions" can only include medical intervention having no intent to cause the death of a child before, during, or after birth.

That principle is still present in related sections of the Criminal Code, which Bill C-43 essentially confounds. Admittedly, in order to save the life of a mother and uphold her security of person when potential arraignment for conspiracy is imminent, it is necessary always for her to have access to all that is legitimate medical care. Abortion is neither medical, nor is it care.

Certain legislators have too eagerly formed the opinion that Canadian religious leaders acquiesce to Bill C-43. Yet, for instance, the Chairman of the Committee of the Conference of Catholic Bishops, who argued against Bill C-43, said on March 7, 1990, "We do not at all approve Bill C-43 in its present form; to that precise question, our answer was a categorical no." Winnipeg Archbishop Exner, speaking for the Catholic bishops of the west, said on March 2, "Bill C-43, as it stands, does not provide the required protection for the preborn".

All true Christian denominations condemn the same glaring socalled "enshrinement" of abortion that Bill C-43 represents. The law of the Jews, upon which Christian mercy is founded, equally abhors human holocaust and abortion. As I mentioned in my speech on Bill C-43 on June 26, 1990, Dr. Abraham, a renowned ethicist in Israel, and director of a department of medicine in Jerusalem, unabashedly calls abortion "murder". Bill C-43, therefore, in its received form, is discriminatory against orthodox religion, and in its promised punitive measures against public protest, it is in fact a persecution of Christ and of Moses. Without dramatic amendment, which is incumbent upon us, Bill C-43 tramels the preamble, section 1, section 2, section 3, section 7, section 15(1), and section 24(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The point I am making, honourable senators, at great pain, is that Bill C-43 must be closely examined for its seditious flaws and its far-reaching legal and constitutional ramifications for Canadian society; and, further, that profound, substantial or reasoned amendments be considered and debated even at the committee stage. To this end, expert witnesses, such as the lawyers I have recommended to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and moralists such as those

I have also recommended, ought to be summoned and heard at least as attentively as the preponderance of pro-abortion witnesses the committee has already heard, and has yet to hear.

As I pointed out in a communiqué to the press released on November 20, an exerpt of which I have also sent to each honourable senator earlier today, fewer than one of every five witnesses slated for appearance by the steering committee has been of the pro-life persuasion, more truly representative of Canadians than the witnesses we have already heard. The pro-abortion witnesses speak neither for the democracy of the dead, nor for the majority of the living, nor for those Canadians yet unborn.

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has refrained from continuing until further notice. This is sensible until the matter here under discussion, namely, to render an instruction to the committee, is settled; otherwise, the motion to instruct the committee may find itself out of order by the rule of non-interference.

Since the committee in question has not progressed to consideration of Bill C-43 in its objects and amendments, and has not undertaken debate on these pertinent matters—not even the strictly legal and constitutional matters—we have the present opportunity to uphold our full parliamentary duty, and debate this privilege and motion to instruct in a Committee of the Whole.

Honourable senators, we in the Senate pride ourselves on being the chamber of sober second thought. If we do not instruct the committee to fully study Bill C-43, then that description is a sham.

The Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee has the power to summon expert witnesses and to hear representations from the two-thirds of Canadians who oppose abortion on request. The committee should seriously consider amendments to correct the identified flaws of Bill C-43, such as separating the "criminal principle" from the "exculpatory provision". It should also examine the flaws in Bill C-43, as I pointed out in my speech on June 26. It must assess the far-reaching constitutional and jurisprudential consequences of enacting such a law. However, honourable senators, the committee is not doing that. Instead, it has heard from non-expert witnesses, most of whom were heard already before the Legislative Committee of the House of Commons, and whose inaccuracies are not being examined or debated.

However, if the committee were to report the bill without amendment, as one of its regular members has publicly promised to do, it would either ensure passage of a bad law or bring about its quick demise, with no law to replace it. What that manoeuvre will not do, however, is properly inform honourable senators who seek to correct the faults of Bill C-43, whether and how such amendment may be possible. That is why the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee so direly needs an instruction, which it is my privilege to move today.

Honourable senators, the time-honoured understanding is that the Senate is a chamber of sober second thought. If we do not uphold this recognized function, then the Senate's role in good government is a sham. If we do not stand up for principle, we are merely rubber-stamping laws or acting as puppets of an arrogant and stubborn government.

MOTION UNDER RULE 33 TO RESOLVE THE SENATE INTO A COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I move, therefore, seconded by Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), pursuant to Rule 33, that it be taken up in the Committee of the Whole, named "Privileges", whether it is a matter of privilege for a Senator to move, as I have already done, to instruct a Standing Committee, as in Motion Number 3 on the Order Paper, to wit: In order to oblige a committee to uphold its parliamentary duty, and furthermore, whether it is a matter of privilege to abridge the pending Orders of the Day in order to bring such a motion to timely and full debate. According to Rule 33, we should be resolved into a Committee of the Whole in order to settle this question of privilege and to render an acceptable remedy, which it is my contention must be done forthwith after the debate and vote on the said "motion to Instruct the Committee" in question.

● (1540)

The Hon. the Speaker: We need the motion, Senator Haidasz. I have to read it.

Senator Haidasz: Does Your Honour want to read it?

The Hon. the Speaker: Of course. If you submit it to the house, I have to read it.

Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Haidasz, seconded by Senator—

Senator Frith: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure—

Senator Doody: Dispense.

The Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, in the absence of Senator Nurgitz, who is chairman of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and Senator Stanbury, who is deputy chairman, I would like to say a few words as the third member of the steering committee of that committee.

Of course, I have been aware of the motion by Senator Haidasz that is before the house, and I am aware of his sentiments as regards the conduct of the committee and the question of witnesses.

I should explain that a committee meeting was held informally, composed of a majority of committee members, at which we discussed the conduct of the study of this bill. Senator Haidasz was not a member of the committee at that time but he became one very shortly after. Senator Hatfield was present, as were a number of others whose names I have. Knowing we are involved here in the house with the debate on Bill C-62, we were aware that we were not going to be able to conduct a regular series of meetings in the foreseeable future or, if we could hold any meetings, they would be just whenever a slot arose temporarily and we could get witnesses on very short notice. As I said, senator Haidasz was not a member of the committee at that time but very shortly after he did become one.

At that meeting we tried to decide how our committee would approach its study of Bill C-43. We were aware that almost every organization and every person who had asked to be heard in the House of Commons was going to ask to be heard in our Committee as well. We had full committee records from the other side, with the detailed testimony and the briefs of people and organizations who did not actually appear. That information hs been made available to all our members. So the idea was simply to try and focus our study, if we could, without repeating everything that had been done on the other side. That was really the object.

Particularly, given the timeframe in which we have to work, I may say that we felt we had to hear from what you may call the pro-choice groups and also from some of the pro-life groups. We were especially interested in hearing from the doctors because of their obvious concern with the present Bill C-43, particularly in view of the recent Supreme Court decisions and a decision in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

Our objective is to try to get on with this study in some way and still allow a broad range of opinion to be again brought before our committee. We made a decision to focus on the bill itself, and that it would not serve our purposes or indeed expedite our study of the bill if we were to get into extensive philosophical, ethical and metaphysical questions.

This is, of course, where those of us who made the decision at that committee meeting and Senator Haidasz, have a difference of opinion. In fairness to Senator Haidasz, he has several times made it very clear to us that he feels we should spend months and months to discuss this in great detail and bring all the witnesses to discuss the ethical, moral and metaphysical aspects of this very difficult question.

At this point I feel I would not be misrepresenting the feelings of the people on the committee if I were to say that if possible we are trying to focus only on the legal aspects, particularly whether any changes could be made in the bill that would not be challenged by the courts. I am not sure that is possible. Certainly we did not want to consider changes that we know have already been ruled on in the courts. It would be useless to bring them before you.

Senator Haidasz has raised this question several times, and I may say I suggested to Senator Nurgitz on a couple of occasions in the last week or two that we should have another meeting of the full committee to go over the list of witnesses. We have the 28 names here of organizations and individuals who have asked to appear before the committee. The list reveals that almost every one of them has been heard on the other side, and we have their briefs. However, I thought it would be useful if, with Senator Haidasz present, we went through this list to try to come up with a reasonable number of witnesses. We have, of course, heard from the Minister of Justice, who will be returning at the conclusion of the hearings.

Just to correct the record, because Senator Haidasz has used different figures from time to time, we have heard from approximately six witnesses. We would hear from the Canadian Civil Liberties Association on almost every legal matter that comes before our committee. We have heard from the National Association of Women in the Law, and from Dr. Henry Morgentaler. In addition to that, we have heard from Campagne Quebec Vie, Mr. Gilles Grondin, who is a strong pro-life exponent, and Ms. Margot Cafferty, who is vice-president of another Quebec organization called Objectif: Survie-Québec.

We have also heard from Physicians for Choice and from Physicians for Life. In those circumstances we have heard from at least a reasonable number on each side. That would be three on one side and three who are taking what you might call an independent view. I think that Physicians for Choice was strongly for choice. In fairness, Women in the Law stated in their brief that they feel this law is not necessary.

Honourable senators, I simply tell you this because we are trying, under rather difficult circumstances in dealing with this bill, to bring before the committee a number of people we can speak to about their opinions. I assure Senator Haidasz that as soon as we can we will arrange to have another meeting of the committee at which we will go through this list and try to make a decision.

● (1550)

I remind the honourable senator that the rules are clear that it is the committee itself which makes the decision about the witnesses, and that the matter does not come before the house. I am sorry that I am not able to elaborate any more on the matter than that.

I would like to move the adjournment of this matter myself, if I may, in case Senator Nurgitz would like to add anything to it.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

MOTION TO SUPPORT FRANCHISES

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Norman K. Atkins, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

> That, mindful of the fact that the game of hockey is part of the Canadian identity, and that the National Hockey League is considering expansion; and that any further expansion of the National Hockey League would benefit from the inclusion of Canadian teams, the Senate of Canada supports the efforts of Ottawa and Hamilton in their bid to obtain National Hockey League franchises.

JAPAN

MOTION TO CONVEY FELICITATIONS ON 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF INSTITUTION OF PARLIAMENTARY DEMOCRACY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), moved:

> That the Speaker of the Senate convey to the Speaker of the Japanese House of Representatives and the Speaker of the Japanese House of Councillors the good wishes of the Senate of Canada on the occasion of the 100th anniversary of the institution of Parliamentary democracy in Japan.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to give a brief explanation.

Senator Atkins and I are both members of the executive of the Canada-Japan Parliamentary Friendship Association. I would point out to honourable senators that this motion was moved and passed in the other place.

This week marks the 100th anniversary of the parliamentary institution in Japan. To note the continuing good relationship between Canada and Japan and our expanding contacts both economically and culturally, we felt it appropriate to raise this matter in the Senate.

[Translation]

The Hon. Paul David: May I ask a question to the honourable Senator Perrault? Are we going to celebrate the hundredth anniversary of a democracy that never failed? Weren't there periods where that democracy was more of an autocracy? Is it a democracy that was faultless for a full hundred years? I do not know much about the history of Japan. I am just asking you the question.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it can be said that all democracies come under stress, trial and strain from time to time.

Senator Doody: Even this one!

Senator Perrault: It has even been known to happen in this distinguished chamber of ours. However, the fact is that 100 years ago the institution of Parliament was established in Japan despite times of trial, particularly during the 1930s. I am sure the honourable senator was referring to that period of time which was a difficult one for democracy in that country.

However, we, as Canadians, are glad to see that the institutions in Japan have weathered the particular vicissitudes of that time. Thus, we, as Canadians, note the fact that the institution of democracy has been established for a full century. We wish the Japanese people well as they develop their parliamentary systems in the years to come, just as we hope to improve our parliamentary procedures and our institution in the years to come.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Is the honourable senator keeping in mind the 1940s when the Japanese were the enemies of North America? Is he also keeping in mind Pearl Harbour? Was that democracy?

[Senator Atkins, .]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall is referring to the same difficult period as that referred to by his colleague Senator David. We, of course, remember those incidents because there were Canadians involved in the tragedies of the Second World War. One need only visit the cemetery at Yokohama and the Canadian cemetery at Hong Kong to understand the degree of sacrifice made by Canadians during the Second World War.

However, despite the fact that a war was under way, the Japanese Parliament continued its operations and the dissident forces in that country ultimately emerged victorious. Parliament was not abolished during that period of time. It went through severe trials, and we recognize that. Our good friends in Japan are the first to admit that. One need only visit the Japanese Diet today to realize that they have a very vigorous democracy at the present time. I understand that both chambers are under change, fnnovation, reformation and review at this very moment in an effort to democratize still further the Japanese system of choosing members for both houses.

● (1600)

In recognition of Japan's century of Parliament yesterday the members in the other place passed a similar resolution unanimously. It is presented in the Senate in the same spirit of friendship.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of petitioners from small towns in Quebec—St-Léon, St-Lazare, and others—and on them are the signatures of 120 rather angry Canadians who are not very happy with the GST. They humbly pray and call upon the Senate to reject this new goods and services tax. I should like to read their names.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, again from various small towns in Quebec I have a petition signed by the following people.

(Names of signatories read)

Those are the petitions I have from that area. I have in my hand a petition from Montreal signed by people from different areas of that city. I shall read their names.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1610)

I have another petition here also from the Montreal area.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are several petitions that I would like to table.

I have a petition on behalf of 20 constitutents from the area of St. Michel.

(Names of signatories read)

Again, from the same area, I have another petition.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1620)

Again, from the same area, we have more signatures.

(Names of signatories read)

I will table that petition.

I have one more petition before I turn this over to my colleague to my left. This petition is from LaSalle. LaSalle is very near to my heart, since my husband comes from there.

(Names of signatories read)

I also table this petition. That is the end of my petitions for today.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have the privilege to provide petitions from dozens of petitioners who call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

The first series of petitions, honourable senators, come from all parts of Simcoe, Ontario, which is a small town in southwestern Ontario. R.R. No. 1, R.R. No. 2, and R.R. No. 4. This demonstrates that all areas of the small town of Simcoe have remonstrated against the GST.

Honourable senators, I think it is worthwhile to note that Simcoe plays a very important part in the establishment, or the roots, of the Conservative Party in Ontario. It certainly plays a very important part in the foundations of the province of Ontario, because Simcoe, which is a small town in the heart of the tobacco district, is named after John Graves Simcoe, the first Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada. He was appointed in 1791, arrived in Canada in 1792, and maintained his tenure as the first Lieutenant-Governor until 1796—a very short period. However, during that period he played a very important role in the creation of many institutions that exist to the present day. The town of Simcoe, in the heart of this area, was visited by him in 1793 and was subsequently named after him when it was established a century later. At that time, when Lieutenant-Governor John Graves Simcoe arrived, he quickly came to the view that southwestern Ontario would play a very important part in the heartland of the North American continent.

The reason I am so familiar with the history of Lieutenant-Governor Simcoe is that I attended in Ontario a public school called "Governor Simcoe Public School." That school was named after him. There was a very interesting historical connection between the town in Ontario where I was born and brought up and Toronto.

Perhaps it might be useful, senators, to indicate that we have petitions from the town of Simcoe, from the city of London, and from the city of Metropolitan Toronto. All these three very important and dynamic areas were established by Governor Simcoe. London was established when it was decided by Governor Simcoe when he visited there that it should become the capital of Upper Canada. In fact, a town was laid out on the banks of the River Thames and one hundred yards from that same river is the Victoria Hospital where I was introduced into this world. So I became very familiar with that area and with the court house that was established at the fork of the Thames. At that time it was Governor Simcoe's intention to transform the town into the capital of Ontario. At the same time he visited Fork York, which was a very strategic military establishment, and later decided, prior to his leaving Canada, that York rather than London would become the capital of Upper Canada.

The history of Fort York has its roots in the Indian lore of Canada. Toronto was an Indian village on the banks of Lake Ontario. It became a route between Lake Huron and Lake Ontario and was used as early as 1615 by Etienne Brulé as part of his travels from the northwest of Canada back into the heartland and up the St. Lawrence.

Later on the town of Fort York was called Fort Rouillé and subsequently the remains of that fort are still existent today in the famous Canadian Exhibition grounds. After that the old fort transformed itself into Fort York and then subsequently into Toronto, which is the Indian word for "a meeting place." I give honourable senators the history of London, Simcoe and Toronto because all of these areas, as I say, could be traced to the influence of Lieutenant-Governor Simcoe and he opened immediately the establishment of southwestern Ontario with the grant of lands to Tory Loyalists.

Subsequently he did some rather interesting things. He appointed lieutenants of the counties and introduced a court of the King's Bench. He was ahead of his time because at the very early period he declared slavery illegal. He set up municipal councils and schools and, in effect, laid the very foundations of the great province of Ontario.

When we turn to the petitions we received from Simcoe, Ontario—which I have visited many times and also worked there as a student—I find it ironic that these cornerstones of Ontario, founded by Tory tradition, now uniformly and almost unanimously are remonstrating against this tax.

Honourable senators, we should learn from history that many Tory Loyalist families who first pioneered these areas of southwestern Ontario decided to do so not only because they were uncomfortable or unhappy with the revolution that was taking place south of the border, but also because they were unhappy with the tax structure of the day. It is a very interesting chapter in history that Ontario, as well as many other places across Canada, essentially were established by people who were fleeing from governments that were insensitive to their needs as citizens. Those governments burdened their citizens with taxes and a very unfair allocation of how those taxes should be remitted.

Honourable senators, I think these petitions bring potently to our attention that when every corner of a small town like Simcoe voluntarily petitions the government to refrain from introducing the goods and services tax, there should be a message. As I have said in earlier addresses, this is a "crie de coeur" from the very parts of Ontario that were founded by Tories, and these petitions, therefore, should commend themselves to the government.

When I turn to the next layer of petitions, they are from Plainfield, Ontario; Wellington, Ontario; Ardoch, Ontario; and Ajax, Ontario. Again, small town Ontario almost uniformly comes forward and requests and petitions the government to refrain from introducing the goods and services tax. These towns are not alone.

I have here a roll call of the great towns of Ontario. Lindsay, Ontario, is the home of Leslie Frost who was a great Tory premier of this province. We have a number of petitions from Lindsay, Ontario; Haliburton, Ontario; the north part of Ontario—where I spent many enjoyable and important summers—Bolton, Ontario; Ennismore, Ontario; and Kitchener, Ontario.

Honourable senators, Kitchener also has a very interesting history. Kitchener was essentially founded by German settlers and was known as Berlin before the First World War. Until the Second World War, the predominant emigration to that area came from Germany. In the nineteenth century, they were fleeing Germany from the burdens and economic conditions placed on them by a European mindless government.

It is interesting to note that during the First World War, Berlin, Ontario, which was also the birthplace of William Lyon MacKenzie King, changed its name to Kitchener, Ontario. After the Second World War, the demographics of that city changed quite dramatically so that now not only does Kitchener have a strong and robust German Canadian population but it also presently has a multicultural population that represents every region of the world.

When we see on this list of petitions the names that come from Asia and other parts of Europe other than Germany, we see that every part of the colourful citizenry of Kitchener is remonstrating against this tax.

We move to Willowdale, Ontario, from where we have a number of petitions. Willowdale, as you know, is located in the city of North York which is one of the great metropolitan areas that comprise the family of the greater Metropolitan Toronto area. We have petitions from the north, Minden, Ontario; and from the southwest, from Chatham, Ontario.

Honourable senators will know the origins of Chatham. It is a dynamic, industrial centre in southwestern Ontario between London and Windsor. Cobourg, Ontario—again, proud of its roots and an important and vibrant part of small-town Ontario; also Oshawa, Ontario, from where we have today received numerous petitions; Bracebridge, Ontario, in the north; and St. Catharines in the Niagara peninsula.

The borough of Scarborough is, again, one of the dynamic cities that comprise the greater Metropolitan Toronto area. We have a number of petitions from all parts of Scarborough which was and is a very important and fascinating place in the eastern portion of greater Metropolitan Toronto. While originally populated by stock from the United Kingdom, it is now a rainbow in diversity from the various communities that now populate this borough. In more recent years, Scarborough has become the centre of a huge influx of Canadians of Hong Kong descent who have increased not only the cultural colour but also the dynamic atmosphere that has pervaded Scarborough for the last decade. Every part of Scarborough is represented on these petitions.

● (1640)

I now move outside of greater Metropolitan Toronto to Oakville. Oakville is the home of the Ford Motor plant and one of the most gentle and, and I think, beautiful residential communities in all of Canada. Again, there are signatures of residents from every part of that community including some from the Lakeshore north and south. There are names which represent every ethnic origin. All these people remonstrate against the GST.

I now turn to St. Catharines, Niagara Falls, Fort Erie and Port Colborne. All these wonderful, important and dynamic towns and cities are located in the Niagara Peninsula. We have the names of people from every part of these communities who remonstrate and petition us to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

I would now like to turn to Lakefield, Ontario, which I believe is east of Toronto. There are also a number of petitions from Caledon, which is in the Caledon hills north of Toronto, and an important recreational area. Obviously, the concern of people there is with respect to the deep, pervasive and damaging impact the goods and services tax will have on their local economy.

Then, honourable senators, I turn to a number of petitions from the area of Kingston, Ontario. I would like to read senators very briefly the outline of this petition which is different from the previous ones to which I have referred.

The petition states as follows:

> Whereas the Government of Canada has seen fit since Confederation and without hiatus to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books, newspapers—

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I do not want to prolong this proceeding unnecessarily. However, I would really like to remind honourable senators again that the point in the proceedings at which we are is the Reading of Petitions. I draw attention to page 57 of our rule book in which—

Senator Turner: What about the other rules?

Senator Kelly: I would refer to those, too, if I could come across them.

Senator Turner: Talk to the Speaker, then.

Senator Kelly: On page 57 under "Presentation of Petitions" it states very specifically that the petition itself is not read. I may be in error in assuming that Senator Grafstein was preparing to read a petition. I simply wanted to head that off to save him from making an error.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate that, honourable senator. I did not intend to read the petition. Whereas the earlier petitions which I referred to were general and petition us simply to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax, this petition is more specific and directs the government's attention to the zero rate of tax on magazines and newspapers and is concerned that these items will now have the GST applied to them. It is a very brief statement to which I would like to refer. I do not intend to read the entire statement. The statement I wish to read sums up the purport of the petition. It states:

> Whereas uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by the GST application, therefore, the undersigned reaffirm the historical principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by proposing an amendment to include the retention of the zero rate in Bill C-62.

It is important to note that this petition comes from Kingston which is important in terms of the economic, social and cultural mix which makes up Ontario. As I look at the petition I see that there are a number of signatures of people living adjacent to one of the greatest educational institutions in the country, Queen's University.

I must say, honourable senators, that I am particularly delighted to receive these petitions from Queen's University because the Queen's Quarterly, which was published just last month, contained an excerpt of one of the speeches I gave to the Senate in June of this year regarding China's policy. It was an intervention to which Senator Doody was so kind to listen with such attentiveness. I have a particular bias, at least for this moment, to present petitions from the regions adjacent to Queen's University since the university saw fit to publish excerpts of a speech I gave here in the Senate.

From every part of Kingston, including Queen's University, we find the names of citizen after citizen and student after student asking us to stop the introduction of the GST.

I think it is important to note for honourable senators opposite who are not from this part of Canada but from the province of Quebec that the people of that province appear to have solved their particular problem in a way that is satisfactory to them. This gives people at Queen's University and, indeed, people in all universities in the province of Ontario the feeling that they may in fact be discriminated against.

I was asked yesterday about a report that some students had received that Quebec had settled its problem by obtaining from the Province of Quebec, and I assume from the Government of Canada, an undertaking that the GST would not be applied to the books of students attending universities. Obviously, honourable senators opposite have not solved the problem for the province of Ontario because we have heard—

Senator Olson: Or for Alberta.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senator, you can speak for the province of Alberta. I am here to represent the province of Ontario.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, please, I must rise on a point of order. The honourable senator is indulging, or at least moving into, a debate on an issue that has been discussed at some length when an amendment involving that particular subject was considered. If this is Presentation of Petitions, why not just proceed with Presentation of Petitions and save that sort of speech for the debate on the bill?

• (1650)

Senator Grafstein: I do not intend to make a speech, honourable senators. Perhaps I could conclude by saying that I think there is a concern that must be shared by all senators, including Senator Kelly, who represents the province of Ontario just as I do. There is a feeling among students that their senators and their representatives in the other place are not powerfully representing their interests in the same way as Quebec members and Quebec senators opposite seem to be able to impose their wishes on not only the Government of Quebec but also on the Government of Canada.

I only suggest to Senator Kelly that perhaps he and I can join into some sort of partnership in order to do our duty on behalf of the province of Ontario. Perhaps we would receive similar treatment, non-discriminatory treatment, for these poor students, who in many respects are students to be impoverished by the GST.

Honourable senators, returning to the petitions at hand, I have one here from Kingston. As honourable senators know—Senator Kelly, in particular, who, I know, is familiar with the demographics of Kingston—while it was essentially, prior to the Second World War, overwhelmingly of British, Irish and Scottish stock, there is now in Kingston a population that represents every ethnic origin. Looking at these names from Kingston, it is clear that they represent many parts of Europe and Asia. By examining these dozens of names on petitions from Kingston, it is clear that they are not only from every ethnic background but obviously from every economic level of society. It is also clear that the population of Kingston appears to be almost unanimous in its rejection not only of the GST in general but the GST as it applies to one of the important educational and economic engines in Kingston—the GST as it applies to books and ultimately to students.

Honourable senators, moving away from Kingston, I have petitions from other areas and cities in southeastern Ontario, including Napanee, Battersea, Godfrey, Sydenham—virtually every small town. Honourable senators, I may be incorrect in this because we have not made a tabulation of it, but I do not believe there is one small town in Ontario or the southern portions of Ontario which I have been concentrating on in lo these many weeks from whence we have not received a petition. I think if we were to go into the history of this important moment in the parliamentary process, one of the things that should be noted in the history books is that practically every small town in Ontario has had its citizens, or a goodly number of them, sign a petition. I do not think that this is the work of one or two organized efforts. I think it is a spontaneous response to citizens' concerns about the GST.

When one examines the names on this petition, one can see that they were written with different pens and obviously in different handwriting. The petitioners give not only their names but also their addresses and their postal codes. It strikes me that these Canadian citizens are very concerned about the GST. I think it is remarkable, honourable senators, that for the first time in modern history in the province of Ontario—it may be different in other provinces of the country, but certainly in this province—we have received so many petitions from so many people at so many levels of society. Surely there is a message there. We hope, when the final vote is taken on the GST some time before my 75th birthday, that senators opposite will take these heartfelt petitions into account.

Honourable senators, I have before me petitions signed by citizens of other communities, including Wakefield, Peterborough, Morden, Oakville, Harcourt, Oak Ridges, McArthur Hills, Highland Grove, Norwood, Whitney, Caledonia, Wilberforce, Haliburton, Hamilton, Woodville, Burlington, Milton, Watertown, Minden and others.

Honourable senators, this is a random cross-section of petitions and I do not believe one small town is not represented. All of these citizens humbly pray and beseech the Senate to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. I ask honourable senators opposite how we can turn these aside and not even provide any relief by way of amendment. How can these Canadian citizens respect the process of government if there is absolutely no change or amendment made to this legislation?

As I said earlier, honourable senators, I welcome the change in heart by the government. Senator Everett is not here, but he confirmed to me earlier this afternoon that he felt what we were doing is worthwhile. I had asked him whether or not these many, many weeks have now paid off, and even he said—and I do not want to quote him out of context—that he felt it was. He had received a letter from the Minister of Finance indicating that if the GST is approved surplus funds would be used to reduce the deficit. Even he, who has taken a rather interesting position with respect not only to the length of these debates but also to the substance of them—has now concurred that we have had some action. We have obviously done something right if the Minister of Finance is now prepared to put himself on the record in that manner for the very first time.

I will conclude by saying this, honourable senators: The news that we received from the province of Quebec that that province has now not only moved itself, but, obviously, motivated the federal government to move seems to be due to the internal efforts not only of the book publishing industry there but honourable senators opposite, I assume, and elected members from the other place and members of the Quebec legislature. If we have accomplished nothing more than a recognition of the points that we have been making so arduously in the last many hours, days and weeks, surely these are two accomplishments.

Therefore, when honourable senators opposite ask themselves whether this has been a waste of time, we on this side can say: "No, not at all." There appears to be a change of heart. Obviously, the substance of these petitions is finally getting through and there is some movement on the other side.

[Senator Grafstein.]

• (1700)

If we stay here another two or three months, perhaps the government will revise the bill in such a fashion as to make it much more commendable to these Canadians who have petitioned so arduously to stop the infamous proposed goods and services tax.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I have a petition signed by 31 people from the province of Newfoundland.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, today in the mail I received a letter from the Mayor of the city of Mount Pearl. It says:

1990-11-23

The Honourable William J. Petten

Centre Block, Parliament Buildings

Ottawa

K1A 0A4

Dear Sir:

The City of Mount Pearl wishes to register its concern over the proposed imposition of the Goods and Services Tax.

Given the fact that Canada is now into a recession and that unemployment and bankruptcies are increasing, the prospect of the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax has become an even greater concern to everyone.

The impact of the Goods and Services Tax on municipalities will be severe, given the fact that the effects of a recession are always felt earlier and last longer in this Province compared with the rest of Canada. If the Goods and Services Tax is implemented, our citizens will be directly and indirectly negatively impacted.

We urge you, in response to the overwhelming opposition evident throughout the Country, to defeat the Goods and Services Tax that is now before the Senate.

Sincerely,

Harvey Hodder,
Mayor

(Names of signatories read)

Allison Petten happens to be my niece. She received her early nurse's training in St. John's, Newfoundland at the General Hospital School of Nursing. She then went to Dalhousie University and has just received her nurse's degree. She is not my daughter so I can brag a little more. She is my niece and she finished at the top of her class.

Sandra Reynolds is also my niece, she is married and lives in St. John's. She is my brother Tom's daughter.

Senator Steuart: How many relatives do you have in Newfoundland?

Senator Petten: I have quite a few relatives in Newfoundland.

I have another petition with 26 names on it.

(Names of signatories read)

Bell Island is in Conception Bay. When you are in Kelligrews you can look across the bay and see Bell Island. There was once a famous iron ore mine there. The mine goes out a distance of four or five miles under Conception Bay towards Bay Roberts.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 27 names on it.

(Names of signatories read)

I should explain to my honourable colleagues who are not from Newfoundland that Grand Falls and Windsor are adjacent towns. It is just a matter of crossing the TransCanada Highway. Now there is an overpass so no one gets killed going back and forth. That has been much easier on the citizens.

Senator Doody: It is easier on the moose also.

Senator Petten: That is true. There is a great population of moose there.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1710)

Senator Marshall: What about Corner Brook?

Senator Petten: I am sure if I look through them, there must be one here. There is one from Grand Falls; but I will find one for you, I am sure.

An Hon. Senator: What about Port-au-Port?

Senator Petten: We will find one there, for sure.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition here from my province, Newfoundland. Most of them are from central Newfoundland. There are 27 persons writing.

(Names of signatories read)

I have one other petition, and then I will turn it over to my colleague on the left. I am still looking for a name from Corner Brook for Senator Marshall.

(Names of signatories read)

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 5,645 men and women from the province of Quebec who are asking the Senate to defeat the bill on the GST. The number of petitioners is, as I said, 5,645. I am not sure I will be able to read all their names tonight, but I will try. I cannot swear I will succeed.

(Names of signatories read)

We are now coming to Longueuil.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1720)

A nice family united against the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

They are all against the GST. Many people of Longueuil oppose this tax.

(Names of signatories read)

The fact remains that a great number of Canadian families, of Italian origin, are all against the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1730)

These Montrealers are unanimously opposed to the GST. They ask that we say so loud and clear to a government which is not listening to them.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is 5:45 p.m. Pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3(a), the Senate shall proceed to the deferred division on Senator Lawson's motion in amendment to Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that Bill C-62 be now read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Lawson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Waters, that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended to require that the excess revenues derived from the goods and services tax be applied to reduce the public debt of Canada, by adding on page 278, immediately after line 27, the following new clause and renumbering the subsequent clauses of the Bill accordingly:

Application of excess revenues

"18. Beginning with the fiscal year that ends on March 31, 1992, such of the revenues derived under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act in each fiscal year as exceed 21 thousand million dollars shall be applied forthwith to the purchase for cancellation of securities of Canada within the meaning of the Financial Administration Act."

Please call in the senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, a special order adopted by the Senate on Monday ordered that my motion that the original question be now put be temporarily set aside until two amendments to Bill C-62, moved by Senator Waters and Senator Lawson, had been disposed of. Those amendments having been disposed of, I am now bringing forward this motion and, therefore, move, seconded by Senator Doody, that the original question be now put.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Murray, seconded by Senator Doody, that the original question be now put.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a question of order, the Leader of the Government referred to house order No. 2 dealing with the two amendments by the independents and the fact that the order provided for the setting aside of the motion made earlier. That could only refer to the proceedings of November 22 last and would be based on the assumption that the motion had, in fact, been moved and had, in fact, been put; otherwise there would be nothing to set aside.

Honourable senators, I think the record should be clear on this question.

An Hon. Senator: It is.

Senator Frith: Good; I think it is too. I think it is very clear and I would refer to it to prove that to whoever on the opposite side said it is quite right.

Honourable senators, I refer you to the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, November 22, 1990, at page 3932. After the vote at the top of that page in the left hand column it reads as follows:

> The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.
>
> Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators—
>
> Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It is after 6 o'clock—
> Senator Murray: —I move that the original—

An Hon. Senator: Dashing all over the place.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): It is Christmastime.

> Senator Frith: —and the Speaker must leave the Chair.
> Senator Murray: —question be now put.

Some Hon. Senators: Dash, dash.

Senator Frith: You can all, as they say in sing-a-long, read along with me.

It then goes on:

> Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I move that under Rule 26—

Senator David: Dash?

Senator Frith: It says:

> The Hon. the Speaker: The rules here say that I have to order—that the Orders of the Day shall now be called.

Senator Frith: Pausing there for a moment, to what was the Speaker referring? I think he was quite correct. He was referring to Rule P-3.(a), which is found at page 45b). I will not read the whole of the rule but it does say that the vote will—

> ". . . be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day, whereupon the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded until the Whips have entered the Chamber and have indicated to the Senator then in the Chair that they are ready to proceed to the taking of the vote; but, in any case, the said bells shall be sounded for not more than 30 minutes, whereupon the vote shall be taken. Orders of the Day shall then be called.

Honourable senators will notice that the Speaker said:

> The rules here say that I have to order—that the Orders of the Day shall now be called.

Senators will remember that that was said after interventions made by Senator Murray and myself. When Senator Murray said: "I move that the original—" and "—and the Speaker must leave the Chair." we were, I suppose, still under either Question Period or petitions, not under Orders of the Day, because Orders of the Day had not been called.

The next speaker on that page is Senator Perrault and he is, shall we say, surprised. He makes reference to a "stunt."

Senator Roblin: Read it.

Senator Frith: Yes, I will. He said:

> So this is your next stunt! It's absolutely disgusting!
>
> The Hon. the Speaker: I am calling for Orders of the Day—
> Senator Perrault: You're a disgrace! What's wrong with you people? You're all a bunch of crooks!

Get this, honourable senators: After Senator Perrault had said, "You're a disgrace! What's wrong with you people? You're all a bunch of crooks!", the Speaker then said: "—which is what the rules say." With regard to that particular phrase, honourable senators, we make no appeal on that ruling. Senator Molgat then said:

> If he wants to call Orders of the Day, all right, call Orders of the Day, and anyone who wants to get up and speak—
> Senator Frith: It is 6 o'clock! Rule 12 requires you to leave the Chair!

Senator Carney: You left out the exclamation marks.

Senator Frith: You didn't give me a chance. It then goes on as follows:

> Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

I hope Senator Carney will not call me to order on that. It then states:

> Senator Frith: You cannot stay in the Chair. It is after 6 o'clock, and you cannot stay in the Chair. Come back at 8 o'clock.

There, in summary, we have the sequence of an attempt by the Leader of the Government to move a motion before Orders of the Day were called. The objection was made that it was 6 o'clock. The Speaker did not acknowledge that, but he did put Orders of the Day. What is the next thing that happened after Orders of the Day had been put? We then see the following:

> Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Lawson: That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but—
> Some Hon. Senators: Sit down! Order!
> Senator Waters:
> —that it be amended to become effective in 1992 instead of 1991 as presently provided in the Bill and, to that end, that the necessary consequential changes be made to the various clauses of the Bill, as more particularly set out hereunder:
> (1) on page 2, in line 27, by striking out "1991" and substituting "1992."

• (2010)

> Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Waters then continues with his amendment.

> Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Waters continues, and then,

> An Hon. Senator: The sound has been cut off. I cannot hear Senator Waters.
> At 9:30 p.m the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

A motion to adjourn was then made by me and, after careful and thoughtful consideration, no doubt, and long consultation with the rules, in which she was, no doubt, much experienced, the Acting Speaker stood up after the explanation was made—and, incidentally, the motion was for the adjournment, and reference was made to P-3.(e), which says:

> In cases not provided for in these Provisional Rules any division requested pursuant to Rule 49(3) may be deferred for a period not to exceed 24 hours whereupon — and so on. I went on to say:

> Now let us just review. In the first place, of course, that question must be put right away.
> Senator Doody: There is a question already on the floor.
> The Hon. the Acting Speaker: —

She had already seized the Chair, and said:

> Honourable senators, honourable senators, order! order!
> Some Hon. Senators: (Applause)

I thank honourable senators for all their help, but it was not "dash, dash"; it was exclamation point, exclamation point. Then Senator Perrault said:

> It has not been put. No question has been put.
> The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Order, order, order. As acting speaker—

This is right after Senator Perrault had said:

> No question has been put,

There is very little space between there for all the careful reflection that this experienced senator had, not only in the chamber but sitting in the Chair, which was:

> Order, order, order. As acting speaker, I rule the motion out of order because, having been in this chamber previously, I heard another motion put, that being the motion of Senator Murray.
> Some Hon. Senators: (Applause).

Or, to repeat it more slowly:

> Order, order, order. As acting speaker, I rule the motion out of order because, having been in this chamber previously, I heard another motion put, that being the motion of Senator Murray,

And, as they are doing now, guess what:

> Hear, hear!

That came from some Honourable Senators. I then said:

> You ruled it out of order before you heard any debate at all, did you?

To which Senator Wood said:

She is out of order!

Senator Perrault said:

> She has made a ruling without any debate! There is no debate anymore.

Senator MacEachen then raised a point of order.

Senator MacEachen: No, no.

Senator Frith: Yes, yes.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I did. Please do not read it.

Senator Frith: I have been asked to not read that because it is not relevant to the point of order I am making. However, considering all the practice that you have had over there helping me, you are all invited at any time to contribute to the debate on this point of order.

I shall turn now to the minutes and try to see the extent to which they reflect what happened. What we find is a broken-field running attempt by the Leader of the Government to move the previous question, interrupted by my calling six o'clock, and before orders of the day had been called; then, after those exchanges and after orders of the day had been called, what happened was tjat a motion in amendment to the motion for third reading was moved by Senator Stan Waters.

The minutes say:

> Therefore the motion and amendment was resolved in the negative.

That is correct. The Honourable Senator Murray, P.C. moved "that the original question be now put." The Honourable Senator Molgat moved that the Honourable Senator Waters "be now heard." The motion made by Senator Molgat under Rule 26, was clearly designed—that is, the rule is designed to handle exactly the situation in which the speaker, quite properly under the rules, when more than one Senator rises—

Senator Simard: Wrong, wrong.

Senator Frith: —recognizes. That is what the rule says. Wrong? O.K., let us see the rule we are talking about.

Senator Cools: Read it.

Senator Simard: Is it Rule 26?

Senator Frith: Rule 26, yes; it is not wrong. I said that the Speaker at that point was quite correct, to which Senator Simard says "wrong". So I take it that he thinks the Speaker was wrong. I do not think the Speaker was wrong. I think the Speaker was right at that point, because the rule says:

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who, in the Speaker's opinion, first rose;

Despite the fact that Senator Waters had given notice twice that he was going to be on his feet, and was, in fact, on his feet—there is no question in our mind that he was on his feet first; that, in our view, was clearly the situation—still the rule provides that, if two get up, it is up to the speaker to decide who in his opinion, rose first. Well, it is his opinion, and up to that point he is right. Then, in the very same sentence—not even a new sentence or sub-rule—it says—

Senator MacEachen: No dash?

Senator Frith: No dash, a semicolon:

> but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak",

That was exactly the motion put by Senator Molgat, and it is a classic example of the fact that the Senate makes these decisions. The rules ask the speaker, in the case of a conflict, to express his opinion, and then it is up to the Senate to say, "all right, yes, Mr. Speaker, but we decide who we want to speak," because, as honourable senators know—to provide a little background on the Speaker of the senate—the Speaker is not elected, he is not chosen by the senators; he is chosen by the Prime Minister, unlike the House of Commons or most assemblies. However, that is the fact. But how has the Senate, for 123 years, responded to the fact that, in effect, what happens with the Speaker, the so-called referee, is that he comes in and says, "I have the honour to inform you that I have been appointed your Speaker," to which—we have had nothing. It is announced. It is said. It is all right. It is perfectly irregular. That is the way it is done, but the response over the years—and it is reflected in the rules—has been: "All right, if the way this thing works is that you are going to come here and just tell us you are the Speaker, well, then, you sit there and call the orders when they come up and we will tell you when we want you to make any ruling, or to help us, or do anything else, or to play a role under these rules." That is why in the Senate, probably unlike any other assembly in the world, senators stand and say, "honourable Senators." They address their colleagues; they do not address the Speaker. The Speaker is like a good child at a dinner table. He speaks when spoken to.

Senator Cools: Absolutely, absolutely.

Senator Frith: Look at all the new people who know all about what happens in the Senate. Look at them all.

Senator Cools: A bunch of children.

● (2020)

Senator Frith: That book is the wrong colour, sir.

Senator Cools: Yes, that book is the wrong colour!

Senator Hastings: It belongs to the House of Commons!

Senator Frith: There are places in the rules where the Speaker is invited to play a role. There are places in the rules where the Speaker is requested in the same way that I have said, namely, he can be called upon when you are on your feet. But there are places in the rules where he is asked to participate.

Senator Barootes: You mean he is "required" to participate.

Senator Frith: Yes, in this case.

Senator Barootes: Look at Rule 15.

Senator Frith: And there are places where his—

Senator Barootes: Like Thursday night when you were disorderly!

Senator Frith: —participation is invited. When you look at the rule you will see that his participation is limited as defined in the rules. What is exactly asked for in rule 26 is perfectly consistent with the history and tradition of the Senate, namely, this is one of the cases where we, the senators, ask the Speaker to play a role. The role that he is asked to play is to give his opinion as to which was first. The Senate then says that a motion can be made—and it does not have to be made—to say, "No, Mr. Speaker. Thank you for making that choice, but we want to make the decision. Therefore, we make the motion and you must put the motion." That is what the whole brouhaha was about on November 22.

Senator Simard: O.k., professor, you may sit down now.

Senator Frith: Senator Molgat put the motion, moved the motion and delivered it in writing. It was that the honourable Senator Waters be now heard. But the Speaker refused to put that motion, which he is required to do under the rules.

An Hon. Senator: That's your opinion.

Senator Frith: I then moved a motion to adjourn—and we have heard about that.

The whole record of all these events that took place—that is, the whole record in the Minutes—was:

> The Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., moved:
> That the original question be now put.
> The Honourable Senator Molgat moved:
> That the Honourable Senator Waters be now heard.

The next thing that should have been in the Minutes, if the Speaker had done as he should have done, was: "the motion being put after debate was resolved" in the affirmative or the negative. If after the debate a vote were called and the vote was won,—and no doubt it would have been won by the government side—then Senator Murray would have been heard. If not, then Senator Waters would have been heard.

An Hon. Senator: Wait a minute!

Senator Frith: That is exactly what the rule is there to provide. In refusing to put that motion the Speaker is arrogating to himself authority that he does not have, has never had in the history of the Senate—

An Hon. Senator: I am sure that he had it.

Senator Frith: —and is attempting to deprive senators of the right that they have under the rules. This record shows it.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Frith: That is why the record and the events of that night were, in the pure sense of the word, "disorderly", because they were against the order provided for in the rules by reason of the Speaker taking unto himself authority that no Speaker in the Senate has. All he was to do in that case was to put that motion, but he refused to do it. He was put there by the Prime Minister, as all other Speakers are put, but he at that point—

An Hon. Senator: All other senators, too.

Senator Frith: —this is the first time in my experience that any speaker has absolutely refused to perform his duty as is required under the rules.

Senator Simard: Sit down, Professor.

Senator Frith: That is why those proceedings should be clarified. That is why the proceedings on that night were all out of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable Senators, I have not been taking a very active part in discussions on points of order recently. I am not sure that I should on this occasion either. But in my opinion the statement made by my honourable friend who just spoke so completely ignores the truth of what happened on that evening as to bear hardly any recognition of that kind.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: I wish to start by making a reference to the duties of the Speaker. If we were to take as a literal statement of the Speaker's duties the description that has been offered by my honourable friend, we would seriously misrepresent his responsibilities. One of the things that he is charged with doing here, regardless of anything else that goes on in this house, is to maintain order. All we have to do is to look at rule 15, which I shall read to you, which describes how he is to do this. Rule 15 states:

> The Speaker shall preserve order and decorum, and shall decide points of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice the Speaker shall state the rule or authority applicable to the case. When the Speaker rises, all other senators shall remain seated or shall resume their seats.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: Cast your mind back—

Senator Phillips: Do you have a T.V. camera lined up, Senator Frith?

Senator Roblin: —a minute or two to the proceedings of the Thursday night in question and recall exactly what happened.

One of the things that happened was that the Leader of the Government rose in his place to make a motion with respect to a government order. The regular courtesies of this House—and, indeed, the practices of any legislative chamber of which I am aware—is that when the Leader of the Government rises on an occasion of that nature he is entitled to be recognized by the Chair.

Senator Frith: In the right place. The " Orders" had not been called.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: But what happened on this occasion is that when he rose several others members rose as well.

An Hon. Senator: Listen!

Senator Frith: Why didn't you?

Senator Roblin: I was able to listen with my mouth closed.

An Hon. Senator: You did not interrupt him.

Senator Frith: You were about the only one who was listening.

Senator Cools: You were the only one on the other side, then!

Senator Roblin: I expect to be able to make my speech here with the house observing a certain amount of decorum, although I admit these days that it is sort of foreign to our nature to behave as we used to in a civilized fashion.

Senator Cools: The Speaker changed that.

Senator Roblin: But what happened on that occasion is that when the Leader of the Government rose to his feet to speak and other senators did at the same time, before the Speaker had a chance to deal with the matter in any way what occurred? A rush of senators from the other side of the House—about half the senators sitting over there in my opinion—

Senator Simard: Shame.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Roblin: —went down to where the Speaker was standing and endeavoured to intimidate him or to have him do what they wanted him to do.

An Hon. Senator: Exactly.

Senator Roblin: In my experience—which has limitations—I have never seen conduct of that kind in a legislative chamber.

Senator Frith: We had not seen anything like that from the Speaker either.

Senator Roblin: It was disgraceful in every respect. If the members opposite do not like what the Speaker is doing they may challenge his ruling and conduct a vote and a discussion in an orderly fashion.

Senator Olson: Like having the doors locked?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: If my friends opposite thought that the Speaker was doing something which they objected to there is a mechanism that we are familiar with to deal with the question.

Senator Frith: Yes, and that is rule 26.

Senator Roblin: It is not berating the Speaker. It is not rushing down to where he is seated or standing to shake their fists—

Senator Cools: There was no rush.

Senator Roblin: —and to scream at him—

Senator Hastings: No!

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Frith: We did not do that.

Senator Roblin: —or to shake a little red book under his nose. If Hansard had been able to record all the things that were said by ladies and gentleman opposite to the Speaker as twenty or so of them gathered around his—

Senator Hastings: There was no profanity.

Senator Roblin: No profanity? You do not have to be profane to breach the rules of decent conduct in this place.

• (2030)

Therefore, it seems to me that the description we've been given as to what happened shows what happens when you abandon the regular rules of procedure and the proper conduct of proceedings in the Senate.

If you do not like what the Speaker is doing, the solution to the problem is not to rush down and berate him or attempt to intimidate him and, indeed, to sabotage the work of the Senate.

Senator Frith: That is not where the sabotage was. The sabotage was from the Speaker.

Senator Roblin: It is a scene which I hope I never have to experience again. To have my honourable friend stand there and give his explanation or his commentary on how he sees things is perfectly in order, but for him not to admit the physical facts of what happened is a mistake. He should have been frank and candid about that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: He should also have recognized that the task of the Hansard people to record what went on on that occasion was indeed a difficult one. They were not able to record because no one could hear themselves speak. The Speaker could not be heard with all the hubbub, the noise, the complaints, the berating that was going on which prevented the work of this house from continuing.

Senator Frith: He brought it all on himself.

Senator Roblin: Maybe he did, but even if he did, even if I agree with my honourable friend, which I don't, the solution to the problem was not to rush down and try to intimidate him in the way it was done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: The solution would be to follow the practice of Parliamentary procedure, which we all know. That is why we conduct ourselves here usually with a certain degree of self-discipline and gentility. It is hard to justify the type of conduct we witnessed that night, even if you do not approve of what the Speaker is doing, when you have a remedy in your hands to deal with the matter in a more appropriate way.

I do not know what the point of order is that my friend is speaking to because we have at the present time a motion properly moved and seconded and read to the chamber by the Speaker with respect to the previous question. That is the matter that is before us at the present time. If my friend wants to complain about the conduct of someone on another occasion, I suppose he has the right to do so, but the point of order, I suggest, has nothing to do with the procedure before us now.

Some Hon. Senators: Question!

Senator Frith: There is no question, for goodness sakes, it's a point of order.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable Senators, I rise on the point of order which Senator Roblin has just spoken to. There is one point on which I can agree with him and that is that the job of the Hansard people that night was undoubtedly a difficult one. I do not in any way fault the Hansard reporters for what ended up in Hansard, nor for what appears in the Votes and Proceedings, because the situation was very difficult to follow. However, there is no question that what appears in Hansard and what appears in the Votes and Proceedings is at odds. There is a difference in those two positions.

We ought to clarify that for the sake of the record, and for the sake of how we handle ourselves here in the future. We ought to be looking at the verbatim proceedings. The advantage of that is that it can be backed up by the tapes of our proceedings which can be referred to if there a question arises. Those tapes are available and we can refer to them. However, I think it is important that we do get the Votes and Proceedings, which are the final record of this house, in proper order. I believe that is what Senator Frith was pointing to, that there is a discrepancy and that we ought to clear it up.

I think one of the fundamental problems we have in our discussion—here let us not say misunderstanding but a different understanding—is as to what the role of the Speaker is in the Senate. I can perfectly well understand that people who come from a provincial legislature, or from the House of Commons, and have only recently been in this house, do not appreciate the very fundamental difference between the role of the Speaker in the Senate and the role of the speaker in other houses. And this is part of the problem we have been involved in for some time. It is not just what happened last Thursday, but what happened earlier this month, and back in October, when the speaker's actions were completely contrary to the rules. There is no question about that. The rules do not provide for what happened at that time. The Speaker does not have that authority in this house. This house operates on the basis that it has an appointed Speaker and this house has no choice as to who that Speaker will be. By the same token, this house—

Senator Beaulieu: You were the first ones here!

Senator Molgat: Would you like to make a speech? Get on your feet and join us. Your turn will come and I will be happy to hear from you.

So there is that very fundamental difference. I saw Senator Forrestall a while ago rising with the green rule book from the House of Commons. The rule book from the House of Commons has no reference to what we do in this house and we simply cannot go back to that point because it has nothing to do with how we operate. The rules in many respects are perfectly clear insofar as how the vote is to conducted in this place and when and how a vote is to be called.

Senator Roblin refers to Rule 15. Well, the first rule for Mr. Speaker is to follow the rules of the Senate. That is rule number one. Don't talk to me about a quorum or all the rest of it. Rule number one for Mr. Speaker is to follow the rules and Mr. Speaker in this house has not been following the rules. Mr. Speaker has been following the instructions of the Prime Minister of this country, that is what he has been doing.

Senator Hastings: And Harvie Andre.

Senator Molgat: He has been going against the rules of this Senate in order to get the Government's agenda put forward. Let us go back to what happened last Thursday evening. Senator Robin says it is perfectly normal for the Speaker to recognize the Leader of the Government. Since when? Show me one instance in our rule book where it says that. Show me one iota of a comment in that regard. More than that, show me a precedent that establishes that the Speaker must recognize the Leader of the Government.

The rule is clear, the leader recognizes the senator who first rises. If there is a disagreement, it is up to the honourable senators to let Senator so and so be heard. What happens is the Senate decides. That is a perfectly normal procedure and exactly the way our rules are intended to be. It is not up to the Speaker to decide what we do in this place. It is up to the senators to decide.

Let us look at the specifics of what went on the other night. Senator Waters said the day before that he intended to propose a amendment. More than that, at 17 minutes to 6 o'clock on Thursday, Senator Waters in his place repeated it.

Senator Simard: That is not important. That has nothing to do with this.

Senator Molgat: He repeated that he intended to move an amendment. "I am telling the Senate now and I am telling Mr. Speaker now that I will be on my feet when the vote is finished and that I intend to move an amendment." Can reasonable individuals—leaving partisanship aside, say that Mr. Speaker, with that double warning, one of them twenty minutes before the event, can suddenly decide that he does not see Senator Waters but sees Senator Murray? Let us be fair. Senator Murray popped up like I have never seem him pop up before. Except when he rushed up here to attack me later that evening. That is the second fastest I have ever seen him go.

● (2040)

This brings me to a point that Senator Roblin spoke about and I want to clear up the record on that one. Yes, I was there in front of Mr. Speaker with my rule book open like this and my motion like this. This is the original motion I wrote at that time. It is quite clear that I moved under Rule 26 that Senator Waters be now heard, and I signed it. I stood there in front of him and did that.

An Hon. Senator: You had no right.

Senator Molgat: I defy Senator Roblin to show me any instance of profanity at that point or any instance of shaking a fist. Yes, we argued with Mr. Speaker but there was no shaking of fists and there was no profanity. The profanity came later that evening and it came from the Leader of the Government, not from this side. Make no mistake about that. Senator Roblin brought the matter up this evening and I wanted to put the record clear and straight. There was no shaking of fists and no profanity by members on this side.

Let us get back to the rules. Senator Murray was doing that night what he has to do. He is the Leader of the Government in this place and he has to get a bill through. I do not blame him. He has his job to do. So he popped up like a jack-in-the-box as soon as Mr. Speaker gave him the opportunity and wanted to move his motion. Senator Waters had given advance notice of his motion and was ignored. Surely under those circumstances the situation was clear, the Senate should have made a decision as to who had the right to speak first.

I do not blame Senator Murray for what he was doing. He was doing his job. Yet we still come back to the rules of the Senate and they are clear. The Senate decides who is going to speak. It is not the Speaker who decides that. He may recognize a speaker but the decision is taken by the senators. That is the point. Our problem right now is that some people are trying to operate this place on the basis of rules that do not belong here. They are not following the rules and precedents of this place. At this moment we do not have a proper rendition in the Votes and Proceedings of what actually went on that evening. I believe we have to correct that. If we do not, we will have an incorrect historical record of what went on in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just before the debate continues, Senator Roblin made a comment about my not being frank about what took place afterwards. I want to say this. I ask honourable senators and others to think about our behaviour in the context of, say, the Grey Cup. The quarterback fades back. You have all the pass receivers covered. The quarterback throws the pass and the referee catches it and starts running for the goal line.

The rules of football do not allow you to tackle the referee. I ask you, what would you do in those circumstances? Are you going to wait until the referee carries the ball over for a score, or are you going to break the rules and try to tackle the referee?

Senator Simard: Cheap shot again.

Senator Frith: You bet it was a cheap shot. It is going to be a very expensive shot as you will find out at the polls.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to the point of order raised by Senator Frith and commented upon by Senator Molgat. I particularly enjoyed the reading of Hansard by Senator Frith. I think he did a better job on the dashes than on the exclamation marks. I listened to Senator Molgat's contribution. Essentially their submissions are a commentary or analysis or explanation from their point of view of what transpired on Thursday. It was a criticism of some of the things which happened Thursday night. They expressed their difference of opinion with respect to the niceties of language used by different senators. They expressed their difference of opinion about the niceties of gesture by different senators. However, the essence of their submissions was a criticism of Thursday's procedure.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Roblin has explained his viewpoint on what happened Thursday afternoon and Thursday evening.

There are just two points I would like to make. It is my personal opinion, and I do not know if it is shared by many honourable senators on this or the other side, but irrespective of one's views about what our rules are or are not, or what authority if any, persuasive or otherwise, other parliamentary practices might have, it is my personal opinion that our rules were designed or evolved in an atmosphere where the adversarial or confrontational nature of the Senate was much different than it is now. I certainly do not say it was not adversarial or confrontational because the very idea of government and opposition means confrontation. My point is, however, that the rules which evolved or were developed, and were quite adequate in an entirely different political atmosphere, are in my opinion no longer adequate today. Then if they are inadequate—

Senator Hastings: Then you write your own rules.

Senator Ottenheimer: Oh, mind readers opposite. Thank you. The honourable senator is a mind reader.

When you have finished I will continue, because I make a point of not interrupting other honourable senators and I do not think it is too much to expect the same. If someone asks a question I certainly do not mind answering and I make it a point not to interfere with other honourable senators. Surely that is a courtesy we owe one another and should observe.

The point I was making before the gratuitous interruptions of my honourable friends opposite was that, in my opinion, the rules which evolved in a different atmosphere, a different set of circumstances, are no longer adequate. That is not to say anything good, bad or indifferent. It is merely to say that the situation in the chamber has changed and to expect that rules which were applicable in a totally different situation will necessarily be adequate today is not, defensible.

• (2050)

Senator Frith: The only thing that has changed is the Speaker.

Senator Ottenheimer: If that is the case, then I think all of us are put in a very difficult, perhaps untenable—it has got to be tenable as long as it is there—and in a very ambiguous position. If the rules are inadequate for the situation in which we find ourselves—I do not mean at this very moment but during the past period of time—then we are all losers. If the rules are inadequate, then certainly the minority's position is perhaps undermined or is not clear; the majority's position is, I think, undermined or not clear; and the presiding officer's position is undermined or not clear. We are all, I think, losers. The institution and its component parts are all losers.

The final line on my viewpoint is that we should activate—not in order to settle matters tonight or tomorrow but certainly in the near future—a rules committee which may make an examination and make recommendations with respect to making the rules more realistic in terms of the political situation or the nature of the adversarial and confrontational position which now exists and which did not exist at a certain time in the past.

The other point I wish to make is that the point of order, as made I understand by Senator Frith and as spoken to by Senator Molgat, was their criticism of what transpired on Thursday or of the procedures on Thursday. I have no doubt that at some time in the future that might make a very interesting subject for dissertation for someone writing a master's degree or, perhaps, writing a grade-five examination. The point is, in reality and not in historical commentary—and there is nothing wrong with historical commentary—it appears to me that, irrespective of what happened on Thursday, irrespective of different people's view of what happened on Thursday, of what should have happened, or what should not have happened, or whether there was refinement of gesture and language or whether there was less refinement of gesture and language, if we are to deal with the here and now, the fact is that tonight Senator Murray moved, and he was seconded by Senator Doody, that the original question be now put. Irrespective of what happened on Thursday—and I do not say it will not be very helpful for the Senate to be aware of things that happened on Thursday, or to be aware of certain shortcomings in either our procedures or our observance of them, or the rules and precedents by which we go and all of that—the fact is that, in the here and now, it was moved by the Leader of the Government and seconded by Senator Doody that the original question be now put.

I have not heard it said by either Senator Frith or Senator Molgat—and I may have missed it—that they are challenging that motion, or that it is not in order. I have not heard them say that that motion put tonight at 8 o'clock by Senator Murray is out of order. It may have been said but I have not heard it. It appears to me that what the point of order concerns itself with is a discussion of what happened on Thursday: The inadequacies or adequacies of the procedures; and different points of view about the appropriateness of what happened or did not happen on Thursday.

I am not saying that that may not be a very fruitful area for examination, but to deal with the here and now, it is my understanding that, irrespective of what happened on Thursday, there is a motion by the Leader of the Government, appropriately seconded, before the house and I am not aware that anyone has challenged that that is in order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the thrust of Senator Ottenheimer's contribution to this debate seems to me that he would like to know what is the here and now and what are the rules for the here and now. That is what we want to know too.

Senator Buckwold: Not the hereafter.

Senator Olson: Is Rule 26 still operative or not? Honourable senators, I do not want to go over the record as recorded by Hansard again or the Minutes of the Proceedings of that day again because it was read very fully and very carefully by Senator Frith. What is clear is that what happened first of all was that Senator Frith called 6 o'clock and was completely ignored even though it was after 6 o'clock. The second thing that happened is that the Speaker claimed that he was required to call the Orders of the Day. Well, if he had called the Orders of the Day, the very next thing was to recognize that it was after 6 o'clock and the session should have been adjourned until 8 o'clock and that was not done. There is no question about that. Does that mean that Rule 12 is no longer operative either? Apparently that is the way it is.

Senator Ottenheimer's argument is that we should let bygones be bygones. I know what is going to happened, honourable senators, and so do you. Senator Murray is going to refer to this as a precedent. That is what he said he was going to do about the other precedent when he and whoever else was with him said they were going to change the rules in the middle of the game. I am sure you all remember what happened on October 4. Somebody decided—and the only one we have it in writing from is Senator Charbonneau—that they were going to end the debate, that they were going to end the long established practice and the right of both Whips to come into the house, and that he was going call the vote at 5:30 p.m. Afterwards they said, "That is a precedent and we can use that from now on." Not only did that not happen but they did not even wait until 5:30 p.m. The doors were locked when some of the senators came down here. They made the excuse that the Whip was there telling senators not to go in. All the Conservatives who had advance notice were all lined up in here and the rest of us or, perhaps, a few of us, were at the door. Whether we were trying to get in or not is irrelevant. The Speaker had no business to send that letter. He had no authority. That is the problem we are faced with now with regard to the situation last Thursday evening.

Senator Simard: You have a problem; we do not have a problem.

Senator Olson: Yes, I have a problem.

Senator Frith: You have a problem but you just do not know it.

Senator Olson: I think, and some other honourable senators have pointed out, that we ought to know what the rules are going to be. We do not want to come across a situation where there is turbulence and difficulty and then the rules are changed. That is what happened last Thursday night and that is what we are complaining about in this point of order. Our complaint is that a motion made properly under Rule 26 was not acceptable. There was an argument with the Speaker for many minutes, maybe even an hour, that he was absolutely, unequivocably obliged to accept a motion under Rule 26 and to put that motion before he recognized anyone.

It has been argued that he had notice twice or thrice—but at least twice—from Senator Waters that he intended to move the motion in amendment but then, in spite of that, Senator Murray jumped up, for whatever reason—I guess he wanted to get his motion through—and it is the consequence of that that is important. By not accepting, or by failing to accept, a motion made under Rule 26, the consequence was to deny honourable senators a right to be heard at all. Senator Waters and Senator Lawson had not been heard at all. That is the consequence we are concerned about and, if that is to stand, it is a precedent for future actions.

I see Senator Murray is not here just now but Senator Doody is and he may try that any time.

Senator Doody: Moi?

Senator Olson: That is why the point of order is so important. Is Rule 26 still valid? It will not be if you got away with it last Thursday.

Honourable senators, we need to clear this up and we need to make sure that, in the future, that what it says in Rule 26 is that the Senate shall decide if more than one senator rises at the same time.

Senator Grafstein: Ask the honourable senator why the mace is not pointed toward the government. Why is the mace not pointed towards the government?

● (2100)

Senator Olson: That is the problem, and the argument that Senator Ottenheimer makes is almost comical. It is so ludicrous. You know that has happened. The other thing he says, well, I wrote something down here, but I wrote it rather fast. I do not know if I can read it. He says, > Senator Ottenheimer: The rules today are no longer adequate for today. So we have to change them.

Senator Ottenheimer: Do you not think it is a good idea?

Senator Olson: You change them in advance.

Senator Ottenheimer: Change them on the run.

Senator Olson: Surely the members on both sides of the house have to know when you are going to change the rules and how you are going to change them and what you are going to change them to. You are making the argument now that what happened last Thursday night was a violation of the rules. Do I take it that that is what you are arguing? You are not so sure. You would be a good ally. Why don't you argue that we ought to know if and when a motion under Article 26 is going to be acceptable in this house.

Senator Frith: Do not embarrass him. He knows that that should have been put. He knows the rules.

Senator Olson: No, but it would be good for him to be a supporter of the members on this side who like to follow the rules or at least know what they are.

Senator Ottenheimer: I am a supporter of the rules of law.

Senator Olson: See, honourable senators, we are making progress.

Senator Frith: You don't think the referee should catch the ball and run for the goal line.

Senator Olson: A while ago he said that the rules do not seem to be adequate for the times. So we had to change them.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Ottenheimer: Besides we have to give the referee a glove.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I do not want to take any longer about this, but I thought the argument that we just change the rules any old time, that they do not seem to be adequate for today, was really pretty weak. But now Senator Ottenheimer is telling us that that really is not a very good argument. We should at least follow the rule of law while the law is there. If you do not like the law, we change the law. So that both sides know ahead of time. So everybody knows. Do you not think that all the players ought to know the rules of the game and that all the players should stick to the rules of the game? Even Senator Ottenheimer is agreeing with me.

Honourable Senators, I think that we need to settle this, straighten this matter out, and if Senator Murray and Senator Ottenheimer would just get up and say, "Well, we intend to honour Article 26 of the rules in the future," and make sure that they do, it would strengthen greatly the opportunity for senators on both sides of the house to know what the rules are going to be, and that they are going be honoured in all circumstances and not just set aside when it is convenient to do so. So, honourable senators, I hope that we can get that sorted out, because at the moment, if we are going to recall what happened last Thursday night, Article 26 of our rules is not operative at all. You see, it does not matter, whether Senator Murray was up first or not—and he was not. Senator Waters was standing before you got up, but can you say, "Well, maybe the speaker did not see him first." But, he put the house on notice. Supposing they were both up, maybe they rose so simultaneously that you could not tell who was up first. Then, Article 26 provides for that, because it says clearly,

> When two or more senators rise to speak, the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion rose first; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

That is the problem. That motion was put right then, right on time, and was not accepted.

Well, honourable senators, is that the way you want the Senate to run? Is that what we have to accept from here on? If we do not get that precedent rubbed off the books, someone is going to refer to it and say, "Well, these are the new rules." Like Senator Ottenheimer says, "We have got to have new rules from time to time." Is this the disappearance of Article 26? I certainly hope not, and I hope also that if we are going to change the rules that we do not do it in the middle of the game like we have done two or three times.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kelly was trying to have the floor.

Hon. William M. Kelly: I was trying to have the floor.

Senator Hébert: I thought I was there first. I can wait a minute or so.

Senator Barootes: It is unusual punishment.

Senator Kelly: I, perhaps, am standing at the wrong time, but I do have a brief speech, a very tiny speech, to make on the bill itself, and in that there is a motion—I am sorry, hear me out. If there is a motion before the house, and I understand there is—

Senator Doody: It is O.K.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, what I am hearing now really is a committee of the whole discussing how the rules should be drawn in the time ahead. I do not know what that has to do with the motion that is before the chamber right now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Kelly: I am not denigrating the need for what has been discussed. I am fully in support of everything that has been said in terms of the need to have rules, but I do not know what that has to do with the track we are now on.

Senator Hébert: Let us finish the point of order and we will see after.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, with respect, can any one of you clearly identify what the point of order is? We are talking about what happened last week, and so on.

Senator Hébert: They must have talked about something. I want to talk on the point of order and maybe you can make your speech in a few minutes. It will not be long.

Senator Kelly: Could the senator say what point of order he is talking on?

Senator Hébert: On the point that everybody has been talking about since 8 o'clock. The same one.

Senator Simard: Read it.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, we have been attempting to piece together the events of last Thursday. I do not ordinarily get involved in discussions on procedure, since there are already enough experts in the field on both sides of the House.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: In your case, it is hot dog stands!

Senator Hébert: Well, we are accustomed to rude remarks from you, so I guess a few more will not hurt.

So, as I was saying, I have a great deal of respect for procedural experts. I even, occasionally, listen with some interest to the points raised by procedural experts opposite, like Senator Roblin, for instance.

But this evening, I must admit I found his little sermon profoundly irritating. He seemed to be saying, in explaining last Thursday's events, that the Liberal senators had acted like hoodlums.

Senator Simard: Well, it is the truth.

Senator Hébert: . . . That they had made hostile gestures at the Speaker and others, had made unpleasant remarks, used foul language, and what have you . . . and that, of course, the Conservatives who were also on their feet to defend their speaker had all behaved like little angels.

Senator Simard: Well, it is the truth.

Senator Hébert: Well, it just so happens that I was standing close to the Speaker over the three hours that these events took place. I did not say a word. I was listening to discussions between the Speaker and Liberal experts who were there trying to help him understand a rule.

At one point, I saw the leader of the government in the Senate leap from his chair and run as fast as he could to Senator Molgat. His face was so red that I thought he was going to have a heart attack. And he hurled the most unbelievable insults at him—I heard him, although I did not say a word, and I was absolutely flabbergasted to hear what Senator Murray was saying; indeed, I was so outraged that I went and sat down at one of the desks, picked up the little card that they usually put under the glasses and copied, word for word, everything Senator Murray had said.

As for fists being raised and the hostile gestures that Senator Roblin accuses us of having made near the Speaker's chair, the only person I saw making gestures like that was Mr. Forrestall, who was standing right there, jostling everybody. So, honourables senators, on November 22, an exchange took place. Senator Molgat, always a gentleman, attempted to explain what had occurred. He said that he had tried to apologize to Senator Murray, who left because he obviously did not want to hear what he had said the other day.

As far as I am concerned, Senator Murray's response—now, I am no procedural expert, but the facts are the facts. I know what I heard. And a lot of others senators heard it as well. If they are here, I am certain they will rise to say that they, too, heard what I heard.

So, when Senator Murray denied having said certain things, he did not tell the truth in this House. He was not fair to Senator Molgat. And I do not like that. He never uses that kind of language. But I would like to tell you exactly what I heard. Senator Murray can leave, because as I am sure he will recall, he is the one that said these things. He knows what I am talking about. So, I will read you what I wrote down—I wrote it in English. He said to Senator Molgat:

• (2110)

[English]

> Sober up, by Jesus Christ . . . .If you want violence, you will get violence. You sober up. You pig. You Goddamned son of a bitch.

[Translation]

That is what I wrote that very evening, two minutes after having heard these remarks.

Senator Simard: Two minutes later, you had already forgotten them.

Senator Hébert: Just be quiet now and let me read this to you—I will even read it in English just so it will be perfectly clear just how much Senator Murray twisted the truth in trying to save his own neck. I would have forgotten all about that little card if I had not heard Senator Roblin sermonizing us about how we behave like hoodlums, when in reality, the hoodlums were on the other side of the House. Senator Murray said:

[English]

Yes, I did say, "Sober up!"

[Translation]

He seems to have forgotten the "Jesus Christ", but anyway . . .

[English]

As the honourable senator suggested, that was said in the heat of an exchange in front of the Speaker's Chair when I thought that the honourable senator was attempting to usurp it. We had words.

I call that words. He goes on to state:

I apologize for having said that.

That is to say, "Sober up". He goes on to say:

I withdraw it unequivocally.

By that he means saying "Sober up". He goes on to say:

I did not threaten violence, but I did say that we were heading to violence and I did ask, "Do you want violence?"

The real sentence is: "If you want violence, you will get violence." That is a bit different. It is so different that there is not much truth in what I read as having been said by Senator Murray.

Senator Simard: Come on. Sober up.

Senator Hébert: I am sorry that that nice gentlemen, Senator Roblin, was not here to have heard that he was defending that kind of language and the kind of gesture that came from Senator Murray and Senator Forrestall.

Senator Simard: Goodnight.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I think it is unfortunate that Senator Roblin called back to our memories the episode of last Thursday evening.

Senator Simard: Are you ashamed of yourself?

Senator Hastings: No.

Senator Simard: Are you ashamed of all your remarks?

Senator Stewart: No, Senator Simard. It is unfortunate that the words that Senator Murray evidently spoke have been brought back onto the record of the house; but let us leave that for now.

On Thursday last an attempt was made by Senator Molgat to use a rule of this house, namely, rule 26. It is a rule that is not unique to this house by any means. It is a rule that is used in the House of Commons. I have seen it used a fair number of times. There is no room for doubt as to what our rule means.

I put it to you, honourable senators, that if there is any room for doubt, that doubt should have been resolved by Speaker Charbonneau in favour of the small minority in this house. I am speaking here of Senator Waters. True, he is a member of a political party; but he is a member here of the Senate as an individual, independent of either the Progressive Conservative Party or the Liberal Party.

[Senator Hébert.]

The function of rules in a game, or anywhere else, is not only to facilitate the operation but also to assure that the weaker party is not overrun by the might of the majority. There is a difference between "right" and "might."

The purpose of "right," whether it is laws to protect property or the liberties of people, is to protect the weak from the strong. That is an important point, particularly when we are dealing with one senator who, under the existing provisional order, did not have the right to move an amendment but who, under the standing rules of the Senate, had an undoubted right to move an amendment if he got the floor. What we saw here last Thursday was clearly a conspiracy to deprive Senator Waters of his undoubted right—

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Frith: Yes, exactly.

Senator Fairbairn: Absolutely.

Senator Stewart: —to speak—

Senator Frith: A harpoon has hit Moby Dick over there, I see.

Senator Simard: Keep quiet, Professor.

Senator Frith: Yes, there is Moby Dick again.

Senator Stewart: —in this chamber and to exercise his rights as an appointed member of the Senate. That is what was happening, and that is why some honourable senators were aroused.

So, honourable senators, whether we look at the English version of rule 26 or the French version, there is no question about the meaning of the rules. But if there was any room for doubt, that doubt should have been resolved in favour of Senator Waters.

It is a sad day when we can no longer rely on the Chair to protect an individual senator from the juggernaut of the majority.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable Senators, I should like to say just a few words with respect to this point of order. I could not help but agree with Senator Roblin's comments when he said that in all the years he has been here he had never witnessed a series of incidents such as we have seen in the last couple of months. I must agree with him on that.

• (2120)

I do agree with Senator Ottenheimer. I think it is time, especially in view of recent events, for us to have a complete study and overhaul of the rules. Senator Kelly, I do not know if you were here when Senator Ottenheimer made his intervention. He is the one who raised the question of changing the rules in the future. However, we are discussing what happened, presumably under the rules which are now in force, whether we like or not.

What concerns me is what good would it do if we could change the rules every day? I am prepared to agree to changing the rules, but if the government decides that it can simply ignore them when it is inconvenient or when it has some other priority, then what is the point? We might as well stay with what we have and break the rules as we go along when we do not like them.

I find it astounding, after the events of the 4th of October, and the absolute disregard for the rules on the part of the government, with the active of support of our Speaker at that time, that anyone has the colossal nerve to say we are guilty of anarchy and guilty of breaking the rules. I think we are guilty of breaking the spirit of the rules at some time, but at what point do you say to the majority, enough is enough? We have to get a message through to you that if that is the way you are going to play the game, we have to try to do something; we can only be kicked around for so long.

What we have to understand is that this rule book is for everyone in this room. If we change it—

Senator Simard: Which rule book was used on September 24 with Senator Buckwold? Which rules was he using, by the way?

Senator Frith: It was Chairman Buckwold's chairmanship and his decision. The Speaker upheld that.

Senator Neiman: Senator Simard, I know you are in difficulty when you interrupt in the middle of someone else's remarks.

Senator Austin: Which you do very often.

Senator Neiman: It's all right. I hope you are sincerely repentant, I really do. All I am saying is that we should all try to follow the rules, and this is a classic example. You are misinterpreting exactly what happened last Thursday night. If you look at Hansard you will know exactly the sequence of events. You will know exactly what the Speaker did or did not do. However, Senator Ottenheimer said, "Senator Murray moves the question, seconded by Senator Doody." There is no such indication. Of course, he did not. I know Senator Doody in his heart was supporting his leader, but he did not get the words out and they are not there.

All I am saying is that I think it is time we got back to the rules. The Speaker himself, when we were acting, as he has said, in an unruly manner, helped by a few people on your side—I was glad to have the company; I was feeling a little harassed—he blurted out, "If we followed the rules we would be here for three weeks".

Senator Leblanc: I heard that!

Senator Neiman: And you don't want to do that; and the Speaker was trying to support you in that. But that simply is not good enough. If we want to change the rules, then, by all means, let us do it; but, in the meantime, let us keep to them. There is omething else I am very concerned about—

Senator Simard: You are a good lawyer but you have a poor case.

Senator Frith: Listen to who is talking!

Senator Simard: You are trying hard.

Senator Neiman: I have to try.

Senator Austin: You are setting new records for interrupting speakers.

Senator Neiman: There is only one other point I would like to make. I think it is extremely important that the Minutes of The Proceedings be corrected, and at the appropriate time and as soon as possible I will make whatever motion is necessary to see that The Minutes of Proceedings are corrected to conform with Hansard.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to follow up on a point that has been raised by Senator Neiman, which I thought to be the fundamental point raised by Senator Frith. At least, it is the point with which I am concerned in this series of comments. Quite apart from the debate and comments that have been made about the proceedings of Thursday last, each of us has his own recollection of what happened. I think it is unfortunate that Senator Roblin intervened and revived it in our minds that evening, because it led to further comments and further additions from this side of the house, which were fully justified. We have our recollections of what happened, and they can remain with us for our own purposes or for our own writings; but there are official records of the Senate, and what bothers me, and which is the point made so clearly by Senator Neiman, is that there are fundamental discrepancies in the account of the debates and in the account of what are called the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. The official record of the Senate is the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. That is the document which tells us what happened, and there are discrepancies between the two accounts. I want to know how we can remedy these discrepancies. I will mention two. The debates make it very clear that Speaker Charbonneau called the Order of the Day. The official record, the Minutes, omit that. Why? A future historian or someone who wants to look at what happened here will pick up the official record and find that the Orders of the day were never called. Then that person goes to the Senate Debates and finds that the Speaker said, "I am calling for Orders of the Day." I think we ought to have some way of reconciling these two different accounts, or the omission in the official record.

The second point is, I think, even more extraordinary. I can find no reference whatsoever in the Debates of the Senate to a motion having been moved by Senator Molgat. The person who picks up the Senate Debates will say, "What was the controversy about, because I cannot find in these debates that Senator Molgat moved a motion that Senator Waters be now heard?" I can't find it. Have you been able to find it? I look at the official Minutes and we see that the Honourable Senator Molgat moved: "That the Honourable Senator Waters be now heard." There may be explanations for this. Perhaps the Senate reporters missed something that was picked up by the Table Officers who are responsible for the Minutes.

Senator Simard: If something is missing, are you blaming us?

Senator MacEachen: I am not blaming anyone at the moment, Senator Simard.

Senator Frith: If you would listen, he said the exact opposite.

Senator MacEachen: I am asking why there are important discrepancies between the two accounts contained in our records. I believe that it would be quite appropriate for Senator Neiman, or another Senator, to make a motion so that these discrepancies can be cleared up or an explanation given. Why is it, to put it simply, that the Debates of the Senate has absolutely no record of Senator Molgat moving a motion and the Minutes say that he did a motion?

There are other anomalies that I will not go into, but those are two glaring ones. There was a ruling made by the Acting Speaker on the motion put by Senator Frith to adjourn the Senate, because, in the view of the Acting Speaker another motion had already been put. So a person who wanted to find out what happened will look to the Acting Speaker and find that the Acting Speaker concluded there was a motion put and that it was before the House. But when he looks at the official records, he will find there is absolutely no mention of it. I believe that at least we are entitled to have some concordance between the two accounts of those proceedings, which are not the accounts of individual Senators but the official accounts that will be available to persons who in the future will want to look at what happened. Let me tell you, honourable senators, if they look at the official accounts they will find misleading, incomplete and contradictory accounts.

I know perfectly well that the events of last Thursday will be an important event in the history of Parliament. It will attract a lot of future attention. It will attract a great deal of attention in the future and people are entitled to have a record. It may be that when Speaker Charbonneau returns it will be possible to have a method by which these accounts can be reconciled. If a motion is not necessary, we will not press with a motion; but, if it is necessary, we will.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think I should say, first of all, that many of the points that have been raised tonight on this question of order, as Senator Frith described it, could have been, and probably should have been, raised last Thursday.

Senator Hastings: They were.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Murray: Or even since then, or even at some future time. We did not have the minutes until two days later. We had the minutes earlier this week. We had the Minutes, as I recall, on Monday, did we not?

• (2130)

Senator Doody: Yes.

Senator Murray: They are being raised tonight but in what context? Senator Neiman and the Leader of the Opposition indicate that at the appropriate time they would, if necessary, move a motion. There is a motion before the house. That motion is my motion, seconded by Senator Doody, that the original question be now put. The original question being Senator Kelly's motion that Bill C-62 be read the third time.

Senator MacEachen suggests that in view of what he sees as discrepancies between the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Hansard, that a way should be found or could be found or might be found to reconcile these discrepancies. I suggest it is up to him to suggest the remedy if there is one. Meanwhile, as I say, there is a motion before the house and I trust we are going to debate it, the motion being that the original question be now put.

However, I cannot, in the spirit of Senator Frith's narrative, resist discussing what happened on Thursday night, really on two points. One is the question of Senator Molgat's motion, which followed mine, "that Senator Waters be now heard." I suspect that what happened is that Senator Molgat walked up to the Chair and delivered the motion by hand but he never really got it out verbally from his place in the Senate. In any case, he was apparently not heard by the Hansard reporter. I was.

I want to say a word about this motion, about any motion that a member be now heard.

Senator MacEachen: Are you on the point of order now, Senator?

Senator Murray: Well, I am entering into the spirit of the narrative we heard a moment ago.

Senator MacEachen: So you are on the point of order?

Senator Murray: I am on whatever it is Senator Frith was discussing.

Senator Doody: The subject matter.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith was very careful. With that great care he takes and these fine distinctions he sometimes draws he did not say: "I rise on a point of order". He said: "I have a question of order" and he launched into his narrative. So in that spirit I would like to say something about the practice in relation to the recognition of senators and I would like to refer honourable senators to citation 302 of Beauchesne's at page 99 of the fifth edition.

Senator Frith: Stay away from the Senate rules at all costs.

Senator Murray: Surely the honourable senator does not deny that Beauchesne's can shed some light on our rules as it can on the rules of other parliamentary bodies.

Senator Frith: If they read right.

Senator Murray: Let me read this:

> (2) A motion that a Member 'be now heard' must be moved before the Member recognized has begun speaking.

I was on my feet, I presented my motion, it was heard by the Hansard reporter, it was heard by the Speaker. In other words, once the senator has begun to speak, having been recognized, that senator has the floor and it is not open to another senator to move that a third senator do now speak or be now heard.

Senator Frith: So Rule 26 only applies to mutes.

Senator Murray: I had begun speaking when Senator Molgat attempted to move his motion.

Senator Frith: That has nothing to do with Senate rules.

Senator Murray: In any case, I had moved a motion. The duty of the Speaker was to put the motion. He tried to do so but was prevented by the storm around the Chair. He tried to put the motion and he cannot be interrupted by a motion that another senator be heard while he is putting a motion that he has already heard from me.

I do want to say a word about the rule governing the motion for the original question. This motion is provided for in the Rules of the Senate, Rule 36(3).

Senator Frith: Now we go to the Senate rules.

Senator Murray: A motion for the previous question, as it is called, is provided for in our rules and it is very well known in all of the democratic parliaments that any of us have ever heard of.

Senator Frith: It is usually put after debate has begun. There is no debate yet. You are cutting it off before he speaks.

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon. It is normally moved by the government after there has been a lengthy debate and a number of amendments. My goodness, we had just voted on the eighth amendment put forward by my honourable friends opposite.

Senator Frith: We have not debated the main motion.

Senator Murray: On Thursday night when I presented my motion we had had second reading debate, we had had report stage, we had had eight amendments voted on at third reading. It is a classic situation where the government would move the previous question.

The purpose of moving the previous question after a debate, after a number of amendments have been moved, is to cut off further amendments and to proceed to the final debate.

Senator Frith: You usually get a little debate on the main motion.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have had eight amendments, which is an extraordinary thing in itself, at third reading. That is extraordinary. Especially from a party that decided to forgo its opportunity to move amendments at report stage.

The main purpose of that motion, which is provided for in our rules and the rules of all democratic parliaments, is to cut off further amendments and proceed to a final decision. Some honourable senators are saying, "well, Senator Waters indicated that he wanted to move an amendment." Indeed he had. Indeed, Senator Lawson had indicated the same thing. However, I never made any secret of what our plans were in that respect. We would try to work out an accommodation similar to the one that the Liberals had had to enable the Independent senators to move their amendments, failing which I was going to invoke the previous question.

Quite frankly, it does not matter whether one or two or a dozen senators wanted to move amendments. That does not impede the government from moving the previous question and letting the Senate decide. That was the situation that we found ourselves in on Thursday night when I moved the previous question.

So, honourable senators, I can only say that while there has been some talk of a motion at the appropriate time, while there has been some talk of finding a way to reconcile what troubles Senator MacEachen and Senator Neiman about some discrepancies between the Minutes of that day and the Hansard of that day, we have not heard any suggestion that my motion that the Speaker put at 8 o'clock or a bit after tonight is anything but in order.

My motion is properly before the house. The debate should begin on my motion unless honourable senators are seeking a ruling on some matter they have not yet articulated from the Speaker. So I would suggest that in the interests of good order, it being almost two hours since we commenced this little exchange over what took place last Thursday, the time has come to debate the motion I have moved, seconded by Senator Doody, which the Speaker put to us at a quarter after eight this evening.

• (2140)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, we have not contested the regularity of the motion which has been put by the Chair. We have not raised a point of order on that. We have raised a point of order on the account of events of last Thursday as contained in the official records. Senator Murray said it was my obligation to suggest a remedy. Well, I do have one remedy which may be more cumbersome than another which I have in mind. It is to move a motion. One could easily move a motion under privilege which would give the Senate an opportunity in Committee of the Whole to try to reconcile these accounts. But, if that is unacceptable, or if further thought ought to be given to it, then we could consider having some explanation provided by the Clerk of Senate which could be conveyed to us by the Speaker. If it were found satisfactory, we could then ensure that the revised editions of these documents would reflect the changes, because it is not a theoretical matter. I know persons who have already looked at these documents and have asked, "What happened?" They are finding differing accounts. I think it is important, if only to preserve some self respect, to have at least the official documents in order. If behaviour is alleged to be disorderly, perhaps we could have the documents reflect order. That is what I have in mind.

If my second proposal were given consideration, I would defer moving a motion.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend has made a reasonable proposition which is that we should ask the Clerk of the Senate carefully to review what evidence there is that he can look at to see whether he would suggest any changes to the records that might, perhaps, be more acceptable to members generally.

I would think we should accept my honourable friend's suggestion and ask the Clerk to do that and to report to the Speaker as soon as he is able to do so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise briefly because I want to put on the record that I do not agree with Senator Murray's interpretation of rule 26. I am not going to debate it at this point, but I do not want it to be taken that he has made a statement that is unchallenged.

Senator Murray: It is Beauchesne.

Senator Molgat: I do challenge his reading of Rule 26.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray PC, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the original question be now put.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bosa: —Thank you for that ovation.

Honourable senators, I rise to take part in this debate on the third reading of Bill C-62, otherwise known as the "goods and services tax."

The debate on the GST is the most controversial debate that has taken place in the Senate. Never in the history of the red chamber have there been so many people, political parties and provinces urging senators to defeat this regressive tax. Just look at the number of petitions and letters that we, on this side of the chamber, have received to get an idea as to how deeply felt is this issue.

The Senate is fulfilling its mandate that the Fathers of Confederation envisioned.

Some Hon. Senators: Order! Order!

Senator Doody: Senator Molgat, this is not a pretty view.

Senator Bosa: In fact, honourable senators, the Senate is going beyond its mandate because it is not only speaking on behalf of the regions and the minorities, but it has also taken an unprecedented new role, that of reflecting the views of the majority of Canadians who oppose and despise this tax, and their voices are falling on deaf ears.

[Senator MacEachen.]

There was an article—

Senator Corbin: Order!

Senator Doody: There is a meeting going on over there. Just wait for them to finish.

Senator Hastings: Take your time. Read slowly.

Senator Doody: There is another meeting going over there. Senator Wood is canvassing. I think we have their attention now.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I was about to read an article from a newspaper in order to place evidence before senators as to how deeply felt this issue is and how opposed it is. I will recite some statistics from an article that appeared on November 1, 1990 in the Toronto Star. It states:

> More than three quarters of Canadians oppose the proposed goods and services tax, according to a Gallop poll released today. Seventy-six per cent said they don't want the 7 per cent federal tax to replace the 13 per cent manufacturers sales tax—

I believe they must have meant the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax. It goes on to state:

> —the highest opposition yet recorded by Gallop.
> This is the third time in 13 months Gallop has found Canadians overwhelmingly oppose the tax. A January poll found 74 per cent against the GST, up from 72 per cent in September, 1989.
> In today's poll only 16 per cent favor the tax while 8 per cent have no opinion.
> The tax is unpopular even among declared followers of the governing federal Progressive Conservatives: While 40 per cent favour the tax, 48 per cent are opposed.

Even the Conservatives who support this government are against this particular type of tax. The article goes on as follows:

> Today's results are based on interviews with 1,041 adults, October 10 to 13. Results from a national sample of this size are considered accurate within four percentage points, 19 in 20 times.

This government with its majority in the House of Commons has rammed through this legislation by imposing closure and cutting off debate through time allocation.

Senator Hastings: And again tonight.

Senator Bosa: With the appointment of 8 additional senators, the government now has a majority in this chamber, a move that was strongly opposed by Canadians as a whole.

Honourable senators, I have another article that I would like to put on the record. It is from the Gazette of October 25, 1990. The headline reads:

> 79% oppose the PM's move to add eight senators: poll
> Half support veto power for Senate.
> Canadians are angry at Prime Minister Brian Mulroney for his recent packing of the Senate with eight additional senators to ram through the goods-and-services tax, a new Gallop poll indicates.

The survey found that 79 per cent, or four out of five respondents were opposed to Mulroney's appointment of the senators to overcome the Liberal Party's control of the upper chamber.

• (2150)

Only 13 per cent agreed with Mulroney's move and 9 per cent had no opinion.

The packing of the Senate was unpopular even among declared supporters of the Conservative Party. Among stated Tory backers, 48 per cent were opposed and 51 per cent in favour of the appointments.

Here we have another area of disagreement among the ardent supporters of the Conservative government.

Senator Hastings: What was the per cent? 79?

Senator Bosa: It says 48 per cent were opposed and 51 per cent in favour of the appointments, but these were all Tories.

The survey was conducted October 10th - 13 among 1,041 adults. It is accurate within four percentage points, 19 in 20 times.

Support for packing the Senate was marginally higher in Quebec than in the rest of the country — 26 per cent of Quebec respondents were in favour while 58 per cent opposed and 17 per cent had no opinion.

While —-

Senator Hébert: Almost 60 per cent opposed in Quebec?

Senator Bosa: Yes, 60 per cent opposed in Quebec.

While opposed to packing the Senate, Canadians increasingly believe the Senate should continue to have the power to turn aside the House of Commons-passed legislation.

This issue is prominent in the current debate over the GST since the Senate, although technically having the power to reject legislation passed by the House of Commons, is by tradition thought to have no moral authority to do so since it is an appointed, not an elected, body.

Almost half of respondents in the survey, or 48 per cent believe the Senate should continue to have the power to turn aside legislation passed by the Commons. 40 per cent thought the Senate should lose the veto, and 13 per cent had no opinion. In 1988, only 41 per cent of Canadians felt the Senate should be able to veto legislation passed in the Commons.

In fact, in a Gallup poll released this summer more than two-thirds of respondents or 68 per cent, said the Senate should use its power to block the unpopular GST legislation.

The current system of appointing senators, however, is viewed with increasing dismay by most Canadians.

The survey found that only 5 per cent of the public favour an appointed Senate—the lowest level in the 46 years that gallop has polled Canadians on this issue.

Support for an elected Senate has never been higher, with 54 per cent of respondents supporting an elected upper chamber, up from 51 per cent earlier this year.

Support for an elected Senate was marginally weaker in Quebec, where only 39 per cent of respondents favoured the move.

So, Senator Hébert, you can see the two significant different opinions that emanate from Quebec when it comes to the Senate.

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Bosa:

More and more Canadians appear to favour abolishing the Senate, a position supported by almost one third, or 32 per cent of respondents.

This marks an increase of 10 percentage points since January.

The proposal to eliminate the Senate had highest support in Quebec where 43 per cent favoured the move.

Nationally, abolishing the Senate had the highest support in 1944 when 36 per cent of respondents favoured getting rid of the upper chamber.

So now we have eight new appointments on the government side, and they have the majority. With the complicity of the Speaker, this government has usurped the rules of the Senate on two occasions which forced members of the opposition to employ methods which are not traditionally used in this chamber in order to defend its rights and privileges. These precedents have created the suspicion that the government will try some other method or some other trick to muzzle the Opposition further from speaking on behalf of Canadians on third reading.

I have received many letters from individuals, briefs from a province, letters from municipalities, and I would like to share with members of the Senate some of the opinions that have been passed on to me. I would like to start with one letter which is from the city of Quesnel in British Columbia. It says:

Dear Senator Bosa: Quesnel City Council members, as "grassroots" political representatives of over 8,000 constituents urge you to use your influence and power as a member of the Senate of Canada to deny approval of the federal government's Goods and Services Tax bill that is presently before you.

An overwhelming majority of the citizens of our community opposite the imposition of the proposed tax, favouring instead a genuine and sincere effort by the government to cut spending to reduce the burgeoning deficit.

Certainly you and your Senate colleagues must realize the opportunity before you to demonstrate in the most basic terms to each and every Canadian citizen that our Senate does have a place and a purpose within our democratic system.

We urge you to force the government to reconsider what is undoubtedly the single most unpopular and unnecessary proposal in many years.

My council recently voted unanimously to reduce taxes in this municipality in 1990 by 2 per cent — not much — but certainly a step in the right direction . . .

Please listen to the people, for it is the people that you and the government represents.

Yours very truly

Michael L. Pearce, Mayor of the City of Quesnel.

I have another one here from a member of parliament who was a staunch Conservative until recently. His name is David Kilgour and he has written a letter to me and it says:

Dear Senator Bosa:

Proposed goods and Services Tax.

I am convinced beyond doubt that implementing the proposed GST as a remedy to problems created by the MST—which is the manufacturer's sales tax,

—would be significantly worse in its consequences for most Canadians than the present "disease". For one thing, as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business points out, Canada will be the only nation on the planet with a two tier sales tax in nine provinces where some items are "federally exempt only, federally and provincially exempt or federally and provincially taxed".

Some people claim that there are 48 countries in the world that have applied some form of goods and services tax, but none of these countries is a federations or a federal state with the exception of West Germany, but the provinces of West Germany or the now united Germany do not have powers of taxation. What they do is carry out the programs of the federal government. Consequently, it is much easier to apply a tax in a unitary state or country or in a federal state like West Germany where the provinces do not have powers of taxation.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Bosa, I wonder if you would accept a question. Did you say there were 48 countries?

Senator Bosa: I understand.

Senator Fairbairn: You would not have the names of those countries by any chance?

Senator Bosa: I do not have — do you want me to answer now?

Senator Fairbairn: Sure.

Senator Bosa: I do not have the names of the countries, but I know that most European countries have it as well as New Zealand which is cited as an example from time to time. It has created havoc in that country.

Senator Fairbairn: I wonder if you perhaps have those names back in your office. At some point maybe you could give them to me and I could include them in my speech when I enter the debate in the house.

Senator Bosa: I would be pleased to do that.

[Senator Bosa.]

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you.

• (2200)

Hon. Peter Bosa: The letter goes on to state:

From the standpoint of city Canadians, the urbanologist Jane Jacobs wrote six years ago about the presence in prosperous cities of a very large number of small, independent producers selling countless services and products to each other. One major problem with the VAT, she wrote, is that "no neater little tax contrivance could be imagined for favouring large, relatively self-sufficient enterprises such as multinational corporations with their many subsidiaries and many internal transactions while penalizing symbiotic production. (By favouring those who can produce in-house and avoid the tax) VAT needlessly twists the knife in the very vitals of city economies." I share her point of view on this fully.

Among many rural organizations, The Alberta Association of Municipal Districts and Counties (AAMDC) issued a paper outlining its concerns, stressing:

—The GST would significantly adversely affect the ability of AAMDC as well as the Alberta Government itself to provide many essential services. The large additional costs of collecting the tax are incalculable at this time.

—As farming is a way of life and vital industry in Alberta, this new tax would force our farm producers to hire bookkeepers, a cost many cannot afford.

I understand our Wheat Growers Association predicts the GST would increase the cost of producing grain on a 1,000 acre farm from $36,380 to $39,654 in Saskatchewan, from $55,630 to $60,636 in Manitoba, and from $52,790 to $57,541 in central Alberta.

Senator Fairbairn, they mention that for every 1,000 acres it would increase the cost of production. The letter goes on to state:

Jim Puckett, director of the Canadian Feed Industry Association's Saskatchewan division, warns that "cash flow problems caused by delays in collecting rebates could be the final straw for many farmers who have operated with borderline profitability for the past decade".

Most business people who support the GST are, of course, in large enterprises, especially within our financial services industry. Yet is it not in the financial interest of our banks, trust companies and brokerage houses to have such a system imposed? The lag time between collecting the GST and turning it into the government, which is inherent in such a system, seems likely to push a lot of cash temporarily through their accounts.

Effect on Middle and Low Income Earners

Instead of looking at the Canadian Bankers Association, the Business Council on National Issues (BCNI) and their enthusiastic approval of the GST, the Senate should look at smaller business, which has been the real locomotive of economic growth in recent years, and what it has to say. In a recent survey conducted by Small Business magazine, only four per cent of small business respondents felt that the GST should be kept whereas 51 per cent said to "scrap it" and another 45 per cent responded: "change it". Whereas British Columbians lead with 58 per cent opposed to the whole idea, Ontarians came in with a strong 47 per cent opposed to the tax.

A host of independent studies of the proposed tax have criticized it as well. Ben Sevack, president of the Canadian Research Committee on Taxation, stated that "The GST or any consumption tax is a bad tax. It punishes Canadians for consuming and it erodes the tax base as consumers buy less. This leads to inching up the rate so it is not a question of percentages. Even 1 per cent is too much." Robin Boadway, a Canadian tax policy expert at Queen's University, believes that implementation of the GST "risks undermining Canada's structurally sound income tax system."

Moving to Canadians generally, even with an unindexed credit every several months, the GST will be harmful to low income Canadians in every province. The vast majority of salaried Canadians would be worse off under the GST.

Some opposed to the GST believe it is being used as a "pay off" to large corporations for their continued support of Mulroney government programs. Tom D'Aquino, president of the BCNI (which represents, as you know, the CEO's of our 150 largest companies) stated, "If they do that (drop the GST rate to seven per cent), they'll do exactly what we want them to do." The rate was subsequently dropped to seven per cent, and Michael Wilson entertained no further changes in the rate.

I should also stress that Michael Wilson has evidently admitted that several billions of the revenues now raised by the present MST are in "business inputs". If eliminating that tax on some items bought by businesses for their own use would release funds for increased investments, is not most of the estimated $4 billion made available for these investments to be replaced by money from the hard-pressed pockets of Canadian consumers generally?

Impact on Outer Canada

There are numerous other points which should be discussed in detail. The especially negative effect on our tourism, restaurant, trucking and fishing industries, the fact that New Zealanders appear to be leaving their country in larger numbers since their GST was implemented and the rate increased, the inevitably adverse effects on our non-profit organizations, the probable inability of the GST at the seven per cent rate to decrease our deficit and mammoth national debt, the administrative nightmare and cost it creates for more than one million small businesses across Canada, its inflationary effects and strong probability of a renewed wage-price spiral, and its significantly more severe impact on Outer Canadians as both producers and consumers than on southern Ontarians because of the new tax on transportation services.

The government should focus its concern less on the financial position of our larger companies and more on our middle and low income citizens who already shoulder a disproportionate percentage of federal income taxes. Only 10.4 per cent of federal tax revenues are expected to come from business contributions during 1990. This is down from 14.4 per cent in 1985, and 18.6 per cent in 1980. I refer here as well to a recent exchange on the record at a Finance Committee meeting.

When asked if corporate income tax should be eliminated, Don Blenkarn replied "Yes", and Murray Dorin added "Absolutely". Is your's a government for large business only?

That was the question that was put by the interlocutor.

In short, I urge you to do everything you can to delay this bill until after the next general election. It is simple sophistry to argue that the present proposal corresponds to the one hinted at by Michael Wilson during the 1988 election campaign.

It is a good letter written by David Kilgour.

Senator Fairbairn: A good Member of Parliament.

Senator Bosa: I have another letter—

Senator Corbin: You said that was David Kilgour, the MP?

Senator Fairbairn: From Edmonton.

Senator Corbin: The Member of Parliament they kicked out of the Tory caucus in the House of Commons because he would not support the GST?

Senator Bosa: Kilgour, MP, Edmonton South East.

Senator Corbin: I guess that is how they treat their members.

Senator Bosa: I have a letter from the City of Sarnia addressed to me personally, concerning the proposed goods and services tax. It is dated April 25, 1990 and reads:

> At the April 17th meeting of Sarnia City Council, concern was expressed about how much the proposed Goods and Services Tax will cost Canadian municipalities. After some discussion, the following resolution was adopted:
> > THAT Sarnia City Council appeal to the Canadian Senate and all M.P.'s to enter into meaningful discussion with The Right Honourable Brian Mulroney and The Honourable Michael Wilson and impress upon them the hardships the Goods and Services Tax (GST) will create for municipalities; and that they press for exemption from the GST for every Canadian municipality.
> Sarnia City Council would appreciate your support for a zero-rating exempt status for the municipal sector.

It is signed Ann Tuplin, City Clerk. Honourable senators may be aware that the municipalities, as well as businesses in Ontario, had a new tax imposed on them in the last several months which is called the Health Tax. Two per cent of the payroll goes to finance medicare. At onetime each one of us in Ontario paid the premiums directly. These premiums are now paid by the business community, municipalities and institutions. The city of Sarnia is concerned about the GST because it is an additional burden to some of the taxes it is already paying.

Senator Fairbairn: It is like the City of Lethbridge, which I mentioned on Monday night—$200,000.00 more a year because of the GST.

Senator Bosa: How big a municipality is Lethbridge?

Senator Fairbairn: 60,000 people.

Senator Bosa: Municipalities do not produce money. They have to collect it through municipal taxes which, in turn, are then imposed on homeowners. Forty-five per cent of their taxes goes towards sustaining education, and the balance goes to provide services such as garbage collection, welfare, and other services that municipalities usually provide.

Senator Fairbairn: It is tough.

Senator Bosa: I have another letter, from British Columbia. It is addressed to me personally. It reads:

> I am writing to you in regard to the G.S.T. the Mulroney Government is trying to impose on Canadians. This is a totally unfair tax to the people of Canada. We are already overtaxed as it is. Please do whatever YOU can to defeat this tax. I would appreciate hearing from you about this. Thank you.

It is signed June Gamble. There was a Member of Parliament from Ontario by that name.

Senator Fairbairn: John Gamble. He ran for the leadership.

Senator Bosa: Yes, he ran for the leadership of the Conservative Party.

Senator Fairbairn: He might have been a better leader than Mr. Mulroney.

Senator Bosa: I have another letter here, again addressed to me. It is from Etobicoke, Ontario. It reads:

> Last month the National Party Council presented a case to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce that Bill C-62 be amended to allow yogourt to be zero rated. You will remember that it was the N.D.C.'s contention that yogourt be treated in the same manner as other basic groceries and dairy products. As the attached newspaper article demonstrates, there is a growing consumer concern and a recognition of the need to repair this confusing anomaly.
> While we have been assured by everyone that a solution is being considered, we urge you to act now while there is still an opportunity to fix this flawed legislation.

[Senator Bosa.]

> It is signed, Respectfully yours, Graham P.M. Freeman, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer.

I have a letter from Jack Sheriff, 246 Main Street, Wolfville, Nova Scotia. Honourable senators can see that I have received letters from across Canada, although I do not see myself as a high-profile Senator.

Senator Murray: You are very well known.

Senator Bosa: I have received letters from British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and now one from Nova Scotia. The letter reads as follows:

> Since the present government has rammed the bill through the House of Commons in the face of almost universal opposition to the bill, it is now the responsibility of Senate to represent the will of the people and either kill the bill or stall it until (or help force) an election with the GST as the central issue.

Since this is the province from which the leader comes, I just wonder whether he has received a similar letter. He seems to be engaged in a conversation with Senator Nurgitz. Perhaps he did not hear the solicitation that was made.

Senator Fairbairn: Read it again.

Senator Bosa: The first part of the letter urges the Senate to either stall the bill or to force an election in which the main issue will be the goods and services tax. This letter is from the province from which our esteemed leader of the Government in the Senate comes, and I just wonder whether he has ever met this gentleman, Jack Sheriff. Senator Buchanan comes from the same province.

Senator Corbin: What is the address?

Senator Bosa: The address is 246 Main Street, Wolfville, Nova Scotia, B0P 1X0. The letter continues:

> Power has gone to the head of Mr. Mulroney. He is no longer paying attention to the voters. He believes he can do no wrong, especially at mid-term.

Was he not elected in Nova Scotia at one time?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Bosa: When he sought public office, a member of Parliament resigned his seat.

Senator Corbin: He is the present Minister of Public Works.

Senator Fairbairn: Elmer MacKay.

Senator Bosa: The letters continues:

> So where does democracy and autocracy begin?
>
> When does a majority of votes in the House of Commons override the will of the people? At what point does the convenience of a mid-term political strategy dictate and contradict the expressed dissatisfaction of the Canadian people?
> What is responsible government?
> At what point, when a government is irresponsible, unfair and wrong-headed, does the Senate express 'sober second thought', assume responsibility and take action?

These are strong words.

● (2220)

The time is now, Mr. Buckwold.

The Bush and Mulroney tactics of stone-walling, brain-bashing and brain-washing are totalitarian tactics. Canadians are upset and overwhelmed by the tyrannic measures of this government yet are bewildered by the question of "how do you fight City Hall?" Tory strategy is that once the GST is in, the measure is carved and set in stone. Millions of our tax dollars have already been spent on propaganda and ads to tell us how workable and effective the GST is. Businesses are being deluged with documentation to demonstrate how to file the GST as though it's already been implemented. But it is not yet a fait accompli. Moreso than any previous government has dared to tread, this government is treading and it is treading too far. The buck must stop somewhere. The buck (or ball) is now in the Senate's court.

As you know, the Japanese government tried a similar ramming technique. The Japanese voters cried halt, and the GST was stopped.

My accountant has acknowledged how terrible a tax this is and suggests that the GST on top of an income tax is not only grossly unfair but insane and killing for small businesses. As if I don't already know it! I hear it daily from my customers.

Both Dennis Mills and the Institute for Research on Public Policy have put forth alternatives. The government refused to listen. Will the Senate? I enclose a copy of a recent newsletter referring to Neil Brooks' report. I assume you have a copy of Mr. Mills' alternative. I trust the Senate will not only listen but pay attention and respond to these alternatives.

There should be a call for an election. Short of that, there should be a national referendum on an issue that will so drastically and disastrously affect the personal pocket book and the collective economy of every Canadian.

Canadians don't want the GST. Short of an election, confronted by an autocratic government, who represents the majority of Canadians at this point in the face of a monolithic, bureaucratic force? The Senate! And you, Mr. Buckwold, and your committee.

The challenge is yours. I trust it will not be deterred by charges of partisan politics but be up to the challenge of helping ensure that Canadians enjoy the right of representative government.

Mr. Mulroney has finally gone too far. Arrogance obviously has no limits. He is prepared now out of sheer perversity to push through the GST at any and all costs, even if it destroys us at the same time. It is up to the Senate to find a way out of this dreadful dilemma because, clearly, even if Mr. Mulroney recognizes his folly in pursuing this course, he also clearly has become so deeply mired and committed that he feels obliged to proceed pell-mell into the abyss and lacks the grace and the face to pull out.

Help him, Mr. Buckwold. And help us. Or God help us all! Stop this misdirected man and stop the madness by stopping the GST bill.

You and your members have the brains and the tact to do the right thing as opposed to the political thing. Canadians are counting on you. You may be sure that you can count on Canadians to support you.

I rarely write letters. But I cannot stand idly by and watch my business and other businesses go down the drain. Canadians have a right to vote on this issue. The government is dealing with OUR tax dollars and proceeding with the GST when they know it is opposed by the majority of tax payers. There is no mystery about this. Mr. Mulroney's standing in the polls continues to plummet with each passing day. Yet Mr. Mulroney doesn't seem to get the message. Please GIVE it to him! This I beg of you, Mr. Buckwold, and all members of the Senate, whatever your political stripe.

My previous letter (copy enclosed) went to every Member of Parliament, every member of the Senate, and every Premier in the land. Now I address you and all members of the Senate with this second plea. I pray my plea does not fall on deaf ears.

It is signed by Jack Sheriff.

Senator Corbin: What is the date of that letter?

Senator Bosa: April 25. I have a brief here from the legislature of the Province of British Colombia.

Senator Corbin: Back on the West Coast?

Senator Bosa: Back on the West Coast.

Senator Simard: Order, please, Senator Corbin.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Simard is talking of order.

Senator Bosa: This letter is addressed to members of the Senate of Canada:

Dear Senators:

Please find a copy of the recent debate in the British Colombia legislature on the goods and services tax. As you may be aware, there was unanimous support by all Social Credit and New Democratic party members of our legislative assembly for the resolution that this house absolutely and unequivocally is opposed to the proposed federal goods and services tax and urges the Government of Canada to immediately withdraw the GST legislation in the interest of all Canadians.

The full debate appears in the attached excerpted pages from Hansard of Tuesday, April 10, 1990. Also attached is a copy of a press release issued by my office on the same topic on April 13, 1990.

As indicated in the public statement, I am hoping that our Senate will provide the opportunity for the House of Commons to have a second look at the necessity of this tax as it is presently structured.

Thank you for your attention.

Sincerely,

Grace M. McCarthy, MLA, Vancouver-Mountain

Was she not a minister at one time?

Senator Fairbairn: She certainly was. She ran for the job of premier.

Senator Bosa: Was that prior to April of this year?

Senator Hastings: Yes.

Senator Bosa: The statement reads as follows:

McCarthy calls for emergency debate on GST. Asks Senate to act.

If I might digress for a second, in 1978, when we were in the midst of a constitutional debate, there was a special Senate committee formed of which Senator Stanbury was the chairman. We had hearings and heard from the provinces, individuals and constitutional experts on what sort of reforms should be instituted in the Parliament of Canada to make it more reflective of what Canadians want. We had a delegation from British Colombia headed by a minister, and that province proposed that we adopt a system of government such as they have in West Germany. They have the Bundestag, which is the equivalent of our House of Commons, and they also have the Bundesrat. The Bundesrat is supposed to be like the Senate of Canada except that the members of the Bundesrat are provincial ministers and they meet infrequently. It does not function the same way as does the Senate of Canada. We meet, deliberate, consider and improve.

● (2230)

Senator Hébert: Day and night.

Senator Hastings: Are they elected or appointed by the parties?

Senator Bosa: The ministers that go to the Bundesrat are elected by the provinces or the "Landers" as they are called. The Bundesrat debates how much money the province needs to carry out the programs of the federal government. It is a party process but, as I said earlier in this debate, the provinces have no power of taxation.

British Columbia is proposing this type of change in the Upper Chamber. Of course, there are many suggestions made about changing the Senate but no one seems to take into account that if you change the Senate it will have an impact on the House of Commons. It is rather like flooding a valley without taking into account the total environmental impact.

Senator Hébert: If you appoint too many senators you have to elect more MPs.

Senator Bosa: If you increase the representation in the Senate you have to increase the number of members in the House of Commons.

Let me read the press release of Grace McCarthy. It says:

Victoria—The Members of the Senate of Canada will receive copies of the Legislature of British Columbia's unanimous resolution opposing the federal government's proposed Goods and Services Tax, according to a statement issued today by Vancouver Little Mountain MLA, Grace McCarthy.

She made the statement at the close of the week that saw her earlier call on the British Columbia Legislature to approve a resolution saying that the B.C. House was "absolutely and unequivocally opposed to the proposed federal Goods and Services Tax and urges the Government of Canada to immediately withdraw the GST legislation in the interests of all Canadians."

Said Mrs. McCarthy during the debate, "There are many ways that this question can be resolved in Ottawa," and that would be, "when it goes to the Senate, to have the Senate turn it down."

Now she intends to make sure the Senate has ammunition for its cause by ensuring that each Senator gets a copy of the unanimous British Columbia resolution.

Honourable senators, British Columbia is not the only province that objects to the GST. Alberta has launched a legal challenge in the courts.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, and they are joined by the provinces of Ontario and British Columbia.

Senator Bosa: There are three provincial challenges.

Senator Fairbairn: They are challenging the constitutionality of it.

Senator Bosa: She goes on to say:

The British Columbia Resolution against the GST was passed unanimously on Tuesday, April 10 with both the New Democratic Opposition Members voting with the Social Credit Members on the motion.

Honourable senators, I have a copy of the British Columbia Debates and we can look at what arguments they used. There is a heading, "Motions without Notice" and then another heading "Proposed Federal Goods and Services Tax". It then goes on to state:

MRS. McCARTHY: Mr. Speaker, I'm happy that leave has been given to suspend the rules that you are duty-bound to uphold, in order to allow this debate. Accordingly I move, seconded by the first member for Saanich and the Islands (Hon. Mr. Couvelier): "Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia is absolutely and unequivocally opposed to the proposed federal goods and services tax and urges the government of Canada to immediately withdraw the GST legislation in the interest of all Canadians."

I want to begin my comments on this motion by saying that there are many ways that this question can be resolved in Ottawa. One would be for the House to turn it down and, of course, that has not happened. The other would be when it goes to the Senate, to have the Senate turn it down. But this debate is important, because it says to the Canadian public and to our fellow British Columbians that we in this House are wishing to have our clear decision, our clear comments, made on the GST, which has been presented by the federal administration—probably the most unfair tax and surely the most burdensome tax to have come forward to the Canadian people since the income tax was brought in in 1917.

I'm sure there aren't many who would not agree that this tax is going to place an unfair burden on consumers across this nation, a burden that was formerly carried by the business community and one which the small consumer cannot carry.

British Columbians have paid their way. We have paid our way in Confederation. We have given our fair share, and sometimes we think we've given more than our fair share. British Columbia has kept its fiscal house in order. No other jurisdiction in Canada has been able to match our record of growth while controlling expenditures. Therefore it's particularly galling to have the freewheeling, free-spending federal administration—both this government and preceding federal governments—with their insatiable appetite for more money, more expenditures, telling us that they need even more money through taxation, through the GST. One has to wonder. Do they need more money for paintings for the National Gallery?

I suppose that is a reference to the painting that drew a great deal of criticism on which the gallery spent $1,700,000.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, I remember that.

Senator John B. Stewart: Senator Bosa, may I ask a question? You have just now referred to expenditures for which this money might be used. Do you recall that in the appropriation bill which came to us from the other place in the spring of 1989 we were asked to give approval to the use of Governor General's Special Warrants for certain expendituress which ministers of this Mulroney Government described as "urgent in the public good". Do you recall that some of the expenditure which ministers of the present government were prepared to describe as "urgent in the public good" included payment for a $20,000 survey of the shrubs of 24 Sussex Drive?

The Prime Minister himself has described that as foolish. Nevertheless, his ministers advised the Governor General to sign a Special Warrant so that payment might be made.

There was also a payment for the purchase of a picture. Your reference to a picture is what reminded me of this.

Is it not quite possible that the people to whom you were just now referring in your interesting address have this kind of payment in mind and that this is the kind of payment for which they are not prepared to pay a tax on goods and services? Do you not think that those kinds of payments made by the present government in the spring of 1989 and described as "urgent in the public interest" are precisely the kind of payments which serve to discredit this attempt to impose a new tax on goods and service?

● (2240)

Senator Bosa: I agree with you fully. Just think of the expenditure of $1.7 million for a painting in the National Gallery, which many painters painted. However, when I refer to painters, I do not mean artists. People who paint houses and people who paint automobiles have claimed that they could do the same for a lot less than that, and also I recall the $20 thousand that the honourable gentleman referred to, which tends to create a deal of criticism and cynicism amongst the citizens, particularly when new taxes are imposed. They seem to recall these expenditures which, in their opinion, are unnecessary and wasteful.

If I many continue with the intervention made by Mrs. McCarthy. She goes on to say:

> You know, when we first heard about the GST, our Premier spoke to the federal administration and told them that a better way to present a new tax regime to the people of Canada would be to do so after they cut unnecessary expenditures in the federal administration. Our Premier told the federal administration to live within their means. Mr. Speaker, can I tell you that today, since I first presented this motion to the House, we have spent $113 million just on servicing the national debt, just in interest?

This goes back to April. It is certainly a lot more than $113 million now. So $113 million has been spent today by the federal government, and she means $113 million a day just to service a national debt.

> When they first suggested the GST, the Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Couvelier) went to meeting after meeting in Ottawa. The Ministers of Finance met and tried to bring some sense to the federal administration, and said over and over again that this was the kind of onerous tax the Canadian people and British Columbians could not tolerate. The record is clear that both the Premier and the Minister of Finance have given the message to an unhearing federal administration.
> I wonder when enough is enough. When are we going to say enough is enough to the federal government? How long will British Columbians, who have long been fiscally responsible, tolerate the kind of expenditures we have seen?
>
> I want to say that we are here today to try to save Ottawa from making a great mistake. Do you know that even Ottawa recognizes that this tax is going to be inflationary? Even the federal Minister of Finance tells us that this is going to be one of the greatest inflationary taxes we've ever seen. This in a year when we in this province are looking forward to a buoyant economy, but when the rest of the nation is saying that we are going to have difficulties in the year ahead. When every economist in the country is saying that we are going to have problems, the federal government gives us more. This is an inflationary tax.
> British Columbians are fair people, and when the federal administration calls on us for more money . . . . I think British Columbians, if they knew it was fair, certainly would abide — although probably not gladly — by the decision of our federal masters. Surely they would say:

"Well, we asked for some of these services; we have to pay for them." I think that's fair, but we have been paying dearly for the services.

Our tax administration in this country is not a reasonable one. Had the people in Canada been asked to reduce the debt through the tax, which was the way it was introduced a very long time ago by the federal administration . . . .had they truly been going to reduce the deficit, I think that even in that case we would have said: "Well, we're going to get away from this incredible debt. We're going to reduce that debt which was handed to us, that national debt which is now $380 billion, costing us $113 million a day to service, $41.1 billion annually just to service . . . ." Had we even been asked to give to the GST to reduce the deficit, I think that perhaps Canadians would have said: "Well, we've spent the money. It's in the deficit". But no, Mr. Speaker. We find out now that it is only for more services, which the federal government deem will keep them in power longer.

I suppose that is referring to the daycare centres that this administration promised during the last election that they intend to carry out.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps, Senator Bosa, they are referring to by-elections such as the one which was brought on in Quebec to bring Lucien Bouchard to the House of Commons.

Senator Bosa: I see. The Honourable Senator Stewart has a better memory than I have.

Senator Hastings: What did it cost? $500 million?

Senator Bosa: I had forgotten that particular aspect.

Senator Hastings: Wasting money on Bill C-62, yes.

Senator Bosa: I have to tell you this. I do not believe it will stay at 7 per cent.

Senator Simard: That has nothing to do with the rebate; does it? Are you talking about the rebate?

Senator Bosa: Yes, this is a debate that took place in the legislature.

Senator Simard: I am talking about the rebate, not the debate.

Senator Bosa: Oh, the rebate. No,no.

Senator Hastings: We will get to that. We will get to that.

Senator Simard: Are you not talking about that?

Senator Hastings: We will get to that later.

Senator Bosa: So Mrs. McCarthy goes on to say:

I have to tell you this: I don't believe it will stay at 7 per cent. I believe that, as in every other jurisdiction in the world, jurisdiction after jurisdiction—and particularly with this federal government—this tax will increase to again satisfy the insatiable appetite of the federal Treasury Board.

The collection process which has been explained by Ottawa will mean that every small business in this province and across this nation will be encumbered by extra bookkeeping costs and added hours. In may not seem important to people who figure out these kinds of things in the bureaucracy, to the federal politicians who are out on the hustings trying to sell the GST and to Mr. Wilson in the federal administration, but I can tell you that it is an onerous thing for a small business to have to purchase equipment—and many will have to purchase different cash registers just to deal with this tax.

Senator Stewart: It has to be passed on to the consumer.

Senator Bosa: Who else?

Senator Hastings: And the consumer will pay tax on the increased prices.

Senator Bosa: That is right.

Senator Hastings: Plus provincial tax.

Senator Simard: Order, order!

Senator Hastings: "Order", he says.

Senator Bosa: To continue with Mrs. McCarthy:

Do you realize that every small business across this nation, every British Columbian in a small business, which represents more than 95 per cent of all the business in this province—the greatest employer in our province and across this nation is small business—will now have to be encumbered by the costs of what we are told are hundreds and hundreds of tax collectors.

I believe 3,900 tax collectors will be hired to administer this tax. Mrs. McCarthy continues:

Thousands and thousands. It's a bureaucracy that will grow and grow and again consume more of our people's dollars.

The throne speech has called the GST unnecessary, and so it is. Business groups have said that the increase in the large corporation's tax rate comes at a very bad time. "One of the things that has been sustaining our economy is business investment, and this tax increase affects that to the tune of $200 million," said Tim Reid, president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. "By increasing taxes to pay for the lower GST rate, the government is taking its hand out of one of our pockets to put it in another." We're tired of having the heavy hand of government in the pockets of our small business people, in the pockets of our consumers, in the pockets of our householders and in the pockets of the senior citizens who need to have security for the future.

The repackaging of the GST has taken place in the last few months. They've taken it from 9 per cent to 7 per cent and thought the Canadian people would buy it.

I think that's one of the saddest commentaries, that we should even consider that we should be bought off by two per cent.

> I do have a solution. I do believe Canadians and British Columbians would accept a line on the income tax form which addressed reduction in the deficit being carried by the federal administration. I think we would do our part. I think a line on the income tax form—no more bureaucracy, no added inspectors—that said 2 per cent, or whatever it would take, on an annual basis would be our contribution to pay for that which we have enjoyed in the past and on which we are paying incredibly high interest rates today.
> I would suggest that if we did that it could be a solution. It would have to be allocated to the national debt.

This is exactly what Senator Lawson was proposing, namely, that the excess funds that are raised through the GST be used to pay the deficit to reduce the national debt. Mrs. McCarthy goes on to state:

> This GST is going to add to our national debt, and we will not get out of the mire of indebtedness for our children and our grandchildren for years and years to come.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: The GST is demoralizing the Canadian people.

Senator Doody: Don't interrupt.

Senator Haidasz: It is a good interruption. You are ruining our country.

Senator Doody: Bad manners.

Senator Simard: Order.

Senator Hastings: Senator Simard is calling "order" over there. Get those fellows in order over there.

Senator Hébert: Put Senator Simard in the chair and then we will have order.

Senator Simard: You listen to Senator Doody.

Senator Bosa: She goes on to state:

> If our members in this House and our families ever see the end of the national debt, it would be a great surprise going with this kind of fiscal policy. It can't happen because they spend faster than they collect and the interest rate adds up to a mountain of debt.

Senator Hastings: Go over that again.

Senator Bosa:

> If our members in this House and our families ever see the end of the national debt, it would be a great surprise going with this kind of fiscal policy. It can't happen, because they spend faster than they collect and the interest rate adds up to a mountain of debt.
> I am pleased to move this motion. I would hope that together in this House, in a spirit of cooperation for the good of the people of British Columbia, we can give a message to the House of Commons and to the Senate in Ottawa and to the federal administration that we do not want the GST.

Senator Hastings: And it is a message to the unelected majority in the Senate, too.

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Mr. Clark then said:

> I am pleased to rise in support of the motion put forward by the government side. Unfortunately, the House of Commons passed the GST motion. It was implemented, essentially, a few hours ago.

I think he was wrong when he said that it was implemented. I think he meant that it was passed. He goes on to say:

> Where was the government for the last three years fighting the GST? Where were the emergency debates in the House? Where were the motions in the House to fight the GST so that we could go on record as opposing the GST when it mattered, not when it's safely passed in the House of Commons? On this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, we have consistently and aggressively opposed the GST. It's regressive. It's an odious tax. We have raised it repeatedly.

Obviously this man is an NDPer. He is criticizing the government of British Columbia for having raised a debate against the GST only after the House of Commons had approved it. In other words, they are accusing Social Creditors of being hypocrites.

Senator Hébert: Well, they have a point there.

Senator Bosa: He continues:

> I'll talk about the record in a minute. The New Democrat Members of Parliament have led the fight in Ottawa against the GST.

I should like to put this on the record so that we can have both sides of the debate that took place in the legislature of British Columbia. We will then have a better perspective of their point of view.

Senator Hébert: It is very important that we have that.

Senator Bosa: We might then say a few words about the NDP, who wish to take full credit for fighting the GST—even what we are doing apparently is to their merit.

Mr. Clark goes on to say:

> In particular, a debt is owed to a former Premier of British Columbia, Dave Barrett, who fought for hours against the kind of tactics that we've seen by the Tories in Ottawa to impose this on British Columbians. But they stood alone. No members of the government appeared before the federal Finance Committee to register their opposition, unlike other governments in Canada. We haven't seen any leadership against the GST from Socred members.

So, Senator Hébert, that means that they never made representations—as some other governments did—to the finance committee when they were considering this taxation. He goes on to state:

> Three years ago, when the GST was first contemplated, the federal Tories talked about a sales tax on food. I put a > motion on the order paper that this government join with the Opposition to oppose a sales tax on food. It was never called by the government.

> So we raised it in Question Period, and this side of the House asked the Premier, on the record—and we can get the Hansard—to oppose the federal government's attempt to put a tax on food.

We can get a copy of Hansard. He goes on to say:

> The government chose not to support the Opposition's motion. They chose to stay neutral on the question of taxing food. We asked that three years ago, and we heard no support from the government. We heard silence on that question, even though, when we raised it, all parties in Nova Scotia had moved a similar motion and adopted it.

So the Nova Scotians adopted it. Should we ask Senator Buchanan about that?

Senator Stewart: Yes. By all means.

Senator Bosa: Senator Buchanan, I was wondering if you were listening to the debate that took place in the British Columbian legislature.

Senator Doody: We have tried to listen, but Senator Hastings keeps interrupting.

Senator Bosa: No, he is not interrupting me. He is asking me questions from time to time to clarify a point that I might not elucidate properly. I am grateful to him for asking me.

Senator Doody: Well, then, keep on elucidating.

Senator Simard: He was attempting to clarify something so that he will stay awake.

Senator Bosa: I am rereading this for Senator Buchanan's information.

Senator Hastings: There is Doctor Simard again.

Senator Bosa: The more interruptions that occur, the longer it will take me to finish.

Senator Stewart: Yes.

Senator Hastings: His time is restricted.

Senator Bosa: It is an NDPer speaking to a motion that was put by Mrs. McCarthy for a unanimous resolution condemning the GST and appealing to the Senate to fight this tax. He is criticizing the Socred government that they awoke only after the tax measure was passed by the House of Commons. He goes on to say:

> So we raised it in Question Period, and this side of the House asked the Premier, on the record,—and we can get the Hansard—to oppose the federal government's attempt to put a tax on food. The government chose not to support the Opposition's motion. They chose to stay neutral on the question of taxing food. We asked that three years ago and we heard no support from the government.

[Senator Bosa.]

• (2300)

> We heard silence on that question, even though, when we raised it, all parties in Nova Scotia had moved a similar motion and adopted it.

I was wondering if Senator Buchanan was aware that this particular matter was raised in the British Columbia legislature?

> All parties in Alberta had moved a motion and adopted it. In this House, we couldn't get this administration and this Premier to go on record opposing the tax on food.

Senator Stewart: Senator Bosa, don't you realize that Senator Buchanan has spoken quite clearly, quite emphatically, in Nova Scotia again and again denouncing the goods and services tax? His position is well known in Nova Scotia. People in my part of the province, Senator Bosa, are going to vote against the Progressive Conservative Party because they know that this is a bad tax and they believe it is a bad tax because of what Senator Buchanan has said. Do you not understand that?

Senator Hastings: On the flight to Ottawa from Halifax, did he hit his head or something?

Senator Simard: Look to the future, please.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bosa, excuse me, but I cannot help commenting on the remark I just heard from Senator Simard. He says to look to the future. He spoke on just about every Liberal amendment to this legislation and where did he look? He was looking back at the past every time. Now he tells us to look to the future. Don't be intimidated by Senator Simard.

Senator Hastings: What kind of future is there when there is no light at the end of the tunnel?

Senator Corbin: A point of order! I do not say this for myself, nor do I say it for Senator Bosa, but we have reporters who are trying to take notes. I have been observing the reporters. They have a hard time hearing what is going on because of the background noise all over the chamber. It is on this side of the house to some extent, but it is especially on that side of the house. I think we owe it as a courtesy to the people who work for us to keep the noise level down and to respect the rule which says, if two Senators have to speak, they should go below the bar or out. Let us for a change be decent and make the task of the people who work for us day after day a little easier. Surely we can do that, can't we?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: If you want to amplify that point, go ahead. As a matter of basic decency, let's hear it.

Senator Denis: If we want to make any remarks, let us rise and make the remarks one at a time, and I am going to follow that suggestion myself from now on.

Senator Bosa: I am glad this point of order has been raised, particularly in light of the difficulty the Hansard reporters have in recording several voices speaking at the same time. In addition to that they have to put up with my accent which might render their task a little more difficult than they should be prepared to accept.

Senator Doody: I know what you mean, I have the same problem.

Senator Cogger: You have an accent, too.

Senator Hastings: What about Senator Simard's accent? He talks all the time.

Senator Bosa: If I may continue, Mr. Clark went on to say:

> Why, Mr. Speaker, did they not fight the GST when it was first introduced instead of now, belatedly, after it's passed in the House of Commons? Because they secretly support it. The Tories in Ottawa are pursuing the same right-wing agenda that we have seen under Social Credit for years: higher taxes on working people, higher taxes on seniors, higher taxes on the poor and tax cuts for the rich and for corporations.
> Under Social Credit, medicare premiums have been doubled; 600 fees have been increased,—

I do not understand what they mean by, "600 fees have been increased." Perhaps they might have meant 600 per cent, but it certainly does not come out that way in this Hansard from British Columbia.

> —many over 100 per cent; licences and permits have been increased under Social Credit, under this administration. We have seen Pharmacare user fees of $5 for senior citizens in British Columbia. We have seen income taxes increased in British Columbia. We have seen small business taxes increase under this administration. And now they claim that they are opposed to the GST for doing precisely that.
> At the same time, under this Social Credit administration we have seen corporate income taxes cut to among the lowest in Canada. We have seen the high-income surtax that Bill Bennett brought in eliminated in the first budget under this administration, at a cost to the treasury of over $30 million—tax cuts for the richest citizens of British Columbia under Social Credit and tax increases for everyone else; tax cuts for large corporations and tax increases for small business.
> This government's philosophy is very clear. They believe the rich don't have enough money and the poor have too much. It's exactly the same agenda we see under the Tories in Ottawa. And the GST fits with this agenda. But they know it's not popular, so they stand and say they are opposed. But their actions belie their true intentions. The Minister of Finance suggested that if the federal government dropped the GST to 5 per cent, then the provinces would agree to a joint 10 per cent GST. He said that; it's quoted. It's on the record: a 10 per cent GST would be acceptable.
> Mr. Speaker, it's like the old joke and I won't repeat it. It's not the principle of the tax they're opposed to; they're just dickering over the price. They agreed to a 10 per cent GST. We heard it from the Finance Minister.
> Then the Minister of Finance stated on March 7, 1990: "Negotiations are underway with the federal government aimed at setting up a system of sharing expertise to collect the GST." They're now negotiating, Mr. Speaker; they're discussing with the federal government how best to implement the GST. That shows their true colours. They're not opposed to this tax. They're opposed publicly, but they have senior staff members meeting with senior members of the Tory government on how best to implement it. They're negotiating to implement the GST.
> On March 26 in the House of Commons, the Hon. Michael Wilson states: "The facts are that we are meeting with the provinces. Those meetings have been taking place quite recently. In fact, there was a meeting with the provinces to discuss the GST as recently as last Friday." That was in answer to a question about whether they were meeting to discuss the implementation of the GST.
> I checked, and senior officials from the British Columbia government met on March 23 to discuss the implementation of the GST with the federal government. That shows you their true colours. The province is cooperating. They should not be cooperating with the federal government through their staff levels or their political levels to implement the GST. They should refuse to meet on any level with the federal government on the implementation of the GST. They are in complicity.
> Mr. Speaker, I want to make another point that demonstrates another reason why the government really isn't opposing the GST the way they could if they showed some leadership on this question. The province stands to make a windfall profit that people don't realize, because the current 6 per cent retail sales tax by the provincial government will be applied on top of the 7 per cent GST imposed by the Tories. In other words, the provincial government stands to gain 7 per cent more revenue from their social services tax. On $1.852 billion in revenue, that means the province stands to gain $130 million in provincial revenue and windfall profits from the implementation of the GST.

• (2310)

> No wonder they're silent on this issue, unless and until it becomes a political issue and they know they have to come out against it. That's why they haven't committed themselves to fighting the GST and why they haven't refused to cooperate. If they were serious, they would not only cooperate, but they would tell British Columbians that the $130 million they are piggybacking on and that they are going to collect on top of the GST will be immediately returned to them in the form of a tax credit—a tax cut—so they don't profit from this regressive and odious tax.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Bosa a question? I would like to ask the senator how many provinces in Canada stand to gain windfall profits as a result of the GST?

Senator Doody: Nine.

Senator Haidasz: I do not think so, but I wonder whether Senator Bosa can tell us. If not, perhaps some other learned senator in this chamber at 11:20 p.m. can answer my question. I think these windfall taxes are unfair to the Canadian taxpayer. They are not just over-taxed but they are immorally taxed, crushingly taxed.

Senator Hastings: Brutally taxed.

Senator Haidasz: May I get an answer to my question?

Senator Doody: It is up to Senator Bosa.

Senator Haidasz: If he cannot answer this statistical and moral question, perhaps some other senator in this place can.

Senator Simard: On a point of order. Is the Acting Speaker taking note of the speakers? I suspect we have had at least three speakers on the other side tonight. I understand no senator is allowed to speak more than once and we have had Senator Hastings, Senator Haidasz and Senator Corbin.

Senator Haidasz: On points of order. All I am doing by standing up and asking a question is to seek information. It is not a speech, it is a question. I would ask Senator Simard to be fair.

Senator Hastings: That is impossible.

Senator Simard: Heed the Chair's ruling.

Senator Haidasz: Apples are apples and oranges are oranges, do not mix things up. The matter of provincial windfall taxes is very important and should be addressed in this chamber before we take a final vote.

Senator Doody: Senator Corbin has a point of order.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard suggested that Mr. Speaker take note of members rising. It is not for Mr. Speaker to do that. The record is kept by the officials of the Senate, not by Mr. Speaker.

In any case, when we rise, we do not rise to speak formally on the motion. We rise on a point of order or to put questions, and questions can only be put with the permission of the honourable senator who has the floor. He has not sought the floor to make a speech. Senator Simard, you have been in politics how many years here in Ottawa and in New Brunswick?

Senator Simard: Long enough.

Senator Corbin: Then you should know the rules. Keep quiet.

Senator Simard: We were told this afternoon that the rules in New Brunswick do not apply in the Senate. Make up your mind over there.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I was asked a question by Senator Haidasz as to how many provinces will gain a windfall profit by applying their sales taxes on top of the GST. As far as I know there are only nine provinces with a sales tax. Alberta does not have a sales tax. It will be difficult to answer the question at this time because the GST has not been implemented.

[Senator Doody.]

I recall during the Ontario provincial election of a few months ago that Premier Peterson made a statement that he was going to reduce the sales tax from 8 per cent to 7 per cent because some politicians were accusing him of trying to piggyback the GST on top of the sales tax. As to what is happening in other provinces, I do not know. Perhaps Senator Oliver could enlighten us as to what is happening in Nova Scotia. Perhaps Senator Doody could tell us what is happening in Newfoundland.

Senator Doody: When the time comes.

Senator Bosa: Perhaps Senator Cogger from Quebec.

Senator Doody: Newfoundland is lined up four-square behind the GST.

Senator Bosa: I would like to continue with Mr. Clark's dissertation in the British Columbia legislature. He goes on to say:

> I want to talk for just a minute about the tax because it falls disproportionately on those who can least afford it. It particularly hits women. It hits the poor disproportionately, as most Tory and Socred taxes have done over the last few years. Women represent 60 per cent of the poor in this country. The largest proportion of poor people in British Columbia are single women with children. That is true in every province, none more so than British Columbia. We have seen that time and time again. That is who it is going to hit the hardest.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I just want to make another comment. That is why the GST is an immoral tax, for that very reason which Senator Bosa has just informed us about.

Senator Doody: Was that a question? You promised it would be a question every time you stood up.

Senator Haidasz: Or a comment.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Clark continues:

> In addition, the other area of the economy that will be hit the hardest—and all economists agree—is the low-wage service sector. Again, it's an area in which women unfortunately predominate in terms of that job ghetto in British Columbia. Again, when the service sector is hit hardest under the GST, it means that it hits hardest on women in British Columbia.
> I want to talk briefly about some facts with respect to the GST that show the GST is not necessary.

• (2320)

Honourable senators, I do not think this is funny although I hear some people laughing. It goes on to state:

> —and that we can have fair taxes and a balanced budget in British Columbia and in Canada. If the amount of direct taxes paid by corporations had increased proportionately to the increase in direct taxes paid by individuals between 1950 and 1988, corporations would have paid $63.4 billion in taxes in 1988. Thanks to the shift in the tax burden under Liberal, Tory and Socred administrations, we saw corporations pay only $11.4 billion in direct taxes last year. In other words, if corporations paid the same in proportionate terms as individuals, the federal government would have $52 billion more in revenue. If they had been forced to pay that $52 billion, the federal government would have run a surplus of $31.5 billion instead of a deficit. If they'd paid the same proportion as they paid in 1950, there would be a surplus in British Columbia, a surplus in every province and a surplus in Canada. Instead, in Canada and British Columbia we have among the lowest corporate income taxes in the world. The highest corporate incomes taxes are in Japan and West Germany, the two most successful economies.

Senator Haidasz: Why can we not be the same?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa: It goes on to state:

Government expenditures over the period '50-88 increased 55 times, but taxes paid by individuals increased 74.8 times. Corporation taxes increased only 13 times. In other words, it's not government spending that has fuelled the deficit; it is the government's refusal to tax corporations at the same rate they tax individuals.

It is a deliberate ideological agenda by Conservative governments in Ottawa and by Social Credit governments in British Columbia that has shifted the tax burden dramatically away from the rich, away from corporations and onto the backs of everyone else. The GST fits with that agenda, and that's why they haven't been as aggressive against it as we have.

Then Mr. Vander Zalm took the floor and this is what he had to say:

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I too of course oppose the GST, as do all members on this side certainly, and I expect similarly so on the other side.

Perhaps I should begin by responding to the charge that possibly no more can be done. The NDP takes the view that it's all lost in any event. I too am pessimistic, but I would remind all members of the House and the people of our province that if we had a proper and reformed Senate, we would still have a further chance.

I can't help but remind the member who spoke just before me that his party has consistently come out against the Senate. Only recently there was a speech by the member for Esquimalt-Port Renfrew (Mr. Sihota) saying that he would, as his party would, abolish the Senate. If we have no Senate, then all the decisions will be made in the Commons, which, as we know, is very much weighted towards Quebec and Ontario. There wouldn't be a hope at all for western Canada and particularly British Columbia. So if we want to talk about protecting British Columbians, the NDP should reconsider its position that we must abolish the Senate. It is the safety valve. It could be the safety valve today on the GST proposal.

I'd like to go over some dates, because the member who spoke before me is obviously not aware that this proposal by the federal government was first made in 1986. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance in 1986—before me and before the present Minister of Finance (Hon. Mr. Couvelier)—went to Ottawa to oppose what was then called a business transfer tax. Again, on October 31, 1986, we made representations in Edmonton to the ministers there assembled, opposing the GST or, as it was still called then, the business transfer tax.

On June 15, 1987, in Ottawa, the options were put forth by the federal government: a federal-only value-added tax, a joint federal-provincial value-added tax and a federal-only business transfer tax. We opposed it in June 1987. On December 10, 1987, in Ottawa, there was a general discussion on the national sales tax. We again opposed the GST in December 1987. On March 9, 1989, there was a general discussion on the national sales tax, again in Ottawa. A federal paper was presented. British Columbia again opposed the GST. On December 7, 1989, at a further conference in Ottawa, we again opposed the GST. On March 27, 1990, at a meeting in Ottawa to discuss all the implications of this, again we opposed the GST.

I have with me a press release from the Ministry of Finance dated August 25, 1989: "...very concerned about the inflationary impacts..." We again opposed the GST. On October 17, '89, our Minister of Finance presented, with others, a paper to the first ministers and outlined the negative impact of the GST and urged us as a body of first ministers to oppose the GST. At the first ministers' conference, November 9, 1989, the only speech of all those presented by the Premiers at the conference that specifically opposed the GST and urged the federal government to reconsider came from the Premier of British Columbia. We again opposed the GST.

As a matter of fact, when we discussed this in April 1989 among first ministers, British Columbia was the only province that presented an alternative. We said: reduce the federal bureaucracy by 25 per cent and consider some of the programs presently in place—perhaps to that extent, or to a maximum of 15 per cent—and you won't need a GST, you won't need a manufacturers' tax and you'll take care of the deficit. That was widely reported, but I would again remind all in the House that the NDP made no comment, because reducing the bureaucracy is obviously very foreign to them. But we did have an alternative.

When we first heard about the GST proposal—or with the other names that were first given it—we were, of course, extremely disappointed, and we were certainly very much opposed. I suppose part of the—

Who is filibustering now? I hear voices from the other side.

Senator Simard: It was not from this side. It was from your side.

Senator Bosa: I feel sorry for Krystyna, the Hansard reporter; she may be having a difficult time trying to hear what I am reading.

This exerpt goes on to state:

> I suppose part of the disappointment came because it was presented by the Conservative government in Ottawa, and we would perhaps expect such to be more in keeping with socialist philosophy.

Honourable senators, here is the premier of British Columbia accusing Conservatives in Ottawa of having socialistic tendencies because the position of the GST is so contrary to the philosophy of people to the right of centre. He went on to say:

> As we look throughout the world and see where the GST was imposed, it was generally, if not always, initiated by a socialist government. Where we saw it initiated by a socialist government—whether it was New Zealand, the Netherlands, Sweden or many other socialist countries earlier on when socialism was somewhat catchy, before all of the happenings in eastern Europe and elsewhere in the world—it began as it did in Sweden, at about 10 or 11 per cent. Today in socialist Sweden the rate is 23 1/2 per cent.

• (2330)

> That will happen in our province, in our country, if we allow this. If this happens, if the federal government proceeds—whether it's them or some more socialistic government that follows—we'll see the same thing. It will simply be increased time and time again. We are very much, and always have been, opposed to the GST.
> As a matter of fact, our record shows that we have continually fought to decrease taxes. I appreciate the acknowledgement by the second member for Vancouver East (Mr. Clark) in his remarks on the throne speech last year, when he too talked about the GST and said, "For a government that reduced the sales tax as you've done it, from 7 to 6 per cent, you must . . ."—

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, the reporter cannot hear. As a point of order, why don't you go in the reading room. People cannot take notes here. They cannot hear because there is too much noise on your side.

Senator Phillips: We will talk louder.

Senator Hébert: You may talk louder, but I am not the one that is suffering. I listen very easily, but it is the reporter who cannot hear what the Senator is talking about.

Senator Phillips: I do not care.

Senator Hébert: You do not care about reporters? If you care, you should be silent.

Senator Hastings: You should be polite.

Senator Bosa: It is still Premier Vander Zalm speaking, and he is saying—I am repeating the paragraph that I read before because there were so many interjections, to make it easier.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Cogger: I thought you were referring to the question from the member from Vancouver East. Is that not what you just said? The member from Vancouver East asked a question. It was not Mr. Vander Zalm. He does not represent Vancouver East.

Senator Bosa: I appreciate—

Senator Phillips: You see, some of us are listening.

Senator Doody: He is trying to be helpful.

Senator Bosa: I appreciate the question that was put by Senator Cogger, but if I must point out to him that it is Premier Vander Zalm speaking and he is saying the following:

> As a matter of fact, our record shows that we have continually fought to decrease taxes. I appreciate the acknowledgement by the second member for Vancouver East, (Mr. Clark)—

You see he is referring to Mr. Clark.

Senator Hastings: Have you got it now?

Senator Cogger: Yes.

Senator Simard: When did Premier Vander Zalm make that statement? When did he make that statement? Was it before or after he sold Fantasy Gardens?

Senator Hastings: When did he sell that?

Senator Simard: It may have something to do with it. I was thinking—

Senator Bosa: He made that statement on April 10, 1990.

Senator Simard: Oh.

Senator Bosa: Anyway, he goes on to say—

Senator Simard: At the time it was made?

Senator Bosa: He was referring to Mr. Clark.

> —in his remarks on the throne speech.

Senator Cogger: Mr. Clark is a member of Vancouver East?

Senator Bosa:

> In his remarks on the throne speech last year, when he too talked about the GST and said, "For a government that reduced the sales tax as you've done it, from 7 to 6 per cent, you must be opposed." Of course, the response was in the affirmative. I appreciate the recognition.

So for the benefit of Senator Cogger, Premier Vander Zalm was thanking the member from Vancouver East, Mr. Clark, for the remarks that he had made. Premier Vander Zalm continues, and he says:

> When I was last in Holland—

You know, he comes from Holland, Premier Vander Zalm. He was born in Holland.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Bosa: It continues:

> —I experienced my cousin coming home from the vet. I've told this story a number of times, and I would like to tell it again because I think it's indicative of what has happened in socialistic countries. His little dog had been attended to by the vet, and the vet presented a bill for 300 guilders.

This is still Mr. Vander Zalm. It has nothing to do with Mr. Clark from Vancouver East.

Senator Fairbairn: I am interested in your story about the little dog.

Senator Bosa: I will continue:

When the cousin went to pay the bill with a credit card, the remark was made: "If you pay with other than cash, it's 400 guilders, because only if you pay cash can I do it for 300 guiders." Certainly, the socialists, if the've studied socialism in other countries, would be familiar with this. That is what's called an underground economy.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Senator Bosa, would you entertain a question?

Senator De Bané: Speak in French.

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: There is something I want to understand. Something drew my attention, you see, my wife is from Holland. Would you please explain to me what your story about a Dutch citizen going to the veterinarian with his little dog has to do with the debate on the GST. That is not clear in my mind. I would even venture to say that it is quite irrelevant.

[English]

My wife is Dutch and we do refer to guilders every once in a while.

Senator Bosa: As I was saying, Premier Vander Zalm, referring to his experience when he returned to Holland, said that he spoke to his cousin who told him a story—

Senator Cogger: About his sick dog. His cousin had a sick dog.

Senator Bosa: He said that his cousin took his dog to the veterinarian.

Senator Cogger: For 300 guilders.

Senator Bosa: And the veterinarian told him that the cost of whatever he did to the dog was going to be 300 guilders. So Vander Zalm's cousin took out a credit card and was going to pay by credit card. At this stage the veterinarian intervened and said, "If you pay me by credit card, it is $400 guilders. If it is paid in cash, it is $300, but if you pay with a credit card, it is $400." Mr. Vander Zalm's point, as I understand it in the way he made it in the British Columbia legislature, is that the GST has a tendency to create an underground economy.

Senator Cogger: Ah, it is quite clear now. In other words, Mr. Vander Zalm's cousin's dog is against the GST. Is that the point?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on a point of order, Senator Bosa has the floor. He is giving examples of the kind of influence the GST may have upon transactions. He has given us an example, and I think that, in the interest not only of the Senate but of the government, it is desirable that we have a reasonable debate on this topic. Now, let me say this, honourable senators. The point is often made that Bill C-62 has been with the Senate for many months. Senator Murray said that earlier today, but I think if you go back and survey what has happened, you will see that the truth of the matter is that we have had very few hours of concentrated debate upon the bill itself.

Senator Cogger: Whose fault is that?

Senator Stewart: Let me tell you, Senator Cogger, on my point of order, that if you go back and look, you will find that the second reading debate took about five, or five and a half hours on May 1, 2 and 3.

● (2340)

I have to be a bit vague on that because I am depending on the Hansard margin time entries. Senator Doody may have the exact figures of how much time was taken on May 1, 2 and 3.

Senator Doody: You say that second reading was in May?

Senator Stewart: The second reading.

Senator Simard: It was in November.

Senator Stewart: In the Senate?

Senator Simard: It was in May, yes.

Senator Stewart: It was in May, on May 1, 2 and 3.

Senator Doody: I do not have it.

Senator Stewart: I am referring to second reading in the Senate. The Bill then went to committee.

I know that Senator Simard thinks that I attended meetings of the committee, but that is not true.

Senator Simard: You are talking about the committee, are you not?

Senator Stewart: We then came back here after a summer break proposed by the government—that is, the three-month summer break. We were then confronted by a report from the committee. After the attempt by the government to push the bill forward failed, a special order was made. We then had a short debate on the report of the committee, which report was rejected. We then went onto amendments on specific topics. Only now are we focusing upon the general topic of the third reading.

Senator Simard: That is your fault.

Senator Bolduc: Yes it is, Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: May I complete my point of order? I will then be happy to deal—

Senator Bolduc: I thought you were making a speech.

Senator Simard: He is.

Senator Stewart: No. What I am saying, honorable senators, is that analysis shows that we have not had much of an opportunity in this Chamber—perhaps members of the committee have—

An Hon. Senator: Only 300 hours.

Senator Stewart: No. That is not quite true. We as ordinary senators have had very little time on the general proposition that the bill be now read a third time. There has been a limited time—that is, approximately 60 hours—available on those amendments. If you take the ten amendments and multiply them by six, that is all the time that was available.

Senator Simard: It is your fault.

An Hon. Senator: How much more time do you need?

Senator Cogger: Is that your point of order? I should like to respond to that.

Senator Stewart: Well, let me finish. My point of order is that we are now addressing the question of the third reading directly, albeit through the smokescreen of the "previous question". Senator Bosa is making a presentation for our enlightenment. Some of us may not like it, but he is doing his duty.

Honourable senators, it is highly desirable and in the interest of the government and the public that we understand the full implications of this bill.

One of the problems with the Meech Lake Accord, honourable senators—Senator Bosa will remember this—is that when that accord was under discussion in the Senate and we had notable witnesses, most members of the Progressive Conservative Party, the party that was supposed to be supporting the Meech Lake Accord, did not even bother to attend let alone ask questions.

An Hon. Senator: What is your point of order?

Senator Cogger: What is the new point of order?

Senator Stewart: My point of order is that when we have an important item of public business before us we should avoid trying to divert the discussion in ways that trivialize and prolong the debate.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michel Cogger: Thank you, senator Stewart. I will now respond.

Senator Stewart: That is my point.

Senator Cogger: May I now respond?

Senator Stewart: Yes, of course.

Senator Cogger: I will respond now. I find it incredible that you, Senator Stewart, should stand up at 10 minutes to midnight to lecture us on this side of the House while senator Bosa, whom I love dearly—I have spent a lot of time with senator Bosa and I have a lot of respect for him—is talking to us about the dog of the cousin of Premier Vander Zalm paying a visit to a veterinary in Amsterdam, or whatever. That is supposed to be the serious stuff that will advance the debate on the GST?

Senator Hastings: The dog is opposed to the GST.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: We can take you on at midnight, at one o'clock, two o'clock, or three o'clock in the morning. We will debate seriously when you guys get serious. But when you talk to me about the dog of the cousin of Premier Vander Zalm, we will have fun. No more sermons.

Senator Stewart: I am not suggesting that the kind of intervention that senator Cogger has made now is nonsense; rather I am asserting it. Senator Bosa is giving us a good, homely example of the kind—

Senator Cogger: He has been reading the debates from the House in British Columbia for the last hour.

Senator Hastings: It is the witching hour!

Senator Cogger: He is not here to debate.

Senator Stewart: Senator Cogger, of course, does not want to listen. Senator Bosa is giving us a perfectly good example of the kind of underground economy that will be encouraged by the tax.

Senator Simard: Sit down.

Senator Stewart: We will be confronted by this situation if the tax ever becomes law. There may be good points to this tax. Obviously there are serious difficulties. We should understand the good points. I hope members of the government will rise in their places to defend the bill. They have been utterly quiet so far as far as the merits of the bill are concerned. On the other hand, we are aware of our duty to expose the difficulties. That is the nature of the parliamentary process.

The trouble with this government is that since 1984 government members of the Senate have been unwilling to invest time and energy in explaining government measures. That has been a large part of the trouble here. We have not taken the time to arrive at the kind of consensus that should be a result of the parliamentary process.

Senator Cogger, you are not at all promoting the cause of the government that you support here tonight.

An Hon. Senator: Nor are you, for the Opposition.

Senator Cogger: Please proceed with the dog, the visit to the vet, and any other country that you want to mention.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Peter Bosa: I suppose that Premier Vander Zalm was trying to underline the fact that the GST has gone to the dogs as well. By that I mean that it applies to the dogs. But I never thought that quoting this example of the potential for an underground economy would cause so much barking in this Chamber.

Let me continue with the debate.

Senator Cogger: We were at the visit to the vet.

Senator Bosa: We are finished with that. We already left the veterinarian.

Senator Cogger: Did he pay by credit card or cash?

Senator Bosa: Mr. Van Der Zalm continues to say:

> Certainly the socialists, if they've studied socialism in other countries, would be familiar with this. That is what's called an underground economy. That's in fact what would happen. We would see an underground economy where people would pay with cash for goods and services in order to avoid paying the GST. Once having paid with cash in order to avoid the GST, . . .

—everybody loses. The government loses and a new initiative in the underground economy takes place. He continues:

> This is fairly prevalent in socialist countries and probably is part of why there has been such a downfall of socialism throughout the world.
> We know as well that this will lead to a giant bureaucracy. There will be a tremendous negative impact on our tourism industry; it will hit the poor, as the former speaker said; and it will definitely be very inflationary.
> We've met many a time in Ottawa and elsewhere on this matter. It was suggested by the finance critic from the NDP that meeting about this was wrong and that no meeting should be held. But I would suggest that in all our attempts and all our meetings we've not only opposed it, but we've also argued that the provinces should at least be more aware of what they are proposing or how they are proposing to implement it. Because if they're determined to proceed, we should, as much as possible, reduce the negative effects of this tax—and there will be many.
> Mr. Speaker, I know that the NDP is also opposed to this tax. They've said so, and I believe it. But I suppose there is a difference between the opposition as we've expressed it and the opposition as we hear it from the NDP, which might be expressed in some of these articles that I've brought with me today. One is a statement by a very prominent socialist New Democrat, David Schreck. His suggestion was that what we could do in the country—be it federally or provincially—was to continue to go into debt. He said:
> > "The public debt is no monster. The monster the Conservatives have created is made up of myths. Public debt is a loan within the family, like advancing your children's allowance. Clearly there have to be some limits to debt, but the available debt shows that Canada's debt is not out of line by historical standards. In 1989 the indicator of debt is not a reason to be alarmed."
> I have heard this said before by other socialists.
> I would also read quickly from a statement made by a Mr. Krog on Vancouver Island, who is a lawyer in Parksville, and a candidate for the NDP socialists: "If we are going to be honest with the people in the next election, that's what we're going to have to tell the people. We'll have to raise taxes for our programs." So they're talking about raising taxes.

The speaker intervenes and says:

> Order, please. I'm sorry, but under our agreement with the House Leaders, that will terminate the Premier's remarks.

Mr. Lovick then intervenes and says:

> Well, well, well. Isn't this an interesting phenomenon? We are making history here. We are witnessing something that looks suspiciously like a rerun of Alice and Ralph from "The Honeymooners". We are suddenly seeing the first member for Richmond (Hon. Mr. Vander Zalm) and the first member for Vancouver-Little Mountain (Mrs. McCarthy) talking together again and voting on the same side. Wonderful stuff!
> And it gets even better. It also reminds one of another television show, the one called "Church Chat," because when we watch this activity and see both sides agreeing on this particular motion, we have to say: "Isn't this special." You know it's special only because this is the most artificial, phony, contrived debate we have yet seen in this chamber. This resolution comes to us at beyond the eleventh hour, and it comes from a gang of people over there who have suddenly discovered the reality of the political winds ablowing. This group of folks, these Socreds—who are really Tories on training wheels—are suddenly going to make the grand announcement that they don't like their big brothers and sisters anymore. They disagree. Come on. Spare us that, please.

If you believe as passionately and powerfully as the two members opposite appear to, where were you when we raised the question in the Legislature on two occasions? Where were you when the Leader of the Opposition wrote and said: "Let's have an emergency debate so we can present a unified front in Ottawa." Where were you? If your opposition is so powerful, one must wonder why most of us have never heard of that opposition. Let me suggest to you, Mr. Premier: bite the bullet and come out of the closet. Come on, let's do it. Come out and tell us what you really believe.

It is impossible to look at the opposition as embedded in this motion without believing and feeling strongly, based on evidence, that there is more than a touch of hypocrisy here. What we are looking at, remember, in the GST is fundamentally a shift in the burden to middle-income and lower-income people and away from the higher sector. That is a pretty clear and simple enunciation of a neoconservative agenda, precisely the same agenda that all of those folks over there have enunciated and defended on more than one occasion.

I would suggest to you that you have a look at your own record in the chamber, members opposite, and see what you've had to say about your solutions to solving economic problems, because they are neoconservative as the Tories have ever been. You have the same agenda.

What I notice also in your opposition is that I had to search hard to find what you were opposed to. The Premier went on at great length telling us they were opposed, but he didn't say why. Similarly, the first member for Vancouver-Little Mountain didn't really say why. They just hide behind the old argument: "We've got to reduce the debt and the deficit." That's their only argument, and I wonder if it's the case that maybe part of their opposition—one of those many quiet meetings none of us heard about—is actually based on the fact that the GST isn't big enough. Maybe they wanted more. We don't know, because we have never seen what your position is. What's wrong with the GST? Let's take a look at it. Let's see what's wrong with the thing.

The predicament we have with the GST is that it is carrying on that fine tradition called corporate welfare—hang on, Mr. Premier, I want you to hear the word—that socialists pointed to in this country in 1973-74. That's the predicament we still have in this country. And guess who's talking about it now? Not just a bunch of people on the left, but folks like columnists in the Financial Post. The Financial Post is talking about corporate welfare, and they are suggesting that what has happened is that government grants to businesses which in many cases have no need for them, which are profitable, which are successful, have become so endemic in our system, so much a part of the system, that we're not even scandalized by them anymore.

Moreover, that same analysis points to the fact that we could take away all of that corporate welfare activity and it wouldn't make a darn bit of difference in terms of employment or keeping Canadians employed. But the Tory government, wedded to the neoconservative agenda? Not likely. And this government, with its friends in the Tory caucus in Ottawa, trying to tell us it has suddenly become converted to the cause against the GST? Give us a break, to use a phrase. How are we to believe that?

Let's have a look at some other arguments. The other arguments that are developing about what's wrong with the GST are coming from mainstream economists who demonstrate to us very clearly that this tax, besides being unfair and regressive, is probably going to have precisely the opposite impact intended, in economic terms. We know it's going to be inflationary. That's given: you can't do 7 percent extra tax without that. If we have an inflationary tax, invariably it will lead to greater wage demands; wage demands inevitably will lead to higher interest rates; higher interest rates will lead to higher unemployment; and higher interest rates—guess what, surprise, surprise—would increase the federal deficit, because a good chunk of the federal debt is made up of interest payments on the debt. The point then, Mr. Premier, is that this tax, regressive as it is, will do exactly what it isn't . . . on this part of the equation we can meet.

• (0000)

But when we look at what we ought to do to replace the GST, this is where we part company, Mr. Premier. And I for one am proud to part company, because your answer, in terms of what we ought to do . . . I quote your member for Vancouver-Little Mountain—understandably from Little Mountain; the member from Shaughnessy. The argument is the oldest one in the book. It's Victorian morality written all over again. It says: live within your means, cut your spending and we'll all survive nicely. But it ignores, sadly, the fact that this tax is going to impose much more hardship on the lower end of the scale than it will on people in that bracket over there—I say, pointing to the member opposite.

The problem is that this tax is a continuation of a Tory taxation policy which is regressive and which is part of an ongoing process of making our entire tax system in this country less progressive than it was before. Nobody on that side of the house, however, is saying anything about what's wrong with the tax in terms of the impact it will have on those least able to bear it. You haven't given us any arguments at all of that sort. We could do some things, but I wonder how many members opposite would be able to handle the bold policies in fiscal and tax reform that we ought to have in this country. I would like to suggest that if the members opposite were really gutsy and really believed that this tax was so insidious and so evil, they might consider something like an amendment to the resolution. I know that's out of order, so I'm not moving an amendment, Mr. Speaker. But I would suggest that this resolution, this motion, if it wants the wholehearted support of members on this side, would say something like this: "Be it resolved that this Legislative Assembly of British Columbia is absolutely and unequivocally opposed to the proposed federal goods and services tax and urges the government of Canada to immediately withdraw the GST legislation in the interests of all Canadians, in addition to eliminating all corporate tax deferrals and immediately initiating a system of fairer taxation." That's what we should have. That's what we don't have, sadly.

There are ways we can solve our debt and deficit problems in this country, but we can do so in a fair way, not the Tory way. Sadly, this government, by its actions day after day and year after year in this House, demonstrates that it is committed to the same agenda, the same attitude and the same ideology as the Tories—because they are Tories.

It's interesting to note, that there was a story recently published that talks about the number of people who make healthy campaign contributions to the federal Conservative Party; and if one looks at that, one discovers all kinds of prominent British Columbia companies, the great majority of which, I think it's safe to say, have friends on that side of the House, friends of that government.

We can also pose the question, of course: how many members on the other side of the House are currently holding two membership cards? How many failed Tory candidates do we have over there? How many people do we have over there who aspire to higher office, like the current Justice minister in Canada? You can pretend all you want that you disagree violently with the Tories, but the reality is, as we all know full well, that you're the same folks.

That is the end of the debate in the British Columbia legislature. I thought it would be worthwhile putting it on the record because we saw in this debate both the views of the Premier of British Columbia, a former cabinet minister of that government, and two members of the opposition. Notwithstanding their enormous differences in political philosophy, they came to a unanimous agreement on approving a resolution appealing to us to oppose this tax.

Senator Simard: That is just federal bashing. What else is new?

Senator Bosa: These are the supposed Socred friends of the Tory government.

I have an awful lot of letters here that I can read into the record indicating feelings which have been expressed to me personally. For example, I have a letter from the Alliance of Canadian Travel Associations dated April 12, 1990. It says:

Dear Senator Bosa:

As the Senate prepares to debate the Goods and Services Tax, I feel that as the National President of the Alliance of Canadian travel Associations (ACTA), I must once again bring to your attention, Senator Bosa, the specific concerns of our 3,200 members regarding the way the GST has been applied in the travel industry. We have tried repeatedly to discuss changes with the Government that we feel are necessary to protect our industry. So far all of our concerns have fallen on deaf ears despite the fact that ACTA has not opposed the tax in general, just the way it has been applied to the travel industry. We hope the Senate may be able to accomplish some changes in the present legislation to offset the severe consequences the act in its present form will have on the travel industry in Canada.

Because you and your colleagues are long-serving members of the federal government process in Canada, I do not have to acquaint you with the details of Canada's travel and tourism industry, and numbers of people that depend on it for their livelihood, not the fact that tourism will be the world's largest service industry by the year 2000. Considering the impact that tourism should have on Canada's future, and given the potential to reduce our deficit with a positive inflow of tourism money, it is inconceivable to our members that every action taken by our present government is designed to reduce Canada's income from tourism by approximately $1 billion per year and will eliminate up to 25,000 jobs.

We hope that during your debate you will use every means at your disposal to correct the negative applications of the GST to tourism and travel in Canada. To assist you, I have attached the details of some of ACTA's major concerns. If I can assist you further at any time, please contact me at your convenience. As well, we would appreciate your office informing us of the dates of any public hearings on the GST so that we may attend and present our views.

And it is signed by A. L. Taylor, National President of the Alliance of Canadian Travel Associations.

In all the letters I have received there must have been three or four that were favourable or who supported the GST. Yet even those had some concerns about the manner in which it was applied.

• (0010)

I want to turn now to the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for Wednesday, July 18, 1990. At page 57:36, the transcript of the proceedings reads as follows:

Mr. Joseph Lebovic, President, Urban Development Institute Canada: Mr. Chairman, and honourable senators, I feel honoured to represent our industry before such an auspicious committee. We have with us Mr. Paul Kennedy and Mr. Edward Barker, who will be reading the brief too you. That will make it easier for you and the translator, since they will not have to hear an accent.

I suppose that he too speaks with an accent. He went on to say:

UDI represents 700 builder-developers. Our goal is to improve communication between developers and also government bodies at all levels: municipal, provincial and federal.

In our brief you will see that to some extent we differ with the hone builders, but to a great extent we agree with most of the representations that they made. The basic difference is that we think that old houses should also be taxed.

We also wish to point out to this committee that our industry is not inflationary. Prices have dropped 10 to 20 per cent in Toronto. On that strength we made representation to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson and asked for certain concessions. First, we asked that anything above 9 per cent should become a deductible expense to the homeowner for the simple reason that our industry is not responsible for inflation and therefore, having conquered that problem, we do not feel that we should be penalized.

I suppose that he was referring to interest rates because he said that anything above 9 per cent should be allowed to be deducted from their expenses because they say that they are not causing inflation. Then the transcript states:

The Chairman: Mr. Lebovic, if I am getting it straight, are you suggesting that any interest over 9 per cent paid by a person who has a mortgage on a house should be along the American system—that is, an exemption as far as income is concerned?

Mr. Lebovic: That is right. The whole thing should be deductible, but the government is saying that it is caused by inflation, for which we are not responsible, and therefore that portion should be deducted to make home ownership easier, especially for first-home buyers. On the technical questions, since I am one of the largest developers in the Toronto area, I would be happy to answer questions dealing with land development, how it affects housing, and the problems we are having vis-à-vis cost of land component to construction. In other provinces and smaller towns, the lot represents perhaps 25 per cent of the total cost of the house, which was the house in Toronto 30 years ago. Today, however, the lot price, which is beyond our control, represents as much as two-thirds of the total cost. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Barker will continue.

Then Mr. Edward Barker of Price Waterhouse makes the following statement:

[Translation]

I should like to make it clear at the outset that the Urban Development Institute of Canada supports the goods and services tax in principle, but only if the government truly does achieve its stated goals of deficit reduction, developing a more equitable tax system and improving the economy.

We believe that home buying—new home buying or old home buying—is a basic right of every Canadian in this country. Whenever anything impacts the affordability of that housing, we like to make recommendations to those in power to ensure that affordability is not affected.

The goods and services legislation as it now stands will affect the affordability of housing in Canada.

[English]

Senator Simard: No, way.

Senator Bosa: Pardon?

Senator Simard: It is wrong. Senator Buckwold will know it was wrong.

Senator Buckwold: I am glad you were listening.

Senator Simard: We are and we will tell you every time you are wrong.

[Translation]

Senator Bosa: You disagree?

Senator Simard: Again, for the same reasons.

Senator Corbin: Would you start again, please?

Senator Bosa: Very well.

The goods and services legislation as it now stands will affect the affordability of housing in Canada. Our primary concern is the transitional relief provided to new home buyers. You may recall that there is a federal sales tax rebate if the house was under construction at the end of the year and it sold and closed and possession was transferred before April of 1991. However, if the tranaction occurred after April 1 no federal sales tax rebate is available to the purchaser. However, the purchaser would have to pay goods and services tax on that transaction. The result is double taxation.

Our primary concern right now is with the transitional relief. Inadequacy of the transitional relief will produce double taxation, will increase housing costs in an already depressed market and, this increase in the cost of housing will affect all home buyers, primarily first time buyers and low-income Canadians. It will also distort the housing markets across Canada. This is because the value of land is included in the tax base, as the previous presenters indicated.

When you include the value of land in a tax base and the value of land varies regionally, you are distorting the housing market. In other words, you are adding to the distortion. In fact, the proposed rebate to compensate purchasers for new house goods and services tax is not based on true consumption when you are including the value of land in the tax base where regional differences do occur.

We have five recommendations that I should like to summarize right now.

[English]

By the way this can be found at page 57:37 of the proceedings of the committee in Toronto on Wednesday, July 18, 1990.

Mr. Barker went on to say:

We have five recommendations that I should like to summarize right now.

The first recommendation is that the federal sales tax rebate period be extended from the current three months to ten months.

Secondly, we recommend that the tax rate be modified for houses selling in excess of $450,000. Presently everything over $450,000 is taxed at 7 per cent. A lower rate on the excess would decrease the discrimination against the Toronto and Vancouver housing market.

Senator Simard: It is self-interest; self-serving.

• (0020)

Senator Bosa: Senator Simard is aware of what they are saying in the first recommendation. The first recommendation is that the federal sales tax rebate be extended from the current three months to 10 months.

Senator Simard: It is self-serving.

Senator Bosa: In other words, if a house is not completed during the calendar year 1990, but is completed before February 15th, 1991, then the builder is compensated by receiving back two-thirds of the federal sales tax that that builder paid during the previous year in order to complete the house. If the house is completed after February 15 but before April 1, then that builder is only entitled to a rebate of one-third of the federal sales tax that he had paid for building materials to build the house in question.

Senator Simard: That makes sense.

Senator Bosa: However, if the house is not sold prior to April 1, then it does not get any rebate at all, and this is an anomaly in this tax. I do not say that the government went out of its way to punish these people. Perhaps the government did not foresee that the tax would create such an onerous financial punishment for builders who are not able to dispose of their stock prior to the set dates.

However, as the honourable gentleman knows, the lowest period for the housing market, is in the winter, particularly in January, February and March. Canadians have, I believe, a disposition to start looking for housing when the sun starts shining, when it is spring, when the grass is green, so that they can see the environment of those buildings. Then they are likely to make a decision as to whether or not to buy. Certainly, the statistics show that there are very few dwellings sold during this present period of the year.

Mr. Barker then went on to say that the seven per cent GST applied on houses that are worth in excess of $450,000 is unfair because they are already very costly, and he also made reference to the cost of land. We know that land in metropolitan Toronto and adjacent areas has reached the sky limit. We talked about paying $200,000 for a 50-foot lot, and when you consider that the builder also has to pay the GST on the land as well as the added components of developing that land, that has a tremendously adverse effect on the ultimate cost of a house, and this affects more people, especially first-time buyers. People who already have a house might sell their house and then buy another one, so they already have a good start. Those who start out from the beginning have to pay the seven per cent tax in addition to the cost of the house.

I grant you that people of modest means will not be buying houses that cost more than $450,000. They are more likely to buy either a resale house, a secondhand house, a condominium, which might be lower in cost, or a townhouse.

Mr. Barker then goes on to say:

Thirdly, we recommend that the goods and services tax include in its tax base existing residential property-that is to say, resale housing.

In other words, they want to go further than what the government has proposed. They also want the sales tax to be applied to present stock; to houses that have already been built.

Fourthly, we recommend that the tax be based on additional consumption. If you sell a house for $350,000 and purchase a new house for $450,000, you should pay tax on the $100,000 difference, regardless of whether the house that you purchased is new or used.

I suppose that is one additional aspect of how the GST could apply, which is not included in the bill at the present time.

Fifthly, we recommend that there be various technical adjustments to the legislation. The first of those deals with the joint venture provision, which is included in the legislation presently, and which only applies to joint venture arrangements in the mining, oil and gas industry. We should like this provision to be extended to real estate joint ventures. The second technical adjustment is that federal sales tax rebates be provided to developers of commercial properties.

I do not understand. Perhaps Senator Hastings knows, or perhaps Senator Buckwold might enlighten us on how the oil, gas and mining industry is treated under the GST as opposed to the way in which the housing industry is treated.

Senator Hastings: Yes, Senator Bosa, I will have a great deal to say about that when I have an opportunity to address the Senate with respect to the GST. However, before I do so, might I draw the attention of the Speaker—if he could put his book down for a moment—to the fact that we have about five young people working here that are on the paging staff who I think are really not needed during the night, and I wonder if arrangements might be made by the Clerk at the Table to excuse that staff from now until whenever we may adjourn during the night.

Senator Doody: Certainly. I have no objection from this side of the table.

Senator Bosa: Are you addressing Mr. Greene?

Senator Doody: He will see to it.

Senator Bosa: Mr. Barker then goes on to say:

> I should like now to turn briefly to some of the background to those recommendations.

Senator Cogger, I am talking about the representation that was made to the committee by the Canadian Urban Development Institute.

Senator Doody: Beautiful B.C.

Senator Simard: We have travelled a hundred miles.

Senator Bosa: I did not hear what you said. I suppose you do not want to repeat it because it was not important. In any event, Mr. Barker goes on to say:

> I should like now to turn briefly to some of the background to those recommendations.
> We analysed the effect of the goods and services tax on both pre 1991 construction and post-1990 construction. Brethour Real Estate determined—and this is included in your package as Appendix A—that most house closings take place in September, August or October—

That is just what I was saying to Senator Simard a moment ago—

> The reason for that is that people purchase houses and arrange for them to close at the beginning of the school year. Our indication is that since 1985, 40 per cent of the transactions closed in August and September. Those figures are included in your documentation. If 40 per cent of the closings do not close in September, then the other closings are spread throughout the year. In January, February and March, which is the current transitional period for the FST rebate, the number of closings is the smallest of all the 12 months.
> We also determined that the health of the new home builders presently is not so good, difficult times are here. Presently, there are inventories of thousands of unsold new homes across Canada. There are also inventories of sold homes that will never close—at least to the current purchaser. These people have walked away the deal.
> Moving into 1991, there will be a great surplus of newly constructed homes that will have little chance of closing in the period January to the end of March. That is why our first recommendation states that the relief period should be extended from three months to ten months. Fundamentally, there is no logical reason for having a time limit on the FST rebate. In fact, we are puzzled as to why this provision was included.

This is what I referred to before. If the houses are not sold prior to April 1, 1991, the builders get no rebate of the federal sales tax, notwithstanding the fact that they have already paid this tax. Therefore, if the houses are sold after April 1, the GST applies, which means that they have been impacted with double taxation: First the federal sales tax and then the GST. This is what they are complaining of. I have not heard any response from the government side as to whether they are taking this matter into consideration, because it is really unfair. Which goes on to say:

[Senator Hastings.]

• (0030)

> Turning quickly to post-1990 construction, no one can predict the percentage increase in the cost of new housing. With the elimination of the FST, some savings will be passed through, but, fundamentally, we cannot picture a contractor on January 1, decreasing his square footage charge from $60 to $57. In the fullness of time there may be a reduction, but certainly not on January 1.
> Finally, we believe that the GST will distort the housing market especially in the City of Toronto. The goods and services tax provides a rebate for housing costs going up to $450,000, which is certainly great if you are in Trois Rivières or Kamloops, but of practically no use if you are in the City of Toronto or Vancouver. Therefore, the recommendation is that the tax rate applied to the excess above $450,000 be reduced from the current 7 per cent.
>
> Our third recommendation was that existing residential property should be included in the tax base.
> The fourth recommendation was that only the additional consumption be taxed in new or old housing. Let me repeat the example that I stated. If you sell your existing home for $350,000 and purchase a new home for $450,000, regardless of whether the new home is newly constructed or a resale, you should only have to pay tax on the $100,000.

That does seems to make sense, but this provision is not included in the bill.

Mr. Barker goes on to say:

> There would be no tax refunded to the purchaser. Similarly today, if you purchase a $20,000 car and sell it for $10,000, you do not get any tax back on that.
> If you do include existing residential construction in the tax base and only tax additional consumption, it is certainly more fair to all home buyers, not just purchasers of newly constructed homes, and it more accurately reflects true consumption. Who can say whether someone buying a $500,000 house as a resale is receiving anything less than someone who is buying a newly constructred house for $500,000 and has to pay $535,000.

The Chairman then intervenes. He states:

> You have been going on for nearly 20 minutes. We do have a series of questioners. We are not cutting you off in any way, but if we want to have questions, there will not be any time for them.

Mr. Barker then responds:

> I will close by saying that one of the technical adjustments that we would appreciate that the joint venture provision that currently exists for mining, oil and gas joint ventures arrangements be extended to joint real estate ventures. This is found under section 273.

There are then a series of questions and answers. There are also questions put by Senator Hastings. He was the first one to put a question.

Senator Hastings: They were good questions.

Senator Bosa: He says:

Thank you, gentlemen, for the informative brief you have given us this morning. As you may have heard in my questions to the previous witness, my interest has to do with the impact of the GST with respect to the cost of housing.

I note that on page 2 of your brief you state that: It will increase the cost of housing and exacerbate the affordability to consumers, especially first-time buyers.

Again, that flies in the face of the propaganda that is being foisted on us by the governement with respect to the cost of housing.

On page 7 you are more discrete. You say that you will not say with certainty what the percentage increase will be that will result from the tax. You are a little more discrete than the Minister of Finance, evidently, but you might just as well state what you think.

What disturbed me greatly is your last sentence in the paragraph, where you state:

However, most of the members in our industry suspect that a contractor who has been charging $60.00 a sq. ft. to build a house will not drop prices to $57.00 on January 1, 1991 just because the Federal Sales Tax does not apply to the cost of materials.

The Minister of Finance has assured us by saying, "Do not worry about inflation, it will only be an itty-bitty 1.25 per cent."—

That is what is written here.

Senator Hastings: You mean "itsy-bitsy".

Senator Bosa: Yes, He states:

"1.25 per cent." That is based on the assumption that 100 per cent of the FST will be passed through to the consumers. That is the first assumption.

You are more practical than the Minister of Finance. You deal more with reality than does the Minister of Finance. In that sentence you are stating that it will not be passed through to the consumer, and I agree with you. When you take away those two assumptions—not one—his estimation of inflation goes straight out the window. I agree much more with you as to what will happen with respect to the FST. It will not be passed through to consumers, as he is allegedly assuring Canadians.

Mr. Barker responds:

I have one comment on that. Can you picture yourself as a contractor on January 1, or right now, setting your square footage price for January? You would not know what it would be. You may have 25 suppliers. You do not know how much they will charge you at that time. In the fullness of time things, for example, market pressures, may bring it down to $57, but in the short term there is no way you can know what to charge.

Senator Robertson then puts a question. She says:

I am sure I did not hear correctly, so I should like a clarification on this point.

What percentage of the cost of a home is the land? You mentioned that amount, Mr. Lebovic.

Mr. Lebovic replies:

It varies with districts, towns and provinces.

Senator Robertson: What is the figure on average?

Mr. Lebovic: On average, it goes anywhere between 20 per cent of total value to 66 per cent of total value.

Senator Robertson: It is 20 per cent to 66 per cent of the total cost?

Mr. Lebovic: The purchase price, yes.

Senator Robertson: Give me any idea of how many flips occur on the land before the homeowner actually owns it.

Mr. Lebovic: There are really no flips. You end up with a high cost of land because of the shortage of the land. For example, we are dealing with a local developer-builder who buys the land and has to go through the 160-odd procedures to have it sub-divided. That sometimes takes anywhere from 4 to 12 years. In that time he still has to carry these lands. By the time he gets to the point where he can service it—because he has to wait for a certain infrastructure that is beyond his ability; he cannot put trunk sewers in or build a highway—the situation is such that the demand and supply is so great that there are not enough lots on the market. Consequently—whether the developer-builder makes his markup or sells it at a lower price—the next purchaser will pass the increase on and increase the price of the lot.

What escalates the cost of the lots specifically in Toronto and in Ontario, is that the provincial government is not spending enough on the infrastructure to provide enough available serviced land, which creates a shortage and influences prices. The farmer who owns a piece of land that is at the point where it can be developed is now asking for over $250,000 an acre because he knows that he is the only one who has it. It gets to the point where, by the time I build a house, sell the land and the house and have to replace it, I am paying more than what I sold the house and the land for.

• (0040)

Senator Robertson: With respect, I would suggest that flips occur before you get into municipal costing. But our time is limited and I want to move on. For someone coming from the Maritimes, things have happened that I find astounding. Is it true that one group—I do not know if it is a holding company, or whatever—controls almost all the new available land in housing around Toronto?

Mr. Lebovic: Yes, that is a rumour.

Senator Robertson: Is it a rumour or is it a fact?

Mr. Lebovic: No, it is a rumour. A few groups control large tracts of land, but the largest landowner of available land that can be developed in the provincial government. It is in their power to do away with shortages by releasing their own lands for development or putting the land in a position where it can be developed. Compared to what the government can develop, the largest developer in Toronto, who controls a large tract of land, has a small percentage.

Senator Robertson: Of course, I will have to do some more homework—

Senator Cogger: Are you quoting our own Senator Robertson?

Senator Bosa: Yes, I am quoting Senator Robertson.

Senator Cogger: That is very interesting.

Senator Bosa: Yes, it brings to light one aspect of the housing industry that perhaps a lot of Senators opposite may not be aware of. I know that Senator Robertson is aware, because she was putting the questions.

Senator Robertson: Of course, I will have to do some more homework on the Richmond Hill area.

I should like to bring up one more subject which was raised in your brief. You are concerned about the high cost of money and the interest rates today. Those of us who do not live in Toronto or in the Triangle might suggest that the ridiculous escalation of prices in this area have been the main contributor to the high cost of living and, in turn, the main contributor to the high interest rates. Would you say that that is true? The corollary there is that if there is a dip here then the cost of money will come down.

I think that was a very good observation by Senator Robertson. The Chairman intervenes and says:

Blame everything on Toronto!

Senator Robertson: Well, these are the facts, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lebovic: But we are sitting in Toronto. The fact is that that problem has stopped. Houses have dropped by $100,000.

Senator Robertson: Yes, so interest rates have come down.

Mr. Lebovic: The fact that it went up to the extent that it did was not a matter of speculation, it was a matter of a limited supply. It is not in the control of industry to provide available lands for building. That is purely governmental. Therefore, if this thing did happen it is the provincial government that should be blamed.

Senator Marsden then puts a question.

Senator Marsden: I have two short questions for the witnesses. You begin and end your brief by saying that you support the GST under three conditions: deficit reduction, a more equitable taxation system, and an improved economy. The whole burden of your brief has been that the economy will not be improved, at least in the short term, and that this is not a more equitable taxation system. The Minister of Finance says that it is revenue neutral—

Senator Stollery: May I ask a question? What hearings are you referring to?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bosa: I am referring here to a deposition made by the Urban Development—

Senator Doody: He can start again.

Senator Bosa: I am referring to a deposition that was made by the Urban Development Institute in Toronto. I believe you were present.

Senator Stollery: Oh, yes, very interesting.

Senator Bosa: I am just in the process of completing the questions and answers of that presentation. In fact, to complete Senator Marsden's sentence:

The Minister of Finance says that it is revenue neutral, so it is not therefore deficit reducing.

You may favour tax reform, but why on earth would you say that you would favour this particular tax reform? Your brief is somewhat contradictory in this regard.

You may not have heard, because you were not here at the beginning, but I just wanted to make the point that even those who support the GST are asking for so many exemptions that the bottom line is they are actually against it. They say they support it, but they want land excluded from the GST, they want to tax old houses and resales and extend the period of rebate from April 1 for ten months so they can get rid of the stuff. They have a point there because, as you know, if a house is not sold prior to April 1st, the owner of the new house will not receive any rebate for the federal sales tax, and that particular house will be charged the GST. So they have paid the federal sales tax and now they are charged the goods and services tax, which is double taxation.

I do not mean to say that the government intended it to be that way. It might have been an oversight, and it might be corrected if this tax is ever implemented. However, it is cruel to tax an industry twice, particularly at this time when we are going through a very critical period.

Mr. Barker continues:

Mr. Barker: That is certainly your opinion. We believe that the goods and services tax will have a positive effect on the economy.

That is what he says, after having complained about all the other exceptions. He further states:

Look at the elimination of the FST in the export market.

Obviously, he does not understand the impact of the federal sales tax, because the federal sales tax is not applied to exports. He asks us to look at what it will do for the export market.

> At present, 1 per cent to 1.3 per cent of the cost of all exports is FST. When you have a GST, that will no longer be there and therefore the export economy should improve. We feel that the tax may be more equitable in the sense that it will be spread among all consumers. If you buy a 40-inch colour television right now, because of the tremendous markups in that industry you are paying a much smaller FST burden that someone buying a 9-inch television. It will be more equitable. In fact, Mr. Wilson said on December 19 that it will reduce the deficit. If you go through the numbers in his presentations, he shows $1.3 billion in deficit reduction.

That is another contradiction, Senator Hastings. You may have noted, if you were there, that the Minister of Finance said this tax is revenue neutral, that it will replace the federal sales tax. This man contends that Mr. Wilson stated there is $1.3 billion in excess of what the government would be raising through the federal sales tax that would be applied to deficit reduction.

> Senator Marsden: But he also says that it is revenue neutral.
> Mr. Barker: He did say that it was revenue neutral at the beginning, but if you go through the numbers, right now the FST is $18.5 billion and his own calculations indicate that GST will generate $22.5 billion. There is $4 billion there.

Again there is a contradiction here. At one point he says there is a surplus of $1.3 billion. Now he says there is going to be a surplus of $4 billion. It continues:

● (0050)

> Senator Marsden: You are in favour of some kind of tax reform and you prefer this kind of tax reform, but you want substantial changes.
>
> On page 5 of your brief you point out that your institute can make—and I quote:
>
> > . . . a substantial contribution to the development of a fair and practical treatment of real estate within the proposed tax system.
>
> You then set out a whole series of fairly important amendments that should be made to this legislation to meet your concerns.
> Did you present your concerns to Mr. Wilson before the tax or subsequent to the appearance of this legislation?
>
> Mr. Barker: Yes, we did.
>
> Senator Marsden: Have any of your concerns been satisfied by the government?
>
> Mr. Barker: In terms of the FST transitional rebate, the original proposal was two months and it was extended to three months.
>
> Senator Marsden: But you are asking for much longer than that.
>
> Mr. Barker: Yes, because of the way the industry has gone in the last nine months, since the original change to three months.
>
> Senator Marsden: Do you have an indication that the government will give you any more comfort in terms of your concerns? Do you have any further meetings scheduled with Mr. Wilson? Do you have any indication that any of these fairly important amendments that you are proposing will be heard by the government?
> Mr. Barker: We have no meetings scheduled right now, but we do know that our joint venture proposal—that it be extended to real estate joint ventures—has supposedly met with the approval of the Department of Finance. How they will change that, I do not know. Right now the legislation states "oil and gas joint ventures or other prescribed joint ventures," so they could put it in a regulation.
> Mr. Lebovic: To elaborate on this question, the past president and myself met with Mr. Wilson a couple of months ago. We told him that the high interest rate was not our responsibility. At that time he was upset with the spending of certain provinces and the inflationary effect of that, and he was not concerned with our problems. Subsequently, we met with his staff, but we are not receiving much relief. That is why we are here now. We feel that we cannot do anything with the GST, but we are asking this body to find us some relief and give us some amendments, through the government, to help us out. If you want the truth, sure, we would rather have no GST on housing, but, based on the fact that we cannot do anything about it, perhaps they can save face by you asking them to make some amendments.

Senator Spivak has left. She would be interested in hearing several questions she put to the witness:

> Senator Spivak: I have a couple of questions for clarification and then a couple of other questions. I will give you them all at once.
> You are recommending that the value of land be excluded from the GST. Do you think this exclusion will help or hinder speculative activities? As I understand it, your recommendation to not exclude residential property is the recommendation for the additional consumption tax—that is, the upgrading tax, which was also recommended by the House of Commons Finance Committee.
> I should like to know how much the price of land has increased in the last five years as opposed to the previous five years—that is, in a ten-year period what is the difference in the increase in the land?
> My final question deals with the fact that your whole approach, or part of it at least, is based on affordability. Given the average income in Toronto, what do you think the average price of a home should be to meet a criterion of affordability, given the percentage a person now has to spend on housing? It used to be 25 per cent, but it may be more than 25 per cent now.

Mr. Lebovic: As far as house affordability is concerned, our institute does not think that society has an obligation to provide affordable housing. We feel that we have an obligation as builders and as a society to provide shelter for people. We do not think that taxpayers should subsidize people who buy an affordable house at $165,000, for which a person has to earn anywhere between $55,000 and $60,000. I do not think those are hardship cases and that the government should be involved in subsidizing those people and to create affordable housing. We have an obligation to create affordable shelter, but not affordable housing. We are not doing any favour to people by giving them individual houses at a reduced price, pay for heat and fancy mortgages which they cannot afford. Therefore, we would prefer to look after shelter affordability. The government has an obligation to provide shelter. However, to go through the machinations of providing affordable housing is not fair on the taxpayer.

Speculation does not come from our industry. Speculation comes from people who hold land. As soon as developers have an opportunity to develop, they will develop, sell the lots and build houses.

The fact that land cannot come on the market because of a lack of infrastructure is beyond our control. Therefore, a shortage is created and prices go up proportionately because of lack of services.

Your question is how much have they gone up in five years. In some areas, very little; in some areas, 100 per cent or more. What has caused this rise is a lack of infrastructure, roads and services, which is beyond the control of our industry.

Senator Spivak: I was not speaking of subsidies in my general questions about affordability; I was speaking about economic forces. As one senator pointed out, the Toronto market was overheated and perhaps the market forces that are now operating to lower the cost of houses are bringing it more in line with what people can afford. The point is that people could not afford to buy houses at that level and they had to come down in price. I was asking for a ballpark figure. Given the average income in Toronto, at what level should the cost of a home settle so that people with middle incomes can afford to buy a home? I understand people with lower incomes need to be subsidized.

Mr. Lebovic: Madam Senator, we are selling affordable homes for $1.2 million and $1.3 million. Some people can afford them. We are saying that if housing is not affordable, shelter is affordable. What the government has to do to bring down land prices is to provide the infrastructure. Since the government controls most the land and controls most of the ability to build sewage treatment plants and highways, there is nothing we can do about it. What causes problems in this province is that the money that used to be spent on infrastructures is being spent on the health care system.

Honourable senators, I have come to the end of my remarks.

Senator Doody: Oh, no.

Senator Bosa: If you insist, I can continue.

Senator Doody: Sure.

Senator Bosa: Should I quote a bit of Senator Simard?

Senator Fairbairn: Oh, I would, even though he is not here. He can read it.

Senator Bosa: To continue:

> The Chairman: I appreciate the evidence we have heard. I must admit I find it a little bit in conflict in the sense that you give a general endorsement of the GST and then present the committee with a variety of requests and recommendations that, in the opinion of some, might be a negation of what the GST is attempting to achieve.

This is exactly the impression I received. They said they were in favour of and supportive of the legislation; they were supportive of the concept, but they wanted so many exemptions that they, in effect, negated the whole purpose of the GST. The transcript continues as follows:

● (0100)

> Mr. Dennis Mills, MP.

Senator Buckwold: This is an interesting one.

Senator Bosa: Yes. Senator Simard said:

> Mr. Chairman, I raised a point of order and I have not received an explanation. I would like the chairman to tell us whether he has discussed with the committee the pertinence of having MPs heard by this group here, especially in a place such as Toronto where we have witnesses solidly for the next few days and we are already half an hour behind. I would like to make the suggestion that we skip to the next witness in order that we do not fall behind further since it is now eleven o'clock. However, perhaps you would like to tell me why, in travelling this country at a cost of $500,000, we need to hear from MPs when we should be hearing from ordinary citizens.

I find that intervention strange because you will recall that the first minister to appear before the committee was the Minister of National Revenue. I do not understand why Senator Simard would object to having a member of the House of Commons appear before the committee when we had the minister appear before us and he could have appeared before the committee in Ottawa. What is good for the goose is good for the gander.

Senator Hastings: It is interesting to note that Senator Simard said it would cost $500,000. By the time he was finished he had it up to $1,000,000.

Senator Bosa: Is that what it cost?

Senator Hastings: It cost $450,000.

Senator Bosa: $500,000 was an inflated figure.

Senator Hastings: So was $1,000,000.

Senator Bosa: Then Senator Stollery intervened and said:

On that point, I would like to remind you that, for as long as I have been in Parliament, Senate committees have always heard MPs.

Senator Cools: And premiers and mayors.

Senator Stollery: It is standard Senate procedure to hear MPs and it has been for years.

The Chairman: I am delighted to have Mr. Mills, especially because he has a very interesting presentation. I must admit, and I am very proud of it, that I personally wanted to hear Mr. Mills because he is the proponent of "the single tax" as an alternative. I am not asking Mr. Mills to say whether the GST is good or bad. I do not know what he is going to say on that, but I would like to hear about his alternative proposal to the goods and services tax.

Senator Simard: Mr. Chairman, you have not answered my question. I want to tell you, sir, that we have other ways of reading or finding out about Mr. Mills' publication. "The Single Tax" and I am not going to be part of an exercise of the Liberal party to promote one of its members and the sale of a Liberal member's book. That is not what is expected of this committee and I protest. I have had it with partisan rulings.

The Chairman: I note that Senator Simard has left the room. Ladies and gentlemen, as the chairman, I have to tell you that this does not particularly phase the chairman or the committee. We have had it at almost every meeting. We had it yesterday in Montreal when we had a member of the NDP speaking to us, and if there are any Conservative MPs who have the courage to speak to us, we would be glad to hear them too.

That was a very good answer. Mr. Mills, the MP from Broadview-Greenwood then commenced his presentation by saying:

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to present to you and the committee an alternative to the GST. At the outset, I would like to introduce my associates. On my immediate left is Mr. Tom Hodgson, President, Central Guaranty Trust Company; Mr. Lou Gallucci, who has been the coordinator of the national response on this project; and Mr. Finn Poschmann, who is the chief researcher for the Library of Parliament.

Mr. Chairman and senators, I want to state at the outset that this is not Liberal party policy. This is simply an open, honest attempt to advance the debate on tax reform. This is an honest attempt to meet the challenge that was presented to us by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister of Canada, and the Honourable Michael Wilson, the Minister of Finance. I have to make sure that that point is known. As a member of Parliament, it is incumbent on all of us as parliamentarians to listen to our constituents. The genesis of this idea on tax reform is not my idea; it came to me from constituents, and it expanded from constituents in Toronto to constituents across the country.

I am not going to deal with the GST today. Everyone in the country knows the Liberal party position on the goods and services tax and, as a Liberal member of Parliament, I endorse that position.

However, I am here to try to put forward a constructive approach, because as you know, Mr. Chairman, the current system is so complex, inefficient and unfair that very few average persons on the street can figure out his or her tax return. In my riding, senior citizens come into my office and ask for help filling in tax returns. This will be the second spring I have done that, and I can tell you that I discovered I could not fill out these tax returns. There are also entrepreneurs who cannot fill them out. In fact, some of the best tax accountants and lawyers in the country will admit that the current sytem is so complex, cumbersome and, with exceptions to exceptions, it works against productivity in our country.

We put together a team of professionals. We are not all Liberals, but people who believe in Canada. We have worked for the last 15 months using the guidelines suggested by Doug Young, our finance critic, that we must develop a tax system that meets three criterion: simplicity, fairness and efficiency. After many months of working on forms and hearing from people across the country—from homeowners to small business people, tax accountants and tax experts—we believe we have come up with a system that will meet the challenge of the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister of Canada. We also passionately believe that we have a comprehensive approach to the tax system that will obviate the need for the GST, meet all the fiscal requirements of the Government of Canada and also make us one of the most productive, highly motivated nations on earth.

I realize we have a limited amount of time to present an idea on which we have worked with hundreds behind us for 15 months. We certainly do not have the resources of the Minister of Finance, but we have had tremendous volunteer support from people across Canada, from all parties I might add. I would now turn to my associate Mr. Tom Hodgson, and ask him to explain "The Single Tax".

Senator Cogger: Whatever happened to Vander Zalm's bill?

Senator Hastings: It is against the GST too.

Senator Bosa: The veterinarians are also against it.

Senator Cogger: There is no respect for the underdog.

Senator Buckwold: Are you talking about the veterinarians?

Senator Cogger: Senator Buckwold should have been there. The discussion had to do with whether vets should be paid in cash or by credit cards and it was pointed out that dogs did not have credit cards.

Senator Hastings: Did the dog have Medicare?

Senator Buckwold: I thought you were talking about underdogs.

Senator Fairbairn: Carry on, Senator Bosa. Do not be distracted.

Senator Bosa: The next witness was Mr. Tom Hodgson, the president of Central Guaranty Trust Company. He said:

> I would like to make one editorial comment as a private citizen and not a member of Parliament. We are submitting to you that what is required is a significant structural change in the tax system.

● (0110)

> In the United States the federal deficit per capita is a little more than half of what it is in Canada and the United States government considers itself to have a deficit crisis. We take the position that talking about whether the GST rate should be 9 per cent, 7 per cent or 5 per cent is like talking to Nero about whether the violin should have four strings or five strings.
> The objective must be to have a tax system which ensures the solvency of the Canadian government and the prosperity of the Canadian people. We believe that neither the current income tax system nor the proposed GST achieves that.
> In Canada, the underground economy has grown to something between $50 billion and $100 billion, and every Canadian feels ripped off by the tax system.
> What is the single tax and why is it such an attractive alternative? The same margin of tax rate of 25 per cent applies to all individuals and corporations. All income is treated alike whether it is wages, interest income, dividends or capital gains. Individual tax credits which are equivalent to the personal deduction, age deduction, charitable contribution deduction, RRSP deduction, and child care tax credit ensure that the personal income tax system is highly progressive.
> To be specific, a family of four with a family income of $20,000 would have an effective tax rate of minus 9 per cent or a tax credit of $1,800. A family of four with an income of $30,000 would have an effective federal tax rate of 3 per cent. That rises to 14 per cent at a family income of $50,000 and 20 per cent at a family income of $100,000.
> On the corporate side, the system is equally simple. There is major simplification of depreciation rules, and dividend payments to Canadian residents are tax deductible by companies because they are being fully taxed in the hands of the recipients.
> Today's tax rules are so complicated that nobody understands them. One of the greatest national tragedies relates to the many thousands of Canadians, highly intelligent, hard working well-educated men and women who make their careers advising individuals and corporations on how to avoid income tax. With the single tax these services would not be required and those people could turn their attention to productive enterprises creating wealth rather than sheltering it. The concept of tax avoidance disappears. You either pay your tax with this form or you commit tax fraud.
> We believe that the impact on investment in Canada would be extremely positive, not because it represents any kind of a subsidy to foreign investment, but because it increases the attractiveness of the investment climate for Canadians and foreigners alike.
> We have said that the single tax is revenue neutral with the 25 per cent marginal rate. That is not really true. Using the 1988 figures, personal income tax collections would have declined by $1.5 billion and corporate tax collections would have increased by slightly over $2 billion. In total there is an increase in government revenue of some $500 million.
> The Fraser Institute of Vancouver, which has never been accused of being a Liberal Party organ, has estimated that over a 5-year period, after the introduction of the single tax, there would be an incremental increase in real growth in Canada of 9 per cent. Nine per cent on the current GNP of some $650 billion is a major increase in the tax base as well as the wealth of Canadians.
> When we say that the system is revenue neutral, we are ignoring the impact of the incremental growth. We are ignoring the productivity increases. We are ignoring any recapture of the underground economy. We estimate that the revenue impact of these items would be several billion dollars per year.
>
> Therefore, it is feasible to proceed with the single tax, avoid the GST completely, and phase out the manufacturers' sales tax over a three- to four-year period. With a solvent federal government a serious reduction in interest rates will occur.
>
> Mr. Chairman, I would now like to turn over to you Finn Poschmann of the Library of Parliament to describe the computer models we used in our proposal.

At this point Mr. Poschmann remarks as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I should mention that Mr. Mills gave me something of a promotion. I am with the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament which Mr. Mills approached last year with a series of questions about the structure and incidence of existing personal and corporate tax régimes. His aim was to discover whether a broader-based system with the single marginal rate would match the revenue generating power of the current régime. Further integration of the personnel and corporate systems was also desired with the vital constraint that traditional notions of vertical and horizonal equity be preserved and, above all, could the proposed régime be a simple one. Mr. Mills wanted to know what a tax meeting those requirements might look like, and to have some estimates of the actual incidents especially in terms of high-income versus low-income families and of families versus single individuals.
> This is where Statistics Canada's Social Policies, Simulation Model came into play. The SPSM is a system which applies income tax and tax transfer formulae to family income records. It works with a database consisting of financial summaries of 100,000 Canadian households. It is a fairly simple mathematical exercise to render national estimates based on this sub-sample. It is one of the very few existing tools which may be used to make reasonably precise estimates of the costs, revenues and distributional impact or incidence of tax policy changes.

The modelling procedure was to strip away many existing exemptions and credits and to apply the new tax calculation. Desired revenue and distribution targets were reached by fine tuning the values for the remaining credits. The figures for personal and child tax credits and the like shown on Mr. Mills single tax form were the result of this sort of process.

On the corporate tax side, rule of thumb estimates were derived from national accounts figures. The results suggested that a small but significant revenue increase would have been obtained under the single tax with a shift of 1 or 2 per cent in terms of federal revenue from the personal to corporate side.

Parameters were also found to tilt the tax burden slightly away from families with children and toward individuals. The incidence was also moved by a few per cent of total income toward high-income as opposed to low-income families.

It should be emphasized that the question is not whether or not such a system can work, because we know it can; it is a matter of determining what values for the various parameters of a tax régime can provide the sort of distribution or incidence we require. This was the purpose of the simulation exercise and the results of the simulation are reflected in the single tax as you see it now.

Then Mr. Mills says:

Finally, senators, my colleague, Lou Gallucci, who has received more than 10,000 responses in the last year—

Senator Hastings: Mr. Speaker, do you see a quorum?

The Hon. Speaker: Yes, I see a quorum.

Senator Hastings: Pardon me? Seventeen. Good.

Senator Bosa: I will repeat:

Finally, senators, my colleague, Lou Gallucci, who has received more than 10,000 responses in the last year from people across Canada—will give us a very short feedback of the reaction and the feeling that we are getting from the people of Canada.

• (0120)

Senator Buckwold: Senator Bosa, will you accept a question? I personally was interested in Mr. Mills presentation of the single tax concept. In the eyes of many, this is an idea whose time has come. It is nothing new. It is based on one flat rate of taxation for everyone with no exemptions, and a fairly high allowable level of income before taxes are even applicable. It is used in some smaller parts of the world.

I got interested in the single tax when I was on a visit to the Isle of Man. Isle of Man is probably one of the most prosperous areas in the United Kingdom. They operate as other jurisdictions do, namely, on the basis of a single tax. The result has been a tremendous influx of capital and very responsible business investment.

I am coming to my question to you in one moment. There has been a good deal of laughter by the Tories about the single tax. This really should not even be part of the goods and services tax discussion. For those of you who are interested in taxation, it is an interesting concept. It is a flat rate tax of about 25 per cent, which provides good exemptions for lower income people and would bring in more money than the graduated tax that we have today. That fact has been proved.

When we were conducting our committee hearings, obviously Senator Simard did not like this idea. Mr. Mills went to great length to disassociate himself from his parliamentary connection. Actually, there was no discussion on the GST as such; the discussion was on an alternative form of revenue.

The major objection to a GST is that the rich get richer, so our friends in the NDP are not very happy with a single tax. In other words, if everyone only paid 25 per cent and some people made $1 million per year, the rich would get richer. Now the rich get richer anyway, as some of my friends across the way illustrate quite dramatically.

Somehow the rich seem to have the ability to attract professional advisors on how to legally minimize their taxation. The exemptions that are provided to government legislation are such that very often those who are well off are able to avoid a good deal of taxation legally. therefore when you look at the concept of a single tax, it is a pretty good concept.

I wanted to get your reaction as to whether this country would accept the premise of a flat tax—that is, a single tax as it is called—in view of the political implications of a tax of that nature. Again I am emphasizing that the man who earns $40,000 would pay his 25 per cent; the man who earns $1 million would pay the same rate. Do you think this country would accept the concept of a single tax, in view of the sort of resentment that we always have that somehow, in the view of some, those with higher incomes do not pay their share?

Senator Bosa: Honourable Senators, Mr. Mills has made a very good case for this single tax to be accepted by Canadians. He has provided a formula whereby people at the lower end of the scale would receive credits and monies to compensate for the fact that they are in a lower bracket. He has explained that. I do not know if you were here from the beginning.

Senator Buckwold: I do not think that we have answered my question. I will try to make it clearer. Perhaps at this hour of the night I am not that clear.

We have a philosophy in this country that you have to soak the rich. I suppose that is generally acceptable. As illustrated by our income tax system, the higher your income, the higher the rates. But we are now talking of a single rate.

My question to you was: Do you think Canadians would accept that philosophically? That is the major problem. Certainly, our friends in the NDP have been against the proposal because the rate will not be higher for a millionaire than it is for a moderate income earner.

Senator Bolduc: You are making a speech.

Senator Hastings: He is asking a question.

Senator Buckwold: Did someone wake up over there?

Senator Di Nino: He is asking a question.

Senator Buckwold: You would not know the difference, anyway. Let us hear the answer, Senator Bosa, concerning the philosophical aspect of whether the country would accept a flat tax.

Senator Bosa: I was trying to reply to that question. Although Senator Buckwold is attributing to me an expertise on the single tax which I do not deserve, perhaps philosophically Canadians might not embrace the single tax concept because of the situation where a millionaire is taxed at the same rate as those of modest means.

However, if Canadians understood the purpose of the single tax, perhaps they might accept it. Some might still grumble about it because it is difficult to propose a new tax and have embraced, gohus bohus, by everyone. But the single tax idea, particularly for small business, would be very much appreciated, even by middle-income earners. Of course, wealthy people would appreciate it even more. This does not mean that the way that the concept has been explained by Mr. Mills would result in the poor being disadvantaged by this kind of tax.

[Translation]

Mr. Lou Galluci, Chairperson for the Single Tax Campaign: We have had the good fortune, as Dennis mentioned, of getting responses from approximately 10,000 Canadians asking questions about the single tax. They filled out the forms and were very interested in terms of how it would affect them personally or their businesses.

The first and most obvious component of the feedback was that Canadians want to participate in the debate on tax reform. It is not a question of saying they are for or against the GST, or if they like this tax system or they don't. They believe there is an opportunity here to work on a comprehensive tax reform package and they believe a single tax system is one viable option that the government should take a serious look at.

The response from the business community was most encouraging. They told us to stay on course and they also specifically highlighted how a single tax system would benefit their business or how it would affect their business overall. The first factor they talked about was the simplicity of a single tax. Administratively, it would be much easier to deal with a single tax program in their business from the point of view of bookkeeping and accounting.

Another point they raised was their relationship vis-à-vis Revenue Canada. They want to spend their time, money and effort conducting and operating their business; they do not want to spend time trying to figure out what their tax position is or dealing on an on-going basis with government debating what they do and do not owe.

The third point that was raised is that under the current system a variety of distortions are created in the marketplace. Basically, they are created by tax shelters and tax credits where good investment moneys end up in areas that are dictated by the tax laws as opposed to good economic sense. They feel there would be more money in the marketplace for productive investment if the system were completely clean, as a single tax system would be.

Another point which has been touched upon is the underground economy. Over and over we heard people stating that the underground economy is growing larger and larger, which means fewer and fewer tax dollars for Ottawa. It is convenient or becoming more convenient to cheat. They believe the single tax system would act as a disincentive to not pass moneys on to the Government of Canada, because if you know your worse case scenario is a maximum rate of 25 per cent it is not worth your while to do those cash deals.

• (0130)

[English]

Another point that was touched upon briefly was foreign investment. We have spoken to bankers involved in the international marketplace, and listened to their responses in terms of Canada being a good place to invest because people would know what their tax positions were.

The last point I wish to touch upon relates to business opportunities. Too often in this country, business opportunities are lost because the first question that is asked at the table is "What is our tax position?" A lot of time and money is spent on figuring out what the tax position is as opposed to actually putting a deal together. That is the response of the business community.

On the personal end, people found that, when filling out their income tax forms, low and moderate income Canadians would be in a better tax position, which would mean more dollars at the end of the day of disposable income versus possible tax credits. As Senator Denis pointed out, they appreciate the simplicity of filling out the forms, especially people on fixed incomes. They would not have to go out and hire professional help, which is in effect another tax. They appreciated the fairness that everybody has to pay tax. However, there is a disincentive today to work overtime because the taxpayer is taxed to such a high degree that there is no incentive to work—

Senator Simard: Which section are you referring to in C-62? I am having a problem finding the connection to your speech.

Senator Bosa: I would be pleased to explain. The government and the critics of the Liberal Senators and the Liberal Opposition, as a whole, have continually said that we do not have an alternative to propose to the GST. We are against the GST, but we do not have an alternative. This is a possible alternative that could be studied more closely in order to provide an alternative to the GST. However, I do not know whether that is a pertinent subject on third reading.

Senator Hastings: Certainly, certainly.

Senator Simard: You may be a little late in your attempt to find an alternative to the GST, now that we are on third reading of the bill. I know Senator Buckwold was telling us that in May. He was still talking about finding alternatives away back in May. But we know what happened; you never found an alternative. You did not want to find an alternative. Senator Buckwold and his colleagues only wanted to hear people talk, and aspired to be the defenders of Canadians. You never looked for alternatives and when you were given alternatives or alternatives were forced on you, you just discarded them.

Senator Hastings: We did not insult witnesses, as you did.

Senator Simard: You misled them for four months into believing that you would find alternatives, but you never did. You closed the book on them, and within four hours, you will close the book on this House, too. You closed your minds in May, I suggest.

Senator Bosa, you are a very good Senator, you are an impressive Senator, you are a sensible Senator, you are a gracious Senator, but please let us not pretend that you are finding alternatives at 2 o'clock in the morning on November 29. You have not, and you will never find alternatives between now and seven o'clock in the morning, or between now and December, I suggest. Would you offer some comments on my remarks?

Senator Buckwold: The remarks are directed to me. The attack is on me.

Senator Simard: Of course the attack is on you, but I want Senator Bosa's comments.

Senator Buckwold: Then why will Senator Cogger not let me speak?

Senator Cogger: Are you closing debate for your side?

Senator Buckwold: I am not speaking.

Senator Cogger: Are you killing the debate?

Senator Hastings: He is speaking to your point of order. You raised a point of order.

Senator Simard: I was not rising on a point of order.

Senator Hastings: Then what did you rise on?

Senator Simard: Of course I was not. I was just trying to get him on his feet to offer a suggestion. That is not a point of order.

Senator Buckwold: Then, I will rise on a question of privilege.

Senator Doody: That's better. That's a bit of a novelty.

Senator Buckwold: It certainly is a privilege to be able, once again, to face my friend, Senator Simard, recounting all the same junk that he has been giving us for months.

Senator Simard: Did you or did you not tell us, and the rest of the world, that you were looking for alternatives? Did you or did you not? I am telling you, perhaps I should dig out some of those Hansard reports. This is what you told Canadians.

Senator Buckwold: We were looking for alternatives. We received suggestions regarding alternatives. We discussed alternatives. We said that there were some good alternatives and there were some poor alternatives. Some of them had a plus sign; some had a negative sign. We looked at them all.

May I draw to your attention that the Tax Foundation of Canada studied alternatives along with the GST, and they had a list, as we did, of the pros and cons of each of the various forms of alternative revenue collection for this country. None of them were perfect, just like you are not perfect in the eyes of some of us, although I presume you might have a slightly different opinion. But then, if there is anyone perfect in this world, I am sure it is Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: You will not get me that way. I have no intention of crossing the floor, either.

Senator Buckwold: Then if there is someone who is imperfect, you would qualify. Is that better?

I just wanted to indicate that I think it is unfair, unreasonable and absolutely uncalled for to attack the Chairman, as Senator Simard has done, when in fact, on looking through the committee reports, I would guess that at least half the witnesses presented alternatives. Indeed, some of them were a lot better than the GST.

Senator Simard: What did you do with those alternatives? When did we discuss those alternatives?

Senator Buckwold: We discussed them very nicely in our report.

Senator Simard: Which report?

Senator Hastings: The one you helped defeat. The one you voted against. The one you bellyached about all summer. And when you come to shutting the door, let me tell you who shut the door. It was your minister who shut the door in Toronto.

Senator Simard: You are speaking next, so you had better save your energy.

Senator Hastings: I have lots of energy.

Senator Buckwold: I appeal to the Acting Speaker to stop reading the paper and call the senators to order when I am rising on a point of privilege.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I would be very happy to stop reading what I have been reading which, by the way, was the rule book. I would also be very happy, as requested by some honourable senators, to call all senators to order. I will now hear the point of privilege of Honourable Senator Buckwold.

Senator Doody: What a gentleman.

Senator Buckwold: I think I made my point of privilege, thank you.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I will conclude my presentation of the alternatives that were presented on the single tax by Mr. Mills and his colleagues. During the intervention he made:

> They would not have to go out and hire professional help which is in effect another tax. They appreciated the fairness of it. Everybody has to pay tax, but there is a disincentive today to work overtime, because the taxpayer is taxed to such a high degree that there is no incentive to work those extra hours, whereas under our system people feel that there would be that added incentive.
> In summation, that is briefly and quickly our view of a single tax.

That is the end of the presentation on the single tax. There was another alternative, and I feel obligated to respond to that because we were accused that we did not provide alternatives.

Senator Simard: Senator Bosa, may I ask you a question?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Simard: Are you prepared to recommend tonight to the house, to your colleagues, any one of these alternatives which you have obviously studied? Are you prepared to make an amendment, or are you quite happy to leave it where Senator Buckwold left all his alternatives, on the table without any comment for future deliberation and consideration?

I am sorry, I am wanted on the telephone, but I will wait for your answer. I am very much interested to hear your answer. Perhaps that is Dennis Mills calling.

Senator Bosa: What Senator Simard is proposing is for me to propose, formally, that a substitute to the GST be adopted holus-bolus here at 2 a.m. That is patently unfair on his part. However, we do have some alternatives which the government could consider, and the Department of Finance, with all the resources at its disposal, with all its experts on taxation—

Senator Doody: I hope it is not a long distance call that is costing someone money.

Senator Simard: Would you tell them to call back in the morning?

Senator Bosa: We feel obligated, Senator Simard, to put on the record some of the alternatives which have been floating around which could be studied, which could be refined and which could have the effect of replacing the GST and making it a lot easier for Canadians to dish out some additional funds without going through the agony of the GST. This is from Professor Neil Brooks at Osgoode Hall:

> The debate about the proposed goods and services tax (GST) has been hampered by a lack of well-articulated and quantified alternatives.
> This article is an attempt to remedy this deficiency by comparing the government's proposed 7 per cent GST with an alternative that would also repeal the manufacturers' sales tax (MST).
> The proposed GST has created more public discussion and debate than any proposed tax change in Canada's history. The intensity of the public discussion is well-founded. The proposed tax will mark a fundamental change in the federal government's tax mix—the relative amounts of revenue the government collects from different tax bases.
>
> Compared to the proposed GST reforms, here's an income tax alternative that is straightforward:
>
> The MST should be abolished and most of the lost revenue could be collected through the income tax by increasing the federal income tax rates.
> If the MST were abolished, and no consumption tax substituted for it, only approximately $10.5 billion would have to be raised through the income tax.
> If left untouched, in 1981 the MST would raise $18.5 billion in tax revenues.
> However, if it is abolished, provincial revenues would also decline by about $0.8 billion. Provinces levy their retail sales taxes on the price of goods which include the MST.

• (0150)

> If the MST is abolished, the price of goods will drop and thus provincial sales tax revenues will decline.
>
> Thus for the change to be revenue neutral to all levels of government, $19.3 billion of revenue must be found:
>
> About $2.3 billion of the MST falls on goods purchased by the government sector. If the MST were abolished, and the reduced taxes reflected in prices, the government sector would need $2.3 billion less in revenue to finance its purchases.
> About $2.3 billion of the MST falls on alcoholic beverages, tobacco products and gasoline. There is little reason to reduce the tax burden on these; therefore, the relevant excise taxes would be increased to recover this revenue.
> If the MST were abolished, the refundable sales tax credit could be repealed: Savings—$0.9 billion.
>
> If the MST were abolished, and all tax and cost reductions passed on directly through prices, the consumer price index would decline by slightly more than 2 percentage points.
>
> This would save Ottawa $1 billion in transfer payments to individuals and provinces. It would also result in additional income tax collections of $0.2 billion because of reduced tax indexing effects.
>
> Finally, if the MST were abolished, there would be a substantial windfall to corporations.
>
> In 1991, more than $1.5 billion of the MST would be levied on exports. If the tax is repealed, corporate profits will be increased by this amount.
> Moreover, some large percentage of the MST levied on corporate fixed capital investment likely falls on corporate profits. Therefore, if the MST were abolished, it seems fair to raise the revenue collected through the corporate income tax by $2 billion.

The required $10.5 billion of additional revenues to be collected through the personal income tax could be raised by increasing the bottom federal income tax rate by 2.7 percentage points, the middle rate by 4.2 percentage points, and the top rate by 4.6 percentage points, and without changing provincial taxes at all.

On the assumption that the basic provincial rate is 55 per cent, and ignoring special federal and provincial surtaxes, one of the tables on this page shows the combined federal and provincial rates both under the present system and the income tax alternative.

The income tax rate increases needed to replace the MST are modest.

To make this point, a number of things might be noted: The highest rate would be about what it was in 1984 when the present government took office; it is more than 10 percentage points lower than the rate in 1981; it is more than 30 percentage points lower than it was throughout the 1960s.

Here are the main arguments for greater reliance on income taxes after getting rid of the M.S.T.:

It reduces the regressivity of the tax system.

The major criticism of consumption taxes is that they are regressive. Low-income individuals consume a greater percentage of their income than high-income individuals. Consequently, the effective rate of a tax on consumption declines as income increases.

The government has conceded the regressivity of the GST, but it argues that this regressivity can be offset by refundable sales tax credits at the lower income levels.

However, there are a number of problems with it.

First, the refundable credit can only remove the regressivity of the tax up to the point where the maximum credit is paid. At the point where the credit begins to phase out (at $24,800 under the government's proposal) and beyond, the tax remains regressive.

Consequently, no matter how generous the credit, middle-income earners will pay a larger percentage of their income in the tax than high-income earners.

There is no logic to placing the maximum burden of a new tax on people with middle incomes, particularly since studies have shown that they were the ones most adversely affected by Finance Minister Michael Wilson's 1988 personal income tax reforms.

Second, the proposed refundable sales tax credit is itself inadequate to remove the regressivity of the federal sales tax:

(1) The credit begins to phase-out for many individuals and families living below the poverty line, particularly those living in large cities.

(2) The government has stated that with the refundable sales tax credits, all families earning under $30,000 would be better off after the GST reforms. In fact, using StatsCan data, it appears that one-quarter to one-third of these families would be worse off even with the credit.

Another one-quarter to one-third would simply break even.

(3) As has been noted many times, because the credit is only partially indexed (for inflation over 3 per cent), it will lose its value over time.

Finally, and perhaps most fundamentally, it does seem strange to first impose a tax on low-income individuals and then give them a credit to offset it.

For one thing, this adds substantial complexity to the tax/transfer system.

More importantly, the refundable sales tax credit leaves low-income individuals much more vulnerable to political whim.

The credit is highly visible, while the additional GST that low-income people pay will tend not to be noticed.

It avoids the adverse over-all economic effects of introducing a GST.

A good deal of uncertainty surrounds the macro-economic effects of introducing the GST.

Although the government is predicting only a 1.25 per cent rise in the consumer price level, this estimate is based upon a number of highly optimistic assumptions: That manufacturers will pass forward tax reductions; that businesses will not attempt to increase prices to protect themselves from, or take advantage of, the uncertainty relating to the effects of the tax; that businesses will not pass forward the substantial costs of complying with the GST; and that labour will be prepared to take a one-time decline in real wage rates.

Under an income tax alternative, not only would all of these adverse effects of the GST on the economy be avoided, but inflation would decrease by more than 2 percentage points. That should increase consumer demand and, hence, employment. It could lead to a decrease in interest rates and, thus, the deficit.

It avoids the administrative and compliance costs of the GST.

Increasing the income tax rates under an income tax alternative would result in almost no increased compliance and administrative costs. Indeed it would result in a substantial saving of administrative and compliance costs since there would no longer be any need to administer and comply with the MST.

The government estimates it will have to triple its sales tax staff to administer the GST. Its estimated direct cost of implementing the tax is over $3.5 billion.

It rationalizes federal/provincial jurisdiction over taxes.

The GST represents a substantial intrusion of the federal government into tax room traditionally occupied by the provinces.

The two levels of government have been unable to agree on sharing a common sales tax base in most provinces, and as a result business people will be burdened with the problem of complying with two different types of sales taxes, requiring separate sets of records and duplicate procedures for tax collections, payment and compliance.

Simply increasing the income tax rates is a viable alternative to the GST.

Low-income households, on average, would pay less federal tax; high-income individuals would pay more.

Perhaps most significantly, the largest beneficiaries of such a change would be middle-income Canadians.

For example, the average consumable income of families in the $30,000 to $35,000 class would be about $270 greater under the income tax alternative than under the GST reforms.

If the government wished to make the alternative more progressive, two or three additional rate brackets could easily be added to the present three rate scale brackets. Moreover, in spite of the base-broadening reforms in 1987, the present income tax base is still full of loopholes that could be closed.

● (0200)

Further, as a complement to these reforms, if the government were to enact a wealth transfer tax, an additional $2 billion could easily be collected every year from Canada's wealthiest families. Income tax rates would then not have to be raised by nearly as much as I've suggested.

The implementation of the GST has provoked more controversy than virtually any other government policy initiative. In light of the many criticisms and of concerns expressed about it, to justify enactment of the GST, it should be necessary for the government to show that the additional revenues could not be more satisfactorily obtained from the income tax. This burden of argument has not been discharged.

These are the two alternatives that the government could undertake to study as a possible alternative to the present GST.

Honourable senators, you were most kind and very attentive to the intervention that I made. I have now concluded my remarks.

Some Hon. Senators: Applause.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to participate once more in this debate with respect to Bill C-62. I would first like to thank my colleague, Senator Bosa, for the contribution he has made this evening, and especially for the alternatives which he has placed on the record. Senator Simard seems to think it is the wrong time to place those alternatives or to remind honourable senators that those alternatives do exist; and I intend to speak to two or three of them at this stage of the debate.

My reason for doing so is because I still think that this bill should be defeated; and I am working for the defeat of the bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hastings: I hope, in the time that I have to speak to you, to convince you that there is still time to change, that there is still time to repent and turn from your ways and listen to the people. I feel particularly well equipped to speak to you of the work of the committee.

It was an honour to serve under the chairman of the committee, and I attended every meeting but one, as we committee travelled across Canada to seek the views of Canadians. Of course, the Conservatives did not want to hear the views of Canadians. They did not want the committee to travel and do its work; but we did, and we held meetings in Charlottetown, St. John's, Halifax, Moncton, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton, Yellowknife, Vancouver and Whitehorse. Of course, Senator Simard thought it was a terrible thing to go to Whitehorse and waste all that money to listen to the northern people there and at Yellowknife. He raised hell about that; but we can now see why, when we saw the attitude of the government members when they were asked, through an amendment, to have a little consideration for the north. It was in line with the consideration Senator Simard showed for the north when he criticized the committee for daring to go to Yellowknife or Whitehorse to hear the views of the people of the north.

However, I think we did our duty as a committee in seeking the views of Canadians. I believe that most senators learned that it was time to listen to Canadians, to hear what the witnesses—and they included, I think, a fair cross-section of Canadians—thought of Bill C-62, to hear any suggestions to improve it, and any alternative tax proposals they wished to put forward. It was in that light that I think the committee reached the conclusion that it did not really have the expertise or the resources. Senator Simard complained about the cost all the way to Vancouver and back. I do not know whether or not he has yet quit. He started in the Maritimes and said, "It is going to cost half a million dollars and the Liberals are going to pass the damned thing when they get back to Ottawa anyway. So why are they wasting the money. It is a waste of time." By the time he got to Vancouver he said, "It is going to cost a million dollars and those Liberals are going to defeat it anyway. It is a waste of money."

Senator Buckwold: Things are expensive in British Columbia.

Senator Hastings: Anyway, I think we did our duty; we did a job, we listened to the Canadian people, and we reached the conclusion that we did not have the resources or the expertise to study all of the alternatives that were placed before us, and that the most logical and sensible way to proceed, as we said in the report, would be to reject the GST in its present form and undertake a complete, worthwhile, in-depth tax reform study when the alternatives could receive the attention they merited.

● (0210)

Indeed, the latest alternative put forward was by the Canadian Tax Foundation just two or three weeks ago, when they concluded that the MST, which has served this country for quite a few years but suddenly became a silent killer of jobs, had to be done away with. The Canadian Tax Foundation have now concluded that the MST is not beyond saving and that probably the most logical way in which we might better proceed would be to amend the MST rather than proceed on this insane course with this unacceptable GST.

Senator Buckwold: Who are the Canadian Tax Foundation?

Senator Hastings: The Canadian Tax Foundation are about the most powerful tax economists in Canada.

That is an alternative that may have been considered, namely, that we might address all of our efforts at updating and addressing those parts of the MST that we find so unacceptable. That would be a far better course than proceeding with the GST.

When you ask why we did not recommend an alternative, it was for the reason that there were a number of alternatives. We felt that the most logical way to proceed would be to reject the GST, which is rejected by the people, and proceed with total tax reform.

Contrary to what you might think, I was impressed and persuaded in those meetings that Canadians are not against paying taxes and Canadians realize and accept the fact that they will have to pay more taxes. But what they do not accept, and what they resent and reject as they reject this tax, is unfairness. When there is a feeling or perception out there that, "I am paying my full share but others are not"—and there is powerful evidence to prove that to me, too—then there is hatred and resentment at what is going on. When you propose this claptrap GST to them they say, "No. There are other ways. One of them would be a fairer taxation".

I do not care what anyone here says, the people realize that they have to pay more. They understand the deficit as well as anyone in this chamber and they understand the national debt, even though Mr. D'Aquino says that they do not understand anything. But they do understand, and they understand that it has to be paid. They are ready to pay the price, provided everyone is carrying his or her share.

Whom did we hear from and what did they want? What did they ask? We heard from Global Economics Ltd., here in Ottawa. They supported the tax but requested changes for that support. The Canadian Veterinary Association also requested changes. The Air Transport Association of Canada supported it but wanted changes. The Federal Superannuation Association was opposed to it. Wolfe Goodman said that they supported it but asked for changes. The Automotive Industries Association had reluctant support but asked for changes.

Professor Neil Brooks put forward the alternative plan that you have heard tonight from my colleague, Senator Bosa.

The Assembly of First Nations opposed the tax and requested changes. The Canadian Construction Association reluctantly supported it but asked for changes with respect to the municipalities and universities, which they have not received. Their support was based on the fact that those changes would be made. I have given you the supporters and there are ten of them requesting changes.

Informatics Ltd. opposed it; The Canadian Teacher's Federation opposed it. The Canadian Association of Custom Brokers requested changes. The Canadian Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Association asked for changes. The Carpenters' Union opposed it. The Conference Board of Canada gave it unqualified support. We have one group who gave it unqualified support.

Professor W. Gillespie is another supporter. That is one voice. The Canadian Seniors' Network opposed it. The Minister of National Revenue, of course, held unqualified support for it. The C.D. Howe Institute held unqualified support for it, and the Insurance Bureau of Canada supported it but asked for changes.

Senator Buckwold: They asked for significant changes.

Senator Hastings: That is right. The Canadian Federation of Students opposed it. The Tourism Association of Canada opposed it. Elfem Foods Ltd. opposed it. The Canadian Association of Psychoanalysts and Psychotherapists for Children opposed it. The Sports Federation of Canada had unqualified opposition to the tax. Heather's Heritage Haven opposed it. The Alliance of Canadian Travel Associations requested changes in it. The Municipal Electric Association requested changes. The National Federation of Nurses' Union opposed it. John Crowe, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, supported it.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business opposed it. The Canadian Exporter's Association requested changes in it. The Canadian Labour Congress opposed it. The Canadian Union of Public Employees opposed it. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture requested changes.

Professor A.M. Mazlov supported it. Ted Carmichael also supported it. J. Hutchinson supported it.

Senator Simard: That was a good day.

Senator Hastings: Yes, that was a good day.

Senator Simard: There were three approvals in a row.

Senator Hastings: The NDP of Prince Edward Island were opposed. The P.E.I. Real Estate Association opposed it. The Social Action Commission of the Diocese opposed it. The P.E.I. Council of the Federation of Labour was opposed to it, as was the P.E.I. Federation of Labour.

We are in Montreal now: Canadian Association of Social Workers, requesting delay and a change; Canadian Real Estate Association, opposed; Central du Segment du Quebec, opposed; Conceil du Patronmat du Quebec, support with changes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Hold the phone. There are about a hundred thousand members, and you are barrelling through. Just don't dismiss it.

Senator Hastings: I did not dismiss it; I said it supports it with changes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Just don't cart it off as if it were just another signatory.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Hastings: No, I won't just cart it off like you have carted off the unions. We will bow down and pray to this one. My God, we've got one corporate Canada. We must pay homage to corporate Canada. As to the people of Canada, you laugh at them as I quote them, but to corporate Canada we bow and scrap.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You do.

Senator Hastings: No, you do. That's what you told me to do. Don't hussle over that one, we'll study it. We will study this Conseil du Patronat du Quebec. We won't hussle over that one, my God. Well, we have one in support, anyway.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What support?

Senator Hastings: Pardon me, have you got something to say? Then stand up and say it, and I will sit down. Come on, what have you got to say? If you don't have the courage to stand up and say it, then keep quiet.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, come on!

Senator Hastings: I regret the implication that he just made, and if he had any courage he would stand up and withdraw it.

Senator Cogger: Praise the Lord.

Senator Doody: Repent.

Senator Hastings: The Grand Council of the Crees, opposed; l'Association Quebecoise de l'industrie due nautisme, support with changes; The Federation ACEF du Quebec, opposed; Comite Canadian du statut de la femme, opposed; Confederation des syndicate nationaux, opposed; Asste Management International Incorporated, requesting a change; Professor Pierre Fortin, support. That was a brilliant performance that morning. Coalition Quebecoise contre le Tps, opposed; Coalition Solidaire des Regions du Quebec, opposed; Coalition du am Quebec, opposed; Federation Nationales des Consomateurs du Quebec, opposed; Conseil Canadian de L'insolvabilite, opposed; Dieticans Consultants of Canada, support with changes requested; Jack Leighton, City of Toronto, opposed. Toronto Home Builders Association, support requesting changes.

An Hon. Senator: What are the changes they want?

Senator Hastings: We'll get to that, don't worry. I will be helpful later on, if you will just kindly sit quiet. I will get to them.

Senator Buckwold: You have four hours yet, so take your time.

Senator Hastings: Urban Development Institute—we are going to be here four weeks. I will get it in in four weeks.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Babble on, babble on.

Senator Hastings: You are doing fine over there. There is another one who can't keep quiet. If you have something to say, stand up and make a speech. I waited for someone over there to stand up and be supportive before I stood up. No one did so. If you want to stand up and speak, will you wait until I'm finished?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Finish your petition.

Senator Hastings: I am not giving a petition; I am listing the witnesses who appeared before the committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: So far there are more for than against.

Senator Hastings: You can't count like the rest of them over there.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is the largest employer group in Quebec. It has about 10,000 members and includes at least a million employees.

Senator Leblanc: Who are they?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Who are they? They are the largest employers in Quebec. Give us the names.

Senator Leblanc: General Motors, Sun Life; every large distillery, every large employer in Quebec, is a member of the Conseil du Patronet. It is the equivalent of the Board of Trade in Toronto; and they are in favour.

Senator Buckwold: Ha, ha, ha.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What do you mean, "ha, ha, ha"? You wanted an answer; I gave it to you.

Senator Simard: Can I ask you a question? Have you ever read more than five sections of Bill C-62? Have you tried to make up your own mind by reading and trying to understand this legislation? Or are you just echoing part of what you have heard? Are you trying to understand this legislation or are you just a parrot like most of your colleagues?

Senator Hastings: I have given up all hope of ever—would you stop your babbling and listen to the answer? I have given up all hope of ever impressing Senator Simard on any subject.

Senator Simard: Why don't you admit that you have not even looked at the bill? You do not even know what it looks like. You get your orders from Senator Buckwold. This is hypocrisy. Have you ever read a summary of the bill? Did you ever watch a video of it paid for by the Department of Finance? Would you answer those questions, please, if you are not too embarrassed?

He has not read the record. He has failed to answer. Tell us about the NDP nonsense.

Senator Hastings: Saskatchewan Outfitters' Association, opposed.

Senator Simard: I am going to have some questions for Senators Buckwold and Kenny, so they should be getting together to read the act.

Senator Hastings: At this stage?

Senator Simard: You can read it over the weekend.

Senator Hastings: Would you repeat that question?

Senator Simard: I have asked you six questions and you can start answering the first one.

Senator Buckwold: Which one?

Senator Simard: You are not very serious, Senator Hastings.

Senator Buckwold: I would not worry about getting serious. Get Simard, that is the main thing. The funny thing is that I like the guy.

Senator Cogger: So do we.

Senator Kenny: Retract, retract!

Senator Hastings: Perhaps I might go on with the list of witnesses from Edmonton.

Senator Simard: I think there is telephone call for you.

Senator Hastings: Is it the Prime Minister?

Senator Simard: It is the same person who called me earlier.

Senator Hastings: Telling me the cheque is in the mail.

In Edmonton the first witness was the city of Edmonton, opposed. I wonder how many citizens live in Edmonton. It is probably around 600,000. Mr. George Deveau, delay; Mr. Mel Hurtig, the publisher. That was one of the best briefs we heard all across Canada. It is too bad that every senator was not present to hear Mr. Hurtig's brief, because they would have been impressed.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Buckwold: It was reviewed on four consecutive days.

Senator Cogger: Do you realize that we are only doing this in the name of fairness. I have convinced my colleagues to help you, Senator Hastings, as much as we helped Senator Bosa. Once we have thrown in our half hour, you will be on your own. Do not look to us to help you too much.

Senator Hastings: The next witness was from the Edmonton and District Labour Council, opposed; The Canadian Federation of National and Provincial Tax Payers, opposed; The Alberta Soccer Association requested a delay.

An Hon. Senator: Their balls are too high.

Senator Hastings: Mary Ellen Riemann, opposed.

Senator Buckwold: I hope the reporter got that comment about the Soccer Association. It was "Their balls are too high." Who said it?

Senator Hastings: That was a sexist comment. More obscenity. To continue: Mr. Bob Hawkesworth, MLA, opposed; The Alberta Council on Aging, opposed; The Alberta Medical Association, support but request changes; The Alberta Canola Producers Commission, support but request changes; The Ontario Nursing Home Association, opposed; The Whitefish Lake Bank, support; Vernon D. I hate to see the honourable senator opposite miss this.

Senator Cogger: I am taking notes and I will tell him all about it.

Senator Hastings: The Canadian Union of Public Employees, BC, opposed; Massage Therapists Association of BC, requesting changes; The Vancouver and District Labour Council opposed; The Guide Outfitters of BC, opposed; The Libertarian Party of Canada, opposed; Astar Business Technology Inc., opposed; Prisoners' Rights Groups, opposed; Concerned Conservatives for New Leadership and No GST, opposed.

Senator Simard: Why are you raising your voice?

Senator Hastings: I particularly wanted you to hear that one because it was a very good one.

Senator Simard: For the record, I want to state that since 10 o'clock there have not been more than seven or eight Liberal senators present. They are now down to three plus the present speaker. That shows the interest they have in Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame, Shame!

Senator Simard: That shows their seriousness. We are being taken through this travelogue as we hear about all of these witnesses who are supposed to be opposed to the tax and who are seeking changes or delays.

• (0250)

This is what the Liberal opposition is doing to this house. They do not care about making amendments. We have known that for some time. They want us to participate in this filibuster, but their very own leader of the Liberal Party has left the Chamber. This debate is supposed to be the last hope of democracy in Canada, yet they do not even show up. They want us to show up for 23 hours straight, if not more, but they do not even come.

Senator MacEachen is not here; Senator Frith is not here; Senator Perreault is not here. There is only Senator Marchand, Senator Buckwold and Senator Hastings, and of course, the asspiring Leader, Senator Fairbairn.

You, Senator Fairbairn deserve a good hand. Perhaps in a few years from now you might lead your party, and we would want to wish you well in that endeavour. Indeed, we might be supportive in getting you organized. You will finally give them courage as Canadians, but right now you are just aspiring.

However, at the moment the Liberal Party is not an alternative because you are making a mockery of democracy, and the absence of your colleagues is a demonstration of the arrogance that presently exists in the opposition. So smarten up. Get your members back.

Senator Hastings: Tell them the reason.

Senator Buckwold: Senators, we had a good crowd here, but they could not stand listening to you. They have gone into the other room.

Senator Hastings: Dealing with the meetings we held, honourable senators, in the city of Vancouver, Mr. D.C. Allen was opposed; the B.C. Dietician and Nutritionists Association was opposed, and requested changes; the Fraser Institute requested changes; the Coalition Against Free Trade was opposed; the Royal Insurance Company supported the tax, but requested changes; the Laurentian Pacific Insurance Company requested changes.

Continuing on in Vancouver, the Zurich Insurance Company was opposed; Hills Health and Guest Ranch was opposed; the Council of Registered Tourists Association of B.C. was opposed; Sports B.C. was opposed; Professor J. Kessleman, supported the tax, with changes.

I am sure that if the honourable senator was serious and would like to know the changes, he can read the evidence or wait until I deal with it when I come back to this area.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I would like to see them.

Senator Hastings: It is all in the evidence, and you can all read it before we come to the final vote. It is worth reading.

Senator Buckwold: You will have a lot of time during the next month.

Senator Hastings: If we come to the final vote before December 25: The B.C. Provincial Council of Carpenters, opposed; B.C. Senator Lynch Staunton: Hear, hear. How many members does the Retail Council of Canada have?

Senator Hastings: There is Eatons and Simpsons, two at least.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And how many employees would they have—thousands? A bit more than the Whitehorse Chamber of Commerce.

Senator Hastings: The Canadian Home Builders Association, support but requesting changes; Canadian Medical Association, delay requesting changes; Canadian Hospital Association, delay; Canadian Manufacturers' Association, support;

Social Planning Council of Ottawa Centre, opposed; Patent and Trademark Institute, requesting changes; Royal Canadian Legion, requesting changes; Canadian Restaurant and Foodservices Association, requesting changes; Public Service Alliance of Canada, opposed; International Association of Machinists and Aerospase Workers, opposed; the Brewers Association of Canada, requesting changes—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How many employees do they have?

Senator Hastings: They requested changes they did not get. The National Dairy Council, changes they did not get; Lee Valley Tools Limited, requested changes they did not get; Canadian Furniture Leasing, support requesting changes; Coinamatic Group, delay requesting changes; Consumers Association of Canada, opposed; American Federation of Musicians, requesting changes; the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers, opposed; Canadian Auto Workers, opposed; Christian Science Federal Representatives, requesting changes they did not get; Canadian Jewellers Association, support with changes they did not get; Professor Jack Mintz and Thomas Wilson, requesting changes they did not get; the Ontario Funeral Service Association, requesting changes they did not get; the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, opposed. I wonder how many people they represent. The Lumber Transfer Yard, support but requesting changes they did not get; Alan Martin Associates, delay. He would not get that. The Pro-Canada Network, opposed. He will not get the delay in view of the fact that he was defeated, but he may get a longer delay than he bargained for. Canadian Nurses Association, delay; Statistics Canada, no opinion; United Nurses of Alberta, opposed; Professor Robin Boadway, opposed, the National Anti-Poverty Organization, opposed; Unitel Communications Incorporated, support with changes they did not get; Canadian Co-Operative Association, changes that they will not get.

Senator Buckwold: I have a question for the honourable senator. What is the largest city in Canada?

Senator Doody: St. John's.

Senator Cogger: Is this "Jeopardy"?

Senator Hastings: Toronto is the largest city in Canada.

Senator Buckwold: I want to confirm that representations were made by the largest city in Canada, because I did not hear the honourable senator read them out. I know that they are on the list, but I have been listening intently so that our vocal friends across the way would realize that the largest city in Canada, represented by an alderman on behalf of the mayor, who wrote later, and millions of people, was somehow missed. You might check the record, but I think it is important we make sure that our big-mouth friend across the way recognizes-

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh!

Senator Buckwold: —that the City of Toronto put in a very strong rejection. I just wanted to have that confirmed by my questioning.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: May I have a copy of that, please?

Senator Cogger: Was that the question?

Senator Buckwold: I wanted to know whether he had mentioned them.

Senator Hastings: Alderman Jack Layton of the City of Toronto opposes the GST.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But not the mayor.

Senator Hastings: He represented the mayor and Toronto City Council.

Senator Buckwold: And the mayor wrote later.

Senator Cogger: What is the largest city in Canada?

Senator Hastings: Toronto.

Senator Cogger: Good.

Senator Hastings: The second largest city is Montreal.

As we moved across Canada to seek the views of ordinary Canadians, Senator Buckwold initiated a procedure that I thought was innovative. The last item of business of every day was set aside for walk-ins, ordinary Canadians who wanted to present their views before the committee. It was an enlightening experience to hear from these ordinary Canadians who senators opposite scoff at. It is worthwhile to stop for a moment and think about the views of these ordinary Canadians.

For example, in the City of St. John's, Newfoundland, Mr. Douglas Winsor came forward. He is a young, 32-year-old disabled Newfoundlander and Canadian, and he had this to say:

> I am basically trying to survive. I am living on approximately $380 per month, which is a very small Canada pension. I do not see anyone who is going to stand up for me and look for an extra increase in my pension. Senators just went out and voted an increase. Your counterparts in the House of Commons just did the same thing. I do not have that opportunity. Until my health improves to the point where I am able to go out and work again, I have to survive on whatever I can get.
>
> Social programs are the heart of this country, but this tax is going to make my life much harder. I worked until three years ago, when I was disabled, and I do not see how I am going to be able to survive after January 1. I believe my situation will become much worse.
> One of the senators here mentioned the fact that Newfoundland was going to be better off by $35 million. I would like to know whose pocket that $35 million is going to go into. It will not be mine. Only one person is going to benefit from this tax, and that is Mr. Block of H and R Block, because many young, uneducated Newfoundlanders will not be able to cope with the massive amount of paperwork they will face with the GST. I have a little education. I am able to do the basic tax form, but if it gets much harder than it already is, I will be lost. I will just have to go to someone like Mr. Block and ask him to do it. That will cost me more money.

The government came out last year or the year before with some tax reform to help disabled Canadians. I do not qualify for any of that because I do not pay income tax. So there is absolutely no benefit to me at all.

One of the points that I tried to make before the House of Commons committee hearing was that if I were to refit my apartment to make it totally accessible by putting in a countertop stove and a wall rack, I indicated that those items are far more expensive than the actual stove. For me to pay an extra 7 per cent on those items would be unfair.

• (0315)

There should be a limit—$10,000 or $20,000—and anything below that limit the person does not pay a tax. Forget about this rebate. That is a waste of time. If you are given a cheque, you put it in your pocket. Half the people in this province will be down on the strip drinking it the night after. That is not to say we are all alcoholics; that is the way it is down here. If the money is not going to be spent on liquor, it will be spent on bingo or something else. The Social Action Commission tried to make that point.

I suggest that the disabled and old age pensioners have exemption status. That is the only way I am going to get equality out of the system.

Earlier in the day some people asked whether or not the Senate has the right to kill the bill. As far as I am concerned the question is not whether you have the right to kill the bill, it is how many people this bill is going to kill.

The chairman then makes a statement and Mr. Winsor continues:

The government has the idea that because someone earns under $30,000 these cheques given every four months will make things all right. They can double the amount of the cheques, it will still not do us any good because the money will not be managed properly.

I worked in the tourism industry in the past. As far as I can understand, the proposal from the government is that out-of-country tourists, when they cross the border, will get a rebate for their major purchases. That is not going to do our country any good. We will be paying tourists to come to the country and then they will take it back home and spend it there.

That is similar to a program the Newfoundland government has. Every year the Newfoundland government gives money to tourists so that they will come here. That is what it amounts to. Now the Canadian government is going to do the same thing. I think the tourists should be given an opportunity to spend their money in Canada.

Senator Lefebvre: What is your disability?

Mr. Winsor: I am disabled by arthritis.

Then the questioning went on with respect to Mr. Winsor's personal circumstances, and finally Mr. Winsor said:

I have had a copy of this legislation since it was printed. I have digested this legislation. I see absolutely no good in the legislation for anyone in my circumstances. Every time we turn around the government has found another way to stick it to us.

Mr. Winsor continued:

One of the problems I see is that these GST hearings have been restrictive, as were the Meech Lake hearings. For someone like myself who does not have a B.A. in this, that or the other thing, it is difficult to get before these committees. I do not belong to an association. I am not a member of a political party that is represented in this room, I am not a director of a large corporation. I just say that it is difficult to get my views across.

Those are the views of an ordinary Canadian who appeared before our committee in Newfoundland to give compelling evidence with respect to his opposition to the GST. It is evidence worth listening to, even at this hour, because there is still time, and we will defeat this bill.

Then, honourable senators, in Halifax Mr. Laurence Pitaro, a private citizen, came forward. What did Mr. Pitaro tell us? He said:

. . . taxes in general are symptomatic of a larger issue and problem facing not only this country but many others, and it is this larger issue that I wish to address; that is, the issue of monetary reform.

There have been a number of monetary reformers in the country—namely, Alma Hancock, George Creed and Wallace Klinck—who have apprised the government on the correct way to initiate a healthy, debt-free monetary system, but the government has turned a deaf ear to their advice. This is unfortunate, since it results in the perpetuation of financial slavery for the populace.

I am opposed to the GST and to taxes in general because they erode purchasing power, and the erosion of the purchasing power means that the standard of living of countless thousands of people is far below what it should be.

Finally he said:

Whether the Senate is an elected or unelected body is of little import. What is of great import is that it has the power to defeat the GST bill. By defeating the bill the Senate can show the country and the world that in a democracy the people are sovereign, and that in defeating the bill the Senate is merely practicing true democracy by reflecting the will of the people; something which Parliament refuses to do.

Another witness who appeared before the committee was Ms. Linda Randolf from the Canadian Congress for Learning Opportunities for Women.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In what city?

Senator Hastings: Halifax. Also, Ms. Shirley Marryat, a private citizen, appeared before the committee. She said:

> Mr. Chairman, when the last task force came down to Halifax, I became famous for shaking my finger at one of the members on that task force. I am thankful for this opportunity to take up a few minutes of your time. I did not know whether I would be able to come to the hearings and therefore I have not prepared a brief.
> I have worked for just about 18 years with disadvantaged people, people who have been on social assistance or people who are waiting for compensation and have to go on welfare, and the working poor. The Maritimes has a vast number of people who can only be classified as "working poor". I feel that there are probably more such people here in the Maritimes because of the seasonal nature of our work and because some of the different jobs we have are low paid. I refer to those working in hotels, those on minimum wage and so on.
> There are many people out there who are disadvantaged because they do not have technical training. There are people out there who have college degrees but who are working at jobs that pay minimum wage. Some of these people, particularly the women, have had to take training to become personal-care workers for people in nursing homes or have taken people into their own homes to look after because they could not get a job in a field they were trained for. When you cannot provide jobs for people who have gone to college, who have received education and training, how in the world can we provide jobs and a proper living standard for people who have to work at the minimum wage?
> The thing is that by the time you break it down into rent, light, oil, gas and the materials these people use for their work, such as work shoes, it adds up to a lot of money. I can remember not so long ago going to the provincial government and saying that the health tax had to come off work safety shoes. I have had people who went to a job in the morning and came back later in the day because they could not take the job. I had to send them to social services to get money to buy a pair of safety boots.
> I was born 56 years ago, and I am like the gentleman who came here 30 years ago. I have always been proud of being, first, a Nova Scotian and, second, a Canadian. To me to be Nova Scotian is to be Canadian. I never really made a distinction. It is all right to say that with this tax, "Oh well, you'll get your money back," but when I talk to people and say, "This is an awful tax," they say, "Oh, no, Shirley, in December we're going to get the money". They do not stop to think that they will get money only in December. At Christmas they will have a few dollars, but on January 1 their oil bill, light bill, telephone bill and cable bills will come in, all with extra tax. Where are they going to get the extra money? As it is now, many of them have to take a little bit from their groceries to pay the rent. The next month they will have to take a little bit to pay their lights. In Nova Scotia—and I imagine it is the same throughout the Maritimes—you have to rob Peter to pay Paul.
> The government says that rent will not be taxed. I have looked after buildings and I know that the people who own buildings will not be able to absorb the tax. If they hire an electrician, he has to be paid, and there will be a tax on his bill. If he buys a part, he will have to pay the tax. The landlord will have to pay a plumber, a furnace man and for the oil. There is a tax on everything. The landlord is not going to absorb it, and I do not blame him. Would you as a businessman? No, you wouldn't because you would have to lose profits in the long run. So the tax will be passed on to the poor tenants. The tenants will not have any extra money. Every few months they will get a few extra dollars. Bully for them, because it will cost them much more to pay the tax.

It seems that Ms. Marryat and Canadians did not believe the claim of the government that rent would be free of GST. I will continue with Ms. Marryat:

> You just heard from Mr. Yetman. I have a lot of faith in what he has said with regard to the labour movement. We have seen a loss of jobs in Nova Scotia. The economy has gone down. The fishing trade has all gone to hell in Nova Scotia—pardon my English, but it has. Fishermen cannot make a living today and when they can make a living where will they get the money? They will get it from unemployment, and when unemployment runs out where do they get the money? They get it from social services. Who gives the money to social services? It comes from the taxpayer, whether it be municipal, provincial or federal. Do you think that the twon of Canso can bear the burden of all those people once they run out of unemployment?

● (0330)

> One gentleman hit the nail on the head when he said that the Senate has a moral right to stand up for the people of Canada and be counted. I know you are not voted in. For years I thought that the Senate was maybe even a bit more important than the government of the day. Whether you are voted in, elected, or whether you got in there because somebody said, "We want him in the Senate,"—

And somebody said, "I want eight people in that Senate."

> —you have to stop and think about the small people in Canada. We are not rich. People who are retired and people who are disabled have only a certain amount of income, and it is not flexible like that of the businessman's. Business can only afford to have the poor riding on its back for so long. I could see it if this GST had been put on cars over a certain price and on houses over a certain price and on luxuries, but when you put it on basic, everyday commodities that people have to live on, that is not right. Like the other gentleman, I think you have a legal and moral right to protect the people against > the GST. I do not have much faith that you will do it because I think that you will feel that because you have been appointed, that if you do not go by the wishes of the government of the day, maybe somewhere down the line you will be finished. I do not know. What I am saying to you is that if you are honourable people of the level I think you are, you should go along with what the people not only want and expect but what they need to live as real equal Canadians.

There is an appeal from an ordinary citizen!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What is his income?

Senator Hastings: I did not cross-examine the witness and ask. I am telling you what she told the committee and I accept her evidence.

> Some people need that extra money that will be spent on the GST just to survive—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There are credits, you know.

Senator Hastings: She explained what will happen to the credits. She explained that 40 per cent of the people will be worse off with those credits. Those credits are similar to what you hear from used-car salesmen: "Buy now and I'll give you $1,000." The Prime Minister is like a used-car salesman. He gives people a GST cheque and then takes it back after the first of the year. Great business!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What kind of rubbish is that?

Senator Hastings: It isn't rubbish. It is the kind of thing they have been getting from this government, and they know it. You are selling it like a used car or furniture: "Buy now, no interest payments. Here is a cheque. Pay the tax." They know damned well they will be paying more than they ever receive from this government.

The evidence continues:

> Some people need that extra money that will be spent on the GST just to survive, and those are the people I represent. They see only the few dollars that you say that they will get, but those few dollars will not stem the amount of money they will pay out. If they are single they will get $290, but it will cost them $500 in the extra tax—

Senator Simard: Wrong!

Senator Hastings:

> —and where are they going to get that extra money? I hope that you as members of the Senate will really consider what I am saying about the general population of the Maritimes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: This is like your petitions: all made up.

Senator Hastings: You don't like to hear what the ordinary Canadian has to tell you.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I don't like fiction.

Senator Hastings: You don't like to hear her tell us to be honourable men.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Like the independents' amendments, these are all made up by the Liberals.

Senator Hastings: The evidence continues:

> The tourist trade is probably one of the biggest industries in the Maritimes right now because the fishing industry has gone downstream. Maybe in Quebec they have other ways of creating jobs, but I imagine that there are a lot of places there that are just as badly off as the Maritimes. As you go across Canada you will find the same thing.

An Hon. Senator: Come on!

Senator Buckwold: Read more.

Senator Hastings: I am glad they are interested.

Senator Buckwold: We are interested.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Even half the people on your side are asleep.

Senator Marchand: It is not because of the entertainment.

Senator Hastings: I am glad you are keeping me awake.

Senator Marchand: Don't let them bother you.

Senator Hastings: It doesn't bother me. We did continue on and we went to the City of Montreal where a young man came forward, Mr. Iftekhak, a university student. You could have done something for this young man if you had voted in favour of his books being tax-free. He said to the committee:

> I thank the Senate committee for giving me this opportunity to come before it and for listening to what Canadians want.
> I am a student. Being a student, I like to emphasize what has happened from our point of view. Last year our Prime Minister, during summer cabinet meetings—we all remember Meech Lake—made an announcement about the education system in Canada. Since last year we have seen what happened in the budget. He shifted the responsibility for education to the provinces. What happened in Quebec was that that power has now been shifted to the school boards. This cannot fail to have an effect upon us.
> As to how the GST is affecting us, especially in Quebec, our tuition has more than doubled.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What has that to do with the federal government?

Senator Hastings: It has lots to do with the GST. Reading on:

> We have never paid taxes on books but now we will have to pay. The House of Commons never gave us a chance to be heard. They have rolled the dice with the Constitution, they are rolling the dice with the taxes, and as to the way the government of this country is proceeding, my comment would be that this is a gross miscarriage of the democratic system . . .
> I am talking about the proposal in general.

I would like to mention another thing. I have been listening here since this morning, but no representations have been made on behalf of the dead people. The dead will have to pay taxes, as we know, under the GST. What is going on is disgusting. I cannot believe what is going on in this country, how the government is proceeding, what it is talking about and what it is doing. Two years ago the government talked about cutting the deficit and improving the employment situation. What have we seen since? In the last couple of months all we have seen are companies going bankrupt. We have seen many people lose their jobs.

Interest rates are going up. How they are cutting the deficit, I do not understand. Maybe some experts know that.

You are an unelected body but you do have constitutional rights. You are obligated to the people of this country. What we want is fair representation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Pious nonsense!

Senator Hastings: I might read one from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. That would impress you.

Senator Buckwold: He's all heart.

Senator Hastings: It's always "pious nonsense" when it is the ordinary Canadian.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are blaming the federal government when it doesn't have anything to do with it.

Senator Hastings: We then went to the City of Toronto, the largest city in Canada.

Senator Stollery: Very large.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: But shrinking fast.

Senator Hastings: We continued the practice of listening to ordinary Canadians, inviting them to come before the committee. There we heard from a Mr. Erwin Joseph Gordon:

The Finance Minister of this country says that the GST will add less than 2 per cent to the inflation rate. I would like to relate one scenario that far exceeds that increase in inflation. Take, for example, a coin laundry of washers and dryers. In most places, the current price for washing and drying is $1.00. The laundromat owner will now have to collect seven cents more from the user for GST. There is no such thing as a seven-cent coin. The owner has a choice of going to a ten-cent coin or a 25-cent coin. It does not pay to go to a ten-cent coin because of the extra cost of a new slide, and with normal inflation of 3 per cent to 4 per cent a year the ten-cent coin will not be sufficient for very long. Therefore, the owner will go to a 25-cent coin, making the cost of washing $1.25. This is an increase of 25 per cent overnight. Laundry is not a one-time purchase; it is done week after week. This is an onerous impact on all those people who live in apartments and in small towns where many people use a coin laundry.

The foregoing is one example of the GST having a 25 per cent inflation rate impact on a necessary service. Multiply this scenario by all the other small operations in this country of this nature and you have major inflation on repeat, necessary purchases.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that the GST is a consumption tax. The problem with a consumption tax is that it is regressive in nature and reduces consumption, which means retailers buy less, manufacturers sell less and therefore need fewer employees. This all adds up to a lower gross national product and higher unemployment.

The only increase in employment will come from those thousands of people hired to administer the tax.

This tax is ill-conceived and ill-timed. You must take a stand and send it back to the House of Commons for more review.

Obviously, the best solution is a higher progressive tax rate and no GST, or, in the alternative, a straight sales tax of 1 per cent or 2 per cent on everything.

It was a little over 200 years ago that the colonists in America threw the tea into the Boston harbour because of the unfair revenue taxes on the tea. It is time, Mr. Chairman, for your committee to take a stand and do the same to the GST.

I would like to close by posing the following question to the committee. How is it that so many people in this country can be so wrong, and so few people in Ottawa be so right?

[Senator Hastings.]

He should have talked to the government leaders and posed that question to them. How can they all be so wrong and the government be so right? That is why the government is at 13 per cent in the polls today: They will not listen.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Don't make a decision; follow the leader. Hear the wind blow and follow it. Tell us about the National Energy Program and the research credits. Tell us about the giveaways.

Senator Kenny: If you want to make a speech, stand up.

Senator Doody: Question!

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, before I stood up, I waited for quite a while to see if there was going to be a speaker on the government side. There was no indication whatever that anybody was going to stand and defend the GST, so I proceeded to take the floor.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And read somebody else's mail.

Senator Hastings: We all hope that sometime in this debate, before this bill is defeated, someone over there will get up and try to defend this bill.

Senator Kenny: Defend the indefensible?

Senator Hastings: And defend it, not with these sniping remarks that are made from time to time, but in a logical manner, as we usually do in this chamber.

• (0345)

Senator Cogger: Senator, I do not understand how you expect remarks from this side. We have been here since 10:00.

All I have heard so far is your colleague, Senator Bosa, reading ad nauseam extracts from a transcript of a committee meeting that took place during the course of the summer.

Senator Kenny: It was a good speech.

Senator Cogger: If you want to speak to me, Senator Kenny, you speak from your seat. That is the rule.

Senator Kenny: Tell me which rule.

Senator Cogger: I will sit down. Let's call the question.

Senator Kenny: No, I will keep quiet.

Senator Buckwold: That is the shortest speech you have made in a long time.

Senator Cogger: I am prepared to speak if you will tell him to keep quiet for a minute. May I speak for a minute, Senator Hastings?

Senator Hastings: Are you taking part in the debate?

Senator Cogger: There is a point I would like to make.

Senator Hastings: Is it a point of order or a question of privilege?

Senator Cogger: It is not a point of order or a question of privilege. If you sit down and listen, you will find out what it is about.

You are arguing in favour of a logical debate. We are listening to someone reading to us from the transcripts of a meeting held last summer, and rereading questions put by yourself and by Senator Robertson. Then he proceeded to read to us the Hansard of the Legislature of British Columbia. I do not find that good participation in a logical debate.

Then it comes to your turn, Senator Hastings. I have always known you to be a very logical, articulate, bilingual and competent senator. Unfortunately, tonight you choose to read someone else's mail. Surely you can do a whole lot better than that. Give us some provocative and innovative thoughts and you will generate an interesting debate, or maybe you will excite our imagination and our will to respond in kind. If you wish to bore us to death, just keep on going.

Senator Hastings: Thank you, Senator Cogger, for the interjection. I am taking part in this debate in a manner that I think is very worthwhile, and that is to remind all honourable senators of the views that we as a committee heard, repeat them to you, and let you think about them a little before we proceed on in this debate. If you will be calm, I hope that I can get to some provocative statements that will stimulate you into action. Before I do that, I want to lay out the groundwork so you will understand the significance of what went on this past summer as we reached the conclusions we have. I hope I will be successful in persuading you to reach the same conclusion. That is the way I chose to proceed, and I am sorry if it does not please you. I thought it was significant to have a grasp and an understanding of what these people told us. It is worthwhile to consider what they thought of us and what they thought we should do.

You can say, forget about them, just do what the Patronat du Quebéc, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, or Tom d'Aquino say, but I think there is another side that we should listen to and it represents about 85 per cent of the people who are opposed to this tax. It might be worthwhile to have an understanding of just why they oppose the tax and why they hate it with the vehemence they do. I think that is a worthwhile way of proceeding. I know that in the debate my colleagues and I will have some provocative statements to make, and I hope we can generate some action and response from senators opposite.

In Toronto, Ms. Charlene E. Black, a student, appeared before the committee and stated:

> I too have not made a speech in public since grade four and that is longer ago than I would like to admit.
> Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman and senators. Thank you for giving me this time. I would like to speak with you on my opinion about the proposed GST . . .

Her opinion about the GST may not be worthwhile to some of us, but I think we have a duty at least to listen to that opinion. I am proposing to repeat her opinion in the hope that you will listen to her and perhaps give serious consideration to what she is saying. She went on to say:

> . . . and no matter what I say, I do not believe that I speak out of self-pity, as the gentleman ahead had perhaps suggested some people do.
> I am a mature, fulltime student at the University of Toronto and will be entering my third year of a four-year program in September. I do receive financial aid from the Ontario Student Assistance Program and I also work part-time.
> It is my opinion that the proposed GST will be harmful to Canadians like myself who must exist from day to day on a limited income. My tuition for this coming year will be between $1,967 to $2,131. On top of this, I have basic living expenses, like everyone else, such as food, rent, transportation, telephone and personal necessities.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What about the credit she will receive?

Senator Hastings: Ms. Black continues:

> Under the GST, educational costs are to be exempt. This is fine. It is my belief that all levels of education should be available to all people: men, women and children. However, books which are a necessity for students and not a luxury are now to be taxed. Never before in the history of Canada have books been subject to tax. The cost of these books has been steadily rising and for each course of study I can expect to spend approximately $100 and sometimes more. This does not include suggested or supplementary reading material, which is approximately $500 for the school year. To place a tax upon an already expensive item is unacceptable and, in my opinion, undermines our educational system. I also believe that it indirectly promotes illiteracy, which is a very serious problem in Canada.

> I am a recipient of assistance from OSAP. Last year I received approximately $5,500 in loans and grants. To add to that, I am allowed to make up to $1,000 during the school year. Any amount beyond this figure and my OSAP is reassessed and diminished.

That is the view of Ms. Black with respect to the taxing of books. Finally, she states:

> In closing, I wish to stress that I have no problem in giving my fair share to support Canada. In my opinion, the GST is asking for more than what is fair. Presently I am in a low income bracket because I am a student. At some point I expect to be able to enter a field that will be both personally and financially fulfilling. At that point I will be more able and willing to give more to this country in a financial way, but right now I have no more money to give.
> I ask the Senate to block the GST and to insist that the government go back to the drawing board and develop a fairer system of taxes to help reduce the national debt.
> Thank you for giving me this opportunity.

That is the statement I made when I first spoke to you, honourable senators. All Canadians realize they have to pay taxes. All Canadians are willing and ready to pay taxes. However, they want to be understood and they want to know that everyone is paying his or her fair share. The goods and services tax is regressive and unfair.

Senator Buckwold: May I ask a question? I wish to put some information on the record to assist our honourable friend who talks about the tax credit, the $300 or $400 that he has been hollering out here.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I don't holler. I try to correct a bad impression.

Senator Buckwold: Whatever it is, we are always glad to hear from you.

May I ask Senator Hastings a question? What will the 1991 GST credit be for anyone earning $6,000 a year or less? Just so you know what this person will receive.

Senator Hastings: The answer was in the evidence I read. It was $190.

Senator Buckwold: Is $190 going to be sufficient?

Senator Hastings: No. I said that this GST credit is a fraud on the poor people of Canada. It is like selling a car with a $1,000 rebate. Every purchaser knows he or she will pay that $1,000. It is the same as the advertisment that suggests buying furniture now and not making any interest payments until 1991. It is like hawking furniture. People who buy furniture under those circumstances know perfectly well that they will pay the interest on that in 1991. The poor people of Canada know that this tax credit of $190 is a gimmick from the government and that they will pay more back when they pay taxes in 1991. That is what we have, a government out hawking a GST tax like an automobile salesman.

Another witness who appeared before the committee in Toronto was Mr. Robert S. W. Campbell, a solicitor in private practice in Toronto, who welcomed the opportunity to present his views to the committee on the legislation creating the GST. He said:

> I make this presentation as a layman without specialized knowledge in the field of either taxation or economics.
> The purpose of the GST is to replace the MST. Because of its obvious shortcomings, there is general agreement that the MST ought to be abolished. However, notwithstanding all its deficiencies, the MST is still less damaging to the country than the GST.

It is very interesting that Mr. Campbell, who stated he was not a specialist in taxation or economics, reached the same conclusion as the Canadian Tax Foundation, an organization of the most high-powered economists in Canada. Mr. Campbell continued:

> I suggest there are two issues before this committee. First, a valid alternative tax to replace the revenue lost by reason of the appeal of the MST and, secondly, fair taxation.
>
> One characteristic of the GST is its unfairness, but I wish to comment specifically on a point that was stressed by the Minister of Revenue this morning and his reference to the fact that lower-income groups have been reached out to by the minister or his department in order to acquaint those people with their entitlement to refundable sales tax credits.

● (0400)

> In many cases I suggested that people in that category will not be compensated. The GST credits will not be received by those who do not file income tax returns. I understand that it is estimated 15 per cent of lower income earners who qualify for GST credits will, for various reasons, file no income tax return, and consequently will receive no reimbursement. This group includes transients, illiterates, immigrants who are suspicious or fear the bureaucratic system. As implied by those who are attempting to sell the GST, opponents of the GST do not oppose an alternative form of tax to replace the MST. In an across-Canada protest vote held on April 7th, under the auspices of the Canadian Labour Congress, the Pro-Canada Network, over 2 million Canadians voted against the GST in favour of fairer taxation. There is a valid and fair alternative to the GST proposed by Neil Brooks.

That is the proposal that we had read to us this evening by my colleague Senator Bosa.

> In a discussion paper entitled "Searching for an Alternate to the GST", presented to the Institute for Research on Public Policy in February, 1990, by way of amendments to the Income Tax Act. This is the logical and reasonable alternative to the GST. Contrary to the inaccurate objections of the Minister of Finance, the income tax alternative to the GST would require only a modest increase in income tax rates and the minor adjustments referred to in Professor Brooks' paper. His proposal would eliminate the costly bureaucracy necessary to administer the GST by utilizing the existing income tax machinery. It would dispense with the artificial and unnecessary system of GST credits and refunds. It would not have the inflationary effects of the GST. On the contrary, it would reduce inflation since it would be more progressive than the GST. It would result in fairer taxation.

I submit that the public hopes that the committee in its report will demonstrate its ability to reflect accurately the reviews of the Canadian public. It hopes that the report would counteract the distortions of the heavy-handed and misleading government propaganda which there has surrounded the introduction of the GST. It hopes that the report will recommend a fair taxation. The hallmark of effective taxation is fair taxation, and the GST does not comply with this standard. It should be replaced by a fair income tax alternative. This is my submission, Mr. Chairman, and I thank you and your fellow colleagues for the opportunity to address you.

And then we had Mr. R. A. Reynolds of the Citizens Against the GST.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: From where?

Senator Hastings: Mississauga. And she said:

Mr. Chairman, we would like to thank you and the other members of the committee for the opportunity to appear before you today. We are doubly appreciative because we are not extended a similar courtesy by our own MP, Mr. Blenkarn and his committee, and we look upon you as our last resort. We represent approximately 150 volunteers in Mississauga who join together to lobby against the GST. One of the activities we carried out in April was to arrange a ballot so that people in Mississauga could vote for or against the tax. The result was that 4,806, 98 per cent, voted against the tax, and 83, 2 per cent, voted in favour of it. That vote may not be completely representative, but it gives an indication of how the residents of Mississauga feel about the proposed tax. We, and the majority of Canadians, oppose the GST because it is regressive, inflationary and hugely inefficient. It is regressive because lower- and middle-income people spend more of their income on necessary goods and services than higher income earners. According to the National Anti-Poverty Organization, the credit to low income people is poorly designed and will not be received by many who need it most. In addition the credit is not indexed to inflation and no guarantee has been given about what will happen to the credit when the tax is inevitably increased to 10, 12 or 14 per cent.

The tax is inefficient and an unknown number of thousands of public servants will have to be hired with the attendent overheads to administer and police the tax. Millions of man-hours in the private sector will be required to keep track of the tax and rebates due. This will result in lost productivity and inefficiency in the private sector. The Department of Finance in the city of Mississauga has stated that the administrative costs of the GST will be horrendous. Inevitably municipal taxes will go up as a result.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Hogwash! That is hogwash!

Senator Hastings: I spoke to a member of the department yesterday and as yet there will be no mill rate, but I was informed that it will be positive and significant.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Those fellows are getting credits. You know that.

Senator Hastings: Reading on:

The GST will cost a rise in tax in every lower level of government. All public institutions will be subjected to this.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: They will not. You are making it up. The Mayor of the City of Montreal has said himself that the City of Montreal will not suffer, as other municipalities will not, from the GST, because they all get rebates or exemptions. So don't read a letter from somebody who doesn't know the facts.

Senator Hastings: Well, I guess the mayor and the city council of Toronto don't know the facts. I gather the mayor and the city council of the City of Vancouver don't know the facts. I gather that municipality after municipality don't know the facts. It is only my honourable friend who understands the facts. We are back to that same old argument that "everybody is stupid but me."

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No.

Senator Hastings: That is exactly what you are using. That is exactle the argument you are using, and it is the same argument that the minister has used.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Quote the mayor of Toronto.

Senator Hastings: I quoted the mayor.

Senator Grimard: Give us a copy.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Make your speech.

Senator Hastings: I am listening.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have no speech.

Senator Hastings: Then why don't you shut up and listen.

Senator Grimard: I cannot speak now. I will make it next week. It will be a serious one. Don't laugh at the people of Canada. You are asking that the people of Canada—

Senator Hastings: The honourable senator doesn't know what he is talking about, but he continues to babble. I said to you that is why the City of Vancouver has declared itself to be a tax-free area. That is why there is a vote in Vancouver at the present time. The provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia oppose this tax but they don't know what they are doing, according to you people.

Senator Oliver: Table the letter from Toronto.

Senator Hastings: You will have occasion to check it. I do not have it here with me.

Senator Grimard: Is that your undertaking?

Senator Hastings: My honourable friend, I invite you to read the evidence that was presented to the committee, when it sat in Toronto, by Mr. Jack Layton, on behalf of the City of Toronto.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have been looking through the report. There is nothing in here.

Senator Hastings: Reading on:

> The government claims that the MST is unfair and presumably because it applies only to certain manufacturers. The government neglects to point out that it has already reduced the corporate tax rate from 36 to 28 per cent.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You are on our side. Come on over.

Senator Hastings: To continue:

> I understand that one member of the committee has already committed to the tax as a fait accompli, but I hope the rest of you in your deliberations will take into consideration the feelings of Canadians. There is a deep malaise in this country at the moment. There is alienation. We hope that you will defeat this tax and give us some indication that we again have some control over our lives and over what happens in our government. I hope that the rest of you in your deliberations will take into consideration the feelings of Canadians, 87 per cent oppose this tax. They are asking you to take into consideration those feelings. There is a deep malaise in this country at the moment. There is alienation. We hope that you will defeat this tax and give us some indication that we again have some control over our own lives and over what happens to the people and our government, but we can tell him and tell her that, "No, we are not going to do that. We will not listen to you. We are going to proceed on if we continue with the bill as we have it before us, if we proceed on it."

Another witness who walked onto the stage in Toronto was Mrs. Donna Peconi.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: From where?

Senator Hastings: From Peterborough.

> Good evening senators. I thank you for allowing the citizens of Peterborough the opportunity to appear before you to voice our concerns regarding the proposed GST. Your task is not an enviable one. Bill C-62 is certainly one of the most controversial pieces of legislation in Canadian history. If implemented it will have permanent and far-reaching effects on this nation and its people. It is for these reasons that we urge you to hear the voice that has been ignored by the government.

Praise the Lord!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Alleluia!

[Senator Oliver.]

Senator Hastings: The voice of the people.

> No one denies our nation is in a crisis. We are dangerously close to crumbling under the weight of our national debt and it gets worse every day.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Oh boy!

Senator Hastings:

> Immediate action must be taken to bring the process of extracating ourselves from the situation. However Bill C-62 is not the answer. One does not solve the problem by masking its root cause. The root of the problem is our system of taxation. Tax reform is the bullet that must be bitten. Not many governments in this country have lacked the will to do it. It is time this government put some spine where the jelly is. No individual or corporate citizen in this nation should be allowed to avoid paying their proper graduated share of income taxes. You cannot legislate one group to pay and legislate loopholes for others. Our current fiscal straights have proven beyond doubt that those who pay cannot support the burden created by those who do not. I will not repeat the flaws that exist in this bill. There are obvious ones that have been outlined in our submissions and will likely be repeated to you numerous times by many other Canadians. What I am going to ask you to think about is this. If Bill C-62 is such a good piece of legislation, it would seem logical that its merits would be obvious, even to us citizens, although we cannot be classed as experts, who not so the economic experts oppose and continue to pose questions and voice concerns over this bill. If many of those qualified to judge have found this bill to be flawed, those of us not qualified surely have cause to worry about what is obviously wrong. And worse, what is not so obvious.

● (0415)

> The response of the government has been completely unacceptable. Its answers are nothing more than double-speak, and we are among the millions of Canadians who are not accepting same.

They are not like Senator Everett, who simply accepts a letter. She continues:

> Our group includes local accountants, small businessmen and tax experts who have shown repeatedly that falsehoods have been offered up by way of explanation. It seems the government expects that if these are repeated enough, they will eventually be believed.
> The opposition to this tax is not simply a flash in the pan. The refusal of this government to listen to its people has angered, confused and frightened us. No party in power can claim a monopoly on knowing what is best for this nation and its people. There are alternatives to this bill. They have not been carefully studied but dismissed because they tread on privileges regarded as sacrosanct by those having them.
> Our nation is in a mess. We no longer have time to waste pointing fingers at who made it in the first place. Through your efforts with these hearings you can do nothing more than pay lip-service to us, or you can get the business end of the broom and help to clean our fiscal house. Canada is sorely in need of your assistance at this time. It is not a question of power. It is a question of conscience. That is the difference between politics and government.

We realize that you as appointees are being asked to override the elected body. You have alluded to the moral dilemma created by such a request. What you must consider is the dilemma created when there exists a majority in the House of Commons and the House refuses to listen to the majority of its constituents.

In our system of government, the line between democracy and dictatorship would almost be indistinguishable but for the Senate. The buck stops right here.

It is true that in the past you have never had to exercise your mandate to its fullest extent on a money bill. That does not mean you cannot and it does not mean you should not. The people have never called on you as they are calling on you now. The House of Commons did not have a mandate to introduce, much less pass, Bill C-62. The issue in the last election was free trade. The matter of tax reform was briefly mentioned but far from specifically addressed. The last election resulted in a house majority, a majority elected by the people on the basis of the issues. Bill C-62 was not one of them.

When this bill was introduced, a majority of Canadian people rose up in vehement opposition. We have not gone away. We do not want it. We do not feel we need it. We have suggested alternatives to it.

We have given you a clear mandate. It is up to you to decide whether the trust of the people and the good of our nation is worth a little grappling with protocol. The answer will lie in your actions.

Will you listen to Mrs. Peconi? Does her evidence mean anything?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: How about the Canadian Manufacturers' Association? Don't they count?

Senator Hastings: They wrote the legislation with your help.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Oh, I see. Why didn't you suggest amendments when it first came out?

Senator Buckwold: What a joke!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Amendments on third reading; unheard of.

Senator Simard: Are you just going to quote people who don't support the tax? You are being selective.

Senator Kenny: Let them make a speech.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, we spent three days in Toronto. The walk-on this day was Mr. Sinan Tanla. He had this say:

Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I thank the committee for the opportunity of speaking in front of you on a most decisive yet ill-founded issue, the GST. I did submit my written contribution within the permitted timeframe to your committee's attention in Ottawa. I would ask you to refer to this submission later on as I believe that, although today I am voicing my opinion as a single person, it does represent a good cross-section of the minds of Canadians.

I am not a supporter of any political party in Canada.

The GST is a very bad piece of legislation because the so-claimed purpose of it is not correctly diagnosed. It shall not effectively contribute to the lessening of the deficit. The concept of a deficit is a political chewing gum. In reality, our world is merging towards major amalgamations. The financial interrelated viabilities of the countries are gaining more and more impetus and momentum of collective destinies. In an acceptable future the concept of deficits shall be merged into large regional responsibilities encompassing more than one nation. The GST shall not find a remedy for Canada's deficit.

Canada, despite her tremendous potential, is a most unfortunate country from the perspective of political life that shapes her destiny. Almost everything is done in order to accommodate certain interest groups. All the political parties in Canada up until now have been involved in creating a positive objectlessness within society by creating an overburdening hunger and pursuing power for material ends . . . .

I have been in Canada for 19 years. I know this country very extensively. I have no recollection, none whatsoever, of Canadians being given the chance to go through a process of national self-determination, that is, deciding on a decisive national issue on their own judgment and evaluation . . .

The GST shall be most disastrous in foreseen and unforeseen economic bottlenecks, give to the rise of corruptive practices, and shall create almost immeasurable overall chaos in Canada. I do not find it decisive to subdivide into such as you all know them very well.

What is decisive is to answer three questions. Is the GST essential? My answer is no.

Must Canadians be concerned about the deficit? My answer is, absolutely, yes, but such concern must be in a most equitable conclusiveness. In other words, the tax burden on average Canadians is already far too much. Enough is enough. There are more effective ways to substitute this evil piece of legislation.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Evil?

Senator Hastings: Evil. He continues:

What should we expect from the Senate? My answer is, a tremendous amount. At present Canada is in a state of turmoil from a national decisiveness about her moral destiny. She must be called to act on this very decisive issue through a referendum.

In my already-made submission to the Senate I envisaged the acceptance of six provinces and 73 per cent of the votes thus affected if GST should be approved. This process shall give Canadians a self-urgency and of being as a nation. At present we stand divided. And as we stand we are a nation only on paper but not in spirit and mind. It is high time for us to commence to learn the process of determining our own futures instead of leaving it in the hands of a group of political opportunists who do not know or care where they are taking ship. The average Canadian is a most prudent human being. He or she is already seeing the rocks this ship shall fall onto.

The Senate has a historical duty to perform here. Up to now and later on in your travels almost always you shall hear the commercial threats, concerns and cries of certain interest groups that shall sharpen the pencil only to their side as far as the GST is concerned. That is not what Canadians want. They need to be involved in the actual process.

My plea to you is neither to strike down the GST nor to let it pass. My plea is on absolute grounds to ensure that all Canadians are given the facts about the GST, which is not so at present, and then call a referendum on this most vital national issue. Such an adoption of policy by the Senate shall and must represent the very best choice for the interests of Canada.

Ask Canada to get involved seriously and determinedly.

Senator Buckwold: I hope you have more of those statements.

Senator Hastings: In Winnipeg, Manitoba, Senator Buckwold continued the practice of hearing walk-ons who wanted to express their views with respect to the tax. Some supported it, but most opposed it, as was the case generally with most of the briefs presented to the committee. Mr. John Clearwater appeared before the committee in Winnipeg. He said:

I noticed from today's schedule that I am the only, what could be termed, private citizen appearing before the committee. All the others have represented corporations, groups or interests. My presentation is directly that of a citizen.

My background is in graduate studies and political science with a second in history and economics. I have been doing graduate work at Dalhousie in Halifax, but I am a Winnipeger, which is why I am appearing before the committee here today.

As I understand it, one of the jobs of this committee is to examine alternatives to the goods and services tax proposed by the Minister of Finance. What I will be talking about today quite clearly would be anathema to most of the people you have heard prior to my presentation. I will be speaking to you about the need to enforce already existing tax laws and to gain revenue through those tax laws from the corporate or the business community which, up until now, has been under-taxed although written into the tax laws but generally ignored through a system of tax favoritism.

[Senator Hastings.]

The current tax system in Canada is clearly wide enough to gather larger amounts of moneys without additional tax laws—that is, the GST. Staff at Finance Minister Wilson's office stated to me personally that the amount of dollars gathered at the 7 per cent GST rate would be approximately $18.1 billion in next year's dollars adjusted for inflation. I have no doubt that is a reasonable figure. That figure was dropped substantially from the $24 billion and the original 9 per cent figure.

What I propose is that instead of implementing a new and cumbersome tax law, that we enforce the tax laws already in place and collect taxes from profitable Canadian corporations and foreign corporations operating in this country.

• (0430)

I would now like to illustrate two examples to show the inequities in our tax system. Over the years, corporate versus private income taxes have radically altered. Corporate business income taxes are assuming an ever decreasing portion of the total tax revenue intake. In 1984-85, of the total budgetary personal income tax revenue, personal taxes made up 41.3 per cent and corporations paid only 13.2 per cent of that total. A year later, personal income taxes had risen to make up 43 per cent of the total and business tax had dropped to 12 per cent of the total. In 1987, the last year for which figures are available from Revenue Canada and Statistics Canada, personal income taxes made up an astonishing 47 per cent of total tax revenues of the government. Corporate taxes had dropped to under 11 per cent from four years before when they were above 13 per cent.

Total tax revenues for corporations are dropping even though profitable corporations have increased their profits by an astonishing 14 per cent in 1987. In terms of the overall income tax paid by Canadian citizens and corporations, the same picture emerges as the one I have just painted. In 1970, personal income taxes were 66 per cent of total income taxes, while corporations paid the remaining 33 per cent. By 1987, the IMF states that corporations were paying less than 20 per cent and personal income taxes accounted for over 80 per cent of total income tax revenue collected by the federal government.

The problem we are seeing is not one where the government is giving tax breaks to unprofitable corporations. Statistics Canada reports that in 1987 the total income of Canadian corporations increased by 8 per cent in that the pre-tax profits of all Canadian corporations grew by 33.4 per cent to almost $86 billion in 1987.

What we are not seeing is the government carrying out the tax laws already in place to gather tax dollars on astonishing profits made over the past 10 years. Corporations have shown no willingness to pay their fair share of tax, and there is no reason why they should if the government is not prepared to enforce laws.

Personal tax growth in this country is going to grow at 125 per cent the rate of income growth for average Canadians. For corporations, it is going to grow at a mere 43 per cent of the increase of their profits. Clearly, the inequities are growing year by year.

There was actually a decrease in corporate taxes of 2 per cent between 1985 and 1986. The Canadian public no longer trusts the taxation system that increasingly burdens them while letting large profitable corporations pay little or no tax at all. For instance, the large and profitable Argus and Power Corporations paid no income tax at all in 1985 on book profits of over $203 million. These are figures supplied by the US Department of Finance, which requires financial disclosure of all corporations operating on its stock exchange. In 1981, 60 per cent of Canadian corporations paid no income tax at all at the end of their fiscal year, and a full 50 per cent of that group were profitable in that same tax year. What that means is that 30 per cent of Canadian corporations—and those are all profitable—paid no corporate income tax, although there are laws already in place to collect such a tax.

In Canada, tax exemptions provide one of the largest problems we have in collecting tax in this country. It is thought that these tax write-offs now account for approximately two to three years worth of corporate income taxes and may be as high as $30 billion to $35 billion. In fact, the buildup of tax expenditures is equal to the projected revenues of the GST over a two-year period, 1981-83.

In respect to corporate tax expenditures, we see the exact opposite trend in the world's highly industrialized and highly successful capitalist economies—for example, West Germany and Japan, which are often considered as the archetypal models for successful capitalist economies. In those economies corporations have few exemptions, few tax expenditures, and are taxed at an astonishingly high rate in comparison to Canadian, British or U.S. corporations. Yet these countries do not seem to have a problem with their corporations. Their corporations tend to stay in the country. They do not run off to the United States. They pay their taxes. These are extremely successful economies.

All profitable corporations must be made to pay their fair share of the income tax burden. In the coming years their share of that burden must increase in Canada.

Since 1960 we have surely seen corporate income tax as a percentage of the tax paid drop dramatically, especially in the last five years. Therefore, I propose that we actually go out and collect the tax dollars due to the Canadian government, and thereby to the Canadian people, from corporations that are not now paying tax or are paying less tax than they would if the laws were fully enforced.

Ideally, corporations should have to increase their share of taxes paid back up to a level of at least 20 per cent of the total federal budgetary revenues.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We just passed a bill to that effect! Where have you been?

Senator Hastings:

They are currently paying approximately only 10 per cent. This would double the effective amount they paid to the federal government. As you will see on the bottom of page 3, I have noted a short plan by which that would be implemented over a period of years rather than simply saying to the business community, "We are going to double your tax on January 1, 1991".

The GST is not going to fight the deficit. However, if we collect the taxes that we said we were going to legislate for, and for which we have legislated, we can reasonably start to attack the deficit. Canada could reduce that deficit if the federal government would only collect those taxes. In addition, currently deferred taxes amounting to over $30 billion could be collected in the short term, thereby eliminating the need for any increases in the level of personal income taxes, which, as I said before, are starting to rise at 125 per cent the rate of increase of incomes for average Canadians.

In short, the collection of back taxes, tax breaks or the deferment of taxes and tax expenditures, along with an increased rate of tax on profitable corporations—and I emphasize the word profitable—would leave Canada in a strong financial position without having to implement the GST.

That is the end of my written submission. Since you all have it before you I see little need to elaborate. I invite questions at this time.

That was the evidence of a young man from Nova Scotia who was attending school in Winnipeg at the time.

Senator Simard: Before we change provinces, for the record, senators should note that only four Liberal senators are sitting in their seats. It is now 4.40 a.m. Obviously the Liberals are determined to show that they are no longer interested in this matter. They are only interested in short-sighted partisan politics, and they do not have the heart to participate in the debate. Not only are there four Liberal senators in their seats, but the record will show that they have refused to identify alternatives to the GST, which I asked them for earlier, and they failed to tell us whether they had read any clauses of Bill C-62. Every hour or so, I am sure one of us will get up and point this out for the record. Senator MacEachen wanted the record to show everything that has taken place, and he will get it, including the number of Liberal senators who were present throughout.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Good point!

Senator Hastings: What will we get?

Senator Simard: The record will show that for the last three or four hours, although at times one or two other Liberal senators have come in, the rule has been no more than four, including Senator Fairbairn, Senator Hastings, Senator Buckwold and Senator Marchand. No doubt there will be other people along, but these seem to be the only four who are willing to put in a reasonable effort, and we will be telling the press that later on this morning.

Senator Buckwold: You are building up your case!

Senator Simard: You should be ashamed of your party.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Disgraceful!

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, since Senator Simard decided to put some points on the record that reflect attendance on this side, perhaps I should point out a couple of things to him. First, he is on the government side and it is your duty to maintain a quorum. We, on this side, do not need to maintain a quorum. You have been in a legislature before.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are here to follow the debate.

Senator Simard: What do you mean, it is up to us to maintain a quorum?

Senator Marchand: It is part of your duty to maintain a quorum. When I was in the House of Commons on the government side we maintained the quorum. So don't try to impose things on us that make us look bad.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We don't have to!

Senator Marchand: I think we have done a good job here.

Senator Simard: I thought you did not want this legislation.

Senator Buckwold: Our strength is the strength of 10!

Senator Fairbairn: At least!

Senator Hastings: I wanted to carry on with the city of Winnipeg when we had Mrs. Janet Paxton, a private citizen, appear before the committee. She said:

> I have been married, have grown children who have now left home and four grandchildren. I am typical of the type of person who believe will be most affected by the GST.

Mrs. Paxton continues:

> Good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen of the panel. I wish to thank you for the opportunity to express my views on the GST.

● (0445)

> I only wish this meeting had received more advertising, because there would have been a lot more people here. I am a grandmother. I have lived and worked in Manitoba all my life. My greatest concern is that I have seen my own income over the years being outstripped by taxes. I remember that when I made $295 a month I had children and I always had money left over to buy shoes or a coat. Now you have to figure out which bills must be paid or whichever is likely to be disconnected.

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: Stand up!

Senator Hastings: I am standing.

> I become very concerned when I look at my children and my children's children. In my opinion, real estate gives you the only real return on investment for Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Stand up! Order!

Senator Buckwold: The Speaker is otherwise occupied.

Senator Hastings:

> I become very concerned when I look at my children and my children's children. In my opinion, real estate gives you the only real return on investment for Canadians. We are hearing how prices are skyrocketing in Toronto and B.C. and how land is owned by other countries. Rich conglomerates are buying all the land, and all of a sudden the prices are going crazy.

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, I have to ask for the question. With all due respect, you have to maintain decorum and the person speaking must stand in his place. I want you to rule on this or call the question.

Senator Hastings: If I can continue:

> The GST is going to ensure that the average working Canadian—and I mean the ordinary person who works in a factory or an office at $10 or $12 an hour, and newly-married couples—

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, if you let this instance go, you are allowing a precedent here with which this house will not be able to live. Next, he will be sleeping or lying on the floor. You have to rule that he has to stand, please.

Senator Buckwold: He will stand if you will understand!

Senator Hastings: I am sure I can lean against the chair, honourable senators.

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Hastings:

> I become very concerned when I look at my children and my children's children.

Some Hon. Senators: Stand up!

Senator Hastings: I am standing.

> The GST is going to ensure that the average working Canadian—and I mean the ordinary person who works in a factory—

Senator Comeau: I hope you don't allow this when you're the leader! This is Allan J. MacEachen stuff.

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, can I ask you to call the Sergeant at Arms or the Black Rod or somebody to look into this? Again, I draw to your attention that there is to be decorum in this place and the rules authorize you to name him, if need be.

Senator Cogger: Mr. Speaker, I might just remind Senator Hastings that, according to Senator Frith, we are all supposed to behave like well-behaved children at the dinner table. I am sure, Senator Hastings, that you do not put your feet on the chairs at the dinner table. Your mom would not allow that.

Senator Doody: Let the record show that the senator is sleeping.

Senator Hastings: What?

Senator Doody: Are you not sleeping?

Senator Hastings: No. I am awake. It is some of your cohorts who are sleeping. I feel offended that they have not been able to listen to a very worthwhile dissertation. I shall probably have to repeat parts of it now.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: God forbid!

Senator Hastings: Now, what did Mrs. Paxton have to say?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We want to hear what you have to say!

Senator Hastings: Be calm, senator! We are early in the debate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We have speakers, too.

Senator Hastings: We are waiting to hear them.

> The GST is going to ensure that the average working Canadian—and I mean the ordinary person who works in a factory or an office at $10 or $12 an hour, and newly-married couples—will never be able to afford his own home. This seems to be a trend that is becoming frightening, and I wonder if there will be any land left for my grandchildren to buy. These tax increases automatically take one-quarter of my income. The GST is going to make it even worse. As one New Zealander told us, the tax there started off at 7 per cent and in no time it increased to 15 per cent. He said that if ever we fought in our lives, all Canadians should be fighting now to make everyone look at what this tax really does to people. The tax is not only on the coffee cup, it is also on the coffee beans in that coffee cup, on the cream, on the sugar and on the overhead, which, when compounded, makes the increase more than just a straight 7 per cent tax. This is what I am worried about.
> The average working person does not have a comfortable living. He cannot save for a reasonable home now. Prices are skyrocketing, and these taxes are going to make it even more certain that only the very rich in this country will be able to afford a house. I am also concerned about how our tax money is being spent. It is like salt in the wound.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is the salt being taxed?

Senator Hastings:

> The money is not being spent wisely. Every person who has worked in a government office can give you a litany of all the waste he sees. You would soon learn that to tax spending is not wise management.
> The things that affect the ordinary working Canadian, such as taking a taxi and having lunch with a friend—things that make life pleasant—will now become very expensive with this new GST. Those are the only things left to low-income people, and I believe it is those that the GST will hurt most. I thank you for listening to me. The gentleman ahead of me was very knowledgeable and I admired his brief. There is the fact that corporations do not seem to pay taxes. The working people do, and I think we are all very depressed about that.

So Mrs. Paxton tells us very clearly—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: She is ill-informed!

Senator Hastings: Everyone is ill-informed except Mr. d'Aquino and the honourable senator. Mrs. Paxton, who is a working Canadian, is totally ill-informed. When she tells you that she will not be able to afford the things that make life pleasant, she does not know what she is talking about?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is there a tax on her rent or on the food or on her prescription drugs? No! Can't you be accurate?

Senator Buckwold: There is a tax on every one of those things, indirectly.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Come on!

Senator Buckwold: The truth at last. Just wait and see what will happen to rent.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Is there a tax on rent?

Senator Buckwold: Certainly there is a tax on rent. You should read the evidence.

Senator Simard: He believes in Santa Claus.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: There is probably a tax on that, too.

Senator Buckwold: That's for sure.

Senator Doody: Question!

Senator Simard: Question!

Senator Buckwold: You guys are making speeches.

Senator Hastings: A Mr. Kenneth Emberley from Winnipeg appeared on his own behalf, and I suppose he did not know what he was talking about either.

> Mr. Chairman, I am a private citizen appearing on my own behalf and on behalf of many thousands of people who have not come to your meetings but who share my ideas. Mr. Chairman, it is good to see you personally 18 years later.

In the City of Regina, a private citizen who came before us was Ms. Margaret Durant, and she told us:

> I appreciate being able to present my simple brief. I am appearing before this committee because I am a concerned citizen, and I feel that the GST is the wrong route to go in taxation.
> Honourable Sidney Buckwold and other members of the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I wish to submit some views to you on the proposed goods and services tax, Bill C-62.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Give us a conclusion or something.

Senator Simard: They are regrouping now.

Senator Hastings: Ms. Margaret Durant of Saskatchewan, put her views before us. She said:

> While the proposed goods and services tax has been presented as a means of overcoming the federal budget deficit, this will not reduce the deficit. It will increase inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

Funny, she agrees completely with the premiers.

[Senator Hastings.]

> It will increase the cost of all taxable goods and services to consumers. Since interest rates will rise, there will be an interest in the cost of borrowing in order to buy essential items such as clothing, soap, bus passes, household repairs, toothpaste, books, newspapers, stamps, furniture and utilities. Another point is that taxpayers will be paying the GST on all tax creating a burden on low income earners and particularly for pensioners who wish to remain in their own homes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No tax credits?

Senator Hastings:

> Because of increased costs to many businesses, such as restaurants, owners will be paying the GST on all their overhead as well as charging customers the GST on meals. They will likely be faced with reduced incomes and possible bankruptcies. They will either reduce the number of people they employ or, if they do go bankrupt, become unemployed themselves. Many other businesses such as bookstores and specialty shops will be faced with the same situation.
>
> Wood Gundy investment brokerage states that the goods and services tax "far from being the hidden agenda for deficit reduction that many fear, we believe that the balance on risks on the fiscal side is that the GST package, together with its indirect economic effects will be deficit increasing".
> What happens to the unemployed who must live on unemployment insurance or their dwindling savings, or, worst, still on welfare? What is the future for other people living on fixed incomes—for example, pensioners? In fact, what will happen to low and middle income families? How will all those groups cope when they find themselves paying GST on bus passes, clothes, soap and many other essential goods and services? Are many people to be deprived of knowledge because they cannot buy such items as newspapers and books since the GST puts these items out of their reach? Here I refer to those on fixed incomes and all low income earning families.
> Instead of making life unbearable for poor people, let us look at a fairer tax system. Instead of creating bookkeeping nightmares for small business people and farmers because of the GST, let us look at other alternatives. Although there are promises of tax rebates for people whose incomes fall below a certain level and there are rebates to businesses and farmers, let us look at some alternatives that would reduce the deficit without increasing inflation and interest rates, which will increase employment, not decrease it.

• (0500)

> These alternatives are to establish a royal commission to redesign our tax system based on a progressive formula and based on one's ability to pay. Bring in a green tax to discourage the production and the use of environmentally hazardous goods.

Ms. Durant concluded by stating:

> Finally, I call upon the Senate committee to prepare a straightforward public referendum so the people of Canada can declare their opposition to this very regressive goods and services tax, as they did on April 7th and 9th, and which they are doing through petitions to the senate, to the government, and to the opposition parties.

Another man who appeared before the committee was Mr. Don McGregor. Mr. McGregor decided it was time to speak out.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What city was that?

Senator Hastings: The city of Regina.

It is a beautiful city.

Senator Buckwold: If we had more people it would be the largest city in Canada.

Senator Hastings: Moving along, honourable senators, I want to cover all the cities. I would like to move to Edmonton. Mr. Lawrence Alexander stated:

> As originally understood, the GST was to slay the deficit. However, Michael Wilson explained that it would be used to replace the hidden manufacturers' sales tax and hence would be revenue neutral. This puzzled the taxpayers. How could the GST reduce the deficit if it was revenue neutral? The government appeared reluctant to supply the answer which was mainly that the GST would tax a far wider range of things than the MST, specifically the enormous and growing service industry which had never really been directly taxed before.
> An argument put up by supporters of the GST is that it is discretionary, that is, you can avoid the tax by deciding not to make the purchase or not to use the services. Theoretically, this is possible. But the idea is of limited value. Under GST, fuels such as gas and heating oil are taxable. Anyone living in Canada who suggests purchase of gas or heating oil is "discretionary" has obviously spent a lot of time in steam heated Ottawa offices with someone else paying the heating bill.
> The GST process is full of refunds. Low income families are to receive a refund to make up for having to pay the GST. Supporters of the GST claim such families will be better off under the GST. However, opponents using different and probably just as accurate statistics claim that this is an illusion. The way in which it is proposed to pay these refunds is open to some question. Refunds are to be paid in advance, using last year's or some other figures as a base. This appears a good deal like buying support for the GST, essentially with the taxpayers' own money. You take it away a little bit at a time over several months, then you give it back in a lump sum in a highly visible form—look dad, a present from the government.

Therefore, most Canadians understand the tax credits fairly well.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Tell them to send the cheque back.

Senator Hastings: Most of them understand it for what it is, bribing them with their own money. Mr. Alexander further stated:

> A GST fallacy is that a lower rate confers a benefit on the taxpayer. A few months ago as a special favour Michael lowered the rate from 9 percent to 7 percent. This was achieved mostly by raising other taxes, while leaving in place most of the basic faults of the GST. The whole process takes on the aspect of an elaborate shell game. Whether the rate is 9 per cent or 3 per cent, most of the faults of the GST are still present. Nor has the government guaranteed that the rate will remain at 7 per cent.

That, honourable senators, was some of the evidence in Edmonton. I think I have given a fairly good indication of the innovation of Senator Buckwold in seeking the views of the Canadian citizen. Never before have we had occasion to receive input from the people of Canada as we have with respect to this tax. I have been in this chamber for twenty-five years and seen a lot of legislation. I have attempted to indicate the participation of the public. As I said, in the twenty-five years I have been here I have never had occasion to see the public become so involved in an issue. Perhaps the capital punishment issue came close, but nothing has ever transpired which has seen the Canadian population rise up as they have done with respect to this tax. Some of the views that have been expressed are very cogent and relevant.

I wish to put on the record a letter from Motor Truck, Canada's largest and most influential truck fleet magazine, which states, in part:

> Senator Hastings, you folks are doing a tremendous job in stymieing the GST which most Canadians despise. Motor Truck Magazine has also taken a firm stand against the GST. We are forwarding more than eight hundred petitions from our readers showing our disgust with this proposed tax to the Liberal Senate Leader, Allan MacEachen.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am honoured to follow a colleague like Senator Hastings, and, earlier on, Senator Bosa, who have both done noble work in the debate on the GST. Senator Hastings was one of the senators who travelled across the country and heard the evidence of a number of people. I believe he was present at almost all of the meetings. One of the determinations that we in the Opposition made when this whole issue started was that we wanted to hear from the people of Canada. We did that. In the remarks that Senator Hastings made earlier, he put on the record a number of things that the people of Canada said about this tax.

I wish to place on the record some of the things that the native people of Canada have been saying about this tax. Some of the native groups made presentations to the committee. In making their presentation to the committee, they did not always get all their points on the record; so perhaps I will put some things on the record this morning which do not apear in the committee's record.

From the presentations made by our groups, and from some of those among our people with whom I have spoken, it is obvious there are many concerns about the tax. The largest concern of some of them is that it was contrary to the treaties. I am an Okanagan Indian from British Columbia and not a treaty Indian. I wish we had made some treaties. However, not having made a treaty, I am not as conversant with the treaties as are a number of my colleagues across the way. Senator Twinn is a treaty Indian and chief of a treaty area, and I am sure he would know a lot more about the intricacies of treaties than I do. But I want to put on the record here some things that have been said. I am going to quote statements made by the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs. They made a presentation to the committee; in their covering letter they said:

● (0515)

> The Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs is a political organization representing the 61 First Nation communities of Manitoba. We worked together with those communities on common issues and concerns. One common issue was the proposed goods and services tax, and the resulting concern of the Aboriginal people of Manitoba with respect to that proposed tax.
> Our concern derives not only from the implications of the tax, but also from the fact that its consequences for Aboriginal people have received such cursory attention by the Department of Finance. Minimal or no consultation has taken place with the Aboriginal people, and in our minds the government has, in its handling of the proposed tax, once more demonstrated the same lack of concern for the rights and concerns of First Nations and Aboriginal people as is demonstrated in the recent process to amend the Constitution.
> Our presentation will outline our concern about the effects of the tax on Aboriginal consumers, Aboriginal businesses, First Nation communities and the various organizations in these communities. We have made tentative arrangements with the clerk of the committee—

I do not think I need to put that on the record. It refers to housekeeping matters that needed attention.

In their presentation they say:

> Our concerns with the proposed goods and services tax derive not only from the implications of the tax, but also from the fact that its consequences for Aboriginal people have received such cursory attention by the Department of Finance. We have not been consulted in any consistent way. In our minds the government has, in its handling of the proposed tax, once more demonstrated the same lack of concern for the rights and concerns of First Nations and Aboriginal peoples as it demonstrated in connection with the recent process to amend the constitution.
> The position of registered Indians and Indian bands, Aboriginal businesses and other First Nation entities with respect to taxation is a complex area where current policies and practices are inconsistent. This is the result of a fundamental lack of recognition of the distinct character of First Nations and Aboriginal peoples and of our special relationship with the federal and provincial levels of government.
> One aspect of that special relationship is our treaty in Aboriginal rights to be exempt from federal and provincial taxation. Section 87 of the Indian Act explicitly exempts registered Indians and Indian bands from taxation of property on reserves or income deriving from such property.
> In spite of this, there has not evolved a policy of general tax exemption for registered Indians and Indian bands. There is not general provision to exempt our people and communities from taxation by virtue of their Aboriginal status. This is, in our minds, one further example of how uncertain and unspecified the legal position of First Nation communities and registered Indians still remains. Instead, various interpretive modes are being used with respect to the Income Tax Act; the intent of the Indian Act is interpreted to mean that income earned on a reserve was not to be taxed.
> Indian bands are also being treated as municipalities with respect to the federal Income Tax Act. The current federal manufacturers' sales tax, MST, does not allow any general exemption for First Nation communities or Aboriginal people. Individual Indians or Indian bands that manufacture goods that are taxable under the MST may, however, claim a tax exemption based on section 87 of the Indian Act.

On the other hand, in the act regulating the federal sales tax of telecommunication services—that is services on Indian reserves—are being explicitly exempt. Consequently, Aboriginal people, also those living on reserves, are currently paying the manufactures' tax to the extent that it is included in the price of goods bought by Aboriginal people. This is a very unsatisfactory state of affairs.

The current proposal certainly does nothing to help clarify the standing of First Nation peoples regarding taxation. The only mention of Indians and Indian bands in the official documentation concerning the GST is contained in the technical paper submitted to the House of Commons prior to the introduction of the final proposal.

In chapter 10 of the technical paper reference is being made to section 87 of the Indian Act. It also says that, given that the legal liability for the GST rests on the purchaser, at the minimum, Indian purchases of goods on reserves will not be taxed. The technical paper states that the taxation of services under the GST raises issue of interpretation regarding section 87 of the Indian Act and that further work is required in this area.

The actual proposal, Bill C-62, contains no reference whatsoever to the standing of First Nation communities, registered Indians and Aboriginal businesses and organizations. Should we therefore conclude that our treatment under the tax is to be determined on the basis of the technical paper and as a matter of administrative practice rather than as a bit of principle and policy?

We think the government has been negligent and arrogant in its handling of Aboriginal peoples generally and specifically in relation to the proposed tax. We want the special position of Aboriginal peoples to be recognized. We resent being painted as a residual problem or to have our nations and communities treated as municipalities or as charitable organizations for tax purposes, when in fact they are not.

Although many aboriginal enterprises may be entitled to special treatment under the GST by virtue of the line of business they are in, we want Aboriginal businesses on reserves to have special treatment on the basis of their Aboriginal status and not according to the particular industry they represent.

I will now deal with concerns we have about the impact of the tax. I will also present the Assembly's views of how the overriding principle of Aboriginal tax exemption as a matter of Aboriginal and treaty rights translates into the treatment of Aboriginal peoples under the proposed goods and services tax.

We are concerned about how the tax will affect Aboriginal consumers, Aboriginal businesses, First Nation communities and the various organizations in these communities. One further concern is how the introduction of the goods and services tax will affect the level of prices. In many First Nation communities, retail business is concentrated to a single outlet. Particularly in remote areas the level of price is already high due to a monopolistic retail structure and high transportation costs. It is of vital importance that Aboriginal people be involved in monitoring the effects of the proposed GST on the level of prices.

We will first briefly review how we view the proposed tax and how it conforms to the general thrust of the government's tax policies.

The proposed goods and services tax is a kind of value-added tax which is charged directly to the consumer, the seller being responsible for collecting the tax. The seller in its turn is allowed deductions for tax paid on inputs. The GST is to be levied on a wider range of items than the tax it will replace—the manufacturers' sales tax. The government claims that the tax is revenue neutral: that is, it will raise the same amount as the existing manufacturers' tax in spite of the lower rate. This will be accomplished through a broader tax base that will include both manufactured goods and services.

The effect is that the tax burden will shift from corporate taxpayers to consumers by an estimated $9 billion. To soften the impact of rising prices on consumers with low and average income, the government proposes tax credits. The value of these credits will be eroded by inflation as they will only be adjusted for a rate of inflation exceeding 3 per cent. The implication of this is that if the average yearly price increase is 5 per cent, compensation is only given for 2 per cent. In eight years a tax credit of $100 will thus only be worth less than $80. As we see it, the tax reform is but one part of a fiscal program that aims to reduce tax revenue from corporate sources and to increase it from private citizens.

Since 1982 the corporate share of direct taxation has diminished from 24 per cent to 16 per cent. To this you can add the lavish tax rates being enjoyed by corporations in the form of write-offs, various deductions and mechanisms for tax referrals. They have been estimated at a minimum of $4 billion a year. This makes it abundantly clear that the burden for financing the federal budget is being shifted over to private persons from corporations. In spite of the proposed tax being lower than the one it replaces, the broader tax base is generally supposed to raise prices. By how much, no one seems able to foretell. We can, however, be certain that the new GST will further reduce the standard of living for persons with lower and middle income and persons on fixed incomes. A disproportionate share of Aboriginal people are in that situation.

The Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs opposes that registered indians should be charged with this tax in the first place. The technical paper suggests that only the sales of goods on reserves should be exempt. In fact, this would discriminate against those reserve residents who only have access to a retail outlet outside their community. The fact is that many of our people cannot find employment or otherwise make a living in their First Nations communities. They are forced to move to urban cities where too many also face difficulties. Aboriginal people constitute a disproportionate share of the urban poor in this country. They should also not have to pay the proposed goods and services tax.

We do not want, and we will not accept, a system where some of our people are spared the tax and some are not. We do not need this artificial categorization which in the end will be divisive for our people. We think that as by virtue of our treaty and aboriginal rights, no registered Indian should have to pay this tax.

● (0530)

Indian bands and other organizations on Indian reserves should also be exempt from paying the proposed goods and services tax. With reference to the Aboriginal and treaty rights of our people not to be taxed on a reserve, all goods and services sold in a First Nations' community should be zero-rated. The implication of having purchases zero-rated is that they will be cheaper than if the tax were applied or if they were exempt from tax. A dealer that sells zero-rated products can claim a refund on tax paid to a previous dealer or to the producer. The consumer is also not to be charged any tax.

Moreover, the sale of goods and services produced or originating in a First Nations' community should also be zero-rated irrespective of the legal status of the producing entity. Currently, incorporated businesses in a First Nations' community are not exempt from paying the manufacturers' sales tax. Incorporated businesses in First Nations' communities should also be zero-rated for the proposed GST. This would be in line with our rights and would also benefit the economic development of these communities.

We should not need to remind you of the need to enhance the economic base of First Nations' communities, many of which have unemployment rates of up to 90 per cent. Any non-Aboriginal region or community with a similar level of unemployment would give rise to a massive program of special measures. The zero-rated goods and services produced in a First Nations' community would help these communities develop the economic base that is so sorely needed.

As indicated in the beginning of this presentation, Aboriginal peoples are worried about the effects of the proposed goods and services tax on the prices we will have to pay for the necessities of every-day living. It is essential that the effects of the proposed goods and services tax on prices be closely monitored. Given the special situation in many First Nations' communities, this monitoring is particularly important. We want representatives of First Nations' communities to be involved in the monitoring process and request that special funds be provided for this purpose.

They go on to say:

We request that our Aboriginal and treaty rights to be exempt from federal taxation be respected. In terms of the proposed goods and services tax, this means that registered Indians should be exempt from paying the tax on their purchases, not only on reserves but everywhere. Also, Indian bands and other organizations on a reserve should be exempt from paying the tax. Moreover, sales on reserves should be zero-rated as well as the sale of goods and services originating on a reserve.

That is just the summation, and that covers what the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs had to say to the committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Very good.

Senator Marchand: What is your problem?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is a good presentation. I enjoyed it.

Senator Marchand: It was not mine, although I wish that it were.

Here is another presentation by the Assembly of First Nations made to the committee on June 6, 1990. They said, in part:

Some competing and powerful interests have succeeded in influencing the outcome of sales tax reform to suit their political, economic and social desires. All businesses under this bill will be free from tax liability when thousands are liable now. Other interests have failed to influence the bill. Suffice it to say that the legislation is not neutral, and does not treat everyone and every interest the same. It could no more ignore these realities than it can ignore constitutional realities. For example, no lands or property of Canada or the provinces is liable to tax. The federal government professes the tax fairness, simplicity, visibility, reliability and economic vitality. The great tax debate is only drowned out by Meech Lake.

Absent in the tax reform and public debate is whether sales tax reform and the legislation flowing from it protects aboriginal and treaty rights and interests. Our informed view is that Bill C-62 is a serious infringement of our rights protected under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Our further view is that the federal government has failed to exercise its solemn duties to uphold our rights and freedoms arising from the special trust relationship created by history, treaties and legislation.

We will speak to these matters in the course of our presentation. First, however, let us make one early point. Our taxation relationship is unique and while successive governments have broken their solemn promises to our nations and whittled away at our blanket relief from outside taxation, our tax immunity remains as true today as it was when earlier federal laws safeguarded the imposition of taxes.

There is no doubt about the existence of these rights. It is foolish and a breach of our relationship and rights to ignore them. Bills like the one before you must make clear the legislative intent of Parliament when it comes to our rights and interests, yet the bill is completely silent when it comes to us. Can you honestly say you know what the legislation means to 500,000 First Nations peoples, businesses, travel organizations, governments, their territories and resources? Do you know that when we say tax relief, this means point of sale relief and not a refund?

Before you answer these questions, think about what your Supreme Court said in its recent judgment in the Sparrow case dealing with aboriginal rights.

> Our history has shown, unfortunately all too well, that Canada's aboriginal peoples are justified in worrying about government objectives that may be superficially neutral, but which constitute de facto threats to the existence of aboriginal rights and interests.

Let us now move to why we know our rights and interests are infringed, without justification, by the federal government's Bill C-62. We have in our possession a recent legal memorandum from the Department of Justice to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which states:

[Senator Marchand.]

> As suggested in the briefing note, it is the view of the Department of Justice that the Indian tax exemption is derived solely from the Indian Act and does not exist as a treaty right.

This is the same Department of Justice that contests our aboriginal and treaty rights and their existence at every occasion; the same department that lost major legal battles in the Nowegijick, Guerin, Sioui and Sparrow cases, all of which are of historical legal importance and relevance here.

It is very evident to us—and we say this with due consideration—that the Department of Justice is anti-aboriginal rights and anti-treaty rights. They are certainly not the ones to devise legislative policy towards us. They will do so without legislative clarity. Bad opinions will become policy. Our dialogue with the Department of Finance on the GST so far confirms this observation. Finance officials have stated as much to us; this despite evidence, First Nations' presentations in the past few months to Finance, and Supreme Court rulings to the contrary.

There are many historical legal agreements such as the Royal Proclamation of 1763, Treaty 8 and other treaties such as the 1760 treaty with the Hurons, recognizing the free exercise of trade, that guarantee our tax immunity. It therefore does not take too long to realize that we are dealing with aboriginal and treaty rights. Our tax relief reflects, among other things, respect for our self-governing nations and our willingness to equitably share our lands and resources. Even if there was some doubt as to their existence, it must be noted that the Supreme Court has ruled that treaties and statutes related to First Nations must be liberally construed and uncertainties resolved in our favour.

Let us look quickly at the probably damaging consequences of the bill in the absence of clear First Nations tax policy. Remember here, too, that the GST is a direct tax on the purchasers, unlike the MST. The exercise of aboriginal land treaty rights may be taxed through the mandatory purchase of items for, and services such as hunting, fishing and camping. There are also camping licences . . . .

Goods and services—predominantly bought off the federal reserve lands by 300,000 reserve inhabitants, because we have very few businesses on these lands, may be taxed. Two hundred thousand First Nations people living off reserve lands, many only recently reinstated or eligible for Indian status, may be taxed on goods and services. First Nations governments and travel organizations providing services may be taxed on their purchases. Commercial activities on First Nations territories and the use of our national resources may be taxed. There may be loss of statutory tax exemptions now in existing federal statutes and the eventual loss of the few tax exemptions now found in provincial statutes.

These real probabilities will, of course, be resisted by First Nations politically and legally, but what does this say about the federal commitment to protecting our rights and its solemn promises. It certainly speaks volumes to the underhanded way in which tax policy is designed for us.

We also reject the assertion in the Minister of Finance's technical paper that our people will benefit substantially from the enriched GST credit as well as relief from GST directly. It is well known that most of our people do not participate in the tax system . . . .

It is well known that most of our people do not participate in the tax system and will therefore not benefit from credits to entice us into the tax system. This, despite our low personal incomes, 54 per cent of the Canadian average, and poor social, physical and economic conditions. While Canadians have benefited greatly from the sharing of our lands and resources, we have not benefited.

We refer you to our Budget in Grief sent to all of you this spring for more information on our conditions. To make my point clear, the scale and depth of aboriginal poverty is horrible. If trends continue, by the end of this year, 1990, an estimated 337,000 out of 510,905 First Nations children, women and men will live on social assistance. We have been impeded legislatively from enjoying the benefits of our rights. This cannot continue.

● (0545)

Again, it seems we must give up more rights and benefits to accommodate government objectives that are out of step with our realities, and which infringe on our blanket relief from taxation and will, therefore, throw Canada-First Nations relations into unwarranted, avoidable and costly disputes.

We do not deserve such shabby treatment. We have made our recommendations to the Standing Committee on Finance and to federal officials with little or no effect. We have tried unsuccessfully to meet with the Minister of Finance to resolve differences and clarify the constitutional matters at issue for ten months now. We have asked the Prime Minister to intervene. All this in pursuit of clear and straightforward answers to unsettled taxation matters.

I do not know if the AFN has since met with the Minister of Finance, but I know that members of the FSI, Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations, met with Mr. Wilson, and they set up a process under which they are going to continue meeting in order to sort out some of these tax difficulties. Is this too much to ask when accommodations can be made to non-First Nations' interests for economic, cashflow and administrative reasons?

In the best interests of our rights and in the clear absence of parliamentary intent towards us in this bill, we urge you to send this incomplete and unconstitutional bill back to the House of Commons and strongly recommend to them to settle the outstanding issues with us that are now open to questions and, in so doing, remind the federal government to settle them in the spirit and intent of our special relationship and in keeping with our Aboriginal and treaty rights that are protected by the Constitution.

This is the only legitimate and fair way to proceed. Anything less would only add to the legacy of mistreatment and neglect of our hard- and long-fought rights and of our unique place in Confederation. We believe you will want to depart from this dishonourable history. Take a stand now.

I wanted to put this on the record. I see Senator Molgat is prepared to speak, and, honourable senators, I will let him proceed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Marchand for yielding the floor to me at this time. The debate in which we are now involved is probably one that will have the greatest effect on the pocketbooks of small taxpayers in this country, which is the reason our group is opposing the imposition of this tax. It is regressive and will work against the very people who need the greatest help in Canada.

In general, I prefer an income tax based on an ability to pay. However, I recognize that the income tax system, as it is presently structured, is an imperfect tool to measure properly ability to pay. The individuals who end up paying the greatest amount of tax compared to their actual income are those who are on straight payroll and straight salary. They have no exemptions. The tax is removed before they see it. Their final paycheque already has the tax taken off. Unfortunately, in many instances they do not realize the full amount of tax they are paying. Yes, it is shown on the cheque stub, but one does not tend to pay that much attention to it compared with the amount of take-home pay. They have no exemptions they can claim and, hence, pay the full tax. Others in our society are not in that same category. Others are making gains of various sorts that are not taxable. So the people who are on a straight payroll are the ones who pay the greatest amount of tax.

Because of that, to make the income tax system fully equitable—we might end up with more costs than are warranted—it is reasonable to look to other taxes. I can, under certain circumstances, agree to a consumption tax. There is no doubt that a consumption tax would reach some of the people that income tax does not. Those people who did not pay tax on the money they made would have to pay tax when they used their money. They would be participating in the tax system at the time they used the money they earned, but on which they may not necessarily have paid income tax. So it would reach those people which presently the income tax system does not.

There would have to be some basic elements in a consumption tax in Canada to make it fair. In my view, this particular proposal by the government does not contain those elements. The first element of a consumption tax is that it must adequately protect the people at the bottom of the earning bracket, that there be full exemption for those people with low incomes and, obviously, that the exemption be indexed. Yet the government, in this particular case, is not agreeable to doing that. Indeed, during the course of this debate, honourable friends opposite have voted against a measure that would fully index the tax. This surely is a most reasonable request and something that the people at the bottom end of the bracket need if the tax is going to contain any element of fairness.

People who are earning between $20,000 and $30,000 should have their rebates fully indexed. Why should that first 3 per cent be removed year by year from the very people who need help the most? Yet my honourable friends opposite have stubbornly opposed any change which would reflect that basic first step in establishing a reasonable tax system. Accepting that we need a consumption tax, how can they refuse to protect the people at the bottom end of the scale who will be paying the tax proportionate to their income in much greater amounts than those at the higher end, including honourable senators in the Senate? How can we consider it fair that someone earning $30,000 would not be fully protected? In my view, that is the first element in a reasonable and fair consumption tax.

Next, Canada, with its geographical differences and great distances, has nine provinces and two territories, which may evolve into provincial status, now charging a sales tax; and a tenth province with no sales tax. I know that my friends opposite, and those who support the GST, point to France, Britain and other countries around the world that have VAT or a consumption tax. But there is a big difference in those countries. They are unitary states. They do not have provinces with their own sales tax systems. Canada is a different type of country. We have nine provinces levying a sales tax. Now we are going to impose a new federal sales tax on top of that existing sales tax system. Surely it would make sense for us to coordinate the federal and provincial taxes.

That is what we have done with the income tax system. Provinces can levy a certain amount of income tax, but they do not proceed to have a separate collection system. We have made an arrangement whereby the federal tax is the basic tax. The federal system collects the tax, and the provinces, with one exception, have the tax collected for them. They decide what their rate is going to be, and it can vary from province to province, but it involves one collection system.

What is the government proposing in this case? It has stubbornly refused to make an agreement with the provinces. Why is that the case? The government initiated certain conversations with the provinces, and my understanding was that they had achieved a certain degree of success. They were not in total agreement, but they were making progress. Suddenly the federal minister, Mr. Wilson, announced that he was withdrawing from the discussions, to the surprise, as far as I know, of the provinces. It was a political decision by Mr. Wilson. He did not feel that the discussions with the provinces were moving ahead quickly enough. He was super-anxious to get the federal sales tax implemented. Why? I suspect he was anxious to have it implemented well before the next election, and if further discussions with the provinces had continued, he might have found himself imposing the tax another year or two years down the line, which, in his view, might affect the electoral chances of the government.

I submit that is not a sound basis on which to establish a tax system in this country. We should have continued discussions with the provinces and arrived at one tax system or one collection system that would be implemented across the country. The provinces could vary the amount of tax they wanted to levy. If some provinces wanted 4 per cent, that would be the case; and, if some provinces wanted 6 per cent, they would have that option.

● (0600)

The federal government would have its basic tax, but no. Suddenly, Mr. Wilson decided that he would go it alone. What are we going to be faced with now? Well, we are going to be faced with a very complicated double-tax system, with the provinces having a sales tax and the federal government having a sales tax. I find it difficult to believe that my friends opposite really believe that that is the best way to go. It does not make any sense, in a country like ours, to impose a double collection system for the purpose of collecting a sales tax.

The very minimum should have been to make an agreement with the provinces, but no. The federal government chose to try to impose on Canadians this extremely costly tax, and I hope we will be able to defeat it.

We should really be revising our whole thinking in this matter. There is general agreement that the present manufacturers' sales tax has many defects, but not necessarily defects that cannot be corrected. We could proceed to correct some of them now. In any case, for the government to say what terrible defects there are in the tax is a little surprising when one considers that when the government first came to office the tax was at 9 per cent and it has increased it steadily since then to 13.5 per cent. To now suddenly decide that it is a terrible tax makes one wonder what the government has been doing for the past eight years as it increased the tax steadily. However, that having been said, it would be possible to improve the federal sales tax while we are dealing with the provinces to arrive at a rational sales tax system with the provinces.

[Senator Molgat.]

The federal sales tax could continue for another year or two, but improved. I do not know how many enterprises in this country collect the sales tax—perhaps 60,000, 80,000, 100,000; it may even be 200,000 or even half a million—but I know it is a lot easier to deal with amendments to a tax, where you have a finite number of people, than to change a tax or bring in a new tax like the proposed GST, which will affect every Canadian. The whole 26 million of us will to be affected by the GST, and the changes in it will have an immediate effect on us; whereas, under the present federal tax, we are dealing with a series of corporations, and, in my view, it would be much easier to make the adjustments.

So it is not a case of where the government absolutely has to move by January 1—at least not from the viewpoint of economics. The economics of the country are such that we could continue for another year with the present federal sales tax. We could improve it in that period of time and we could be dealing with the provinces to arrive at a sensible system. The reason for the rush to January 1 is a political agenda, not an economic agenda, for this country. Indeed, one might well wonder what is the connection between that tax and the so-called Free Trade Agreement. Were there any promises made to the Americans that we would do such a thing? I do not know. In any case, I do not see the great rush to impose the tax by January 1. We could carry on for another year. That would give us time to arrive at a sensible tax system, and, in particular, to allow us to mesh whatever we are going to do at the federal level with what the provinces are doing.

Canadians reject this additional great federal bureaucracy. The government talks a great deal about reducing expenses. Well, this is one area where it could certainly do so. There is no question that we could arrive at a simpler tax system. There is no question but that we could, with some concessions on both sides, arrive at an acceptable agreement with the provinces.

During the course of the work of our Banking, Trade and Commerce committee which studied the tax, a number of different proposals and suggestions were made for different taxes. I should like to deal with one of them. I am not saying that it is the final conclusion or that it does not need some further study—I believe it does—but I think it is at least worth examining, along with some other systems that have been proposed. The one that I am interested in at the moment, and which I think is at least deserving of some study by the Senate and by Canadians, is the proposal for the single tax by Mr. Dennis Mills.

I should like to read into the record some of the proposals. Perhaps I should start with the introduction to The Single Tax. This in an introduction by Mr. J. Lyman MacInnis, the past President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario and of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and a member of the Canadian Tax Foundation. Mr. MacInnis is well-known, therefore, in his profession. He holds the Queen's Jubilee Medal, for outstanding contribution to the profession, and the National Business Writing Award. He is the author of numerous articles and books, and certainly is not a newcomer to the tax field. Here is what Mr. MacInnis has to say in the introduction to the book, The Single Tax:

> There are three fundamental tests which an income tax system must meet in order to achieve its goals effectively. It must be fair, efficient and understandable.

If I might add a personal comment, I think that honourable senators could make those same comments about the GST. It should be essentially fair, which the present proposal is not, as it does not index people at the bottom end of the income bracket. It should be efficient, which the present proposal by the government is not, because it superimposes, on top of present provincial systems, another sales tax—surely not an efficient system. As Mr. MacInnis says, it should be understandable. Well, let me tell you, from everything I have been able to find out, this proposed tax is certainly not one that could be classified as understandable.

I have a number of letters in that regard which I perhaps should read into the record. They have to do with a request that was made to me many months ago—in fact, I think it started in October of last year—by a gentleman, in what was my old provincial constituency, who has a small laundromat in a rural village in Manitoba. He asked me if he was going to be subject to the GST and how he was to collect it, because his laundromat is a coin-operated one. He was concerned as to whether his laundromat would be affected. This goes back to October of 1989. On October 19, 1989, I wrote the following letter:

> Information Services
> Department of Finance Canada
> L'Esplanade Laurier
> 140 O'Connor Street
> OTTAWA, Ontario, K1A 0G5
> Dear Sir/Madam:
>
> Re: General Sales Tax
> I have been asked by the operator of a small coin operated laundromat in rural Manitoba, how the proposed tax would function in his case.
> Would he have to collect tax? How could he collect it?
>
> I will be pleased to hear from you at your convenience.
>
> Sincerely yours,
> Gildas Molgat.

Some time went by and I did not hear from the Information Services; so, on January 24, 1990, about three months later, I again wrote to the Information Services of the Department of Finance, as follows:

> Dear Sir/Madam:
>
> I enclose a copy of my letter of 19 October to which I have received no reply.
>
> My letter did say "... at your convenience" but I did not expect that would mean more than three months.
> I look forward to hearing from you.

Well, at the end of February, or the beginning of March, I still had not heard, despite my second request. So, on March 5, 1990, I decided that, obviously, the Information Services of the Department of Finance did not know how the GST was going to apply, so it was better that I go to the source—and I wrote to the Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario. This is now my third letter, the first one being in October. I said:

> Dear Mr. Minister:
> I enclose copies of my letters to your department of 19 October, 1989, and the follow up of 24 January, 1990.
>
> To this date, I have heard nothing from them.
>
> I do not like to bother you on what seems such a small matter but I find it inconceivable that your department cannot answer.

Finally, on July 19, again several months later, I received this letter:

> Hon. Gildas L. Molgat
> Senator—Ste. Rose, Manitoba
> Deputy Speaker of the Senate
> Ottawa, Ontario
> K1A 0A4
> Dear Senator Molgat

Let us remember that the first request for information was on October 19 and we are now at July 19 of the following year:

> I am writing with respect to your letters of October 19, 1989 and January 24, 1990 regarding concerns expressed by the operator of a laundromat in connection with the proposed Goods and Services Tax (GST) and its application to coin-operated laundromat services. Please excuse the delay in replying. My department normally operates an efficient system for managing correspondence. In this case, it appears to have failed us both.

• (0615)

As an aside, it certainly has, but it is also not indicative of much knowledge within the department. The letter continues:

> It may interest the operator to know that the existing federal sales tax, which has been in place since 1924, will yield about $700 million in federal revenues from Manitoba residents this year. Under the GST, they will actually pay less.
> The existing federal sales tax limits our output by some $9 billion a year, at the expense of income and jobs for Canadians. Replacing it with the GST will enhance our competitive position and provide a major stimulus to economic growth—a $300 million increase in real output in Manitoba. At the same time, the GST will improve the overall fairness of the tax system.
> Unlike the existing tax which is imposed at multiple rates on only one third of all goods and services consumed in Canada, the GST will apply at a lower uniform rate and to most goods and services. As you know, the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, which held extensive public hearings on sales tax reform, also recommended that the GST be broad-based. Consistent with this principle, the GST will apply to coin-operated laundromat services.

Lo and behold, in reply to a letter which I first wrote on October 19, followed up again in January, followed up again in March directly to the Minister, and what do I get? A whole page of reply where there is not a single word referring to my questions, but a lot of propaganda from the department about what a great tax this will be. However, not a word about my request, now repeated three times. It is only on page two that they first get around to even recognizing that I asked for information about coin-operated laundromats. After stating that it will apply, the next paragraph of the letter states:

> However, all vendors of goods and services who charge GST on their sales will be entitled to recover the GST paid on their business inputs, that is, all the goods and services they acquire to operate their businesses. This is a substantial improvement over the current system in which federal sales tax is hidden in the price of business inputs and, hence, adds to their cost of doing business.

Another paragraph of propaganda, but still no reply to my question.

Finally, here is the simple answer to my friend who is trying to figure out what he is going to do with his laundromat operations in McCreary, Manitoba:

> With regard to coin operated laundromat machines, the GST will be 7/107ths of the total amount collected from the machine. For purposes of calculating their net tax of either remittances or refunds, laundromat operators will be deemed to have collected GST on their sales on the day on which they remove money from the machines.
> Once again, thank you for your letters. I trust my comments have been helpful. You might wish to forward the enclosed explanatory material about the GST.
>
> Yours sincerely,
>
> Brian Carter
>
> for Joel Weiner, Director
> Consultations and Public Affairs.

That is the response to my friend who operates a small laundromat in McCreary, Manitoba: "With regard to coin-operated laundromat machines, the GST will be 7/107ths of the total amount collected".

I would have thought that they might have had a suggestion as to how a small laundromat operator would collect this. People put in twenty-five cent pieces and that is it. The machines are geared for $1 or $2, whatever it may be. However, the answer from the department is that he has to collect 7/107ths. This, after eight months of correspondence, three letters, and finally having to go directly to the Minister himself, and waiting, in that case, from March 5 until July 19.

Mr. MacInnis stated in the introduction his three fundamental tests for an income tax: "Fair, efficient and understandable". If those tests are applied to the GST, I suggest that the GST is neither fair, efficient nor understandable.

This whole episode ended up in my writing to my friend, the laundromat operator, and I may as well put the letter on the record. He happens to be an old schoolmate of mine and we speak together in French.

[Translation]

This letter is in French. It is dated September 6 1990. It is addressed to Mr. Wilfrid Boiteau, P.O. Box 370, McCready, Manitoba, R0J 1B0.

> Dear Wilfrid:
>
> You have asked me that question quite a while ago—you can see that my first letter is dated October 19 1989 and that I have written other letters after that.
> I finally have an answer; five long paragraphs of propaganda and a short one saying that you will have to remit 7/107th of your sales as tax. Since it would probably cost too much to change your automatic machines to charge higher prices, you will have to pay this tax yourself.
> The Department of Revenue obviously does not know where it is going with this new tax. It took them nine months and three letters before they could answer.

GST is supposed to be a simple and direct tax! But even the minister of Revenue cannot answer a very simple question in nine months. And when the officials finally answer, is there any sense to be made out of their letter? They tell a businessman:

> You will hae to remit 7/107th of yours sales as tax.

So that is an indication of that new system which is certainly not easy to understand.

[English]

In Mr. MacInnis's introduction to the book The Single Tax by Mr. Dennis Mills, he continues:

> To be fair, an income tax system must ensure, to the extent possible, that taxpayers in similar circumstances pay similar amounts of tax.

Mr. MacInnis is talking about the income tax system. Let us apply the same test to the GST which my friends are proposing. I presume taxpayers in similar circumstances means taxpayers with a similar income. Surely, if that is applied to a sales tax the same rules should apply in similar circumstances.

Yet we have demonstrated clearly in this chamber that the tax does not apply to people in similar circumstances paying similar amounts of tax. We very forcefully pointed out the case of the north in the amendment proposed to exempt people in the Northwest Territories. I did not have a chance to participate in that debate. If I had, as I did in my vote, I would also have supported vocally the proposed amendment by Senator Waters. However, I would have pointed out that just to take the Northwest Territories as the barrier is not, in my view, sufficient.

In most of the provinces, certainly the three prairie provinces, and in northern Ontario and northern Quebec, we have areas that have weather conditions and problems of transport as great as some areas north of the sixtieth parallel. I would have made a plea for areas in my province such as Churchill and the northern areas. I suspect that in Churchill, the weather conditions are probably worse than in many areas further north because of the influence of the bay. I would have made a pitch to protect other areas as well.

However, be that as it may, we proposed in that amendment to put in some degree of fairness by protecting people in those northern areas who have very different problems and very different costs. If a sales tax is simply slapped on at the point of purchase, they end up paying an awful lot more than people in the rest of the country.

Some time ago I read into the record the difference in cost for an individual living in Winnipeg in the same sized house as an individual in Richmond, British Columbia. The gentleman in Winnipeg, aged 70 and now retired, would be paying $2,200 for electricity and heating. His friend living in British Columbia in the same sized house with the same size of income, would pay $600 in heating and electricity. If 7 percent is added to those costs, they produce very different results. That is the reason we proposed an amendment that electricity and heating fuels be tax exempt, in order that there would be a degree of fairness. It is totally beyond my understanding why my honourable friends opposite are not prepared to accept that type of amendment when it is essentially fair.

To return to what Mr. MacInnis stated:

> To be fair, an income tax system must ensure, to the extent possible, that taxpayers in similar circumstances pay similar amounts of tax.

I submit that the same applies insofar as the GST: That taxpayers in similar circumstances pay similar amounts of tax. The GST does not do that. The GST discriminates by virtue of being simply one flat tax applied across the country, and in circumstances which are very different across this country.

My honourable friends are moving along with a tax which may work well in England: a unitary state which is small, with basically no extremes of climate, transport conditions and communication such as we have. The same applies in France. Admittedly, the climate on the coast of Normandy is not quite as good as that on the Côte d'Azure. However, it is very different from the climate in Canada when one considers Toronto and Iqaluit. It is not the same thing. You cannot simply import a tax system from another world and say, "Oh, that is marvellous. It works in France, it works in England, and so it willwork in Canada." And then impose it.

● (0630)

Just look at some of the other countries that have federal systems such as ours. Probably the closest one is Australia. Well, has Australia adopted a VAT or a GST? It has not. New Zealand has, their neighbour, has done so, but New Zealand is not a federal state. It is a unitary state, and again a much smaller state, and again a state where the weather conditions, the transport conditions, the living conditions are not that different. Whether you live on the south island or the north island in New Zealand, it is very much the same. There is not that great a difference.

However, in talking of Australia, if you live in Brisbane, in Melbourne or up in the very northern area, or if you live in the desert, you are dealing with very different conditions, and again tremendous expanse, tremendous transport problems. So Australia has not moved at this point. I know that my friends opposite will point to a recent press story which I found very interesting, which I think was, "Liberal Senator from Australia Recommends VAT tax," or something of the sort. I am sorry I do not have that story right at hand. The problem is that "Liberal" in Australia means "Conservative." My honourable friend, Senator Doody, has dealt with the Australian delegations and I think is aware that the party that labels itself "Liberal" in Australia is indeed the conservative party. It certainly was not a proposal made by a liberal-minded individual.

The GST does not meet the test that Mr. MacInnis says . . . must ensure, to the extent possible, that taxpayers in similar circumstances pay similar amounts of tax." That will not be the case with the GST. He goes on and states that in Canada, our income tax system does not do that.

> Depending on the source of income—and I am quoting again from Mr. MacInnis at this point,

> Depending on the source of income, the ways in which it is earned, and the manner in which taxpayers arrange their affairs, Canadians may pay vastly different amounts of tax on the same amount of income.

He goes on:

> An efficient tax system must not unduly interfere with the allocation of economic resources, including both capital and labour. The Canadian tax system is fraught with special provisions to entice or discourage economic activities in particular segments of our economy—a task better left to the forces of a free market.
> But, where our system fails most miserably of all is in the test of simplicity. Income tax laws should be simple enough that most taxpayers can comply with them without professional help, and simple enough that the authorities can enforce them without undue expense, disputes and litigation. Well, our tax system is totally incomprehensible by human beings with average intelligence. It is largely incomprehensible by human beings with superior intelligence. Our tax courts are clogged with income tax cases. There is a whole industry of tax accountants and laywers dealing solely with disputes with Revenue Canada. The cost of income tax compliance is mind boggling. Our income tax laws must be simplified!

I agree with a good deal of what he says, as I said in my opening comments, I do not think our income tax system does the job that we need done in this country, but the same thing applies to the proposed GST. It must be simplified at the very minimum to a one tax system, tied in with the provinces—

[Translation]

Senator Bolduc: May I ask a question?

Senator Molgat: Certainly.

Senator Bolduc: When I was at the University of Chicago in 1952, there was a professor by the name of Henry Simmons who had written a book on a "One tax system". It was the subject of a major discussion within the university at the time. However, people eventually concluded that it was not only not efficient, but impossible to implement. I just wanted to mention that—I am going back 35 or 40 years now. It was discussed in great depth by American economists in the fifties—between 1948 and 1952. They concluded that it simply was not either feasible or practical.

Senator Molgat: Thank you for your comment, Senator, but was the proposal for a single income tax or variations on that thing?

Senator Bolduc: The economist's name was Henry Simmons.

Senator Molgat: Well, I really do not have time now to discuss it with you, but I would like to speak to you about it later, because it does interest me. I do not know whether you were here when I began my remarks, but the fact is I was not proposing that we have a single tax. I would like the income tax system to be simplified. If I really had a choice, I would opt for an income tax that affected all tax payers equally and truly reflected the individual's ability to pay, in other words, that was directly related to his income. It is the basic principle that I cannot accept in a modern system.

Senator Bolduc: But the weakness of that sytem is that you are taxing the economy's productive resources. You are taxing labour, intellectual resources, machinery, capital and everything that is productive in society, rather than taxing consumption. That is the weakness of an individual or corporate tax system. You are basically taxing everything that is productive—inputs, in other words. It seems to me that it would be much wiser, particularly since we already have an income tax system that is fairly onerous both for individuals and corporations—albeit less so for corporations. So, at some point, we simply must try to restore some sort of balance by introducing a consumption tax system, so that we will not be hitting the production side.

Senator Molgat: I really do not think your position and mine are all that dissimilar. I said initially, and I have just repeated this, that even though from a philosophical point of view, I would prefer that income tax really be based on how much an individual actually receives in income, but I realize that in a modern world, that single source of income is not adequate.

The fact is it is not always fair. Many people who currently do not pay income tax should be paying. Putting the system in place to recover that money would cost us a fortune. I am not proposing that we depend only on income tax, but rather, that we simplify it as much as possible and do whatever we can to make it more appropriate.

[Senator Molgat.]

On thing that concerns me about our current income tax system is that those who pay the most are salaried workers, people who receive a cheque every week or every two weeks. Those people pay the whole shot. They have no deductions, and indeed, they do not even see the tax, whereas many in our system are not paying their fair share, Trying to get at those people, though, would cost too much money, and that is why I agree that a consumption tax is necessary. I accept that fact. But I have also set out the conditions under which a consumption tax should be brought in. It must be applied equitably across Canada, in so far as that is possible, and it must be simple. What I do not like about this proposed tax is that we are going to have nine different provincial systems. The only province that has no consumption tax is Alberta. All the others already have a tax system in place. What I would like to see is a joint federal-provincial system, in other words, an agreement with the provinces on a single system, although the rate could vary.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: There could be just one.

Senator Molgat: The other provinces are not doing it. Right now, all the other provinces are taking the federal government to court. Alberta, for instance, is fighting the federal government in court at this time, as are the Province of British Columbia and the Province of Ontario—here are some clippings—

[English]

> Ontario to join GST court fight. Ontario's NDP government will join British Columbia and Alberta to fight the federal government's goods and services tax, Premier Bob Rae says. The provinces decided not to go it alone because the other provincial challenges are already underway, Rae said. He said the province would be intervening in the Alberta and B.C. court challenges.
> "We are going to mount a very, very strong case against attacks," Rae said as he left the cabinet meeting yesterday. "We think that the GST is interference with an important provincial jurisdiction and is not something that we can let go constitutionally without a fight."
>
> Attorney General, Howard Hampton, said Ontario will argue that by stacking the Senate, Ottawa has altered the purpose of the body which is to guarantee provincial and regional representation. He will also argue that the federal government does not have the right to impose a retail tax in Ontario.
> "Do not take the view that because we are intervening in somebody else's case, it is minor; that we are taking a minor bit part," Hampton said. "We will not be making the identical arguments that Alberta is making, nor the identical arguments that B.C. is making."
> B.C.'s court case is scheduled to start December 17 and Alberta's is expected to get to court sometime in January, he said.

[Translation]

So, I do agree that it should be simple and that we should reach some agreement with the provinces. We should delay the implementation date of this tax so that we have time to come to some arrangement with the provinces. Right now, only one province is prepared to co-operate. Three others are presently before the courts to fight this tax measure, and the majority of the other provinces—other than Newfoundland, perhap—are all opposed. So I would like the government to take the time to simplify our tax system so that we can avoid superimposing some 4,000 federal public servants onto provincial bureaucracies in order to collect what is essentially a single tax.

Senator Beaudoin: The question of tax harmonization really has nothing to do with time. It has to do with the system. If Quebec can manage to do it within the space of a few weeks, why could not the other provinces as well? I believe the provinces currently challenging the constitutionality of the federal initiative would just as soon challenge in six months time. I do not think it is a question of time. The need to harmonize the two taxation systems arises from the fact that we are part of a federation. It is a little bit more complicated, but it certainly is not impossible. But I, for one, would not conclude that this is a sufficient reason to delay the tax's implementation. As far as I am concerned, because we are part of a federal state, we must come to some agreement between the two levels of government on matters of taxation—particularly taxation such as this. But I do not think that time has anything to do with it, or that the solution is to delay the tax's implementation. The problem is simply a result of the fact that Canada has two levels of government with the power to tax. Perhaps we could make a comparison with other countries. Someone started to draw an analogy with West Germany, which is also a federation, but the fact is it may not be exactly the same there. I am certainly not trying to say that there is no problem. There is indeed a problem of harmonization; but Quebec found an appropriate solution, and I, personally, do not believe that time has anything to do with it.

Senator Molgat: Well, Senator Beaudoin, let us just say that there are two issues involved with respect to an agreement between the federal government and the provinces on the new tax. There is, of course, the constitutional question. And based on what I just read you about what the Province of Ontario has been saying, it is clear that they intend to base their arguments on the constitutional issue. And certainly, this issue must be resolved. Is it constitutional or not? That fact must be established. Having established that—and I suppose you are in a better position than I to assess the issue—I suspect that the decision will probably be that both levels of government have the right—

Senator Beaudoin: Yes, I believe so.

Senator Molgat: That is what I expect will happen. Once that has been established, we can move on to the second topic of discussion, and that is precisely where we will need time to reach an agreement. I am the first to admit that compromise will be necessary. There will have to be some give and take on both sides. But it seems to me that this process would allow us to come up with a more acceptable tax for the country as a whole and if we were to see the provincial perspective as well, I think that would be to set a direction that is precisely the one you would recommend for our Canadian federation—manely that every province should have additional rights or powers over things that affect it.

As you know, you and I do not exactly have the same view of things: You are a lot more in favour of decentralization than I. But supposing you are right—that the provinces should be more independent. If that is so, and we want to introduce this federal tax, should we not in fact be giving the provinces an opportunity to discuss this with the federal government and say: "Let us agree on a tax to be applied across Canada, but with certain variations here and there". If we took the time to have these discussions, we would end up with a tax that would be more acceptable to the country as a whole. Whereas now, three provinces are already taking the government to court, and most of the others are saying they are also against this measure. What I am saying is this: Let us just take the time to solve the constitutional issue that this raises. Once that has been solved, then we can start working on compromises that will allow us to have a workable tax.

What I am trying to say is that this precisely will take time. And we must set aside the time to do it. Unfortunatley, in the midst of discussions with the provinces, Mr. Wilson suddenly decided to put an end to them. I, myself, suspect that the reason he did this was that he was in a big hurry to get it in place, so that implementation would not be occurring too close to election time, which is in two years. I do not think it was an economic decision. The issue of how to make the proper adjustments with the provinces was really a political discussion. They felt they had to act right away because if they did not, this unpopular tax would be coming into force just before an election. That is unfortunate, but that is the reality. But I do think we should take whatever time is necessary to reach an agreement with the provinces. Otherwise, we will end up with two taxation systems and two collection systems, and heaven knows we certainly do not need that in this country. We already have too much duplication as it is.

Senator Frith: If I am not mistaken, the only country or state that has two levels of taxation is Brazil; in other words, there are other countries with a federal system—like Germany, for example—but according to my information, Brazil is the only one with two levels of taxation and two taxes. Is that right?

Senator Molgat: Senator Frith, unfortunately, I am not in a position to answer your question. I cannot say whether it is the only country or not—indeed, I must admit that I am really not aware of the situation in Brazil at all. But it is my impression that in Germany—and perhaps Senator Beaudoin could help you in this respect—the lander do not have their own consumption tax.

Senator Frith: The reason for my question is the fact that it has been noted on occasion that no other federal state has a tax like the GST, but I have since been told that that is not true and that there are some countries with a federal system—in other words, two levels of government—and a tax similar to the GST. But the combination of the two—in other words, a federal state with two levels of government and two levels of taxation—only exists in Brazil. And if my information is correct, the system does not work very well.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator Frith, for that clarification. It is really quite interesting, and I suppose our researchers from the Library could probably answer that question. Perhaps another senator would like to participate in the debate—maybe Senator Beaudoin has some information in this regard. Are there actually other federal states that have two levels of taxation? It is simply my impression that those who have established such a tax are unitary states.

I repeat that it is my impression that Germany does not have two levels of taxation, even though it is a federal state.

Senator Beaudoin, I do hope I have answered your question. Are you satisfied with my answer, Senator Tremblay?

So, we all agree! If I am not mistaken, then, the francophones agree that we can have two systems of taxation: A tax on basic income, as well as a consumption tax that is equitable, provided we have the agreement of the provinces. We are indeed making progess! I think I can probably get through my speech in a few more hours!

But to come back to what Mr. MacInnis was saying, he was in fact talking about income tax. I believe the thrust of his statement was the need for a single tax system.

I could certainly accept what my friend opposite was saying—namely, that a single tax may not work—but I do think we have to look at the one being proposed, the GST, with a view to simplifying it. Mr. MacInnis was saying that:

● (0645)

[English]

> Our income tax laws must be simplified!
> The main reason they have to be simplified is in the very nature of the Canadian income tax system itself. It's what's commonly known as a self-assessing system. Under the law, it's up to you and me, and every other individual in this country, to be sure we pay the correct amount of income tax. If we make mistakes on our returns we are subject to heavy interest charges—and possibly a fine if we can't prove the mistake was innocent. That's hardly fair when the law under which we have to file our returns is barely understandable, even by tax professionals who spend their entire working lives and much of what should be their leisure lives—trying to understand it.
> It's particularly repugnant when you consider further that the cost of having a professional prepare a tax return for the vast majority of Canadian taxpayers, is not deductible for income tax purposes. To get a deduction for the cost of income tax advice you have to have either business income or a substantial amount of investment income. That's not the majority of Canadian taxpayers by a long shot.
>
> Could our income tax laws be simplified? Yes, they could. And they should, if for no other reasons than to get rid of the great uncertainty which stifles initiative, slows down the economy, and drives so much commercial activity underground where it is not taxed at all.

[Senator Frith.]

[Translation]

Honourable Senators, I freely admit that a consumption tax . . . of course, because these people have to spend the money they earn, even though they have not paid income tax, at least they should pay tax when they spend that money.

[English]

> A simplified income tax act would mean more revenue for the government and a fairer distribution of the tax burden. And the right way to accomplish all of the objectives—fairness, efficiency and simplicity—is to move to a single rate income tax system.

[Translation]

I hope Senator Beaudoin is listening, because this took place in 1961. I believe you were telling me about an economist at the University of Chicago . . . . What was the year again?

In any case, allow me to quote something written by Dr. Ken Eaton.

[English]

> The idea is not new. In 1961, Dr. Ken Eaton, a respected, 25-year veteran of the Federal Department of Finance, said:
>
> "The obvious benefits to Canada of a flat rate tax include: incentive to work harder and earn more take-home pay;"

[Translation]

That runs completely counter to what was said earlier in the discussion I had with my collegues opposite, who maintained that it destroyed motivation, since the tax was aimed at people who produced. But Dr. Eaton maintains that there is—

[English]

> . . . incentive to work harder and earn more take-home pay; Canadians would have money left to acquire a greater ownership of a Canadian industry; it would attract highly trained people to stay in Canada; remove the incentive to cheat on taxes; simplify tax provisions and reduce the cost of administration.

[Translation]

So, there is definitely another perspective on the issue besides that expressed by my colleagues earlier. I will now return to my text.

● (0700)

[English]

> Dr. Eaton was right. A single rate system without complex deductions, credits and exemptions would eliminate the need for complicated legislation and the totally unproductive incentive to find loopholes and other ways of avoiding payment of tax.

[Translation]

I am sorry to see that you are leaving us, Senator Beaudoin, because I think we could have had a most interesting discussion together. I am going to miss you!

[English]

> Dr. Eaton was right. A single rate system without complex deductions, credits and exemptions would eliminate the need for complicated legislation and the totally unproductive incentive to find loopholes and other ways of avoiding payment of tax. The underground economy would virtually disappear.

[Translation]

As far as I am concerned, one of the things we should be trying to achieve with our taxation system is indeed the elimination of all these complexities.

Right now, however, we are, quite frankly, encouraging people to evade tax. And with the GST, we will simply end up with a system where people will rely on a system of exchanging services.

For instance, the garage mechanic will repair the dentist's car in exchange for having his teeth checked and his dental problems solved without there being any exchange of money. We will in fact be encouraging the creation of such a system.

So, Mr. MacInnis goes on to say:

[English]

> Consider the advantages of a single rate system:
> 1. Simplification of the income tax act;
>
> 2. Lower taxes for most people;
>
> 3. A fairer application of the tax burden;
>
> 4. The elimination of loopholes and tax shelters, which would result in re-channeling of enormous resources into truly productive endeavours;
>
> 5. A significant withdrawal by government of influencing market decisions; and
> 6. A tremendous reduction in the cost of collecting the tax.

These, it seems to me, are objectives we should seek in the income tax system as well as but also in the present GST. I have accepted that we probably need a dual system, perhaps somewhat reluctantly, because of the conditions. Surely the objectives should be the same.

Hon. Dan Hays: Senator Molgat, may I ask a question?

Senator Molgat: Yes, please.

Senator Hays: With respect to both the GST and the single tax you are speaking of in the quote you have just read, you are getting into an area where there has not been much discussion or debate; that is, the differences between the tax systems of Canada and the United States. As you have been speaking, and in anticipation of my speaking later, I have been reading an article published in the Canadian Tax Journal of May-June, 1990. I will read a brief quote with respect to the harmonization of Canadian and U.S. tax systems, and then I will ask my question. It is a criticism of the GST. It says:

> The federal government has been concerned about harmonizing the income tax system with that of the United States. Yet there seems to be little concern about harmonizing the Canadian commodity tax system with its U.S. counterpart. The introduction of the GST will maintain the existing disparity between Canadian commodity tax rates and the rates in the United States, which are only about one-third of current Canadian rates.

There is an interesting footnote referring to an article about international tax harmonization by Mr. Francis Vaillancourt of the University of Montreal, 1990, which we can perhaps get into later. I will continue with the paragraph:

> For certain goods that are taxed heavily under the MST, such as automobiles and furniture, the introduction of the GST will lessen the disparity between US and Canadian rates. For other items, however, particularly services and other products that are taxed lightly or not at all under the MST, the GST will increase the disparity. Given the free trade agreement, the persistence of the disparity in commodity tax rates will make cross-border shopping more attractive to Canadians.

It is not unlike the comparisons of other countries you were discussing with Senator Beaudoin and Senator Bolduc. It is more important because disharmony with the U.S. tax system is something that Canadians must be wary of, cross-border shopping being one of the issues.

With respect to the GST and the tax you are talking about, which is the single tax, I wonder if you could comment on the differences they would present between Canada and the United States, bearing in mind the important trading relationship and our proximity, and whether or not either of these are a good idea.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator Hays. I want to clearly point out that while I am dealing with Mr. Mills' proposal, the single tax, I am not necessarily advocating everything that he has said. I am trying to point out that there are other alternatives we could look at, and I do not think the government has done so. This is one alternative we could look at. I am not a tax expert and do not claim to be one. I have not studied what this means in-depth. Earlier a senator across the way said that when this was studied at the University of Chicago 30 years ago, there was opposition to a single tax. So I am not saying that this is the be all and the end all, but I think it deserves study.

With respect to your specific question, we have to be careful when harmonizing our tax system with that of our neighbour. Much as I do not like to be caught up in the U.S. orbit, we must recognize that they are next door. You only have to look at what is happening insofar as purchases across the border. Most of our major Canadian cities are within easy driving distance of the U.S. border. My own city of Winnipeg is 60 miles from the American border, and Vancouver is even closer. So if our tax system is out of whack with them, as it is now, with respect to a number of things such as alcoholic beverages and many food items, obviously there will be a tremendous attraction for the Canadian consumer to make purchases in the United States.

I think the GST will aggravate that. I will cite one example with respect to air fares. I am told that many Canadians, instead of purchasing their airline tickets in Canada, cross the border and use American carriers. I think this will be aggravated by the GST. We will find that many tour operators and travel agents—and I do not fault them for it because it is a question of economics—will be recommending that passengers do not fly, for example, from Winnipeg to Florida, but buy a ticket that goes from Grand Forks, North Dakota, and have a bus to take them to Grand Forks, thereby saving a lot of money. I do not think our tax experts have considered the impact of this.

Canada's population is concentrated within 100 miles of the border. Every one of our major cities, except Edmonton I suppose, is within 100 miles of the border. It is a simple proposition for 90 per cent of the Canadian population to cross the border to shop, but we cannot operate in a vacuum. We must realize that our tax system must be able to face what is going on across the border from us.

Senator Hays: Senator Molgat, specifically with respect to your example of air transport, when the Department of Finance restructured the goods and services tax and reduced the rate from 9 per cent to 7 per cent, at the same time I understand there were increases in the excise tax on transportation, air travel in particular, and in some cases the use of a flat rate rather than a percentage of a total ticket, the idea being that travel over Canada would be taxed, but travel over a foreign jurisdiction would not. My recollection is that for the 7 per cent to give the federal government the tax yield it wanted, the excise tax was increased, because the GST was applied on top of the excise tax. Do you have any detail on that?

The point you are making is that this discourages the use of Canadian carriers because we are taxed much more heavily than U.S. air transport. I am wondering if you know any of the details about the increase of the excise tax on travel so that the yield would increase, because the GST was applied on top of it. In any event, my question will highlight the point you are trying to make if you cannot provide me with further detail.

Senator Molgat: Unfortunately, Senator Hays, I do not have those details. Some years ago when the federal government decided to impose what I think it called an airport tax, it was on a percentage basis with a maximum of, at that time, $50. There were substantial objections raised in my region, and I presume from yours as well because if it is, indeed, an airport tax, it does not cost any more if you are flying 4,000 miles from Vancouver to Quebec City—the airport costs are the same—than if you are flying from Quebec City to Montreal. Yet when you charge on a percentage basis, obviously the individual having a ticket that costs $1,000 pays a great deal more than someone who paid $200 for his ticket on a short flight. There were objections at that point from the western regions. I am not in a position to advise you as to what changes were made recently.

To return to the single tax proposal, I repeat that this is one of the possible alternatives. I am not saying that it is the cure-all for anything, but I think we ought to be looking at alternatives, this being one. The introduction by Mr. MacInnis sets out the broad approach we should take to the tax system in Canada. He says that there should be simplification and lower taxes. Of course, all of us want lower taxes, but we also want a fairer application of the tax burden, the elimination of loopholes and tax shelters and a tremendous reduction in the cost of collecting the tax. I think those are all things that we should be looking at with the GST.

• (0715)

Now, Mr. MacInnis carries on again dealing with the single tax. He considers the advantages of a single rate system and he puts down six advantages and then continues:

> There is only one disadvantage. Some people who don't pay any income tax now might have to pay some under a single rate system, and some others might have to pay a bit more. However, this is offset by the fact that more income would be available to more people. It's the higher income earners who invest and take risks. If they are left with more disposable income, that extra income will soon find its way into productive uses, with the result that lower income earners will have greater opportunities available to them to increase their earnings. And they'd get to keep more of it under a single rate tax system. Over the longer term everyone would be better off.

After reading that section, here is where I say that there is room for a proper consumption tax, but again, I repeat, "a proper consumption tax". I laid out at the outset of my comments what this meant to me. It had to be fully protective of people at the lower end of the scale, not discriminatory in various parts of Canada, and it had to be simple to collect, which means tying it in with the provincial systems.

Mr. MacInnis finishes off his introduction by saying:

> So, why don't we have such a system? Because until now there hasn't been an elected politician with the required combination of economic insight, political will, common sense, and backbone to support it.
> Welcome Dennis Mills! Our country needs you.

For those who were not here earlier, that introduction is by Mr. Lyman MacInnis, the past-President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Ontario and of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and a Member of the Canadian Tax Foundation. He is well-recognized in his own profession. He holds the Queen's Jubilee Medal for outstanding contribution to his profession and the National Business Writing Award. He is also the author of numerous books, so he is not a newcomer or an individual who does not know what is involved.

Now, what is it that Mr. Mills suggests?

> It is often said that industry is the engine that runs the modern economy. If that is so, the oil that keeps the engine running is the tax system. It is a tax system that encourages or impedes the will of the country to be productive. If the tax system is inefficient, the cogs and wheels, the valves and dials of industry do not operate at their full potential.

I think that is a very sound opening statement, and that is why we have to review the GST, to ensure that it is indeed an efficient system and will not end up by putting grit into the cogs and wheels and valves and dials of industry but, instead, will put oil in them and ease the system, not make it worse. I come back to the text:

> But the tax system does more than lubricate the motor—it is also the heart of the economy. For industry is not simply cogs and wheels and valves and dials—it is also people. If the tax system is unfair or complex, then people lose not only the will and the motivation to succeed but also their sense of involvement with the economy.

I think that is a fair statement. Part of the problem with the GST is that it suits the bureaucrats who designed it, but I do not think it suits the people. I think it is a bureaucratic approach which needs to be tempered by a people input, and that people input should come, at this point, by the provinces being directly involved in the final solution instead of being head-on against the federal government, three of them in court and almost all the others objecting. We have to work together so that it becomes a people system, properly attuned to the different regions of the country.

Mr. Mills continues:

> So, for Canada to aspire to a worldclass economy, industry and the people who are its life force must be supported by a tax system that is, above all, fair. And if people are to be sure that it is fair it must be understandable.
>
> A tax system that is unfair is a malignant organ right at the heart of the economy and it is for this reason that tax reform is such a vital issue in Canada today. Our tax system should not only provide the motivation to succeed, it should also reflect our value system and our national identity.
> We are a small nation in a big land and we are in great need of national productivity at all levels of the economy. But how can we rally Canadians, how can we appeal for teamwork and cooperation, how can we expect to galvanize the national will, if the root of the problem lies not in the ability of Canadians to respond but in the inequity, the complexity and the inefficiency of the tax system?

I think that most of us in this room, regardless of our political views, could agree with those statements. The question is: How do we arrive at this goal?

Mills carries on:

> I know at first hand how much individuals and businesses are handicapped under the current situation. I, too, have been a small businessman struggling to meet a payroll and having to face the bank manager in hard times.
>
> My wife and I have not forgotten what it was like in 1970, attempting to build the business and living in a basement apartment at $90 a month because it was all we could afford. And I know very well from my constituents in Broadview-Greenwood that this is still the situation for many families and businesses in Canada today.
>
> So, for many Canadians, the need for tax reform is not an interesting academic exercise but a problem that demands immediate attention. We must—

And that is Mr. Mills' emphasis with the italics.

> —find a better way so that we can restore their trust in the system.

In order to start building that trust I want to put my own cards on the table and explain exactly why I became involved with the Single Tax proposal for reform.

I believe we are all shaped by our experiences and I have been privileged to know some very special people who have had a great influence on my thinking and attitudes.

The first was my father, who taught me that you didn't have to be the best but you had to do your best in order to succeed. What made my father successful in business was his attitude towards service. Anyone can rent out cups and plates and tables, but it is how you treat your colleagues and your customers that counts. I believe that attitude to service is essential in whatever vocation a person chooses.

The second big influence came from Stuart Lawson, whose portable grandstand business we bought on the condition that he stayed and worked with us. Once exposed to this man, you could sense a special quality about him. Given time to reflect, you realized that what made him special was his attitude towards life.

Mr. Lawson was an energetic, intelligent and multi-talented person. When asked "How are you today?", he would pause, look you straight in the eye and say confidently, "Never Better!" He believed that each day of his life was better than the one before. Each day was his opportunity to meet and conquer new challenges. The statement echoed his happiness to be alive, active, caring and thinking. He took nothing for granted. He was never too busy to help others, to show interest in their projects or to let you know that he loved his wife and family.

The "Never Better" philosophy and way of life allowed Stuart Lawson to enjoy all 85 active years of his life. His attitude allowed him to work confidently along with fellow workers, exceptional athletes and powerful businessmen and women yet treat all with equal respect and dignity.

By adopting this "Never Better" philosophy, people show an unqualified joy for living, a special ability to meet daily challenges, and a love for family, friends and co-workers. To say that someone has the "Never Better" approach means that they are eager, caring, motivated and determined to make each day "Never Better".

The third important influence came from the Basilian Fathers at St. Michael's who taught me the importance of teamwork, both in the classroom and on the ice. It is this notion of teamwork that makes it impossible for me to stand up in Opposition and criticize the government unless I can produce what I truly believe to be an equal or better proposition.

A fourth influence came from working as Senior Policy Advisor to the Cabinet Committee on Communications and also having the privilege of being on the senior staff of Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau from 1981 to 1984. During this time I also met Senator Keith Davey and it was he who told me to "lean to your strengths".

My strengths came from all the people mentioned above who gave me the confidence to act on my own beliefs and, when necessary, have the courage to go against the wind.

From four years of reading cabinet documents I had the rare privilege of learning all about the complexities of the issues in the governance of Canada. And the issues of the day were complex:—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, whom are we talking about?

Senator Molgat: This is Dennis Mills. Some of you may wonder why I give all this background. I am trying to show that he does have a very broad view of Canada and I think it is important to understand that. When I read the introduction by Mr. MacInnis, I gave his background because it is important to understand from what basis these people are speaking. Mr. MacInnis was speaking as a man who had been a long-time chartered accountant. Mr. Mills was speaking as a man who had been a long time in business and had lots of political involvement and could reflect his vision of Canada and has a reason to propose the changes. This is Dennis Mills himself.

Senator Frith: Can I ask Senator—

Senator David: Molgat.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Senator David. I remembered his name, although "Senator" was enough, but so that the record will show it clearly, it was Senator Molgat. I noticed that Senator Doyle has raised his glasses and is leaning forward, poised to say something.

Senator Doyle: I just wanted to be sure it was not Senator Mills you were speaking to.

Senator Frith: Not yet, apparently. This book is a biography, if I understand correctly, but I take it that it also sets out very fully the proposal that Mr. Mills is making for his single tax.

Senator Molgat, when you come to that part, I assume you are going to tell us, and I hope it will be in some detail, of the proposal for a single tax so that we can make the comparison between the single tax proposal of Mr. Mills and the GST. I should also like to ask if that book also contains some comparisons within itself to other single tax proposals. Certainly, the concept of a single tax did not originate with Mr. Mills. I seem to remember there was some chap from the west who was a candidate at one point for the leadership of the Conservative Party who had a single tax proposal.

Senator Austin: Pocklington.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Lucier: The man who sold Gretzky.

Senator Frith: This is the same man who sold Gretzky, I see. Did he have an abattoir or something?

Senator Lucier: Yes, he did.

Senator Molson: He was connected with Gainers.

Senator Frith: Yes. I must say that the first time I became aware of someone on the national scene proposing a single tax system was with this Mr. Pocklington. I wonder if Senator Molgat is going to put on the record something that will give us an opportunity to make a comparison between Mr. Mills' proposals for a single tax and the GST. Perhaps Senator Molgat could comment on how Mr. Mills' proposals differ, if they do, from other single tax proposals.

• (0730)

Senator MacDonald: Flat tax.

Senator Frith: Do they mean the same thing, flat tax and single tax? Perhaps Senator Molgat could also tell us about that.

Senator Molgat: You are correct, Senator Frith, it is not the first time a single tax was proposed. Indeed, at the time of the last conservative leadership contest, Mr. Pocklington made quite a point of pushing the single tax or flat tax. It is not something that Mr. Mills has completely originated. That is the reason I read his own background, to indicate that he does have this broad input from outside.

To answer your question directly and to show you where I am heading, the following are the various headings of the chapters. Chapter 1, Involving Canadians in Tax Reforms; Chapter 2, What is Wrong with the Current System?; Chapter 3, The Development of the Single Tax System; Chapter 4, The Advantages of the Single Tax System; Chapter 5, Other Tax Reform Proposals—

Senator Frith: Are you going to be able to give us selections from all of those headings?

Senator Molgat: I hope that I can, because it is important that we do look at alternatives.

Senator Frith: I think it is important to get them on the record early in this debate.

Senator Molgat: I might add that there are two more chapters. Chapter 6, The Problems with the GST, and Chapter 7, Advancing the Debate. I trust that what we are doing here is advancing the debate.

Senator Lucier: He did not get all the problems with the GST in one chapter?

Senator Molgat: No, I suppose not. However, that chapter runs from page 133 to page 148, so he has a selection. However, he may not address all of the problems in depth. By putting this on the record, I hope to have an opportunity of doing what Mr. Mills wants to do, which is to advance the debate. When the committee in the other place was allegedly studying the bill, one of the great disappointments was that it did not look at any alternatives and simply proceeded; it supposedly listened to people, but there was no in-depth look at other proposals.

[Translation]

Senator David: I do not get the impression, Senator, that we were doing exactly the same thing in the Senate Committee.

Senator Molgat: Senator David, I guess I am getting old; I cannot hear you very well.

Senator David: Well, I will try to speak louder . . . You say the Commons committee proposed no alternatives—indeed, did not even consider any alternatives—but it is my impression that that is more or less what happened in the Senate committee as well. As I recall, Dun Mills was a witness before the Senate committee, at which time he explained at great length the theory you have just be discussing, but we did not in fact have the time or the energy or the opportunity to consider alternatives. Several were in fact proposed to the committee. About 12 pages of the committee report are devoted to a discussion of the alternatives—alternatives that were not considered seriously and where only an attempt was made to point out advantages and disadvantages; in other words, the kind of superficial consideration that could have been done verbally, as Senator Frith was proposing. But I think it is a little late now to get involved in that kind of study.

Senator Thériault: I would like to say in response to Senator David's comment that what he is saying is quite true.

Senator Frith: You are not speaking to the motion.

Senator Thériault: I am commenting on the question Senator David put to Senator Molgat. In response to his question, after hearing all the recommendations made to him, the committee decided that there had been so many representations made and that so many people were either totally or partially opposed to the GST that in the end, we had no alternative but to recommend that it be scrapped.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senators David and Thériault. In fact, Senator David, my feeling is that the committee simply concluded that it had no other alternative, given the kind of restrictions being imposed by the government—namely, that the tax had to be in place by January 1, 1991. The simple fact of the matter is that there was not enough time to really propose the proper reforms and that a far more in-depth study of the issue would be required before the appropriate recommendations could be made—that is all I was trying to say earlier. I really do not see why it is absolutely essential that the tax be in place by January 1. After all, the tax that we are changing—the Manufacturers Sales Tax—has been around for a long time. I freely admit it is not perfect, but I would also point out that when Mr. Mulroney's government came to power, that tax stood at 9%. Since then, the government has continued to increase it, not every year, but in a couple of different stages, since it is now 13.5%. So, if the tax was really that bad, surely in the eight years it has been in power, the government would not have seen fit to increase it from 9% to 13.5%, if it was really that terrible. Consequently, I see no reason why we could not take another year, or even two, to develop the means of changing that tax. My fear is that we will end up forcing on Canadians a new tax that is a lot more complicated and a lot more costly. I was saying a little earlier that our efforts should now be focused on harmonizing the tax with the provincial systems. True, your province has agreed to do so, but three provinces are also taking the federal government to court to fight the tax, and the majority of the others are opposed to it as well. So, I do think we should take the time to achieve harmonization.

Senator David: It may take a long time.

Senator Molgat: But the provinces really do have a major objection. For example, this is what the Alberta government has to say about it.

> Alberta News Release
> GST LEGAL CHALLENGE
> Dick Johnston, Provincial Treasurer, and Ken Rostad, Attorney General, announced today that the Government of Alberta will proceed with a legal challenge to the proposed Federal Goods and Services Tax (GST). A reference has been directed to the Alberta Court of Appeal under the Judicature Act. It will ask the Court to hear and consider certain questions regarding the constitutional validity of the GST.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: So, here we have a very important province that is not only unhappy, but unhappy to the point of taking the federal government to court. So, all I am asking is that we take whatever time is necessasry. Let us just wait a year or two if we must, rather than bringing in a system that is going to be too costly. The federal government will need an army both to put the tax in place and to collect it. We have a good idea of what the cost is going to be. We were recently told that some $350 million would be required to make the system operational. And the provinces will then have to do the same thing. So I would just like to continue reading this press release from Alberta, because I think it is important that we be aware of attitudes across the country.

[English]

> "This legal challenge is part of our continuing campaign to stop the GST," said Mr. Johnston. "We believe that, in whole and in part, this tax violates several sections of the Canadian Constitution that are clearly in the realm of provincial authority," said Mr. Rostad.
>
> There are three key elements to the province's reference:
> First, the GST infringes upon provincial jurisdiction over the property and civil rights by interfering in the regulation of commerce. All businesses through the production and distribution chain are forced to be federal tax collectors, while the purpose of the GST is only to collect net tax revenue from the final consumer. The GST will be an administrative nightmare for every business person. They are regulated to collect the GST for the federal government and are forced to do so largely at their own expense.

In the case of zero-rated goods, such as exports and food, this entire tax collection superstructure is imposed on businesses for no revenue purpose at all, as the sale of zero-rated commodities yields no net revenue to the federal government. "Alberta businesses do not need another layer of regulations any more than they need another tax", said Mr. Johnston.

Second, the GST attempts to tax provincial Crown property which contravenes section 125 of the Constitution Act. By levying the GST on fees charged by the provincial government for certain uses of its natural resources, the federal government effectively taxes the province in the performance of its constitutional responsibility for the management of these natural resources. The GST will also tax provincial property by imposing the tax on top of provincial fuel and tobacco taxes, and liquor revenue, which are Crown property. "We cannot allow this unconstitutional intrusion by the federal government", said Mr. Rostad.

Third, the GST increases the tax burden on health care, education and municipal services which are the constitutional responsibility of the province. If the Alberta government were to provide educational services directly, Albertans would not bear a GST burden on education because the Crown has constitutional immunity. Albertans are being penalized for their choice to have education delivered in a manner that is responsive to local concerns.

Even with a partial rebate, the GST is an interference with the discharge of a provincial constitutional responsibility. "We will fight the federal attempt to siphon off money that Albertans pay for health care, education and municipal services", said Mr. Johnston.

The Canadian economy has already plunged into an Ottawa-made recession under the weight of the high interest rate regime of the federal government. This strategy has been strongly attacked by the Economic Council of Canada in its 1990 Annual Review.

The GST will inflict further damage to the national and provincial economies and prolong the recession, if it is implemented.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: So you see, Senator David, that in the face of such difficulties, we really should take a step back, reconsider our direction and take the time to do things properly—as I say, it is not as though we could not possibly endure another year of the manufacturer's sales tax. We have had it since NATO was created. The government has raised it a number of times. I think we can live with it another year. So, I do not see it as essential that the tax be in place by January 1, 1991; we could delay it if necessary. Let us take a closer look at the alternatives before we get involved in something that we may regret—namely creating a whole new bureaucracy that is going to make everybody's life more difficult and cost Canadian taxpayers a lot more money.

[English]

Hon. Dan Hays: Senator Molgat, in that context, I wonder if you are aware—we touched on it in the reading of that press release—that in Alberta's case the Government of Alberta does not intend to remit, or refuses to remit, the goods and services tax that is applicable on rents payable to crown corporations such as the treasury branch of the Alberta Liquor Control Board, which leaves the owners of those properties in a situation where they are legally obliged to remit the tax, but they cannot make themselves whole by collecting the tax from the provincial government.

I am asking if you are aware of that, because it was not clear in the press release. I asked the question to clarify that issue for the honourable senators, because it is a good example of the impossibility of the situation in which many people find themselves with the tax imposed and with the provincial government resisting it. they are out of pocket and they have no way of being reimbursed for the moneys they are required to pay to comply with the federal tax that the provincial government refuses to recognize.

Senator Molgat: That is an interesting point, Senator Hays. Possibly what I should do—because that was indeed a press release, and, as we know, press releases have to condense greatly the essence or the argument itself; they just give the basics—is put on the record exactly what it is that the Alberta government said; and then we will be clear, because I really think it is an essential part of this debate, one of my points being that there is no need to put down January 1 as something that is absolutely unchangeable. I think January 1 can be changed and should be. The federal sales tax can continue for another year. We can take the time to end up with a sensible Canadian system, instead of having one that has the provinces, except for the province of Quebec, opposed and fighting; and the fact that the provinces are fighting against the federal initiative indicates in this case that there are regional differences and that we shoudl be listening to the regions. We ought to finish with a system that is going to be acceptable.

In earlier comments with Senator Beaudoin, he pointed out that the provinces would always be opposed, because there is a constitutional question, and that was touched on in what I have said.

I admit there is a constitutional question, but at some point the courts will settle that. I suspect they will settle that between the federal and provincial governments. I am not a lawyer, but there are lawyers here who can judge that better than I. Once the constitutional question is settled, we can then discuss making the system work. That will take a little time, unquestionably. It will take compromise. It will mean that the provinces and the federal government will not get all their own way. I think we can arrive at a system that will be better for Canadians; but it means that we must first have enough time to settle the constitutional issue, so that it is clear that the players know what their position is. Then we have to deal with the people issues, as to why it is that certain provinces want things done differently than other provinces.

We really come down to the essential question that we were involved with two years ago on the Meech Lake issue, that we have to have a way of enabling the provinces and the federal government to arrive at solutions. We can only do that, in my view, by sitting down and talking. I agree that it will take time, but it is far better to take the time than to rush into something, as was the situation with the Meech Lake Accord. We rushed into something without really involving in-depth discussions with the provinces. This is what we have to do if we are going to arrive at a sensible tax system.

Here are the elements of Alberta's GST court challenge.

> Alberta's challenge to the constitutionality of the GST is based on the opinion provided by legal advisers that the GST may contravene sections 92(13), 103, 125 and 126 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Am I going too quickly for the reporters? I am trying to keep at a pace where honourable senators can follow me, because there are some intricate things here, and I may not be able to circulate all of the documents in time. If I rpoceed too quickly, please send me a signal.

> GENERAL QUESTION
> Question 1
> This question is very broad and refers to the Constitution Act in general. It asks the Court to determine whether the GST or any part of it is unconstitutional. This question is intended as a general introduction to the more specific questions and covers general issues not identified in the subsequent specific questions.
>
> REGULATION OF BUSINESSES
> INFRINGES ON PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION
> Question number 2
> Under the GST, the final consumer is the only one paying the tax on a net basis because at all pre-retail stages the tax paid is fully refunded through the input tax credit. The federal government, therefore, plans to impose controls on businesses to collect a tax which it intends to levy on the final consumer only. It is argued that such controls constitute an unnecessary infringement of provincial jurisdiction with respect to the regulation of property and civil rights.
> Section 92(13) states "In each province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subject next herein-after enumerated; that is to say,... property and civil rights in the province."
> It is also argued that collection of the GST involves costs to every supplier of taxable goods or services and that the federal government has the obligation to repay those costs in full. Section 103 of the Constitution states that "The Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada shall be permanently changed with the Costs, Charges, and Expenses incident to the Collection, Management, and Receipt thereof..."
> TAXATION OF PROVINCIAL CROWN PROPERTY
> Question Number 4
> Section 125 of the Constitution Act states that "no lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to Taxation."

I put in an interjection here. I think that possibly touches the point that you were making, Senator Hays.

To continue back to the text:

> It is argued that the GST contravenes section 125 by taxing Crown property. For example, by imposing the GST on fees charged by the provincial government for certain uses of its natural resources, the federal government effectively taxes the province in the performance of its constitutional responsibility for the management of these natural resources. The GST also contravenes section 125 by taxing Crown revenue. For example, the GST is levied on provincial fuel and tobacco taxes, the revenue from which is Crown property, and the revenue remitted by the Alberta Liquor Control Board, which is also Crown property.
>
> It is also argued that the imposition of the obligation on the Government of Alberta to collect GST on the goods and services it supplies contravenes section 125.
>
> The collection and remittance of the GST also involves costs for the Government of Alberta. In some cases, the Government of Alberta may be required to remit GST not yet collected. It is argued that the imposition of these costs by the federal government contravenes section 126 of the Constitution Act. It is Alberta's position that section 126 guarantees the integrity of the province's general revenue fund solely for provincial purposes. Therefore, it restricts the federal government's ability to impose expenses unilaterally on the provincial Crown.
> TAXATION OF GOVERNMENT FUNCTIONS
> DELIVERED BY PROVINCIAL AUTHORITIES
>
> Question Number 6
> It is argued that municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals (the MUSH sector) provide public services by exercising, on behalf of the Government of Alberta, delegated provincial constitutional powers. These functions would be free of GST if they were performed directly by the province.

Senator Frith: Senator, I recall hearing the expression "MUSH," in committee. I think it stands for Municipalities, Utilities, something for the "S", and Hospitals. Is that right? What does the "S" stand for?

Senator Molgat: You are pretty close. You got two out of the four. That is a 50 per cent pass rate, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: For me, that is very good.

Senator Molgat: The part in brackets which says "the MUSH sector" means Municipalities, Universities, Schools and Hospitals.

Senator Frith: The utilities would be included with the municipalities?

Senator Molgat: Yes, the utilities would be included with municipalities. It is Municipalities, Universities, Schools—

Senator Frith: I should get half a point for that.

Senator Molgat: Half a point. We will raise your mark to 60 per cent.

Senator Frith: Senator David gives me a 75.

Senator David: Another five points is not so much.

Senator Molgat: I come back to where I had left off, and we argue that tax immunity under section 125 therefore extends to purchases by MUSH institutions. Their purchases should be tax free.

> The Court is asked whether MUSH sector institutions would be tax free on their purchases if they were specifically designated by the province as being Crown Agents.
> The Court is also asked whether tax free status for the MUSH institutions would be obtained through the following arrangement, which would be made only with the consent of these institutions:

These are not numbered, but they are set out as four separate points.

> Alberta sets up a Crown Purchase Agency
> The Agency purchases goods and services that would be normally purchased by MUSH institutions
> As a government department the Agency would not pay GST on purchases
> MUSH institutions would acquire goods and services from the Agency as a grant. The Court is asked whether such grants would be free of GST.

There are the specific details. Now, again, this part, the elements of Alberta's GST court challenge, is in layman's language. I have the actual court documents, but I do not know if it is necessary that I read those in the record at this point.

Senator Frith: Keep them. I might want them.

Senator Molgat: All right. Possibly what I might do, with the help of the stenographic services, is to separate this.

● (0800)

Senator Hays: Perhaps I can ask the honourable senator a question. Has he thought at all about the implications of a single tax or a flat tax with regard to federal-provincial harmony? There are many problems with the GST, as the honourable senator has observed. Quebec is the only province on board, and it is anticipated that Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick may be leaning towards it. There will be difficulties of uniformity with other provinces if they do come on board. Can you tell us anything from your readings that would lead us to conclude that such a tax would be easier to sell on a federal-provincial basis than the GST?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Molgat: Perhaps we should resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole and ask Mr. Mills to come back and see us.

Senator Frith: What a good idea.

Senator Molgat: In that way we could go into the matter in some depth. It would not delay our work too much and it would be very easy to do. We could spend an hour with him and get clarification on a number of these points.

However, I believe that the single tax would get us away from many of the problems of the GST. There are complications and those complications will vary from province to province. The other day I asked questions of Senator Murray based on the situation in my province of Manitoba. The Manitoba government has said to some of the provincial agencies, such as Autopac, the provincial automobile insurance agency, that they will not be subject to the tax, that they need not collect it. It is not clear whether they will or will not pay the tax, and it is not clear what position the federal government will take. The tax will have an impact on all these agencies. Every element of Canadian business and government will be affected if they purchase goods. There will be rebates and charges.

Alberta has asked what would happen if they set up a government purchasing agency to do all of the purchasing and, instead of the government providing, as it does now, grants to municipalities, hospitals, and so on, they simply give them goods on which the Alberta government has not paid the tax, to alleviate these institutions from having to pay it. If Alberta were to take that road and another province were to have a different system, there would be discrimination. If we went to the flat tax, the individual would pay. It does not involve a collection system or a tax that must work its way through the manufacturer, wholesaler and down to the consumer, nor does it involve the whole business of the relationship between the federal and provincial governments and municipal and crown corporations. Indeed, it will be a nightmare.

The point that I have been making is that we should not assume that January 1 is the be-all and end-all. Let us take some time and reflect on what we are doing, and, above all, talk to the provinces to arrive at a sensible system that can be enforced.

Senator Frith: Get back to some national reconciliation.

Senator Molgat: Yes. At this time we have friction within the Canadian system from a constitutional standpoint. For the government to take the lead and say, "We have been hasty; we have jumped into this and we are taking a step back to have a second look at it," would show good will and would provide the opportunity that Senator Frith has suggested, an opportunity for national reconciliation. Instead, we are heading into a battle with the provinces. So, in that regard, the single tax would eliminate those problems.

The part on which I still want to satisfy myself is that there will still be no evasion under the single-tax system. That is the one reason why I can support a consumption tax, if it provides proper protection for the people in middle- and lower-income brackets, a simple system that has the cooperation of the provinces and is tied in with one collection system. I could accept such a system in order to reach people whom we might not be able to reach through another tax system, including a single-tax system. So I leave that open. I repeat, I am not necessarily convinced that the single tax is the only answer to the question, but it is certainly an approach that should be considered.

Senator Hays: Senator Molgat, I would like to ask you about the so-called Brooks proposal. The best way to put my question is to quote again from the Canadian Tax Journal of May and June. It reads at page 652:

> The proposal made by Professor Brooks is relatively simple. Instead of introducing the GST, the federal government would eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax in favour of increased reliance on income tax revenues. The Brooks proposal would allow for higher income tax rates, which would be achieved mainly through a federal personal income surtax.
>
> This simple proposal has a number of advantages over the GST:
>
> It simplifies the tax system tremendously by eliminating one source of tax revenue altogether.
>
> It avoids the conflicts that would arise between the federal government and the provinces from their joint occupancy of the retail sales tax field.
>
> It allows for the possibility of a more progressive tax system—that is, the rate increase could be made higher for high-income earners.
>
> It achieves greater harmony between Canadian commodity taxes and commodity taxes in the United States.
> It would produce a reduction in consumer prices of more than 2 per cent. (This calculation assumes, as the federal government does, that the savings to firms as a result of the elimination of the MST would be fully passed on to the consumer.)

It goes on to talk about the idea that a higher income tax would provide incentive to Canadians to move to the United States. Essentially it answers that question by suggesting that when you compare the taxes of the two countries and the different systems in terms of social services, and so on, it is not an incentive at all.

In any event, what do you think of Professor Brooks' proposal?

Senator Molgat: Senator Hays, unfortunately I was not a member of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee that studied the tax. I had accepted some other obligations this summer of a military nature with which I am still involved, and I could not be at the hearings, particularly those in Manitoba. So I have not had a chance to review in-depth all these other proposals. I hope that when you make your contribution to this debate, as I trust you will, you will proceed to give us some other alternatives.

While you were quoting, I could not help but think that the one great advantage of a direct tax on individuals, be it through that system or through the flat tax, is that it does not encourage individuals to go to the United States to purchase goods, services and all those things that the GST will encourage people to do. The GST will substantially increase the cost of living in Canada. It will encourage people to make purchases outside the country and it will discourage people from coming to Canada. Admittedly if our income tax rates get too far out of line, it would create a problem as well, particularly with our higher-paid people or professionals. They will then look at the rates in other countries. For example, a doctor may say, "I could make more money in California."

However, you touched on an important point, that of the benefits of being a Canadian: the social structure that we have established; the tremendous benefits of our medicare system and the real stability that it provides; Insurance, peace of mind. There are many benefits that people should look at before they make that jump. Personally, I think there is less danger in that approach for Canada than a tax on consumption, which is too far out of line with the American system.

Let me come back to Mr. Mills. I was pointing out the background he has laid out. I know that some people laugh at the idea, saying that it is too simplistic and that it cannot work. After all, taxes have to be complicated, otherwise they are not good. Bureaucrats do not always like the simplistic approach, but the fact is that Mr. Mills is not coming from a vacuum or out of the blue; his credentials are good, and he shows here the things that have motivated him in his proposal. I think we should have that on the record, so that there is no misunderstanding. He goes on to say:

> From four years of reading cabinet documents I had the rare privilege of learning all about the complexities of the issues in the governance of Canada. And the issues of the day were complex: the Quebec referendum; constitutional renewal; interest rates at 24%; the National Energy Policy; and 6 and 5 restraints on wages and prices. And these were only some of the problems.
> What Canadians should know is that governments don't take decisions deliberately to alienate people. Sometimes they have to make tough decisions that they may dislike but which they believe present the best creative options available.

One does wonder at times what the government is trying to do with the GST. It almost seems to be a deliberate attempt to alienate the provinces, particularly when Mr. Wilson suddenly cut off discussions with no warning and decided that he would go off on his own. Mr. Mills goes on to say:

> For example, Michael Wilson is not setting out to be hard on seniors in his policy decisions. Rather than suggesting that he is, we would be better employed assisting in the search for improved alternatives to his policies. That is what the Single Tax proposal is intended to do—provide a more creative and improve option for tax reform.

● (0815)

That is exactly what we should be looking for.

I am fully aware of the complexities of the tax structure, so when people insist that a complex society must have complex taxes I can dispute this from a position of strength. I firmly believe that, if we can simplify the system, make it understandable and so restore trust, the people of Canada will respond by improving our national productivity out of all recognition—and I am not alone in that belief.

As an aside, for the help of our stenographers, they can get a copy of the book from the library, which they can verify against their text. I will not refer to pages, but I think it will be easy for you to follow along. I am presently at page eight. I want to make your life easier because your days are going to be as long as ours, and I think we should ease your burden as best we can.

I may not be an economist but I know how to find solutions to problems by going to the best minds in the country and then putting together a team of people to translate the theories into action.

I also believe that the Single Tax System is the best answer to our present problems and I am going to do my best to see it implemented.

So the main purpose of this book is to advance the debate on tax reform as a matter or urgency. In order to do this, all Canadians need to be involved but many Canadians are at a disadvantage because so much information about taxes is written in "legalese"—a language most of us find incomprehensible. In this book we are including some background information on taxes and we have attempted to present our proposal in readable form.

So, before we begin to consider the Single Tax Proposal (or compare it with the present system or other possible solutions), we need to back track and take a look at how taxes evolved, why they are needed, what they are used for, what different forms they can take, why people tolerate or become disatisfied, and finally what terminology is used in describing tax systems.

In any discussion, misunderstandings can occur when people do not understand the concepts involved because special terminology is used whose meaning is not always clearly defined. Sometimes there are even different definitions of the same terminology and that also gives rise to confusion.

In order to avoid this, we have included in this chapter a set of definitions for the special terms that are associated with taxes and that are used throughout the book.

He gives a brief history of taxes, which, as we are looking at what is going to be a fundamental restructuring of the Canadian tax system, might be worth putting on the record as well. It is of a more general nature, but, in these circumstances, it should be put into the record. He says:

[Senator Molgat.]

Taxes—the second certainty of life—have been around for almost as long as man has existed.

As soon as some of the poppulation took on the job of "governing" they needed to be supported by the rest of the population. In a very short time the process became bureacratized—one of the first uses of writing was to make records of tax collections. In ancient Crete the earliest form of Greek was used to make lists of tax payments.

THE USE OF TAXES

Over time, nearly everything has had a tax imposed on it, from salt (France) to having "too many" rooms in a house (The Netherlands). Especially popular are those items that at any one time are considered undesirable—today's versionis are the so-called "sin-taxes" on tobacco and alcohol.

Taxes are used for a variety of purposes from financing war to protecting domestic markets from foreign goods. Sometimes taxes are even used in an attempt to alter the behaviour of the population: to encourage them to have more (or less) children; to help persuade them to save rather than spend; to make it more rewarding to donate to charity or to political parties.

Forms of Taxation

There have been many different forms of taxation but the main ones today are: taxes on property or wealth; customs and excise duties; value added and sales taxes; social security and payroll taxaes; and personal and corporate income taxes.

A main distinction is between consumption taxes (like the proposed Goods and Services Tax) and those which tax production (like personal and corporate income taxes).

This was part of the discussion I had earlier this morning with Senator Bolduc who said that when we tax on the basis of personal income tax, we are taxing production and reducing the incentive to production. I recognize that, which is why I can accept a mix of the two systems, provided they are fair, simple, equitable and undertaken in conjunction with the provinces.

Another distinction is between direct taxes (like income taxes) and indirect taxes (like the Manfuacturers Sales Tax).

Income Taxes

Income tax, as we know it today, was first introduced in England, which was at the forefront of the new industrial revolution. It was used in the late eighteenth century to finance the Napoleonic wars, so it is possible to argue that both of Canada's founding cultures were responsible for the beginnings of income tax.

I will admit that this comes from different sides of the issue, but he has a point.

At first it was only a temporary measure. However it was not long before it was reintroduced on a permanent basis in 1842.

The early income taxes were flat rate and only applied after a large personal deduction, which exempted the less well off; taxing the working poor is a relatively recent development. Later came more complex additions, such as graduated rates and special interest deductions and credits.

Taxes in Canada

In Canada the powers and responsibilities of the federal government and provincial governments are outlined in the Constitution Act (1982), which was originally the British North America Act. At the time of Confederation (1867), it was the intention to create a powerful central, or federal, government in Canada. The federal government was therefore given the major responsibilities, as well as the authority, over major revenue sources. In order to match the major responsiblities with the financial authority, unlimited taxing power was given to the federal government.

To the provinicial governments were allocated matters of more direct local importance. As these were seen as having less importance at the time of Confederation, provinces were given less command over revenue sources than was the federal government. During the years immediately after Confederation, many of the provincial responsibilities were relatively unimportant but, today, they have acquired major importance. Education and health care, for example, now comprise a large portion of the total provincial government expenditures.

This reinforces the point I have been making, and I repeat that we must have harmony with the provinces when we are entering a major tax revision such as this. It is insane to pit federal against provincial in this kind of discussion. We need to sit down together and arrive at some compromise of one system if we are going to enter into a consumption tax. The provinces now have their own sales taxes which vary from province to province. There are good reasons for the provinces having different sets of rules and conditions because the situation is not the same in every province; and, before the federal government rushes headlong into this, it should sit down with the provinces, without artificial or political deadlines established by the present government which says we have to have the GST implemented long before the next election so that people will have forgotten about it; they will have accepted it, and the money will come in by the barrelfull, and the members of government will be able to make big fellows of themselves before the election.

Hon. Paul Lucier: I wonder if the Honourable Senator Molgat would permit a question at this point? Senator Molgat has always been a great friend of the north, and I know that when he refers to harmony with the provinces he is also referring to harmony with the two territorial governments. As we know, representation was made to the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee and also to the committee of the House of Commons by both territorial governments strenuously opposing the unfairness of the GST and the manner in which it is going to treat, in particular, the people of northern Canada.

When you speak of harmony with the provinces and the territories—I am sure that is what you meant to say, Senator Molgat—during the committee hearings, members of the tourism industry, particularly big game guides and fishing guides, made a strong point that the GST would discourage tourism in the north, not only foreign tourism but Canadian tourism. As I said the other day, one can fly to Hawaii and not pay tax, but if one flies to the Yukon or to the Northwest Territories one must pay tax on the flight, which will increase the cost of doing business in the territories. We know that tourism is a provincial responsibility. The governments of the provinces and territories spend a lot of money promoting tourism, which the GST is now going to tax. It seems to me that one level of government is promoting something that is within tis jurisdiction, while the federal government is taxing it. How does that fit in with the harmony among the provinces and territories that was mentioned by you?

Senator Molgat: Senator Lucier, let me make it clear that when I said "provincial governments," I was not excluding the territories. You and your colleagues from the north have made it clear to me that the north is a total and essential part of the country, but I do not believe they have provincial or territorial sales taxes.

Senator Lucier: They do not; that is correct.

Senator Molgat: Do they have the legal authority to introduce a sales tax at the moment?

Senator Lucier: They probably do, yes.

Senator Molgat: It would be an interesting point. In any event, please understand that when I say "provincial" I include territorial insofar as authorities of taxation is concerned. Certainly, when you discuss tourism you make a very good case. Some provinces may want to put more emphasis on tourism than others, and some obviously depend on tourism much more than others. Regions within provinces are very much more affected, and I think that there is a sound reason for provinces to say they want certain exemptions or changes because the conditions vary. It is for that reason that the federal government should sit down and make an arrangement with the provinces and not proceed in isolation with one flat tax right across the country without that provincial input. It is absolutely essential. One of the major weaknesses of the tax now proposed to us is that the provinces have not agreed. Not only have they not agreed, but they are taking the government to court. It is ridiculous for Canada to be going along in this way. Let us step back.

• (0830)

If I may just step aside from what Mr. Mills is saying, I should like to point out some of the letters that I get from across the country. Here is one that I presume most senators have received. This is from Paul Haynes Comics and introduces "Captain Tax Time". This is from Oakville, Ontario. The letter says:

> Your fight against the G.S.T. is a worthy cause. To let you know you are not alone, and to let you identify the real villains, we enclose our Premier Edition of Captain Tax Time.
>
> And please note the serious message contained in Captain Tax Time's Open Letter. As the recent Ontario election demonstrates, the people want a square deal.
> Yours very truly,
>
> J. Paul Haynes
> Publisher

His fight against taxes, and against this particular tax, is in this particular comic book, "Captain Tax Time", but, as he points out, there is a serious message at the back, and I think it is worthy of notice. As I have been reading Mr. Mills' background of taxes and how they arose, I should probably read what this man has to say. This is an open letter from Captain Tax Time:

> Dear Fellow Taxpayers:
>
> "In this World, nothing is certain but death and taxes."

That is a quotation from Ben Franklin.

> Ben Franklin made that telling observation in a letter, in French, to Leroy in 1789. Since then, taxpayers in North America and democracies throughout the World, have grudgingly lived with its basic truth.
>
> They have done so because all Governments, including freely elected Governments of all democracies, require money to operate, and that money is ultimately obtained from its citizens through taxation. Paying taxes is, if not a patriotic duty, certainly a necessary first step if you want to have a functioning society.
> All citizens know this and most willingly pay the taxes levied upon them. But lately it seems that Politicians and Bureaucrats the World over take a knee-jerk approach to dealing with Revenue problems.

Now, is that not what we are having right now from the federal government, a knee-jerk approach in which suddenly we have to go into this GST without caring what the provinces have to say? I come back to what Captain Tax Time has to say:

> They see the large number of middle and low income earners and turn to them automatically when they need additional funds.
> They even scheme the best ways of getting ever-increasing sums from these naive (in tax matters) income groups, turning away from income taxes as a too visible and accountable technique. They turn instead to value-added taxes (Canada's impending Goods and Services Tax is a type of value-added tax) where increases come easily with increases in economic activity, and the rates sound low (at least initially) because they are levied on all transactions instead of just the incomes portion of the economy.
> But it is really the administration of these taxation schemes and their relative impact on lower and middle income groups that is causing taxpayer rebellion on a World-Wide basis.

He highlights the following sentence:

> Taxpayers are incensed when they hear about large corporations and wealthy individuals that pay no income tax.
>
> They cannot afford the high-priced talent required to find a way around tax laws. And while they do not understand most of the complicated tax-avoidance arrangements, they are infuriated when they come face to face with obvious inequities that involve all taxpayers.
>
> In Canada, one such obvious inequity is the inability of low and middle income taxpayers to obtain a deduction for the cost of having their tax returns prepared for them. Wealthy taxpayers obtain such a deduction on a routine basis by burying it in accounting costs.
> Professional Accountants routinely bury tax return preparation costs in accounting fees, knowing full well that Canada's income tax laws do not allow a deduction for the cost of preparing returns. These are the same parties empowered to certify the accuracy of financial statements. Perhaps they prepare tax returns at no charge, but apart from isolated clinics for Seniors, we have not heard of that happening.

I think that most business men who hear me reading this can only say that yes, that is true, that is exactly what goes on. Who is getting the shaft in those circumstances? Well, it is the individual at the bottom of the scale who has to go to a tax agency because the present income tax forms are so complicated and so difficult that they defy being filled in by most individuals. These individuals have to go and pay for it, but they cannot deduct it. The big corporations can bury the cost in their accounting costs. There is no charge for them. I come back to the text:

> The position of Revenue Canada is even more infuriating. In the face of surveys that indicate 70% of taxpayers get help in preparing their returns, and over 46% pay a fee for such help, they routinely maintain that all taxpayers can complete their own returns.
> Revenue Canada makes these claims despite an accuracy rate of less than 50% in answering taxpayer phone enquiries, a functional illiteracy rate of 25% throughout the whole population (with functional illiteracy defined as the inability to follow written instructions) and an innumeracy rate of 50% throughout the whole population (with innumeracy defined as the inability to perform simple addition and subtraction).

I interject here to ask honourable senators please to note that figure: 50% innumeracy rate in the whole population. It is an unbelievable number. If you say that innumeracy means the inability to perform simple addition and subtraction, it is a sad comment on our educational system in this country.

Taxpayers with illiteracy and innumeracy problems have no more ability to complete their own tax returns than have paraplegics the ability to walk. Yet paraplegics can deduct the cost of their wheelchairs.

The Government orders us to file tax returns. For those unable to perform the task, a deduction or credit should be allowed when they pay others to do so. And if no deduction is to be allowed, then we demand that all wealthy taxpayers be reassessed a taxable benefit equivalent to the cost of tax return preparation buried in their accounting fees.

Revenue Canada has had no problem in arbitrarily assessing taxable benefits for the personal use of automobiles. Why have they never been able to do the same thing for the cost of preparing the tax returns of the wealthy?

Abraham Lincoln said that the United States would not survive half slave and half free. Captain Tax Time says Canada will not survive with 95% of the population paying its full share of taxes and the wealthiest 5% paying little or no taxes at all.

Sincerely,

Captain Tax Time.

As I said when I began, this is a comic book, and the producer of this, Mr. Paul Haynes, says in his letter that he wants to get the message across in a humorous way, but that there is a serious message.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Would the Honourable Senator allow me to ask a question? He spoke earlier of harmonization with the provinces. A number of us read the proceedings of the debate that took place last weekend among members of the Quebec Liberal Party, when militants insisted the provincial government adjust the GST on books and reading material in general.

The honourable Senator Molgat will recall that we advocated a similar measure when tabling one of our amendments. I am delighted to know that Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland is with us this morning. I believe that she will be particularly interested in your response, as Mr. Gérard-D. Lévesque has shown a great deal more sensitivity to this issue than the Honourable Senators opposite and the government they serve with admirable loyalty—indeed, all the more admirable because it is complete, indiscriminating—indeed, blind loyalty. I suppose it is because they believe that they must behave like a lot of sheep and follow the signal of those who have brought them to 14 and 15 % in the polls—namely, the Minister of Finance and his buddy, the Prime Minister.

Mr. Gérard-D. Lévesque initially resisted, but common sense and the need to think things through eventually prevailed, so that when he came back to Quebec, he in fact proposed tax relief in the area of books, book sales and sales of printed materials. I would ask my colleague if he does not in fact regret that harmonization talks between the provincial and federal governments came to an end. Our colleagues opposite cited as an example the total agreement between the Province of Quebec and federal government with respect to taxation. But are they not concerned about the feelings of the people who have been following these problems closely and who are the most threatened by them—in particular, publishers and companies that deal with books and printed material. Are they not concerned that the perfect harmony our colleagues opposite spoke of so euphorically earlier may in fact be disintegrating? Indeed, their pigheadedness, their complete refusal to listen to the pleas of one of their own colleagues, who is herself an author, is quite unbelievable. The government's refusal to see nothing and to do nothing to ensure that those whose livelihood depends on intellectual pursuits are not driven to bankruptcy by this kind of tax measure is completely incomprehensible to me. Should not the example of Mr. Gérard-D. Lévesque even coming, as it does, at the last minute, be a source of inspiration to our colleagues opposite?

Senator Molson: I guess that is a question.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc. I hope our colleagues opposite will want to answer that question themselves, because I think they are probably in a better position to do so than I. I must say that the tax adjustment proposed by the Quebec government for books and publishing materials delighted me, although I failed to see it in the light that you have just presented it in, which is completely logical. This is a perfect example of the fact that harmonization, about which so much has been said, is not really working. If there really had been meaningful discussions with the provinces and a real attempt to reach agreement, we would not now be in this predicament where the provinces, who tried to co-operate, find themselves unable to do so.

To get back to the issue of taxing books and published materials, the figures I have once again read to you indicate that Canada has a real problem when it comes to education, and rather than increasing the tax on books, we should actually be providing subsidies to encourage Canadians to read more and improve their education. We certainly should not be discouraging education in this country.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Do you not think we should suggest that Senator Chaput-Rolland, who expressed her views on the subject with graet emotion, play a more prominent role regarding the discussion that took place in Quebec last week? I am sure she still has some contact with the provincial Liberal Party. She certainly did have before. Could she not take it upon herself to make representations to Prime Minister Mulroney's henchmen on this issue, including explaining the changes being proposed by Mr. Lévesque? We may yet see a last minute conversion—perhaps not on the road to Damascus but at the entrance to the neighbouring town—on the outskirts of Damascus, in other words. Perhaps in this way, Mrs. Chaput-Rolland could be freed of the demons that have been torturing her ever since she told this Chamber that she believed Mr. Mulroney had promised that he would exempt publications and the publishing sector from the tax; by doing so, perhaps we could kill two birds with one stone.

Indeed, perhaps even hundreds or thousands of birds since, on the one hand, we would be providing Mr. Mulroney with an opportunity to show his generosity, to be—what is the word—"enlightened". And I do not mean this in the sense of showing the way to others, but simply appearing enlightened to the electorate. As I was saying, Mrs. Chaput-Rolland would recover her serenity and peace of mind—something that she has not had since allowing herself to be in the poor company of other colleagues during a vote on the issue, rather than abstaining, as her colleague, Mr. Castonguay, did.

Whether or not she pleaded with her House Leader to be allowed to avoid the humiliation she must have suffered when she rose and voted against the interest of publishers and intellectuals across the country, I believe it might be worthwhile suggesting to Mrs. Chaput-Rolland or one of her colleagues—perhaps the government leader, who expresses himself with such elegance—indeed, far more elegantly than I myself do—that there be another attempt to wrench one last concession from the government on the road to Damascus; one last conversion however, however modest. We all know there is greater joy in finding one lost sheep than in having the 99 others. In this case, the lost sheep are all those who blindly went off in the wrong direction. I am quite convinced that many of the profound errors that governments make are in fact the result of pigheadedness and of a bureaucracy that served previous governments badly and serves the present government badly as well. What I mean by that is they go out of their way to find formulas that are not based on good common sense, as one might hope, but are just intended to make people's lives difficult and produce the kind of income tax forms you talked about earlier, that are so complicated now that an ordinary Canadian can no longer look after his own income tax.

Finally, I would ask Senator Molgat, who is a man of considerable charm and can be very persuasive, to approach Mrs. Chaput-Rolland or, if she refuses, one of her colleagues who mounted a less vigorous defence of publishers' interests but could still carry the message forward, so that we might finally see a modicum of common sense prevail and stop oppressing Canadians by taxing books and reading materials.

I was recently shopping for Christmas presents in an Ottawa bookstore, and I noticed that even though these people do not generally get mixed up in politics, a number of publishers had in fact stuck a little card on many of the books in this French bookstore asking the government to at least refrain from taxing books which, particularly in French Canada, are already quite expensive.

European books are also now being sold in Canada, and Senator David will certainly agree with me that books from France being sold in Canada are already very expensive. If you add a 7% tax on top, it will certainly act as a disincentive, yet the government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to get ready to collect a tax that has not even been passed into law yet.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator LeBlanc. I would certainly encourage our colleague, Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, as she indeed in fact indicated she had reservations regarding this tax on books. She participated with us in this debate. I am sure that she will be willing to take the opportunity to give us her views on the subject.

[Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour).]

Other than that, I do not know what other kind of encouragement I can provide, other than these words. If by speaking to her personally, I could provide greater encouragement, I would certainly be very anxious to do that. I believe we need to hear everyone's point of view in this debate.

As I have said so often this morning, you will never have me believe that this tax simply must be implemented by January 1. If we really want to take the time, we will!

The manufacturer's sales tax is still with us. It has not be abolished. It can certainly stay in place for another year. In the meantime, we can work towards making our tax system fairer than the one currently being proposed—one that could in fact make special provision for books, in particular. That was the subject of the Liberal Party's first amendment. We could concentrate on that issue and find a solution to the problem.

If we insist on implementing the legislation by January 1, we will obviously be forced to bring in a new tax regime that is not only unfair and very costly, but that will have a detrimental impact on the provinces and the regions. We simply must take the time to develop a fairer system.

My colleague, Senator Lucier, was speaking earlier of the impact of this tax on the tourist industry. That is an issue that affects the regions, the provinces and the territories.

I have received many recommendations in this regard. Here is one of a regional nature. It is from the Province of Saskatchewan. The people who have sent me this petition do in fact work in this industry.

It is actually addressed to Prime Minister Mulroney. I have only been sent a copy. So, Mr. Mulroney has received it. The people who signed it are in the catering business. The heading is:

Petition condemning the proposed GST.

> We, the undersigned owners and operators of Canadian fishing and hunting lodges and resorts, wish to express our unequivocal opposition to the proposed Goods and Services Tax (G.S.T.) on the tourism industry and any political party or candidate supporting such a regressive tax for the following reasons:
> 1. While Canadians have no choice and will continue to have haircuts, buy new houses and other goods and services, Americans who constitute the bulk of our customers do have many options on where to spend their leisure dollars (Alaska, Belize, South America, Mexico, Costa Rica, etc.) and non Canadian options will only become more attractive than they already are.

2. The ultimate result of the G.S.T. will be less U.S. consumption of our unique outdoor products, putting many operators out of this already troubled business.

3. The loss of business will most adversely affect northern communities and native peoples where unemployment is already at an unacceptable and immoral level (Staff: client ratio in industry 1:1 to 1:3)

That is indicative of a very, very high employment factor in that particular industry.

The covering letter with this petition is dated May 24 and states:

The Honourable Gildas L. Molgat,

The Senate of Canada,

Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Senator Molgat:

The following resolution was passed at the 1990 spring meeting of the Saskatchewan Outfitters Association:

"That the Saskatchewan Outfitters Association go on record as not supporting the proposed Goods and Services Tax as presently proposed.

The Saskatchewan Outfitters Association request the Government of Canada to exempt all non-residents on all package tours to the province. Fishing and hunting tour packages should be treated as an export product and be exempt from the GST.

Failure to do this will mean severe economic consequences to the Saskatchewan Outfitting Industry and will further increase the high level of unemployment in northern Saskatchewan, particularly in regards to the northern native populations."

It is imperative that the Government of Canada consider this resolution. Failure to do so will have serious consequences for many businesses and people in the province.

The introduction of the Goods and Services Tax will totally change the fabric of the industry. The increase in prices charged to clients as a result of the GST will put the Canadian product at a competitive disadvantage.

We are presently aware of many outfitting operations that will be moving their base of operation outside of the country during the winter of 1990-91, in anticipation of the G.S.T. The only part of the operation that will occur in Canada is the fishing. All marketing and packaging of the product will be done out of the United States.

The economic benefit to the country will be decreased substantially.

We again ask for industry exemption to the G.S.T.

PS: Also included in this package is a petition signed by lodge operators across Canada condemning the G.S.T.

Yours truly,

Cliff Blackmur,
President
Saskatchewan Outfitters Association.

Senator Lucier, that is the view of the Outfitters Association of Saskatchewan. The petition is signed by lodge operators and owners across the country. I am sure this plea by the Saskatchewan Outfitters can be repeated by tourist operators throughout the country in every province and in every territory. And I note an interesting comment that he makes in his submission, that what would remain in Canada is the fishing. In other words, the use of our resources will continue, but the employment around the other aspect of it, the printing, all of the work that goes into the preparation of the tours, the individuals who work in the office to arrange the tours, all of that other work will cease to exist. What will be left to us is the lower paid work. The resource extraction, the planning, the work, the printing, the business head, the operation will be outside of Canada. I had not really focused on that particular aspect of the effect.

• (0900)

Tied in as well with this question of tourism, of course, is the restaurant and hotel industry, and I have here a letter from an individual who was in the restaurant industry. It so happens that the gentleman is originally from Manitoba, although he does not live there now. He is presently living in Surrey, B.C., but he is originally from Rivers, Manitoba, and he still owns a restaurant in Brandon, Manitoba, called the Soup Kettle, and he is violently opposed to this tax, considers it to be a regressive tax and sends me a document entitled, "GST and its Negative Impact on Restaurants and Middle and Lower Income Individuals", and possibly I should put that one in the record as well. It is dated January 22, 1990, originally addressed to the Honourable Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance and readdressed to me.

Re: Negative effects of GST.

1. Decrease sales especially in soft areas of the country.

2. Increase cost to customers in an area that they would not otherwise pay FST.

3. Compound taxation on food. 7 percent on 7 percent yields 14.49%.

He is talking about the Manitoba situation where our provincial sales tax is 7 per cent.

4. Increases costs to businesses in areas that they previously paid no tax such as on rents and accounting fees to name a few.

5. In soft economies greatly reduces operators chances to pass on costs to customers because an increase in prices to a customer also increases the tax that the customers will be paying.

6. Tax will reduce the number of tourists that will come to Canada because that will give them less money to spend while they are in the country. Most will look at the increased cost and ignore the fact that they can get a rebate. It will be claimed by a very few.

7. The Government is passing the dirty work on to the retailer to take the wrath of the customer who already object strongly to paying PST on food and other items. Many cashiers are paid poorly now and this will sure not help. The people who are not making minimum will be away from the battle lines as usual.

8. The small business person will have to do a lot of extra bookkeeping to keep track of the GST paid in each expense area and this will make the work load greater with no compensation. Again the little person gets the shaft. A lot of small operators have very poor booking systems now, like once a year for tax time, this tax will not improve the system.

We have to remember that many, many in the restaurant industry are indeed small, single operators. It is likely to be a family operation or one individual operator with very few employees. They do not have a computer system and a complicated accounting system to keep track of their inputs and outputs.

9. When a commercial property is purchased GST must be sent to the government and financed only to have all the GST returned to the purchased in the next quarter! A lot of unnecessary paperwork and inconvenience and no benefit to anyone.

10. The introduction of the GST will follow the same route as PST and personal taxes once they were introduced, they all went up, never really down. The amount the government takes from the individual is in the range of 60% to 70%. At what point does it stop? We have no choice we must pay and pay. The gas tax is another good example.

11. The introduction of the GST will see many smaller customer orientated businesses go bankrupt due to reduced sales because the customer does in fact have less to spend. The GST is not revenue neutral. It is obtaining 90% of its revenue from the individual not the businesses who can afford to pay more considering all their deductions.

12. The GST is a one sided tax the individual is the only one who eventually pays, the rest can write it off or pass it on! Many can least afford it especially in some parts of the country.

13. The GST will reduce the disposable income mainly for individuals that at present are in the middle and lower incomes, the ones that can least afford it.

14. The 7% on retail is the same as 13.5% on wholesale. The Government assume that the retail price is double the manufactures cost. So in effect no prices will fall and many more will go up.

15. The present government never used this tax as an election issue, if they had they would not be in power today, the electorate are strongly opposed to this tax regardless of politics.

He goes on:

[Senator Molgat.]

I have evaluated the tax on my own restaurant business operation and I projected a 7% loss in sales. I would be collecting $22,000 in tax I do not presently collect and my operating cost would rise by $5,800. The net result is that I would be sending $16,200 in taxes in the first year alone; if I survive from the decreased sales and increased costs and labour.

Please evaluate the above points with an open mind. I know we have to cut the deficit but this is going to hurt the segment that can least afford to help. They spend all their money just trying to stay afloat.

He is speaking about the lower end of the income bracket. This is Murray Watts. He signs "Murray Watts, a small businessman, Surrey B.C."

So there, Senator Lucier, in answer to your specific question regarding the effect on tourism, are responses from the people who are in the business, not from me. It is one thing for me to stand up here and say, "Well, you know, this is what I think it is going to do in the industry." There are the Saskatchewan outfitters, a large group representing many outfitters. This is what they say. Then there is this small businessman from my own province, and this is how he sees it.

Senator LeBlanc: Senator, if you will permit a question again. I find what he is saying is very interesting and very significant. We tend to talk about the North as the far north, and we also tend to think of regional underdevelopment as mainly an eastern problem, and I am going to try to attach my question—and I have to explain why I am going to precede my question with an explanation. If one looks at the map of Canada, the northern tier right across the country, practically from Port Edwards in British Columbia to Labrador, the northern tier is the underdeveloped part of the country with some very minor exceptions. Be it the native people in the northern prairie or northern Ontario or northern Quebec. Be it the people who live above Prince Rupert in British Columbia. There are real economic problems caused by distances, isolation, access, and I am going to talk about fisheries because I happen to know a little bit more about it, and I am going to talk about it in terms of tourism.

Senator Murray: When the time comes for you to intervene in the debate—

Senator LeBlanc: I apologize.

Senator Murray: You propose to do that when the time comes, to intervene in the debate, one assumes.

Senator LeBlanc: Yes, I will, but I may not have time to come to that because we are on to the impact of the tax on tourism. We all know that fish caught by a sportsman has economic ramifications which are very, very much higher than a fish caught and canned or served in a meal immediately or frozen or whatever way to do it, and for that reason the northern areas—and I am thinking of places like La Ronge and others and places in northern Quebec where my colleague Senator Watt knows so well, and in fact we discussed occasionally—the appeal that these places have is that they are very isolated and the very protection of the resource and multiplication of the resource comes from the fact that there is isolation, and therefore natural protection. When we look at the appeal for people from all over the world and look at the number of Japanese tourists that are sports fishing in British Columbia every year, the appeal right around the world is the isolation in the sense of unspoiled nature, the appeal of being outdoors, camping outdoors, et cetera. This is a resource which Canada has in great abundance and we are in one of the very favourite countries, and it has economic benefits for the population that lives there locally. Senator Roblin will understand this. The economic benefit to a fisherman in the northern prairie is not devived from sending his fish to be processed, at obvious cost, to a fish plant in Transcona or to have fish distributed in southern Canada by what is a necessary and expensive process. The great benefit that that resource has is to try to put it to the extent possible at the disposal of tourists and those who find the appeal of these regions to be very, very tempting and who would use these attractions if you did not overload the circuit with an additional tax, like this one. I would like to ask Senator Molgat what his knowledge of the northern area of his own province is, and if he would not agree with the fact that in Transcona, in the very area which he knows so well, the Winnipeg area, if the resource had been used more for the benefit of the local fishermen, either to bring in tourists or to put it to some use which tourists would visit—if those benefits would not, in fact, have been greater than having to survive in very difficult circumstances especially when you are thinking of transportation south.

• (0915)

Senator Molgat: Thank you very much for your question. The honourable senator is certainly in an ideal position to put that question, having been Minister of Fisheries at one time. Of course, he knows the operation of our Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation in Manitoba and, indeed, throughout the west and wherever it operates. There is no question that there is more value in a lake trout caught as an angling fish by tourists than in a lake trout caught in a net by a fisherman in a northern lake. That fish then has to be transported, usually at substantial cost, to the processing facility in Transcona and sent to market.

However, in order to maintain the value of the angling fish, there must be a concentrated tourist market. We must ensure that the people who are presently employed in the commercial fishery will benefit from the tourist industry. They know the commercial fishing business. They have been in it for years and usually the operation has been passed from father to son. The channels for gathering and selling the fish are there and they have the equipment and know-how to do the job. The Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is there to buy the fish. It is the easiest route to follow.

To transform that industry to tourism would require a concentrated effort. The GST would be an impediment to that effort. The outfitters said in their presentation that the adverse effect would come mainly in northern areas, areas where fishing, angling or commercial, is the only source of income. Exempting the GST from the tourist industry in these areas would help these people to transform their operations from commercial fishing to tourist fishing, or to operate in both. However, we need the assurance that people presently engaged in the commercial industry will benefit from the tourist industry. Definitely, they should be tied together. Certainly the GST would be a discouraging factor in that process. I hope that answers your question.

Senator LeBlanc: Thank you.

Senator Molgat: I come back to what Mr. Mills was saying about taxation. I had come to the point where he was providing a short history of taxation, which I think is important to understand fully what it is we are doing. We are heading off into a new field, and we ought to know from where it is we began. He is talking about the use of taxes, and goes on to say:

> Taxes are used for a variety of purposes from financing war to protecting domestic markets from foreign goods. Sometimes taxes are even used in an attempt to alter the behaviour of the population: to encourage them to have more (or less) children; to help persuade them to save rather than spend; to make it more rewarding to donate to charity or to political parties.

Then he goes on to cover the forms of taxation which I have already discussed. He indicates that income taxes were first brought in in England to finance the Napoleonic Wars and that they became a permanent tax in 1842. Then he deals with the situation in Canada and goes on to the effects of change, where he wrote:

> The Fathers of Confederation never foresaw how the tax system would change. The provinces were given direct taxing authority and the federal government indirect taxation powers. At the time of Confederation, direct taxes were very unpopular and little used. Indirect taxes are taxes imposed on one person, but paid in part or in whole by another; they are taxes that can be shifted. Commodity taxes, like the sales and excise taxes levied on manufacturers, are indirect taxes. The manufacturer on whom the sales tax is levied can pass the tax on in the form of higher prices.
> As the provincial jurisdictions expanded, they needed vast sums of money for welfare, education, roads, and hospitals. The provinces had to exploit all of the various kinds of direct taxes and, prior to World War I, they made use of succession duties, corporation taxes, and income taxes. The federal government, until World War I, stayed out of the direct tax field. In the 1920s, the provinces began to make use of gasoline taxes and, today, the most common direct tax used by the provinces is the retail sales tax.
> Income taxes were supposed to be temporary, according to the Federal Government during World War I. After the war, Ottawa reduced sales taxes, personal income taxes and corporate taxes, but the temporary taxes became permanent.
> The depression brought about a decline in imports which reduced tariff and excise revenues while the increase in unemployment put pressure on government spending. To cope through the 1930s, the government increased sales taxes, personal income taxes and corporate taxes on a regular basis. As well as forcing tax increases, the Depression also focused attention on the instability and constitutional impasse of the Canadian taxation system.

Recommendation for Reform

By 1937 the federal government was forced to act, and appointed the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission to review federal-provincial relations—which included the obvious problems with the tax system. Although the BNA Act gave the provinces specific rights to levy direct taxes, the Rowell-Sirois report recommended that all taxation of personal and corporate income be given to the federal (at the time the Dominion) government. In return, the provinces were to receive transfer payments (equalization grants and tax rental agreements) that would compensate for lost tax revenues and help to reduce regional disparities.

The Effects of World War II

The federal government and the provincial governments were just beginning to discuss the federalist nature of the problems when the financial pressures associated with World War II influenced a new agreement. With approximately 90% of all federal government expenditures directly related to the war effort, the provinces agreed on a temporary basis to give the federal government full power over corporate and personal income taxes.

The ability to use direct taxes to influence fiscal policy was immediately used by the federal government and they began to raise taxes and deduct those taxes at source. After the war, discussions continued between the provinces and the federal government on the tax system. With a series of five-year agreements, various equalization grants and tax rental agreements were commonplace for over 15 years.

Federal-Provincial Relations

Direct taxes, unpopular at the time of Confederation, have proved to be powerful fiscal tools that are more suitable than indirect taxes for implementing fiscal policy.

During the Second World War, a more equitable tax system existed when the provinces gave up their major tax fields (personal income tax, corporate profits tax and succession duties) to the federal government in return for tax rental payments and equalization payments.

The equalization payments were designed to lessen somewhat the gap between the revenues of the wealthy provinces and the poorer provinces.

Quebec stopped taking part in rental agreements after the war, arguing federal interference with provincial autonomy.

The other provinces, whose expenditures were increasing rapidly, pressed continually for a greater share of the revenues, while the federal government, noting its own rising expenditures, kept resisting.

In 1962 the tax rental agreements were terminated and the provinces were made responsible for levying their own corporate and personal income taxes. The federal government agreed to collect any taxes imposed by the provinces, provided the tax base was identified in the same way as the federal tax base.

That brings me to what I believe is essential in the proposed GST. We have to have the same agreement in connection with the GST as we have with the provinces insofar as personal and corporate income taxes are concerned. We need one collection system. The rates can vary as they do now on the income tax, but we must have one collection system. As Mr. Mills says, the agreement would work, "provided the tax base was identified in the same way as the federal tax base." Obviously, we would have to agree as to exactly what items would be taxed and what items would not be taxed within that one system. The amount can vary. If Ontario wanted to top-off the federal tax with an extra 2 per cent, let it do so, and if Manitoba wanted 4 per cent, let it do the same, as long as there is one collection system and not a great big bureaucracy repeating what already exists in the provinces. Admittedly, there are variations in what is taxed and what is not taxed between provinces. However, surely we can sit down as reasonable individuals and say, for example, "We will not tax children's clothing, but we will tax such and such. We won't tax books but we will tax something else." Mr. Mills went on:

> Quebec collects all its own taxes, and Ontario collects its own corporate taxes.
> The conference on constitutional reform in June 1969 made some progress toward agreeing on the division of the taxing powers. There was agreement in principle that both the federal and provincial governments should have access to both direct and indirect taxes.

● (0930)

It is an important agreement because it removes the constitutional challenge, provided all the provinces agree—apparently they did in 1969—and provided that both levels of government would have access in the direct and indirect. At least that removed one constitutional hurdle and means we can proceed with a straight discussion, regardless of whether or not you have the right to do so. That is agreed.

By the mid 1980s, the federal government's revenues came from:

personal income tax	42.1%
corporate income tax	13.3%
sales taxes	12.2%
customs import duties	5.1%
other	20.6%
non-taxrevenue	6.7%

Basically there are six sources, personal income tax being predominant at 42 per cent.

In contrast provincial revenues had a much wider base:

There are 18 different revenue sources at the provincial level against six sources at the federal level. Within the 18 provincial sources, personal income tax comprises 21 per cent of the total; whereas in the federal situation, personal income tax comprises 42 per cent. In other words, the federal government is twice as dependent at the moment on personal income tax compared to the provinces. Of the provincial revenues, personal income taxes comprise 21.3 per cent; corporate income taxes, 4.2 per cent; general sales taxes,11.8 per cent; motor-fuel taxes, 3.4 per cent; other consumption taxes, 2.4 per cent; property taxes, 0.2 per cent; miscellaneous taxes, 2.2 per cent; universal pensions, 1.4 per cent; health insurance premiums, 3.4 per cent; workers compensation contributions, 2.8 per cent; natural resource revenue, 7.6 per cent; privileges, licences and permits, 2.2 per cent; liquor board profits, 2.2 per cent; sales of goods and services, 2.1 per cent; return on investment, 10.5 per cent; other own source revenue, 1.6 per cent; general purpose transfers, 5.8 per cent; and specific purpose transfers, 14.9 per cent. The source of that information is the Provincial and Municipal Finances (1985) published by the Canadian Tax Foundation in 1986. So we see that the federal government is much more dependent on personal income tax. It has basically six sources of revenues, whereas the provinces have identified 18 different sources of revenue, none having the predominance of the personal income tax in the federal field.

In 1962, the Prime Minister of canada, John George Diefenbaker, appointed a Royal Commission to investigate the tax system. Six volumes and five years later the Carter Report made several recommendations about the tax system which have variously been called reforms, realignments and ridiculous. Perhaps the most famous phrase from this report was Carter's comment that "A buck is a buck is a buck" which has sometimes been attributed to Edgar Benson. Although, by today's standards, Carter's recommendations were not that radical, he received little support from business, from the finance department or from many of his fellow politicians.

Two years later (1969), Edgar Benson, the Liberal Finance Minister, responded to the Carter Report with a white paper on taxation. Those recommendations also failed to get support from business, the finance department, or the politicians. So, when a Tax Act was introduced in 1972, it contained little of Carter's original recommendations.

Resistance to Reform

As a reform of the tax system, the Carter Report was simply not accepted, particularly by the special interest groups. The consistent lobbying, public campaigns against the provisions, and the lack of political will, resulted in the Tax Act of 1972 being substantially amended.

The political reality of facing such a determined opposition to tax changes resulted in little attempts at reform for the rest of the 1970s. In 1981, the Liberal Finance Minister, Allan MacEachen—

I am pleased to see that he is here with us.

—introduced a budget that unexpectedly reintroduced the tax reform debate to the citizens of Canada for the second time in a decade.

If one point was made, in the tax reform debates of the 1970s and the early 1980s, it was that the special interest groups were well organized, well funded and well connected with the media. After their campaign against the government programs, the government was forced to withdraw most of the reform measures.

Complicated System

From the end of the Second World War until 1962, every finance minister in the federal cabinet added exemptions, incentives and programs to redistribute income, encourage business development and gain votes. Taxes continued to grow in order to meet the demands of the social safety net of Canadian society. Complaints that the tax system was inefficient, unfair and too complex were commonplace.

At the beginning of the 1990s, citizens still believe our tax system is unfair, inefficient and too complicated for the average person. The Mulroney/Wilson tax reform measures that have been introduced contain few attempts to eliminate the special preferences enjoyed by special interest groups. The rhetoric, suggesting that the provisions in the 1987 white paper and the GST are true tax reforms, rings hollow compared to other efforts since 1962.

Therefore, a reform of the federal tax system is still badly needed. Apart from improving the federal system it might also encourage a reform of some of the provincial tax systems to make them fairer, simpler and more efficient.

Why Taxes are Needed

Earlier forms of taxes were used to support the lifestyle and the conquests of rulers. Even today taxes still have to be used for defense purposes and to provide government residences. In a large, modern, democratic country, the governing of that country is delegated to a few who have to attend to the job full-time. So taxes have to support the salaries and expenses of the elected members of Parliament and the permanent staff of the various government departments and ministries.

In Canada, several different levels of government levy and spend tax revenues: federal, provincial, regional and municipal governments are all involved in the process.

Hon. Dan Hays: Senator Molgat, I appreciate being enlightened on this topic. I wonder if you can comment on the general concept of tax reform as an integral component of what a country does to be competitive in the world. We talk a lot about this with respect to the global economy. We now have many companies that are multinational—certainly international—and you are quoting extensively from Mr. Mills' single tax text.

I wonder if you could draw our attention, by giving us your own views, to how tax reform plays an important role in the country's strategy to be competitive in the world today. I note that some countries are doing a better job of that, which is one of the reasons we have a high deficit and why our future does not appear to be as bright as it should. What would give us confidence in our country? That is one of the things that I hope to comment on when I have an opportunity to speak to Bill C-62.

I thought I would interrupt you at this point because you are familiar with what is in Mr. Mills' book. It would be helpful if you could enlighten honourable senators on how tax reform plays a role in the strategy of the country as a whole with respect to its competitiveness. No country is more interested in that than Canada because, per capita, we rely more heavily on exports than any other country in the world.

Senator Molgat: Unfortunately, Senator Hays, I have to repeat what I said earlier. I am not a tax expert by any means, and I do not think I am in a position to give a reasoned, technical answer to your question. My response would be more in the sense of one who has been involved in politics and dealing with people for many years.

One of the concerns of the Canadian people now is the economy. There is no question they are concerned about the deficit. Unfortunately this tax is not being presented as a tax that will deal with the deficit. Senator Finlay MacDonald spoke eloquently while the committee was travelling, and I will not quote his statements. It is definitely a topic of concern to Canadians.

To return to how we compare our taxes to those of other countries, we are in a unique position in Canada. We are not like a European country that has many neighbours very close by. They are small, homogeneous countries that do not have our regional economic differences. Ours is a country that deals with one other country ten times our size in economics and in population. We have an inter-connection of transport and communication by radio, television and film. Many Canadians travel south in the winter for a whole host of reasons, one of which being the better weather. We are much more under the influence of our neighbours than are European countries. People in Germany do not feel the same pressures the French, British or Italians do.

● (0945)

Everything in our society links us closely to the Americans, as does language. True, we have two languages here, but the major language of business is the same. So there is a particular problem for us in this matter of having a tax system that is not completely out of step with theirs. I think we have to be very cautious about that. I do not like to look at it in the sense that we are forced to do something because the Americans want us to do it. I want to be free to do what we want to do as Canadians. However, I cannot help but accept, by the reality of geography and economics, that we have to be very careful that whatever we do does not put us too far out of step. After all, many Canadians are increasingly travelling to the United States for economic reasons. Often they are going to buy across the border and, unfortunately, I am afraid that even more of them will be tempted to do so if the GST goes through. So we have to be careful that we are not too far out of step.

Senator Hays: Senator Molgat, you discussed my question in a Canada-U.S. context. I really had in mind a broader context, but let me go to your Canada-U.S. comparison and how that affects us. As I understand it, the United States has just gone through a difficult process of addressing its deficit. The means they have decided to use, in part, included an increase in taxes, notwithstanding the President's commitment during the election that there would be no new taxes. I guess that was an undertaking he always knew he would have to break, and it is now broken. It appears that that is the route that they have decided to follow to address their problems, which are not dissimilar to ours—that is, a rising deficit, heavy debt service, with a lot of that debt service dependent on foreign investment, particularly from Japan and Europe. I wonder if you could agree or disagree that that is a signal to Canada that a consumption tax puts us out of sync with the United States and puts us at risk in ways that we had not anticipated when the goods and services tax was planned, and that that might be another reason for rethinking it at this time?

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator Hays. If I put my reply in terms of the American context, I think I tried to explain why I thought that that one was so important to us for a whole host of reasons. However, I agree you cannot simply ignore that we are living in an ever more dependent world, but I do not think that our tax regime in Canada, compared to, say, the tax regime in Japan, has that much of an impact on Canadians. We are not that aware of what the Japanese setup is. Quite obviously, it is different when you come to the question of tariffs. I am thinking of the discussion we had a couple of days ago about the tariff on canola and canola oil and our dealings with Japan.

As far as our Canadian population is concerned, we still have to focus more on the U.S. question. However, be that as it may, I do think that in any of our tax measures we have to look at what it is that we want to do as Canadians, and that has to be the first priority, but we cannot do it in a vacuum. We have to be conscious of the countries we deal with and the countries with which we have rapport whether by history, geography or economics. We cannot be too far out of step. Moving to a GST will certainly put us more out of step with our main neighbour and our main economic partner.

I wish I could give you a more tax-expert approach to it, but I am not in a position to do that. As I said at the opening of my comments, I can only really relate to the proposed tax as a Canadian who has been involved in Canadian politics for a very long time, and I sense this problem. Perhaps I overemphasize the American problem, but to me it is an overwhelming one for us, and I cannot think of any other country in the world that has that same relationship at all. If we look at the countries in the rest of the Commonwealth, it is true that New Zealand has a somewhat similar relationship to Australia, with a similar population difference, one to ten, but even though Canadians seem to think of them as being close neighbours, they are not. They are separated by 1,500 miles of ocean. They do not have the cross-country border.

For us, it is an entirely different operation. We have a strip 100 miles wide and about 3,000 miles long where 90 per cent of our people live and where there is that constant flow. I am afraid that, very often, we know more about what goes on in the United States than about what goes on in distant parts of our own country. So I have to see the tax impact as one mainly connected with the American scene and less with what goes on in the EC, for example. Perhaps I am too dominated by what I consider to be, perhaps not dangerous—although perhaps it is dangerous, in a sense, to Canadian independence—but that pervasive influence of the United States. It is not by any ill-will on their part but by the very fact of what they are and how big they are. I do not know if I have gone any distance to answering your question.

Senator Hays: Well, you certainly tried, Senator Molgat, and I thank you for that.

Senator Molgat: All right. So to come back to tax reform, Mills goes on to say:

> The provision of law and order within a country, and protection from threats from abroad, also needed revenue raised from the population, and modern armed services, police forces and the judiciary are also funded via taxes. Most citizens would support the wisdom of having the services of the courts, the army and the police under central control and financing. The alternative is a system of private warlords and arbitrary justice with the weakest going to the wall.

He then discusses social programs:

> As developed countries became both more complex and more specialized, and the responsibilities of the family, the community, and to some extent private enterprise, were increasingly taken over by government, revenue was needed to pay for those additional services. Social security systems, health services, and environmental protection agencies all require money to pay for them and taxes have to be raised to meet those costs.
> In Canada, federal taxes now have to pay for a long list of items. These can include a wide range of expenditures: the salaries of immigration judges, teachers and astronauts; the costs of subsidies to farmers and fishermen; maintaining embassies abroad or Canadian parks at home; and helping our less developed neighbours or the less fortunate within our own boundaries.

Then he goes on to why people accept taxation:

> Whether people have to be coerced into paying taxes by force or whether they are grudgingly accepted as a necessity, they are never popular. So unpopular can they become, that they have started many a revolt and revolution. The United States, one of the most powerful nations on earth, came into being over a dispute about taxes. But, in a modern democracy, such as Canada, most people agree that taxes provide useful or necessary government programs and services, even though they sometimes disagree on what any particular government decides is useful or necessary.
> The Limits to Acceptance
> However, this acceptance is based on several conditions: that the "pain" is shared equally amongst the population—

And I think that is very important. That is an essential element of fairness in a tax. One of the great objections of Canadians to the GST is that they do not feel that it is fair. I come back to what was said in this chamber regarding the people in the North who are going to feel the impact of the GST much more than people in the South. There is no question about that. It is not a surprise that our Inuit friends came and sat in our galleries when Senator Watt presented his resolution on the North. They are going to be directly affected. It is not something that will be happening to someone else eventually. If the GST goes in—God forbid that it will—the people represented by my colleagues, Senators Watt, Adams and Lucier, are going to bear a much greater proportionate share than other Canadians. Mr. Mills says, the "pain" must be shared equally. Well, people do not feel it is being shared equally. The people in my province of Manitoba, by proportion, are going to pay a higher amount of GST than Canadians living in Ontario and Quebec. The basic manufacturing of this country goes on here in the central provinces. When you move those goods to our part of the country, there are transportation costs, and we will pay the GST on those transportation costs. To the extent that there is less competition as you get away from the bigger centres, and the prices are higher, you will pay a larger share of the GST. So there is an inequality in the system.

Mills goes on to state that the second condition for acceptance is that the workings of the system should be able to be understood by the average taxpayer. Well, I do not think that the GST meets that test either. Not only do I think that the average taxpayer will have difficulty in understanding it, I think the government has difficulty in understanding it. For those who were not here earlier in the course of my comments, I read some correspondence I had with the Department of Finance. I will not read it now, but I would simply point out that back in October of 1989, I was seeking information on behalf of a chap who had been a constituent of mine when I was in the provincial legislature of Manitoba. He operated a small coin-operated laundromat in a small village in Manitoba, which operated by people putting in four quarters, pushing the lever and starting the machine. His question was whether he had to pay the GST. I said I really did not know but that I would try to find out for him. I started on October 19 with a letter to the Department, to which I received no answer. I wrote again on January 24, again to Information Services, and again received no answer. I wrote again on March 5, this time to the minister himself, not having bene able to obtain any answer from his Information Services. I finally received an answer on July 19, and it included a page and half of propaganda first about how great the GST was, and then a short reply to my question:

> With regard to coin-operated laundromat machines, the GST will be 7/107ths of the total amount collected from the machine.

Now, I sent that answer to my friend who operates the laundromat. How can he figure out what he is going to remit on the basis of twenty-five cents collected? It is 7/107ths, and I submit that it is not a simple answer.

• (1000)

I do not think the GST meets the second test put forward by Mr. Mills, that the workings of the system can be understood by the average taxpayer. The GST is apparently not understood by the bureaucrats, if one judges by the length of time it takes to give an answer and the type of answer given.

The third test Mr. Mills puts forward is that the money collected is used effectively for the purposes agreed by the majority of the citizens. Collecting taxes, never a popular task historically, can only be carried out to the limits of tolerance of those having to pay them.

Senator Olson: Now that the operator of the laundromat knows he has to collect 7/107ths of the total that is collected in the machines, how will he arrange to collect that money from the people who are putting the coins in the machine? Is he supposed to take it out of his own pocket. If the usual required amount is two quarters, which it usually is, will the vendor put in three quarters? I am curious how the operator will collect it from his customers without either overcharging or undercharging them. According to the reply to the letter you received, even if there are machines left that are set up to take a nickel, neither a nickel, dime or quarter works out. What does your friend say about that part of it?

Senator Molgat: Senator Olson, I am sorry, but I do not know what solution he has come to. All I can tell you is that I sent him a copy of the letter from the minister's department. As he and I usually converse in French, my reply to him was in French, but I will give you a quick translation of what I said. I told him that correspondence started on October 19, 1989, that there were several letters and I sent him copies. I told him that finally I had a reply: "five long paragraphs of propaganda and then a short paragraph telling me that you will have to remit 7/107ths of tax on your sales. As I suspect, it would cost you too much money to change your automatic machines in order to increase your prices. I am afraid that you will have to pay the tax from your own pocket."

I do not know what solution my friend will eventually accept. However, he has a real problem because his is not a big operation. The town of McCreary has a population of 800 or 900, so the laundromat is not a great, bustling enterprise. I would suspect that the cost of converting his machines to take another coin of some type will be more costly than it would be worth. However, if he does proceed to the change, he will probably either be overcharging or undercharging, if one looks at the increase purely from a GST remittance standpoint, because I do not know how one splits 7/107ths of twenty-five cents. I do not know what the solution is. It certainly imposes on a small businessman a very large cost item.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Lucier: Senator Molgat, you say that the laundromat operator has a serious problem. However, I wonder whether the operator has a serious problem or whether the poor people in that region who use his services have a serious problem. As I said in my earlier remarks regarding laundromats, the only logical solution for this poor guy to try and get out of this mess is to increase the price. If it is presently $1.00, which it usually is, it will be to increase it by a quarter. He is going to put a twenty-five cent tax on. So while he will have to remit 7/107ths, it will be the poor people in that area who will pay. As I said before, rich people do not use laundromats; it is poor people who use laundromats. They are the ones who will have to absorb this and take a 25 percent shot on it, not a 7 per cent shot, because the operator cannot put a seven cent slot on the machine. He has to put a twenty-five cent slot on the machine.

Senator Molgat: Senator Lucier, you are correct. If he proceeds to change the machines to take the extra twenty-five cents, there will be an overcharge insofar as the GST is concerned and the public using the machines will be paying substantially more. Because it is not a big operation, I suspect he may find that the cost of changing the machines would be too high, in which case he has to absorb and pay the 7/107ths—what a simple calculation—when he remits at the end of the period the money collected. It will be a nightmare for him; and for his customers, it may be a substantial additional charge.

Your reasoning is correct that the bulk of people who use laundromats are people who are in the lower income category. If they had more income they would probably own a washing machine. Although some people who use laundromats are people who are travelling or have no permanent base, people with a permanent base who use laundromats generally are those who are not able to afford washing machines. Therefore, there is a discrimination.

I think it is important that we have the background of Mills' thinking when he is developing his tax approach in order to understand why it is that he is proposing what he is. That is the reason I give this background which he has in the book.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have received another flyer on my desk, with no indication where it came from. It is an editorial with the headline "Pass the GST". I do not know who is sending these things around, but we are getting a little tired of our desks being used for mailboxes. I have a mailbox and they may put it in there. It looks like the gremlins are at it again. This editorial in The Vancouver Sun states, "Pass the GST", so I guess perhaps Senator Carney knows where it came from. Did Senator Carney have this put on our desks? I thank her very much, but I do not need any more propaganda. I read the headline and that is enough.

I will tell you that I do not want my desk cluttered up with these things. I have a mailbox for that purpose. I thought we agreed the other day that we were not going to have this propaganda distributed to our desks.

Senator Barootes: It is our form of petition, Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: That is what it is. It is a terrible abuse to have this photocopied and sent to us. I have read this kind of garbage before.

We will spend quite a few hours arguing that this sort of information is not in the Canadian interest. We have hundreds of pages of good documentary evidence given to us by Canadians who are concerned about the GST.

That is not the point. The point is that if our desks are going to be garbage-collection places, I believe that senators on both sides of the house would agree that it would not be a good thing to deteriorate to that kind of mess in this place. I hope honourable senators opposite will stop doing this.

Hon. Pat Carney: I should like clarification of your remarks, Senator Olson.

You said that it is not in the national interest for the Vancouver Sun to run this editorial.

Senator Olson: I did not say that. I said that this should not be put on my desk.

Senator Carney: You said that it was not in the national interest to have this kind of garbage published. Are you saying that the Vancouver Sun does not have the right to write an editorial that says:

> Enough is enough. It's time Liberal members of the Senate stopped horsing around with the goods and services tax and let Canadians get on with the job of learning to cope with it.

Are you saying in this chamber—and I am asking for clarification —that the Vancouver Sun has no right to take an editorial stance on the GST, as it has?

Senator Olson: I did not say that. Senator Carney can say that as many times as she likes, but there are many witnesses here.

Senator Austin: The record will show what he said.

Senator Olson: I did not say that the Vancouver Sun could not publish that. There are other papers in Canada that print things that, in my view, are garbage.

I object to the fact that someone is putting this on everyone's desk, cluttering up our environment and using up trees, as the environmentalists say, for things that are absolutely unnecessary. We had a discussion about this the other day. We said that we did not want this kind of garbage—whether it is good garbage or bad garbage—put on our desks.

It was pointed out that every one of us has a mailbox. That is where we expect to receive communiques from any other senator or anyone else in the country, not piled up on our desks. If the Senate is not going to make a prohibition against this kind of ridiculous distribution, I want everyone to know that I do not want this scrap on my desk. This is a private area for me to use while I am here.

Perhaps we have an admission. "Me thinks thou doest protest too loudly." It is probably Senator Carney who did this. You have no right to pollute my desk or anyone else's desk. If you want to do this in the future, at least have enough respect for other senators to find out whether or not they want you to pollute and contaminate their desk with your propaganda. I, for one, do not want this.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable Senators, at some point this issue should be referred to a Standing Committee on Rules. I have noted that this is a spreading habit, and I use that word advisedly.

Even though we have been issued these rather voluminous and noisy garbage cans, I do not think that is a reason to use perfectly good paper. This is not even recyclable paper, which means it is environmentally friendly. What is more unfriendly about it is to be deluged with propaganda.

Unless we establish a rule, at some point the pro-abortion or anti-abortion groups may hand over a pile of propaganda. The messengers will then be asked to distribute it to us. Unless we address this issue, it will become completely exaggerated.

Hon. William E. Kelly: I should like to raise a point of order. Honourable senators, we are here to debate Bill C-62. While this discussion is fascinating and very interesting, it does not seem to me to have anything whatsoever to do with the order we are debating.

Senator Olson: You are supposed to raise a point of order at the first opportunity. That is what our rules say, and we still follow the rule book.

Senator LeBlanc: Senator Kelly has just said that we are debating the bill on the GST, and he has asked why we are having these irrelevant discussions. He has just passed judgment on a document which I suspect came from Senator Carney.

Senator Olson: She kind of admitted it.

Senator Carney: No, I did not.

Senator LeBlanc: If Senator Kelly wants to say that these things distributed by Senator Carney are totally irrelevant, I would love to see them settle that among themselves.

Senator Carney: On a point of order. Senator LeBlanc stated without equivocation, that I distributed this Vancouver Sun article. I would have been delighted to have done so, but, in fact, I did not personally distribute this editorial. I point out that it says—what you call propaganda—is that the uncertainty and divisiveness created by the stonewalling of the Liberal senators are only making things worse.

I am interested that you say that a Vancouver Sun editorial, writtenby an independent newspaper, widely respected in the west is propaganda. I will ensure that the Vancouver Sun is aware of your views.

Senator Roméo LeBlanc: While you are talking to the Vancouver Sun, if they are still talking to you, you might tell them that if they want some lessons in divisiveness in order to write the next batch of editorials, they should take the record of the present government. They would find that, not only in connection with the GST but in a whole series of other fields, Canadians have been blockaded "braqués les uns contre les autres" by this government. Perhaps then, when they check this editorian and make a correction, the honourable senator might want to distribute that also.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable Senators, I believe the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate has already informed the Government Leader in the Senate and the Speaker that I wanted to raise a question of privilege. I would like to tell my colleagues on both sides of this Chamber that I am not trying to prolong the debate nor my participation in it by raising this question of privilege.

This morning I got up earlier than usual and read the Globe and Mail, as I generally do, because it is recognized as the mouth-piece of the Liberal Party, and in any case I make it my business to read it.

I came across an article that shocked me and insulted me as a French Canadian. I have had enough of being classified as a francophone from outside of Quebec! I am a Canadian of French origin, and I was in Canada before the Quebecers.

I had only the English version, using the Globe and Mail's adjectives, of Yves Beauchemin's famous comment. Before raising my question of privilege, I wanted to see what Quebec journalists (if we really can apply that term to most of them in Quebec) had to say on the subject.

Apparently Yves Beauchemin appeared before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and said, and I quote: "The francophone community outside of Quebec reminds me of a still-warm corpse".

I have something to say to Mr. Beauchemin, and I hope Senators Tremblay and David will pass my remarks on to him. I am insulted at remarks of this type from certain Quebecers who think they are the only French-speakers in the world! I sometimes wonder whether these remarks are made out of ignorance or malice.

If Quebecers have become so much better than everyone else, if they want to have their own country at all costs, hell, let them have it! I am fed up with this paternalistic attitude on the part of Quebecers who think they know the answer to everything.

Honourable Senators, I protest vehemently against this type of insults that we are constantly getting from pseudo-intellectuals or journalists in Quebec. They should apologize for their radicalism, for their inward-looking approach, and their attitude that they are the Cat's Meow!

Some Hon. Senators: Bravo!

Senator Paul David: Honourable Senators, I do not wish to defend Mr. Beauchemin. As you know, he is a writer of some renown in Quebec. Moreover, I think you should make your protest to him directly. Either he was correctly reported in the newspaper from which you quoted, or he was not. Journalists sometimes, in fact often, distort a writer's ideas.

[Senator Roméo LeBlanc.]

If we were to assume for the moment that the allegation is true, I do not think one Quebecer represents all five million French-speaking Quebecers.

Senator Thériault: I am very pleased to hear Senator David's clarification.

I would just like to tell him that according to the Globe and Mail, Mr. Beauchemin said he was not sorry for making his remarks shortly after his appearance before the Commission.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable Senators, I am rising on a question of privilege because of the way in which Senator Thériault expressed his outrage—quite correctly, by the way—at Mr. Beauchemin's remarks.

I full support his reaction to Mr. Beauchemin's comments. I do not hesitate in sharing his feelings in this regard.

My question of privilege is based on the fact that Senator Thériault gradually moved from talking about Mr. Beauchemin to talking about Quebecers generally. Toward the end of his comments, he seemed to lump many Quebecers in with Mr. Beauchemin.

I certainly agree with Senator Thériault's reaction to Mr. Beauchemin's remarks, which were completely out of line. There has been considerable discussion of these remarks on Ontario 30 and elsewhere here in the region. However, I think Senator Thériault is making a serious mistake by attributing the same attitude to other Quebecers. It has never occurred to me personally to adopt the so-called paternalistic attitude he referred to at the end of his comments.

Senator Thériault: Honourable Senators, I certainly understand that Senator Tremblay has not always paid attention to the type of patois I use, because I think this is a type of patois used by certain Quebecers. I can imagine that if one is a Quebecer and lives in Quebec in the extreme nationalistic context that exists at the moment, one might not always pay attention to statements of this type. But I can tell him that as recently as two or three weeks ago, maybe less, Lise Bissonnette wrote an editorial in the Le Devoir that is somewhat similar to what I have been saying. It is true that my accusations do not apply to all Quebecers. In fact some members of my own family even live in Quebec. Not all Quebecers are doing this, but there is a group of pseudo-intellectual journalists in Quebec at the moment who behave like Beauchemin. That is why I say: "If the shoe fits, wear it".

bSenator Leblanc (Beauséjour): I saw how upset Senator Thériault was this morning at 6.30 when he told me about this matter. We wanted to check exactly what had been said in the French-language newspapers, because, personally, I have never found that the world can be interpreted by a single prophetic voice, in this case the Globe and Mail, over which Senator Doyle formally presided. I think the matter is much more significant than the mere irritation that we may feel at the statement made by Beauchemin. I think the question of francophone minorities underlies much of the discussion going on at the moment about the constitutional future of our country.

Personally, I do not intend, whatever happens, to repatriate Quebec. For me, Quebec is no more my homeland than France is. Whatever the future of our country may be I will remain where I have been since 1603—in the Acadian community. Having said that, I think we should perhaps have a more thorough discussion of this matter, perhaps preferable here rather than in the other place, because I think there is more serenity here, once things calm down a bit.

There is more serenity to examine the role of minorities in constitutional discussions since 1867. There is no doubt that since the beginning of confederation the discussion on francophones outside and even inside Quebec, was defined in religious terms much more than in linguistic terms.

I think it would be a good idea not only to express our legitimate indignation at Mr. Beauchemin's statement, but to raise questions about the status of minorities in Canada, and there are one million of them—whatever happens in the country's constitutional future.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, since I was here in the Chamber, I did not have an opportunity to see the article referred to by my colleague, Senator Thériault. As a person born in Manitoba and as a French-speaking Canadian, the question is of great interest to me, and I would like to take part in the discussion of this point of privilege. However, I will reserve my remarks for another time, because I am in no position to speak at the moment. I do share the concern expressed by many regarding some of the comments coming out of Quebec.

As I said, at the time of the Meech Lake debate, I always thought of myself as a French Canadian, and I was never happy with the term franco-Manitoban, francophone outside of Quebec, or whatever. I am a French Canadian and we kept our language in my province. It was not always easy, but we managed to maintain it. In my case I will not go any further for the moment, until I have a clear idea of exactly what was said.

To get back to the discussion, there was a comment about something that was circulated in the House this morning.

[English]

With regard to the material that is sitting around in the chamber, perhaps it is something that the Senate rules committee should consider. At the very least, whoever distributes material in the chamber should identify himself or herself so that we know the source.

Senator Olson: Prohibition.

Senator Thériault: Unless they are ashamed. The honourable senator indicated that perhaps it is Senator Carney, and certainly she seems to have established some proprietary right to this document; perhaps she was embarrassed about distributing it.

Senator Olson: She did not sign it.

Senator Murray: I think it is trying to waste time.

Senator Carney: As the Leader of the Government in the Senate says, I believe you are just trying to waste time. I do not know whether you are seeking employment as an editorial writer for the Vancouver Sun but you have certainly conveyed that impression. I am more than happy to read the entire editorial into the record, if that would satisfy you.

Senator Thériault: That is not the question. Who distributed the article?

Senator Carney: As I pointed out before, I support this editorial supporting passage of the GST bill, but I did not distribute it in the chamber.

Senator Thériault: Did you have it distributed?

Senator LeBlanc: My difficulty with Senator Carney is a little bit like Senator Kelly's comment a while ago. On the one hand, Senator Carney accuses us of wasting time, but, on the other hand, she continues to promote her piece of paper. She has to make up her mind. Either the editorial was valuable enough to be distributed and, therefore, valuable enough for us to stop and consider, or it was not—in which case why was it distributed? I do not think she can have this one both ways. On the other hand, that is usually what editorial writers do: they often start with an assumption and often finish with their prejudices.

Senator Carney: Honourable senator, it is not in the journalistic tradition to suggest that editorials are merely prejudices. I do not believe this editorial can deserve that title.

I will read you this paragraph, so that you understand my point.

> Perhaps Senator Allan MacEachen, the Liberal House leader, would enjoy playing the Grinch who stole Christmas, by blocking the delivery of GST rebate cheques worth $600 million to some eight million low- and middle-income Canadians.

Senator Thériault: Whose money?

Senator Carney: The next paragraph:

> But they're not the only ones who would suffer. Any further uncertainty about the introduction of the tax on Jan. 1 will create chaos for businesses already hurting because of the recession. Let it pass, Mr. Grinch, and let's try to make the best of a bad situation.

I do not find that a matter of prejudice; I think it is a matter of judgment and of good, reasonable thought.

Senator Olson: Pure garbage! Pure garbage!

Senator LeBlanc: Senator Carney read the article. First of all, I really have a fairly high opinion of the Vancouver Sun, including, occasionally its editorial page. I am sorry that in some ways Senator Carney has shaken my confidence in the Vancouver Sun. To think that that paper could take, practically holus bolus, the propaganda put out by the Department of Finance on the GST operation—and it is propaganda to which they will not even place a signature. They tried to hide under the multicoloured folder that came through our mail slots.

I mean, this is a bunch of reluctant parents that we have around here. No one wants to take responsibility for this sheet of paper which was distributed. People pay with public money for this propaganda. They do not even do what the official agent in any election does, which is to at least have his name appear at the bottom of the page.

Now we are served with an editorial or something, disguised as an editorial, which does not appear to have been written by anyone. I suspect it is cut out, pasted and printed with those new copying machines.

Senator Carney: An editorial is an editorial.

Senator LeBlanc: These days one cannot even see the line of the cutting and pasting. It was just pasted and put into a printing press straight from the Department of Finance. Well, that is all right. The Department of Finance, with that sort of operation, obviously has good connections through Senator Carney.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Carney could explain why she is so anxious to believe the editor of the Vancouver Sun instead of 85 per cent of the people of British Columbia who are opposed to the GST, including those who were to receive cheques.

Senator Murray: Is this your intervention in the debate, or is that it?

Senator Lucier: No, no. I was just asking her a little question.

Senator Murray: Senator Molgat has a speech to make, if he is permitted to complete it.

Senator Olson: Give us your explanation.

Senator Carney: I am sorry, I did not hear your question, Senator Lucier.

Senator Lucier: I will repeat it. I was wondering why you are so anxious to believe and support the editor of the Vancouver Sun instead of the 85 per cent of the people of British Columbia, including those who were to receive these cheques, who are opposed to the GST and are supporting what we are doing.

Senator Carney: I support the editorial in the Vancouver Sun because I think it has made a very sound and reasonable point; but that is not the issue in discussion here. The issue is that you senators are challenging the right of a leading Canadian newspaper to express its editorial views.

Senator Olson: No, no.

Senator Carney: You continually call it propaganda and that is your position; and I will ensure that it is conveyed to the Vancouver Sun.

Senator LeBlanc: I beg to differ. I think you will look at the record and, if I am wrong, I will apologize; but I do not think I used the word propaganda. I said they often start with one idea and often finish with their prejudices.

Senator Olson: That is propaganda.

Senator LeBlanc: I have to say it has been my experience as a working journalist that very often there is a rather substantive wall between the editorial division and the information division. The latter normally informs and gives some knowledge to the people. This may not be the case with editorials. Very often the editorial division finds that its own opinions are so important and so sacred that they should never be diluted by reliable information.

[Senator LeBlanc.]

• (1030)

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, if I may, and if Senator Molgat will forgive me, I should like to comment on what the honourable senator has said about the walls between editorial writers and those who gather the news. I would like to assure Senator LeBlanc that they are now more penetrable than they once were. The reason for that is that many times editorial writers nowadays are finding it necessary to correct the rather loose habits of some of those who pose as reporters and write articles that do not appear on editorial pages.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I think Senator Doyle, with that statement, has allowed us to measure the loss his newspaper suffered when he left. I suspect it is that sort of clear thinking and lucidity that was lost to the Globe and Mail.

There is increasingly a problem in Canada, I am afraid to say, and I suspect that one of the bad habits was acquired during the debate on free trade. I am sorry for that—not for the result; on the result I will have another opinion another day. I can say that, on the business of the owners of newspapers—especially in situations where there is not a spectrum of newspapers being distributed, as one had in the old days in England, but where there is, rather, a one-newspaper market—they make interventions and peddle their own ideas. that is, perhaps, where I got the word "prejudice." That tendency in this country has contributed to the serious loss of the sort of journalism that Senator Doyle not only defended but embodied.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I must clear up one point. I raised the question of privilege originally because the copies were being distributed to senators' desks here in the Senate chamber. That was the question of privilege. It was not, as Senator Carney suggested, about whether the editor of the Vancouver Sun has the right to print anything he likes.

Senator Carney: Check the record.

Senator Olson: Oh, I will, but I have people seated beside me who can verify it right now. I can tell Senator Carney that, as far as I know, there is nothing wrong with my memory. I remember exactly what I said.

I object to this material being distributed in the Senate chamber and I object to its appearance on my desk. The only thing I want to see on my desk is a paper that has to do with a motion that is being made, for example. I like to get that kind of thing in writing. If there are any Orders of the Day that must be dealt with, I also like to read committee reports and the kinds of things that come at the various stages of routine proceedings. But I do not care how good or bad editorials are, nobody has the right to clutter up my desk with them. That is what has been done.

Honourable senators, what surprises me is that we had this discussion the other day. I thought we had agreed on both sides of the house that it was a bad practice and that we should stop this kind of distribution. Put the stuff in the mailboxes, if you like, although I must say that at home I have a little sign on our mailbox asking that the mailman not deliver flyers and that kind of thing. That creates clutter, and it is absolutely against the concerns of a lot of people who are worried about the environment, and all of the trees that are cut down to provide newsprint for that sort of mail, and so on.

I do not want it in my mailbox. I do not want it on my desk, either. I just want to make sure that that is clearly known. My question of privilege is not what Senator Carney suggested it was, that we were trying to object to the Vancouver Sun printing what it likes to print. It can do that and can distribute it to people who subscribe to that paper, or to anybody else, but not those in this chamber. That is the point.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I really do not know who distributed this document in this particular case and I do not intend to seek out who distributed it. But I think that we should consider for the future whether or not, when someone wants to distribute something, he or she should put his or her name on it. I freely confess that I have distributed things at times without doing that.

Senator Steuart: But his were all true.

Senator Olson: At least they were not propaganda.

Senator Molgat: However, we can discuss that at another date.

I do find, however, something in the editorial with which I agree. It states:

> Most Canadians still don't want the GST. Neither do we.

I find that there is something in the editorial of definite value. It recognizes the true facts of the present situation.

Senator Carney has brought forward that constant complaint that I think Mr. Oberle brings out all the time, that we are preventing people from getting their rebate cheques. The fact is that what we are trying to do is to prevent people from being gouged by the GST when it is implemented. That is what we are trying to do. Let us make no mistake about what this is all about. Those so-called rebate cheques are a blackmail operation.

Senator Olson: Even bribery.

Senator Molgat: It is an attempt to con people. It is an unbelievable action by a government to try to buy people off. It is hard to believe that a conscientious government would even consider that kind of practice; that it would even consider sending out cheques to people in advance of passing the tax—which is still not in effect—in an endeavour to lure them into it. Then, after January 1, if they get their cheques, the government will shove it to them, and shove it to them hard, day in, day out, every day from then on.

Don't kid yourselves into thinking that the rebate will reimburse those people at the bottom end of the scale in comparison to what they will pay. They will end up paying a lot more in GST than they will ever get back in rebate, particularly when one considers that the amendment we propose to index the rebate has been refused. This is the road to loading more taxes onto these people and the rebate will not cover them. That is where we are.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, this brief interlude has permitted me to obtain some more information for Senator Lucier, who was interested earlier in the effect the GST will have upon tourism. In specific reply to Senator Lucier, I would like to place on the record some of the things that were conveyed to me regarding the tourist industry.

I received, for example, a letter from a Mr. A.L. Taylor, National President of the Alliance of Canadian Travel Associations. This letter is dated April 12 and was addressed to me, the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, the Senate of Canada. It states:

> Dear Senator Molgat:
>
> As the Senate prepares to debate the Goods and Services Tax, I feel that as the National President of the Alliance of Canadian Travel Associations (ACTA), I must once again bring to your attention, Senator Molgat, the specific concerns of our 3,200 members regarding the way the GST has been applied in the travel industry. We have tried repeatedly to discuss changes with the Government that we feel are necessary to protect our industry.

• (1050)

> So far all of our concerns have fallen on deaf ears despite the fact that ACTA has not opposed the tax in general, just the way it has been applied to the travel industry. We hope the Senate may be able to accomplish some changes in the present legislation to offset the severe consequence the act in its present form will have on the travel industry in Canada.
>
> Because you and your colleagues are long-serving members of the federal government process in Canada, I do not have to acquaint you with the details of Canada's travel and tourism industry, and numbers of people that depend on it for their livelihood, nor the fact that tourism will be the world's largest service industry by the year 2000. Considering the impact that tourism should have on Canada's future, and given the potential to reduce our deficit with a positive inflow of tourism money, it is inconceivable to our members that every action taken by our present government is designed to reduce Canada's income from tourism by approximately $1 billion per year and will eliminate up to 25,000 jobs.
> We hope that during your debate you will use every means at your disposal to correct the negative applications of the GST to tourism and travel in Canada. To assist you, I have attached the details of some of ACTA's major concerns. If I can assist you further at any time, please contact me at your convenience. As well, we would appreciate your office informing us of the dates of any public hearings on the GST so that we may attend and present our views.

I replied to Mr. Taylor, indicating that there had been no dates set for the hearings to be held. At that point in April, the bill was still under debate in this place.

They have concerns about the goods and services tax, which I will read:

CONCERNS ABOUT THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

1. Inbound tourism, already adversely affected by a budget cut to tourism Canada from $35M to $20M, will further decline under the Goods and Services Tax due to Canada being seen as a high cost destination.

The general impression that will be created by the GST is that we are a high-cost destination.

This has been a problem in the past and will become even more so in the future. U.S. tour and bus operators have already expressed their concerns about bringing tourists into Canada, and Canadian inbound operators will be at a distinct disadvantage versus off-shore operators.

Solution:

Treat travel and tourism as an export industry as it applied to the inbound portion for foreign travellers.

2. The GST as applied to the retail and wholesale industry renders the Canadian industry uncompetitive with U.S. suppliers. The unilateral tax increase cannot be overcome by the Canadian industry. The most likely result would be that up to an estimated $150 million of income to airlines and travel agents in Canada will be lost to American competitors due to the provision that transborder air travel will be treated as domestic travel. We cannot help but wonder why air travel was arbitrarily selected to be taxed on a transborder basis.

Solution:

Rescind the provision in the present Goods and Services legislation that transborder air travel will be taxed as domestic travel.

3.The provision that the GST will apply on the Air Transportation Tax (ATT) creates a "tax on a tax" situation. This sorry situation was further exacerbated by an increase in the percentage of ATT to be applied to each ticket from 5% to 7% at the same time that the average rate of GST was dropped from 9% to 7%. This will increase lower air fares disproportionately and could affect the feeder airline system carefully created by the major airlines to service their major routes. It also places an unfair increase on the lower cost traveller.

Solution:

GST should not apply to the ATT and the ATT should be reduced to the original 5% proposed.

[Senator Molgat.]

4. Zero-rated international travel sales will still require the GST be remitted on the retailer's commission and claimed back by the supplier as an input tax credit. If a sale is zero-rated, why should any GST be generated?

Surely this is another complication and has a negative impact on the cash flow of the supplier and is costly to account for all parties.

Solution:

A zero-rated sale should not require this "cycling" of Goods and Services Tax.

5. The lead time to implement this tax by January 1, 1991, is limited and will place an unfair burden on small businesses. The government's own timetable assumes the final act will not be ready before mid-August. How can businesses be expected to adapt to collect tax on forward contracts starting September 1st and complete the changeover of their entire accounting and reporting systems by January 1, 1991.

Solution:

The implementation and date should be extended, say, to July 1, 1991.

This is a thoughtful submission. I compliment this group for not only presenting the problem, but suggesting solutions. We cannot guarantee that the solution in every case is the right one, but at least they propose solutions to the problem.

I have another letter which is closer to your area, Senator Lucier. This letter is from the Cariboo Tourist Association, Williams Lake, British Columbia. I will admit that that is not the Yukon, but it is getting closer to you.

Senator Lucier: We are neighbours.

Senator Carney: You do not know your geography. Williams Lake is nowhere near the Yukon.

Senator Molgat: The Cariboo is certainly closer to the Yukon than to Ottawa.

Senator Lucier: Winnipeg is not in the east, but they were in the Grey Cup last week.

Senator Molgat: I do know where Williams Lake, Hundred, Mile House, Quesnel, and Prince George are. I have been to all those places.

Senator Barootes: We wish you were there now.

Senator Molgat: Senator Barootes, in many ways I wish I was there also. It is delightful country, but we have other tasks at hand right now.

The Cariboo Tourist Association is at P.O. Box 4900, Williams Lake, British Columbia. I suppose my name has thrown them off somewhat because they address me as Mrs. Molgat. I get that quite frequently. My name is indeed a little confusing. The letter says:

RE: GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

The Cariboo Tourist Association has over 330 members, primarily from the private sector, involved in various activities serving visitors to the south central area of British Columbia. Our members include fishing resort operators, guest ranches, guide-outfitters, hotels, motels, restaurants, service stations, fishing tackle shops, chambers of commerce and civic governments.

Visitors primarily come from Canada, United States and Europe to enjoy our resorts and outdoor activities.

Our Board of Directors is gravely concerned about the effects the Goods and Services Tax will have on the tourism industry, its ability to compete due to higher costs imposed by the administration of tax collection, and its ability to attract Canadians who may be lured elsewhere by prices not subject to GST.

There is concern about the demands made upon operators to collect taxes and buy new equipment to do it.

We have communicated our concerns to our Member of Parliament and asked him to relay our concerns to the House of Commons.

Our letter to him discussed the following items:

1. Accommodation rental increases.

2. Provincial Parks' not being required to pay the tax, therefore not collecting it, and being at a further unfair advantage with regard to privately operated campgrounds.

3. Foreign purchases of Canadian vacations and foreign purchases of Canadian vacations at resorts owned and operated by non-Canadians. The collection of GST may slip between the cracks with these operations.

4. The removal of the 13.5% manufacturers tax will not offset the 7% tax which is included on $%all$% goods and services.

5. Currency exchange rate. As the dollar rises, so does the cost to foreigners for Canadian products. The ability of Canadians to afford off-shore vacations also rises.

6. Other export products are free of GST to the buyer.

7. Rebates cannot be applied for unless a visitor spends $285.00 (to generate $20.00 GST). This unfairly allows the visitor to high cost areas such as major cities to receive rebates, but visitors depending on camping or low-cost accommodation will have no opportunity to obtain rebates, nor will short stay visitors. We understand the National Tour Association has received a group rebate program which will not require individual spending of $285.00 to qualify for rebates.

8. Capital costs. The imposition of 7% on prices already including 13.5% GST costs.

9. Non profit associations. We have been notified we must start charging 7% GST after August 1990 for memberships and services relating to 1991.

What nerve!

The tax law has not been passed, yet the tax man knocks.

In these times of recession threats, inflationary high interest rates and inflation feeding taxes, our association can ill-afford the unproductive costs of dealing with the confusion, frustration and difficulties of pro-rating charges which are levied on an anniversary and/or occasional basis.

We also question collection of a tax for which there is no legislative authority.

The Cariboo Tourist Association is not against taxation, or tax reform. Both are necessary.

Taxation should be fair. Tax reform should start with the GST. The Association supports reform and supports a much reduced GST rate with no exemptions allowed.

We request that the Senate notify our Association of the dates and locations of meetings in British Columbia so that we can prepare to attend.

We applaud the Senate in its initiative to foster, maintain and promote the principles of democracy in Canada. This letter has been sent to all Senators. We urge you to do everything in your power to defeat the Goods and Services tax legislation as it now stands, and to promote tax reform for the benefit of Canada and Canadians.

Yours very truly,

Pat Corbett,
President

This is a very sensible letter. Senator Lucier, here are more answers to your request for the effect of this tax on the tourist trade. This seems to be a general reaction everywhere.

Earlier, I was asked for information on the VAT or GST in other countries. The slight interlude that we had permitted me to organize my information, and I can now respond more fully to the question that was asked by Senator Frith, with particular reference to the experience abroad. The point I was making at that time was that there is a big difference, in my view, between a VAT, a GST or a consumption tax in a unitary state as compared to the same type of tax in a federal state, where the federal components have sales taxes of their own, which is the case in Canada. Nine of the provinces presently have a sales tax, and we are imposing a new tax in addition to that sales tax.

Those who have been here for some time have heard me make this argument before, but I see there are newcomers whom I must try and convince of the rightness of my argument. I will not repeat the argument in full, but I will give you a condensation so that you will appreciate it fully.

• (1110)

In answer then to the statements I was making at that time, I was asked a question about other countries, and federal countries in particular. I thought perhaps that what I had best do is give you the section from the Canadian Tax Paper No. 88. The title is The Economics of the Goods and Services Tax, and it is by John Whalley and Deborah Fretz. This is a publication of the Canadian Tax Foundation. I have a Library copy here stamped October 11, 1990, so it is certainly a very recent issue.

Perhaps I should read the forward into the record, then there is no argument as to the validity of the credentials of the document and the credentials of the individuals who have written it.

For the sake of the reporters, I may not be able to give them the text right now, but they have the title and I believe the Library has other copies, if need be. I will make my own copy available later, but I may need it sometime during the course of the argument. It may be that some of my colleagues have this document as well. If any of them do, perhaps they could supply it to the reporters, as it will ease their task.

I am quoting first from the foreword:

> A fundamental and highly controversial change in the Canadian tax system is the introduction of a value-added tax to replace the longstanding manufacturers' sales tax. The proposal for a VAT was included in the federal government's white paper on tax reform that was published in June 1987.

In passing, I might add that that proposal did not get any great publicity during the election campaign, despite what has been said.

> After extensive public hearings and parliamentary debates, the legislation implementing the proposal—the goods and services tax—was enacted by the House of Commons in April 1990. As this volume goes to press, the tax is under consideration by the Senate. The scheduled implementation date is January 1, 1991.

I might question—this is not from the text, it is my own comments—I might question their statements about extensive public hearings, because I believe that the House of Common's hearings were, in fact, very shortened hearings, and very limited hearings. Insofar as extensive parliamentary debates, I also believe that that is a vast exaggeration, as closure was used constantly. If anyone is interested, I have the occasions on which it was used. It was used regularly to stifle debate in the other place. Fortunately, the Senate is doing the job that it should do in giving the matter in-depth discussion.

> This study reviews the debate on the GST. The authors investigate the operation, deficiencies, and economic effects of the MST and summarize previous attempts to reform the federal sales tax. They present many of the arguments in favour of the GST, and explore the proposed base for the tax, the form it should take, and whether financial services should be included in the tax. They evaluate alternatives to the GST involving changes in the sales tax, the payroll tax, and the personal income tax. Finally, they look at other countries with value-added taxes—Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and Mexico—to see what Canada can learn about the GST from experience abroad.
> John Whalley is a professor of economics at The University of Western Ontario and is the author of numerous books and articles in the tax field. Deborah Fretz is a research analyst at The University of Western Ontario.
>
> Rosemary Shipton edited the manuscript, Michael Gaughan verified the references and quotations, Jim Lyons helped with proofreading the galleys, and Eve Gillies compiled the index.
>
> As with other foundation publications, the views expressed in this volume are those of the authors and should not be attributed to the foundation or its members. D.J. Sherbaniuk, Director, September 1990.

[Senator Molgat.]

The document represents the views of the researchers, not of the foundation. The researchers are qualified people; a professor of economics, author of numerous books and articles in the tax field, and a research analyst. I think we can depend on the accuracy of their statements. We may disagree with some of their conclusions or some of their opinions, but we have to remember that they are, nevertheless, the opinions of qualified people.

I am quoting now from Chapter 11, "What Can Be Learned From Experience Abroad?" This is in specific reply to the question asked by Senator Frith earlier this day.

> Because there has been so much experience abroad with attempts to reform indirect taxes and introduce value-added taxes (VATs) or goods and services taxes (GSTs), it seems sensible in closing to review this experience and assess what can be learned from it for future possible directions for Canada in this area.
> Origins of the VAT
> The VAT was first introduced in France in 1954, and subsequently in other European countries in the late 1960s and early 1970s. An even larger number of developing countries have since introduced the tax, although in most cases the tax effectively remains restricted to the manufacturing level. Table 11.1 from Tait—

When they refer to Tait, they are referring to Mr. Alan A. Tait's publication, "The Value-Added Tax: Why and How," in Report of Proceedings of the Thirty-Sixth Tax Conference, 1984 Conference Report (Toronto: Canadian Tax Foundation, 1985). Here at this particular time they refer to particular pages. They refer to Tait at different times—certainly in the whole of the volume they do, but I do not know if they do so in this chapter. In case the name "Tait" comes up again, you will know what that refers to.

So to return to the document:

> Table 11.1, from Tait, shows the sequence of introduction by country, the taxes replaced, the intended revenue effects, and other changes which occurred at the same time.
>
> Experience with the tax reflects operation with the credit-invoice VAT rather than the subtraction-method tax, and much of this comes from Europe. The tax seems generally to be relatively easy to administer, although table 11.2, also from Tait, indicates that following its > introduction rates have tended both to multiply and to increase significantly.

Please note that: They have tended to multiply. Please note that the experience is that the rates have tended both to multiply and to increase significantly. I remind you that that is what a lot of Canadians have been saying. They have been saying, "Yes, you will start off with 7 per cent, but we know what will happen; next year it will be 8, next year they will have to go to 9, and then 11."

When we look at what this government has done with the FST, we have good reason to believe that, because when we consider that, when the present government came to office in 1984, the FST was at 9 per cent. It has since made four successive increases and is now at 13.5 per cent. I think Canadians have a good reason to be leery of a tax which was originally to be set at 9 per cent, then during the course of the debate, to make it a little more palatable, it was reduced to 7 per cent. If Canadians look at the FST experience, they have reason to be wary. If they look at what has happened in other countries, as documented by this study, it has tended to both multiply and increase significantly.

> This concern that the VAT is too easy to collect and, consequently, that there was little pressure on governments to reduce deficits through control of expenditures was the main reason given for rejecting the VAT in the United States, when tax reform was eventually enacted in 1986.

I repeat: ". . . too easy to collect and, consequently, . . . little pressure on governments to reduce deficits through control of expenditures . . ."

I know Senator MacDonald will be particularly interested in that aspect because of his concern about the deficit. I think we should pay close attention to that statement, ". . . too easy to collect and . . . little pressure on governments to reduce deficits through control of expenditures . . ."

> The third volume of the US Treasury tax reform documents, devoted exlusively to the VAT, makes it clear that the main argument against the VAT is that it is a "money machine" for government.

I repeat that in the United States Treasury tax document specifically dealing with VAT, they say that the main argument against this tax is that it is a "money machine" for government. This is exactly what Canadians are concerned about, that they will be "milked" steadily, repeatedly, continuously, in ever-increasing amounts, with no attempt by government to control expenditures, because they know that they have got that easy way in which to bring in the money.

I repeat, why the urgency to have it done now? Why do we have to have it right now in January 1991? For political reasons; not economic reasons. It could wait until next year. The reason is that the government wants this "money machine" in operation now so that prior to the election, they can spread the money around the country, and incur great expenditures in order to try and buy another election. That is the reason for the rush.

Hon. Jack Austin: I wonder, Senator Molgat, if you have information as to whether Senator Everett was able to obtain a letter from the Minister of Finance with respect to the level of GST? Was he concerned about that level remaining at 7 per cent? Also, did he obtain the assurance of the Minister of Finance that this government would not change the level of the GST from 7 per cent?

Senator Molgat: That is a fascinating question, Senator Austin. I do not know. I would have to speak to my colleague to find out exactly what the minister told him. I would be very surprised if the minister tied his hands in that way.

An Hon. Senator: Do not hold your breath.

Senator Molgat: I regret that we did not pass the amendment that was proposed by Senator Lawson and on which we voted on yesterday, to guarantee that the funds would all go to deficit reduction. I am surprised that some of my friends opposite, and particularly Senator Finlay MacDonald, my good friend from Nova Scotia, who has shown an interest in that deficit, did not jump up and second the amendment, because I think it would go right along with his sensible views of what needs to be done. I would have loved to have had that whole-hearted support. I think it is you, Senator Lucier, who has the quotes on that.

Senator Lucier: Yes.

Senator Molgat: I think you read them to me one day. I was not at the hearings, but I thought, "Now there is a sound thinker."

Senator Lucier: And a very honest man.

Senator Molgat: Yes. A man who says it like it is. A true Nova Scotian who says it like it is. Yesterday, when he had the opportunity, he let me down. That is too bad. That is the way of politics.

Senator Austin: I just wanted to ask you again, Senator Molgat, on this point you are making, whether you are aware—and this does bear out the point you are making—that even tax experts believe that the level of the GST will have to be raised. You were saying that Canadians, across the board in our communities, are of the view that 7 per cent is not where the tax will end up, and that that is one of the greatest causes of alarm and anxiety in our community. I have an article here which appeared in the Financial Post on Tuesday, November 27, under the headline: "A 9% GST looms, tax lawyer warns". The article states in part:

• (1120)

> The proposed 7% goods and services tax will probably be raised to 9% after the next federal election to allow Ottawa to get a grip on the growing deficit, a leading tax lawyer predicted yesterday.
>
> Claude Desaulniers, a tax expert with Montreal law firm Stikeman Elliott, told reporters people who think the GST will not come into force are dreaming.
> "I think (the tax) will be there for a long time," he said, speaking at a media briefing organized as part of the Canadian Tax Foundation's annual conference . . .

> Desaulniers said that if interest rates remain high, pushing the interest payments portion of the federal deficit even higher, the federal government will be forced to increase the GST.
> Desaulniers, noting that every one percentage point increase in the GST will generate $3 billion in added revenue, . . .

He also reminded his audience that Finance Minister Michael Wilson originally proposed a 9 per cent levy but pulled it back to 7 per cent because of political pressure.

The article goes on to state:

> He said the GST legislation is very complicated and this will ensure lots of work for lawyers and accountants, both in applying the GST law and contesting its interpretation.
> "This bill is so technical. There are so many provisions and the more complicated a bill, the more loopholes that can be found."

Those remarks, Senator Molgat, are from a very eminent tax expert who works for a very eminent tax firm. He is warning the Canadian public that as soon as the next federal election is over this government, which proposed this revenue-neutral tax, will be raising it to 9 per cent. Perhaps Mr. Desaulniers is being conservative, if I can use that word. Perhaps it will be raised to 10 per cent or 12 per cent.

Do you have the same concerns as those of Mr. Desaulniers, Senator Molgat? Do you have additional evidence to show that technical people such as Mr. Desaulniers who question the level of the GST and how long it can remain at that level are accurate?

Mr. Desaulniers has also said that the French version of the law is an adaptation and not a direct translation of the English version. He said, "The French version is quite different". The article in the Financial Post goes on to state:

> A company could decide how it will charge the GST based on the French version of the law even though the English version says something else, Desaulniers said, and it would be up to the courts to interpret just what the legislator meant. " This will certainly give rise to many interesting cases before the courts."

My second question to you, Senator Molgat, is whether you have examined the differences between the English version and the French version and whether this alarming report that there are substantial differences between the two versions will give rise to considerable problems of interpretation by the Department of National Revenue. Would you agree that, undoubtedly, it will cause major cases of litigation before the courts?

Senator Molgat: You have presented me with a number of questions, Senator Austin. Later in my comments I will deal with the question of the increases, and I will give you specifics with regard to what has happened.

I can tell you at this point what I have already put on the record. That is to say that Tait in his study found that the rates have tended both to multiply and to increase significantly. That is what Tait's study shows, and I will give honourable senators those figures later on.

Second, in its study the U.S. Treasury saw the real dangers in this kind of tax constantly increasing. The U.S. Treasury called such a tax a money machine. Insofar as that side of it is concerned, I think you can rest assured, Senator Austin, that the quotations you gave are accurate.

Your other point had to do with the differences between the French and the English systems. I must confess that I am more familiar with the French system than I am with the English. I am not in a position to make a comparison between the two. However, my impression is that the countries of Europe are presently moving toward harmonization. Because of the integration of their economies right now, it has been realized that they must harmonize.

In fact, just over a year ago we had consultations in Paris with the French concerning their system. It appeared to me that their system was quite complicated. It has different levels for different types of products. They do not have a proposal such as ours, which is a flat rate proposal.

My understanding of what the French told us at that time is that they are moving toward getting all these matters harmonized so that all the countries of Europe will end up with the same system. I think that with the economic integration that is going on in Europe now they will be forced to do that. If they were to continue with different levels of taxation, many distortions would be introduced into their system.

It is difficult, considering the proximity between the countries. For example, if Luxembourg has a different rate—which it has at present—than does Belgium or France, difficulties may arise. We think that it is easy for Canadians to hop across the border to purchase goods in the United States at lower costs. It is a great deal simpler to do that in Europe because the distances are less. For example, if you live in northern France you have a choice of shopping in France, Luxembourg, Belgium or Holland, which are all within an hour's drive of some cities in the north of France. Thus, I think that they have to harmonize their rates.

Senator Austin: Senator Molgat, I think that you have missed the point with respect to my question. Perhaps I read the article too quickly.

Senator Molgat: Did I miss something?

Senator Austin: The last part of my question concerned the comment of Claude Desaulniers of Stikeman Elliott, who said that the French version of Bill C-62 is an adaptation, not a direct translation, of the English version. He said, "The French version is quite different." He went on to speculate that a company could decide how to interpret the GST based on the French version even though the English version states something quite different. He speculates that there will be an enormous amount of litigation and a pile up of work for the Department of National Revenue. He is quoted in the newspaper article from which I read to have said, "This will certainly give rise to many interesting cases before the courts." That is one of the major problems with the legislation which this house did not attempt to rectify. Nor did the other place attempt to do so. The French version and the English version are not in accord in a number of significant places. I wonder how this house could possibly give consideration to a bill, and perhaps pass it into law, which would create such a proliferation of issues for Canadian citizens.

Senator Molgat: I was indeed way off track, Senator Austin. I thought you were asking me to compare the VAT system in France with the VAT system in England. You were talking about the GST in Canada as written in French and as written in English. I am sorry I missed the point.

I have not tried to compare the two. Obviously, if there is a difference between the French and English texts, then we will be in real trouble. That is because the two texts are valid in law. You are a lawyer while I am not, Senator Austin. You could go before a court and make such an argument—

Senator Poitras: That is what we wanted to do in the committee.

Senator Austin: You have had many opportunities to introduce a corrected language version in this chamber.

Senator Murray: When?

Senator Austin: At any time you wished to do so. You could have introduced an amendment. In fact, one still speculates as to what Harvie Andre meant when he mentioned a few days before the house came back in September about his willingness to entertain amendments. The poor Vancouver Sun, which Senator Carney was quoting earlier, went for the bait and said that the most civil thing that the government had done so far was to announce that it was prepared to receive amendments. I could read the editorial. However, I will spare senators opposite the punishment which Senator Carney levelled upon us.

Senator Murray: Are you making your intervention in installments?

Senator Austin: No. I am responding to a comment raised by you, Senator Murray.

Senator LeBlanc: It would be very interesting to hear the editorial.

Senator Austin: The Vancouver Sun is the leading paper in terms of circulation in the province of British Columbia. The problem is that in terms of its editorial page it is highly equivocal. It wants to stand on many sides of a question so that it can put itself on the right side as the future unfolds.

Senator Molgat: I realize, Senator Austin, that one should not reply to a question by asking another question. However, do you know if Mr. Desaulniers gives any examples concerning differences between the French text and the English text?

Senator Austin: That is not pointed out in the news story. However, apparently in his address to the Canadian Tax Foundation he did give some examples. I have asked for the text of his remarks, which I have not yet received.

Senator LeBlanc: Mr. Desaulniers is not a light-weight. He is a very serious and substantive citizen. If he has made in a speech a serious allegation such as that and underlines the problem as being very serious I wonder if somewhere in the Privy Council Office somebody did not mix up a distinguished society paper with papers on the GST. Perhaps that is how we entered into a situation in which distinguished lawyers such as Mr. Meighen and a number of others opposite will find themselves before a judge who is not bilingual in one of the official languages and who will make a judgment which will cause their client to end up somewhere in a superior court. This will inflict incredible expense on the citizens of this country.

This is a body of adults. When we are told something as remarkable as the fact that there are some glaring differences between the two language versions in a country with two official languages we say nothing. Does the government not feel any onus to say anything about that? Will it simply let the citizens go to the slaughter of recourse in the courts in trying to find an arbitration? Frankly, I think we should adjourn right now for a few days to see what the other side intends to do before we discuss this question any further.

• (1130)

Senator Murray: We will move that at 5 o'clock, according to Rule P-2.

Senator LeBlanc: I am quite sure that Senator Murray could get unanimous consent quickly if he were to request that. Let us at least take 48 hours. Because the bureaucrats are up in Wakefield it may take a few hours for their return, but once they get back they might want to sit down to compare the two versions. Perhaps they could call in a competent editor or reviser—we have one in the Senate who is very good—to at least try to make some sense of this.

I am not a lawyer, but as an ordinary citizen who started his journalistic career covering the city court, who saw ordinary citizens trying to disentangle themselves from the web that had been woven by the system, I just do not understand how we can sit here, quietly discussing something which appears to me to be obvious, and not get an answer from the government side because it has been hit by this "mutism", if that is an expression. They have all not only taken leave of their senses in the usual capacity, they have taken leave of one sense in particular, which is that of hearing.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I regret that I was distracted at the time Senator Austin raised his point. I got off on a lengthy comparison of the English and the French or European systems. The point raised by Senator Austin is exceedingly important to Canada. If there is a substantial difference between the French text of the law and the English text of the law, then quite obviously we should not pass the law until we get it reconciled. Not only will we be open to substantial litigation, but this may also cause serious economic problems if certain people proceed on the basis of one law and there is another version that says something different.

I would hope that the government would be looking at this matter with the utmost urgency and that Mr. Desaulniers has specific instances of these differences that he can provide now so that the corrections can be made. I have some idea of how difficult it is to translate properly any document, but it is even more difficult when dealing with a legal text. It is an extremely difficult and highly specialized job. I think that our legal experts have tended recently to approach it in a different way. Instead of trying to translate mot pour mot, I think what they are trying to do now is to go to the concept of the law and to write it in the initial instance in each language. They do not attempt to do a mot pour mot translation, which can end up with some real dislocations. I believe what they are trying to do is think "What does the law intend?" They then write it in that language. I think that is the proper course.

However, if that has not been done, then I caution the government that it ought to look at this situation with the utmost urgency. Otherwise, we could be heading into some serious troubles.

[Translation]

Senator David: I think the explanation you have just given is excellent. The way to translate from one language into another has been changed and when I came here I was a member of the committee on legislation. I had a lot of difficulty to interpret the clause by clause meaning of pieces of legislation from one language to another in most cases. As far as I am concerned, it was rather from English into French that I had to interpret. I asked someone to explain to me exactly what you have just said, namely that translation is not literal anymore. It is not anymore simply a grammatical exercise; in fact, they try to keep the concept of each of those sections. So, I have no difficulty to believe that there are some slight differences between the two texts in a bill made up of hundreds of different clauses. Now, I would like to know who is that Mr. Desaulniers and to ask him to send us in writing the differences he sees between the English and the French text. He will probably get the same answer as I received several times, about several bills, mainly that the concept of the section is kept in both cases but that it is expressed with different terms.

● (1145)

[English]

Senator Austin: Senator David, perhaps I could answer, since I initiated the question in the first place. Mr. Desaulniers is described as a tax expert with the Montreal law firm of Stikeman Elliott. He made an address before the annual conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation. Part of his comments—which are reported only briefly in the Financial Post—are that the French version of the law is an adaptation, not a direct translation, of the English version. He went on to say: "The French version is quite different." He then speculated that a company could decide how it will charge the GST based on the French version of the law even though the English version says something different. Then he stated that it would be up to the courts to interpret just what the legislator meant. He said: "This will certainly give rise to many interesting cases before the courts."

[Senator Molgat.]

Therefore, while I do not have the specific material—and as I said to Senator Barootes earlier in the debate I have asked for comparisons to see how serious the differences in the text will be—it is clear that an expert has concern and is notifying the business community that there will be problems that will give rise to litigation. I think honourable senators who know anything about tax practice will know that the Department of National Revenue will interpret the rules to suit its best case. It will choose from the English or the French version as suits the position it wishes to take. That puts the onus on the taxpayer to disprove the interpretation of the Department of National Revenue.

Clearly, in a great many cases individual Canadians will be facing litigation in order to determine their rights. There is an additional burden placed on everyone by Bill C-62 if the translations are not properly done. And those are not costs that are recoverable. They may be recoverable in part, but certainly tens of thousands of dollars will not be recoverable. They will be lost costs, and all because the government has presented a bill that does not have proper confirmation between the two languages.

This is an extremely technical bill. Therefore, generalizations of meaning are inappropriate. They might be appropriate for the translation of some piece of literature, but neither in Senator David's field, which is medicine, nor in my field, which is law, can we afford to have anything but precise translation.

[Translation]

Senator Poitras: You might allow me to have a reaction to your statement because in the Senate committees, in particular in the Committee on Banking, we have to read both the English and the French text, clause by clause, unless all the members of the committee dispense from doing it. Now, we did not have either the permission or the time to do this in spite of our request and this is one of the weaknesses. When we do not comply with the rules, when we do not follow the appropriate procedure, the Canadian public has to foot the bill in the end. I agree with the honourable Senator that we should not allow such things to happen again.

● (1200)

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat said earlier that he is not a lawyer. On this very point of the lack of . . .

[Translation]

Furthermore, I agreed that, in our present situation in Canada, while we have both official languages, it is always very important that both texts match. This is certainly true in the Committee on Banking, especially for a tax bill. The study in committee must give the opportunity to check if both the English and the French match.

[English]

I was going to ask Senator Molgat whether he was aware of the fact that there is an added difficulty created by discrepancies or lack of agreement between the two versions. There is a well accepted rule of interpretation that taxation statutes are interpreted very strictly. In any book on interpretation you will find that the courts have always taken the view that, when a legislature wants to tax, it must be very clear as to its intent. I know that Senator Poitras, as an accountant, is probably familiar with that. He has probably had it used either for or against him in his practice.

I wonder whether Senator Molgat is aware of that rule of interpretation, which underlines the difficulties created by any lack of concordance between the two versions.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Well, I thank Senator David and Senator Poitras for their recommandation. I think we agree on the way we should proceed for translations because the word-for-word translation does not work. We agree that we must go to the essence of the language, to the essence of the concept, that we must draft the regulations. Now the question is to determine whether the mistakes or the lacks of concordance, as indicated by Mr. Desaulniers, are such that they require urgent attention. I think it is important to ask Senator Austin.

[English]

to get from Mr. Desaulniers the specifics. I note that Senator Austin has requested them, but it is important that we receive that material so that we can judge whether indeed there are substantial differences—differences that could cause problems for chartered accountants, for lawyers or for businessmen in terms of interpretation.

We ought to have a look at that material as soon as possible. I am sure that my friends opposite will agree with that approach. All I can do is ask Senator Austin to press Mr. Desaulniers. This is still Friday. He should be able to send his material to us by fax. Indeed, we might ask Senator Murray whether the people at the Department of Justice could have another look at this question. Perhaps they, too, can advise us of any problems that they see so that, as we proceed in this debate, we can examine them.

If I may, then, I will come back to what we can learn from the GST or VAT systems abroad.

• (1215)

A number of questions have been asked of me about comparisons with other countries, comparisons with federal states and non-federal states. I will read the material as I have it from this document by the Canadian Tax Foundation.

I was saying that the U.S. government or the U.S. Treasury Department turned down the VAT on the basis that it was a money machine for the government. And I continue quoting from the book at page 134:

> When the VAT was introduced in France in 1954, it was seen largely as a method of avoiding the cascading present in the turnover taxes in Europe at the time. It was not seen as a revolutionary change aimed at moving existing taxes onto a broader base. Indeed, cascading in the turnover tax was a major problem not only in France, but in Germany and other European countries as well. In addition, cascading created incentives for vertical integration within firms and major difficulties with rebating taxes at borders. These border tax adjustments were required because of the administration of the turnover taxes on a destination basis.
> Thus, while the VAT was proposed by the French civil servant Maurice Lauré in the early 1950s largely as a way of removing cascading within the existing turnover tax, it came to be regarded as a successful and desirable tax following its introduction in 1954. After the creation of the European Economic Community (EC) in 1958, the tax took on new and major importance as attempts to achieve fiscal harmonization and the elimination of fiscal frontiers between countries got underway.
>
> A major objective for European integration has been not only to remove tariffs and other trade impediments among countries within the integrating union, but also to move to common fiscal arrangements and ultimately eliminate fiscal frontiers among member states: taxes on imports and rebated domestic turnover and other taxes. Early on in the then accelerating process of European integration, a committee was appointed under the chairmanship of Fritz Neumark to consider how best to harmonize indirect taxes in Europe.
> This committee considered a number of options, including retail sales taxes, but came down in favour of the VAT as the best common harmonization objective in the indirect tax field. The recommendation was based largely on the argument that in order to eliminate fiscal frontiers among member states, it would eventually be necessary to move from the existing destination basis used in turnover taxes to an origin basis among member states of the EC—that is, a tax at the point of production. The destination basis—what Shibata . . .

Shibata, in this reference, is Mr. Hirofumi Shibata writing in "The Theory of Economic Unions: A Comparative Analysis of Customs Unions, Free Trade Areas, and Tax Unions." In Carl S. Shoup, editor, "Fiscal Harmonization in Common Markets", Volume 1, Theory (New York: Columbia University Press).

> . . . subsequently called the "restricted origin basis"—would remain between EC member states and third countries. The committee held that administering a retail sales tax, the rival broadly based indirect sales tax, on an origin basis was a contradiction in terms, and would, therefore, be incompatible with the integration aims of the EC.

That is partly what I was trying to say to Senator Austin in my earlier comment when I thought he was asking for a comparison of the system in France and in England, whereas he was really asking for the difference between the French and English versions of the tax in Canada. I did try to answer the broader question.

> The VAT also appeared to be preferable to a retail sales tax as a harmonization target for indirect taxes in Europe for a number of other reasons. It already existed in France. It was relatively easy to implement, given that the change would be from a turnover tax to a VAT for most of the original European member states. Finally, it was viewed as superior to a retail sales tax on compliance grounds, since taxes were also collected from larger primary producers at earlier stages in the production process and invoices could be matched.

With its adoption as a common harmonization target in the 1960s, European countries in the EC then began to adopt the tax. Between 1968 and 1972-73, most of them implemented the tax. The newly acceding countries (the United Kingdom, Ireland, and Denmark) also adopted the tax in place of their existing indirect taxes.

Now, to go specifically to the various countries, first of all I think it is important to list here which countries have gone to the VAT so we can have a look at which ones are federal states and which ones are unitary states to have an idea of when the various countries entered into the system and any other specific information per country. This would permit us to have a valid comparison. I am dealing now with Table 11.1, which is "Details of the Substitution of Value-Added Tax for Other Taxes by Country, and Effects on Revenue". This table indicates the country, the date on which the VAT was introduced, the taxes that it replaced, and the intended effect on revenue.

This is important to us because it seems to me we have had various contradictory statements on this. We have been told all along that this is revenue neutral; in other words, that it should be "equal yield".

Senator Lucier: We have not been told that by all of them; only by some of them.

Senator Molgat: No, by some of them; but certainly the governmental official position is: It is revenue neutral. I think the Prime Minister repeated that as recently as a month ago when he was in Vancouver. I assume that the government position is that it is revenue neutral and we have to operate on that basis. We will also look at other simultaneous tax changes, in the event there were any.

We start off with Argentina; they introduced the tax in January 1975. It replaced a wholesale sales tax and it was intended to be equal yield. In other words, revenue neutral, as Canada says. The other simultaneous tax changes were "provincial tax".

Austria introduced VAT in January 1973 which replaced a cascade wholesale tax and was, again, equal yield. The other change at the time was the lowering of income taxes.

Belgium introduced VAT in January of 1971, replacing a cascade wholesale. It was intended to produce equal yield and there were no other simultaneous tax changes.

Bolivia introduced VAT in November of 1973, and the taxes replaced were a multi-stage ring system sales tax. Again, the government said it would be equal yield but there were, in this case, some other simultaneous tax changes, being new luxury tax rates and increased excises.

Brazil is a country that came up earlier in Senator Frith's question. Senator Frith was inquiring about the situation in Brazil which, I understand, is a federal state and which has provincial or state retail taxes as well.

Senator Frith, in answer to your question regarding Brazil, VAT was introduced there in January of 1967, replacing the cascade tax on sales and consignments. It was rated to be equal yield; in other words, revenue neutral.

Senator Frith: I see.

Senator Molgat: There were no other simultaneous tax changes brought in at that time.

Senator Frith: So is it two levels of tax or not?

Senator Molgat: The only information that I have here is that it was introduced in January 1963; it does not say anything specific about—

Senator Frith: About state taxes?

Senator Molgat: No, and I have nothing in the detailed conclusion.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Molgat: In the detailed conclusion, which I will come to later, I have information on the specifics in Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and Mexico. There was a section on the United States, but, of course, the United States does not have a VAT so it will not be a direct comparison. I do not have details about Brazil except that they introduced VAT in January of 1967 and it was intended to be equal yield.

Chile brought the tax into effect in March of 1975 and it was replacing a cascade turnover tax. They were honest; they said increased revenue was to be the intended effect. At the same time they also brought in some additional taxes on gasoline, income, and property.

Colombia had an early introduction of VAT which occurred in January of 1965. There was no sales tax in Colombia prior to VAT so it was a brand new tax. They clearly indicated that it would be an increase in revenue; at the same time they brought in other simultaneous tax changes on income, property, and capital gains taxes. There is no indication whether those changes were up or down; simply that they were changed.

Costa Rica brought in the VAT in January of 1975 and it replaced a multi-stage ring system sales tax, the same as Bolivia. They again were honest and said it was going to be an increase in revenue. At the same time they brought in some increased excise taxes.

Denmark introduced VAT in July of 1967, and it replaced a wholesale tax. They stated it would be an increase in revenue and, at the same time, they lowered the income tax.

The Dominican Republic introduced the tax in November of 1983 and I regret I have no information on whether it replaced a tax or what the intentional revenue was or any other simultaneous tax changes; the columns are blank.

Ecuador brought VAT in during August of 1970 and it replaced the turnover taxes on mining and manufacturing. The intended effect on revenue was an increase; other simultaneous tax changes were a reduction in mining taxes.

France brought in a simpler VAT in January of 1968 but VAT had been previously introduced in 1954. So this was then a revision, probably to begin some harmonization with the EC. It is shown here as January 1968, but that was a simpler VAT and it was equal yield. At the same time, tax exemptions were abolished and income tax adjusted.

The Federal Republic of Germany introduced the VAT in January of 1968 to replace cascade retail; it was to be equal yield and no other tax changes were proposed.

Guatemala introduced the VAT in August of 1983 and it replaced stamp duty on sales, services and imports. There is no indication as to the effect on the yield and no indication of other simultaneous tax changes.

Haiti brought in the VAT in November of 1982. It replaced 79 excises; it was to be of equal yield. They also brought in replaced commissions, levies and excises.

● (1230)

Honduras introduced the VAT in January of 1976. It replaced a single-stage ring system sales tax. The intended effect on revenue was to be an increase. There appear to be no other simultaneous tax changes.

Ireland introduced the VAT in November of 1972. It replaced a wholesale and retail sales tax. It was to be of equal yield and there were some other tariff reductions at the same time.

Israel brought in the VAT in July of 1976. It replaced various sales taxes. It was intended to increase revenue. There were no other tax changes at that time.

Italy introduced the VAT in January of 1973. It replaced general and local government sales. It was intended to be equal yield. There were no other simultaneous tax changes.

The Ivory Coast introduced the VAT in January of 1960. It replaced the Manufacturers' VAT. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. There are no other simultaneous tax changes indicated here.

South Korea introduced the VAT in July of 1977. It replaced eight sales taxes representing 40 per cent of revenue. That is quite a dramatic tax reform. The intended effect on revenue was to be an equal yield. The other simultaneous tax changes were changed excises.

Luxembourg introduced the VAT in January of 1970. It replaced the cascade wholesale tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. There are no other tax changes indicated.

Madagascar introduced the VAT in January of 1969. It replaced a cascade production tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. There are no other simultaneous tax changes indicated.

Mexico introduced the VAT in January of 1980. It replaced the cascade production tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield or increase. The other simultaneous tax change was a lower border VAT of 6 per cent.

Morocco introduced the VAT in January of 1962. It replaced a cascade production tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. The other simultaneous tax changes were changed corporate and production taxes.

Netherlands introduced the VAT in January of 1969. It replaced the cascade wholesale tax. It was to be of equal yield, and at the same time they brought in lower income tax.

New Zealand introduced the VAT in May of 1986. It replaced a wholesale tax. It was intended to yield extra revenue. At the same time they brought in changed income taxation.

Nicaragua introduced the VAT in August of 1978. It replaced the multi-stage ring system sales tax. I am not familiar with this multi-stage ring system sales tax, but it seems to be prevalent in quite a number of Central and South American countries. I presume that there was an agreement between them for a harmonization of taxation. The VAT was intended to be equal yield. They reduced customs duties at the same time.

Niger introduced the VAT in January of 1986. It replaced the cascade manufacturers' tax. It was intended to yield extra revenue. It replaced existing taxes on services.

Norway introduced the VAT in January of 1970. It replaced the retail sales tax on 65 per cent of consumption. Strangely enough, the intended effect on revenue was to be a loss. This is the only country that has indicated that. The other simultaneous tax changes were reduced income and property taxes.

Panama introduced the VAT in January of 1976. Previous to that they had no sales tax, so it did not replace anything. They intended that there would be an increase in revenue. The other simultaneous tax changes were that stamp taxes were reduced and excise taxes were increased.

Peru introduced the VAT in January of 1973. It replaced the cascade production and stamp tax. The intended effect on revenue was an increase. There were no other simultaneous tax changes.

Senegal introduced the VAT in March of 1961. It replaced the Manufacturers' VAT. It was intended to be of equal yield. There were no other simultaneous tax changes.

Sweden introduced the VAT in January of 1969. It replaced the retail sales tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. At the same time, they brought in a 1 per cent payroll tax to offset the lost revenue.

Turkey introduced the VAT in January of 1986. There is no information with respect to what taxes were replaced, or the effect on revenue, or other tax changes. I assume that the information is not available.

The United Kingdom introduced the VAT in April of 1973. It replaced a multi-rate wholesale tax. They are the second country to indicate that they expected a loss from the introduction of the VAT. They did make some other tax changes at the same time. The selective employment tax was removed.

Uruguay introduced the VAT in January of 1968. It replaced a manufacturers' single-stage tax and a cascade turnover tax. The intended effect on revenue was equal yield. They did not make any other changes in their tax system.

I hope this answers the questions that were asked of me earlier regarding the details of the introduction of the VAT in other countries.

I want to deal now with the experience with the VAT in Europe. I think we have to look particularly at an item that is concerning Canadians. That is whether we are indeed going to be faced with this constant increase. Are we going to have the "money machine" effect that the U.S. Treasury talks about? Are we going to have, year by year, or every second year, another increase? I think that what should guide us is what has happened elsewhere, particularly in Europe. What has happened in other countries? How is the tax perceived?

I will read to you exactly what these researchers have to say about the experience with the VAT in Europe. They say:

> It is important for Canadians to understand that the European VAT was not in and of itself an attempt to introduce a truly broadly based tax. It was the end result of a successful reform largely aimed at removing cascading which was present in pre-existing turnover taxes in most European countries. There was no pre-existing retail sales tax system, as Canada has at the provincial level, that worked well. The objectives, therefore, were different from those underlying the reforms now being proposed in Canada.

So they did not have a system, as we have, with nine provinces already levying a sales tax. That was not the European operation.

> The experience with the VAT in Europe is generally viewed as good, although there are blemishes. The tax is now widely seen in Europe by both tax administrators and taxpayers as a simple tax which is easy to collect. Although there have been concerns over compliance costs, these have primarily concentrated on the same segments of the economy for which problems have arisen under the income tax: small business and sectors in which there are a large number of smaller taxpayers, such as farming.

Please note that they have had particular problems in those segments of the economy for which problems have arisen under the income tax; small business and sectors in which there are large numbers of smaller taxpayers, such as farming.

> Any tax would face problems in these areas. Tax returns seem easy to fill in, and the crediting mechanism seems to work relatively well. There do not seem to have been major complaints about the tax, and the tax base has remained relatively stable over long periods of time.
> As Table 11.2 indicates, however, there has been a clear tendency both for rates under the tax to rise over time and for rates to multiply. Most European countries introduced the tax with a single rate; most now have three, and in some cases, four rates.

There are two things that happen. One is the escalation of the tax itself, and the other is the development of a larger number of rates. One may start off with a single rate; that is, the initial objective, as they perceive the tendency has been to increase the number of rates.

> There are a number of other problem areas with the tax which would certainly be encountered in Canada were such a tax to be introduced. Farming is one, because of poor record keeping in the farming community and the large number of taxpayers involved. Farmers generally do not keep good records for taxes which they pay on their inputs, and substantial amounts of pro rata apportionment are used for such items as taxes on fuel inputs in Europe. These have been the source of much wrangling between representatives of the farm community and the government in many countries. In addition, the large number of farmers who have been brought into the indirect tax system through the introduction of the VAT has resulted in political conflict in some countries.

Now there is a footnote—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, Senator Molgat. It being almost 12:10 p.m., I am on my feet simply to say—and I mentioned this in an informal way to the Leader of the Government—that as far as our side is concerned, we are prepared to give unanimous consent to a break of about an hour for lunch. If it is the wish of the house.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is no disposition on this side, given the projected length of this debate, to interrupt business for that purpose. We will be taking turns in taking a bit of refreshment as the afternoon goes on, but we intend to maintain quorum.

Senator Corbin: To the Honourable Leader of the Government, they are not participating in the debate, what is the point of sitting around here? We may as well all go for lunch and resume. What do you gain?

I guess he is deaf and dumb today, he is not even reacting.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I believe that in a short time there will be some refreshments in the Reading Room.

Senator Frith: I thought on previous occasions we did break for an hour. On a couple of prior occasions we broke for an hour. That is why we raised the matter of a luncheon recess. However, we have our answer.

Senator Molgat: Well, inspired by that, I launch forth for the rest of the afternoon. There is no point in getting nervous at this time.

Returning to the VAT in Europe: It is indicated, as I have said, that the VAT has resulted in political conflict in some countries. There is a footnote on that, which possibly I should put on the record, because it has to deal with what is still a major Canadian industry, and certainly in my part of the country, still a major industry, and that is the farming community. So the footnote reads:

> Under the new GST, sales of agricultural products and farm livestock will be tax-free. Farmers will be entitled to claim input tax credits on their purchases, but will need to keep adequate records in order to do so. It is expected, however, that this record keeping will parallel that necessary for filing income tax returns, and will not result in extra bookkeeping.

Perhaps we can evade some of the problems they have had in Europe with the farm community, but we will have to wait and see.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: I wonder if I may ask a question?

You mentioned the problem which they are having in Europe, and the problems we foresee in Canada with our farmers with regard to record keeping. I am sure we all realize that it would be quite a burden. Is there any information available, that you know of, to indicate what has happened in some of these countries that have a VAT, what kind of breakdown there is in farming records, what kind of lack of tax collection, or any indication of what the farmers have been put through legally in court cases? I think that would be worthwhile to know, because the government, while having shown no inclination to make any amendments or give any relief to anyone in the country, has said on several occasions that after this tax, if such tax goes into effect, it will consider somewhere down the road taking a look at the problems the tax will create.

We already know that it is going to create tremendous problems, especially for the farm community where you and I come from, and perhaps even more so for the farm community in Ontario and Quebec, where they probably have far more transactions. It will cause problems for the dairy farmers, egg producers, and so on, and for the grain farmers, who are having great difficulty, as they have relatively few items to sell. This would not be true of mixed farming.

I wonder if you, senator, have any information that could be brought to the attention of the government concerning the problems that have arisen. Are you aware of any information that the government has or research it has done which we could pass on to our farmers to help them obey this law and gain back some of the money they have input? If they cannot claim any of it back, it will not do them any good. Do you have any information whether the Government of Canada has done this research and is prepared to give it to our farmers? If not, what information do you have? Or do you have any idea how this has worked out in other countries which have a VAT system and which have some experience in these matters?

Senator Molgat: Unfortunately, Senator Steuart, I do not have any information as to what studies the Canadian government might have done in this area. Possibly, senators who were on the committee might enlighten us in that regard. Perhaps they could tell us if representatives of Agriculture Canada appeared before the committee. I have not checked the index of witnesses and thus I do not know offhand. I think it would have been very proper for Agriculture Canada to conduct such a study in this area because it is one department which has potential problems. Perhaps other departments of government have looked at the situation as well. I have no information on it. Senator Poitras, who is vice-chairman of the committee, may have some information. I do not know.

Senator Poitras: I am not aware of any.

Senator Molgat: We might get some of our research people looking into it to see just what was done.

Certainly, in Europe, and while I do not have chapter and verse what has happened, the statements are clear that there have been concerns over compliance costs. These have been primarily concentrated on the same segments of the economy for which problems have arisen under the income tax: small business and sectors in which there are a large number of smaller taxpayers, such as farmers.

The European experience is that they have had difficulty with compliance. The direction from which you are approaching the problem, Senator Steuart, is what this will mean to farmers. I suspect it may mean that in a good number of cases they will not get the rebates to which they are entitled. That is the risk in a system where they have to pay the tax up front. They have no choice. You and I know what the farming community is like. There is a multitude of pressures on farmers at certain times of the year, whether it be at seeding time or harvest time. Farmers do not always take the time or the trouble to get all their invoices and keep them in order. If their business operated over the course of the year, and if they had an accountant running the business, which is very often the case because of the size of the business, the accountant can't be on the combine when the fuel truck comes up. I think there will be a danger that rebates to which they are entitled will not being collected. That is the difficulty I see from a farmer's standpoint.

Senator Steuart: Have you had any complaints from Manitoba farmers who are having difficulty in finding out where they stand? I talked with a farmer the other day who farms in the Birch Hills district near Prince Albert. In an effort to diversify his farming he went into growing canary seed. This might not seem serious to some, but it is extremely serious to him. He has not been able to find out if he has to charge the GST to people who buy canary seed from him. For a while it looked as though he would have to. In one way the regulations appear to show that if one grows seeds or grains other than for human consumption then the GST must be charged on their sale. Yet, another place in the regulations states that if the same seeds or grains are grown for feed for cattle and other animals, then the GST does not have to be charged and all the inputs can be claimed.

The farmer I am speaking about is attempting to diversify his farming, and this is something we are trying to encourage as the sales of our standard grains are running into difficulties. His complaint is that he doesn't seem to be able to get any answer from those who should know.

According to the government, it is on the verge of putting this tax in place. This farmer is about to enter another season and has to do his planting at this stage of the game. He has to decide whether he should continue with this particular crop or abandon it and concentrate on others. Have you had any complaints in that regard from farmers in your area? What results have they had when they have tried to follow the television ads or the advice they have received from telephone inquiries they have made? We know that the government is spending millions of dollars to advertize and explain the GST. Have you had any complaints of that nature?

Senator Molgat: I must say, Senator Steuart, that I have not received any complaints directly from canary seed growers. While it is not a common crop in my province, quite a few producers grow canary seed. It is an important sector for diversification.

Let me try to identify this person's problem. Is it that he is going to have to collect the sales tax when he sells canary seed, or that he does not know if he has to collect it? What is his specific concern?

Senator Steuart: He has had inquiries from people to whom he sells this seed as to whether they will have to pay it. He is not sure. I obtained some of the regulations from Senator Buckwold's research people. My reading of one of the regulations is that he will have to pay the tax, depending on where he is selling the seed. He may sell some of it to someone in the United States and he would not have to collect the tax. However, if he sells it to someone here in Canada, apparently he will have to collect it. His problem is that he does not know, and the people he is selling to are not sure. He also does not know whether he can claim any inputs on that. This farmer also grows wheat, barley and oats and he knows he can claim inputs on those particular crops. However, he might not be able to on the canary seed. How does he divide it up? It creates a difficult accounting problem, and he has not been able to get any satisfactory information. He gets certain advice from one source and differnt advice from talking to someone else. He is extremely confused and worried.

Senator Molgat: I am sorry, Senator Steuart, but I cannot give you an answer to the problem. However, I do see it. If he grew only canary seed, then I think there would be a simple solution. I suspect that he would have to collect the GST because it would not be labelled as a food product. However, if he produced other items, then he would certainly have a difficult accounting procedure to follow. It would be extremely difficult to segregate the amount of his inputs that result from growing canary seed as compared to growing wheat or another crop. He might make some chartered accountant happy, but the farmer would be unhappy if it added more costs on top of what he has to pay for the GST. It indicates the complicated nature of the problem.

Senator Steuart: Far more than 4,000 civil servants will be needed to chase all these people down.

Senator Molgat: Yes, that is true.

Continuing with the VAT in Europe:

> While most European countries tax food fully, the non-taxation of food in the United Kingdom has created definitional problems over what is or is not a food item. Difficulties have arisen particularly with restaurant meals and in other areas such as confectionery. Financial institutions have largely been exempt from VAT in Europe, but there have been problems of definition over what is or is not a bank. It seems that European countries generally have exempted financial institutions because of the difficulty of defining value-added for banking, insurance, and other financial activities. Canada, in contrast, had considered including financial institutions in the tax base before the announcement of their exclusion in the white paper. The lesson here from European experience may be the potential pitfalls in any attempt to include financial institutions in the tax base.

A Senate page has just delivered to my desk more of my "blues". The pile is building up. In view of the fact that the audience is changing, I may start over again so that all of my honourable friends will have the benefit of the full content of my remarks.

Senator Marsden: Senator Molgat, would you entertain a question? Apropos of what you just said, and since I am one of those who has just entered the chamber, could you summarize for us what your remarks have been to date? I don't mean for you to repeat your speech but to put the remarks you are about to make into context.

Senator Steuart: I understand from senators opposite who have among their numbers three top-grade doctors, that they are guaranteeing to save only one of us every 24 hours. Remember that as you speak, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: How can I refuse that kind of invitation, Senator Marsden?

I started off on the basis that, philosophically, I prefer a tax based on ability to pay. I said that if we could make the income tax system absolutely fair so that it covered everyone, then I would prefer a graduated income tax system. However, I recognize that it is virtually impossible to make the income tax system fully operational as I would like to have it. The cost of doing so might be astronomical. People who pay income tax are basically people on salaries. They pay through the nose. They don't see their tax payment. It is taken off their income before they ever get their cheques. The tax load of income tax falls on those people unfairly. There are a number of people in this country who for a variety of reasons do not pay the amount of income tax they should. There is some income which the system has difficulty reaching. Therefore, I can accept a consumption tax, but with certain clear provisos. The purpose of the consumption tax would be to get those people who do not pay their share of income tax. They have made money but have not paid any income tax on it. We can at least get some of the tax when they spend the money. However, the system must be fair. It must definitely guarantee that at the lower and middle parts of the income scale there are adequate deductions which are indexed. The amendments we proposed to this bill would have done that, although I would have considered raising it so that there is more protection at the bottom end.

I said also that the tax must be coordinated with the provinces from a collection standpoint in order to reduce the overhead and so as not to have nine collection systems; that is, one in each province which has a sales tax, with Alberta being exempt, and then superimposing on that another federal collection system. That is wrong from a Canadian standpoint. It is also costly and impractical.

I also said that the provinces have to—for other purposes altogether—coordinate with the federal level of government. There are variations in our country. The people who can best judge that are those who run the provinces. We have to look at some of the anomalies that the system presently produces. It has unfair regional impacts. I cited the case of our Inuit friends who were in our galleries last week. I referred to the amendment proposed by Senator Watt. Those people will be paying more GST than other Canadians in proportion to their income.

In my province the people I represent, because of our climate and our distance from the centres of manufacturing production in Canada, have to pay large transpostation costs. For a variety of reasons our people do more travelling. If they do business or deal with the federal government they have to travel to Ottawa or Toronto. The people of Manitoba will pay a greater share of the GST than will the people in your province, Senator Marsden, who live in a milder climate. In any case, the government ought to sit down with the provinces.

This leads me to the conclusion that we should not proceed with the GST at this time, and not with the GST as it is. There is no rush to go into it on January 1. That follows a political agenda and not an economic one. Mr. Wilson and the Mulroney government want the tax now so that it will not have to come in just after an election is called. In that way they will have bushels of money to make great fellows of themselves when the next election comes. That is the reason that January 1, 1991, is such an important date for them. Economically, I do not think it is that important. The manufacturers' sales tax is still in place. Granted, it needs a great deal of improvement, but it can be improved. The government has not attempted to improve it. Yet, it has been in office now since 1984.

• (1300)

What they have done since 1984 is to have increased the MST from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. So the gist of my argument is let us not move now on the GST. Let us take time and let us deal with the provinces. Let us get one collection system and let us make sure it is fair. Let us not move at this time; there is no need to do that. That is the essence.

The rest of this has largely been answers to questions but also dealing with what has happened elsewhere. Right now I am dealing with the European systems of VAT, and I intend to come back to what I was dealing with earlier, which were the alternatives. I was particularly dealing with Dennis Mills' proposal of a single tax as an example of an alternative at which we ought to look. There could be many others and I have a few more in my file, as well, which I could deal with later.

Senator Marsden: Thank you. That is very helpful information to receive. I am very sorry I missed the first part of your speech because it certainly coincides with what many of us want to develop in our speeches. I only want to raise one point with you very briefly because I will have an opportunity later to do this at greater length. It is true that the tax may be higher for Manitobans in some way because of distance and climate and so on. But the tax is very, very hard in a province like Ontario in terms of what it does to industry and to our mix of consumers. I am sure I am not the only one from Ontario who will be expanding on this question at some length. I am very glad you pointed out the difficulties that Manitobans will face. I have a lot of sympathy for them, but I would hate to see us get into an interprovincial competition about who the GST will have the most impact upon. It seems to me that it is going to be pretty bad wherever you live in Canada. I look forward to hearing the rest of your comments.

Senator Molgat: I understand what you are saying. We should not get involved in that type of "I am suffering more than you are" discussion. There is nothing to be gained from it, and I agree that we will all be suffering. It indicates a need to get the provinces involved in the discussion. When Mr. Wilson backed off from his discussions with the provinces, it was clear to him that it would take some time to arrive at a compromise, and for the very good reason that the provinces had some specific concerns.

I earlier read into the record the particular concerns of Alberta, which was taking the federal government to the Supreme Court, and I think they were demonstrating how there are differences in the provinces. Surely the government would have learned from the Meech Lake experience. They thought they could bulldoze Meech Lake right through instead of sitting down and talking to the people of Canada. On this GST, we are faced with the same situation in that there has to be more consultation with the people of Canada. The first approach should be to get an understanding with the provinces.

We had a discussion earlier this morning with some of my colleagues opposite regarding the court cases in which there are currently three provinces involved; Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario. There are two elements, the first being the constitutional one whether Ottawa is entitled to raise that type of tax. The Supreme Court can judge that one. The other element is much more involved, and it will take time to talk to the provinces and find out what are their problems and what is it they each want in order to arrive at one system.

To come back to the European experience with the VAT, we have seen that it has particular problems for small business and for farming. They have also had difficulties particularly in the United Kingdom, as to what food is taxable and what food is not taxable. Most of the continental countries simply tax food; there is no exemption.

Problems in the financial area. What is a bank and what is not a bank; what is a financial institution and what is not a financial institution?

> Canada, in contrast, had considered including financial institutions in the tax base before the announcement of their exclusion in the white paper. The lesson here from European experience may be the potential pitfalls in any attempt to include financial institutions in the tax base.

Housing is generally exempt from the tax in Europe, both for construction of new housing and rental of existing structures to households. The attempts to tax housing in Canada on a construction-cost basis will almost certainly continue to encounter political resistance, and European experience perhaps indicates there are other potential pitfalls.

Now, before I go on to the experiences in value-added taxes and sales tax reforms in other countries, I want to deal particularly with the warning we had by the United States Treasury when they studied the VAT system and declared it was a money machine. The warning that we have had from European countries is that once implemented, it leads to regular increases. If we are talking about 7 per cent now, you can expect it will be 8 per cent a year from now and 10 per cent two years from now after the election. So what has happened, in general terms, with the VAT introduction in other countries is that the rate has been increased and the governments have added several different rates. In many cases it has started only with one rate and proceeded to multiply.

An Hon. Senator: Income tax has gone down.

Senator Molgat: Gone down? That part I am not sure of; it could be.

I am dealing with Table 11.2 on page 139. Argentina introduced VAT in January of 1975 at one rate of 16 per cent; by 1984 they had four rates of 5, 8, 18 and 25 per cent. They dropped it on two counts but they had increased it on two of them.

Austria introduced VAT in January, 1973, on two bases, 8 per cent and 16 per cent. There has been no change there.

Belgium introduced VAT in January of 1971 with three rates of 6, 14 and 18. By 1984, the rates were 6, 17, 19 and 25 per cent. They had added another rate and increased the others.

Bolivia had started with a VAT in October of 1973 comprising three tax rates of 5, 10 and 15 per cent. As a rare example, they are the first and only one in 1984 with a tax rate of 5 per cent. The first country on this list is Brazil. It introduced its tax in January of 1967 at 12 per cent. By 1984 it had three rates: 9 per cent, which was a reduction; 12 per cent, as at the time of introduction; and 17 per cent, which was a new rate.

● (1310)

Chile introduced its VAT in March of 1987 at 20 per cent. In 1984 the rate was still at 20 per cent. Columbia introduced its VAT in January of 1975 at the rates of 4, 6 and 10 per cent. By 1984 it had five rates, all of them higher: 6, 10, 15, 20 and 35 per cent. Costa Rica introduced its VAT in January of 1975 at 8 per cent. This table shows no indication of what it was by 1984. Denmark introduced its VAT in July of 1967 at 10 per cent. By 1984 it was 22 per cent. It went from 10 to 22 per cent. The Dominican Republic introduced its VAT in January of 1983 at 6 per cent. By 1984 it was still at 6 per cent. Ecuador introduced its VAT in July of 1970 at 4 per cent. There is no indication of what it was in 1984.

France introduced its VAT in January of 1986 at the rates of 6.4, 13.6, 20 and 25 per cent. By 1984 it had dropped one rate to 5.5 per cent, but had others at 7, 18.6 and 33.3 per cent.

Senator Steuart: May I be permitted to ask a question on the research Senator Molgat has done and the statistics he has before him? First, is there any indication that the different rates were charged for the reason underlying one of the amendments we introduced here, which was turned down, which is that there should be higher rates of tax on luxury items? In Senator Molgat's opinion, would that make the tax less burdensome on low income people? Of course, people with high incomes, who tend to buy luxury goods, would do so at higher rates.

Senator Molgat has gone over the figures, but in his opinion what percentage of those countries who have gone to a system of graduated taxation have done so in an effort to make this a less oppressive tax than what we are proposing here in Canada? Is there any indication of what type of good would be taxed at a higher rate? Take, for example, the 33.3 per cent rate. Has there been any indication of what type of good or service would be taxed at that rate?

Senator Molgat: This book does not give me that information. However, I can tell the honourable senator that, from personal consultations with French government officials—we spent four days with them having a look at their system—the increase in the number of different rates and the increase in the rates was indeed to catch luxury items. They were following basically what it was that we proposed here in one of our amendments, that luxury items ought to be taxed at a higher rate because those who could afford to buy those goods could afford to pay a higher rate of tax.

I cannot guarantee that the same applies to all of the other countries. But I can tell Senator Steuart this, that two things have generally happened. First, the rates have gone up. Second, several levels of rates have been added. A country might have started with one or two rates, but has ended up with three, four or five rates. That is the consistent pattern. That is what I am trying to get on the record.

Senator MacDonald: I think Senator Molgat will find that income taxes in those countries have decreased.

Senator Molgat: If that information is in here, I will read it. I can assure Senator MacDonald of that.

Senator Steuart: Do I take it, from what you have said, that many of these nations began with one level of taxation, as we are doing in Canada, but have learned from experience and so have added other categories? Would that indicate that again our government either has not taken the advice or studied examples of other countries and has refused to put this graduating scheme in now? We are going to wait until our present system causes all kinds of hardships, and then the government will do what governments in other countries have done, after what was probably a bitter experience for the people.

Senator Molgat: Yes, I think the senator is correct. I cannot at this point go through the table to provide him with an enumeration of how many have gone up and how many have gone down, but all anyone has to do is look at this list. This line shows where they started, and the lines are short. This other line shows where they were in 1984, and the lines are longer. There were a lot more VAT rates in 1984.

The trend, honourable senators, is very clear. What we proposed in our amendment was, I think, a sensible approach. Experience shows what has happened in other countries. It is better that we start off on the right foot.

I come back, Senator Steuart, to say that if we had had proper discussions with the provinces about this matter; if we had taken the time to do the work that should have been done, things might have been different. We should have taken that time when going through a major tax reform.

Senator Steuart: It is not too late.

Senator Molgat: No, it is not too late. The federal sales tax is in place. It will bring in revenue next year. It is not going to change suddenly. Let us get away from this political agenda of having the tax passed on January 1 so that the government can get ready for the election two years from now. Honourable senators, this is a political agenda. It is not an agenda for the people of Canada; it is an agenda for the Conservative government in anticipation of re-election. That is what this tax is all about. The government wants to shove it through now with the idea that people will have forgotten it by the time the election comes along.

Senator LeBlanc: They won't!

Senator Molgat: The government will have bushels of money. It will have exactly what the American treasury has called a "money machine" for the government.

Senator Steuart: Is that what it says in that book?

Senator Molgat: That is what it says right here. The Treasury Department of the United States in 1986 conducted a study devoted exclusively to the VAT. This document states:

> The third volume of the U.S. Treasury tax reform documents, devoted exclusively to the VAT, makes it clear that the main argument against the VAT is that it is a "money machine" for government.

Senator Steuart: Who put that book out?

Senator Molgat: This book is put out by the Canadian Tax Foundation, an impartial group. That is what it is called in here—a "money machine" for the government. It is a political money machine for the government; and this is a political agenda for a government getting ready for the next election. This tax is being shoved down the throats of Canadians on January 1, 1991 in the hope that they will forget it by 1993. That is its whole purpose.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I wonder whether the honourable senator would allow a question relating to those comments? He will recall that in their first term, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Minister of Finance spent their time blaming the previous administration for the Canadian deficit. In every one of his budgets, the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, introduced measures that he claimed would reduce the deficit. But that did not happen, for obvious reasons—they continued spending. They spent in new areas of economic activity. They enlarged some programs but still, under the guise of cost-cutting, reduced, or attempted to reduce, the federal civil service. That went on and on.

For the first four years that is all we ever heard: "Blame it on the previous administration." But during that time the deficit kept creeping upward. In their second term, they were still bemoaning the actions of the previous administration for the Canadian debt.

The government has been in power now for six years—six long years—and it is still moaning and groaning and grumbling. Have honourable senators ever heard an administration that has been in power for six years blame the previous administration for the sins it has itself committed?

• (1320)

Do you have the feeling that with the GST we are witnessing the greatest act of highway robbery in Canadian industry? Do you agree that Mr. Wilson has lost his credibility? The Prime Minister is tired of him. The news is now leaking out that Mr. Wilson is on his last run as Minister of Finance, whether or not this bill passes or whether it passes in this form or another form, immediately following its adoption, if it gets adopted.

Do you have the impression that they have reached a state of panic, after hearing the testimony collected by the committee during its summer sittings and the many letters and briefs that we have received on this side? I am sure tht senators opposite have received the same material, but we never hear a whimper from them. They also must have received petitions, but the only petition they dared to raise in the house was the one that Sentor Doody has asked Senator Murray's office staff to sign.

We are now faced with a government that has proven its incapacity to control the growing debt, a debt which, over the last six years, they have substantially contributed to. The GST is just an act of panic, highway robbery, and digging deep into the pockets of Canadian taxpayers.

Senator Steuart was suggesting—as you are suggesting—that the government has not properly studied what happened in other countries. We know that in other countries in most cases proper studies were done. I am not saying that the imposition of the value-added tax or its combinations was generally accepted by the population, but at least they did their homework. They opened themselves up to amendments and suggestions.

This government is like a bull in a china shop. It is ram, ram, ram.

I will repeat my question, Senator Molgat. When you analyze the whole situation, do you have the impression that this government has panicked and is panicking? How can we hope to pound any sense of reason into it at this stage, knowing what a panicked person is like? I would like you to comment on that.

Senator Molgat: Senator Corbin, I do not know how Mr. Mulroney feels about Mr. Wilson and what degree of confidence Mr. Mulroney has in him. I have heard rumours that he intends to put Mr. Wilson in another post.

It is clear that the Canadian public has lost confidence in Mr. Wilson. They see a government that is stubbornly hanging on to the GST, refusing to listen to the Canadian people, refusing to listen to reasonable propositions that are put to them, and refusing to listen to the provinces of this country. Three provinces are taking the government to court. Most of the others have said they are opposed to this bill. Yet, the government stubbornly hangs on and says, "We don't care what the Canadian public thinks. We don't care what the provinces think. This is what we are going to do."

Is it because of panic? Is it because of stubbornness and a refusal to change course when you can see that you are wrong? I do not know. The results of this tax are not good for Canada. It is a sad situation.

The House of Commons has passed this, but I would like a secret ballot to be held in the House of Commons, and see what the outcome of the GST would be.

Senator Corbin: Senator Molgat, I realize you have the floor, but I should like to ask another question following on your comments.

Do you think the legislation would pass the House of Commons today, knowing what we know about it and having received the government's information sheets with respect to its application? The facts that we have indicate that not everyone knows about the full impact of the GST. We have managed to elucidate and garner quite a bit of information through our Senate activities over the spring, summer and fall. Would you not think that there would be great resistance at all stages in the House of Commons if that bill in its present form were to be introduced today?

Senator Molgat: Senator Corbin, I would hope there would be. There is no question that if the elected members were to listen to their electorate, it would not pass.

We have an electoral system in Canada which is better described as an elected dictatorship. Through the power of the party system and the control that the Prime Minister, once elected, has over the system, the power is immense. It is indeed a dictatorial power.

We talk a great deal about Senate reform in this country. I am for Senate reform. I chaired the last joint committee on Senate reform. Our report recommended major reform in the Senate. It recommended an elected Senate and many other things. My record is clear as it relates to Senate reform. Senator Balfour was also on the committee.

Hon. James Balfour: I was. Did you permit the committee to participate in the drafting of the report?

Senator Olson: Of course. We invited everyone to be there.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Molgat: Yes. You were there, Senator Balfour.

• (1330)

We have a good committee. You probably could not have noticed in our committee who belonged to what party from the discussions and the way that—Senator Tremblay was there as well!

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Which report are you referring to, the one that came out in January 1984?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Tremblay: Who was in power at that time?

Senator Molgat: Mr. Trudeau's government.

Senator Tremblay: What was done for six months?

Senator Molgat: I will send you the answer, Senator Tremblay. You will remember that we used one of the House of Commons' Standing Orders whereby the government has 60 days, 90 days, or something, thin which to respond after a report is tabled. Since it was a joint committee, we used the House of Commons' Standing Order and we asked the government to respond. Within the prescribed length of time, Mr. Trudeau wrote to us saying that he did not necessarily agree with all of the recommendations, but that generally the government agreed with our report, which was to be the starting point for discussions with the provinces. At that point he assigned Mr. MacGuigan, who was the Minister of Justice at the time, to visit all the provinces. Mr. MacGuigan began his round of visits. In the meantime, Mr. Trudeau resigned and the leadership race began. That was the end of things. However, I can assure you . . . I will be very pleased to send you a copy of the letter. I thought everyone had received it, but if not, I will be pleased to send you one.

In any case, to get back to what I was saying, the government began discussions with the provinces.

Senator Tremblay: Do you remember chapter seven—if I remember correctly it was chapter seven. The report said that the Senate could initiate major changes on its own. Unless I am mistaken, you were in the majority at the time. I remember suggesting that we proceed with these matters. But nothing ever became of it.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable Senators, I would like to raise a point of order. I believe Senator Tremblay has just established a precedent. We must decide whether we will accept what he did as a precedent. He rose to ask Senator Molgat a question but he was not in his proper seat in the Senate.

Should we consider this action a precedent or should we rescind it? This is an important, fundamental issue. As far as I know, this is the first time a senator has officially risen in this Chamber either to make a speech, ask a question or raise a point of order without being in his or her assigned seat in the Senate.

I see the senator is preparing to rise again in Senator Grimard's seat. I think Senator Tremblay is usurping Senator Grimard's rights and privileges. The Whip of the Party assigned Senator Grimard his seat. I see Senator Tremblay has already acknowledged the seriousness of my point of order, since he is hurrying back to his proper seat. I see him as a person who respects the Senate's traditions, and I salute him warmly.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: In conclusion, Senator Corbin, I would like to say that I was considering intervening from another senator's seat, not with a view to contrevening the Rules, but of absolving you for the times when you did the same thing.

Senator Corbin: On the same point of order, I would ask Senator Tremblay to tell me when I would have violated this rule. You are making a very serious accusation.

Senator Tremblay: I do not remember at what precise time you did it, but I can still see you rising to speak to myself or others from seats other than your own.

Senator Corbin: I may have heckled on occasion, but as far as I can recall, I never remember asking a question or raising a point of order or doing anything else from a Senate seat other than my own.

I may have done some heckling, but that is fair ball, everyone does it all the time. However, what you did was to rise to officially ask Senator Molgat a question. In any case, I would like to acknowledge the respect you showed to tradition by returning to your seat. I consider you a first-class gentleman. We came to a good understanding. The Rules apply in this case. We both recognize that, and I thank you for what you did.

• (1340)

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Senator Corbin, if I may say so, I think you are being very harsh on Senator Tremblay. He was not moving a motion. He was not doing something that was going to have momentous consequences, although the reply may have momentous consequences. I think you should be asked to reconsider forcing the senator to come all the way back to his seat when we all know who he is. We even know the new senators, most of them by name. It seems to be a little harsh. I wonder if you want to reconsider?

Senator Corbin: On that point of order, honourable senators, last night we had another one of these, what I would like to call, "pontificating speeches," by Senator Ottenheimer. It was his turn last night. We get pontificating speeches from time to time, regularly scheduled, probably prepared by someone in some office somewhere. I am speaking on the point of order. Senator Ottenheimer suggested that we should change our rules. I am not opposed to extending the privilege of speech from a seat other than one's own in the Senate, but the rule is written now in such a way that we have no option. It has to be applied. There must be a very good reason for that.

To begin with, it makes it easier for the stenographers to identify senators. The people taking notes see Senator Tremblay getting up in Senator Grimard's seat, and she or he probably made a note, "Senator Grimard on a question", when, in fact, it was Senator Tremblay sitting there. We cannot expect the staff to be able to identify senators visually and instantly like that. That is, I suppose, one of the good reasons for that rule, that when a senator wishes to speak, he rises in his place in the Senate.

Senator Barootes: Like last Thursday night, would you say? Last Thursday night when you were all asked to return to your seats? That was rising in your place?

Senator Corbin: I suppose you are speaking to the point of order from your—

Senator Barootes: Excuse me?

Senator Balfour: How many times have you spoken to this point of order?

Senator Corbin: I have been asked to speak to the point of order, and I am responding to it.

Surely you will agree with me, senator, that Senator Tremblay was out of order in rising to put a question to Senator Molgat from Senator Grimard's seat. You know that. You occupy the Chair from time to time. You are an experienced parliamentarian. I think we have sat the same length of time or thereabouts on the Hill. We know what the rule is in both houses and in other legislatures.

I am simply saying that Senator Tremblay, after my point of order, regained his seat. He did it in a gentlemanly fashion. He did it because he recognized he was in the wrong by putting the question from a seat other than his own.

I think the matter ought to be closed, Senator Marsden. I do not think there is anything to add to it, unless I missed the angle of your question.

Senator Marsden: No, Senator Corbin. I think you have made very compelling arguments in favour of the rule, but I wonder, since you know a lot more about the rules than I do, if you can expand on the implications? For example, could it have been that Senator Tremblay was really asking a question on behalf of the senator in whose seat he was sitting? Or, alternatively, if one of us wants to ask a question on your behalf, should you be absent, could this be done simply by moving to your seat so there are no stenographic problems? Of course, we could have questions asked in absentia, as it were. Is that one of the implications of the seating rule?

Senator Corbin: You asked me to clarify that point of order. I have not known Senator Grimard for very long. However, I remember a certain sitting during the night when he got up in his seat and made some very valuable contributions to the debate that was taking place at that time. He brought forward a number of clarifications. In a sense, Senator Grimard is an experienced proceduralist. I understand that he is a good lawyer, un beau "chicanou" comme dirait Molière. I do not think he is ready to concede his chair in the house to another senator. I do not think he is prepared to see his seat usurped by another senator under the guise of a point of order, a question of privilege or a speech.

• (1350)

The seat that has been assigned to us is from Her Majesty the Queen through the Governor General of Canada under the Great Seal of Canada—

Senator Murray: Does that make you a British senator?

Senator Corbin: No, I am not a British senator. However, I have much respect for Her Majesty the Queen. I suppose you could say that I am a royalist to a very great degree because I respect the institutions of Canada as they stand. I am a royalist, and I will not apologize for that. My ancestors were royalists. They were royalists when the United States invaded Canada in 1775. They fought side by side with the Governor of Canada of the day. We are not ashamed of that tradition or record in our family. In fact, we are very proud of it. As long as Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II is the Queen of Canada we will stand up to defend the institution. That is the way it is. As long as it is there, I am prepared to respect it. If collectively Canadians want to go another way, I suppose the majority will have its say.

However, Senator Marsden, coming back to your point, you said tht I am an expert in the rules. I am by no means an expert in the rules. I have gathered some valuable experience over the years. I know of many precedents that have been established in the course of debates. My whole point was to draw to the attention of the house whether or not we should consider as a precedent Senator Tremblay's rising in Senator Grimard's seat to put a question to Senator Molgat. Should we let it stand as a precedent? I guess the whole matter was resolved when Senator Tremblay walked back to his seat and made a comment therefrom. He acknowledged implicitly through that act that he was out of order and that he therefore does not want his questions put in Senator Grimard's seat to be considered a precedent in any way, shape or form. That is fine with me. I like people who respect the institution and its rules.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: If I remember correctly, I was answering the question by the Honourable Senator Corbin. His question was as follows: If Bill C-62 on the GSt were introduced again at this time in the House of Commons, do I think that it will be passed at this time?

I was telling him that unfortunately, in a supposedly democratic system that is in fact a dictatorial government that is elected every four or five years that the Prime Minister's power is in my view far too extended in this country. He is empowered to appoint 40 ministers who report only to him; to appoint some 40 parliamentary secretaries who report only to him. To appoint committees chairpersons, and there is a great number of them, who report only to him; to appoint all deputy ministers and find them a position in any department of his choice and report only to him. I am talking here about our government system. Let us put aside the ambassadors and the commission heads, etc. Let us talk only about the government system. His power is immense.

In our party system, we hardly allow independent voting. What we need in Canada is not only Senate reform. I am in favour of Senate reform. What we need, essentially, is a parliamentary reform. We have to change our system so that Parliament will better represent the Canadian people, what it is not doing at the present time. Canadians do not feel that the Canadian Parliament represents their point of view with regard to the GST. I am talking about the Canadian Parliament!

We represent, I think, public opinion. When the House of Commons is voting on the GST, it does not represent public opinion. We therefore must change the system. Otherwise it is quite clear that the Canadian public will lose its confidence in the political system. It is not something that can be put aside or that can be toyed with. This is far too important.

We need a parliamentary reform so that Parliament can really fulfil the expectations of Canadians and be the democratic tool we want it to be.

I will send to Senator Tremblay the letter of former Prime Minister Trudeau. Senate reform had been started but nothing has been done about it since then. Senator Tremblay is telling us that the Senate could have done a few things. Yes, this was up to us. I did not get many indications that there was a wish on the Senate's part to do it and certainly not from the government; no step was taken. Absolutely no step was taken. I know that some would say that the Meech Lake Accord was dealing with Senate reform. But that was not Senate reform, it was only changed with regard to the appointment of Senators. There was no indication that the provincial governments would make any changes and that the Senators they would be appointing would be very different from those appointed by the federal government.

Let us come back to the question before us regarding the GST. I was talking about the European experience and the experience of various other countries which adopted a GST. They generally start with one taxation level which is gradually increased. I was also stating what happened in most of those countries. I think that you understood what I meant. I am told that some other Senators would like to take the floor. I do not want to take advantage of the Honourable Senators. I could go on until 2 p.m.

At this time, I might make a small change in the tone of my speech.

• (1400)

[English]

I am totally non-partisan today, and it is not so much that I want to become partisan, because I think the issue is far above partisan consideration. Before I sit down, I wish to hve certain things put on the record because of certain statements that have been made and repeated.

I want first to deal with the question that has been frequently repeated across the country, that we do not have the legitimate right to oppose government legislation. That is a standard question, and I have to confess that in the past it has troubled me at times. I think my friend, Senator Hatfield, is nodding his head in agreement. We come from the same sort of background, having started in provincial legislatures, ourselves coming from an elected source. Admittedly, I had some reservations about the position of appointed senators whether dealing with government legislation. Yet when I considered what happened with the GST and the effect it is going to have on Canadians, and the fact that I think the House of Commons was bulldozed into this thing—

Senator Olson: For sure.

Senator Molgat: —I am convinced that the members representing my part of the country want no part of the GST. If they were left free, they would not have GST as it is. I think they would agree with me that we should take time to change it, but they have been bulldozed into it.

However, I want to read into the record what some outsiders think about our right, our responsibility and our authority in this matter. I am quoting from an article by Mr. Rick Salutin. Here is what he says:

> Perhaps it's possible to move, for a brief moment, from the subject of unity to that of democracy. The Meech melodrama has hardly been a democratic high point, but an important focus for this issue is the current set of battle lines between the House of Commons and the Senate.
>
> In fact, the dispute over the Senate's right to alter or reject legislation passed by the House of Commons may be Canada's quirky way of entering the worldwide political ferment over democracy. It raises basic questions because it hinges on the difference between the substance of democracy and its mere form.
> Cabinet members and opinion leaders keep pointing out that the Senate is unelected; therefore, they insist, it is undemocratic for it to block measures passed by the elected members of the House of Commons. The citizens do not appear impressed. A Gallup poll, for instance, shows 68 per cent of Canadians believe the Senate should stop the proposed goods and services tax, while only 22 per cent feel it should not.

This article was printed some months ago; so, at that time, 68 per cent of Canadians thought the Senate should stop the GST; 22 per cent said they should not. That is some contradiction with the government saying that we cannot do this.

> There was similar tolerance for the Senate's role in forcing an election on free trade.
>
> This is not necessarily a sign of mass political mindlessness. It is not that people fail to notice the unelected nature of the Senate, but that they've become far more aware lately of how undemocratic the Commons and the government can be, their elected status notwithstanding.
>
> Consider the major cases of "obstruction" by the Senate.
> The free trade agreement. In 1983 Brian Mulroney said free trade was "a threat to Canadian sovereignty," and citizens would hear no more about it from him. Shortly after, he made a free-trade deal, which the Senate blocked pending an election on the matter. Who behaved more democratically?

Good question.

Senator Olson: I suggest the Senate did.

Senator Molgat: To continue:

> Unemployment insurance. During the 1988 campaign, then minister for international trade John Crosbie said:

I am sorry I cannot do this in proper Newfoundlandese but, if I may be excused, I will do it in my standard flat western Canadian French. So I am quoting Mr. John Crosbie.

> "The prime minister has assured me that there will be no changes to unemployment insurance." In April, 1989,—

Just a few months later:

> —the government introduced a massive and fundamental revision. The Senate is insisting on amendments to protect some features of the program. Who is acting undemocratically?
> Clawback. In 1984, Mr. Mulroney called the universal nature of social programs a "sacred trust." Once in office, he moved to abolish it for the indexing of pensions to account for inflation, then backed off. But it has been eliminated through de-indexation of family allowances, and the recent pension clawback, which the Senate refuses to pass.

Of course, this was prior to the resumption of the session in September, but the Senate passed the clawback.

> The GST. The government did speak of this before the election, but very softly. Popular opposition, though, is massive. The GST may be the least popular measure any Canadian government has ever passed.

Well, not yet passed in the Senate but passed through the House of Commons.

> There is no doubt the Senate will voice the view of the vast majority if it blocks the tax. So who is democratic?
>
> These matters affect the real lives of Canadians far more than the abstractions and rhetoric around Meech Lake and national unity. It is the Senate which has kept them alive as issues, and prevented them from slipping by in our long night of constitutional obsession.
>
> The sole argument for calling the Senate's actions undemocratic lies in its unelected character. But what of those elected on one platform who blithely do the opposite? Or implement policies that even they agree are almost universally despised? The prime minister refers to this as providing leadership, rather than ignoring the will of the people, but it can hardly be called democratic.
> The conventional response is that the voters get their chance to react at the next election. But why should citizens have to wait, especially when their lives, or even their country's life, can be damaged or shattered before the next vote? And also when, as people increasingly believe, elections can be manipulated or bought so the democratic will of the country is not guaranteed. Anyway, why should elections be the only time that elected governments have to behave as though they are democratically responsible?

We live in a time in which people have grown concerned about the reality of democracy rather than its mere electoral trappings. "We elect a king or queen, though we haven't elected a queen yet," a Vancouver youth worker told me during the last federal election, "and then for four long years that leader has carte blanche."

A Cape Breton rail worker felt much the same way: "You get to vote once every four years and then they get to do whatever they want for the next four years. And this is the great process of democracy?"

It used to suffice, in reply to such thoughts, to quote Winston Churchill, who called democracy the worst form of government except for all the others. But Churchill assumed democracy was equivalent to the British or U.S. political systems. People now seem ready to ask, just how democratic is our democracy?

● (1410)

This challenges those who feel change was necessary in the "people's democracies" of the Soviet bloc, but not in the near ideal "bourgeois democracies," as U.S. pundit Charles Krauthammer calls them. Others feel less complacent, and think our own system could still be a little more perfect, too. Democracy, in their view, is too important to be left to the occasional election. It has to be maintained between elections, as even the Senate, to everyone's surprise, is helping to do.

The Senate is no long-term solution to our democratic problems, and approval among Canadians of its recent role is strictly conditional, based on its value as an unlikely but useful corrective. What if the Senate ceased playing that role, either because a Tory government stacked it or because the Liberals returned to power and the Upper Chamber resumed its task as a rubber stamp?

An Hon. Senator: Oh!

Senator Molgat: Yes, I don't deny it.

People would look elsewhere for the kind of democratic check on the arrogance of elected power the Senate now provides. They might even discover means of expressing their frustrations that would make the current decriers of impasse look back fondly to the good old days of the undemocratic Senate.

As for Senate reform, it's a fine idea, and it would make the Senate itself more democratic. But it wouldn't touch those deeper problems that concern the far too undemocratic behaviour still possible in the rest of the system.

[Senator Molgat.]

I think Canadians should ponder those words. I think that we have a serious problem here.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Would Senator Molgat permit a question?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Kirby: In light of the excerpt he has just read, which comments on the democratic process, and in relation to the GST, given the fact that Senator Molgat is from Winnipeg, and given his knowledge of Winnipeg and Manitoba, could he comment on two points that were made when the Banking Committee held meetings in Winnipeg this summer?

As the senator knows, at the end of each day the committee encouraged individual citizens simply to walk on and make comments. Those citizens did not represent any groups. They were simply individual citizens wanting to comment on the GST. During the hearings in Winnipeg two of the citizens made walk-on comments that dealt directly with the issue just raised by Senator Molgat.

I think it would be interesting if I were to tell him briefly what those two citizens said, and then ask him to comment on them. One of those citizens was a Dr. Edward Agnew, a private physician in Winnipeg. He said to those of us on the committee:

> Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, is in jeopardy in this country and this piece of legislation is helping to get rid of it. In fact, at the present time Canadians are wondering what the democratic process in this country is all about . . . This goods and services tax must be defeated because it is undemocratic legislation . . . you Senators are the only thing that stands between the democratic process of Canada that I used to know and straight dictatorship.

I present that quote from Dr. Agnew as a reflection of a Winnipeg citizen. I would appreciate Senator Molgat's comments on it. Before he begins, however, there was another private citizen who spoke before the committee in our five minute walk-on sessions. He was a Mr. Arthur Allan de Jardin, who may, in fact, be from St. Boniface rather than Winnipeg. He stated:

> There has been a great deal in the newspapers lately about the question: Has the Senate the moral authority to stop the GST? I would suggest that every Senator, and the body itself, certainly has that authority . . . it is important that we look within ourselves and make the kind of decisions that may not stand up in the press, that may not get us a lot of friends . . . but which see us do the right thing. We have to get back to doing what is right, what is correct and what is moral . . . you certainly have the legal authority because you have stopped other bills without legal challenge. You certainly have the Canadian public behind you.

Those two quotes seem to me to bear directly on the point made by Senator Molgat. I repeat that they are comments from two private citizens in Winnipeg who took the time and trouble to appear before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce at its Winnipeg hearing on July 24 last. I would ask Senator Molgat to comment on their remarks, recognizing that these are citizens of a city and province within which Senator Molgat has been involved in public life for a long time. I think they reflect much of the feeling which Senator Molgat has indicated he thought existed in his part of the country when he said, at the opening of his remarks, that if there were a secret ballot in either the other place or here, members of the House of Commons or senators from his region of the country would vote against this bill because they would feel compelled to reflect the public opinion that I believe has been expressed succinctly yet accurately in the two quotes I have just read. Would the honourable senator comment on that point?

Senator Molgat: I thank Senator Kirby for his question. He may be from Atlantic Canada, but he has captured very well the feeling of westerners.

When people talk about western alienation and so on, I can say there is frustration. We feel that we elect members, send them to Ottawa, expect them to reflect our views, and then, when they get here, they become part of a big party machine and vote the party line. That is the reason why, through the years, the west has spawned new parties. We can go back to the Progressives of the 1920s. Take the farmer movements, the CCF of later years. The Social Credit Party had some strength in Alberta and I suppose we could now consider also the Reform Party.

There is the feeling that political institutions of the country do not work adequately to represent the feelings of the people. This is why I think the Senate has a particular role, and why I believe in Senate reform. The report on Senate reform—to which Senator Balfour and Senator Tremblay contributed—was essentially a non-partisan report, and the intent of it was to make the Senate a non-partisan house. That was really the thrust of our report—to get us away from partisan politics so that we could represent the regions from which we come rather than the political parties to which we belong.

I think the two quotations provided by Senator Kirby show the feeling of many westerners, and I can only agree with him. I have put on the record the views of Mr. Salutin to back up what I believe is the present situation that the Canadian public want. I think they expect the Senate to do what it is doing in opposing this tax. The Canadian public believes that we are not being undemocratic despite the fact that we are not elected. They believe that we are adamantly representing the will of the Canadian people.

● (1420)

I should like to put on the record another item. It has been constantly repeated that the government had a mandate to proceed with the GST—that indeed it had talked about it in the last election—and that Canadians knew, according to the government, that it intended to impose the GST. Therefore, it is perfectly legitimate for the government to go ahead now, because the public had been warned. I would like to read another commentary from The Globe and Mail of Wednesday, October 17, 1990. The headline says, "Keeping the public in the dark," and it is written by Linda McQuaig. It says:

> One of the most misleading statements coming out of Ottawa these days is the contention of Brian Mulroney's government that the goods and services tax was part of its 1988 election platform.
>
> The government is advancing this theory now, of course, in an effort to suggest that it was elected with a mandate to impose the GST. Even if the electorate is now overwhelmingly opposed to it, the theory goes, the public elected the government knowing full well of—even presumably endorsing—the GST.
> This is a considerable distortion of what happened. It is true that the government has indicated in vague terms in its 1987 tax-reform documents its intention to replace the Manufacturers Sales Tax with a new sales tax. But the government went mum on the subject during the 1988 campaign. This silence was with good reason.
>
> The new tax was going to benefit only a small segment of the population—primarily manufacturers, who had long disliked the existing sales tax and would enjoy a much lighter burden under the GST. Indeed, some $4-billion of the sales tax burden was to be transferred from the corporate sector to the household sector.
>
> So the government saw no particular advantage in mentioning the new tax to the general public during the election campaign. It was bound to raise suspicions that the tax would be used to soak additional revenues out of the public for the ongoing war against the deficit.
>
> For the Tories, there was no advantage in turning the GST into an election issue. Everybody who would like the new tax—manufacturers, business economists, tax experts—already know about it. The rest were better kept in the dark.
>
> So the government was set to let the issue slumber throughout the campaign, even though the GST was a central part of the Tory plan for its second term and all was in readiness to set the wheels for the new tax in motion as soon as the votes were counted. Everything was going according to plan when Don Blenkarn stumbled onto the scene.
>
> Mr. Blenkarn, the feisty Conservative chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee, was scheduled in the early days of the election campaign to make what promised to be one of its dullest appearances. He was to address a tax conference at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. The event actually had nothing to do with the election, having been booked months earlier.
>
> In the course of the day-long session, Mr. Blenkarn told the audience of economists and tax experts that the government planned to collect billions in additional revenues through the GST.
> This evoked little interest: the tax specialists in the audience already knew it. But when Mr. Blenkarn's comments about the additional revenue-raising potential of the new tax were reported the next day on the front page of The Globe and Mail, the cat was out of the bag. The increase that only experts were supposed to know about was now in the hands of the electorate—a dangerous place indeed. So how did the government react? If it is true, as the Tories now maintain, that the government had "campaigned" on the GST, surely its response would have been to say, 'Yes, Mr. Blenkarn is right, the new tax will raise considerable extra revenue and this is necessary for deficit reduction.' They would have said then what they are saying now.

But both Prime Minister Mulroney and Finance Minister Michael Wilson were quick to deny the accuracy of Mr. Blenkarn's comments, insisting that he did not speak for the government.

As the issue percolated over the next few days—Ontario Treasurer Robert Nixon piped in with comments about how Ontarians would find themselves paying a lot more sales tax—the government repeatedly denied that the new tax would raise any additional revenue.

Mr. Wilson insisted that it would be "revenue-neutral"—that is, would not raise additional money. It was not a vehicle for deficit reduction. With the government's assurances, the issue died.

Since the election, Mr. Wilson has been more frank. On CBC's Morningside radio program last month, he told host Peter Gzowski that the GST would raise additional revenues for deficit reduction.

"But I thought it was revenue-neutral?" Mr. Gzowski said. Mr. Wilson replied: "Well, no, it helps us get the deficit down." So much for honesty on the election trail.

The government now argues with ferocity that the GST is really the only option for reducing the deficit—choosing to ignore other fairer options, such as a detailed proposal developed by Osgoode Hall tax professor Neil Brooks to abolish regressive sales taxes altogether and raise the lost revenue through modest increases in the income tax. This option, which the government has refused even to consider, would save Canadians hundreds of millions in administrative costs alone.

The Tories now concentrate their fury on the evils of an unelected Senate, insisting that the shenanigans in the upper chamber are blocking the will of Canadians to have the GST put in place. But Canadians never endorsed the GST—not now and not during the election campaign.

Is the Senate really blocking the will of the people, as the government suggests, or simply blocking the will of the government, on an issue where the government was less than honest at the one time when Canadians were in a position to register their opposition?

Could it be that the Conservatives don't trust an informed Canadian public to make the right decisions, that they believe the only way to put their policies in place is sometimes to circumvent the will of the people? Are the antics in the upper chamber the real threat to democracy?

[Senator Molgat.]

• (1430)

I think those two items are very germane to the discussion before us, very apropos of what we are doing here in the Senate. I think we should reflect very deeply on the democratic aspects of it. This is why I appeal to my friends opposite to reconsider. It is not too late. It is not necessary for this tax to go in on January 1. The tax can very well be deferred. The manufacturers' sales tax is still in place, which will continue to generate revenue for the next year. We can spend the next year improving this tax. We can spend the next year in dealing with the provinces. We can spend the next year, instead of having three provinces bringing the federal government to court, as we have now, and, I think, two other provinces opposing, we can get them on board and do a job of tying Canada together. That is not the course that the government is on right now.

The government right now is on a course of needless confrontation with the provinces. There is no need to do that. We can change the agenda; we do not have to have this done by the 1st of January. I ask my honourable friends opposite to take the shackles off, do not let Prime Minister Mulroney and the gang at the other end tell you what to do. Be free. Do what your people want.

Senator MacDonald, you know that the people of Nova Scotia do not want this tax. They do not want this tax. Senator Marshall, you know that the Newfoundlanders do not want this tax.

Senator MacDonald: I know that 69 per cent of them do not believe that the Liberals would change it.

Senator Frith: Put us in there and let us try.

Senator Molgat: Do not tell me what—

Senator Corbin: The people are opposed to it.

Senator Molgat: —the Conservatives can do or what the Liberals can do. Senator MacDonald, you can do it. Do not wait for someone else. Do not wait for the next election. Do it now, Senator MacDonald. All you have to do across the way is represent your people—just represent your people.

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator Molgat: I am sure the people are telling you the same thing they are telling me. Why do you not listen to them?

Senator MacDonald: Seventy-four per cent—

Senator Frith: You do it then.

Senator MacDonald: Do not quote polls.

Senator Molgat: The issue is here before you now. Let us not—

Senator Corbin: Senator Molgat, you have touched a sensitive cord.

Senator Molgat: Let us have no illusions. Let us not say what is going to be done after the next election or before the next election. I am saying to all senators across the way, to all of the Conservative senators, it is in your hands. You can make the change. You can do it now. You do not have to wait. It cannot be done instantly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: Stand up. Tell those autocrats at the far end. Tell the Mulroneys and the Wilsons and the Oberles and those people who talk that way—what is his name—Jelinek. Yes. Tell them; tell them that it is not what the Canadian people want.

Senator Olson: You know that.

Senator Molgat: It is in your hands. You can do it. Do not tell me what will happen after the next election. The time is now. Speak out for your people in the way that we are trying to do.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, a few days ago, I think it was last Sunday, I was reading the literary pages of the Montreal Gazette. In fact, it was November 24, 1990. I particularly enjoyed the comments of a critic, T.F. Rigelhof, himself a novelist, on Sheila Fischman's excellent translation of a novel, Benito, by François Gravel, published in French in Quebec.

Is that an extraordinary event worth mentioning in the Senate of Canada? I think so.

What is it about? It is a novel by a Quebec novelist, François Gravel, published in Montreal in French by Boréal, a very curious book, a sort of contemporary fable whose hero is a complete fool whom the great of this world think wise. They ask his advice and we have a good laugh.

In Toronto, a small publishing house, Lester and Orpen Dennys, liked this book, which was certainly not going to be a bestseller or make its publishers rich. Lester and Orpen Dennys then had Benito translated into English by one of the country's best translators, Sheila Fischman of Montreal. The Gazette's critic thanked her warmly for her precious gift to English-language readers and added:

[English]

> It is the kind of book that rarely gets written in English. Its nearest relative being Jerzy Kosinski's Being There.

[Translation]

So two Canadian publishers, one in Toronto and one in Montreal, a French writer, an English translator, a few hundred bookstores and libraries scattered from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland. That is the complex, fragile system that enabled an author, François Gravel, to speak to thousands of Canadians in both official languages and, no doubt, reach an audience beyond our borders. The Gazette critic considers this a "big gift" for the English community.

It seems to me that is a wonderful way to bridge the "two solitudes" spoken of by Hugh MacLennan, that great English Quebec writer whom Senator Chaput-Rolland knew so well!

T. F. Rigelhof concluded this short by sympathetic review of François Gravel's book with these words:

[English]

> What makes all of this more than merely diverting is that Gravel understands (as Morrison does not) that the road from loving kindness to political consciousness and back again, has a million mischievious twists and turns.
> After the GST comes into effect on Jan. 1—

I am quoting of course. I do not believe that, but I am quoting Mr. Rigeloff:

> After the GST comes into effect on Jan. 1, books will still be published. But it's unclear who will be able to afford them. What is clear is that there will be many fewer new fiction titles from fewer publishers sold in many fewer independent bookstores, and that translations from French into English will be largely confined to the literary presses.

He continues:

> Rumor has it that one of the first firms to collapse may be Lester & Orpen Dennys, whose international fiction list broadens literary taste and ought not be allowed to terminate in Benito. Is anyone listening?

Honestly, Mr. Rigeloff, I do not think anyone is listening on the government side.

● (1440)

[Translation]

In recent weeks, we have seen that the Mulroney government is not listening to anyone. Absolutely no one. The eight amendments presented by the Liberal opposition were the minimum improvements that could be made to a very bad bill.

The senators opposite, some of whom are very good people, are nevertheless a fine collection of disjointed puppets who remain impassive in their seats until the time comes to vote. I imagine the sort of directions they must have received from their leader, Senator Lowell Murray, in recent caucus meetings. I am trying to picture the scene.

I suppose Senator Murray told them something like this:

With the eight additional senators, we are now assured of a majority. (Senator Murray is hardly embarrassed by the fact that the legitimacy of these eight senators is being discussed in court! That is a trifle.)

"So," Senator Murray continues, "we will win the final vote on the GST." He is sure of himself. "We will beat each of the eight Liberal amendments and those from the independents if we are weak enough to let them present any." That was before we forced them.

"Here are your marching orders," says the great leader, Lowell Murray. "First, pretend to listen to the Liberals' speeches and do not waste time discussing their arguments. What counts is the vote."

"Secondly, be careful when they read their petitions. Yes, even you, Senator Simard! Tell yourself that this Chinese torture can only last a few more days."

"Thirdly," Senator Murray continues, "everyone be present at the time the vote is scheduled. Pardon me, I correct that:

everyone be present five minutes before the scheduled vote. Yes, even you, Senator Keon. Even you, Senator Eyton. Yes, I well know that the Prime Minister promised you that your obligations as a senator would keep you in Parliament only two or three days a week, a few hours at most. Our Prime Minister was certainly sincere. It is MacEachen who spoiled everything. Complain to him."

"Fourthly," Senator Murray continues to tell his caucus, "personally, I promise you that the GST will be voted on by December 5 at the latest. I promised Harvie Andre that. As a precaution, make your reservations for Miami for after the 10th, but not before, because one never knows with MacEachen and Frith . . . And then come the big holidays! The Prime Minister will adjourn the session and close up shop until March: no more embarrassing question periods in the House of Commons, no more interminable sittings in the Senate, no more questions of privilege, no more petitions! Vacation time!"

Senator Murray stops for a moment to catch his breath. He looks around sternly, "No questions?" Tormented, disturbed, upset, worried by the amendment on books and periodicals, Senator Chaput-Rolland bravely raises her hand, followed by Senator Lavoie-Roux, who wonders whether it is good to overtax the Inuit in the Far North. With a look as stern as that of a medieval bishop about to excommunicate half his diocese, Senator Castonguay raises an authoritarian arm. A few other sensitive souls do the same: Senator David, surely, Senator Spivak, Senator Marshall, out of kindness.

Faced with this rather unhealthy expression of interest, Senator Murray showed impatience. He looked at his watch and said:

> "Dear colleagues, as I told you last week and the week before, it is always a great pleasure for me to answer your questions. Unfortunately, I am already late. I am expected at a meeting of the special committee of ministers to which I must report every day. You know Harvie Andre. He is not the most patient of men . . . Submit your questions in writing and you will find the answers in your mailboxes when you return in March."

I am quite sure, honourable senators, that I have given you a good idea of the caucus meetings attended by our colleagues opposite. If any details . . .

Hon. Paul David: What you say there, Senator Hébert, is all dreamed up.

Senator Hébert: You can talk longer, Senator David.

Senator David: No, that is all. It is just a very short comment in passing.

Senator Frith: Is it too fanciful or far-fetched?

Senator David: Everything that is dreamed up is usually wrong.

Senator Hébert: I am quite sure, honourable senators, that I have given you a good idea, dreamed up though it may be, as Senator David says, of the caucus meetings our colleagues opposite attended. For any details, I count on them to make the necessary corrections. If Senator David wants to correct something that I had Senator Murray say which is not quite right, because other senators have already helped me make corrections in other circumstances.

I apologize in advance for any possible errors. Alas, to know exactly what is going on in the Conservative caucus, I would have had to consult an expert like Erik Nielsen, for example, who listened in on the national Liberal caucus with electronic methods that are a great deal more effective than mine. It must be for his talents in communications that Mr. Mulroney appointed him chairman of the Transportation Commission. After all, they cannot name New Democrats to everything! There are limits!

I was telling you that Senator Chaput-Rolland could not ask Senator Murray the questions she had on her mind about the first amendment proposed by the Liberals, the purpose of which was to exempt books, periodicals and newspapers from any tax. Senator Chaput-Rolland asked her questions as a Quebecer, of course, as a writer, and of course as a woman, as she always says herself.

She did receive a promise from the Prime Minister, which must be taken far more seriously than Senator Murray's answers, which are always vague and somewhat woolly. I will take the liberty to quote this promise, which is now on the record, as a Quebecer, a former publisher and a man. I quote Senator Chaput-Rolland:

> I was afraid of this tax and, as an author, I wished with all my heart that the Prime Minister of Canada would carry out his promise to amend it, correct it, transform it, but out of loyalty to the Prime Minister of Canada, I was going to vote for this tax.

That is the statement by Senator Chaput-Rolland that I quoted several times and that I feel I will quote even more in future.

Hon. Louis Robichaud: That is not dreamed up!

Senator Hébert: It is not dreamed up. You are right, Senator. Those are facts. It is a quotation taken from the Debates of the Senate. This promise from Prime Minister Mulroney to Senator Chaput-Rolland, this nice concise sentence I just read to you—I would like to use it as a caption for this somewhat long speech where I will mention writers, publishers, booksellers, readers and, of course, the GST and the harm it will do them.

I hope to appeal to the intelligence or the heart of some of the senators opposite. I will leave it to my more competent colleagues to show the harmful effects the GST will have on all citizens of Canada except the rich. It will not bother the rich, but it will hurt everyone else. And the particularly devastating effects the GST will have on some sectors of our economy that are already shaken, like co-operatives, and on some regions of the country, like the Far North.

Personally, I will just talk about the world of books before it is too late, that is, before the GST brings back the chaos that existed in that field barely 30 years ago.

To understand the subject well, it is important to go back and remember what the small world of publishing was like, especially in Quebec, in the 1960s. It was not that different in Ontario and the rest of the country, as you know. The simplest thing would be to quote to you from a thesis, or part of a thesis, presented to the Sociology Department of the Faculty of Arts and Science at the University of Montreal by Ignace Cau. This thesis was not prepared for our committee or the House of Commons committee. Therefore it contains unpublished facts on Quebec publishing between 1960 and 1977. That is the period in which this previously non-existent industry struggled to become established. It continued to fight for its survival but the GST will put an end to it.

Here is what Marcel Rioux, who is a professor, as you know, and not in our party, said. He is speaking in a completely non-partisan way.

I suppose he wrote this as a preface to Mr. Cau's book which I mentioned.

● (1450)

> I suppose there is no greater joy for teachers than to learn that one of their students is publishing his first book, especially when it deals with the world of books in his country. I did not direct Ignace Cau's thesis—Marcel Fournier did, but I taught him for two years and I am not at all surprised that a publisher is interested in his thesis. As a student, he already showed the qualities that now make him an analyst skilled at seeing how things fit together.

This is to give you a taste, to show you that I am not quoting just anything at random to fill up the time allotted to me. On the contrary, it is to give you some completely new ideas about book publishing in Quebec.

> What I especially like about Cau's study is that he puts the problem of publishing in the context of the evolution of Quebec's cultural policy, which he shows in the overall development of Quebec in recent decades. These phenomena are intimately connected and are all steps towards a greater control of our national destiny.
> But as the writer clearly shows, we have a very long way to go and books were long suspect by the clergy and politicians.

Congratulations. Clergy and politicians, especially undemocratic ones, fear books. They do nothing to help disseminate books. So we can wonder about the democratic intentions of a government that knowingly, knowing the results of a fiscal policy, takes such risks with books, or rather book publishing. Does that mean it is not important for them? Does that mean that, like the clergy of another era or politicians in totalitarian countries, they suspect books? Because they suspect ideas? That is a question we might ask. I would not want to be on the side being asked that question. I know that it embarrasses some people here. They do not dare say so, but they are ashamed to be told that, basically, they do not respect books and ideas that much. It is irritating.

Msgr. Bruchési and Duplessis—

Duplessis is of the same ideological family as the people opposite, a Conservative, Union nationale. He changed the party's name because he was a bit ashamed about having it called Conservative. It is the same breed of people, as Victor Lévis-Beaulieu would say. I am borrowing the title of one of his books, Race de monde.

Msgr. Bruchési and Duplessis are not very far from us . . .

He said that in 1981, nine years ago. We must add that they are not very far from us either.

> We need only read the studies by Auguste Viat of our literature to realize it. The concept of culture in recent years has taken on a meaning that it was far from having when the Department of Cultural Affairs was founded in the early 1960s. The author shows very well that culture, far from being the icing on the cake, as they say, is what holds all the ingredients of the cake together and gives it meaning and its specific characteristics. That is a statement which some people are still hesitant to make. The publishing, distribution and reading of books is obviously an important component of culture and it is of the utmost importance that women and men here can be heard through their books. Our government must make this kind of cultural expression possible. That is what it takes to win a bigger place among the nations of the world. The wealth of nations, to borrow the title of Adam Smith's famous work, is not only economic growth . . .

As they seem to believe on the other side of this House.

> . . . but also its cultural richness.

which they do not seem to give a damn about on the other side.

> If, as Suzanne Crean and I say in our book Deux pays pour vivre (published by Albert St-Martin, 1980), the ultimate stage of imperialism is cultural domination, we are amazed that it is always necessary to remind decision-makers that films and books, for example, play a crucial role in our national life.

That was written in 1981. As you could see in the press in recent days, the film industry is another one that will probably be killed by the GST but is starting to realize it.

> By seeing and reading the world as others dreamed and expressed it, we quickly become those others. This cancer is fatal! We must thank Ignace Cau . . .

. . . the author whom I will quote at length to you in a moment . . .

> . . . for having dealt so skilfully with one of these important subjects.

That is by Marcel Rioux, who is not a Liberal—far from it—dated August 31, 1981.

I do not think that he is a Conservative either. Here is Professor Marcel Fournier's introduction to the same work. I read you the preface. Now here is the professor's introduction which somewhat guided the writer of the thesis.

> In human history, the importance of the invention of printing and the use of books as a means of communication—the Guttenberg Galaxy—is such that some contemporary psychologists do not hesitate to call such tools "culture simplifiers". They maintain that access to literature increases man's intellectual capacities. It even seems that interaction with books is a sort of precondition to a child's intellectual development.

In a historical work, L. Eisenstein summarizes the vast amount of documentation on the effects of the invention of printing and presents an interpretation of the social and technical changes related to this invention. The author does not claim that the development of printing alone explains these other changes; she shows how this technique tied many developments together. However, there is one field where printing itself changed the nature of intellectual constructs: science. The mere ability to write and reproduce easily allows new forms of knowledge to take shape.

We know the social prestige books soon acquired. Princes and kings sought the company of intellectuals and scribes; during the Renaissance, they loved to be painted talking to an intellectual or touching a book. Leadership was often associated with the ability to write. Books are both the tool and the symbol of learning, so much so that for some, using books is the main part of their life. To make sense of things and events, books (and writers) are essential, not only in research laboratories and study groups but also in daily life—to strengthen religious or political conviction, to solve a problem in child-rearing, to enjoy a bottle of wine, etc.

Books have thus earned a considerable place in the social and intellectual life of various communities; they have been the subject of much thought and analysis. In Quebec, we certainly know literary history, writers and their works, but we have very little information on the development of printing itself and on the production and marketing of books. Although it does not provide a history of books in Quebec, Ignace Cau's work shed light on an important and little understood aspect of Quebec's learned culture, the world of publishing from 1960 to 1977.

That is, the heroic period during which an industry that was almost non-existent before 1960 sprang into life, almost overnight, and that will be almost non-existent, or in any case seriously shaken by the GST once it takes effect, should that misfortune befall us.

Both the small size of its market and its great dependence on American and European (French) cultural businesses make Quebec publishing very unprofitable and unviable. The publishers and writers are the first to admit it. Nevertheless, this area of Quebec's cultural life has grown rapidly in recent years and is very dynamic. Ignace Cau's study provides an excellent description of this expansion and also explains it. The renewal of Quebec publishing coincided with various other cultural transformations—many art galleries opened, the museum of contemporary art was created, intellectual events were organized and various groups or associations were established. This appears to be closely tied to the Quiet Revolution. Thus, an intellectual environment and a Quebec public for it arose at the same time. The creation of the Hexagone publishing firm in the early 1960s is revealing of the conditions under which cultural institutions developed. The first writers and readers of this publisher of poetry were originally closely related to it, in the interconnected networks of the CBC, National Film Board and humanities and social sciences faculty of the University of Montreal.

The present government is killing the CBC. The National Film Board is not being spared with the budget cuts.

Quebec publishing followed fairly closely the changes in the university system which, in the 1960s and 1970s, was characterized by the growth of education, social sciences and humanities.

Nevertheless, it seems that the development of the education system at the college and university levels and the increased schooling of Quebec's population was not enough to ensure the growth of Quebec publishing companies. Except for a few publishers that are plainly business-oriented and issue mainly practical or topical works, Quebec publishing in most cases depends on school books and government subsidies to live. This is a condition of producing and distributing books in Quebec, but this relationship of publishing with the schools and government shows that this industry is weak and fragile.

As for its relations with the government, the coalition to defend publishing, faced with the threat of the GST, came to Ottawa in the last few days, but did not have great success. In fact, it obtained greater success, as one of my colleagues just pointed out to me, in an article in the Globe and Mail today, I think, which I may have the time to read to you, if all goes well, on the provincial level perhaps, because the Government of Quebec, despite its faults, is a little closer to reality. The government in Ottawa has shown that it is completely cut off from reality. It refused the request of eminent personalities who came from Montreal, from the publishing, bookselling and writing communities. Gratien Gélinas, Beauchemin and other known writers were scarcely received by people from the government. In any case, their representations were rejected.

It can hardly compete with the large American and French companies. Political intervention still appears necessary to reduce the dependence by reducing foreign control on publishing firms and distributors and marketers. We remember the Hachette affair.

I will tell you about it a little later.

● (1500)

The book industry is extremely vulnerable. In the past the Hachette affair nearly put an end to the development of booksellers and publishers in Quebec. More about that later.

It is worth reading what Ignace Cau wrote about this event. For his part, the Quebec Minister of State for Cultural Development suggested in his recently released White Paper a series of well-defined measures to ensure the production and distribution of Quebec books: adopting new property regulations, setting up distribution co-opera> tives, drafting a copyright law, establishing a program to help libraries, etc. At a time when production and distribution costs are rising, are these measures sufficient to protect publishing houses?

He was asking this question in 1980.

> The last two decades have seen publishers multiply and diversify, and we are now in danger of seeing small publishing houses disappear.

This is exactly what will happen and what was predicted in the latest studies submitted to Committees of the Senate and the House of Commons but nobody was listening.

It has been proven by purely scientific studies. There is also this sociology professor at the University of Montreal who asked the same question nine years ago, long before the Tories ever dreamed up the GST.

> We are in danger of seeing small publishing houses disappear.

Including the one I referred to earlier that published in Quebec a book which has been very well received in English Canada and might even be sold abroad. He goes on to say, and I quote:

> Mostly those concerned with culture but also, in higher proportion, businesses that produce and distribute books.

It is how this government thinks. It does not care whether books are handled by American or French interests through the Hachette group. It is the law of competition. If Hachette wants to buy, let them do it.

> In addition to these structural weaknesses of the Quebec book market, Ignace Cau writes in his conclusion about another problem which seems just as important: the reading habits of Quebeckers. Everything points to the fact that Quebec has the lowest proportion of readers in all of Canada . . . And, if we had more information on the reading segment of the population, we would see that a significant proportion of the books that are read come from Europe and the United States.

There is obviously a high rate of illiteracy throughout Canada, particularly in Quebec. Needless to say, the population base is not big enough to make the publishing and bookselling business profitable. Book readers comprise an even smaller segment of the population. These people are bilingual and therefore have direct access to the great literary works of the English-speaking world from the United States, Great Britain and elsewhere as well as to another inexhaustible source of books: the French-speaking world, particularly France but also Belgium and Switzerland.

> Moreover, if we had more information on the tastes of Canadian readers, we would see that an important proportion of books read come from Europe and the United States.

It is incredible how—and that goes for the Anglophone sector as well—foreign publications have already eaten into our market when our own authors make it into our few bookstores.

> Even though it is a good thing for readers, Quebec's geographical location and its access to two cultures constitute a major problem for publishing houses. They have a hard time finding books and authors able to compete with American and French best sellers. In the education sector only, considerable efforts were made to set up first-rate university publishing houses but it is far from certain that it is the main information source and training tools of Quebec academics.
> It is therefore important to study the reading habits of various segments of the Quebec population and to do what could be called an "ethnography" of reading habits. This study must be done as soon as possible because, in the coming years, Quebec readers will be sollicited more directly by other communication technologies . . . .

He must have been thinking about television, compact disks and videos.

> . . . and will face increased automation of information. Some already fear that books will disappear . . . Without panicking, we must recognize that books and reading habits will change considerably. People will not stop reading but they will read different books and for different reasons. We will still be wondering whether a book is from Quebec.

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, can I ask a small question to Senator Hébert? What do you mean, by "ethnography of reading habits"?

Senator Hébert: I think it is a kind of inventory to know from which country and culture books originate and what proportion of the Quebec market they make up, for example. I do not know if it has ever been done. What proportion of our books come from the United States, England, Australia and New Zealand, or from France, Belgium, Switzerland or Monaco. This is how I interpret this comment.

Senator David: Could it not mean something else, such as which readers are targeted. Does ethnography refer to the reading habits of various segments of the Quebec population? If my interpretation of this word is correct, as your study was done between 1960 and 1977, I suspect major changes have happened since then. Do you agree with me?

Senator Hébert: There certainly have been major changes but the reason I was quoting from this book is to show you where Quebec publishing got its start. In 1960, there was no such thing. Through a kind of miracle, the Quebec publishing industry established itself between 1960 and 1975 and as recently as 1980. All of a sudden this disaster called the GST strikes. It will probably set back by 30 years development efforts of this economically vulnerable but culturally essential industry.

• (1510)

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I should like to ask you whether the book to which you refer talks about the use of public libraries in Quebec. One of the interesting ethnographic features of Quebec readers is their book buying, on the one hand and their very low usage of public libraries on the other hand. If you compare the circulation figures of public libraries across the country, it probably has been explained, and perhaps you intend to explain it later this afternoon, but I think that is extremely interesting and one of the contradictions of the situation.

Perhaps that book may tell us how many of the holdings in the libraries of Quebec are published in Quebec. Is that what you are referring to?

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Hébert: I do not know if I understood your question. You wanted to know, what is the proportion of—

Senator Marsden: No. Perhaps I could explain. I do not expect that anyone keeps that kind of information in their head, but in this very interesting book to which you are giving us some exposure this afternoon, I am asking whether that book deals with this question of public library development and use?

Senator Hébert: No, it does not. Later on, other documents and other research that has been made and that has been collected does talk of this aspect of the problem. I can tell you right now that, in that respect, Quebec is not on top by far. Our libraries are not in great numbers. Our libraries are undeveloped. They are underfinanced. It is a pity. We are not very proud of our library system in Quebec, and that is part of the problem, naturally. However, with books selling for much more than they used to, in certain cases because of the GST, Quebec has changed its mind about adding its own GST on books, but even at that, the price of books will become so high that there will be less and less books bought by public libraries. It is a vicious circle, of course.

Speaking of the change of mind of the Quebec government about books, I think it would be useful to put on the record this information of what happened in the recent days, which I thought was very well put. In today's Globe and Mail, there is an article by Steven Godfrey "Quebec refuses 'to impose ignorance'". That, of course, was the slogan of the campaign that went on for many, many weeks and months in Quebec against the GST on books.

I quote:

> Now, that's the way to lobby for culture!
>
> Book lovers everywhere should be delighted. After a month and a half of impressive campaigning by the press, reading public and the publishing industry, the Quebec government has capitulated.

It is not very often that intelligence wins.

> Finance Minister Gérard E. Lévesque announced that books will be exempt from the 8 per cent provincial sales tax it was intending to impose. That tax was to be added to the forthcoming federal goods and services tax, which would have meant a staggering 15.6 per cent increase in the price of books—the highest in the country.

[Senator Marsden.]

> The announcement was made on Tuesday, just one day before up to 300 members of the Coalition Against Taxes on Books—whose members include Gratien Gélinas, Yves Beauchemin and just about every active writer in the province—were scheduled to take a convoy of buses to Quebec City and drop off at the National Assembly a petition containing the names of 250,000 Quebec residents protesting the provincial tax.

This represents quite a number of people protesting the tax on books, which is the subject of my modest intervention.

> The petition itself was a thing of beauty. You saw samples of it everywhere—

In Montreal and everywhere in Quebec.

> —in restaurants, stores and theatres. It was a large-sized, lined exercise book with commanding white letters on black on the cover saying "Taxer les livres, c'est imposer l'ignorance." (To tax books is to impose ignorance.) The only likely place that it didn't appear was in Montreal libraries, thanks to Mayor Jean Doré. Not only did the mayor refuse to commit himself to any position on book taxes,—

That was very courageous of him—

Senator Marsden: Maybe he does not read.

Senator Hébert: Perhaps he has not read in the paper that this GST is coming out.

> —but his administration resorted to an old law forbidding petitions in municipal office buildings.

Perhaps he would not have liked our reading the petitions here, if he had been here.

> Doré was virtually alone in not opposing the tax.

He was alone. There were a few Conservatives, Dr. David, Senator Chapeau-Rolland, opposing the tax.

> Actually, there was one other man. Albert Juneau, who writes editorials for Le Devoir, ventured to suggest that taxing cultural products wouldn't be as bad as all that.

He had met some Conservatives before he wrote that article.

> Not only was he vigorously debated in print by the newspaper's publisher, Lise Bissonnette, but he received a drubbing by a number of speakers in the National Assembly for his efforts.

Imagine how popular you would be defending the Conservatives' policy. Even Le Devoir, which is not a Liberal newspaper, as everyone knows.

> The newspaper La Presse commissioned a poll, which was headlined "The majority of Montrealers against the GST on books." The newspaper was clearly overwhelmed with its findings—whatever they were. "Nearly one Montrealer out of two would buy fewer books if they were taxed," warned the lead on page one.

That is a brutal fact. If I were I member of the opposite side, I would say that in voting for this GST, I would be responsible for the fact that one Montrealer out of two would buy fewer books. I would not like to be responsible for that.

> The poll found that 92 per cent of Montrealers opposed a tax on books—

Ninety-two per cent. You do not see many polls going that high. That is almost unanimity, considering the few Conservatives did not answer because they did not know what it was all about.

> —a greater opposition than opposed increases in categories such as restaurants, newspapers, shoes, and theatre tickets.

Which means that the man in the street understands that books are not objects like any other object, and that bookstores are not just ordinary businesses; they are cultural centres and they have to be protected if we care at all about our culture.

I do not have that poll in front of me, but I read it when it was published and I was amazed to see that the man in the street, obviously most of those who answered those polls were against GST on restaurants, newspapers, shoes and everything. They were against it. But 92 per cent of them opposed tax on books.

> Quebeckers know that literature is the greatest expression of language, and the survival mechanism for a francophone Quebec. Or as Bruno Roy, president of the Quebec Writers Union, put it "To tax books is to tax the distinct society."

I am not a nationalist, as you know, but I certainly understand that if we want to protect Quebec's culture or any culture for that matter, that culture needs more books.

> Never mind for a moment that Quebec's terrible library system has the lowest per capita investment by a province, except for Newfoundland—

That is in answer to your question, unfortunately,

> —or that 26 per cent of Quebecers are functionally illiterate.

which I mention myself before reading this here.

> The point is that educated Quebec does have a special relationship with its books, and words in general. As an example of how the protection of French itself is considered a source of pride, the newspapers this week have been full of the triumph of 16-year-old Montrealer Pascale Lefrançois, junior champion at the world finals in Paris of the Spelling Championships of the French Language. Let me say that she speaks better French than all the ministers I know of in this government.

• (1530)

Senator Frith: Who?

Senator Hébert: This little girl, Pascale Lefrançois, who was the junior champion at the world finals in Paris of the Spelling Championships of the French Language.

The article goes on to state:

> It is the third junior champion in a row from Quebec.
> So it's little wonder that literate Quebec cited a study—ironically, from the federal Department of Finance—that book sales could fall by more than 25 per cent, and 30 per cent of Quebec's 350 bookstores could close, if the full taxes were imposed.

I think I should repeat that sentence since we have plenty of time. I do so because this is a very serious matter. It is not just that this issue involves numbers. I ask honourable senators to try to imagine what this means for culture. This figure comes from the federal Department of Finance:

> —that book sales could fall by more than 25 per cent, and 30 per cent of Quebec's 350 bookstores could close, if the full taxes were imposed. Since 80 per cent of Quebec's relatively young publishing houses and 75 per cent of its bookstores have revenues of less than $1 million, the effect would have been disastrous.

The disaster is a little bit less since at least one of the two governments listened to people and changed its mind. The article goes on to state:

> With such ammunition against it, it's a miracle the provincial government held out as long as it did.

The real mystery is to see the Conservative Party holding out as long as it has. The government does not care about petitions. I suppose members of the government do not read letters that are sent to them. It is easier for them to say, "To hell with these people. Books are not that important. They are for poets. We are on the side of the rich, the business people. We do not care about these poets and violin players".

The article continues:

> Hervé Foulon, spokesman for the Coalition, and president of the Quebec Association of Publishers, . . .

Honourable senators may remember that Mr. Foulon came to Ottawa a few weeks ago. He has been quoted in this chamber. He held a press conference here on the Hill. He is a publisher himself and president of the Quebec Association of Publishers and represents this coalition. I thought that a few people from the government would have heard what he had to say in the name of all the other publishers, booksellers and authors. On Tuesday he said:

> . . . he was "delighted" with the decision of the provincial government, but that the Coalition was still chartering those buses for Wednesday's rally.
> "Instead of Quebec City, we're now heading for Ottawa to try and convince the Finance Minister to drop the GST on books," he said.

He is very optimistic. He was thinking that the Minister of Finance would listen to him.

Senator Marsden: Senator Hébert, before you go on, I would like to ask you to comment on one other possibility. Even if Quebec has dropped the tax, it is not at all clear that that will work out very equitably between Ottawa and the province of Quebec in terms of taxation. You made very convincing arguments earlier about the importance of books and reading to culture, history and so on. Is it your view that if this tax should be imposed, and if the very difficult copyright law should continue, then what people write will be circulated underground; that we will have as the Russians have had for many years, our own underground press, not for reasons of censorship but for reasons of costs and the unwillingness of people to open bookstores, the unwillingness of public libraries to buy, and the unwillingness of educators to go through the repressive copyright laws? Are we seeing here a contribution to the underground economy and a destruction of civil liberties in a civil society?

Senator Hébert: I have no idea if it will go so far as to encourge the writing of books on walls. One thing that is absolutely certain is that a great number of talented people, whether they be poets, novelists or those who write essays and who have new ideas to share with society, will not be in a position to be voices for change in our society. That is obvious to me. This happens to be a world about which I know something.

I can tell this house that the choice that the publisher has to make between one book and another is very difficult. For example, let us compare the publishing of a cookbook and a novel which brings forward refreshing and new ideas which may change our society. Perhaps a few dollars can be made on the publishing of the cookbook. That will allow the publisher to pay back his loan at the bank. Of course, its publication will not add a great deal to our culture.

At the same time with the situation as it is now the publisher will lose money publishing a novel by a new novelist who brings forward a refreshing new idea to society. The publisher will have trouble with his bank. The publisher will say to himself, "Let's forget it completely, or at least put it aside until next year."

This is what will happen because choices have to be made every day of every year by publishers between something that may be profitable and something that should be published but cannot be because it would be too costly. A publisher would have to publish this novel and print only 1,000 copies instead of 3,000 because of the GST on the printer, the paper and everything like that. Fewer copies will have to be printed because there are fewer bookstores. If there are fewer bookstores, that means that there are fewer places to distribute the book. People will have to finally buy this book at a cost 30 per cent higher than what it should normally be. There is no way a publisher can survive like that. His bank manager will say, "You should get out of this business right away". This will happen, and a great many young, potential authors who are the key to change in a society, to progress—

Senator Frith: Had better keep the daytime job, as they say.

Senator Hébert: Yes, that is right.

● (1540)

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Would you allow me to ask a question?

Senator Hébert: Of course.

Senator Corbin: I would simply like to know whether, in the course of your remarks, you intend to address the effects the GST will have on book sales outside Quebec. I understand that, as a Quebec senator, you are defending the interests of your province, of your people and all that, but I would like to know whether, at some point, you are going to address the effect this tax will have on French-speaking Canadians who do not live in Quebec, who live in areas where they are already short of money and where they are subject to a fairly pronounced anglicization factor in certain provinces.

If you would answer this part of my question, I will see from your answer whether I should ask another.

Senator Hébert: For the moment, I am obviously describing the situation in Quebec. I will talk about the situation in English Canada later, but it is clear that, if the situation in Quebec is this delicate, if the future of the book publishing industry is endangered by this federal tax, it is clear that the presence of the book publishing industry—I hardly dare talk about the publishing industry as a whole. I know a few French-language publishing firms have sprung up outside Quebec. I am sure there are some in Moncton or elsewehre in New Brunswick. There are perhaps other elsewhere as well. One thing is certain, though, and that is that they must be small publishing firms.

As for book stores, I remember when I worked in the industry and travelled in New Brunswick. I believe the senator will recall that I was the president of the publishers when he was premier of his province. A delegation of publishers from Quebec travelled to New Brunswick precisely to try to see how they could collaborate with the government and the Department of Education and also to see what opportunities there were. It must be admitted that the whole effort was somewhat an attempt to expand a minuscule market for French-language books, to go outside Quebec and to tap into the most Francophone province nearest us. You remember, senator; it was fun. But we realized that New Brunswick had 10 times the problems Quebec had. There were few book stores in Quebec, but New Brunswick at the time hardly had any. I remember there was one that was more or less associated with the University of Moncton, but that was the only one in the area, I believe. It was just beginning.

The GST will of course have even more devastating effects on Francophone communities outside Quebec. You don't have the numbers. I proved that we don't have the numbers to support a publishing industry even in Quebec. We don't have the numbers. So you can imagine that it's impossible in Acadia.

Senator Corbin: So if you permit, I am going to ask my second questions. From what I understand, you have a lot of material on how to deal with the situation as it exists in Quebec, but you don't intend to address specifically the problems that the GST will cause for French-language publishing firms outside Quebec. That is what I seem to understand. So, when I speak, I will be addressing this question and elaborating on the effects of the GST.

Could you tell me whether the newsletters of the historical and genealogical societies—there are a lot of them in Quebec—and of the historical societies in New Brunswick, Western Canada and Ontario will be subject to the GST?

Senator Hébert: Of course they'll be subject to the GST. It's going to affect all paper. The government is not sparing books, newspapers, periodicals or magazines. You can be sure that your poor little geographical and genealogical newsletters are going to catch the GST bug like everyone else.

Senator Corbin: One last question for the moment, Senator Hébert. That means that the only French-language daily in New Brunswick will be subject to the GST. I believe you are aware of the saga of the French-language dailies in New Brunswick, as is Senator Simard by the way. You are aware of the trouble and misery we went through to maintain a French-language daily in New Brunswick. If there is an important instrument for the survival of a people, it is this kind of means of communication within that people's own community. This means that the French-language daily in New Brunswick, which is already scratching hard for every last cent, will be put in an even more unfavourable position, if I understand your comments correctly. It will be in an even more unfavourable profit position when the GST goes into effect than it is now. Can you confirm that for me?

Senator Hébert: Unfortunately, I obviously have to confirm that for you, even though I am not happy to do so. I have emphasized the business of defending books against the GST. You should not forget, of course, that the amendment which the Liberals proposed as a last resort included periodicals and newspapers as well as books. Of course, when we talk about newspapers—if you think of the Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, the Sun—it seems to me that we may say that, ultimately, these major newspapers can perhaps afford to pay the GST. The problem is that, when we do that and accept the principle for a few major newspapers whose names come to mind, we forget all the small local and regional newspapeers that are going to suffer and, in certain cases, completely disapperar, thus depriving communities of a newspaper, which, in somewhat isolated communities, in the rural areas, is often a favoured and extremely important means of communication.

As to the problem concerning my colleague, Senator Corbin, for a Francophone community that is even more isolated from the rest of North America than communities are now in Quebec, it is obviously all the more important to have a newspaper that can serve as an instrument or a link among the members of that Acadian Francophone community.

I wouldn't be surprised to see that people actually encounter the difficulties which Senator Simard could recall for us in detail, the difficulties involved in keeping a French-language newspaper operating in a community where the population is relatively small, as in Acadia, or to hear that things were difficult a year ago, just as they were difficult 10 years ago. If the GST is ever passed, the situation is probably going to be impossible; it's going to make the situation impossible. You are right, Senator Corbin, to be concerned for the future of French-language publications outside Quebec. In Quebec, there is still a population base that you don't have. But I don't get the impression that these are considerations that disturb the consciences of the ladies and gentlemen on the other side.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, I told you that my third question was my last, but your comments lead me to ask you another question. I shouldn't say that it is the last; there could be others.

I believe the two of us are saying things that have not yet been said in the course of this debate. It is very important that our colleagues understand this. This tax will threaten the very survival of small French-language publishing firms outside Quebec. It will threaten the newsletters of the historical societies, the weeklies.

In the case of New Brunswick and its only French-language daily, I believe that New Brunswick's French-language daily is the only such publication outside Quebec. Le Droit, which perhaps began in Ottawa, cannot be considered as an Ontario French-language daily. It is aimed mainly at Quebeckers on the other side of the Ottawa River. All its advertising is aimed at a Quebec clientele. Le Droit, which is now part of Conrad Black's empire, can no longer be considered a daily that speaks on behalf of French-Canadians. It will nevertheless be subject to the GST no matter whether you pay weekly for home delivery or subscribe and pay annually. It will be subject to the GST.

The point of all that is that some of our colleagues on the other side are great defenders of the French fact in Canada. You remember that Senator Simard split with his party when he wanted to establish a French-language daily in New Brunswick, the succeshsor of the newspaper, L'Évangéline, a newspaper almost 100 years old. He stood up in the House and said that he would henceforth sit as an independent Conservative member because he did not want his party to suffer from the fact that he was taking semi-leave to found the newspaper. It was not a success, incidently, and I can understand why it was not. That's just to show you how difficult it is for a French-language daily to stay afloat and turn a profit. Senator Simard knows that perfectly well.

If I remember correctly, and this is still by way of a question to you, in the course of the work of one federal commission of inquiry on which Senator Chaput-Rolland sat, that senator travelled with the commission to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta. She made the headlines because she cried over the fate of French-Canadians in the other provinces, in the provinces outside Quebec. You remember that. She wept bitter tears and nevertheless voted reluctantly against her conscience and in favour of the GST on the kind of item I've just mentioned. Can you understand that kind of attitude?

Senator Hébert: My answer is no; I don't understand it. Now, you know very well your colleague Senator Simard, whose praiseworthy efforts to save a French-language newspaper in your province you mentioned a moment ago.

Senator Corbin: It wasn't to save it; it was to found another newspaper because the first newspaper went out of business.

Senator Hébert: And the principle of having a Francophone newspaper in your province. In other words, he knows just how difficult it is. The question you are asking is perhaps how do I explain the fact that he voted against the amendment that would have given a French-language Acadian newspaper a greater chance to start out and survive.

Just before we had this difference of opinion, I was about to finish; I only have one paragraph left, the article in which the coalition's victory over the Quebec government was reported. The coalition of bookstore owners, writers and publishers was able to convince the Government of Quebec to withdraw, or at least suspend for one year, its plans to tax books and to introduce a provincial GST that would be added to the federal government's tax. So I'm going to reread the last paragraph. I was telling you about Hervé Foulon, who is the spokesman for the coalition.

[English]

> Hervé Foulon, spokesman for the Coalition, and president of the Quebec Association of Publishers, said on Tuesday that he was "delighted" with the decision of the provincial government, but that the Coalition was still chartering those buses for Wednesday's rally.
>
> "Instead of Quebec City, we're now heading for Ottawa to try and convince the Finance Minister to drop the GST on books," he said.
>
> If half of the energy and commitment went into this recent lobbying ends up in Ottawa, Michael Wilson doesn't have a chance.

• (1550)

[Translation]

We saw what actually happened when Mr. Wilson and Mr. Masse and all the Conservatives actually met this prominent group on Parliament Hill upon its arrival. I don't need to tell you they were sent back to Quebec empty-handed.

Senator David: Excuse me for interrupting you, although it just shows just how interested we are in your speech. I would like to ask a question to clarify a point. It has always been my impression that a book is ultimately a manufactured good. We know there is a sales tax on manufactured goods. Could you tell us where it was situated before the GST?

Senator Hébert: The publisher could purchase ink without paying the manufacturer's sales tax. He could purchase paper without paying the tax on the good.

Senator David: Without paying the federal tax?

Senator Hébert: Yes, without paying the federal tax. The publisher did not pay the tax. The firm could purchase string to bind the book without paying the tax. It could purchase glue tax-free to glue its covers. I know. I was in the industry for 15 years of my life. There was no tax at any level. Where books were involved, all taxes disappeared.

Senator David: As for machinery to print material—increasingly sophisticated material is required—wasn't there a federal sales tax on all that machinery?

Senator Hébert: Well, I plied the publisher's trade, but not that of the printer. I don't know whether the printer paid the tax. I imagine not since, as publishers, we did not pay tax on ink. I imagine the printer didn't have to pay it either. No, I don't think so. I don't think there was a tax on machinery. I can do a little bit of research and confirm that for you; I can give you an answer on that in the next few days. I would also be interested in knowing that.

Senator David: I simply wanted to know the percentage of the tax that is hidden, that does not currently appear in the sales price of a book. In Quebec, of course, we know there was no sales tax; there was no sales tax on books. So they've returned to their old habits. However, in the process of manufacturing a book, I am almost certain that there was some kind of sales tax. That is ultimately the piece of information I would like to have, if, by some chance, you could provide it.

Senator Hébert: I'll look into the matter, but I can tell you that, from where I stand, I know that, when it came to printing a book, there was no tax on ink, paper and so on. I don't know whether the printer, who doesn't print just books, but also prints calendars, circulars and brochures, which are not books, but, in those cases, he of course has to charge a tax on the goods that leave his print shop. Consequently, it would perhaps be logical for him to pay a tax on presses when he purchases them or on the ink he uses that is not used to print books. There must be some kind of distinction of that kind. In any case, it is an interesting question. I will consider it a duty to enlighten you.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, I have a question to ask you which is a follow-up to Senator David's question. When printers had to pay a manufacturer's tax on presses, they paid it only once. In many cases, they paid no tax at all because the system was not in place when they bought their presses.

I remember very well when I was editor of the weekly, Le Madawaska, in Edmunston, New Brunswick, we printed our paper on the press which L'Évangéline had sold to Le Madawaska, when they sold their business during the 1940s and 1950s. It was a press that dated from the turn of the century. You could also say that no tax had ever been paid on it. There are many small companies that still operate using old presses. In the great scattered Francophone community, not everyone can afford four-colour offset presses. Many are printing on a shoestring budget. Otherwise, they'd simply go out of business.

Perhaps you've had some experience of this kind. Perhaps you know of small publishing firms that have operated on this basis. So Senator David's argument is perhaps valid. When you buy a press, it's for a long time, and you only pay the tax once. It wasn't the manufacturer's tax that meant life or death for those businesses. It wasn't necessarily that.

He spoke of the tax as a hidden tax. I don't think it was a hidden tax. It's on the law books in Canada.

Senator David: Let's remove the word "hidden" and use "non-visible".

Senator Corbin: What is visible and what isn't visible? Senator David, this tax was introduced under a statute of Parliament, a statute that was passed in full view and in full knowledge of everyone and that received Royal Assent. I believe the people who were in business and those who did business with those people were aware the tax was in effect.

Everyone assumes that, in any case, there will always be some form of tax on manufactured goods in one way or another. It's not really that that has altered the debate. What has altered the debate is that the GST has broadened the tax base. It is not neutral, and that's what hurts. Isn't that correct, Senator Hébert? That is my question.

Senator Hébert: Absolutely, Senator Corbin. And, by the way, I definitely knew many of those small printers who had presses that kept working God knows how and who certainly hadn't paid tax on them. But Senator David's question is important, too. We should know whether, in today's state of affairs, printers that print books and other items pay tax, and the exact nature of the problem of tax on machinery. I am sure it is not passed onto the printer's customers who produce books because books are free of all taxes. There are no taxes on books at any level.

So I'm going to begin to read you the excerpts from this work, which is virtually unknown and which has hardly been distributed at all, but which is nevertheless fairly well done. It contains some errors, which I'll point out as they come to mind. But, on the whole, it's well done.

First, it seems to me necessary to point out that Quebec publishing has been studied very little. That is why I wanted to share this document with you. I wanted to share its conclusions because very few studies have been done on books in Quebec. There was the thesis by Jean-Pierre Chalifoux of Éditions Québec. It concerns the period from 1940 to 1950 and is the only monograph on the subject. It's already a little out of date. That was during the war. It was a fairly strange period in publishing because of a fact that suddenly showed us that, if we were not such a small community, concentrated almost solely on the Quebec public, publishing could become an interesting and feasible proposition. During the war, we no longer had any contact with France. Consequently, we no longer had any contact with French publishing.

The societies of French writers established outside France or in England, in London, had reached agreements with a number of Quebec publishers, enabling them to republish important and classic French works, for example, and to republish them often photographically. There was no offset printing at that time. They had to photograph each of the pages of these books, which had gone out of print, but were nevertheless still in demand in Quebec and elsewhere, in North America and South America. There was a market for French books.

There are French-language book stores in Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo, Buenos Aires and Montevideo, and I've even seen some in Bogota. There are a lot of them. All these French-language book stores were no longer able to supply themselves with French books from France. There was nevertheless a market. And that's how publishers from 1940 to 1950 were able to profit from an international market that excluded France, a market that became profitable. In other words, they could publish, let's say, the major works of Jules Romain, books that were fashionable at the time, those of Pasquier and Duhamel, all the books that were in demand in Quebec. They are in demand in the rest of the free world, including North America and South America. The publishers obviously had to deposit copyright royalties in a reserve fund. Some were a little negligent in this regard, and that's why a large number of these publishers that achieved a certain degree of success between 1940 and 1950 suddenly went under. They failed to take precautions with regard to their reserves.

It was only around the mid-1960s that Quebec sociologists set their sights on literature and the arts as subjects for analysis.

> It is our overriding ambition that our study on the point of departure of sociological research should be the point of departure for sociological research in a key sector of Quebec cultural life.

The author writes:

> Working in publishing, I have become aware of how important books are to cultural activity in Quebec, even though books are seen as a mediocre good in our society, invaded as it is by political economy and its rationale.

I have often returned to this point. That is the attitude of the present government. There is no exception. Books are a good like any other. Someone has taken paper, ink, string, canvas and so on and manufactured something. For the people in the government, a book is the same as a carton of cigarettes or a box of cigars or a brick. It is an object. It is a piece of merchandise. Consequently, it must be treated like all other merchandise. It is subject to the seven per cent tax, no matter the consequences.

But we all know, and the governments of civilized countries have always understood that a book is not simply a piece of merchandise. It is a means of communication and culture. It is not a box of cigars. It is not a brick. It is not a dishwasher. It is a means of communication and culture.

> It is also the battlefield and weapon, the author writes, in the struggle of ideas.

I do not need to tell all the people who have been influenced by the Judeo-Christian tradition just how far books such as the Bible and the Koran have helped change the world.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert. I would like to ask you another question. I have in my hands a book entitled, The Constitution of Canada, which I find very interesting. Its author is Gérald A. Beaudoin. He is our colleague, Senator Beaudoin. It is a book that is part of the Blue Collection of the Faculty of Law, Civil Law Section, of the University of Ottawa.

I bought this book because I consider it important. I believe it is an extremely important book, and I say that seriously. I take this volume very seriously. I have already read much of it. I am no expert in constitutional law, but I believe it is my duty to learn about the field.

If I remember correctly, this book cost me—or rather didn't cost me, since I used my research budget to purchase it— it cost me $80, or approximately $80, more or less.

My question is this: Will this book, which will become a major reference work for students of constitutional law, a highly important reference work for constitutional scholars of all kinds, not only in Canada but elsewhere as well, will this book be subject to the GST?

● (1600)

Senator Hébert: Yes, of course, all books will be subject to the GST, the good as well as the bad. By the way, I have just received some information. I see that Senator David is not here. It is a brief answer, but may nevertheless suffice. I hope it will not prevent him from sleeping tonight for worry over the GST. It's about the instruments and machines used in printing. Where machines and instruments are acquired specifically for the production of books, there is no tax. In other words, the machine itself, the printing press is not taxed. The sources I've been given here are Litho Prestige, a Montreal printing firm, and the printers, Québecor. This is preliminary infomation. More detailed information will follow so that Senator David can be at peace on this matter. The author I was quoting, then, writes:

> Ultimately, the function of the book, which is a species of the most general form of printed matter, is to encourage people to take part in the formation of the collective conscience and the cultural model that defines a society.

You don't do that with a box of cigars or a washing machine. You can only do that with a book.

> It follows that the occupation of publisher is not an innocent occupation, a way of earnign one's living like any other.

Here again, a moment ago, I have an example of this terrible choice that a publisher must constantly make between a book that may be mediocre, but that will be profitable, and another that is perhaps an excellent book, which contains highly original ideas, but which will lose money. Obviously, the good publisher is the one who does not always publish books that enable him to meet his loan calls at the bank, but also who is happy to contribute to the development of the society in which he lives. This kind of dilemma does not arise in all occupations. For that reason, the author is right in saying that publishing is not an innocent occupation or a way of earning one's living like any other. It is something that tries one's conscience at all times.

> If one were to summarize the printer's trade in a word, one could say that the printer's function consists in managing the imaginary life of a society.

In other words, by his decisions, the publisher can influence the dreams of the society in which he lives.

[Senator Corbin.]

> The field in which the publisher acts is the field of human thought. His raw material is cultural creation, whose purpose is to feed and transform society's imaginary life.

How then, if we accept the definition of publishing I have just given, can we not exempt books from the GST without wincing, realizing as we do that the disastrous consequences of this measure are well known. They've been assessed by the department of Finance of this government. Consequently, this is not something that has been invented by the Liberals to irritate the government and upset its plans. The government's figures, the department's figures tell us that this tax is going to be catastrophic for books. We know that the book is not a good like other goods.

> In giving form to cultural creation, the publisher ensures that the communication which transforms the work into a medium is effected. Without the decision to publish by the publisher, the "gatekeeper of ideas", as Lewis A. Coser calls him, that creation would not come into existence.

In other words, the most beautiful poem in the world created in a poet's mind will stay there. Only his family and friends will enjoy it unless a publisher understands that it is a beautiful poem and invests in something that requires ink, paper, glue, string and canvas to manufacture an object that will enable this poem to enchant other men and women and, in certain instances, to enchant an entire society and even have political consequences, as in the case of Victor Hugo and so many other poets.

> The interest in the Quebec editorial field as a subject of sociological analysis scarcely needs demonstrating. Publishing (the book industry) is a quantitatively unimportant sector of the Quebec economy, but, qualitatively, is of the utmost importance because books are one of the primary vehicles of Quebec culture, an essential factor in the affirmation of identity, a favoured means of stating and clarifying the specific nature of Quebec's culture.

And that is precisely what harms the publishing industry. It is so unimportant in economic terms in Quebec and in the rest of Canada as well that it is considered not important at all. And so the people of the government say to themselves: What are they talking about? Peanuts, a few million dollars a year. It's not important. Seven per cent on that is not going to change very much. It's not a serious issue.

> Publishing, a reflection of our production in symbolic terms, now appears as both witness of and driving force behind social change.

Of course, when you are an anowed Conservative, you are not very sensitive to the driving force behind social change. You like things not to change too much; you like them to stay the way they are. Perhaps this ultimately explains this kind of contempt that some have for books, a contempt that goes so far as to endanger the security of the book industry simply out of this obstinate desire to apply the seven per cent tax to everyone.

Ah, Senator David, I have just received a message which provides a partial answer to your question. I am told here that, when machines and instruments are purchased specifically for the production of books, there is no tax. I don't know if that partly answers your question. There are no details. It says: When machines, instruments, presses are acquired specifically for the production of books, there is no tax. The source for that is Litho Prestige of Montreal and Imprimerie Québecor of Montreal. I will have more details later, but, for the moment, that's the first reaction that I've had.

> In this document, we are interested in what shapes the identity of Quebec publishing firms. We want to know in what way they express our social environment and how they act on these changes.

> One obvious point underlies our entire theoretical approach: since books (publishing) are a social fact, it is in their relations with the various levels of the social structure that we must undertake the analysis of phenomena which, in both a close and more distant manner, directly concern the Quebec editorial field. The sociological perspective on our subject is based mainly on the work of Robert Escarpit and Pierre Bourdieu.

These are two well-known French intellectuals.

> If we exclude Goldmann, who looked at the work itself and not at its divisions, Robert Escarpit was one of the first in France to determine the conditions for and problems in a sociology of literature. His work, Sociology of Literature, which first appeared in 1958, was translated into half a dozen languages.

So it was very definitely translated into English.

> According to Escarpit, literature appeals to the sociological analyst in two main ways: as "process" and as "structure".

> Literature as "process" is characterized "by a project, a medium and an approach, all three of which are related by language". The project is the work conceived and realized by the writer, the work, which is a dialectic between the constraints of the situation, and the righter's freedom must be dialectically structured in both its expression and content.

So that concerns the project.

> The medium is the book, which constitutes "a sort of rolling press which codes in linear fashion a multidimensional work". The book is "a typereader", a "word spreader".

And, lastly, the third item, and I quote:

> There remains the reader's approach. According to Escarpit, a book exists only as something read. The obvious result is that an infinite number of readings of a single work are possible by one or a number of readers.

> Literature as "structure", which is the second level of the sociological analysis of literature, includes "a production, a market and consumption"; it is precisely at this level that one finds all the material, economic and ideological forms of processing of the literary product. First comes the processing by the producer, which Escarpit generally calls the publisher . . .

That's who produces the object.

> . . . whose editorial function may be summarized by three verbs: select, manufacture, distribute . . .

The most difficult part is obviously to select, and a good editor is not very often wrong. An editor who is never wrong will of course very quickly become a millionaire. So choice is very important, and a good editor is someone who is considered as perhaps having instinct and whose choices are not always bad choices.

Second, the author mentions manufacturing. A work which, today, can be produced in the form of a diskette, but, which, in my time, was in manuscript form, either typed or often handwritten by the author, is a shapeless mass that must be transformed into an object that, as far as possible, must be made beautiful and attractive and meet marketing criteria and compete with thousands of other books in book stores. The publisher must rely on a network of book stores that exist or do not exist or that are half there and possibly on book clubs and libraries. It was admitted a moment ago that Quebec's library network was highly deficient. Library budgets are lamentable.

Consequently, they count for very little in the distribution of books.

To these three operations correspond the three essential services of a publishing firm, the literary committee which obviously receives manuscripts. To give you an idea, my publishing firm, which was not a large international firm, far from it, although perhaps prominent at a very local level, received 1,000 manuscripts each year. We published a little less than 10 per cent of that number. So a literary committee is needed to make this selection. A manufacturing office is also needed, or at least very direct contacts with a printer, and that means page make-up people, artists who design covers and who design pages in the book, people who decide whether the book should have ornamental capitals, bands or tail-pieces. For all those things, it is artists who set to work in the second phase, that is manufacturing.

You also have the marketing department, which includes representatives who are going to sell the books, and especially who are going to sell the ideas because you don't sell objects. The representatives of a publishing firm are going to tell the book store owners that such and such a young writer really has talent or that he is promising and that, consequently, it's not going to sell like a dishwasher, but that it's an idea that will sell.

> It would appear, then, that, as regards production, the literary phenomenon is "the result of a series of selections made through various social, economic and cultural filters from projects which writers have brought to the writing stage".

It is thus a series of selections which the publisher makes: he chooses the author, he chooses the kind of book in which to present the work, he chooses the kind of advertising, that is the language that will be used to make people understand the book's content in a few words.

> Literature as "structure" then includes a market or distribution as such, that is, generally, sales. In capitalist countries, distribution is the most critical part of the life of a book. If a book is poorly distributed for one reason or another, it will not reach its public.

It should be said, of course, that all authors never fail to complain that their books are poorly distributed.

• (1610)

Never in my life have I heard an author say: "My book could not be better distributed. It is sold everywhere". Somehow the author always finds himself in the bookstore that doesn't carry his book. Sometimes he asks without giving his name why they don't carry such and such a book. If I were a bookstore owner, I would answer: "I have just sold the last one, but I have ordered more".

> Escarpit identifies three publishing networks: the institutional network, the school-book and scientific book network. It is a market composed of institutions which work in isolation.

I will not say anything further about this network because I do not know it well. The fact remains that it is relatively easier for people who know about school-book publishing because there is a guaranteed outlet. Obviously, the production costs are higher. There are risks. But the fact is that when a book is approved by the Department of Education, you have an assured outlet. Such an outlet generally lasts several years. So much for the institutional network. There is . . .

> . . . a highbrow network aimed at an articulate public that can be considered as an intellectual elite; it is composed mainly of professionals, intellectuals, students and teachers;

Senators are not mentioned, but one must assume that some of them read, that some of them belong to this intellectual elite.

> This public's needs are catered to mainly through bookstores; a lowbrow network composed mainly of stores which carry books with a big turnover, a production far removed from a specifically popular cultural life.

It is often said that if a third of Québec bookstores closed down, there would still be many stores selling books. Books are sold in department stores, in convenience stores, in smoke-shops. These establishments, which do not belong to people who like books but to businessmen, carry specific kinds of books. Business is business. The businessman will want to sell books with a high turnover, regardless of quality. He will not be interested in a young author, a major poet or an essay that could change the world. No. He wants books which can easily be sold, that is detective novels, cook books, popular psychology books like "How to get rid of shyness in 24 hours" or "How to stop smoking in three days". Those kinds of books sell like hotcakes. Those are the books you will always find in stores that are not bookstores. That is why it's dangerous to say: "There is a bookstore in Verdun which will close down. What a pity." That does not mean that books will not be sold in Verdun. Only that there are kinds of books that will never again be sold in Verdun. Only a bookstore owner who loves books will carry, despite the added cost to his business, books that could stay on the shelf for a very long time, just in case somebody some day comes in his store and asks a book which could change his life.

> Then there is the literary network, the third component of the system. That market is defined by several factors such as intellectual level, education, social and professional status, type of housing, etc. Escarpit identifies two sub-markets: the functional and the literary, each with its own set of motivations. In the functional sub-market, you find mostly people who read to acquire knowledge and culture while truly literary works are those which embody art for art's sake, books that are seen not as a means, but as an end."

Therefore, there are those who read to learn, to know, and there are others who read for the pleasure of reading. For the exaltation that poetry can give them.

> It follows that a "work is literary when it is not a tool (such as a handbook or manual), but an end in itself"; finally, according to Escarpit, "it is the relationship between the author and his public which determines what is literary from what is not".

POINT OF ORDER—DOCUMENT TABLED

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable Senators, I had sent a little note to Senator Hébert asking if he would briefly stop his speech for a moment so that I could rise on a point of order.

This afternoon, just before he left, Senator Doug Everett asked to me to table on his behalf a two page letter addressed to him from the Honourable Michael H. Wilson. Honourable Senators may recall that Sentor Everett either alluded to or quoted from the letter during his speech in the Senate this week. I have tried to find the specific reference myself but I cannot find it; I do not know whether that particular Hansard has yet been printed.

In any event, before he left, Senator Everett asked me if I would be so kind as to table this letter on his behalf, and I should like to do so, of course, if there is agreement.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable Senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Corbin: On behalf of Senator Everett, I thank my colleagues.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I was talking about—

> Escarpit agrees with the vision laid out in "What is literature?" by Jean-Paul Sartre by saying that it consists in "situating literature in society by a dialectic method which involves both literary analysis and social analysis". From a methodological point of view, he sees "a sociology of the book" understood both as a medium of the process > and an instrument of the structure, a psychology of reading and a sociology of the literary work".

And the author goes on to say:

> We cannot, in the course of our research, give the same importance to the two levels of insertion of "the sociological fact in the literary field", i.e. literature as a process, literature as a system; our analysis will concentrate rather on this second level (mainly production). Since we accept the rationale behind the three research levels suggested by Escarpit, that is to say "a sociology of the book", "a psychology of reading", "a sociology of the literary work", we propose to concentrate on the first.

Therefore, a sociology of the book.

Senator David: Could you please repeat the name of the author?

Senator Hébert: Robert Escarpit.

Senator David: Is he a researcher?

Senator Hébert: He is well-known French author. I am sure that if I had pronounced his name correctly, you would have remembered him. His name is Robert Escarpit. I pronounced the "t" at the end of his name, but maybe I am wrong.

Senator David: I had understood Escarpette.

Senator Hébert: Now frankly! In that case, I apologize. In Québec, we tend to pronounce the "t" at the end of words. That is how a family name like Morrisset or Pouliot becomes Morrissette or Pouliotte. That is how poor Escarpit became Escarpite in my mouth. I apologize to him and to all future generations.

Senator Corbin: How do you spell his name?

Senator Hébert: E-S-C-A-R-P-I-T.

Senator Tremblay: Is that pronounced like "acabit".

Senator Hébert: No, it is not pronounced like "acabit".

We mentioned at the outset that our sociological survey of the publishing sector in Québec stems also from the works by Pierre Bourdieu, among others, those dealing with the fields of symbolic production. In the notion of "field" (whose function is purely heuristic), Pierre Bourdieu includes the various epistemological levels (process and structure) which are involved in literary activity according to Escarpit's vision. Like Escarpit, Bourdieu fits the book and the author in a system of objective relationships.

It follows that the value of the book, according to P. Bourdieu, is ensured not only by the writer, but also by the editor, the "cultural banker"...

So says Escarpit... I used to call myself a caretaker of talent. "Cultural banker" is better.

—who, by publishing it, "vouchsafes" the product by proclaiming the value of the writer; the critics talk about the "products" with more or less respect; the readers contribute to the value of the work by materially appropriating it (according to Escarpit, books exist only insofar as they are read);

I think it was Louis Jouvet who was asked, "How can you tell whether the play is good or bad?" He answered, "If the room is full, it is a good play. If the room is empty, it is bad." Similarly, a book only exists if it is read.

... Finally, there are also economic systems involving distribution which may give the advantage to one category of books over another.

However, because of the rather high level of autonomy of the production area of symbolic or intellectual property, a sociological analysis cannot be limited solely to the operating logic of this intellectual field; consideration must also be given to literature's place in society—specifically, we have to identify the various factors that foster or limit distribution (expansion): these factors (such as increased schooling and the appearance of new professions) correspond to changes in the social structure.

If, for example, the number of functionally illiterate people in Quebec decreased by 27 per cent to, for example, 10 per cent as it is in Sri Lanka, then there would be an increase in the number of books published because there would be a larger number of readers. The rate of illiteracy in Sri Lanka is only 10 per cent. It is a poor, underdeveloped country which is currently grappling with political woes, and yet only 10 per cent of the people there cannot read.

> However, developments in publishing do not relate solely to the various social characteristics of the readership (or the authors), they also reflect the wider social context of language, geography, demography and so forth. The particular features of the literary phenomenon are only meaningful if they are viewed in connection with the national context and history that distinguishes this little French-speaking community in Anglo-Saxon North America. Literature is therefore not only a "status symbol", but it is also the issue and the expression of social and national conflicts.

> Our research methodology is three-tiered: firstly, the highlights in the evolution of the Quebec publishing industry between 1960 and 1977 will be reviewed. Particular emphasis will be placed on the material, economic and political conditions faced by the literary phenomenon as an economic entity (that is, the book as an object).

It does no good to repeat a thousand times that a book is not an object like the others, it remains an object.

> In the second stage we will describe the development of production per se, that is, production categories, and features of Quebec's social structure that shaped production. Finally, publishing houses will be described within the framework of Quebec's publishing industry and the image of publishers defined in relation to the structure of the field and their publishing strategy. The results of the questionnaire that we sent out in the spring of 1978 to 23 publishers will show the real areas of interest among Quebec publishers—that is, what distinguishes their companies, how their practices are represented and also the relationship between publishers' practices and the awakening of the Quebecois identity.

Of course, you may not feel that these considerations are germane to the subject before us today, but by raising the issue and trying to explain why the GST on books is more serious than the GST on any other item, it appears to me that we are moving forward in the debate. We must make people understand that we are asking for something special and that taxing books means imposing ignorance, as the Quebec coalition against that tax says.

[Senator Hébert.]

Senator David: It's a little bit exaggerated, just the same!

Senator Hébert: You think it is exaggerating to say that to tax books is to impose ignorance?

Senator David: Yes, a little.

Senator Hébert: I hope that members of the Coalition didn't hear you. I hope there are not many of them in the gallery because they wouldn't be very pleased to hear you say that, sir.

If we took away books from your life, I think your life would have been very different from what it is today. If books had been any more expensive, I do not know whether you would always have been able to buy them or at least to buy as many. Sometimes, one book more or less could make a world of difference in a man's life and career.

I think that you, as we all do in these moments, had a very quick retort, which we regret immediately afterward. I do not think it is exaggerated in the least to say that to tax books is to impose ignorance. It is a question of degree. This slogan was published on the front page of the Globe and Mail's arts and entertainment section. I do not know whether you were here when I read it earlier. It is not a slogan which seems to frighten the people at the Globe and Mail.

I do not know whether you were here but it says here, he was speaking of the petition which was signed in the big black cover and which was found throughout Montreal.

• (1630)

[English]

> The petition itself was a thing of beauty. You saw samples of it everywhere, in restaurants, stores and theatres. It was a large-sized, lined exercise book with commanding white letters on black on the cover saying "Taxer les livres, c'est imposer l'ignorance." (To tax books is to impose ignorance.)

[Translation]

Taxing books is imposing ignorance. In any event, he doesn't seem to think that's an exaggeration. On the contrary, he found it to be a saying that summed up the situation very well.

> The book problem (in Quebec) is the result of a system which itself is part of the concept of society and of a development strategy: the political, economic and social life of a country and the life of a book are closely related.

Clearly, if you agree that books should be taxed, then you are agreeing with what I've just said, namely that it is going to have a direct impact on the political, economic and social life of the country.

Senator David: What I'm saying is that it's a play on words in French. "Imposer" can mean either "impôt" or "forcer". As a slogan, I find it somewhat of an exaggeration, that's all.

Senator Hébert: In any case, one thing we can say about their slogan and their initiative is that it succeeded in getting the Quebec government to back down. It couldn't have been that bad after all.

In the first part . . . of this book that we are quoting extensively from

> —we will show how, during the period from 1960 to 1976, the global development of Quebec society was dominated by the requirements of economic development. By looking at the cultural policy of the Quebec state so as to draw a clearer picture of the government's policy on books, we can indeed see that cultural development did not rank as high on the State's list of priorities as economic development.

> That is curious, nevertheless. I have to admit I am flabbergasted by the present Conservative government's lack of sensitivity toward books and culture in general. But I have to say that it is not alone in reacting this way to books. I am speaking here about provincial governments.

Clearly, this was never a priority. I remember the early days of the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs. I think maybe Senator Tremblay remembers them as well, perhaps better than I. He was closer to those governments. I vividly recall the creation of the Cultural Affairs Department by the Lesage government. It was given a paltry budget and had limited jurisdiction. It reminds me of something De Gaulle once said about the United Nations. I don't know whether it was in fact ever called that, but the Cultural Affairs Department was La Palme's "machin". It's just one of a number of signs that governments are more sensitive to economic development and to the political repercussions of their actions than they are to the cultural dimension of their initiatives. It's a tragedy at the provincial level and at the municipal level.

A while ago, I quoted from an article in which Mayor Doré of Montreal had performed the astonishing feat of not speaking on the issue of GST and books and of applying a regulation preventing libraries across the city from simply allowing visitors to sign a petition.

One notices that governments as a rule, and Conservative governments in particular, are not very sensitive to cultural values.

Senator Corbin: You say that some governments are more sensitive to cultural vaues. How do you explain the Quebec government's decision not to charge provincial sales tax on books?

Senator Hébert: I must say I'm astonished. I think they got scared. Politicans generally don't like to see buses descending on Quebec City carrying 300 writers, authors, publishers and so forth. This is perhaps truer in Quebec than elsewhere.

We musn't forget that Minister Lévesque had stated in no uncertain terms—I saw it for myself on television—to a convention of young provincial Liberals in Quebec, that he would not back down on the issue of books, that is was not possible, that it was a complete exaggeration, because the young Liberals clearly wanted their provincial government to exempt books from the provincial GST at all times and to exert pressure on the federal government. I saw the minister on television. He very clearly stated that it was absolutely impossible. What he seemed to be saying was : children, mind your own business and let us run the province. When I say it's impossible, I mean it's impossible because the cash registers have been manufactured in such a way and books have to be included along with everything else.

One interesting thing is worth noting, however. I was rather proud of the reaction of these young Liberals. That isn't always the case because I often disagree with their actions, (particularly when they get excited about ambient nationalism). However, this time, they told their minister that they were not a society of tape recording machines. Culture and books are far more important considerations and a solution has to be found. They fought him and in effect, they humiliated him. If I had been Minister Lévesque, I would not have been very happy to suffer this kind of blatant humiliation.

Thus, the provincial government realized that its own youth was criticizing it on this score. Pressure was being felt from within. As is often the case with dynamic parties - I don't know if it's true for the Conservatives, you'll have to ask them -young Liberals can put a considerable amount of pressure on governments.

There was also the well-structured coalition of which I spoke at length earlier. After repeatedly saying no, Minister Lévesque finally said: perhaps it's not so complicated after all, perhaps we could arrange it. We will charge the tax, and then automatically deduct it. There's no mystery there. What was missing was the political will to exempt books.

That's exactly what's missing with the present government, the will to exempt books. It's merely being obstinate. It's perfectly possible to exempt books. Except it is being obstinate and where their GST is concerned, it wants all or nothing. It's like Meech Lake, a seamless webb, as Senator Murray so eloquently puts it. We can't change anything, we can't move a comma, we can't make any amendments. Books have to be placed on the same footing as cigars, washing machines, bricks and all the rest.

Senator David: I hope you're not comparing Meech Lake to washing machines.

Senator Hébert: Not at all. That's not what I said. I said that in the case of Meech Lake, it was the expression "seamless web" that has remained as a symbol of the government's intransigence. Perhaps if it had said: maybe we can work something out, than Meech Lake would have passed. I don't know.

Senator Corbin: Sir, you say you are quoting Senator Murray. Perhaps he was the one who used the expression "seamless webb".

Senator Hébert: It was either Mr. Mulroney or Mr. Murray. I don't recall which.

Senator Corbin: Although I'm bilingual, I'm not familiar with the expression "seamless webb".

Senator Hébert: It's the equivalent of a "tuniqe sans couture".

Senator Corbin: I see. I thought it was something like a "spider's webb".

Senator Hébert: No, a "tunique sans couture".

Senator Corbin: If it were a "spider's webb", we could always change the spider.

Senator Hébert: It's simply an expression that reflected the arrogance of a government that thought it could resolve complex constitutional questions by saying that it's all or nothing and we can't change anything. Let's not harp on that subject. It's too painful.

Let us go back to the GST which puts us in a difficult situation, especially with regard to books.

There are four telltale signs of this situation.

I do not have the time to read this right away. These are the blues I received. Do you want me to read them?

In a nutshell, the book policy did not take into account the cultural aspect. There are four telltale signs of this situation.

The book distribution systems which were almost entirely controlled by foreigners.

At the time when the book was written, most books were distributed by foreigners or by people other than distributors. Books were distributed by newspaper distributors. People who are used to throwing a bunch of newspapers at the doorstep of convenience stores before they open in the morning and whose owners would later find these papers under a foot of snow are not exactly qualified to distribute books. We had to choose between them and foreigners.

The underdevelopment of public libraries;

We talked earlier in response to a question by Senator Marsden about the underdevelopment of public libraries in Quebec. It is a shame. But it is a fact that publishers must face.

The Canada Council (established in 1957) supported Quebec publishing with all kinds of programs.

The Council gave subsidies to publishers to enable them to publish certain books without incurring major losses. This allowed a great number of books to be published. I think all publishers are grateful to the Canada Council for what it did.

It is strange however that a government that tries to assist through the Canada Council the pubication of books that would never have seen the light of day otherwise—of course it was under a different administration—wants to impose a undiscriminating tax that will destroy everything that the Canada Council and the Department of Cultural Affairs had tried so hard to build through their contributions.

● (1640)

[English]

That is what I find completely absurd.

He concludes:

—the budgets below the poverty level that have always been allocated to the Department of Cultural Affairs.

As I was saying earlier—and this may not be the right place to discuss it—simply shows that culture is not important for governments because they do not bring in enough votes.

We will explain the social and political meaning of the government's cultural interventions and discover the interests served by these interventions in the book industry.

Without a government policy—

And we are talking about the provincial government.

—on books, this tends to support the theory that a dominated and dependent state which controls only a small part of its sovereignty cannot fully promote its cultural creativity.

As Senator David was saying earlier, the author goes a little too far. I do not think Quebec is dominated and dependent to that extent. One thing is for certain, a tax on books is a kind of violation of its sovereignty it could do without. I am talking here about cultural and not political sovereignty.

In this context, "culture" means not only literary and artistic works but also, as Marcel Rioux explains, individual and collective behaviour at both the economic (the goods and services production process) and the political level (the organization of power). It finds its expression in daily and intellectual life. Cultural policy could be summed up as follows: The concrete improvement of the living environment by including cultural development within overall development.

Statistics on the publication and selling of books in the early 1960s are almost impossible to find.

This information is impossible to find because there was practically no publishing and only about 23 book stores in all of Quebec in 1960.

The report of the Commission on the book trade in Quebec often named after its chairman, Mr. Maurice Bouchard, is the only study we have. Under order 555 dated April 3, 1966, the Commission was created to investigate on all aspects of the production, sale and distribution of books in Quebec.

This investigation had been requested by the Conseil Supérieur du livre representing authors, publishers and booksellers associations, in a brief to the Department of Cultural Affairs.

According to the Conseil this crisis was affecting the whole book industry in Quebec, especially bookstores many of which were in danger of disappearing.

We are now in 1963. The Canada Council helped with publishing. The Department of Cultural Affairs took certain measures even though it was not enough. In spite of all this the book industry realizes that it is not enough and that a great number of Quebec bookstores and publishers are about to disappear.

The Bouchard report reveals the anarchy and instability which paralyzed the book trade in Quebec in the early 1960s.

But it did not start during the 1960s. Before pointing out the problems and the solutions recommended in the Bouchard report, let us have a brief look at the book industry before 1960.

The year 1960 was only yesterday.

Senator Corbin: It was the year that Louis Robichaud came to power in New Brunswick. On June 25, 1960, he was elected Premier of New Brunswick.

Senator Robichaud: June 27, 1960.

Senator Hébert: Thank you for setting the record straight. Future historians will not make a mistake on this important date in the history of New Brunswick.

The study by Jean-Pierre Chalifoux on publishing in Quebec from 1940 to 1950 showed that it was during the last world conflict that the Quebec book industry organized itself on a commercial basis. According to him, before 1940, publishing books in Quebec was a big risk and few people were interested. Production was very low and book sales were not much better. Only a few things such as textbooks and religious books were imported from France.

In other words, before 1940 there was nothing.

The Second World War suddenly cut off supply for French-Canadian bookstores.

The few that existed at that time. If there were 23 in 1960, I imagine there were about 10 real bookstores in Quebec in 1940. But all of a sudden their source of supply dried up. I said something about this earlier. Because of the war France stopped supplying us with books.

Quebec was culturally isolated.

There was no other source of French books because Belgium could not send us books anymore than France could.

In 1940 the Canadian Prime Minister (William Lyon MacKenzie King) gave French Canadian publishers a licence to print French books.

This was negotiated with representatives of French publishers who were more or less qualified—there ws a war on after all. As a kind of war measure, the Prime Minister told them, "Print French books, forget about copyrights and after the war we will settle this with other countries to ensure that publishers pay for these rights.

Federal intervention, the war, the collapse of French publishing, the opening of foreign markets—

I talked earlier about the bookstores that were unable to get books from France. The same could be said about the many bookstores that existed at that time. French was still the most popular second language in Latin America, a lot more so than English. It is now the opposite. English predominates. Before the Second World War, French was the second language of the elite in Rio de Janiero, in Sao Paulo, in Buenos Aires, in Bogota, in Caracas, in Lima. The French culture was flourishing in those countries. They, like French-speaking Quebecers, had a rude shock when all of a sudden, because of the war, French publishers were unable to distribute their books throughout the world.

This federal intervention, the war, the collapse of French publishing are the external circumstances that made possible the spectacular development of Quebec publishing.

All of a sudden, there was a sort of explosion, which no doubt would not have happened without those disastrous events.

During the war, Montreal became a big publishing centre. It happened all at once, overnight. We had no experience. We had no professional publishers, but all of a sudden people like Bernard Valiquette, who became a major publisher overnight and welcomed such visiting great writers as St-Exupéry and Jules Romain . . . They gave big receptions at the Ritz. I remember that. I was still far from that crowd.

On the whole, the book industry experienced great prosperity.

Of course, it was even easier because publishers did not pay copyright. They took, say, columns by Pasquier or Georges Duhamel, photocopied them, printed them and copyright would be paid after the war. It was relatively easier. Then they could sell to South America or to the big Bren Palace bookstore in New York. Publishing activities slowed down in 1947. Once the war was over, France resumed its place in publishing. France, Europe and America no longer wanted our books.

Of course that means that we could no longer sell back to France the French books we printed here. The Quebec books written by our authors and that we finally sold in South America and all over were not, it must be admitted, of the same quality as the greatest French books. Therefore France could offer its great writers to the rest of the world and the small markets that we managed with some difficulty to open during the war closed again to us.

Production in 1949 returned to pre-war levels.

That means the phenomenon was completely due to the war. Once the war was over, it stabilized and France resumed its publishing activity. All those Quebec publishers went bankrupt—it is a sad story. They disappeared or they went back to the very low level of their small pre-war business.

During the years that followed the end of the war—

That is, after 1947, more or less:

—people talk of a "dark period" for publishing. The publishers' society reports it thus: Our society was founded in 1943. It then had 27 active members, of whom only four stayed in the struggle—

You see, in 1943, 27 publishers were active members of the Association. Right after the war, four were left.

—six declared bankruptcy, three transferred their business and all the rest gave up for lack of activity or a field to operate.

You see how this industry was in its infancy. It thrived briefly during the war and right after, in 1947, it fell back to nothing, to what it was before the war.

• (1650)

The situation of bookselling reflects that of publishing.

Of course it depends on publishing.

With the decline of publishing, bookselling was also headed for a crisis.

The publishers who resisted the epidemic of bankruptcies after the war are those whose profitability depended on the demand for books from educational institutions and libraries.

The Francophones among us will remember their names. Those that survived made school textbooks, so they did not lose everything when it dried up. Beauchemin, Fides and Granger are the three names that managed to survive the disaster of 1947. Of course, they sold school books. These three large firms, perhaps not Fides, but in any case Beauchemin and Granger, had been in business in Quebec since the end of the last century or the very early 1900s.

Fides began to develop the educational market systematically only in the early 1950s.

Fides began differently, at a time when Quebec was a "priest-ridden country" as Anglophones called it. The clergy dominated. Of course Fides was a religious publisher. Therefore the company prospered at that time. Only in the 1950s did it add school books to its activities, which helped it survive when all other publishing companies, starting in 1947, were going bankrupt or closing down.

Senator Corbin: Would you allow me a question, Senator Hébert? Did you ever wonder how come, despite the eight amendments presented by the senators on this side of the House and the two presented by the two independent senators, our colleagues senators Waters and Lawson, there has been no movement on the other side? Our efforts to improve this bill and to make it fairer and more equitable have been systematically blocked.

I might be able to shed some light on it for you. I would like to have your comments. In the Debates of the House of Commons of November 29, 1990, the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Herb Gray, asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said today that he and his government are ardent defenders of the United Nations. That seems strange to me, given that a few days ago, the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that they were prepared to take unilateral offensive action against Iraq, with or without the UN's approval. Those are not the words of someone who has full confidence in the United Nations.

I particularly draw your attention to the following statement made in French by the Honourable Herb Gray, Leader of the

> Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Conservative senator and constitutional expert Gérald Beaudoin . . .

Where did he go? He was here a moment ago. I do not like to talk about people behind their backs. He has disappeared, but anyway, I will continue reading the quotation:

> Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Conservative senator and constitutional expert, Gérald Beaudoin, said that the government would not have to call Parliament if it decided to come out in favour of armed intervention against Iraq. Mr. Speaker, this statement contradicts a government resolution passed by this House on October 23.
> So I ask the Prime Minister: Will he repudiate today the statements by Senator Beaudoin and will he affirm today that he intends to respect his commitment to call Parliament before Canadian troops are dragged into a military offensive in the Persian Gulf?

You will see right away that this has nothing specifically to do with the GST, but the Prime Minister's answer might say a lot about the government's attitude to the Senate, to senators and probably to the efforts of our colleagues opposite to talk sense to the government about the GST. Here is what the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, the Prime Minister, answered Herb Gray:

> Mr. Speaker, I have not read the senator's statement but my hon. friend would not want me to start commenting on all the statements coming from the Senate, because we would be here for a long time.

Do you not have the feeling with that kind of answer that even if our colleagues across the way tried to talk sense to the government, the Prime Minister would not be interested in hearing them in any case, given the answer he gave the Honourable Herb Gray about the Persian Gulf crisis. I would like to have your comment on this.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, Senator Corbin is quite right and even if I may have rather harsh words at times for my colleagues opposite, I am convinced that some of them have made noble efforts to try to convince the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance that some Liberal amendments—and maybe even before we made our amendments, I am convinced that some Conservative senators pleaded the case for books. I do not know at what level, perhaps at meetings . . .

Senator Corbin: Who would have pleaded that case?

Senator Hébert: I am thinking of Mrs. Chaput-Rolland, Senator David, Senator Tremblay.

Senator Corbin: Perhaps Senator Beaudoin himself.

Senator Hébert: Perhaps Senator Beaudoin himself. He is an academic, the author of at least one book, maybe more. I also think of Mrs. Lavoie-Roux, who is quite close to Quebec's cultural community. So there are a fair number of them. Among the others you have John Lynch-Staunton, who was active in Montreal municipal politics.

Those are people who are no doubt sensitive to these problems and must have made an honest effort. I only hope that they realized that even an honest effort does not go far with people who have a sort of arrogant attitude towards their bill. They always submit them to us with a warning in advance that not the slightest amendment is acceptable or possible.

Therefore there is no use trying. We saw that with C-21. We saw it with the regressive and anti-social—I would even say inhuman—refugee bills. We saw how far they went, although some senators tried. I think of Senator Spivak and other members of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. They gave us the impression that they agreed with us.

It was only at the last moment, when the time to vote came, that these ladies and gentlemen gave in. They changed. They had been with us, who were defending certain points of view. I do not remember the details. They were there to defend the dignity of refugees. They opposed new restrictive measures that would make Canada almost like other selfish capitalist countries that closed their doors very, very brutally against the flood of refugees from all over the world.

Canada has always had a very different reputation in this area. It had a reputation for being welcoming, compassionate and humane. We felt that several Conservative senators shared that point of view. When the time came to vote, it is quite certain that they had received very clear orders.

In a caucus meeting like the one I described this morning, Senator Murray must have told them: "No weakness, ladies and gentlemen. Go ahead. We want our bill as is. Accepting amendments is weakness—no way. Maybe we can make vague promises to reassure people."

For example, apparently Mrs. Solange Chaput-Rolland was reassured by I know not what promise from the Prime Minister. In any case, she said that she was reassured herself. I am sure that other senators among our colleagues, perhaps Senator Spivak when we were fighting for refugees or I do not know which senator on Bill C-21 would have been or even was sensitive to the same arguments that made us sensitive to some amendments that would not have changed the spirit of the bill but would still have improved it a little and, in the case of the refugee bill, made it a little less inhumane.

Only they had their little lesson in caucus. Senator Murray told them: No weakness, no discussion. Those bills, like all the others from the government, are a "seamless web". It is all or nothing, no concessions. That is how I see it.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Hébert a question. Having followed you attentively all afternoon since you started speaking, I see that you steadily defended the interests of Quebec publishers.

Senator Hébert: Not quite. It is not the publishers. What I was defending was more than the publishers. It was books.

Senator Corbin: It was what, exactly?

Senator Hébert: It was books as a means of communication and expression of thought. I'm not fighting to defend the publishers' guild.

Senator Corbin: I beg your pardon, I phrased my question badly. You were defending books in French, weren't you?

Senator Hébert: I would say books generally, but in this particular case I used Quebec as my example.

Senator Corbin: You were speaking primarily of books published in French?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Corbin: I would like to know, as someone who doesn't live in Quebec, are there English-language publishing houses there, or that publish in other languages than French? Quebec has a sizable non-francophone population. Do they have their own publishers and printers? Would they be hit harder by the tax than francophones? Can you give us the facts?

Senator Hébert: I'll be getting to that a little later in my presentation. I don't know how many hours later, but we'll get there. At that point I'll focus more particularly on English-language publishing—it's centred chiefly in Toronto, but increasingly we're seeing publishers locating in other cities and expanding quite considerably. There's Hurtig, in Edmonton, for instance. There are others as well, in Halifax, Vancouver and everywhere in between. I'll be getting to that later.

First of all, in concentrating on the French-language books published in Quebec I can give you a more detailed picture because it's an area I happen to have had some experience of in my past life. So I can speak of it with some assurance. Except that I do know that the situation isn't quite the same in English-language publishing. It's slightly better. Why? because their market within Canada is slightly larger than ours. In reality there are enough anglophones—and when I use the word "anglophone" I don't mean Anglo-Saxons, I mean people who normally read their books in English—there are enough of them in English Canada to justify the existence of publishers. Normally they ought to be able to make a profit, according to the United Nations' standards, which say you need at least 10 million inhabitants speaking the same language to justify publishing houses, in economic terms.

What makes the problem worse for English-Canadian publishers is precisely the fact that they're publishing books in English, which is a universal language. So is French, but to a lesser degree. So with the number of English-Canadians that there are, their publishers could get along fine if they spoke a language all their own. Take Findland, for example, which has a successful publishing industry. Why? because they have a language that's not English, that's not French.

• (1700)

This means that their authors are writing in a language that is unique in the world. Finnish doesn't resemble any other language, and that's wonderful for the publishers because all Finnish authors have a captive market of people who only speak Finnish. Even if they want to read some masterpiece from one of the universal languages, as it might be Victor Hugo, unfortunately!—as Gide remarked. (You know they said to Gide, "Who is the greatest French poet?, and he said, "Victor Hugo, unfortunately.") Anyway, that foreign masterpiece would have to be translated into finnish if the Finns wanted access to it. They don't have direct access.

The same is true of Shakespeare, or the great American authors. So the problem facing the English Canadians is rather like our problem in Quebec. There are more of them, admittedly. But on the other hand their public has access to an inexhaustible source of books: the United States, which is just across the way. Obviously it follows that the American influence that has been so strong among Quebec's francophones must be even stronger, I assume, among the anglophones who have direct access to their television and who in the end experience the influence of the American culture even more than francophones do. Although we're affected by it more than we admit. We're much more American than we are French, there's not the least doubt about that.

But the anglophones do share a language with the Americans. Which means that the publishers in Toronto and elsewhere in English Canada have to face the problem [of American competition]. They may have a relatively larger market of readers than francophone publishers do, but those readers are inundated by American book marketing. The number of French Canadians who belong to the Book of the Month Club, for English-language books, is frightening. I don't have the figures in my head, but a really frightening number of French Canadians living in Quebec are members of the Book of the Month Club. They get these fat parcels every month from the United States.

I would venture to think that the percentage must be even higher among English Canadians. This means that competition from American books, and especially American paperbacks, is everywhere: in drugstores, in corner stores, in stations and airports and everywhere. Obviously that remains of the English-language market for our English-language publishers is necessarily limtied. To books produced in the United States you have to add books produced in Great Britain, which is also very considerable. And because of ancient ties between the Anglo-Saxons in Canada and England, I imagine that like us and France there is still a powerful enought communication that they like reading British books.

So the situation of English-language publishers in Canada isn't that much rosier than that of French-language publishers centred primarily in Quebec. I'll talk about that later. I'll give you the figures at that point. For the moment, I think I'm answering your question.

There was a curious phenomenon in Quebec during the last war, a sort of explosion in publishing, completely artificial, because, oddly enough, Mackenzie King authorized Quebec's publishers to reprint French books that were no longer available on the international market. Quebec started selling books everywhere in the world, except of course Europe, where the war was raging.

There was the Bouchard Report, which was the first report of books in Quebec, in the 1950s. According to the Bouchard Report, the four big publishing houses shaped and dominated the whole trend of book-selling in the post-war years.

I told you there were four publishing houses that survived. Four! It's not a joke! They survived the slaughter starting in 1947. How did they survive? Because their specialty for 40 or 50 years was the text book. In the case of Fides it was the religious book, the four Gospels in one and that kind of thing. So there were only four publishers left.

> And they set the tone, so that book selling was oriented toward the demand from educational establishments.

It was only to be expected, there weren't any book stores, there was practically no market. So to survive they had to concentrate their efforts on publishing text books and in some cases children's books, or books that could be given to pupils who were learning to read. That's why the Bouchard Commission said:

> We can say without fear of error that most of the decisions relating to book selling—supply policies, importing, wholesale distribution, discounts, retail sales prices—have increasingly been made based on the institutional market, with of course a whole series of more or less disastrous consequences for the development of the general public market, which is the lifeblood of book stores.

This was by-the-way, before getting back to our English-language publishers. I hope to find all this information in my documents further down the road. Another striking phenomenon among English-language publishers in the years when I had connections with them was that there were a large number of foreign houses that dominated the sector.

I remember there was MacMillan, for example, which was a London publisher. I recall Harold MacMillan, the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, who after his defeat went on working in publishing. I remember meeting him. I didn't meet as many people as Senator Chaput-Rolland, naturally. I met him with other publishers, which reminded me how normal it was for English-language publishers in Toronto in those days to be more or less dominated by either British or American publishing houses. It was more obvious in their case than in ours.

It was such a natural state of affairs that Harold MacMillan, who was a big name because he had been Prime Minister, was invited, and why? Because he was president of MacMillan, which was an important publishing house in Great Britain, and was also an important firm in Canada. The characteristic of those foreign publishers, which is normal with a business of that type, the really big ones, sometimes multinationals, was that they used Canada as an outlet for their writers' work. From time to time, as if to justify their position, they would publish a Canadian writer. From time to time. It wasn't their main function. Their main function was basically to be distributers in Canada of books put out by the mother house, whether that was in London, or New York, or somewhere else in the United States.

That was one of the issues, among others, that exercised English-Canadian publishers. It was also a contributing factor to the special charm and prestige of Jack McClelland of McClelland and Stewart, which was the big Canadian publisher specializing in Canadian works.

God knows the people who kept a close watch on poor Jack's financial problems and vicissitudes—he was a great publisher, but he too had to face terrifying competition from American and British books. He had to cope with a relatively small market. And despite that he managed to build a publishing house that is still working effectively within English Canada.

So let's get back to Quebec. The data on which the table cited earlier was based were gathere by the Commission of inquiry, which approached 106 businesses that sold books. These weren't necesasrily book stores as we understand the expression. They were 106 places where books could be bought. Of that total there were perhaps twenty that resembled book stores. The rest were stationery stores where they sold notebooks, pencils and so on, and where there was a shelf of books at the back of the shop. So a study was carried out on these businesses.

> It appears that the volume of business done by book stores in Quebec — and when they say "book store", once again it's in the broad sense of the word—> in 1962 totalled $18 million, or closer to $19 million. Of this total, $5,200,000 must be subtracted as dealing at the wholesale level. The volume of retail sales reached $13 million, but by adding to that amount retail sales at outlets other than book stores we reach a total sales figure of $15 million worth of books.

You can imagine what a tiny industry we're talking about — even in those years, $15 million as the total volume of business for the whole sector, every book store! What did it mean for each one? Crumbs.

This table enables us to make the following observations: 70 per cent of total consumer sales are made to educational establishments. There are services emerging in the Quebec provincial budget.

This means that there weren't individual buyers, people who felt the need of a book and went into a book store and bought it. That's not what they were talking about in that $15 million. They were talking about sales to educational institutions. In other words, a book store might manage to seel 50 copies of a math text. That was a big sale. It wasn't an individual who was doing the buying, it was a school board or some government service.

Just 30 per cent of sales were to individual consumers.

The sale of text books accounts for half of all retail sales, 50 per cent.

Of this meagre volume, half consisted of match texts, catechisms or other school books.

Four per cent of sales are religious books—

That would be bibles and the lives of saints, I presume—and 16 per cent are books for young people. Only 30 per cent are cultural works.

These figures enable the Commission of Inquiry—

That's the old Commission we were discussing earlier, but for my part it was the first time I saw those figures—enabled the Commission of Inquiry to conclude that the market that belongs specifically to book stores, that of the individual consumer,—

That of the buyer who walks into a book store—who is in a sense the raison d'être of the book store as a specialty business, is a very small market in the province.

This is the conclusion of their study.

The underdevelopment of the general public market explains the underdevelopment of book stores in Quebec.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable Senators, I propose pursuant to Rule P-2 of the Interim Rules that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable Senators, Senator Hébert has just moved in accordance with Rule P-2 of the Interim Rules that this sitting of the Senate be suspended until Monday, December 3, 1990, at 2:00 p.m.

Do you agree to this motion, Honourable Senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting was adjourned until Monday, December 3, 1990, at 2:00 p.m.

Thesitting of the Senate was resumed at 2 p.m., on Monday, December 3, 1990l, the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-2, I ask leave to withdraw the adjournment motion I proposed on Friday, November 30, 1990.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

EXCISE TAX ACT
CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS ACT
CUSTOMS TARIFF EXCISE ACT
INCOME TAX ACT
STATISTICS ACT
TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the honourable senator Kelly, seconded by the honourable senator Beaudoin, for the third reading of Bill C-62, an Act to amend the Excise Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, last Friday, I was brutally interrupted in the middle of a flight of oratory at the stroke of 5 p.m., while describing to you the situation of bookstores and publishers in Quebec in the sixties.

I quoted long excepts from a small book by Ignace Cau, one of the very few studies on the subject by the way. I will continue today for a little while, because it is important to know about the difficult beginnings of the book publishing industry in Quebec, which were not so different from those of the industry in English Canada.

It is important for several reasons. First, to better understand the tremendous effort that was required to finanlly make this nearly invisible bud of an industry blossom. It is extremely vulnerable even today and is the first affected by the slightest fluctuation in the economy. For instance, an increase in unemployment in Montreal will translate into a noticeable decline in book sales. In times of recession, you may eat less but you still buy food, and you definitely buy fewer books, if any.

We are now in a recession. Mr. Wilson, who is very reluctant to use that word, finally uttered it. There are words that the Minister of Finance and Conservatives in general found difficult to pronounce. Words such as recession, compassion, unemployment, poverty, hunger and illiteracy are hard to say. They hurt. They are difficult to pronounce. We have definitely entered a made in Canada recession, that is to say a recession the government has brought about by stubbornly maintaining perticularly high interest rates, among other things.

A number of booksellers and a few small publishers will undoubtedly be forced to shut down. In these difficult times, one would expect a government at all responsible not to deal them the death-blow with a 7 per cent tax on almost all the goods and services we use, except the air we breathe.

Some colleagues of mine have started and others will continue to describe the damaging effects of the GST in various areas. I will confine myself to that one sector of books. The GST has infinitely more serious effects because it deprives society of the spiritual nourishment it craves so much in these troubled times.

A survey made a few years ago by the Department of Consumer Affairs on family expenditures showed some very interesting facts that I should point out at this time. The Canadian consumer spends a very small amount of his income on books, general literature, newspapers and periodicals. Those are 1982 figures, but I do not think they have changed much.

In 1982, he—the Canadian consumer—spent only 0.6 per cent of his total expenditures on books, newspapers and periodicals. Expenditures for education, including school books, at 0.7 per cent, are not far behind. Reading and education are the two categories that account for the smallest proportion of average expenditures. Let us stress that the Canadian consumer spends eight times more on entertainment that on reading, or 4.7 per cent of total expenditures.

Statistical tests show a very strong connection between the income level of families and their expenditures, in real terms, on printed matter, whether it is books, school manuals, newspapers or magazines: that is to say the higher the income, the more important the expenditures.

However, when figuring the ratio of expenses on books over total expenses and the development of that ratio by income levels, we see that families earning $15,000 spend as much on books, as a proportion of their total income, as families earning more than $75,000.

Multiplying the average family expenses by the number of families indicated by income brackets in the survey sample, gives an approximation of the total consumer expenses in school books and textbooks. According to calculations, families earning less than $40,000 are accountable for most of the printed material purchases: 62 per cent of reading material (newspapers, magazines and books other than textbooks), 56 per cent of books including textbooks, and 57 per cent of books only.

By comparison, families with an income of $75,000 or less are accountable for 73 per cent of school book and textbook purchases. In the $40,000 bracket, families have one full-time worker, national average is 0,7, and families with an income of $75,000 have two full-time workers.

According to Statistics Canada, the highest family income treshold is $40,000. These results totally refute the belief that a high-income select minority purchases the greatest number of books.

● (1410)

Hon. Eymard Corbin: You are going too fast.

Senator Hébert: Am I going too fast? You do not want me to start all over again, do you?

Senator Corbin: The reporter is unable to follow you!

Senator Hébert: The reporter is unable to follow me. Well, thus, that is why, honourable senators, it seems essential to me to describe the difficult development of the book industry since 1960, to applaud the successes of the last years, to demonstrate that the application of the GST could shake an already very unstable industry.

So this is what Mr. Ignascau was saying about the bookstore business in his history of the Quebec publishing industry. I resume my reading where I left off:

> The book market was dominated en 1962-63 by a few big firms that covered the whole Quebec territory. The Inquiry Commission named these "big firms". They were of course the four big firms: Beauchemin, Fides, Granger and Dussault to which were associated other important firms like the CPP, or the Centre de psychologie et de pédagogie, the CEC, or the Centre éducatif et culturel, Hachette, which is of course a big French firm, and Fomac which is also a firm from France.

> Apart from the CPP, those big firms were part of the Association of Canadian Book Wholesalers that was founded on October 1st, 1954. That Association proposed to tighten the bonds between its members, which did not prevent these big firms to fiercely fight for the control of the school market, creating then an unbearable instability for the small bookstores. For the small bookstores of the Province of Quebec, these big firms were altogether essential suppliers—that have indeed contributed to the development of bookshops in the whole province—and fearsome rivals in that the selling agents of those big firms snatched up the orders of the neighbouring institutions of these small bookstores such as school boards, public libraries and all which gravitated around small provincial bookstores.

Moreover, small bookstores could not rely on an efficient imported book system. Large bookstores import just enough to meet school orders and the market needs of large sales outlets distribution, thus without covering the various needs of general bookselling. We understand better the seriousness of the situation when we consider that the book trade was at that moment extremely dependent on imports. "Leaving aside the school books published here—says the Commission of enquiry—we can safely say that between 85 and 90 per cent of the books sold in our bookstores are imported."

This is an appalling figure and it is still recent, that 85 to 90 per cent of the books sold in our bookstores are imported. That was in 1962, not a century ago.

> For 1962, the imports aaccounted for $6.5 millions, the Quebec school book part of the market for $6 millions, and the rest of the Quebec book market for one million dollars at the most. Eighty per cent of the imported books were coming from France, 18 per cent from Belgium and 2 per cent from Switzerland.
> Finally, those large firms were shaping the imported book price policy; they were setting for imported books a retail price 50 per cent higher than the European price. This high level of retail prices for imported books was a serious impediment to the expansion of public demand. The high prices for imported books led a large number of educational institutions (and of college cooperatives too) to buy directly from Europe, receiving rebates similar to those that were granted to Canadian bookstores; thus, students too began to desert the bookstores.

I remember very well that that began even before that, because in the 1940's, I was at the École des hautes études commerciales, in Montreal. We had established a co-operative bookstore, because we had a better access and the prices were lower. So, it began as early as in 1942-1943.

> The publishing industry
> The Bouchard Report also dealt with the problems of the publishing industry. Publishers do not all face the same problems. The Commission noted that publishers of non-educational materials will never have an easy task, since the local market is limited and isolated; because of this limited market, they cannot always rely on big runs to lower their unit costs (generally one third higher than in France); For that reason, the problem to be solved "is that of too high ... costs compared to those of imported books, ... taking into account what the potential buyer can pay".
> The result is also that, to raise his profit margin, the Quebec publisher is forced to limit the discount offered to wholesalers, who, in response, show a lack of interest for books published in Quebec, finding the distribution of imported books more profitable than that of Canadian books; that also explains why 80 to 90 per cent of books sold by Canadian publishers are imported.

The Commission of inquiry concluded that the Quebec publishing industry (that which publishes cultural books versus the "how-to" or the cheap books) could not survive without state assistance. The state must try "to eliminate the comparative disadvantages between Canadian and imported books, to permit the Canadian publishing industry to match the lower cost of imported books in our market". The common problem to all publishers being "the locking-in of their cash into books inventories that sell slowly", The Commission recommended that the state assist the Quebec publishing industry with an interest-free loan which would be repayable "at a rate of half the amount by which sales exceed twice the total cost of production".

● (1420)

I must say that that measure was never implemented subsequently. It shows however that governments and, in this case, the Quebec government, have always felt that they had to find ways to help the publishing industry to survive, to flourish for without a publishing industry a society is in a very bad state.

The total aid granted as interest-free loans could be as high as 33 per cent of the production cost. Introducing the interest-free loan, the Commission recommended the abrogation of the Publishing Insurance Act of April 11, 1962 to help Quebec publishing industry. This act on interest-free loans to publishers was another well intentioned act which never worked.

As far as textbook publishing is concerned, the commission of enquiry noted its rapid expansion since 1952. That was the field of activity chosen by many publishers after the war. The number of active publishing firms went from 12 in 1953 to 18 in 1962, which means that in 1962, there were 18 publishers of French books in Quebec and certainly none outside Quebec. They were only 18 and they could make ends meet only because they published mainly textbooks.

The annual sales of these firms went from $1,5 million in 1953 to $5 millions in 1962. In 1962, sales of textbooks accounted for half the total retail sales. Half the textbook publishers were religious communities. In 1953, these communities sold 60 per cent of all textbooks; in 1962, their share was reduced to 35 per cent.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Slow down, please, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: I am so anxious to get to the conclusion of my speech that I hurry. If you miss parts of what I am saying, Senator Frith, rest assured that I will apply myself to slow down my delivery.

Senator Frith: One of my teachers used to tell me: Slowly, slowly, Mr. Frith.

Senator Hébert: He was absolutely right. Senator Gigantès, do you have anything to say?

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: I don't know whether you noticed, but our stenographers and interpreters have problems keeping up with us when we go too fast. Then, they come and ask whether we had a text. Don't you think it would be easier to go more slowly . . . A speech is not an article, it is another communication medium, and a lot of things go into a speech which would not be on a written page. It is a bit theatrical! If you want your punch line to be recorded by these people who serve us so diligently . . . they are almost martyrs these days. If you want them to follow you with the attention that your words deserve, because they are always worth listening to—your sentences are always well formulated—don't you think that a slower pace would be a major contribution on your part?

Think of the studies which will be made of this great debate, because it is a debate, and I think it is a first in the Senate. Such a vast debate dealing with so many subjects, and which is only beginning. You are one of the stars of this show, of this democractic action on our part! I beseech you to speak more slowly, because I also, and I know you well, have difficulty following you. What you say is so thought provoking that while we are musing over your penultimate sentence, you are already 3 or 4 sentences ahead, so we end up missing parts of your speech. The following day we rush to look in Hansard for the parts that we missed and we stumbled onto some hecklings, like the ones by Senator Simard, which caused trouble to the stenographers—

Hon. Paul David: He is quiet now, so leave him alone!

Senator Gigantès: He won't be quiet very long! It is not like him. Sometimes, he is a bit untimely in rising. Maybe you do not realize it but sometimes, the next day, you notice that some parts were missing his speech. And since you have so much to do, Senator, I am in somewhat reluctant to come to you the day after and ask you: "What did you mean before that sentence?" You have more important things to do than to answer questions from your fellow senators. I would not want to be mean end say it might just be that conservative members opposite were too noisy. Neither would I want to blame the stenographers and the translators for missing parts of your speech!

Should you not consider that you are somehow returning to the art of public speaking? It is an ancient art! Besides, you master the French language so well—

Senator David: Alas!

Senator Gigantès: Oh, yes he does. He has a great mastery of the French language with a beautiful accent and a comprehensive vocabulary, as well as elegant, clear cut and well constructed sentences.

● (1420)

I would dare say that in an independent Quebec, everyone should be required to speak the way you do and not like some others I will not name who are most disturbing whenever they rise because they do not have that beautiful speech flowing that is characteristic of the French language. Senator Beaudoin speaks also a beautiful French, a little esoteric, I would say, because he uses legal terms. It is inevitable. I am sure that if Senator Keon spoke French and started talking about cardiology with Senator David, a few of us would thank our starsnot to be in their hands. Not that we would not be in good hands, but because we are still fortunate enough not to need their services. We would certainly find their discussion a little confusing. As for you, your French is never like that. I would then ask you if you would consider slowing down your delivery.

Senator Hébert: Well—yes, the doctor always takes part in some way in our proceedings. I must however correct Senator Gigantès who said that neither he nor I ever needed the services of Dr. Keon ou Dr. David. It is not quite correct because it so happens that, a long time ago, I had to consult Dr. David, who was and still is the best cardiologist in Montréal. That was many years ago. I have been well ever since.

• (1430)

Well then, as I was saying, and I will repeat my last sentence to make sure that you got my meaning even after all the remarks—

Senator Gigantès: I have a very short question to ask. What is for an angina attack that you went to see Senator David?

Senator Hébert: No, no.

Senator Gigantès: I see.

Senator Hébert: It was to get some reassurance.

> In 1953, religious communities sold 60 per cent of all school books, and in 1962, their share was reduced to 35 per cent.

One could say that the quiet revolution occurred over a short span. In the course of a decade, the religious communities, which strongly dominated the production of school books, lost nearly half their share of the market to non-religious publishing houses who were perhaps, one has to admit, scientifically more advanced.

> Furthermore, the Board of Inquiry has enumerated 18 schoolbook stores owned by teaching orders which were selling books, in 1962.
> As for schoolbook publishers, the Commission of Inquiry notes that the pricing of schoolbooks was completely anarchical. Editors fixed prices according to elements that had nothing to do with the cost of the book. For example, a teaching order, the Frères des écoles du Centre pédagogique de Québec, charged high prices for its books as a way of financing its needs.

So geography books were sold for a little more because it was necessary, the brothers needing a new building. Those religious communities were nonetheless very devoted and contributed a lot to education in our province.

> The Commission of Inquiry notes also that the schoolbook approval process was not free from undue influences—

Imagine!

> —conflicts of interest were numerous among the subcommittees and the sub-commissions. According to the Bouchard Report, at least one business has directly committed some schoolboards trustees to its development.

Games were played . . .

Senator Gigantès: Which Bouchard is that?

Senator Hébert: Well, I don't remember his first name

Senator Gigantès: Was it Lucien?

Senator Hébert: No, no, it was not him.

Senator Gigantès: Not Lucien.

Senator Hébert: It was another Bouchard.

> To solve these difficulties, the Commission of Inquiry recommends: That within the new public education structures resulting from the decisions taken as to Bill 60, the Minister of Education—

Who was Paul Gérin-Lajoie at the time, and his deputy minister is sitting there, Senator Tremblay, but he is not listening, he is speaking. I go on with the quotation.

> —be directly responsible for the approval of school books and of all preliminary studies done in view of this approval.
> Thanks to the Bouchard Report, we can now conclude that the publishing world in Quebec, in the early sixties, was relying entirely on demands from schools and that the distribution was done in an anarchistic way, particularly profitable to some businesses.
>
> To the commission of inquiry, all solutions had to be comprehensive. The commercial perspective of the last ten years had to be changed. Conditions for determining what the reverse should entail would not be set until a comprehensive policy had been identified and implemented. This comprehensive policy was aimed at making books available to Quebec readers. This would be achieved by fine tuning demand which would bring books to smaller communities and also prevent the large publishing companies from having a quasi monopoly in the business.
>
> In concrete terms, the commission recommended creating a "maison du livre", a Crown corporation.

This recommendation was never implemented.

> To supply Quebec bookstores at the wholesale level, it was necessary to take this function away from the wholesalers and develop our network of bookstores, a major instrument for cultural development.

The commission realized that bookstores were not just ordinary businesses. They were a major tool for cultural development.

> This Crown corporation was seen as a vital instrument, especially for small Quebec publishers that did not have the financial resources to reach the entire market. It was no use supporting the publishing sector if its products could not reach the reader.
> Finally, to enable bookstores to play this key role in the cultural development of Quebec society, the commission recommended obliging government subsidized institutions and services to purchase the books they needed from bookstores accredited by Quebec.

In the following chapter we will see how the government of the Quiet Revolution acted on the recommendations of the commission of inquiry.

I have already said that some recommendations were not followed up, but some were, including the recommendation to accredit bookstores as suppliers to the government, schools and libraries—that was done, and it had a very positive impact.

On June 22, 1960, the Union nationale was defeated by the Liberals under Jean Lesage, after 16 years in power.

I imagine quite a few ladies and gentlemen on the other side weren't in the best of spirits on that particular day.

The arrival of the Liberals marked the birth of a new Quebec. The time was ripe for change, for progress, for a quiet revolution.

Among the many political concerns on the Liberal Party's agenda, one of the main priorities was culture.

The first item was to create a department of cultural affairs, which did not exist before 1960. Culture was not a concern of the Union nationale, as we all know. Premier Duplessis bragged that he never opened a book after he left university. He may have been exaggerating, but there was certainly an element of truth in what he said.

Once in power, the Liberal team included culture and education among its priorities.

In fact, I think this may have been the most important contribution made by a government of which it is said that it brought about the quiet revolution. In fact, the revolution was possible because culture and education were one of the government's priorities.

The Department of Cultural Affairs, a product of the faith and energy of Georges-Émile Lapalme, its first incumbent, was created by Jean Lesage in 1961, in the full flower of Quebec's spring. We will try to give a short outline of the first five years of the department's history.

Politically and intellectually, the government of the quiet revolution felt that culture had to be the inspiration of the common goals of Quebec's society. It was to develop the soul of our society.

● (1440)

On March 2, 1961, Jean Lesage introduced the Bill creating the Department of Cultural Affairs with those words.

Of course, I cannot imitate him because he is truly inimitable, but I can hear him now, when he addressed the Legislative Assembly which was not yet known as the National Assembly:

I seek the cooperation of all men of goodwill to make the Bill presented to this assembly a tool of greatness for our province and to create a Cultural Affairs Department that will be, in a way, a Department of French Canadian Civilization and that will become the first, the greatest and the most efficient servant of the French fact in America, of the soul of our people.

Then I presume that the members of the National Assembly, which was still called Legislative Assembly at the time, broke out in applause because by simply reading them aloud, we are reminded of the inimitable droning of Mr. Lesage, a powerful speaker, probably one of the last great ones. He also had a slight nationalistic accent but he believed in Canada.

So the Department that was supposed to be a tool of greatness . . .

As Mr. Lesage had just told the people of Quebec

. . . was officially born on November 22, 1961. After years of cultural inertia under the Duplessis Government—

A right wing Conservative Government, which explains why culture was not one of its priorities, something we see right here in Ottawa—

—a government criticized for its unbelievable delays in all fields including that of literacy, there came a "revolutionary" government which took upon itself to spread culture at home and abroad, but that was not to happen. If we look at the budgets given to the Department of Cultural Affairs, it seems that the government that triggered the Quiet Revolution did not really take that department seriously.

Although the Department of Cultural Affairs was something the Premier used to brag about, you realize, when you examine its development over the years, that politicians do not really believe in culture, literature and, as they say, "fiddle playing". I have here a table which I will summarize for you and which describes the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs budgets from 1960 to 1966, the period under consideration.

When it started, the Department had a budget of $2,724,000, which represented at the time about 0.4 per cent of the total Quebec budget. It was nothing to write home about.

Senator Gigantès: Only 0.4 per cent.

Senator Hébert: More precisely, 0.46 per cent of the total Quebec budget. Then, in 1961-62, it was increased to $3 billion and something, which was about 0.48 per cent. Then, in 1962-63, it fell to 0.44 per cent. In 1963-64, it was increased to 0.6 per cent. In 1964-65, down again, to 0.55 per cent, and finally in 1965-66, the last year of the period under review, it fell to its lowest level, even lower than the year it was created, to 0.45 per cent.

In spite of the fact that the budgets—

Senator Gigantès: You say 0.45 per cent?

Senator Hébert: Yes, 0.45 per cent of the total Quebec budget—

An Hon. Senator: Less than half of 1 per cent.

Senator Hébert: Of 1 per cent. You're right. Culture is something politicians like to talk about, but come budget time, it remains the least of their concerns, and that is what happened in Quebec, which totally discouraged Georges-Émile Lapalme as we will see later.

> In spite of the fact that Quebec's Estimates started to increase rapidly beginning in 1960, the Department had always at its disposal over this period an average of one half of 1 per cent of the total Quebec budget, which represented $23 million over five years.

When I consider all the catching up we had to do, the fact that there were hardly any public libraries, that those which existed hardly had any books, that the network of bookstores was absolutely pathetic and entirely dominated by the purchasing arms of the various religious orders, as was the publishing industry for that matter.

> Georges-Émile Lapalme, who is considered as the father of the Department of Cultural Affairs, resigned on September 3rd, 1964, and stated in his letter of resignation that the Department of Cultural Affairs could not justifiably continue to exist. There was no need for a department with absolutely no power and no authority to sign a $1,000 purchasing order, while the minister's own signature would be accepted by a banking establishment for a much greater amount.

The minister could not sign a purchasing order exceeding $1,000. It had to be referred to the Cabinet or something.

> Guy Frégault, who was the first to hold—

Senator Gigantès: I am sorry, but could you tell us whether our honourable colleague Senator Tremblay was at the time Deputy Minister of that department? I think he was.

Senator Hébert: No, he was not with that department, but with the Department of Education.

Senator Gigantès: Department of Education, not Department of Cultural Affairs.

Senator Hébert: No.

Senator Gigantès: Therefore, it was no fault of his if the Department found itself in—

Senator Hébert: Not at all.

Senator Gigantès: If he had been with that Department, things could have been different, because I am told he was a formidable bureaucratic street fighter.

Senator Hébert: He has always had that reputation.

Senator Gigantès: He still has that reputation. If he had been with this department, he could certainly have found ways to obtain additional funds.

Senator Hébert: I think so.

Senator Gigantès: So do I.

Senator Hébert: What is the use, you cannot re-write history.

Senator Gigantès: He would have taken them to task in no uncertain terms, and certainly more than once.

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: I thank you, Senator.

Senator Hébert: Besides, this information I am giving you could have been passed on to you by Senator Tremblay who knows that period even better than I, or at any rate who was closer to government than I have ever been. Well he has chosen to be on the other side and of course, he cannot allow himself to do that. He lets me do the work all alone.

> Guy Frégault, the first deputy minister in 1960, tells us in "Chroniques des années perdues" about the Department tribulations between 1961 and 1966. The Department is a "Tough land" . . . It is a quotation. Guy Frégault wrote well:
> ". . . a tough, rocky land, impossible to plow." The main difficulties come from Treasury Board where there there is always a concern that the Department projects, called . . .

• (1450)

There, one can easily recognize the politicial vernacular.

> . . . "the flute players' papers".

This is how he used to call the documents presented by the Minister of Cultural Affairs and Treasury Board officials.

I am going to repeat the sentence because it is so well written. It is by Frégault:

> The main difficulties come from Treasury Board where there is always a concern that the Department projects called "the flute players' papers" by Treasury officials might end up under Procuste's smaller bed—

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, may I ask a question? I see that you are talking about senior Quebec officials, is that right? You are indeed talking about Quebec civil servants?

Senator Hébert: Yes, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: There is in this Chamber, besides Senator Tremblay, Sanator Bolduc who has reached the highest levels in Quebec Public Service. What you are quoting concerns perhaps some measures or some initiatives or the lack thereof for which he might have been responsible while he was a senior Quebec official. I take the liberty of speaking now because while you were ready to start on that issue, Senator Bolduc was chatting with his colleagues. Maybe he had better listen to what you have to say.

I am sorry for the interruption. If Senator Bolduc feels that you are not telling the truth, he will have a chance to intervene.

That is what debate is all about. Give and take on both sides of the chamber. We give but the other side never takes. It makes for a rather dull debate. Not that you are dull or boring, but we have the impression that despite all your sound arguments, they on the other side are not interested, they do not listen, they do not participate, with the result that Parliament is no longer Parliament because there is no response! Speeches, yes, but no response! We get the impression we are speaking in a soundproof room. We can hear ourselves talk, but there is no echo. We do not hear anything from the other side. It is almost as if Parliament no longer had its raison d'être. I would urge you to wait until Senator Bolduc listens before proceeding because what you were saying was very relevant indeed.

Senator Gigantès: I do not like to disagree with your colleague. I have a lot of esteem for Senator Corbin because of his outstanding qualities, which everyone knows and appreciates. He is a good friend, a valiant colleague in our fight.

Perhaps you might settle the matter, but I find that it may be presuming too much because we have no idea what goes on within the public service and what advice senior officials give to the ministers. They are still bound by their secrecy oath. And so are Senator Tremblay and Senator Bolduc. But saying that our colleagues may have made mistakes or hesitated to defend our culture may put them in a rather difficult situation! Both are honourable and very charming colleagues. Senator Hébert, do you not believe that we cannot really hold them responsible for these failings to support Quebec culture? What do you think?

Senator Hébert: Well, I think you are both right, each in your own way. But what I realize, is that, yes, senator Corbin has every reason to complain that the Conservatives do not seem to want to take part in this debate. In fact, I think the government has established a kind of work distribution model in the Senate. They let the Liberals talk, make speeches, explain the facts to the people, and then they vote while we are not in the house. That could be considered as work distribution. Everyone has a task to do.

I remember this beautiful quote from Guy Frégault, who was complaining about problems he encountered with Treasury Board when selling up Department of Cultural Affairs. He said:

> Treasury is the main problem. When dealing with those epople, one is always afraid that Departmental projects, or what the Treasury Board officials called "the pied pipers paper", would end up on Procrustes smaller bed.

Not on the larger one! On the smaller bed of Procrustes. Naturally . . .

If Senator David were here, he would undoubtedly ask me to explain who was Procrustes, or he would tell you himself. Procrustes was a robber in the Ancient times. The robbed travellers and compelled his victims to lie on an iron bed, if I remember correctly. He would then stretch or cut off their legs to make them fit the bed's length of his bed.

Are you aware that mythology is not clear on that point; he may have had two beds, not only one. There are many accounts, but in Greek legend, he had only one bed, and if you were too tall, he would cut off your legs to fit the length of the bed and if you were too small, he would stretch your legs until they fitted it! According to other accounts, he had two beds, a smaller one and a larger one, so he would never run out of people to torture. But, personally, given the meagre resources they had then, I think he only had one bed.

Well, I always thought he had two beds, because that is how my grandmother told me the story.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Gigantès: Well, if your grandmother said it, I can only accept it.

Senator Hébert: I hope so. Because we could end up being at odds if you questioned my grandmother's good faith.

Senator Gigantès: Heaven forbid!

Senator Hébert:

> The Arts Branch, created in 1963, was made up of five divisions, namely Music, Theatre, Research, Aid to creativity and Arts. We were working in very small teams. The department could not find talented people because he didn't want to pay them.

It was absolutely pitiful.

> "Skills were less important than one's reputation as an administrator." To say that nothing revolutionary ever happens in the Department of Cultural Affairs is a statement of fact.

I must say that the memories I have of that period, well, aren't very good ones because it wasn't a pleasure to work there. As you will see, that's what enabled the Arts Council of Canada to estblish itself in Quebec because it could give more direct and precise answers. The Arts Council was more in sync with the needs of Quebec cultural community than it's own Department of Cultural Affairs was. So when I hear Quebecers complain about the federal government's interference in Quebec's small matters, I think we often tend to forget that we are to blame to a large extent. Because after all, the Department of Cultural Affairs would have had more success if it had been given more power. Even its founder, George-Émile Lapalme, had to leave the department because he felt they were joking by giving him such insignificant budget.

Later on, many people particularly the nationalists, complained because the Arts Council was supporting the writers. Well the least either government, or preferably both, could do was to respond favorably to the needs of the cultural community. The fact remains that the Arts Council was always more receptive.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senator, do you know that the Arts Council has a translation funding program? When a publisher from English Canada wants to publish a book written in French by a Quebecer, he receives a grant in order to cover the translation costs and vice versa. That program still exists and is very successful. Are you aware of its existence?

• (1500)

Senator Hébert: Of course, I used it for many writers whose works I published over my lifetime. That program of the Canada Council has been in existence for a long time. I would even think it goes back to the early sixties. It was one of their first moves.

Cultural exchanges between both lingustic groups were in the spirit of the Massé-Lévesque Commission. It seemed eminently logical to make easier the translation and publication of important works in the other language. It was important, obviously. The program did not cover all types of books, though, but only novels, short stories, poetry or essays of a certain intellectual level. You could not use government money to translate cookbooks or guides on how to quit smoking in three days.

Senator Gigantès: What about books on economy? They are eligible, are they not?

Senator Hébert: It was not always that way. It had to be literature. For other types of book, you had to turn to the Science Council, which is similar to the Canada Council. I left that sector a long time ago, but I think the difficulties are settled. Even a book on economy could be translated at the government's expense.

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me for being insistent. I would like you to check this, because I am quite sure. Incidentally, my publisher just told me that a few days ago. If he had planned to translate in French a book like mine, The Road ahead, I did not need to bother giving him a French version. Even if I worked for hours translating it, I did not need to do it because the Canada Council would have paid to have it done.

As a matter of fact, it is in the estimates and in the accounts of the government. Do you think a minister in this government should know that such a program exists since his own government passes the budget?

Senator Hébert: Yes. Had the minister in question been aware of that policy of the Canada Council, he would not have accused you of being a crook and of using official Senate translators to translate your book. This is such a gross accusation that I wonder how any reporter could have taken it seriously.

Senator Gigantès: But what do you think of a senator, who is not a minister but who held a Cabinet post before, who throws such an accusation at me? I am talking of Senator Simard and of Senator David before him. The question in itself is indeed insulting. They should at least have enquired into this matter before smearing a colleague's reputation.

Senator Hébert: My answer is yes, of course. You cannot accuse a colleague or impute motives if you do not know the facts. First, it is true that there are federal programs, administered by the Canada Council or the Science Council, to help translate literary works and even economic essays. However, this does not seem to stop certain ministers from thoughtlessly throwing accusations and then giving half apologies later.

Senator Gigantès: Do you think that such thoughtless accusations are due to the fact that the ministers on that side mix with members of their party, some of whom are presently in jail after being convicted for fraud and all kinds of wrongdoing? Perhaps they get used to judging others by the same standards as those they mix with. Do you think this fact may have influenced the Leader of the government opposite?

Senator Hébert: It is quite possible. It is indeed possible because it is really too much to accuse another senator of being a crook and of using Senate translators when they know that, for at least 40 years, there have been programs specifically designed to help translate works from a language to another. This is utterly stupid. Well, we were talking about Procrustes and his two beds.

> In short, for the Liberal government in office at the time, culture was never a priority despite an obvious lack of cultural facilities.

It is typical of all governments, but I think it is right to say that it was particularly true of the Lesage government at that time. But at least it established the department.

> Health, welfare and education were the priorities, totalling 67.6 per cent of government expenditures. In 1964-65, the Education budget was $327 million.

Senator Tremblay took everything, so there was nothing left for culture.

> He absorbed 28 per cent of the province's financial resources.

We are not blaming you, we are just joking.

> While "metapedagogues", a term used by Frégault in the Department of Education, succeeded in having big buildings erected on the simple premise that education is a good investment, the "pied pipers" from Cultural Affairs continued to complain about the extreme inadequacy of cultural facilities in Quebec. In 1964-1965, they drafted a White Paper in which they meditated on the end of instability.

The authors of the White Paper vigorously reminded the government, which was busy developing an economic, social and education program.

And I quote from the White Paper written by Pierre Laporte, if I am not mistaken:

> The time has long gone since the Government of Quebec could be certain that, by controlling the public education sector, it would preserve the national identity of French Canadians. In addition to playing a more direct role in Quebec's social and economic development, the government has a duty to develop a cultural policy that will confirm its historic and exclusive responsibility in this field.
>
> The authors of the White Paper did not ignore the economic progress of our society. They believed it was necessary for Quebeckers to see francophone culture as the main instrument of financial, industrial, commercial and scientific progress. For them, "one of the roles of the Department of Cultural Affairs in this government is to help mould the collective destiny" of Quebeckers who were wondering about their collective personality and searching for an identity.
>
> The White Paper of 1965 was the first document in which the Government of Quebec proclaimed the objectives of a cultural policy for that province. The defeat of the Liberal Party at the hands of the Union nationale in 1966 prevented Pierre Laporte, then Minister of Cultural Affairs, from tabling this important document at the National Assembly et making it public.

The White Paper was shelved by Jean-Noël Tremblay, of the Union nationale . . .

then the new Minister of Cultural Affairs . . .

and resurrected by Liberal minister Jean-Paul Lallier . . .

who replaced him six years later.

The White Paper took a decidedly different view than that of Quebec political leaders of the sixties who seem to have unwittingly preferred welfare to culture.

The Bouchard Report, which Mr. Lapalme tabled in the National Assembly in January 1964 (seven months before his departure), allowed Jean Lesage's team to gauge the situation facing book publishers and libraries in Quebec. This situation was well described in the Bouchard Report using terms such as "anarchy", "anachronism", "instability" and "under-development", which all pointed toward a crisis. The Bouchard Report was tabled in the National Assembly at the same time as Paul Gérin-Lajoie's famous Bill 60 . . .

I never understood why he called it Bill 60. Senator Tremblay may be able to provide an explanation. The word "bill" is an English term. I do not know. In any case . . .

creating a Department of Education, and to a large degree government efforts were focussed on it for the greater part of two parliamentary sessions.

In the meantime, the Department of Cultural Affairs was drafting its White Paper intended to remind the Government, busy implementing economic, social and educational programs, of the need to develop a cultural policy. Culture is proposed as a major development tool. For the authors of the White Paper, the State must limit its role, toward both artistic creation and broadcasting, to one of assistance and promotion.

In no case should it replace, restrict or put in jeopardy original creativity . . . On the other hand, the State should not hesitate to correct existing structures which obviously hamper the distribution of original works and should even go as far as to substitute itself to these structures . . .

● (1510)

You realize to what extent the Government, which I take the liberty of criticizing along with this author, the Quebec provincial Government was anxious to try and protect the book publishing industry, libraries and the reading public in Quebec. Under no circumstances would these people have considered imposing a 7 percent tax on books. They are criticized nowadays for not having gone further, but to them a GST on books would have been unthinkable; their concern for details, for using every means at their disposal to provide assistance, demonstrates this clearly.

The role of the State as defined and the measures put forward in the White Paper to alleviate the situation of the book publishing industry in Quebec reflect the philosophy underlying the Bouchard Report: The Government has a role, not so much in creating or administering, but in spreading culture.

[Senator Hébert.]

A distribution problem, lack of libraries and other distribution channels, existed.

In other words, the Government must make books more readily available to people. What would be the use of encouraging creativity or publishing if books do not reach the intended readers? The White Paper borrows a recommendation from the Bouchard Report, to create a book distribution center.

This, I may as well tell you now, never materialized.

This recommendation was never acted upon, although a significant number of briefs it inspired showed, based on existing models, that it would haved proved a solid institution. Some firms, benefitting from the anarchy surrounding book distribution, opposed a common front, through associations such as the Association des libraires grossistes du Québec, to the proposed Quebec distribution network.

This was obviously unsettling for some people.

As for its policy on assistance to bookstores, on August 6, 1965, the Legislative Assembly passed Bill 90, the parent legislation that established bookstore accreditation.

It was sound legislation, and in fact, they changed the name in French because in 1974, according to the "politique d'agrément des librairies", in French the word agréé was used because they found that the word accrédités was not good French. It took nine years but, in the end, they corrected the legislation.

The most important measure recommended by the Bouchard report to promote the book trade was not followed up, and I am referring to the obligation for subsidized institutions to buy their books at accredited bookstores. In 1966, there were 89 accredited bookstores.

It says "accrédités" here in French, but I am reading a text that was published before the bill was passed.

An Hon. Senator: It's as bad as "licencié".

Senator Hébert: In French you have to say agréé.

But as far as the business aspect was concerned, whether they had a certificat d'agrément or certificat d'accréditation was not terribly important. The accreditation certificate implied that certain standards with respect to stock, bibliographic facilities and competence of staff were met, and that the establishment was recognized by the government as a bona fide bookstore.

It would take eight years for the Government of Quebec to adopt significant measures affecting the book trade, as recommended in the Bouchard Report. Regarding the publishing industry, the report recommended abrogating the Publishers Loss Insurance Act, passed in 1962, and replacing it with an interest-free loan formula. The report also wanted to promote distribution of Quebec books by creating a "Maison du livre". Neither recommendation was followed up.

The government merely proceeded to amend the Publishers Lost Insurance Act, first in 1964 and later in 1965. When the Act was passed in 1962, the Conseil supérieur du livre expressed its satisfaction. The fundamental aspects of this legislation were suggested by the Association des éditeurs, and the legislation only applied to publishers who were members of this association.

> The Bouchard report raised serious objections against this kind of assistance, both for purely financial and cultural reasons. The basic flaw of this legislation, according to the commission of inquiry, was that it provided government assistance based on the proportion of unsold copies of a given printing. Its aim was clearly to cover the publisher's bad risks. It encouraged the publisher to make hasty decisions about print runs and stop promoting sales when a book was not selling well.

That is what Mr. Bouchard argued, while I sided with the Association des éditeurs. We didn't agree, because why should a publisher publish books that will not sell in order to get a subsidy to cover his losses? After all, we don't launch books just for the sake of losing money!

> Finally, this legislation also encouraged publishers to withdraw prematurely from the market books whose sales were lagging. For all these reasons, the Bouchard report recommended abrogating the Publishers Loss Insurance Act. As we said before, this recommendation was not followed up.
> Publishers generally failed to use that legislation. In 1964, a Laval University sociology team had already noticed a lack of interest in that legislation on the part of publishers.
>
> They wrote that it seemed obvious that publishing insurance satisfied nobody. Varied formulas of assistance to the production as such were proposed but the need was stressed to promoting and organizing the distribution of French Canadian books not only in the Province of Quebec but in the other provinces as well as overseas.
>
> As for seeking solutions to their problems, from 1960 to this day, the Quebec publishers will have constantly stressed the utmost need for the establishment of a quebec distribution network as recommended in the Bouchard Report.
>
> With Guy Frégault, we believe that in today's society books are a good indicator of the general well-being of the cultural community. Guy Frégault sums up the situation in these terms:
>
> > Books are a ruthless indicator, be they looked from the point of view of their production, their commercial distribution or their distribution throughout a public reading system. Libraries are a particularly clear indicator. What do they indicate? The extreme weakness of the foundation of the cultural structure and the failure of notables to share the spiritual goods (. . .) What do they indicate? To put it in one word, ruthless but true: Underdevelopment.
> >
> > That underdevelopment is particularly obvious in the reading habits of the public. During the quiet revolution in Quebec, the magical formula "Education is a good investment" would contribute to have big schools built easily but not institutions like libraries in the true desert of Quebec public reading. Already, in January of 1960, Maurice Lebel . . .

a professor at the University of Montreal, if my memory serves me well,

> . . . was enlightening us on the core of the problem:
>
> > It is not enough to build beautiful gymnasiums and academic halls, we also have to spend much money on libraries . . . In times past, they used to talk of the pitiful state of the churches of France, but the pitiful state of our libraries is enough to make you weep.
>
> In their study on "the status of the writer and the diffusion of litterature", the Laval University team of sociologists gave us a picture of the global situation of public reading in the early 1960s.

It is almost incredible.

Senator Gigantès: On that subject, Senator Hébert, I have two questions to ask you, which came to my mind because of what you said a moment ago. I want to ask you them one at a time, if you allow me.

● (1520)

You said at a certain moment that it would have been unthinkable for those governments accused of not having done enough to go in the opposite direction, even to the point where they would have put a GST on book sales. The present government is telling us that this GST is needed to reduce the deficit, which could lead to a decrease in interest rates.

Yet, a former minister of the Mulroney government, Mr. Sinclair Stevens, is telling us what we were all suspecting, that our dollar is kept to the level of parity it is now with the US dollar, more or less, because of a secret deal between the Canadian and the American governments. In other words, the Americans said: "Listen, the Free Trade Agreement is a very good thing as long as you will not let your dollar go down, or rather providing that you bring back your dollar to a level where your products are not as competitive on our market as to worry our business people. If they are bothered, they will bring pressure to bear on the Congress. Our trade laws would have to be amended to block, as it were, the access to the US market for Canadian products."

How do you like that explanation by Mr. Sinclair Stevens of what is happening now? If he tells the truth, we would not need the GST to reduce the deficit, it would have nothing to do with it. In fact, the high interest rates are there to please the United States. I have another question to ask you after this one.

Senator Hébert: I am not quite sure I would trust Mr. Sinclair Stevens on everything, but this is certainly something he knows very well. He played a very important role in the Mulroney government. He was on the front line and he probably knows a lot of things that you and I don't know. His analysis of the situation and the present fiddling with the dollar seem to me worthy of consideration, no doubt about it. Is that all you wanted to know? You said you had a second question?

Senator Gigantès: I was hoping for more, but you do not seem willing to go into this field, so I will switch to something else, the problem of university textbooks, especially in pure science, but also in some social sciences.

I have young relatives in Quebec universities, nephews and nieces who are fiercely separatist. So are their parents. However, they must study with English textbooks. These books are updated very regularly. New inventions from Xerox allow you to produce two copies of a 454 page book, with a full colour jacket, in 5 minutes.

Nowadays, scientific textbooks are published with replaceable parts. A new chapter might be published to replace one already in the book if new developments warrant it. These books sell for a very high price, because their translation is not subsidized. Very often they are not yet translated that a new edition or version is already out.

If we want to educate our young people in French in Quebec, is it not an area were a Crown corporation, or a book clearing house, or more money could be used to prepare speedy translations, quick updates of textbooks in the fields of business, social sciences, pure sciences like maths, physics, chemistry, biology, so that our students could be taught in French instead of being Frenglishized, if I may use this horrible new word? We would not want them to speak half English and half French, would we? Do you not think that, first of all, the GST will make this problem even worse? If it was too expensive to do it until now, it will be even more expensive.

At least in this field, should this government, that says that it is so concerned with the well-being of the French-speaking population in Canada, especially in Quebec, not make more efforts to allow Quebecers to protect their language by doing their professional training in their mother tongue, this very beautiful and rich language of French, instead of having to pursue their studies in English? There is nothing wrong with speaking English. I am totally in favour of bilingualism.

Even Mr. Landry says that he is for personal bilingualism, trilingualism or multilingualism. So, a sovereign, independent, associated Quebec, with a superstructure or infrastructure, I do not know, will always have to have a lot of bilingualism and unilingualism. One of the gifts that the Canadian federal government could make, that would be a very important contribution to the distinctness of Quebec, its distinct society, would be to allow young Quebecers to get an education in their language.

We are not talking about the language of Ruritania. We are talking about one of the very important languages in the world, of a really imperial language, French, which has an extraordinary richness, a superb elegance and flexibility.

This language has not only been neglected, but its protection will become even more difficult. It is not only a matter of availability of books, but also of computer sofware whose production should be financially assisted as well. Software are also a form of publishing. If we make these materials more expensive, we are turning our backs on the goals we are pursuing. And our goals are to have a much faster production of these news items in good French to make sure that vocational training is delivered in French. Otherwise, French will always be in danger in Quebec. Am I wrong?

Senator Hébert: No, Senator Gigantès, you are not wrong. That would be the ideal thing to do. But I cannot say that I am overly shocked by the idea as far as university studies are concerned. But it would be frightening if it were the case at another level. I suggest that a university student in Quebec, or elsewhere in Canada for that matter, should be able to manage in more than one language. It should not be much of a problem for a university student to have to study in books written in a foreign language.

I remember that when I was attending l'École des hautes études commerciales, in the 40s, the major accounting books were American. They were given directly in English. We had to make do, although we were not thrilled. Now, thinking of it, I wonder how we could have aimed at an advanced diploma in business and specialized accounting without being able to manage in English, an important language in the business world, especially in accounting.

I believe that today, books are available in French on this subject and may be used almost exclusively, if I am not mistaken. In spite of that, if I take it from the recent newspaper reports, exam results of Quebec students in accounting are slightly inferior to the Canadian average. I cannot explain it. Is it related to the fact that schoolbooks are not entirely in French? I don't know, but you all seem to say—and I agree with you—that these issues are not given much consideration by the government.

> In its inquiry on the writer's status and on literature distribution, the team of sociologists from Laval University gives us an idea of the general situation regarding libraries in the early sixties.

You will see that we had a long way to go to catch up.

● (1530)

> In 1962, the 100 public libraries of the province which were considered suitable—out of a total of 251—had a budget of 84 cents per person, for a total of $2,217,659, while the 510 Ontario libraries could count on a budget amounting to $2.52 per person, for a total of $10,553,182. Ontario had 1.3 books per person, and in circulation 6 copies, compared to 0.4 and 1.6 respectively for Quebec. In the province, of the 72 towns and cities having a population of more than 10 000, 56 have no public library, and two out of three towns with a population of 5 000 to 10 000, that is 41 out of a total of 61, offer no library service at all. On the whole, the number of city dwellers who do not have access to a suitable public library service is estimated at 1 million; as for rural areas, the number is close to 1.6 million, or 94 per cent of the population.

I am not too thrilled to mention numbers like these, but it is a fact. I hear some say: Blame it again on the English.

> In such a case, conclude the sociologists, we can speak of an urgent need, so much so that for certain fractions of the population, the economically weak, living in remote regions and not reached by the publicity, the public library is the only access to the written word, the only possible way for authors and the public to meet.

When there is no bookstore, when one can't go to the city to buy books, the library is the only way out.

> Budgets granted to public libraries from 1961 to 1966.

The budget granted jumped from $140 000 per year, can you imagine, to under 1 million dollars for all public libraries in 1966.

> We are a long way from considering libraries as "one of the main links" of cultural policy.

We could see from the chapter I have just summarized for you that the governement of the Quiet Revolution did not pass the important measures recommended by the Quebec commission on the book industry.

> The purpose of these measures was to thwart the sale tendancy of the last ten years which benefited private companies. For the commission, it was above all essential to take away the wholesale supply of books from wholesale booksellers in order to expand the bookselling network.
> On April 28, 1967, the Société des libraires du Québec petitioned the new Minister of Cultural Affairs, Jean-Noël Tremblay, a member of the Union nationale, to put an end to the bookselling crisis in Quebec, which, according to the petition of the Société des libraires was already responsible for several bookstores to go bankrupt, and among the survivors, it prompted a general deterioration of the service and a reduction in the selection of books offered to the public. In their request, booksellers suggested solutions to put an end to the crisis. Their proposals reflected what was previously recommended in the Bouchard report, such as buying only from accredited booksellers . . .

and accredited now . . .

> . . . and setting a fair price on books published in Quebec and imports. For imported books, the Société des libraires proposed tables for converting European prices in Canadian dollars. That went against the interests of the Société des libraires-grossistes, which expressed its objections in a letter sent to Minister Tremblay on May 31, 1967. According to wholesale booksellers, conversion tables would disrupt the industry, and even put them out of business.

They said that would put an intolerable strain on companies which were up till then offering a much-appreciated service to the French-Canadian community. It would create a vacuum which powerful foreign publishers and commission houses would soon have filled, using every possible means to quickly and efficiently colonize the publishing industry in Quebec.

> Eliminating wholesalers, hence disrupting the established structures, as was recommended in the Bouchard report, would mean wholesale booksellers would have to give up their domination over the book business in Quebec in favour of a few foreign companies. Indeed, it is those foreigners, not the Quebec government, who are responsible for the erosion of anarchic distribution and production systems in Quebec from 1967 to 1972.

During the Bouchard inquiry, the book business was practically controlled by Quebec interests. According to the Commission, until then, the whole market, but especially the general public market, was too small for European publishers to be able to turn a profit by having representatives and depots to supply small bookstores.

Not until the mid-60s did the major foreign publishers, who of course published in France books in great numbers for the whole French community, find the Quebec market profitable.

They realized it was very profitable for them to sell parts of their stocks in Quebec. However, for Quebeckers, with no outlet outside Quebec, to publish a book remained a very risky business.

> It was only in the early 1960s that the major foreign publishers felt for the first time that the Quebec book market could prove profitable and started to open offices in the province. They certainly were right in their assessment. According to an inquiry carried out in 1969 by Ernst and Ernst for the Federal Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the book industry went at the time through a period of accelerated growth. On the basis of the data published by the Quebec Bureau of Statistics, Ernst and Ernst tried to determine the average yearly growth rate of sales from 1964 to 1969, by Quebec publishers who file reports with the government. They established the yearly growth rate of these publishers at 12 per cent. This growth rate amounted to 14 per cent annually, according to the sample of 11 publishers among the 31 who participated in the study.
> The following table emphasizes the sale tendency over the six years under review by the Quebec publishers to a growth rate between 12 and 14 per cent annually, up to an estimated level of $16.2 million in 1969.
> For 1969, the total sales of books in the French language by bookstores and other distributors was estimated by Ernst and Ernst at $29 million.
> In 1967, according to a study made by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, total sales for 77 bookstores amounted to only $27.5 million. Foreign publishers tried therefore to benefit from this growth of the Quebec book market. The major foreign publishers in Quebec in 1968 were McGraw-Hill, Holt-Rinehart and Winston, Dent and Sons, Bordas, Encyclopaedia Britannica and Hachette.

Of course, Bordas and Hachette are both French.

In July 1968, Encyclopaedia Britannica, a subsidiary of an American corporation of the same name, purchased the Centre de Psychologie et de Pédagogie, a 139-member cooperative, who, for the most part, were authors of school books.

A very important publisher of school books at the time.

At the time of the Bouchard inquiry, the CPP had almost the monopoly of the school book market in Quebec. At the time of the purchase in July 1968, the CPP published approximately half of the school books in Quebec, with assets over $4 million. Three years later, l'Éducation nouvelle, another major publisher of school books in Quebec, bought back the CPP.

The sale in 1968 of the Centre de psychologie et de pédagogie to American interests alerted the book industry and the public opinion in Quebec.

● (1540)

There was fear that, sooner or later, an important part of the book industry and of educational publishing would fall under foreign control.

In 1969, the Conseil supérieur du livre, the coalition of book professionals in Quebec, exposed the Hachette case. In a White Paper presented to the Minister of Cultural Affairs on April 11, 1969, the Conseil supérieur du livre denounced the fact that Hachette had invaded Quebec's book industry. In 1969, Hachette was present in all sectors of the industry, from publishing to retailing, from distribution to mail-order selling. According to background information given by the Conseil supérieur du livre, Hachette came to Quebec in 1955, but until 1968 its policy did not give rise to any major resistance.

In 1968, Hachette changed its policy. It opened a second bookstore in Montreal, established Les Messageries internationales du livre . . .

to distribute books to bookstores

. . . and broke the contract it had signed in 1965 with a textbook publisher from Quebec to whom it gave technical support for the production of textbooks from the Hachette collection. With the creation of Les Messageries internationales du livre, all the wholesalers and retailers from Quebec had to deal with this distributor for paperback and widely-sold series.

At that time, Hachette controlled a good number of French publishers and, in particular, the first paperback collection.

Quebec's wholesalers were cornered. Hachette was taking a big share of the book distribution business in Quebec.

Under those circumstances, the Conseil supérieur du livre asked the Quebec government, in its White Paper on the Hachette case, to intervene in order to prevent the distribution and, as a consequence, the publishing of French language books in the province of Quebec from falling under foreign control. It also asked the government for some help in order to obtain from Hachette a commitment to respect the existing structures of the book industry in Quebec.

Hachette was not intimidated.

It was obviously a very big business.

In January, 1971, with the help of the Société générale de financement . . .

That is, using Quebec funds . . .

. . . Hachette acquired the Centre éducatif et culturel, the largest publisher of school textbooks in Quebec, for $2 million . . .

It was a lot of money at that time.

. . . Then, in February of 1972, using the name of this company, in which it had a controlling interest of 45 percent, Hachette purchased the Librairie Garneau with its five branches. It was the oldest bookstore in Quebec City.

This, I think, was a psychological shock for Quebecers, including myself, particularly those who were interested like me in the publishing industry. The disappearance of Librairie Garneau, which was located in the heart of Quebec City, across from the Basilique, was a real shock and an outrage for members of the industry.

This operation succeeded thanks to the silence and complicity of the Bourassa Liberal government, which was elected before April 1970. In an editorial published by Le Devoir on January 11, 1972, under the title "Hachette buys out Quebec publishers", Claude Lemelin wrote the following:

Instead of condoning by its silence and complicity the cultural transformation of this industry that Hachette is effecting, the Bourassa government should be doing something about it.

The acquisition of Librairie Garneau by the Centre éducatif et culturel, which was owned by Hachette and the Société générale de financement, gave rise to violent reactions in the book publishing industry, the media and the Quebec public opinion. For professional writers, this transaction marked the beginning of an anti-Hachette campaign. J. Z. Léon Patenaude, Jacques Hébert . . .

. . . who was probably a cousin of mine.

. . . Pierre Tisseyre and Raymond Carignan were the main spokesmen of this campaign of the book lobby against Hachette and the Société générale de financement, which was accused of being the Trojan horse of foreign takeovers.

I have to say that the Anti-GST Coalition reminds a lot of the similar coalition that was formed when Hachette, this huge French multinational, suddenly invaded Quebec City with the clear intention of taking over all major book distributors, publishers and retailers.

There are so many similarities between the two situations. In the Hachette case though, the enemy was from the outside. They were foreigners, they were French, whereas we are dealing now with our own government instead of a foreign one.

With the GST, the Canadian government threatens the whole publishing industry which I have been trying to describe for a few hours. The dangers are at least as great as they were in the Hachette incident.

That is why . . . May I engage on a digression on the Hachette problem? I will even quote from a speech I made when I was president of the Publishers Association of Canada and vice-president of the Conseil supérieur du livre. I made that speech on February 8, 1972 before the Montreal Chamber of Commerce. I have to confess they did not invite me too often since then.

You will see that there is nothing new under the sun and that if problems are not always of the same nature, the book industry is always at risk. In 1972, the danger came from foreigners but this time it is our own government.

Senator Gigantès: They behave like foreigners.

Senator Hébert: The least I can say is they are not familiar with the Canadian situation, the Quebec situation as far as the publishing industry is concerned.

When you pay heed to nobody, you end up being cut off from reality.

Twenty years ago, I never thought the Canadian government would some day jeopardize all we fought for during decades. I will come back later to the interesting book of Ignace Cook which opened many perspectives for us. For now, let me take a few minutes to quote my own speech.

So, I was quite trembling before the Chamber of commerce of Montreal. I was trying to convince them to save the publishing industry from the Hachette threat:

> "An ordinary book business."

I make that quote at the beginning. It had been used on television by the president of the Société générale de financement du Québec. By the way, it is typical of the Quebecers to always complain about the federal government, in some cases, or about France or England or the United States, or whatever, but when we look deeper, we realize that there is always some of our elite trying to help the invaders.

> "An ordinary book business." This is how the director general of the Société générale de financement was referring to bookstores, during a recent televised debate, between himself and—is there a worst choice of an oppronent?—Léon Patenaude, a formidable passionate person.
> God bless his soul!
> The word "business", it is not to you . . .

I was addressing the Chamber of Commerce, of course, I was trying not to offend people's sensibilities. I said:

> It is not to you that I have to say it; as such, it is not offensive. And it is unquestionable that booksellers are business people. But what M. Deschamps . . .

Because it was he who was the director general of the Société générale de financement in those days

> . . . did not seem to understand—and that is extremely serious, considering the key role that he would like to play in the publishing industry—was that bookstores were not only businesses and books were not ordinary products.
> Must I repeat again that bookstores are real cultural centres that exert their influence over a whole neighbourhood, sometimes a whole city.

I know a lot of booksellers, the real driving force in the industry, who were having financial difficulties and pratically lived in their stores, being over worked, their passion for books overrriding everything else. A bookseller used to say:

> Authors write books, publishers publish them, and I sell them. Every day, I find myself at the outpost of the literary world.

Listen to what another bookseller had to say:

> Selling, advising, making suggestions, making a book a must, is the last step before the victory, and the victory is for the reader.

What other merchant can boast of playing such a cultural role? What other business is more essential for the expansion of a nation's culture, or simply of culture itself? We can deplore the fact that Mae Wests and other such pastries now belong to non-Quebec interests . . .

● (1550)

I remind honourable senators that the great confectioner from the Beauce that was Vachon once was the pride of Quebec. The Vachon company sold Mae Wests, a kind of pastries we can still buy here, at the cafeteria on the fifth floor. That company had just been sold to foreign interests, right in front of the smug General Investment Corporation. You know, we can deplore the sale of that company, but it won't kill us. However, the day we lose control over our book business, it will only be a matter of days before our collective identity disintegrates.

> What goes for booksellers goes for publishers, who also run a business. They put some pretty strange products on the market, products made of paper and ink, that would mean nothing without their spiritual content.
> That is probably why publishers make very strange businesspeople, always torn between the needs of the mind and the needs of their business, between this young and talented novelist who needs a break and the bank manager who is not sure whether he should loan money to someone knowingly producing such non profitable items.
> For example: Tomorrow I am publishing a beautiful book by Maurice Champagne, entitled Lettres d'amour. It was indeed a nice book that I brought out the next morning, so I was doing a bit of advertising while I was with these Chamber of Commerce people, who might not have been the greatest readers on earth, so what!
>
> This book deserved careful printing and good quality paper, which are expensive items. I bet on the book success and, if I win, everybody will be pleased, including my bank manager. But, if I lose, I'm not ashamed to admit that I will have no regrets.

As you can see, the publishing industry is different. Books are unique products, even materially.

Facing such a well-informed audience . . .

It was worth then, it is worth even more today, in front of all the assembled senators.

I do not have to insist on the cultural consequences of the book industry. But, you will surely ask, as far as business is concerned, what is the meaning of this industry which suddenly arouses envy amongst Americans and Frenchmen?

Very little, in fact. Total retail sales of French-language books by bookshops amount to about $40 million, split up as follows: (a) for publishers of school books, $15 million; (b) for general literature publishers of Quebec, $2.6 million; (c) for publishers of France, Switzerland and Belgium, $22.4 million. Of that amount, France's share is about $21 million. There is very little left for Belgium and Switzerland.

—or more than half the total sales of the book industry in Quebec. And it was in the hands of France.

This figure is indisputable. Indeed, the official French figure on book exports to Canada, at publishers' prices, totalled $12 million in 1970. Once you have added transportation costs, salaries of intermediaries and retailers' profit margin, you get $21 million.

Before the Quiet Revolution, bookselling in the Province of Quebec had no interest for foreigners.

So, they were not coming, it was not interesting.

School book publishing was entirely in the hands of religious congregations and a very large number of bookshops were coming under procuracies. As for the literary publishing industry, it was as it is today, an eccentricity left to a handful of cranky people willing to die poor.

During the last decade, as the religious congregations were moving out of the book trade, disorder and anarchy were setting up behind them. It was not a climate propitious to attract serious capitalists like MacGraw-Hill or Hachette.

But little by little, our professions organized themselves through the impetus given by men like Tisseyre, Patenaude, Dussault, Hurtubise, Carignan, Sasseville, Martin, D'Anjou, Constantin, Houde, Bode and so many others. Our associations have negociated without a respite with governments which finally, after some arm twisting, took some of the measures we were crying out for. That is how, in May, 1971, the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs decided to recognize the competent book retailers that would be the only ones authorized to sell to communities subsidized by the state. That was a good way to get bookselling profitable at last. One of the conditions of the agreement was that foreign ownership of the bookselling business were not to exceed 50 per cent of the capital stock.

This, of course, was not what the Hachette bookshops wanted.

Unfortunately, it was too timid a step, but in the right direction. In practice, we know very well that a clever shareholder can manage to control a business with only 50 per cent of the shares.

That measure and a few others were nonetheless foretelling that the book market was to get healthier. It was getting almost interesting to be a bookseller, and Quebec publishers were viewing the future with confidence.

This change of climate was very rapidly sensed in New York and Paris, and in a very short time, the giants of the foreign publishing world which had always treated us with the most supreme contempt were swooping down on Quebec, well determined to reap what the Quebec bookselling and publishing hacks had sown.

Thus we were seeing them coming by every plane:

. . . Encyclopaedia Britannica, Bordas, Holt Reinhart and Winston, Hachette, MacGraw-Hill and many more.

Every time we lost a knight or a rook, our associations sounded the alarm and alerted public opinion and governments. The last big blow, i.e. the takeover of the five Garneau bookstores by the Centre éducatif et culturel, a publishing firm practically controled by Hachette, was the straw that broke the camel's back.

I see here a note which might be of interest to experts.

Hachette holds 45 per cent of the shares of the C.E.C. and an option over 5 per cent of the shares held by the founder's widow. The SGF holds the other 50 per cent. Justly, the Conseil supérieur du livre maintains that the SGF can only be a silent partner and that the effective control belongs to the main shareholder which has the expertise and the experience in the trade, i.e. Hachette.

● (1600)

From now on, we will fight, not for the status quo, but to regain the lost ground! Foreign domination in the book business is no longer a vague threat, it is a sad reality that I can describe by quoting a few figures.

In the field of books for elementary and secondary education, foreign companies control more than 40 per cent of the total sales, which amount to $15 million. The group controlled by Hachette accounts for half of the foreign sales.

In the field of distribution to wholesalers, foreign control amounts to almost 65 per cent of about $9 million sales, and a third goes to Hachette.

Foreigners already control 15 per cent of bookstores sales, and Mr. Jean Deschamps,— said publicly that he intended to develop the network of bookstores already controlled by Hachette through CEC.

. . . president of the Société Générale de Financement . . .

As to general publishing, the large foreign publishing companies scornfully leave it to us, because it is not yet profitable. Furthermore, they know full well that by controlling the distribution and the bookstores they will bring the Quebec publishers to their knees. The Quebec publishers have been brought to their knees.

BILL TO AMEND—DEBATE RESUMED

That is a fact. Such a situation is intolerable. But it will surely get worse. I am not making a case against Hachette, but rather honouring its all-consuming dynamism when I say that it will try to dominate the Quebec market like it did in all countries of the world where it spread its tentacles. Hachette is not to blame in trying to dominate, control, prosper. In a capitalistic system, and I am sure the members opposite will understand, these are the principles applied by big trusts. In his speech to stockholders at the Company's last general assembly, the president and chief executive officer of Hachette, Mr. Ithier de Roquemaurel, did not hide his ambitions. He said:

In conformity with our intention to increase our international presence, said he, > said he, we have, among other operations, acquired an interest in the Centre éducatif et culturel de Montréal . . .

—which is the leader among school book publishers in French Canada,

> —in spite of the problems encountered nowadays with cultural investments in Quebec.

I am telling you, who knows how strong Hachette would be in Quebec if our publishers and bookstore owners associations had not reacted.

> On the other hand, one cannot blame France for backing Hachette a hundred per cent and applying incredible pressure on our provincial government. This is a normal course of action for capitalist countries with a colonial past. However, it seems necessary to mention that one of Hachette's most embarrassing characteristics has to do with its close and forever ambiguous relations with governments.

According to L'Expansion, the great French economic review, and I quote—

Senator Corbin: Will you tolerate another question?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Corbin: You know that in Ottawa, we have the National Arts Centre. In the NAC there is a large auditorium for operas, symphonic orchestras and an other auditorium, I think, for theater plays. There are also two other theatres, one of which is used for experimental theatre and things like that. Of course, there are also atriums, rooms for official ceremonies, for example, an official reception was given for Queen Elizabeth II. Well, actually, it was not a reception, after a gala, she walked through people, corridors, atriums, and all that.

But what I am driving at is this: In the large complex formed by the National Centre—and by the word national I mean Canadian—there is, or there used to be, two bookstores. One of them was selling French books, and the other was selling mostly English books, but also videos in the end because that have become popular. I don't know for what reasons, but the later one closed its doors. Just besides the English bookstore, there was a French bookstore. That is, a bookstore where books, encyclopedias and luxury books of art or photography were sold, with a lot of magazines arriving from everywhere in the world, but mostly from France. You could also find there literary critics, poetry magazines, all in all, a sample of everything published in French.

This French bookstore was called Librairie de la capitale. I don't know who were it's owners, but it was closed or sold last spring. I had not been there fore several months, but I went for a visit in September. First of all, I wanted to see if there was still a French bookstore there, and if so, who was the owner. Well, I have been told that Flammarion has taken over our National Arts Center. It is not a Canadian bookstore, it is a branch of Flammarion. And what is Flammarion? A publisher? You know the publishing world much better than I do. For one thing, I don't know how long they will stay in business, because you know the price of a French book, nowadays.

PLus seven per cent, naturally. But of course, Flammarion does not sell only books or magazines from France. They also sell books published in Canada. All this to tell you or to strenghen your argument that efforts are still being made in our country to control book publishing sales. And in this case, in the heart of our capital, of Canada, it is Flmarion, a French company, which did settle in our country.

The same phenomenon is happening elsewhere in the city and in the Ottawa region. Then, are these not obvious and sufficient reasons for the government to ponder the matter? To mainly reflect on the consequences of its tax, of its GST. Where there was no tax before, now French books are going to be taxed, which is going to make their price even more outrageous. I am not against books from France, on the contrary. If it were not for French books, we might not be as advanced culturally and intellectually as we are now. Well, if there is a good author somewhere in the world, we want to read his work, and so on and so forth . . .

But the GST is going to make French books even more expensive and will discourage people from buying them, and I think this is the point you are making today, namely that Canadian books which are already experiencing so many difficulties just to survive will be hit ever harder than French books. What should one conclude, dear colleague? Faced with this situation, would it be better to close down all Canadian bookstores and abandon this field to French and other foreign bookstores? Or should the Government reconsider its GST? Granting that the Government is providing assistance to the book publishing industry through grants, the Canada Arts Council and other agencies perhaps, has the time not come, before the bill is implemented, for the Government to seize this opportunity, before the GST is adopted if that should be the outcome, to reassure Canadian book publishers and bookstores before it is too late.

Senator Hébert: I think that your analysis is perfectly correct. That is why the Quebec Government changed its mind. Its Finance Minister had taken a position similar to Mr. Wilson's, publicly stating his support for the GST at a young liberals convention or meeting.

He had put forward all the arguments used by Mr. Wilson and others, that it is absolutely impossible, for technical reasons, to exempt books and that this would complicate things greatly for all equipment, cash registers, etc. And then suddenly, under the pressure brought to bear by the publishing industry, the Quebec Finance Minister found an apparently simple solution that allows books to be exempt from the Quebec provincial GST.

• (1610)

[Translation]

So, nothing is stopping the federal government from doing the same thing for the entire country. But I don't think it will, at least not willingly. That's why we have to continue trying to convince it.

As for the Flammarion book store . . .

Senator Corbin: Do you think it is right for a French publishing house . . .

Senator Hébert: I'm getting to that . . .

Senator Corbin: . . . to have such a high profile in what has become one of our national institutions, the National Arts Centre?

Senator Hébert: Well, in that instance I don't know the root of the problem. I would certainly be very surprised if the Centre Pompidou in Paris let booksellers from Quebec or anywhere else set up shop there. It is most unusual for a national institution to be shared with foreign investors.

In any case, the fact of the matter is that Flammarion is on the one hand a publishing house, but it is also a major bookseller and has had a bookstore in Montreal for a very long time. However, unlike Hachette, Flammarion never tried to corner the market, to have a foothold in all sectors, as did Hachette with its involvement with schoolbooks, bookstores, distribution of French books, etc.

So obviously, it is unfortunate that a foreign bookseller should have set up shop at the National Arts centre. But you can't compare the threat posed by Hachette with that of Flammarion. I would just like to remind you of the Hachette incident.

I was quoting the economic magazine Expansion, a major French magazine, which deplored Hachette's strong position in textbooks publishing—this was strictly in France, they were complaining about it in their country—its strangehold on the new distributing services for the Parisian press, in other words, those who distribute magazines and newspapers to all the train stations, sales outlets and newsstands. There are also complaints about its near monopoly on distribution of books and newspapers abroad, because Hachette has not set up business only in Quebec, but also in all francophone countries. The name appears everywhere in francophone Africa, in Dakar, Lomé, Kinshasa; Hachette's stranglehold can be seen everywhere in French Africa. It's sort of an international book conglomerate.

> Its control over bookstores in train stations and Métro newsstands, its influence on public opinion through the daily newpapers

. . . because there was also a daily called France-Soir

> . . . none of this would exist without state approval.

Obviously, such a thoroughgoing domination of the media could not have come about without some approval from the state.

> Hachette always had the governement behind it.

It was a French magazine that wrote that.

> (Including during the Nazi occupation from 1940 to 1944).

That didn't bother them at all, they were there to make money and to publish. So obviously, the most widely read authors during the Occupation were not necessarily the strongest advocates for democracy. In any case, Hachette got along well with the Nazis.

> Those in power always co-operated with Hachette, because they knew they could then influence people to adopt their political views. Everyone got something out of it . . .
>
> For instance, Hachette has just entered into sweetheart deal with the ORTF, a French government organization, a deal which has provoked strong reactions in France, especially since two of the prime minister's close colleagues, Mr. Simon Nora and Mr. Gérard Worms, were suddenly made Director General and Assistant Director General of Hachette.
> It was Mr. Nora who signed the Agreement on behalf of Hachette, while Mr. Chaban-Delmas had signed the decree on behalf of the government. On January 24th last, L'Express reiterated the fact that before becoming prime minister, Mr. Chaban-Delmas had negociated the transfer of a tabloid, Samedi soir, to Librairie Hachette. In short, the universe was unfolding as it should.

I sometimes wonder whether the provincial government of Quebec is aware of these things, if is knows that when it has these cordial meetings with the French Government, when it attends fine dinners with Mr. Pompidou (one of Hachette's stable of authors!), and proposes champagne toasts to France-Quebec agreements in the halls of the Élysée Palace, there are always representatives of Hachette hovering about?

Be that as it may, the time has come for the Government of Quebec to stop yeilding to French pressure, to stop allowing the SGF so stray from ist fundamental mission by allowing Hachette and other foreign interests to acquire effective control of business that should obviously be protected because of their special nature, and finally, to take the emergency measures that Quebec publishers and bookstores are urging it to take, with the questionable support of the majority of the population.

No doubt because it has become commonplace to see ultra-secret cabinet documents from one government or another published in the daily paper, public opinion did not react as strongly as it should have when Le Devoir published, last January 21st, the text of three Orders in Council that show how the government backed down.

On March 10th, 1971, a first Order in Council placed a ceiling of 25% on the foreign ownership of Quebec bookstores if they were to be certified by the Government, giving them the right to sell to organizations subsidized by the provincial government. That was positive, but the news was not made public.

Six days later . . .

on March 16th . . .

a new Order in Council raised the ceiling on foreign ownership of our bookstores to 40%. We were on the verge of defeat. Hachette knew that, and at that time, in cooperation with the SGF, they were negociating the acquisition of 45 % of the shares of the CEC.

On April 28th, or shortly after Premier Bourassa's official visit to Mr. Pompidou, the Cabinet passed a third Order in Council reaising the ceiling on foreign ownership to 50 %. France had won and Quebec had lost.

And to cap it all, the Syndicat de l'édition de France (French Publishers' Union) denonced even this regulation . . .

saying that the 50 % limit was still too stringent.

It took the Quebec Government as well as our professional associations to task in a tone that reminded one of the atitude the French used to take in days gone by toward their African colonies that dared to attempt to shake off their yoke.

[Senator Hébert.]

Among other things, the French union accused our Ministry of Cultural Affairs of having placed the production and distribution of books in Quebec into the hands of a small coterie (in the worst sense of the word). And what did the French refer to as a small coterie? The three large associations that represent almost all of the publishers and bookstores in Quebec!

No doubt to add more weight to the pressure exerted by Mr. Pompidou on Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Maurice Schuman, the french Minister of Foreign Affairs, brought the issue up again when he was in Quebec last September. With a rather brutal approach, surprising on the part of a diplomat, the Minister informed the Quebec press that if our publishing policy did not suit France (or Hachette?) the French would not be interested in distributing books published in Quebec in France. If that was not a kind of blackmail, I don't know what else to call it!

But allow me to come back for a moment to the role played by the SGF in the Hachette affair. I'm willing to admit, to be fair, that the law did not forbid them to act as they did. Some crimes are legal but remain crimes nevertheless. Like the Conseil supérieur du livre, we should at least say how unacceptable it is that «for the sole purpose of earning money—that is not my expression but the one used by the Director General of the SGF on television!—a corporation set up by the Quebec government with taxpayers' money, should intervene to sell out Quebec interests in favour of a French conglomerate, even so skillfull and competent a trust as the Librairie Hachette.»

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, I feel I must put in a word here. You have just referred to crimes that are legal but are crimes nevertheless. I must say I lost you there.

Well, now I really can't follow you. How, on the one hand, can you say that a crime is legal and how, on the other, can you say even if it is legal, even if it is allowed, it is done, even if it is forbidden, it is done.

I don't understand that kind of talk. If it's forbidden, it's not allowed. If it's forbidden and it's done, it's a crime. When does a crime stop being a crime? So I ask you before going any further in your recitation of the Hachette case to explain exactly what you mean by that. It seems contradictory.

Senator Hébert: It's easy to understand. The example we all have in mind is the GST. If the GST, especially applying to books, were to become law, God forbid, it's far from being done, but if ever, hypothetically speaking, the GST were to be enacted, I think that it could be said without exaggeration that the GST on books would be a crime, at least morally speaking. It's an attack whose impact in the area of culture is incalculable. That wouldn't prevent the GST from being legal, if ever it passed, but it would still be a crime, morally speaking. That's what I meant when I used that expression in this case.

Senator Corbin: Now, what you've just spoken about, can this be done in other areas? You're saying that the government is perhaps acting legally but is committing an immoral act.

I have in my hands a book entitled "The Eloquence of Winston Churchill". I've had this book for a long time. I've never read it through, but I thought of taking if off the shelf in my library on the weekend for relaxation. On page 37, I found this excerpt from a speech given by Sir Winston Churchill in the House of Commons at Westminster on April 6, 1936. That's quite a while ago; 1936, that wasn't quite 12 years after I was born.

The editor of this book on the eloquence of Winston Churchill entitles a paragraph from which this excerpt from one of his speeches is drawn, and I quote:

> "Le roi ne peut faire le mal. Le roi ne peut faire le mal."

And he then quotes Sir Winston:

> "Selon une vieille doctrine constitutionnelle, le roi ne peut faire le mal et si le roi commet ce qui peut passer pour être un crime, ce sont ses mauvais conseillers qui en portent l'odieux. Mais appliquer cette doctrine au chef controversé d'un parti politique, voilà qui serait une extension indue de ce principe."

Maybe that's what you meant when you said that something done legally can still be a crime. The king can do no wrong, but his advisers, that is, the government of the day, may, through its policies and under the cover of sovereignty, Her Majesty in right, the Sovereign of Canada and her other domains, the government may commit acts which, it might be said, are "illegal". That's the word, a strong one, that you used before. It may perpetrate or commit acts and do things that seem immoral. You told us a moment ago that imposing a tax on books has a an immoral stench about it. But to get back to Sir Winston Churchill, the king can do no wrong. Perhaps that's what you meant when you said a moment ago that crimes can be committed which are legal. I'd like to hear what you have to say about that.

Senator Hébert: It is quite clear that . . .

● (1620)

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Before you deal with the question as put to you by Senator Corbin, Senator Hébert, may I put it to you in a slightly different way?

In the time of King Charles II a wag is said to have written on the King's bedchamber door, "Here lies our sovereign lord the King. He ever said a foolish thing and never did a wise one." The King commented, "Well, that is easy to explain: My words are my own and my deeds are the deeds of my ministers."

I wonder if that does not sum up neatly the situation to which Senator Corbin refers. Is it not the case that, in this instance, the Queen, by whose consent this bill will become an Act of Parliament—if, indeed, that happens—will have done no wrong, but her advisors will have done a very bad deed? Is that not the situation?

Senator Corbin: On a point of order, is Senator Stewart extending that affirmation to the appointment of eight additional senators to the Senate of Canada? Her Majesty did no wrong but, on the other hand, the matter is before the courts; so that raises a question, does it not?

Senator Stewart: Yes, I think it is pretty clear that the doctrine that the sovereign can do no wrong would apply in the instance to which you refer as well as to the imposition of taxes on books.

Senator Gigantès: I think an extension of that is the doctrine of estoppel which Senator Beaudoin, I am sure, could discuss learnedly. That was established under the reign of Kind Edward III of England who had a great chancellor, whose name escapes me, the man responsible for the beginnings of the edification of the great jurisprudence that is common law. The doctrine of estoppel says that no mistake by a servant of the sovereign can be used against the sovereign. In other words, if, for instance, a tax official, mistakenly but in good faith, tells you that you do not owe tax, and you do not pay that tax, the sovereign is not bound by the errors of his or her servants.

In this particular case, after six years of Conservative government, I would suggest that, for all monarchists, this is a wonderful doctrine here in Canada because, if the Queen were to be held responsible for the acts of the Mulroney administration, there would not be a monarchist left in the land.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: Having witnessed this pyrotechnical display of erudition from my three learned colleagues, I do not know which way to turn to get out of this. Perhaps I should pray to Talleyrand, the minister, who one day said to Napoleon: "Sire, what you are about to do is worse than a crime, it is a mistake." So that is what the government is doing with the GST: "Worst than a crime, it is a mistake".

I see a senator laughing. I can assure that if the writers of Quebec were to hear you laughing, they would remember your name for a long time because they are not in a mood for laughter at all. If you had met Gratien Gélinas last week, you would know what I mean. Well, yes! I am not the one who provoked him. He started laughing because we were saying that the GST is morally a crime.

It is not the Société générale de financement's mission to introduce into an industry, a business entirely controlled by Quebeckers, a foreign interest so powerful in its own country that it periodically inspires press campaigns to prevent it from increasing its power any further.

> Nor is it the role of the Société générale de financement to become the silent partner of foreign interests that do not even have the merit of setting up a new publishing business or opening bookstores, but infiltrate existing concerns, choosing the most prosperous. The $2.3 million cash paid by the Société générale de financement for its share of equity in the Centre éducatif et culturel will not create one single new job. In fact, many employees of the Centre éducatif et culturel have been laid off and it would seem logical that some of them will be replaced by Hachette's men from France.

But let us leave the painful Société générale de financement to its own devices and get back to the crux: the invasion of the book trade in Quebec.

Because it is the most ambitious, the most sly and the most brutal of the invaders, Hachette deserves our attention more than the others. So let us look at the immediate and future consequences of this company's policies in Quebec.

First of all, Hachette was the catalyst of the foreign takeover, of the French publishers who, in France, refused to kow-tow to this conglomerate. They thought it was indispensable to set up in Quebec to distribute their own books, as Hachette ws invading the market and was going to impose preferential treatment for the stock of books it controls.

Since Hachette's decision to charge into Quebec, two big publishers, Bordas and Gallimard, have set up here, not to mention distribution concerns such as Somabec, Socadis and so forth.

Those who do not come over will, sooner or later, have to fall into Hachette's clutches for distribution in Quebec.

As for Quebec publishers, they will also be forced to hand over their distribution to Hachette if they do not want to disappear.

● (1630)

This may seem unthinkable to the layman. The mechanism is easily demonstrable and I am sure that none of you will be surprised. In any case, the move is on because Éditions du journal La Presse have just handed the distribution of their works over to Hachette, even though there are many exclient Quebec distribution services; these, however, were less powerful and did not have Hachette's prestige.

You know just as well as I do that when you control a good share of whatever is sold in a store, you can demand better shelf space from the retailer. Hachette admits to already controlling 22% of all French books sold in Quebec and, thanks to the Centre éducatif et culturel it is now the publisher of 20% of Quebec's schoolbooks. Besides that, Hachette is the exclusive distributor of the Livre de poche and is now the exclusive distributor of Éditions de La Presse, who are about to launch some 60 new titles in 1972. Can there by any doubt that Hachette will instruct its vendors and representatives to demand everywhere that the books it is distributing occupy the very best of shelf space, that is, the window displays in the bookstores and countertops elsewhere?

No retailer will be able to refuse this preponderance to the books distributed by Hachette when Hachette becomes the most powerful distributor.

In the area of magazines, whose sales are short-lived—but for many books the sale is short-lived also—this policy is so prevalent that Ontario did not hesitate, in view of the recommendation from the royal commission, to legislate to prevent Canadian distribution agencies for magazines and pocketbooks from being controlled by foreign interests.

The Ontario legislators were in fact convinced that if Canadian distributors were to become the property of the Americans, all that would be found on shelves and countertops would be magazines such as Time, Life or Playboy while Maclean's, Chatelaine and the other Canadian magazines would no longer by displayed. For books, it is less obvious, but the tactic is the same. If, out of curiosity, you walked around railway stations in France, you would see that a considerable number of books published by the Hachette group are on display in the station bookshops. You would really have to search for a comparable choice of books by other publishers. The reason for that is simple: Train station bookshops in France are owned by Hachette. Thus, travellers who have several hours to spend on a train and who want to buy a book are offered mainly books published by the Hachette group. Of course, this means higher revenues for Hachette than if the book had been published by another firm.

Quebec publishers will thus be caught between a rock and a hard place: Either they can refuse to be distributed by Hachette and their books will disappear from shop windows, or they will agree, but will have to settle for the few crumbs that Hachette is willing to throw their way.

Like all publishers, I have not forgotten the sale of the Pony bookshop that used to be located in the heart of French-speaking Montreal. It was sold to Hachette in early 1959 and, overnight, Quebec books disappeared from the windows and shelves of this old bookshop that many of you probably once shopped in. Quebec books were removed from the windows and shelves and confined to the darkest corners. Of course, Hachette refused its services out of hand and it had to be begged to accept the odd copy of our best books.

Since Hachette cherishes great ambitions in Quebec, and particlarly since the Conseil supérieur du livre devoted a white paper to it, the Hachette bookshop on St. Catherine Street has slowly begun to sell Quebec books.

On October 28, 1968, it condescended to order a copy of the Quebec book catalogue for the first time. What will happen if Hachette ends up controlling the distribution of books in Quebec in the same way it does French railway stations?

In certain circles—outside this profession, I should point out—it is said that if we accept Hachette in Quebec, Hachette will impose Quebec books on the huge market in France and the rest of the French-speaking world already under its control. Pardon me if I laugh, along with other publishers here today who have not forgotten our first similar adventure with Hachette exactly 12 years ago. We really must tell you about it because it is quite funny!

After intense negotiations, the Association des éditeurs canadiens signed an agreement with Hachette in Paris on December 7, 1959 for the distribution of our books in France.

(The dates are important here.)

As I recall, the champagne was flowing. The agreement provided for a discount of 50%, an absolute right to return unsold books, and return transport and taxes to be paid by the Quebec publisher.

Thus far Hachette was not exactly risking its shirt! In order to reduce the risk even further, it only accepted 15 Quebec titles in all.

Fifteen of the best titles.

The number of copies varied from 100 to 250, depending on the title. That is how on December 22, 1959, for the first time in history, 3,690 Quebec books left for France.

After that, a long silence descended on this first France-Quebec agreement. Finally, on December 7, 1963, four years later, we received a final report on the operation.

Throughout France and the rest of the French-speaking world, Hachette had managed to sell exactly 523 Quebec books. We received a cheque for $606.79 to be divided among all participating publishers, and that was before deducting shipping costs of $222.51. Some publishers had their unsold books returned to them at their expenses. In order to get them back, we had to pay the shipping.

Gaston Miron had the surprise of seeing that Hachette had not even opened boxes containing works from L'Hexagone, although these boxes had spent four years in France. At the time, Gaston Miron was the director of L'Hexagone. He is the one who told us about this. His boxes of books left for France at his publishing house's expense, spent four years in a Hachette warehouse, and came back at his expense four years later without having been opened.

Finally, Hachette notified our association that we had to assume the cost of bringing back 2,364 unsold books that they wanted to return to us.

● (1640)

[Translation]

In a magnanimous gesture, such as are sometimes made by beggars who are exasperated, we decided that these damn books would end their days in France no matter what: we donated them all to the Quebec delegation in Paris!

It is a fact that we still have a few books to offer France and the rest of the French speaking world, but in the past 10 years, and particularly in the past five years, many Quebec authors have demonstrated that they are at least equal to good contemporary French authors. With or without Hachette, they will be not received any better in Paris than Belgian or francophone Swiss authors. The French are loath to buy books published in French outside of France. That's a statement of fact.

On July 23 of this year, Le Figaro published a major survey on the problems of Swiss authors and publishers vis-à-vis France, despite the proximity of these two countries.

The Swiss are right next door, they don't have an ocean separating them from this market!

You only needed to replace the words "Suisse" and "romand" by the words "Québec" and "québécois", and that article could have applied in its entirety to our own situation.

Let us listen to what they have to say. I'm quoting the article that was published in Le Figaro regarding the problems of Swiss publishers. Quebec's situation is no different.

Francophone Swiss writers have always experienced a legitimate feeling of frustration . . .

I think that that could be said of Quebec writers.

One has to either become a Parisian like Jean-Jacques Rousseau or Benjamin Constant or, if one intends to stay Swiss, resign oneself to not crosing the French border . . . The literary books displayed in bookshop windows in Lausanne, Neuchâtel and Geneva are mostly foreign, and mostly French.

Swiss novelists hardly get the same treatment. They have little access to Parisian publishers and the patronage of a Swiss publisher far from guarantees open doors to the French market. It is easy to understand the bitterness of Vaudois ou Valaisan writers upon seeing that translations of works from German-speaking Switzerland have a better chance of penetrating the Paris market than their own books. They are also correct in saying that they are not on an even playing field with French authors, who benefit from powerful distribution networks in Switzerland while they have to fight tooth and nail in Paris.

You will have noticed that one simply needs to replace the word "Switzerland with "Quebec" for this article to describe exactly our situation in France.

I do not claim that the French market is forever closed to us. Our publishing association was successful in making a small breakthrough four years ago by establishing a distribution centre for our books in Paris, thanks to the cooperation of the L'École bookstores. We have another one in Brussels that is developing much faster than the one in Paris. I'm simply saying that Hacette is not the solution and that we must continue to look to joint publishing and joint distribution with friendly French publishers who are independent of Hachette.

The arrival of foreign publishers in general and of Hachette in particular will not be anymore beneficial for textbook publishers than it is for literary publishers. They will be placed in an impossible competitive position, since the major foreign publishers can use documents, illustrations and films whose cost was amortized in previous use.

Where were the major American and especially, French publishers 15 years ago, when we needed at least their technical assistance? They were very far from Quebec, a market that did not interest them because it was controlled by the church. Now that everything is changed, now that we have technicians and authors, now that we have hard workers such as Georges Nadeau, the founder of the CEC, who have successfully built up modern and often flourishing textbook publishing house, these foreigners come here, settle in and grab our most prosperous enterprises. Economically speaking, it's galling enough, but culturally speaking, it's absolutely intolerable.

At a time when Quebeckers are more concerned than ever with their collective dignity, will they accept the humiliation of letting Paris or New York decide what books will be used by Quebec students and what authors they should read? Never! The word should be spread abroad, as well as in certain government circles in Quebec itself.

We don't want American textbooks nor French textbooks for our school children and students; we want Quebec textbooks. That answers the question asked earlier by Senator Gigantès.

For subjects on which it is not yet economically possible for us to produce textbooks, Quebec publishers are perfectly capable of deciding for themselves which foreign textbooks they want to adapt to our needs until such time as our own textbooks can be published.

Some well intentioned people have tried to reassure the population by stating that the arrival of large foreign firms will stimulate competition and make book prices drop. That is a delusion, unfortunately. All the experts will tell you that Hachette's bursting into our market will most certainly result in a 20 percent increase in the cost of French books sold here.

Allow me to remind you of a minor "Hachette incident" that is still fresh in minds of our booksellers.

In 1968, Hachette established a distribution service in Quebec, called Les messageries internationales du livre, to distribute certain books published by Hachette, as well as their paperbacks, for which it was the sole distributor. Since the publishing house had its own outlet here, everyone thought that the price of paperbacks would finally go down. What happened instead was that their price suddenly went from 90 cents to $1.10.

Although that is a far cry from the prices we see today, it gives you some idea of the change that took place:

the jump meant an increase of more than 20 per cent. It took all the combined energies of the bookstore keepers and the the Conseil supérieur du livre to persuade Hachette's chief executive officer to bring the price of pocket books back into line with what they were before the publisher's arrival in Quebec.

Since I am speaking to businessmen . . .

I went before the Chamber of Commerce to explain all of this . . .

[Senator Hébert.]

it is impossible to raise arguments that one hesitates to submit to public opinion in general, because the ordinary man-in-the-street sometimes finds it difficult to believe that some accusations are well-founded.

To convince you that the selection of books available in Quebec will be limited if we allow Hachette to control the market, it should be enough to point out that when books published by a firm belonging to Hachette are sold to Quebec consumers, Hachette makes a three-tiered profit: as publisher, as distributor, and as bookseller if the works in question are sold by bookstores under its control.

When books by other companies are sold through the Hachette distribution network, Hachette makes no profit as a publisher. Consequently, it is clear that Librairie Hachette will be putting more effort into marketing the books put out by its own group of publishing firms.

For this publishing giant, a book is a product and must make money. It will seek to identify the most profitable products, and if there is more to be made from the sale of ballpoint pens and games from the sale of such and such a book, it will sell ballpoint pens and games. It has the right to do so. But the possible development of a book distribution monopoly with profit as its only objective would mean that the cultural interests of Quebec would be very poorly served indeed.

That is in fact the way Hachette runs its operations in France, a modus operandi which has stirred up the hostility of the other publishing firms and led them to make concerted efforts to set up their own distribution channels for their books abroad. The reason Gallimard, the biggest publisher of literary works in France, severed its ties with Hachette was that it was not satisfied with Hachette's distribution methods.

A bookstore, be it large or small, cannot stock all available works. In Canadian books alone, there are more than 8,000 titles available from publishers.

That was some time ago: today there are many more.

As for French books, there are some 150,000 titles. Now, consider that Quebec's best-stocked bookstore is proud, and quite rightly so, to stock 30,000 titles, and that that is less than 20 per cent of all available books. If Hachette manages to establish itself as the dominant distributor, it will be able to force its clients to favour its own works over that of other publishers, and the most directly affected will be Quebec publishing firms. Thus, I think it is safe to say that Hachette's domination of the Canadian market would not result in an increase in the number of titles made available to the reading public, but rather in a change in the available selection, a change which would be tantamount to a kind of censorship, because books that are not available when one wants to buy them are very often never bought at all. Only librarians have the patience to wait several months to receive a book they have ordered.

The average customer who goes into a bookstore because he has just read an article about a book and wants to read it, will, nine times out of ten, not follow up on it if it turns out that the book is not available in Quebec.

This insidious form of censorship is all the more disturbing when one is aware of the close links between Hachette and the French government of the day, and that included the Nazis in their day. The freedom to write, to publish, to distribute and to read whatever books one chooses to is too precious a right to give up one iota of it to foreigner. Furthermore, Quebec's publishers and booksellers have always been very much in favour of having books from France, Belgium, Switzerland and elsewhere circulate freely, and have practiced what they preached. We have never advocated protectionist measures that would have hampered that free flow of books and increased the price of books published in French.

In the current debate on whether the GST should apply to books, this attitude is apparent in the fact, which you may or may not have noted, that the group made up of publishers, booksellers, authors, and librarians, etc., have never asked that only books published by Quebeckers be exempted from the GST.

They have always asked that all books be exempted. Had they wanted to, Quebec publishers in particular would have had a perfect opportunity to say: "Well, of course, we want our books exempted from the GST, but don't exempt the books that come from our big competititors in France, Switzerland, Belgium or elsewhere, and for the rest of Canada, from the States or Great Britain." Rather, the common front is asking that all books be exempted from the GST, not only those that are published here.

That has always been the attitude in those circles. We have never advocated protectionist measures that would have hampered the free circulation of books, and hence of ideas, and increased the cost of books published in French, even elsewhere. If the GST were to apply to books in French, you can be sure that those books would be terribly expensive.

I bought a book yesterday. I could not get over it. It was the French version, published in France, of Gabriel Garcia Marques' most recent work, "The General in his Labyrinth". It cost 30 dollars, even though it is not a particularly big book; it is in fact relatively short. If the GST were added on, it would cost much more. By comparison, books published in Quebec would be less expensive. But we don't want that kind of protectionism.

For instance, I wonder if our French friends know how easy it would have been to demand that the federal government impose a duty on imported French-language books, as it does for English-language books?

We tend to forget that French-language books can come into Canada duty-free whereas English-language books are dutiable.

This apparent «favour» on the part of legislators is due to the fact that for these purposes French was considered a foreign language, and, out of consideration for its cultural minorities, Canada does not impose a duty on "foreign-language" books. When the decision was made, the legislators considered French a foreign language. We never complained about that. We could have said: Why are French-language books imported from France not dutiable, as are books imported from the United States or Great Britain? We never complained, and even accepted this anomly of having French considered a foreign language.

Senator Fernand Leblanc: Has this been going on for a long time?

Senator Hébert: I think it is still going on. We did not want to complain because we did not want to impede the free circulation of French-language books. If we had asked the federal government to impose a duty on books from France at that time, they would have become even more expensive than they were already.

On the contrary, Quebec publishers and book sellers will continue to accept this curious «favour», which consists in having French considered a foreign language, and if they are currently taking a stand against foreigners taking control of the book trade, it is, among other things, to avoid a decrease in the number of foreign books available, and to prevent an increase in their prices. On the other hand, did you know that the books from Quebec that manage to get into France, and they are few and far between, are subject to an import duty of seven and a half percent, the value-added tax? They have this tax in France, which was at 7½% some time ago. I don't know what it is today. I mentioned the figure in another speech I made before the Senate. However, what I do remember is that France is one of the countries in which a much lower tax rate is applied to books than to other products generally, and to certain luxury goods.

That being said, neither publishers nor book sellers want to see the fraternal relations that should exist between France and Quebec marred by this unfortunate Hachette affair. We intend to pursue our mission as publishers and distributers of the works of authors who write in French, be they from here or elsewhere. All we want, for reasons that are known to you, is that Quebeckers keep control of the book trade.

We should not wait, as did our fellow countrymen from English Camada, for almost all of our publishing and distribution companies to have been taken over by foreign interests before legislating. To correct the situation, the Royal Commission that is at this time studying the problem involving English-language books will probably have to recommend radical measures to the Ontario Government. It has in fact done this, as I mentioned earlier.

In the closely related fields of radio and television, federal authorities did not hesitate to impose a 20% limit on foreign ownership of businesses' share capital. Within two years, radio, television and cable companies, many of which had been controlled by American or British interests, were 80% Canadian-owned.

This was due to the 20% limit on foreign ownership, before which American and British business interests were quickly snapping up the very lucrative cable distribution companies.

Neither Mr. Nixon nor Mr. Heath resorted to undue pressure to prevent the Canadian governement from adopting this necessary measure. Mr. Pompidou will also have to accept that we intend to pass similar legislation, for the same reasons, in the publishing field.

We are asking the Quebec government to impose a 20% limit on foreign ownership of publishing firms that produce literary works, and textbooks to be used in grade schools and high schools, and that the same measure apply to distribution companies and bookstores.

To obtain this legislation that is essential to their survival, publishers and booksellers, energetically supported by librarians, authors, unionized printshop workers, French teachers and many others, are gearing up for a battle royal.

It is comparable to the coalition against having the GST applied to books. It is made up of the same people, the same groups, the same union workers, authors, French teachers, etc.

Not since 1860, when the Capricieuse made its famous voyage to bring the first French-language books Quebec had seen since the Battle of the Plains of Abraham, have the books been the subject of such unanimity, such a collective will as that being expressed day after day in editorials, open letters, petitions and resolutions addressed to government. I took the trouble to tell this story because I find it very relevant to what is happening at this time, and the coalition of interests that took a stand then is the same as we see now. I think the fierce determination of the anti-GST coalition made the Quebec government back down and that the federal government is going to have to do the same sooner or later.

It is only a matter of time.

You can be absolutely sure of one thing: we are not going to give up!

That is exactly what Mr. Foulon, the president of the coalition, said last week and two weeks ago when he came here to meet with us.

The reason I am deeply committed to this struggle is not primarily to defend the legitimate economic interests of Quebeckers, but rather because I feel that if we lose this fight, the cultural future of Quebeckers as a whole will be jeopardized forevermore.

We won the previous battle and I do not think that the current coalition is going to lose this one.

[Senator Hébert.]

In conclusion, I would like to submit a short but urgent request to our New Minister of Cultural Affairs. The portfolio changes hands every year; at the time, the Minister of Cultural Affairs was Mrs. Claire Kirkland-Casgrain, who had just been appointed, on February 2nd, 1972. Moved by inspiration, I said to her:

"Madam, although quite recently appointed to your new duties, you are already being given the opportunity of taking a step that will eary you the gratitude of future generations."

I could adapt the message for Minister Wilson and say to him: "Sir, perhaps you have been in the same portfolio for too long, but you are finally given the opportunity of taking a step that will earn you the gratitude of future generations.

Act quickly and you will earn everyone's admiration!

I am asking you to exempt books from the GST.

• (1700)

[Translation]

If only you were still with us, Madam!

I should say that at this point the entire Montreal Chamber of Commerce burst into applause. They would, of course, have applauded for Mr. Wilson just as warmly, on behalf of all Quebeckers. That is the end of that aside.

Let me get back to the history of publishing in Quebec from 1960 to 1977, which basically sheds a great deal of light on the precariousness of the book publishing industry in Quebec and on its vulnerability to the threat of the GST.

The Conseil supérieur du livre—this was at the time of the Hachette affair and I added quite a bit to what this author had to say to you—will once again urge the government to intervene, but this time, if the Quebec Government does not intervene, says Pierre Tisseyre, chairman of the Conseil supérieur du livre, we will have no option but to turn to the federal government.

We never thought we would see the opposite situation today. It is the federal government that is deaf to our pleas. It is the provincial government that finally opened up its heart and mind to the pleas from the industry. In January 1972, then, the Conseil supérieur du livre sent a document entitled "Requête présentée au ministre des Affaires culturelles" (request submitted to the Minister of Cultural Affairs) to the new Minister of Cultural Affairs, François Cloutier—one of several ministers we had during that period—in which it recommended that the Quebec government place a ceiling on foreign ownership of publishing firms that produced literary works and school texts, as well as of distribution companies and bookstores.

In its text the Conseil supérieur du livre also provided figures illustrating the extent of foreign ownership of the book trade in 1972. The percentage of foreign control over publishing and distribution are estimated to be as follows. These are figures I have already quoted to you before in my speech. I will spare you the repetition.

The Conseil supérieur du livre received support on every hand in its struggle to protect Quebec interests in all of these book-related fields. In a telegram addressed to Premier Robert Bourassa—that was Robert Bourassa in his first incarnation—the Société des auteurs et des compositeurs (Association of Authors and Composers) blamed the Quebec government for having allowed the French firm Hachette to penetrate the Quebec book market to such an extent. And the association added:

> In the face of this foreign infiltration, we invite Quebec public opinion to rise up against its leaders, and to express its indignation at this dispossession which is being tolerated and negotiated by its government. We thought, concluded the Société des auteurs, that we had seen the last of colonialism, at least in the cultural domain. Economic considerations alone are of very little import when measured against the will of a people to protect and express its identity.

Both Le Devoir and le Soleil took a stand on the Hachette affair. Claude Lemelin, of Le Devoir, wrote an editorial supporting the positions defended by the Conseil supérieur de livre on the substance of the issue, i.e. the 20% limit to be imposed on foreign ownership of publishing firms, distribution companies, and bookstores, as well as the gradual withdrawal of foreign businesses that were well established in this sector of the Quebec economy, the most notable being Librairie Hachette.

Claude Lemelin saw no reason to seek the collaboration of foreign businesses in that sector of the Quebec economy where the capital needed to restructure and finance growth of the Quebec book trade was to be found in quite sufficient amounts.

Finally, according to Lemelin, it was incumbent upon the Bourassa government to maintain an independent, domestically-owned book distribution system in order that publishers, and Quebec publishers first and foremost, might have access to it. Ivanohé Beaulieu, of Le Soleil, spoke out on the Hachette affair by preparing a background article. According to Beaulieu, no industry so insignificant from the economic point of view had ever raised such a hue and cry in Quebec.

But, said the Le Soleil reporter, when you talk about books you cannot expect to tell the whole truth by quoting percentages and financial statements. In Quebec, you must look beyond these figures to see that the debate is driven by emotion, by such things as nationalism, culture, heritage, etc. Like any society that feels threatened, Quebec will react very strongly if it feels that any part of its collective life is in jeopardy.

In Quebec, foreign invasion, be it by Europe or the United States, will always be considered a legitimate hobby-horse. Beaulieu felt that the accusation that Hachette wanted to take over the Quebec book trade was justified by the remarks made in May, 1971, by Mr. Ethier de Roquemaurelle, whom I spoke of a bit earlier, at the shareholders' general meeting. And in his article he brings in the quote I gave you a bit earlier:

In light of the fact that in Quebec Quebec publishers and all professionals must maintain their fair share of decision-making power, Beaulieu and Lemelin both blame the government for its attitude in the Hachette affair. In his analysis of the interests involved in the battle opposing the Conseil supérieur du livre and, more particularly, the pressure group representing the Société des éditeurs de manuels scolaires (Textbook Publishers' Association), to Hachette's majority shareholders, the journalist from Le Soleil concludes that the threat referred to by the publishers of school books is to a certain extent of a commercial nature. This may at bottom be a trade war rather than a fight to the finish to protect our culture, as some would have us believe. So the journalist harbours certain doubts. Textbook publishers always react very badly to the arrival of foreign publishers in their sector of the publishing business which they consider to be a very lucrative one overall. A study carried out in 1969 by Ernst and Ernst throws some light on the real concerns of textbook publishers. As a solution to the gradual decline and inevitable disappearance of bookstores—that was the situation at the time—several textbooks publishers and a few publishers of general works felt that the Government of Quebec should set up a program to assist bookstores by providing them with subsidies, for though they might not be economically viable they continued to have a cultural raison d'être.

> The proposed solution did not change any of the gives in the book trade. The scales might have been tipped by the arrival of Hachette in the textbook publishing milieu with the opening of the Centre éducatif et culturel. (Cultural and Educational Centre).

> On May 3, 1971, the then Minister of Cultural Affairs,

I have to name him because there was a new one every year, François Cloutier, a psychologist, > announced the Bourassa government's comprehensive policy on books. Three days later, Le Devoir published an editorial entitled: Une politique québécoise du livre (Quebec's Policy on Books). The editorial was signed by Claude Ryan.

He also wrote this book. In the editorial, he wrote:

> "Of all the areas for which reforms have been considered in the past few years, none has seen as much discussion and as little effective action as the publishing field. The Quebec government has finally published its policy on the issue, a policy that was eight years in the making. The enormous advantages it will have for Quebec's society as a whole certainly outweigh the few disadvantages it will bring to those who had developed bad habits." We were aware of all the ins and outs of the problem since the publication of the Bouchard report. It is, then, in the Bouchard report, which had been collecting dust since 1963 at the Ministry of Cultural Affairs, that François Cloutier found the ingredients that went into his policy on book publishing. The policy was approved by the Bourassa Cabinet, which passed three orders in council on

2 February 1992, at the urging of a new Minister of Cultural Affairs, Mrs. Claire Kirkland-Casgrain.

Senator Castonguay was a minister in that cabinet, by the way. I don't know what his position was with regard to books in those days, but we know what his position is today. He is against them.

> Two orders in council, numbers 353 and 354, were signed concerning the institutions to be subsidized: school boards, libraries and bookstores. They force all institutions subsidized by the Government of Quebec to purchase their books, be they published by Quebec firms or foreign ones, from approved bookstores . . .

Today they call them certified bookstores.

> At least 50 per cent of the share capital of these approved bookstores had to belong to Quebeckers. These two orders in council, which also contained provisions concerning a price and rebate mechanism and the regionalization of purchases, came into effect on February 26, 1972.
> The third order in council, number 352, concerns assistance to publishers. For a publishing firm to be subsidized, at least 50 per cent of its share had to belong to Quebeckers. That regulation came into effect on February 19, 1972.

Senator Corbin: They had to belong to Quebeckers, not Canadians, but Quebeckers.

Senator Hébert: Yes, Quebeckers, yes. I think they could have belonged to other Canadians as well. I think they simply wanted to exclude foreign ownership.

> The Bourassa government, by passing the three regulations on the publishing industry that set a 50% ceiling on foreign ownership of share capital in these firms, showed scant regard for the representations made to it by the Conseil supérieur du livre and by many other cultural groups on the issue of foreign ownership.
> Just as the government's lack of action in the cultural field was incomprehensible in the days of the Quiet Revolution, the measures taken by the first Bourassa government at the time threatened to provoke some very ominous backsliding.
> It has become a commonplace in Quebec to refer to the cultural colonialism of Hachette—Hachette is in a way the symbol of cultural imperialism in Quebec—but the Bourassa government is the one that instigated this by its silence and its complicity. The Bourassa government's record is no better than that of the governments of Jean Lesage or of Daniel Johnson and Jean-Jacques Bertrand: it does not consider books to be an essential means of expression of Quebec culture.

Even among Liberals, you can find conservatives: people for whom books are considered an industrial product of little importance—and the grotesque orders in council defining the policy on book publishing prove it.

[Senator Hébert.]

Senator Corbin: Could we also say that there are liberals among the Conservatives?

• (1710)

Senator Hébert: There are some too, but they did not express themselves with much courage during the last vote on the amendments, as we could see. If there are Liberals amongst them, people who have some liberalism left in the bottom of their hearts, it didn't show during the 10 votes on the amendments.

> On March 10, 1971, foreign participation was limited to 25 per cent in an order. Six months later, a new order brings this level to 40 per cent and at that time, Hachette became the owner of 45 per cent of the shares of the Centre éducatif et culturel. But according to the last order, it couldn't be approved by the Department. Finally, shortly after Premier Bourassa's official visit to Paris . . .

where champagne was served in abundance . . .

> the Cabinet voted a third order bringing foreign participation up to 50 per cent, which was more acceptable for the French.

In Le Soleil, Invanhoe Beaulieu summarized this imbroglio in these words:

> In less than two months, Quebec book professionals have lost the guarantees they had been promised during the last few years. The door was opened for the arrival of foreign capital. Between the James Bay project, where French investors provide funds, and the Quebec book industry, the Bourassa government chose the James Bay project.
> The period from 1967 to 1972 was also the beginning of the conquest, the occupation.

The Quebec cultural landscape had been left vacant by the cultural inaction of the Quebec government and, as I said earlier, Canada Council's initiative was extremely beneficial for Quebec and I wonder if the book industry in particular would be where it is now without the intelligence, efficient, generous contribution of the Canada Council. And this compensated for the carelessness shown by the various ministries for cultural affairs which followed one another in Quebec under one government or another, under Bourassa's Liberals or under Johnson and Bertrand's Conservatives.

> Instituted by the Parliament of Canada in 1957 following the work and recommendations of the Massey Commission, which is rather called the Commission Massey-Lévesque in Quebec, because of Révérend Père Lévesque who was the co-chairman, Canada Council's mandate was to encourage intellectual creation and activity. It was designed after some large American foundations—the author should maybe also mention after a British Council of the Arts which was also taken as a model—> and with typically Canadian characteristics. This agency was created by the Secretary of State only four years before the Quebec Ministry for Cultural Affairs.

> At first, Canada Council resources were limited, since they only had a total of 2.7 millions dollars. These resources would remain limited up to 1965. During that time, the average operating budget was around 3 to 4 million dollars for the whole country.
> In that first phase of its existence, the federal competitor

—this, according to Guy Frégault, of course, who was a strong nationalist and as such, very hostile to any type of intervention, as he said, of the Federal Government in our affairs—> the federal competitor didn't seem to have the muscles of an unbeatable champion. Despite its lack of resources, the Cultural Affairs Ministry was strong enough to compete with the Canada Council.

In reality, this did not happen, and the Canada Council started to pull ahead of Quebec in 1966.

> The second stage of the Canada Council's existence starts at the beginning of 1966 and goes on till 1973. It is the era of experience, also the era of abundance. As early as 1966-67, the Federal Government cultural expenses reached 146 million dollars. The resources granted to the Canada Council also begin to grow: 7 million dollars in 67-68 for the arts, then from year to year, $8,700,000, $9,400,000, $10,300,000, $12,700,000 in 1971-72. In 73, the arts' subsidy amounts to 45 million dollars. In a speech given in September 1973, the Canada Council Director, André Fortier, thus summarizes the Council's role:
> But first of all and essentially, the Canada Council represents a direct and partial effort to face one of our big national problems: the necessity of promoting and developing our cultural identity. This identity has been and still is difficult to realize.

There was a survey made at that time—and I will just summarize this:

> 70 per cent of respondents—

This must have been publishers themselves—

> think that Ottawa is more likely to solve their problems.

So, that was the book industry.

> This conviction will be strengthened by the Hachette affair which had shown that the Quebec government had not made a very good choice in this situation.
> In the publishing sector, Ottawa's role was mainly to grant subsidies for research and creation.

They were not very high but at least it was done clearly, it was direct and it was useful.

> One of the tables, table 2, summarizes the evolution of subsidies granted to the publishing sector by Ottawa and Quebec for the period from 67 to 72, period when the Federal Government started infringing on the Quebec cultural landscape. This table shows that the assistance granted to Quebec publishers by the Quebec government is of the same magnitude in 72-73 as in 67-68; that of the Federal Government was 15 times higher than in 67-68.

There, you will note the tone used by the author I'm quoting, who is obviously a nationalist and most probably a partisan of sovereignty or independence, as they call themselves in turn. This is not my case and then, when he talks about the Canada Council's interference, I cannot agree that it is an interference. I cannot imagine that Canada being my country, it could be accused of interfering in a field which is not education and culture but a mixed field which could receive assistance from various levels of government.

> Throughout this period, we saw further inroads being made into economic control over Quebec culture through foreign takeovers of distribution companies.
> As for the government's representatives, in private they continued to profess their goodwill and sympathy for the spokespersons of special pressure groups,

Just as the Honourable Marcel Masse did last week, when he received a delegation of publishers, booksellers and authors headed by Gratien Gélinas, I believe—in any case, I know he was the most senior person among them, since he is more than 80 years old. So, again, we had fine words from all these people, including Mr. Masse, except that the last word was still a clear, emphatic "no".

Senator Corbin: May I ask a question? Since you are talking about the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse, I wonder whether you are aware that last Wednesday in the House of Commons, Sheila Finestone, the member for Mount Royal, put a whole series of questions to the government? Perhaps I could just quickly quote some of Mrs. Finestone's comments. She said:

> Mr. Speaker, over the past several months, the Government of Quebec, like us, has been imploring the federal government to exempt books from the GST. But like us, it has come up against a brick wall.

Were you aware that the Quebec Government had asked the federal government to exempt books from the GST?

Senator Hébert: Yes, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: Oh, you were! She goes on to say: "Yesterday, realizing that it had made a grave error by also putting a tax on books, the Government of Quebec changed its position and finally decided not to tax books or reading materials. Is the Prime Minister prepared to tell us today, in this Chamber, whether he intends to follow Quebec's example and comply with the wishes of thousands of canadians from coast to coast by announcing that books will be exempt from the GST?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!"

That question was put last Wednesday in the House of Commons at 2.20 p.m.

So, the Honourable Marcel Masse, the Minister of Communications, rose and gave this answer:

> "Mr. Speaker, with respect to taxation, the government has decided on a broad tax base in order to keep the rate down".

Do you understand what he is talking about? Initially—and these are my words now—they had set the rate at 9%. Then they lowered it to 7%. And yet, they neither broadened or narrowed the tax base when they took that step. And let me just quote again Mr. Masse's words:

> Mr. Speaker, with respect to taxation, the governmnent has decided on a broad tax base in order to keep the rate down. The government recognizes that particularly in recent years, the cultural industries in general, and particularly the publishing sector, have experienced some difficulties. The Prime Minister has sympathized with their predictament and the government is indeed prepared in due time to further analyse the situation and make whatever changes may be required.

That was the first answer from the Minister of Communications, Mr. Masse, to the first question put by Mrs. Finestone. However, unsatisfied with that answer Mrs. Finestone rose a second time and said:

> But changes are required immediately, and the minister knows that perfectly well, as does the Prime Minister, in fact. In Vancouver, the Prime Minister said he would reconsider taxing books such as the Bible and Koran, for example. We saw that in the TV clip; the Prime Minister may not agree with the network, and I can hardly blame him. And we do not blame him, because we are increasingly concerned about the growing problem of illiteracy and its impact on our economy and our international competitiveness. We are also concerned about the feeling of isolation experienced by those who cannot read.

It is a little difficult to read but I think I can do it. No problem. Just because I am from New Brunswick—indeed, a francophone from New Brunswick—does not mean I cannot read in the Senate. You do not need to come from Quebec in order to read in French in the Senate. We are not just warm cadavers, Senator Poitras—although some of your Quebec compatriots would probably like people to think so. Isn't that something! So Sheila Finestone went on to say:

> The Ministers of Finance and Communications said . . .

Then the Speaker rose and . . .

● (1720)

[English]

Senator Roblin: This pseudo question here, this speech introduced in guise for a question: you know that is against the rule.

Senator Stewart: I suspect you will rise on a point of order, Senator Roblin.

Senator Corbin: Would Senator Roblin please indicate in what way my question to Senator Hébert, who has the floor, is against the rule?

Senator Roblin: I think I can safely say my friend is not asking a question; he is making a speech. He is making a reasoned argument. He is not asking a simple question. That is what he should be doing.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Corbin: All I am doing, Senator Roblin, is quoting from the House of Commons Hansard as a lead-in to my question. Shortly after your government was elected in 1984, you yourself admitted that you had mastered the art of asking long questions with long preambles when you were sitting on the opposition benches. So I really don't see why I should be taking any lessons from you today. Anyway, you aren't listening. What, indeed, is the point of trying to get through to our friends opposite? Consequently, I will address myself to Senator Hébert. Then, the Speaker rose and said:

> I would ask the member to please put her question.
>
> Mrs. Finestone: The Ministers told me that they were seeking other means of funding the publishing sector and the Minister has, in fact, just recognized the problems it is experiencing, which also goes to show that the government is hurting that sector of the economy.
>
> The Speaker: The member is starting to make a speech; so I would ask her to please put her question.
>
> Mrs. Finestone: Will the minister immediately withdraw the tax on books and publications?
> The Hon.Marcel Masse, Minister of Communications: Mr. Speaker, since we are talking about reading, I think the member for Mount Royal would do well to read exactly what the Prime Minister has said on the subject, as she would realize that her interpretation does not in any way jibe with the Prime Minister's statements.

Perhaps I could just digress for a moment and say that I do not know exactly what the Prime Minister may have put down in writing on the subject, but I, myself, heard him say on television, in front of a group of young people, that he was unaware that the Bible and the Koran would be taxed. I stand to be corrected, but I heard it myself on the CBC news. Then Minister Masse goes on to say:

> Secondly, the member says the government must take steps. The fact is, the government has already taken steps in the past, is currently doing so, and will continue to take whatever steps are necessary, bearing this in mind."

This is Minister Masse speaking here: "The government has already taken steps in the past, is currently doing so, and will continue to take whatever steps are necessary, being this in mind."

That is certainly relevant to the debate? Is it not? And to your comments, Senator Hébert. Minister Masse goes on to say:

> The government does recognize that there are two separate markets for books in Canada: an anglophone market and a francophone market. I thought there were actually three—what the Quebec government likes to call the allophone market.
> We also recognize that the francophone market is under pressure because of the small population base available to support the industry as a whole. That is why, in its current 8-million-dollar annual program, the government devotes 40% of its funding budget under the publishing program to the francophone publishing sector in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

So, Mrs. Finestone rose a third time and said:

Canadians who read books, be they francophone or anglophone, need to be able to do that; but they don't need a tax.

No tax on books.

She then moved on to another topic—the CBC.

You see, Senator Hébert, the GST not only concerns the senators, who are in the process of considering the legislation and debating it at the third reading stage; it continues to be a source of concern within the House of Commons, which has already passed the bill.

It continues to concern members of Parliament who have the courage to rise and talk about it because they want the government to change its ways and get rid of the tax now. So, you see, Senator Hébert, this issue is by no means resolved. It is not in the bag for the government just yet. Members of Parliament continue to discuss the issue. And senators continue to discuss the issue. And Senator Poitras, do not say a word, because your whip told you not to say anything today. You disobeyed the rule earlier. So did Senator Roblin. You must keep silent. Listen to what your leaders tell you; just do not say a word. Your turn will come.

So, Senator Hébert, do you think the government will be able to continue to resist pressure from all sides to remove the tax on books, as the Quebec government has done? Do you think this government will be able to resist up until the day the tax is finally in place, if we ever reach that day?

Do you not think rather, that the pressure is so strong and so irresistible that in an attempt to make a sort of a peace offering, the government is likely to make a statement in the next few hours or days to the effect that it is prepared to listen to the representations of the Liberal senators and the arguments of publishers, booksellers, provincial governments and Canadians in general by backtracking on the plan to apply the GST to books. I have the feeling that that is what is going to happen, do you not?

Senator Hébert: Well, I am not sure you are right. I certainly hope so, though. And there is a very simple reason why I am not sure: The Quebec government really did not have any intention of giving in on the issue of a tax on books. The reason it gave in is because it quickly realized that the coalition it was facing was not the kind of coalition that is here today and gone tomorrow. It realized that his coalition was not about to disappear overnight. Intellectuals are very stubborn, as are publishers. Even a very down-to-earth man with his feet firmly on the ground like Mr. Gérard-D. Lévesque, the Quebec Minister of Finance, realized that it would be better to concede now with dignity rather than continuing a battle that he was certain to lose one day. I think at the federal level, the difference is that they are not quite as familiar with that kind of coalition or with these people. And yet, you would think they would be familiar with its counterpart in Toronto, whose members include the best-known English-speaking writers in Canada, as well as publishers and booksellers. It is the kind of coalition that does not just fade away overnight, but continues to fight until it succeeds. I am not sure the government really realizes this. That is why, to answer your question, I am not really convinced the government will have the grace to say: Okay; we will follow Quebec's lead and exclude books and periodicals from our proposed tax. I do not think they will do it. I think they are going to dig in their heels because they imagine they still have the support of—what is it, 14 per cent of Canadians? It seems to me that is not a lot of support. But they still seem to be pretty sure of themselves, and they are pretending to govern with a majority that is becoming increasingly eroded in the House of Commons, although they have increased their numbers in the Senate through the totally illegitimate means that we are all aware of.

• (1730)

Senator Corbin: You have partially answered my question. But I would just like to briefly draw your attention to the Honourable Marcel Masse's second answer.

Senator Hébert: Senator Roblin is not here.

Senator Corbin: Well, Senator Roblin just may be here. I asked him to tell me what Senate rule prevented me from putting a question to you while you have the floor. He was unable to answer my question, although he did give me a little sermon. He was unable to refer me to a specific Senate rule in that regard. In other words, he is not terribly serious about all this. So, Minister Masse, in his second answer made the following statement: This is what the government has done in the past, is presently doing and will continue to do, bearing this in mind. And a little later on he says: That is why, in the current $8-million funding program, the government devotes 40% of its budget under the publishing assistance program to the francophone publishing sector in Canada.

Does that lead you to believe that the government does in fact have another option, namely to increase its publishing assistance program? According to the minister, the annual budget is now about $8 million. Now here is an option: He could increase it to $10 million, or $12 million and still keep the GST in place; or, another option would be to leave the program funding at $8 million a year, but rather than devoting 40% of the publishing assistance program funds to the francophone publishing sector in Canada, he could increase that to 50, 60 or 70%. If he were to give the entire $8 million to the francophone publishing sector in Canada, would that be enough to counter the damage caused by the GST?

Senator Hébert: Well, what it might do is allow a number of publishers to avoid going belly-up. Funnily enough, the publishers did not commend Mr. Masse on his proposal—indeed, not at all, because they understand that even though artificial means, such as direct subsidies to publishers, may make it possible to save some publishers from starving to death or closing their doors, that sort of thing does not stimulate reading. That does not change the fact that the book I paid $30 for yesterday afternoon, will cost $40 or something once the GST is in place, if it ever passes.

That is what people in the books and publishing sector cannot accept. The introduction of the tax will mean a drop in book sales, and will actually prevent many ordinary Canadians from buying books. Consequently, it will inhibit the exchange of ideas, something that already is not all that easy in a small community such as ours, with only a small network of bookstores and libraries that are neither well stocked nor well funded. That is why Mr. Masse's proposals, which seem generous—he talks about $40 million here and 40% of the budget there—did not really impress the books and publishing community or the delegation he received, because it does not solve the problem. It is nothing more than a band-aid. Perhaps he thought he could buy the silence of publishers, but he was wrong. Publishers are not like other businessmen. They are people who generally see what they do as something of a calling; so it is not enough for them to know that they will not starve to death, they want people in Quebec and Canada to read books. They want books to be accessible. They are already too expensive. But with the GST added on, as the figures demonstrate, it will be an absolute catastrophe. All this discussion arose from the fact that we were talking about the Quebec Government. But governments are sometimes alike. I think the government will be content to establish working groups to look at the problems without ever following up on the excellent recommendations that we have made.

There again, at that particular point, the Quebec government was behaving a little like Marcel Masse. There were plenty of fine words and studies, but when something occurs that is as clear and unequivocal as what happened in Montreal—I refer to thesurvey showing that 92 per cent of the population of Montreal was asking both governments to abolish the tax on books, well, that is thekind of unanimity one rarely sees on any subject.

So it referred to documents or studies on the book trade in Quebec that had been prepared for the Ministry of Cultural Affairs in October of 1976 by Drouin, Paquin et Associés. These presented a full picture of the situation that has prevailed in the distribution sector in recent years. I have an excerpt from the study here. The fact is the market share of foreign distributors has been steadily increasing in the past four or five years. They now form the majority within the Quebec book distribution network.

Most of them are French distributors or publishers, like the Nouvelles messageries internationales du livre, Hachette, Socadis—which is the Gallimard group—Flammarion, Bordas, Juneau, d'Imédia—which is the Seuil group—les Éditions françaises—which is Larousse—les Presses universitaire de France and finally, les Presse de la cité.

Also, a number of exclusive distributors of foreign collections deal with imported books, which they distribute and sell at exorbitant prices. And they are perfectly free to do so, because the 1972 regulations do not cover the way in which retail prices are set for exclusive foreign collections.

The popular distribution agency established by the Sogides group to distribute its own collections, like l'Actuel, l'Édition de l'homme, Habitec, and Édition les Presses libres, is the only Quebec distributor in a position to compete with foreign distributors. A number of Quebec publishers have no choice but to use foreign distributors.

According to Drouin, Paquin et Associés, Quebec publishers have to choose between a Quebec distributor having only limited means of dissemination and a foreign distributor, who can be much more effective in that regard but who is, at the same time, a competitor in the publishing sector. And because foreign publishers and distributors are effectively controlling the market, Quebec books are treated as poor relations. It is perfectly understandable that if foreign publishers control the distribution system, their priority will certainly not be to distribute and promote Quebec books. On the contrary, those distributors are primarily concerned with giving prominence to their collection and ensuring that their books are well displayed in bookstores and other points of sale.

Senator Corbin, you spoke a little earlier of the Flammarion bookshop in the National Arts Centre. It goes without saying that books published by Flammarion are prominantly displayed in that bookshop. And no one can blame them for doing that—particularly since they do provide reasonable space for their competitors' books, be they French or Canadian.

> Because of the foreign publishers' and distributors' effective control of the market, the needs of the people of Quebec are subordinated to the interests of these foreign publishers and distributors, who are not concerned with the future of Quebec literature.

One cannot expect Flammarion or Hachette or any other French publisher to show any great concern for Canadian or Quebec literature. It is of no interest to them.

> Literary publishing, of course, is not profitable, and therefore does not interest foreign distributors whose primary goal is to maximize profits. By pushing certain collections, the consequence of which is to eliminate others in the market, some of the more powerful distributors, like Hachette, are effectively exercising a kind of censorship, by preventing the circulation of ideas, and in that sense, are engaged in an activity that is not only commercial in nature but ideological as well. One can certainly understand that a distribution company like Hachette would want to distribute the book about Mr. Pompidou, who was the President of France and Prime Minister under de Gaulle, but it is less clear that it may want to handle a book like "Notre ami le roi", which has just been published and is a blistering criticism of the King of Morocco's regime. I do not imagine Hachette will be all that keen to distribute the book, particularly since it dominates the French-language book distribution network in Morocco itself. So, you can see the kind of latent censorship that that gives rise to.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Honourable senator, would you entertain a question at this point? I realize that you are concentrating your interesting address on publishing principally in Quebec, but I know about a situation in English-language publishing that disturbs me and many others. I wonder if the same situation prevails with regard to French-language publications in Quebec.

I am referring principally to books published by university presses—for example, Oxford University press or Cambridge University press. It used to be that one could buy an Oxford University press book when I was an undergraduate for approximately $5 or $6. They then went up to $10 or $15. A book that cost 10 pounds was really extraordinary. I now find that when I buy books from England I am paying 30 pounds, 40 pounds, or even 50 pounds for them. One asks: Why has the price of these kinds of books gone up in this astronomical way?

I am told that it is a vicious cycle. The price was put up to pay for the increse in printing costs. The result was that the number of books purchased declined. Consequently, the price was raised again, and, as a result, the circulation declined. We now have a situation where books are printed in small runs—as they say in the printing trade—and are sold for 40 pounds or 50 pounds. I buy a fair number of books of that type—at least I used to. A book that costs 40 pounds when imported into Canada will cost around $85 or $90 plus postage. We will then put a tax on that. That will decrease the number of those books purchased and printed. The same will apply with regard to books published by the University of Toronto press or by McGill-Queen's press in Canada.

Does the government have any realization of the economics of academic book publishing in Canada? I ask a two-pronged question here. First, is what I say true with regard to academic books published in the French language? Secondly, how will the tax on books influence the publication of so-called learned books in Quebec itself? I wonder if now or at some other opportunity perhaps later today you could deal with that question.

Senator Hébert: You described the situation for the learned books of university presses published in Great Britain, or Toronto for that matter, quite accurately. It also applies to books published in French, but with one difference, namely, when the University of Laval or University of Montreal press prints a book on a matter that is for a limited audience, especially if it concerns matters that are related to Canada and are of special interest to Canadians or Quebecers, it is more accurate. The difficulties that you described concerning books that are printed in English are still more acute in Quebec because of the smaller number of readers.

You are correct. The price for these books is now so high that it is difficult to buy them for students who have limited means. These books will not be classified as text books and will be taxed at 7 per cent by the GST. Consequently, fewer books will be sold to students, academics, researchers, and so on. Also, fewer books will be exported at a cost. Consequently, fewer books will be printed in the future. Because there will be a fewer number of books in the run, as you have mentioned quite correctly, the publisher will have to increase the price of these books, and the higher these books are, the less people will buy them and the more costly they will become. So what is the end of that, I don't know. One thing that is quite clear to me is that the GST on books is not the answer. It is the beginning of the end for a lot of books.

Naturally the publishers of learned books will also have to make choices, which means that a lot of the good books that should be published on very special subjects, books that are important for the evolution of thinking of society, will not be published at all, let alone sold in smaller quantities. In a year from now the Toronto University Press will not publish the same number of books that they are publishing now, and that will be because of the GST. If I were the government, I would not be happy to be responsible for these books never becoming a reality and never playing a role in the evolution of our society.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator. May I ask another very short question on the same topic? We have in our midst a distinguished authority on constitutional law who has just recently published a book on this rather esoteric topic. Would it be helpful to ask, Senator Hébert, if Senator Beaudoin could tell us the implications for the publication and sale of books similar to his own after this tax goes into effect, if indeed it does go into effect; or is it too much to ask him to share that kind of knowledge with us as we debate whether or not Canada should have a tax on books?

Senator Hébert: I could see Senator Murray making a negative sign to Senator Beaudoin not to answer your question, and he is intimidated—

Senator Frith: Like a pitcher shaking off a catcher's signal.

Senator Hébert: He knows he has received his instructions at what I described on Friday as a Conservative caucus, when Senator Murray told all these nice people, "One thing is sure, do not intervene. Shut up. The only thing you are here for is to vote."

Senator Frith: I don't think you are going to hurt Senator Murray's feelings.

Senator Stewart: He wouldn't use language like that.

Senator Hébert: "Shut up" is perhaps a bit rough. "Please be quite", he would have said. That is why I think we are right. Senator Beaudoin will not give this information. We will never know.

Senator Frith: Not publicly, anyway.

Senator Hébert: No.

Senator Simard: You had better take a pill over there.

Senator Hébert: Oh, you were told not to intervene, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Take a pill, anyway.

Senator Frith: When that old harpoon hit him, Moby Dick rose.

Senator Hébert: The discipline is going to the dogs on the other side, eh?

[Translation]

When I was interrupted, we were talking about

> . . . several exclusive distributors of foreign stocks apply excessive sale's prices to the books that they import and distribute. They are free to do so because the 1972 regulations do not establish the retail prices of exclusive foreign stocks.

Does Senator Beaudoin want to make a point?

Senator Corbin: On a point of order, Senator Poitras is telling Senator Lefebvre: Be polite! Be polite!

Senator Lefebvre: I am always polite!

Senator Corbin: Here they go again! The other side is giving us another lesson!

Senator Hébert:

> . . . Because the book market is subordinated to foreign publishers and distributors, Quebec books are treated, so to speak, as second class. Clearly, in a distribution system controlled by the distributors of foreign publishers, the distribution and promotion of Quebec books hardly is a priority! Indeed, these distributors make a point to give priority to their own books and to promote them in book stores and sales outlets. Foreign publishers and distributors exert a stranglehold on the book market and the main victims of their indifference to the future of literature are the Quebec readers.
> Quebec is a prosperous market, particularly for French publishers. Between 1972 and 1975 the imports of French books have grown rapidly.

During that period, they have grown from 16 million in 1972, to 22 million in 1975. You can easily imagine what the figures are in 1990.

> According to reports on the book market presented to Cultural Affairs during the last few years, Quebec books deserve a more prominent place in book stores and outlets. To give them the place they deserve, the Government will have to intervene in order to change the rules of the game that control the economic mechanisms in the cultural field. According to the findings of the Drouin, Paquin et Associés report, the distributors of foreign publishers should lose their dominance so that Quebec publishers could be distributed by a Quebec company that would not be controlled by a competitor.
> In his report, Mr. Pierre de Grandpré,

. . . who was a senior civil servant at the Ministry of Cultural Affairs, and who had been asked to do a study on the distribution of periodicals and pocket books, concluded, and I am quoting him:

> "In the publishing field, a Quebec policy can only be efficient and fruitful if shipping and stands which constitute the most important distribution network of popular culture through the printed word, are adequately regulated."

There you have a long winded sentence typical of a civil servant.

> According to the report, there are more than 10,000 outlets for newspapers, periodicals and pocket books in restaurants, grocery stores, "tabagies" . . . The word "tabagies", which means smoke shop, is put between brackets because it is a Quebec creation which is particularly common in Quebec City.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. Acting Speaker: Honorable Senators, according to article 12 of the Regulations, I must leave the Chair. The debate is adjourned until 8 o'clock tonight.

Are you agreed, honorable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8 p.m.

THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, once again at the stroke of six, I was rudely interrupted in mid-sentence, maybe at the exact moment I was about to convince some senator across the way.

Never mind! I am an incorrigible optimist and I will continue. After all, I only need to convert two or three and then it is done.

In the first part of my speech, I took the trouble to explain the difficult beginning of publishing and book selling in Quebec, because the situation there is in many ways similar to that in English Canada. I recalled the battles that the book community had to fight, the unfair foreign competition and, alas, too often, the indifference of governments.

In spite of everything, both the provincial and federal governments at least claimed in their speeches that they wanted culture, and literature in particular, to flourish. The federal government created the Canada Council many years ago. This Council has made an effective contribution to encourage the publication of new works and translations of Canadian works in one language or the other.

At the end of the 1970s, The Department of Communications created wonderful programs to help publishers. For its part, the Government of Quebec established the Department of Cultural Affairs and set up some programs, which, however, were more timid than those of the federal government.

One thing is certain: the various levels of government so far have treated books with the respect they deserve. That is why, since Confederation, no government has even suggested taxing books—neither their sale or manufacture. Then came the Mulroney government. With the wonderful assurance that comes from ignorance and in particular ignorance of cultural realities, Minister Wilson decided to apply the GST to books, which is a real tragedy for publishers, booksellers, librarians, authors and readers of books. In fact it is a tragedy for all of society.

Before proving that statement, let us describe the situation of publishing in the 1972's to show you what it was like then.

> Without denying the beneficial effects that the decrees of February 1972 had on the book industry, it is likely that the Bourassa government's aid policy . . .

I am talking about the first Bourassa government, of course.

> . . . had no tangible effects on the development of the bookstore system.

This refers to accredited bookstores. We said what an accredited bookstore was. From 1966 to 1976, the number of accredited bookstores increased from 89 to 136.

> The number of accredited bookstores remained quite steady from 1966 t0 1970 . . .

In fact, in 1971, there were 142 of them. The number went up to 156, then 174 and went down to 166.

So you see how fragile that business is. From a peak of 174 to 176, some 40 bookstores had to close their doors or lose their accreditation for lack of the necessary facilities.

> Note that the number of accredited bookstores remained quite steady from 1966 to 1970, grew very rapidly from 1970 and 1971 (53%), continued to grow significantly between 1972 and 1974 and declined suddenly and sharply in 1976, bringing the number of accredited bookstores to the pre-1971. So the period of significant growth is around 1971, when 142 of 190 bookstores were accredited. At that time, booksellers already had some government support. "Nevertheless, we believe the main effect of this aid was not to create new bookstores but to encourage existing ones to seek accreditation." The reason they did not do so before is that the 1965 Accreditation Act was not commercially attractive. It was only in 1974 that the bookstore accreditation policy started to be seen as insulfficient to ensure their profitability. The difficult economic situation that began around 1973 or 1974 surely did not help the book business. At the same time, bookstores reported a drop in book sales and a sharp rise in prices due to inflation.

So as we saw in 1973-74, as book prices go up, sales go down. It is a direct effect of inflation which is less apparent in other sectors but very obvious in the book trade. That is why no one doubts that the GST applied to books will lower book sales, thus lowering press runs, thereby raising book prices. The more book prices go up, the more sales go down. The decrease in sales leads to catastrophic vicious circle.

So booksellers' profitability has declined since 1974, with a gross profit margin, according to the Drouin, Paquin at Associés report, of 26 to 28%, which is very close to overhead expenses of around 27 to 28%. Nearly half the bookstores (46%) had less than $250,000 in total sales in 1975. For that year, total book sales were estimated at $54.5 million.

• (2010)

Insufficient profitability forced many booksellers to give up accreditation and its standards (at the end of April 1976, Quebec had 136 accredited bookstores—two-thirds of those in the province) to be able to limit their stock to what sold the most and give greater importance to better-paying related products: stationery, office supplies, etc. Books were in danger of becoming just another product.

Now we now that the growth of the book market in Quebec depends on the health of the bookstore business.

For Quebec publishers, the bookstore system is of prime importance. Unlike the United States, where book sales have become the specialty of college stores and book clubs, here in Quebec, we have proportionately 10 times as many bookstores as the United States. Bookstores are the first place to look for works of general culture and reference.

Let us turn now to the structure of publishing.

By defining commercial publishing houses to be those that publish at least four books during the year, the Bibliothèque nationale du Québec estimates that the number of publishers did not exceed about 50 in the period from 1972 to 1976. For its part, the Conseil supérieur du livre believes that the actual number of publishers—those whose main activity is publishing—was about 65 in the same period.

Since the number of publishers in Quebec varies over time (firms start one year and close the next), we can expect the actual figure to be somewhere between the two mentioned.

Since 1970, Quebec publishing has become much more concentrated geographically and economically. Of the 79 publishers recorded in 1974 by the literature and book service of the Department of Cultural Affairs, 65 were in the Montreal area, 11 in the Quebec City area and 3 in other regions. The presence of a large number of consumers and of renowned universities (centres of intellectual activity) is likely a deciding factor for choosing the location of a publisher, but it must also be admitted that, owing to its cultural nature, publishing is a luxury only big cities can afford.

In economic terms, this results in most of Quebec's book production being concentrated in about 10 publishing houses.

In 1974, "about ten publishers produced nearly three quarters of the titles issued every year and four or five of them accounted for most of the new titles, reprints and republications." The profitability of Quebec publishing is low and the great majority of firms are small as the following table shows:

[Senator Hébert.]

I do not have a table for 1990, but proportionately, the number of publishers is higher than at the period we were talking about. However, the ratio of large to small firms is much the same. As I said, I think, last Friday, it is all very well to say that large publishers will survive the GST. There is no doubt about that. Large publishing firms will survive the GST. But the history of publishing and literature shows us that the small firms have a large role to play and that writers who are now well known in France, England, or other countries would never have been published if there had not been small firms to believe in them and in works that at first glance may have seemed more difficult because they were new, because the ideas were new.

In 1975, only seven publishers had sales over $1 million and 54.2% of firms had sales under $200,000.

You see how small that is.

In 1975, the total sales of Canadian publishers in French were estimated at $29.9 million. The sales of commercial publishers (59 in Quebec) were $26.1 million, of which $19.66 million was for their own books and $7.45 million for those of other publishers.

To survive, a Quebec publisher must in most cases represent another publisher, often French, whose books he distributes. So, except for rare cases, he can never be only a publisher but must also be a distributor and wholesaler to some extent.

Statistics Canada estimates that, for the period with which we are concerned, Quebec publishers' sales of their own books were:

I will spare reading you the table . . .

Although total sales rose sharply, especially since 1973, the profitability of publishing has remained low. All studies agree on this point.

The impact of foreign capital on publishing houses is not negligible. Foreign-controlled firms publish mostly educational books, almost all in translation. "The opportunities French Canadian authors have to publish their own works seem to come only from Canadian-funded publishing firms."

Foreigners do not accept our works.

According to the report by Drouin, Paquin et Associés, profitability is limited by the following factors: Ever increasing production costs, competition from foreign publishers in a market that is already limited, lack of foreign outlets and especially no growth in medium-sized press runs.

The production of so-called commercial publishing firms, those that have published four or more titles during the year, has grown hardly at all in recent years.

No growth in number of titles combined with stagnant or declining press runs has led to a stability in the size of publication.

• (2020)

> Commercial publishing (firms with four titles and more) . . .

That is not a very big business . . .

> Depend mainly on new releases (93.6%). Only 6.4% of production is not destined to become quickly obsolete with reprinting, it represents financial cultural capital that may increase continually in value.
> In the period 1972-1977, the breakdown between new releases and republications . . .

Was somewhat similar.

> Until 1976, Quebec's cultural development was always identified with the Department of Cultural Affairs . . .

Which was created, as I told you earlier, in 1961,

> . . . which was never taken very seriously by subsequent governments. Our previous analysis shows that cultural development was not a government priority in the same way as economic development.

That was true Quebec in 1976 and it is true at the federal level in 1990.

> In 1976, Jean-Paul L'Allier, Minister of Cultural Affairs at the end of the Bourassa regime, in his green Paper entitled "For the evolution of a cultural policy", which was the first summary and policy paper released by the Department of Cultural Affairs in 15 years, put cultural development back in its true context.

This is the same Jean-Paul L'Allier who is now mayor of Quebec City. He was then Minister of Cultural Affairs at the end of the Bourassa regime.

> In 1978, two years after the green Paper, the Lévesque published its white paper entitled, "Quebec's cultural development policy". The Parti Québécois' white Paper went further in giving cultural policy an over-all dimension.

But it was still rhetoric. It was still discussion papers. Not much was done in fact.

> The Green Paper puts forward the concept of an over-all cultural policy and proposes broadening the field of activity of the Department of Cultural Affairs.
>
> The concept of culture underline the green Paper is found in the main documents published over the years on Quebec's cultural policy. Jean-Paul L'Allier draws heavily on "The Report of the Cultural Tribunal" chaired by Marcel Rioux for his over-all cultural policy.
>
> The concept of culture put forward by Marcel Rioux and the reality it identifies refer "to all individual and social behaviour, both economic and political, in daily life and in intellectual life. Culture—the world of values, images, signs and symbols—is found in economics—defined as the process of producing goods and services—as well as in politics—defined as the organization of power".
>
> This concept of culture is entering the common language of post-industrial society, which seeks to make cultural policy part of a broader policy of quality of life.
>
> Jean-Paul L'Allier shares Marcel Rioux's views and proposes a department "of services" to go along with the Department of Cultural Affairs. It would emphasize information, cultural activities, dissemination and access to culture. It would set policies that all departments would be called on to implement.
>
> In short, Jean-Paul L'Allier suggests a department that would be the government's "cultural conscience setting guidelines and limits for everything so that in all its activities in all areas, the government can protect and promote Quebec culture". Concretely, as "cultural conscience" of the government, the department will help set policy for public works, immigration, education, recreation, communications, business and industry.
>
> Jean-Paul L'Allier objectively analyzed what his department did over the years.

Here is what he said:

> A marginal department, Cultural Affairs over the years turned inward. According to L'Allier, it lacked resources, manpower and the necessary structures. It also lacked imagination and dynanism.
>
> Jean-Paul L'Allier also provides an accurate picture of the situation with books. His paper draws attention to seven main problems: Penetration of the relatively small, weak Quebec market by large foreign publishers; lack of markets for Quebec books abroad; weak public and school library systems; very high cost of books;

Imagine what it will be if the GST is every passed!

> Poorly protected copyrights; lack of an effective distribution system and especially inadequate government effort for a real book policy.
> Jean-Paul L'Allier admits "efforts made concentrated more on the industrial than on the cultural aspect of book publishing. Thus, Quebec has no real public reading policy". Furthermore, the help for the business side, such as aid to publishers, has been inadequate. L'Allier is the first to admit it. This is because the Quebec Department of Cultural Affairs has always been marginal, in budget terms: it has always had less than half of one per cent of the total government budget. The federal government "has occupied the field left vacant by Quebec's chronic inaction".

It is reluctant tribute, but tribute all the same, to the Canada Council, which is responsible for Canadian cultural policy and has managed to support Quebec publishing with all sorts of programs.

In fact, it was the publishers who suggested these programs. There was one difference. They were never acted on in Quebec but were well received by the Canada Council.

> L'Allier wonders: "How can we ask artists, creators, disseminators of culture not to agree to co-operate with the federal government if Quebec cannot offer them a vigorous, effective policy of action and co-operation?"

Jean-Paul L'Allier's great merit is that he proclaimed the need for a "real public reading policy in Quebec". To do so, L'Allier says, "the first objective of the Department of Cultural Affairs must be to make Quebec products, and incidentally the best foreign products, available to as many Quebecers as possible".

Attaining this objective requires, among other things, a library development policy, which is the precondition to a publishing policy and a policy to make books available to Quebecers.

In his green Paper, Jean-Paul L'Allier analysis the reasons for Quebec's slowness in developing public libraries . . .

This answers a question Senator Marsden asked me on Friday.

. . . with great insight. He compares the situation of public libraries in Quebec with public libraries in Canada on the following nine criteria: percentage of population served, number of books in libraries, number of loans, total receipts, municipal contributions, provincial subsidies, total expenditures, salary expenditures, expenditures for books.

That is, book purchases.

Quebec comes sixth to tenth among the 10 provinces on these different criteria. In spite of a catch-up plan accepted by the government—a 15-year plan—L'Allier says that 15 years from now, we will be 15 years behind Ontario in terms of the number of people who have access to a public library.

So this shows you the comparative situation and of public libraries in Quebec and Ontario.

The ideological context in which public libraries in Quebec were established and maintained for too long largely explains the lag behind Ontario.

Thus when John Ridington came to Quebec to study library development, Premier Taschereau told him . . .

He was a Liberal Premier, who preceded Duplessis. This was the 1930s.

[English]

"A public library is not without perils to our older generation and especially to the younger ones."

● (2030)

[Translation

We see the same thing when the time came to create the Montreal Municipal Library.

Bruchési thought the library should only contain technical works and exclude those that were "dangerous for faith and morals".

That means novels, poetry and so on.

Public libraries thus became a way for the church to "proselytize" and something harmless and inoffensive for the government. The cultural revolution revolution of the 1960s helped redefine the concept of library and promote real pluralism for Quebec's reading public.

Jean-Paul L'Allier's green paper was widely commented on in newspapers at the time. In Le Devoir, Victor Lévy-Beaulieu described it this way:

A collective cultural projet that the Parti Québécois could very well adopt if it came to power.

The defeat of the Liberal government on Novemberd 15, 1976 prevented Jean-Paul L'Allier from implementing the structures required for the reforms he advocated. However, we will see that his paper did not meet the same fate as Pierre Laporte's did after the Liberal defeat in 1966.

The PQ government made culture one of the cornerstones of its plan for society.

Therefore, it took over much of L'Allier's green paper.

In its analysis of the situation of cultural industries, the white paper pointed out their cultural weakness, which was worsened by the overwhelming presence of multinationals, and suggested a series of measures to correct the situation.

The white paper suggested creating a cultural industries development corporation, known by its French acronym SDIC, to help produce and distribute Quebec cultural products. The PQ government used the SDIC to help set up a Quebec production, distribution and marketing infrastructure.

On the subject of books, recalling that the publishing, distribution and sale of books are a "powerful means of cultural expression for a community", the white paper observes:

No country, no people, no group can allow it to be under foreign control. Nevertheless, that is the situation in Quebec, in varying degrees, for each of these industries. Can heavily foreign-controlled publishing firms legitimately benefit from direct or indirect government subsidies? Can these interests be allowed to choose what regions to serve, what points of view to convey, what titles to distribute, what teaching material and school texts to prepare and so on?

The white paper suggests reviewing the book policy on this basis.

A system of accreditation or licensing for publishers and distributors that would complement the one for booksellers;

—new regulations on Quebec ownership that would take account of the particularities of publishing, distribution and book selling and the practices in effect;

—the creation of two Quebec co-operatives, one for supply and distribution, the other for a Quebec collection of paperbacks;

—government involvement in a communications and transport plan and also an advertising plan and a plan to encourage reading;

—a special program to help companies succeed and export;

—a Quebec law on intellectual property;

—a special program to help develop public libraries.

Of course, not much of all that has been done, but at least there was an expression of political will to change things with respect to books.

During the period 1960 to 1977, most of the present publishers came into being. The reason was the Quiet Revolution. The Quiet Revolution marked the beginning of a new Quebec, a renewal of social structures, a modernization of government, a retreat of religious authority and the birth of a party advocating sovereignty.

We will show how the change and restructuring of various kinds of production can be explained by the growing public and its changed social composition, a result of education being more democratic.

This made new classes of people consumers of the written word—books, periodicals and newspapers.

We will also show how this restructuring was accompanied by changes in authority in society. The Quebec politicians who came out of the Quiet Revolution, writers and journalists took the place of the former clerical elite in providing themes and symbols for collective thought. Generally speaking, one could expect a slow movement from a fairly homogeneous production, one with a moralizing or religious character, to a more differentiated production where literature and science take an ever larger place. As production becomes more diverse we would expect the increasing number of publishing houses to reflect the cultural dynamism of Quebec society.

The election of a Liberal government in 1960.

Many observers agree on the importance of the social and political upheaval and massive cultural changes that took place in Quebec after 1960. The Liberals' coming to power in June 1960 marked the end of a period in Quebec history. According to Marcel Rioux, the election of the Liberals in 1960 called all of society into question. It called centuries-old truths into question, as well as the most firmly established authorities.

● (2040)

Since the 1960s, says Guy Rocher, Quebec has been going through a metamorphosis:

The old traditional, clerical, inward-looking society gave way to a post-industrial, secular society that was more and more North American.

The pre-industrial mentality of most Quebecers gave way. Léon Dion and Micheline de Sève summarize this period of upheaval thus:

A people whose living conditions had changed with no corresponding change in mentality was suddenly forced by its political leaders to realize how unfit it was for a definitely urban, heavy industrialized environment and it had to catch up fast.

The rapid upheaval of institutions and the consequent breakdown of the cultural framework Quebec knew at the beginning of the 1960s are not merely the result of an election and its political and ideological context.

The breakdown of the institutional and cultural framework of traditional society is part of a slow, painstaking process of questioning ideologies, attitudes and mentalities. This process arises from many powerful forces for change that were already active in our community between 1948 and 1960.

Among the main social agents opposed to the established regime, we can name: the Faculty of Social Sciences at Laval University, some Catholic action groups like the JOC, some farmers' movements and co-operative organizations, the CTCC, which became the CSN,

the group associated with "Refus Global", a manifesto published mainly by artists in the late 1930s, I think—

—the Hexagone group—around Gaston Miron, a group of poets especially—

The magazine Cité libre. The opposition to the regime (ideology and power) of these groups of social agents from different ideological backgrounds, often working underground, helped Jean Lesage and his "équipe du tonnerre" take power in 1960.

In the struggle that these social agents waged from 1948 against the upper classes (the clergy and members of the traditional professions), the information media (radio, television, books, newspapers) were a favoured tool for change.

It was these media that spread new ideas on authority, freedom, economic and cultural development, the secularization of society, the role of the state, and the nationalization of natural resources.

In a nutshell, the Liberal Party's accession to power enabled some social groups that had fought against traditional factions of higher social classes to implement their ideas about direct state intervention in economic and cultural key sectors, with the accompanying increase in responsibilities with regard to superstructures, principal channels through which established ideologies are transmitted into the hands of the old coalition made up of religious authorities and members of traditional professions at the end of the 19th century.

The enhanced role of the Quebec state during the Quiet Revolution was accompanied by a superstructural renovation of society, a modernization of state organizations and a regression of the religious power in public affairs. The battle fought around Bill 60

. . . introduced by Paul Gérin-Lajoie

. . . and the creation of a Department of Education in 1964 were the apex of the then Liberal government's efforts to assert itself politically.

The first years of the Quiet Revolution were characterized by a battle among the new elite to take their places at the head of the state and administrative system and ideological organizations (schools, health, leisure, culture, information). As early as 1964, Jean-Charles Falardeau . . .

a professor at Laval University, sociologist and political scientist who died a few years ago . . .

. . . explained where the various players stood in the fight for state control:

And I quote:

Finally, our society is dominated by two groups of planners and technocrats opposed to each other, at least partially, through their objectives and their ideologies. While one group comes from a university environment, the other comes from industrial or financial big business, but they both try to control the state.

In general, the Quiet Revolution government took the initiative of developing policies aimed at meeting the social ambitions of the urban population. For example, it democratized access to education by providing it free of charge.

With the Quiet Revolution, says Denis Monière, education became a fundamental value of our national creed. Educated people get richer. In ten years, the number of students increased by 101% at the high school level, by 82% at the college level and by 169% at the university level. The education budget went from $218 million to $1 billion.

The emphasis on education and the rise in the level of schooling went hand in hand with the intellectual dynamism and the collective euphoria of Quebec society which had its turning point between 1959 and 1963. We will try to briefly describe these exciting times when it was obvious that literary creation was the lifeline of books.

"The Age of Speech"—The story of the first years of intellectual dynamism during the Quiet Revolution has not been written yet. Notre éveil culturel by Germain Lesage is our only essay, and a partial one at that, on the subject. It is not a historic research but rather a diary of the identities Quebec society gave itself daily from 1959 to 1962. In early 1963, Germain Lesage wrote:

"The French Canadian people are going forward. Our cultural awakening is really a mass movement. This collective change is powerful and irreversible. It is an evolution whose purpose may not be clearly defined but which is going in a new direction at an unprecedented pace".

[Senator Hébert.]

• (2050)

The almost terrifying pace of evolution in Quebec since 1959 was also pointed out in Le Devoir by Gérard Filion who wrote in 1962:

"Quebec has experienced almost a century worth of changes in every areas."

Two other observers of the unsettling first years of the Quiet Revolution, D. Clift and R. Daigneault wrote:

"In the current confusion, what seems most important is to adjust to the new conditions prevailing in Quebec".

As early as 1960, Quebeckers were aware of taking a path which would allow them very quickly to fill the gap created over the years between their culture (ideas, values, symbols, motivations) and their society (urbanization, industrialization) because they were letting life go by instead of playing an active role in their own fate. That is why sociologist Philippe Garrigue said in 1961:

"We hope that this phase of anxiously looking for new cultural values shows that French-Canadians want to take control of their future."

Influence of the media—After having a major impact on the emergence of social groups who challenged the rigid traditions of Quebec society before 1960, the information media also played a major role in the sudden change of mentality and the re-evaluation by the population of its social and political identity in the early 1960s.

The role played by the elecronic media (radio and television), especially Radio-Canada, in post-war Quebec society has not been sufficiently emphasized. The eminent popular science writer Fernand Séguin, who died a few years ago, said this:

"Radio-Canada is the best thing that happened in French Canada since Jacques Cartier. Quebec homes were quickly invaded by television. The percentage of Quebec households owning a TV set went from 10% in 1953 to 52% in 1955, 89% in 1960 and has been hovering between 97 and 99% since 1972. When writer Marcel Dubé summarized in 1962 what Radio-Canada had done in its first 10 years of existence, he said that state television was directly or indirectly responsible for the intellectual rejuvenation and the ideological revolution in Quebec. According to Dubé, Radio-Canada is also responsible to a large extent for the evolution of literature and the arts. Richard Arès, a Jesuit and nationalist, described even more fully the impact Radio-Canada had on literature and the arts. He wrote in 1961, probably in Relation magazine:

It is obvious that we are now witnessing an important rehabilitation of French-Canadian culture, especially in literature and the arts. And it is just as obvious that > Radio-Canada's leading influence is at the root of this phenomenon.

> It was able to accomplish this through its financial support of artists and intellectuals and the quality of its programming. Radio-Canada made it profitable not only to practice an art or be an intellectual but to do so in French . . .

Since writers, especially novelists, poets and playwrights could not make a living any more than today, Radio-Canada was certainly their lifeline as they could practice their art and write for radio or television and earn a little more money than by having their books published in Quebec.

It is regrettable to see this government directly attack not only writers, books and readers through the GST but also Radio-Canada through drastic budget cuts. Richard Ares, the Jesuit I just quoted, > described Radio-Canada as, on the one hand, the most powerful contributor to the disintegration of traditional culture and, on the other hand, a typical new cultural institution where the source of inspiration is not religious values anymore but language and a so-called secular and democratic humanism. Finally, Richard Ares rightly talks about a new leading, > vigorous and creative but non-religious cultural elite that will leave its mark on French Canadian culture.

For a Jesuit to write this in 1961 took a certain courage.

Senator David: Senator Hébert, do you—

Senator Hébert: You want to talk? I thought nobody else could.

Senator David: Nobody ever forbade us to talk and I am pleased to ask you a question. You often say, "I quote" and then, "according to Dubé or Ares". I would like to know which document, thesis, book or publication you are referring to because I find them extremely interesting.

Senator Hébert: Of course, there's a lot of asides. But I mentioned at the beginning (maybe you were away) that it was a thesis by Mr. Cau that was eventually published in a small book by a small publisher. It is called Histoire de l'édition au Québec, I believe. I can give you the exact reference with the publisher's name and the year of publication.

Senator David: Can I ask you a supplementary question? Is it the same book you referred to in the speech you gave last Friday? Is it the continuation of this thesis or this book that you continue to quote?

Senator Hébert: I see Senator Murray nodding. It shows he listened more carefully than you, dear doctor. It is a relatively unknown document. You are therefore justified in thinking that it may be unpublished but it is not the case. It would be surprising if those who appear not to take seriously the status and the importance of books in a market as small as Quebec and, to a certain extent, as English Canada had heard about this thesis.

Senator David: In what year was that book published?

Senator Hébert: I think it was in the late 70's or the early 80's. I mentioned it at the beginning of my speech but I don't have it anymore. It is with the stenographers but you surely have a copy.

Senator David: Do you know how many pages it contains?

Senator Hébert: Yes, it is 175 pages long.

Senator David: What page number are you at?

Senator Hébert: At about page number 100.

Senator David: Thank you, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: However, as I've done since the beginning, the time I've spent talking since Friday doesn't count because I often get away from this book. And I quoted many other sources. I quoted from a lecture I gave on the Hachette affair.

We were referring to the new cultural elite Father Arès was talking about in 1961.

> It was this new cultural elite made up of writers, academics and journalists, who, with Quebec politicians emerging from the Quiet Revolution, replaced the old religious elite and other leading citizens. In its mission to give symbols and values to Quebecers' expectations. This of course gave rise to a wave of protest in conservative circles—

I am talking about small-c conservatives even though it is sometimes hard to see a difference—> who violently attack the new authorities. This is confirmed by two statements.

>
> In 1962, in Les éditions de l'homme, E. Simard takes aim at all information media:—

> Montreal dailies give readers a distorted image of our people's judgment and conscience, not to mention television, radio, certain magazines—
>
> Jean-Louise Brouilli,

another Jesuit a little different from Father Arès, > reacted against newspapers that had replaced church authorities in providing collective symbols without really reflecting society. This is what Father Brouille, who made waves at the time, had to say:

Senator Beaulieu: He is not dead.

Senator Hébert: No, he is not dead, as I found out recently that he was busy writing, with a few collaborators, a history of St-Marie College alumni such as myself.

● (2100)

> Our papers have become quite important in the last few years.

He says this not because he is happy about it but because he finds it annoying.

> The new press has taken the place of priests and educators.

It is true that people were less likely to listen to Father Brouilli's sermons and more likely to read the papers.

> The influence exerted in the past by those who had a little instruction is not exerted today by the information media (press, radio and television).

I suppose he meant Jesuits such as himself. He resents having to admit that they are being overtaken by the media.

> Our daily newspapers do not really reflect French Canadian society.

Like the clergy was before people were liberated by books. The first years of the Quiet Revolution introduced a real change in Quebec publishing. To help you better understand the scope of these changes, I will give you an idea of what publishing was like before 1960.

> According to a statement made in 1964 by a group of sociologists from Laval University, publishers divide the development of publishing in the last 25 years into three periods. Before 1946 was the golden age but there is hardly any of those publishers left. The prosperity was mostly due to the opening of the international market following the enforced idleness of the French publishers, as I explained to you last Friday. Quebec publishers were authorized by MacKenzie King to publish French books that were in demand on the international market, mostly in North and South America, even if they later had to pay the copyrights to French editors then under German jackboots.

It was an era of artificial prosperity when publishers were gambling, living the good life, throwing parties at the Ritz-Carlton hotel which has since been taken over by Tory bigwigs.

> From 1947 to 1956-57 was the black period. Some publishers continued to publish out of a sense of obligation but it was a very difficult period.
> Since 1957-58, we have been in a period of renewal.
>
> The foundation of Les Éditions de l'homme and Les Édition Leméac in 1957 illustrates the climate of renewal observed in publishing circles in the late 1950s.
> On the eve of the Quiet Revolution the publishing world is still going through hard times. However, the profession is not a "dangerous adventure" as it was in the early 1950s. People, especially intellectuals and writers, expect publishers to promote creative works that fire and awaken the public imagination. Jean-Guy Pilon, a poet and Radio-Canada producer, wrote in 1959 that publishers are the link between writers and intellectuals and their public.

Obviously, without a publisher, the author cannot communicate his thoughts to his public.

> In 1959 Jean-Guy Pilon used both poetic and prophetic words to express this wish:
> Now that the structures of French Canadian society are about to burst, that some of our free spirits have decided to liberate us, that we feel the need to redefine ourselves in this cold, snowy country where pettiness is commonplace, it seems to me that the regular publication of serious books, whether they are political, social or literary works or simply testimonies given by free men, is not only desirable but essential. It was in 1959, at the beginning of the Quiet Revolution. We threw off the yoke of the omnipresent and very powerful church then associated with the conservative forces of the day, the Duplessis government, to put Quebec society into a kind of straightjacket. What this author with rather nationalistic views seems to forget is that Quebec was heading for a new darkness. A new church awaits us just around the corner. We notice a new unanimity among intellectuals.
> Quebec publishers faced up to the challenge and we saw, in the early 1960s, an increased production of books and the establishment of new publishing houses: HMH—which stands for Hatier, Manne and Hurtubise, PUM or Presses de l'Université de Montréal, the Éditions du jour which I know very well, Parti-Pris, and Boréal-Express.

[Senator Hébert.]

> Publisher Claude Hurtubise, for his part, is enthusiastic. He says that, at the beginning of the Quiet Revolution, publishing was characterized by public recognition of the importance of Canadian publishing.

He wrote this in 1962:

> The public is finally admitting in the only positive way, that is by buying them, that Canadian books exist and deserve to be read. The launching of a new Canadian book is not only a social event of interest to a small group of intellectuals and a benevolent press, it also reaches the general public.

This was written by one of my publishing colleagues, Claude Hurtubise, who is also a talented writer. It is worth noting however that, in 1962, he could refer to Canadian books in a Quebec publication although he really meant books written in French and published in Quebec. Nobody said anything at the time but it would be very different today because of the nationalist mood currently prevailing in Quebec.

> The publishing explosion symbolizes in a way the intellectual dynamism and the frantic activity of the Quebec people who, through their writers, have reclaimed their place in history. Publishing is both the cause and effect of the shattering of cultural and institutional frameworks that were in place at the beginning of and throughout the Quiet Revolution which . . .
> Michel Bernard, the French literary critic touring Quebec in 1962, accurately describes the importance of books, that is of writers, in the promotion of the new Quebec consciousness. He wrote this:
>
> In Quebec a book can become the living word, the key to the universe. How can we not like Quebec's intellectual environment where every original thinker can express his ideas and affect society around him.

• (2110)

> Here intellectuals see themselves as pioneers. They are clearing the forest, making tracks, making water gush out of springs, awakening dead souls, and every one of their words finds an echo. And it doesn't have to be a master> piece. Culture becomes life. The most modest of intellectuals knows he is part of a larger creative design.

> Culture connects with life. This statement by Michel Bernard can be read in the light of another statement by publisher Jacques Hébert who said in 1962: "Everything that relates to our problems can produce a bestseller."
>
> With the foundation of the Édition de l'Homme in 1957 . . .

With the participation of the cousin I named earlier, and the Éditions du Jour, also established by my cousin in 1961,

> . . . another kind of book quickly became popular in Quebec: Popular practical guides and books on current social and political realities. Books published by these two houses in the early 60s show the changes in Quebeckers' lifestyle and bear witness to the activities of certain social agents in the political or intellectual arena. These popular books or documents also instilled in many the desire to read and to learn.

What these writers seem to forget is that the Éditions du Jour, for example, was publishing not only popular books and works by agents of political or intellectual change as he calls them but also a lot of novels and books of poetry as this house launched about 100 novelists, and half as many poets, not to mention plays and other works which have nothing to do with so-called popular books.

> The Quiet Revolution put an end to the privileges enjoyed by the Church, that is the religious communities, at the educational and cultural level. The modernization and nationalization of schools especially sharply reduced the presence of religious communities in Quebec textbook publishing. As we know, prior to 1960, textbooks had become very important to the church in their efforts to propagate their ideas.
> In 1962, half textbook publishers (which in 1962 still accounted for over half of French language publishing) are religious communities. However, their market share fell from 60% in 1952 to 35% in 1962.
>
> The advent of core programs in 1960 put an end to the traditional textbook published most of the time by religious communities and full of religious images.

Some among you might remember adding up wafers and dividing up monstrances.

> Under these new programs, dynamic teaching tools were encouraging personal research by the students rather than by the submissiveness often linked to the use of manuals considered immutable.
>
> With the creation of the Ministry of Education came free public education at the secondary level. In primary and secondary schools textbooks are chosen by the ministry and purchases in approved bookstores. Religious houses in textbook publishing, except for Fidés (both cultural and educational publishing) these les Frères de l'instruction chrétienne, les Frères maristes. These two houses established before 1960 restructured themselves on a more commercial basis in the early 1960s, and some minor houses gradually withdraw througout the 1960s from textbook publishing and the book business. The emphasis on education and the rise in the level during the quiet revolution coincide with a vigorous expansion of the textbook market. Many secular textbook publishing houses such as Erpi, Guérin, Julienne, Lidec, Sablier and McGraw-Hill opened their doors.
> The number of titles and books printed are the best indicators we have to study the evolution of production. The number of titles will show us the wealth and variety of intellectual production; the number of books printed will give us an idea of the impact of production (reading) in social life. It cannot be assumed that these two indicators constitute the main explanation for the diversification of production quality or value of the books.
> The number of titles and books printed whose meaning is very relative, allows us to assess the social significance of these works. The value of the book, that is its impact on the intellectual life of society, only exists in the context of over-all production. In short, statistical analysis underlines the basic structural characteristics of production. We will then have to interpret its characteristics by using the available data on the relevant social framework.
>
> The evolution of Quebec editorial production from 1962 to 1967 is shown . . .

on a table further.

> What is important is that this evolution is represented by the proportional importance of each category within the production structure.

First there was a gradual fall of religious production. Let us start by comparing the evolution of production between 1962 and 1967 to what happened before the 1960s. In 1964 a team of sociologists from Laval University analyzed from bibliographical notices of the Société des écrivains all titles published in Quebec from 1937 to 1961. This team noted that since 1955 the annual production of popular works was done while scientific essays and literature were up.

> It could be said that we slowly went from a rather undifferentiated and edifying or religious production to a more differentiated one where poetry books and scientific essays of all kinds play an increasingly important role.
> The decline of popular literature, especially religious books, intensified during the period 1962-67 and gave way to science essays and literature and a more diversified production in general. As a percentage of global production from 1962 to 1967, essays and literary critical works come in first place with 14.68 %, followed by history and geography with 14.18 %. Canadian novels come in third place with 13.02 %; poetry comes fourth with 10.70 %; education and leisure is fifth with 9.64 %; religious books come in sixth place with 9.03 %. We then have youth literature in seventh place with 7.42 %, science in eighth place with 5.35 %, sociology in ninth place with 4.39 %, and foreign novels in tenth place with 4.03 %. At the bottom of the scale come the general category with 2.47 %, philosophy with 1.36 %, linguistics with 1.36 %, theather with 1.21 % and the arts with 1.11 %.

The percentage of religious books fell from 21.6 % in the period 1937-54 to 13.8 % in the years 1955-61, then to 9 % from 1962 to 1967. After dropping to 4.8 % in 1961 in the middle of the Quiet Revolution, religious publishing went up slightly to 10.27 % in 1963 and 12 % in 1964. This increase recorded in 1963-64 is due to the impact of the second Vatican Council. During that period, Quebec religious publishing was swept by the wave of renewal created by the Council. The prestigious Heritage et projet collection at Fides was launched during that time. The period following the second Vatican Council and particularly the 1970s saw again religious publishing fall to the bottom of the global production structure.

I think the percentage was 3.6 %. I remember publishing at that time a paperback edition of Pope John XXIII's first encyclic that had just come out. I was far from being a religious publisher but it proves my point. The second Vatican Council suddenly generated a lot of interest. I remember selling some 30,000 copies—with a 25-page foreword by Claude Ryan—at newstands everywhere, which was rather surprising.

The gradual decline of religious publishing and the considerable development of essays and literature show that academics, journalists, writers and poets started in the early 50s to replace church officials as legitimate symbols of society. With the shattering of cultural and institutional bastions in the late 50s and early 60s, the traditional role of religious values as a source of inspiration and main cultural integration factor was taken over by language and a kind of secular humanism.

In fact, we replaced the yoke of religion with the yoke of language and language-oriented nationalism.

Steady progress of literary production—The second comment in Table 3 concerns the steady progress of literary production. While the percentage, set at 22.5%, of literary works in world production made little progress from 1950 to 1965, Quebec literary production—novels, poetry, theatre

—which was clearly lower than the international average until the early 60's, has increased regularly since the Second World War, going from 14.7% in 1950 to 31.6% in 1961. From 1950 to 1961, Quebec literature accounted for an average of 19.3% of global production. This proportion then reached 29% from 1962 to 1967. In 1965, the percentage of total production allocated to literature was between 22% and 33% in 22 European countries. That same year, Quebec publishing was certainly holding its own with 30.9% of its production devoted to literature, novels, poetry and theatre works, not to mention youth literature (in the last category, Quebec had a slightly higher percentage with 37.8%).

[Senator Hébert.]

Let us look closely at the evolution of the two main literature sub-categories: poetry and novels. We see that from 1955 to 1960 Quebec writers favor poetry (8.6%) over novels (5.7%). After 1960, poetry production continued to progress (to 12.6% in 1964). But novels come before poetry books in the number printed category. Novels come in third place as a percentage of global production from 1962 to 1967 (13.2%) and poetry comes in fourth place (with 10.7%).

Publishing in the 1960's is clearly characterized by its vigor, a diversification of production and a new restructuring of the various styles. This development and diversification coincide to a large extent with an increase in the level of schooling due to a greater democratization of education. The organization of the school system is certainly a factor in the abundant production of history, geography, and educational books (respectively in second and fifth place in the rankings). The people who read these educational books usually come from social classes whose only wealth is their culture and who rely on the school system to spread their cultural heritage. But in the 60's the public of Quebec writers (mostly of fiction), whose demand has remained relatively high (average run: 3,000 copies), is no longer limited to professionals. According to the study done by Laval University sociologists, we see more readers among members of the middle class: semi-professionals, white collars and, of course, professors and students.

These "new" readers coming out of the universities in increasing numbers work in the developing educational and cultural sectors: the public service, radio and television, newspapers, universities and so on. Similar changes seems to be affecting the population of writers: since 1965, there has been an observed decline in the number of writers who are members of the clergy or religious communities (less than 17%). In addition, most writers now come from urban environments and most often belong to the upper-middle class. Lastly, more women are writing and publishing, but women are still largely under-represented (21.7%). Often associated with the education system and cultural institutions (radio and television, newspapers, etc.), writers, of whom the percentage of foreign origin is tending downward (14.5%), are thus finding social and institutional conditions more favourable to the dissemination of their works and to greater personal recognition.

The political phenomenon. One of the phenomena that marked the evolution of literary output in the mid-1950s was the very rapid development of poetry. That development was surprising at first. How can one explain that poetry was a prominent literary genre and an expression of Quebec culture for years before the Quiet Revolution? The changes observed in the evolution of literary output are without a doubt intimately related to the overall development of society, but, as we have repeatedly seen in the sociology of literature, literature is not a simple reflection of what a society is and experiences. "The production and consumption of literary books," writes Robert Escarpit . . .

and not "Escarpite", as someone wrongly said on Friday,

. . . are more related to the political structure than are voluntary activities, which area a realization of the need for communication in certain types of individuals, writers and readers. That need may be outwardly limited by institutional factors such as political propaganda, the police or religion."

In his study, Poetry and Society in Quebec, Axel Maugey observes that "Quebec's literary works present a very special interest since they are the primary manifestation of the level of cultural expression of a community which is entering the modern world and enriching that world as it goes." And he adds, very much to the point, that, "for a people that has been and remains dominated, poetic creation acquires a sense of individual reconquest through the reappropriation of language, which is the beginning of liberation through speech as a result of the irreversible process of thought and commitment it introduces. And indeed, poets, along with other intellectuals, were among the main social agents who, during the 1950s, prepared the Quiet Revolution through a slow and laborious rethinking of the old traditional, clerical, inward-looking society. To a certain extent, "in the early 1950s, poetry took on responsibility for what no longer was." And, as we are reminded by the poet, engraver and enamellist, Roland Giguère, certain poets at first took action through underground channels.

He writes:

• (2130)

I remember the 1950s as a time of extraordinary excitement . . .

This is Giguère speaking:

There was something clandestine in these activities carried on by a few isolated poets. It was of course a time of total darkness. We were somewhat like moles digging a tunnel toward the light, with no audience, no gallery . . .

because he was also an engraver,

. . . no publishers, nothing other than a wonderful, youthful revolt. Everything had to be done, and we did everything.

In the 1950s, the Éditions de l'Hexagone and a group of small poetry publishing houses gradually channelled the aspirations and actions of Quebec poets. L'Hexagone, the shrine of present day French-language poetry—and by "present day" I mean 1990 and 1991; let us hope it will survive the GST

—was founded in 1953 by a team of six persons from various backgrounds and led by Gaston Miron.

He is also a poet, as we all know.

From its founding, this publishing firm decided its goal was to make "a publishing and editorial effort" to change the rules of the game in the publication of poetry. In 1953, there were no publishers for poetry; most of the time, poets paid for publication out of their pocket because, they were told, poetry did not sell. Hexagone undertook to prove the contrary by recruiting a reading public for poetry. The method hit upon for reaching out and interesting poetry readers was the subscription. Hexagone involved the public in the company's operation through subscriptions to announced works. The subscriber paid for the work, which was numbered and autographed before publication. This fortuitous form of financing through subscription was maintained until 1968, a date that marked the start of the "professionalization" of this publishing firm. In its editorial policy, Hexagone also helped change the "graphic face"—the expression is Miron's—of Quebec publishing by attaching very great importance to the material presentation of books, that is to their graphics and page lay-out.

We recently learned that the Hexagone is still in existence. It has had its problems, but was just bought by the Sogidis Group some weeks ago, I believe.

In its editorial and literary policy, the Hexagone team examined from the outset the identity and universal nature of our literature. "We discovered," says Miron, "a lack of universality due to a lack of identity, and we understood, around 1958, that, to rise to the ranks of other national literatures, we needed a concept of a national literature . . . Culture must have a political dimension."

Well, that's his opinion. As for Gilles Marcotte, he says:

In addition to being a publishing house, an originator of poetic trends, Hexagone is an ideological entity, a supplier of ideas that concern not only the practice of poetry as such, but also social action as a whole.

An initial examination provides an overall picture of the development of Quebec editorial porduction from 1968 to 1977.

Between 1969 and 1977, the number of titles published in Quebec increased 214%. After increasing sharply from 1969 to 1975, the production of titles began slowing in 1975. The 22.7% decline recorded in 1975 was in fact the result of a technical problem in the reporting of statistics because 556 titles published by the government were not copyrighted in 1975, but rather during the 1976 statistical year.

I must admit I could have spared you that last detail.

The picture is less rosy when you consider the number of copies published and average printings. Between 1969 and 1977, the percentage increase in the number of copies published was less than the percentage increase in the number of titles: 114% compared to 214%. The result of this uneven growth was a decline in the average press run per title, which fell from 5,450 in 1969 to 3,723 in 1977, a decline of 31%.

> Developments in all production categories. We will now analyze developments in all categories of Quebec publishing output from 1968 to 1977. The figure used to represent those developments is the percentage size of each category in the production structure.
> Social science specialties. This brief comparative analysis of the Quebec publishing industry with those of four European countries . . .

There is an analysis here which I should have read to you, a comparative analysis of Quebec publishing out put and foreign output showing that it compares well with that of other countries.

> Before I analyze the development of Quebec publishing output from 1968 to 1977 in greater detail, it would be quite interesting to compare, with the aid of tables, the major trends in that development (that is to say, the nine major categories) with those observed in the output of other countries such as Belgium, Spain and the Federal Republic of Germany. A very striking fact is that, in the fields of science and education, Quebec is developing in its own way. Only Spain appears to be developing along similar lines.
> Literary output is spearheading Belgian, Spanish and German publishing; this category occupies the largest place in the output of those three countries. It should nevertheless be pointed out that the literary output percentages of the three other countries outclassed that of Quebec partly because those other three countries produce more children's books. In Belgium, for example, 616 children's books were published in 1976, 9.6% of the country's total publishing output. In Quebec during the same period, 125 books were published, 3.3% of total output.
> Quebec, Belgium and the Federal Republic of Germany, but not Spain, promote scientific publications almost at the same degree. Quebec more than the other three countries appears to favour publications in law, public administration, political science and political economy. From 1968 to 1972, Quebec's output of religious publications developed somewhat similarly to that of Spain and the Federal Republic of Germany, whereas, from 1973 to 1977, it was closer to that of Belgium. In addition, the marginalization of religious publishing in Quebec since 1974 did not occur in the other countries analyzed. Lastly, the historical and geographical studies published in Quebec compare favourably or somewhat favourably with those published in Germany and Belgium.
> The social science specialties. This brief comparative analysis of the Quebec publishing industry with those in four European countries thus underscores certain characteristics which differentiate it from the industries in the other countries. The decline of religious and literary publishing, the major expansion in education sciences and political and administration sciences seems to us to be a phenomenon that is closely bound up with the sociological development of Quebec in the 1960s and 1970s.
> After playing a primary role in the circulation of ideas between 1958 and 1968, Quebec literature has had markedly less influence since 1970 than other disciplines such as the humanities and social sciences, in particular as a result of the gradual decline in religious output, and does not seem to be the genre used to state a broader plan for community existence as it was in the 1960s.
> More particularly, it seems to us—and this is the hypothesis we want to advance—that the writers (particularly literary writers, poets and novelists who, in the late 1950s, replaced the traditional wielders of influence, the clerical elites and the "notables") in the symbolic legitimization of the cultural, social and political universe of Quebeckers, the writers have in turn been replaced since 1970 in this function of symbolic legitimization by specialists in education and social sciences. For a few years now, these specialists have managed phenomenal development in all the social sciences, particularly education, from their bases in the new "centres of influence", that is to say the educational institutions, which, starting in 1960, began to take over from the traditional forms of clerical tutelage. For members of a social class, whose social position was altered as a result of the various economic, social and political changes in Quebec since 1960, these fields provide access to management positions and high incomes. To improve their social position, the greatest number of members of the lower and middle French-speaking middle class study toward university degrees in the social sciences. "From 1970 to 1975, the largest number of graduates were in the humanities and social sciences: 3,643 in 1970 and 5,297 in 1975. This was followed by the education sector, in which the number of graduates rose from 1,000 to 3,785. The education sector saw the largest increase in six years: 275%."
> In short, our impression is that these social science specialties, which have been rapidly expanding since the 1970s, can be held responsible for this explosion in Quebec publishing output in education, political and administration sciences. These specialists, these sociologists among others, have, for example, enabled the public to accept progressive political measures by the governments in power. They have encouraged people to develop collective solutions to their problems, and their efforts to increase awareness have produced even more fundamental changes in people's perceptions of the distinct, specific and original character of Quebec society.
> In conclusion, it should not be forgotten, however, that the sharp increase in the number of titles in certain categories of Quebec's output is also closely linked to the radical change in and democratization of the education system (that is to say, the phenomenal expansion in the secondary, collegiate and university education system). "The number of graduates at the three levels—secondary, collegiate and university—increased from 1970 to 1975 > by 80.6%, 231% and 7.5% respectively." The majority of young people now continue their education to the end of the secondary level. In 1977, according to the following table, 80% of young people 16 years of age were still in school, compared to 51% in 1961.

Senator Hastings: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Hébert: I sure would.

Senator Hastings: I am sure that we are all very grateful for the exposé the honourable senator has given us this evening with respect to the contribution that publication and printing has made to educating the masses during the quiet revolution in Quebec. I am sure that the honourable senator would agree that all the great periods of reform throughout history have been aided by the distribution of literature and information; for example, Martin Luther and the Renaissance. His success was due to the invention of the printing press which, for the first time, carried the printed word to the multitudes.

I presume that the honourable senator would agree that one of the most regressive features of this goods and services tax is that, for the first time, we are going to tax the printed word, including school books and those publications that are so necessary to the education of our youth. I am sure that one of the greatest disappointments to the youth of this nation was the rejection by the Senate, particularly by the Conservative majority in the Senate, of the Liberal amendment which would have changed that very regressive feature of the GST. There are many regressive features to this tax, but had the government been a little more sympathetic, perhaps—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Are you speaking or asking a question?

Senator Hastings: I am asking a question. If you will listen carefully, you will see that I am asking a question of my friend with respect to the taxation of the printed word as a result of the rejection by the Conservative majority in this legislature of an amendment. Had that amendment been accepted, it would have made the GST a little more palatable.

Senator Hébert: A little more.

Senator Hastings: Not much but, nevertheless, it would have been palatable to the coming generations of Canadians who will be saddled with the GST on many things; in particular, on this most important feature, education materials that are used in our schools.

Does the honourable senator agree with me that that is one of the most regressive features of this tax?

Senator Hébert: I most certainly agree, and I have been trying to say that in all kinds of ways. During the past week we have argued the terrible effects the GST will have on many sectors of our nation—for example, in certain regions, like the great North; on certain types of organizations, like the cooperative movement; and, on certain goods, like fuel. It is obvious to me, at least, what the government is doing. Taxing books is the most devastating of all the effects that the GST will have on our society, because it is a way of depriving our society of ideas, of books, of poetry, of joy, of information, of education. This will not be without serious consequences on future generations. There is do doubt in my mind that the other amendments that we and the two Independent senators presented were all good amendments. However, this one is something special. It touches something very intimate in the soul of our nation, and we will never be able to evaluate exactly the consequences of this really crazy gesture of the government.

● (2140)

I think they could have made a mistake. We all do. But this mistake was explained to them at such length—not by me, I'm doing my job now,—and I am not referring just to us, I am referring to the people directly concerned and the best informed among them. That is to say the writers, the poets, the novelists, the drama writers, the publishers that allow them to reach their public, and the bookstore owners—all these people have told the government and have formed a very united common front as they have done in Toronto for English Canada and in Montreal for French Canada. These two groups have done a fantastic job gathering everybody and uniting against the government to try to convince two governments, and in the case of Quebec they have succeeded in changing the mind of the Quebec government.

How is it, and I wonder really, why is it that this government does not at least accept this small amendment? We are not talking about a great amount of money. I do not think it would make much difference to the deficit. I do not think so at all. It has been mentioned previously that it is not a great amount of money. So why is it that the government is so stubborn on this matter? If they had accepted this one amendment—and as you have just mentioned, senator, the bill would still be a bad bill, and the tax would still be a bad tax—but at least they would have recovered some dignity with a very important sector of our society, and a very influential one.

I know that politicians do not think much of intellectuals usually, but, in the long run, intellectuals very often have the last word on politicians. So I do not understand why, simply for political reasons if not for any other, why they did not change their mind on this small part of their bill?

Well, we will never know.

[Translation]

Senator Lefebvre: Would you permit another question, Senator Hébert?

I was just reading an article published in La Presse on November 29. The headline reads, "Ottawa refuses to cancel the GST on books. Minister of Revenue softens stance: let's pass the act first." The article is written by Philippe Dubuisson of La Presse's Ottawa bureau. I'll read only two paragraphs, and I would like to ask you some questions afterward.

> After its victory in Quebec City the day before, the Coalition Against All Taxes on Books suffered a bitter defeat yesterday in Ottawa. The federal Minister of Communications, Mr. Marcel Masse, categorically stated there was no way the federal government would exempt books from the GST. For his part, the Minister of Revenue, Otto Jelinek, suggested that Ottawa might remove the GST on books, but not before the act was passed.

Encouraged by the Quebec government's decision to offset the effect of the 8% sales tax on books, a large Coalition delegation of some 200 writers, editors and book store owners appeared on Parliament Hill during the morning.

Could you tell us, Senator Hébert, whether you had the opportunity to meet with this major delegation of people from Quebec? I imagine you know almost all of them. Did you have the opportunity to discuss their important request with them? Is there some small hope that the government may change its mind eventually and, with a little heart, follow Quebec's example? As we all know, the Quebec government had announced it intended to impose a provincial GST on books. That would have added 16% to the price of books because the Quebec GST would have applied after the federal GST. But it seems these people understood the common sense argument against such a measure. Here in Ottawa, can we expect that the government representatives may also use a little common sense from time to time and recognize that these people are right?

I would like you to explain what the people who came here hoped to achieve when they set out.

Senator Hébert: Well, first of all, I would like to tell you that the delegation came to Ottawa twice. They came a first time when they held a press conference here on Parliament Hill. They met with a number of Liberal senators. They tried to meet with Conservative senators, but were not able to do so. They did not manage to meet those whom they met because they were well received by their secretaries. On the contrary, the secretaries refused to organize meetings with the representatives of the Coalition.

They nevertheless managed to meet a few senators, they told me, by chance in the elevators and in the halls. I wish to tell you that the Conservative senators were not very interested in hearing what the President of the Coalition and the persons accompanying him had to say. Their impression was that they were better received by the Liberal senators than by the others. I am telling you what they told me.

● (2150)

I also met a number of the members of the Coalition again at the Montreal Book Fair, which is a major event and showcase of the dynamic book industry in Quebec. The Fair was a fantastic success and, in a few days, attendance exceeded the 100,000 visitors originally expected. I spent four or five hours there on Saturday and Sunday.

Despite the fact that it was a considerable success—since the publishers were pleased with sales of the books displayed and so on—there was also a sense of sadness and gloom because of the GST. Everyone wore buttons that read, "No to the GST on Books". In all the areas, at almost all the booths, at the entrance and everywhere else, there was this handsome petition booklet. And by the way a Globe and Mail review which I quoted on Friday described these handsome black booklets, which were something like school exercise books, but black—it was not by chance that they were black—then in white letters, there was the Coalition's slogan, "Taxing books is imposing ignorance". So, despite the fact that it was a major book fair, there was for the first time—I've been attending the event for some 25 years now—something gloomy and sad about it.

I believe I told you about the very moving moment when the President of the Fair, Jean-Claude Germain, who is a writer himself, a playwright, and who was Honourary President of the Book Fair this year, suddenly took the microphone and asked everyone who could hear him in the enormous room to observe a minute of silence because of this incredible misfortune that has befallen the book publishing industry in Quebec.

I don't know if these are things that people on the other side find funny, but none of the people who were there laughed, and there were thousands of people at the Book Fair. And people in fact stopped talking for a minute and said to themselves: what we are seeing at the Fair this year is the end of an era. Some of the publishers exhibiting their books this year won't be at the Fair next year because they will have disappeared.

To come back to your question, I believe that the delegation that came here and that included a large number of writers and publishers and book store owners went home very disappointed. They had just achieved a major victory in Quebec City and arrived here fully confident that they would be received with at least a minimum of courtesy by the government people. Not more than one or two weeks earlier, they had tried to meet with the Conservative senators from Quebec and were of course unsuccessful. I can tell you that because I gave them telephone numbers and other information and they tried . . . All the Conservative senators from Quebec received a telephone call from the President of the Coalition, Mr. Foulon, and every one of them found an excuse not to receive either the delegation or Mr. Foulon. They returned this time with more prestigious names such as Gratien Gélinas, and Beauchemin, the novelist, and a number of others, hoping this time they would be received with a minimum of courtesy. They were not.

You saw what Mr. Masse told them? That was the most positive response. It was in fact a formal no to their main request to remove the GST from books. Mr. Masse told them stories about wanting to apply remedies to the publishing industry in an attempt to calm publishers somewhat by telling them: well, you're going to lose money, of course, but, on the other hand, I'll be giving you a little, and so on, not realizing that was not the problem. The real problem is that fewer people are going to read; fewer people are going to be able to buy books. Even if we assist certain publishers so that they don't starve, that won't help people buy books at a reasonable price.

Senator Lefebvre: One question with your permission. You have acquired considerable experience in this field, Senator Hébert, over many years, particularly in Quebec. But you have contacts and are in communication, I believe, from sea to sea, with writers and publishers in English Canada as well. I would like to draw a comparison. In Quebec, you call a book a best-seller when it has sold several thousands of copies, I believe. In the United States, however, a best-seller sells tens and tens and tens of thousands of copies. So, by comparison, what can a Quebec author hope for? To sell 10,000 to 15,000 copies if his book is a major success, compared to his cousin in the United States or England, or even with an author in France. I believe we saw in the newspapers that, if Quebec and Ottawa had both imposed the GST, that would have put 30% of the Quebec book publishing industry in serious danger of bankruptcy, if I am not mistaken.

Quebec has finally understood. They were very open; they listened to all the people who objected to the measure. They finally understood in Quebec City that they were endangering a very important cultural industry for Francophones, particularly in North America. So can you tell me what the danger is for French-language publishing especially in Quebec now that Ottawa has upheld its decision to impose the tax? Does that still threaten publishing in Quebec?

Senator Hébert: I don't think we can go so far as to say that Quebec publishing will disappear as a result of the GST. No one has gone so far as to say that. What is going to disappear, however, is a large number of small publishing firms. The larger firms will survive. That much is virtually certain. They will have more problems; they will raise the prices of their books. They will therefore sell fewer copies, and readers will therefore suffer. That much is certain. However, as for the firms that will disappear, we think it will be more the young firms. And I have often said that this is a field where it will not be enough for us to have only large firms. There are all sorts of contingencies in larger firms as a result of which it becomes more difficult at some point for a young author to get published. It is essential that we have small publishing houses that publish perhaps 10 books a year. Incidentally, I quoted statistics a moment ago and it was said that a firm is considered a publisher if it publishes more than four books in one year. From a statistical point of view, it is considered a publisher if it produces that figure. It can be a publisher that publishes books, but doesn't necessarily hang out its shingle perhaps. But if someone publishes only four books a year, he is a publisher. He doesn't need to have offices on St. Catherine Street. He can do it in his basement, doing business with printers. But the essential point is that we should not turn our noses up at that. Throughout history, there have been great poets, great . . . I am thinking of Jacques Ferron, for example, who is one of our very important novelists in Quebec, who began to publish with a small publishing house of no importance whatsoever. It was not even a real publisher. It was a printer who had small crank presses, and that's how Ferron published his first books.

The small publishing houses are going to be terribly affected by the GST. There is absolutely no doubt about that. I believe that the Coalition, which conducted the appropriate studies, told us that it expected 30% of book stores would close their doors.

That was when they expected to see two GSTs. Of course, that figure should be somewhat lower. Perhaps 15% of book stores will close their doors. That's nevertheless a lot of people, a lot of lost jobs and, especially, a lot of cultural centres, which is what the book stores are, that will disappear from the smallest municipalities and the less well-off neighbourhoods.

So it will have a harmful effect on small publishing firms, in particular, which will disappear, and on a certain number of book stores, which will also disappear. Even those that remain will suffer considerably from the GST because all the evidence given in all the studies that have been conducted to date shows that books are one of the first goods affected by a crisis, by recession, by a price increase, by inflation, by any other such thing. Books suffer first. Why? Because people first have to eat. People can't help it, they have to buy food, clothing, get their hair cut, and so on. When it comes to books, well, people can wait till next month, or they can wait until the situation improves.

● (2200)

In others words, this means that book sales are going to fall dramatically, if the GST is ever applied to books. And if book sales decline dramatically, publishers' press runs will fall as well. When press runs fall, that means that the unit cost of each book will increase. Book prices increase, and sales fall off even further. If sales fall off even further . . . well, you can see it's a vicious circle, and it is more catastrophic than it seems at first glance.

[English]

Hon. Colin Kenny: Senator Hébert, on page 99 of the committee's report, the GST and education is commented on. The report outlines how upset most witnesses from the educational sector were with the GST, and sets out their opposition to it in principle. Beyond that, they expressed specific concerns in relation to the GST and how it could negatively affect education in this country. I wonder if you could comment on that.

The Canadian Federation of Students decried the taxation of textbooks and other educational materials because they must be purchased separately by students. The federation emphasized that students could be adversely affected by the GST since many would not qualify for the full refundable credit. In order to qualify, one needs to earn at least $11,169 to claim the full $100 singles credit. The federation told the committee that only 22 per cent of post-secondary students have incomes in excess of $10,000. One could then conclude that almost 80 per cent of students would not be entitled to the full credit.

I would be interested to know if you have any views on that, particularly as it relates to Quebec students and their ability to get the required textbooks in order to carry on their studies.

Senator Hastings: Allow me, honourable senator, to point out something I read the other day in La Presse on the very subject we are discussing now. The article was entitled "The tax on books: more than a partial victory" and said the following.

> The Bourassa gouvernment was wise to annonce yesterday that there will be no tax on books in Quebec starting in January.
>
> The announcement was made by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Gérard D. Lévesque. Although he was all smiles as usual, he must have acted with some reluctance. After stoically resisting the pressures exerted by the book industry and even by a few of his own colleagues, the Minister of Finance finally gave in.
> This goes to prove that the arts and culture community is making its presence felt much more than we could believe. The publishers, booksellers and authors succeeded in mustering popular support, which shows that they are not destined for marginality.

You said the same thing tonight, Senator Hébert.

> The Minister's decision should not, however, be viewed as a present, but rather as a good move. The new tax, in addition to the GST, would almost certainly have stirred up a crisis in the book industry.
>
> While not bringing about the wave of bankrupticies predicted by the opponents to the tax, a price increase in excess of 15 per cent would have lead to a decline in book sales, a change in reading habits toward other reading material, such as anglophone pocket books, and a shift in the policies of the publishers facing a shrinking market.
>
> The fact that Ottawa still insists on imposing its GST on books does not mean that the book industry win only a partial victory. A 15 per cent tax is not only twice as harmful as a 7 per cent tax, but this double tax was so high that it was setting a psychological barrier many would-be buyers would have found hard to overcome. The 7 per cent federal GST, on the other hand, will be more easily absorbed by consumers.
>
> Some are wondering why Mr. Lévesque made it a temporary measure, why he suspended the tax for a year and did not make a commitment for later on. It can be explained.
>
> In 1991, it is not the GST that would have applied to books but the conventional provincial sales tax that would have been extended to more goods and services for a year, before the real GST would have been implemented in 1992. That transitory measure was doubtful: The Minister was taking advantage of the hubbub created by the introduction of the GST to raise his revenues.
> It is easier to drop that strictly provincial temporary tax than to move back on the true GST in 1992, because one objective of the Quebec government is to harmonize its GST with the federal GST so as to avoid a complex and contradictory double system.
>
> That is why the Minister of Finance is right to wish first that Ottawa will also accept not to tax books before committing himself for after 1991. But he must not wait too long.

[Senator Hastings.]

Otherwise, the book trade will go through the year that will soon begin in a state of uncertainty, without knowing if it can rely for the future on a serene climate, favourable to its development.

> The battle will now move to Ottawa. There is little chance that the federal government is going to give up rapidly. Incredibly unpopular, getting only 12 per cent of the support of Canadians according to the Crop-Environics survey published this week in La Presse, the Conservative government is surviving only by disregarding the wind of opposition it is causing. In such a context, and facing the hysterical struggle against GST across Canada, the Conservatives can hardly amend the GST legislation, even for good reasons, without reviving the hopes of those who wish its abandonment. That is why, even if the Minister Michael Wilson were willing to accept amendments to the GST, he can reasonably do it only after it will have been passed and implemented. The English Canadian publishing industry has a wider market, but it has to face considerable pressure from the American industry. The survival of the English Canadian culture is threatened too. This battle in Ottawa may be won because the French publishing industry is not the only one to suffer from this new form of taxation. I think, honourable senator, that this article says exactly what you told us tonight about the GST.

Senator Hébert: I thank you for giving us these details, Senator, as I thank my other colleague for his questions. In fact, you are absolutely right.

Senator Kenny was pointing to the new burden that this tax will impose on those in need of help, that is the students, especially the university students. This tax brings disaster for them.

In Quebec, university students recently faced a very large increase in tuition fees, and now they are being told by the federal government that books—mainly scientific books which are often very expensive—will be taxed.

By the way, in student circles senators don't have such a great reputation, especially these days, but right now, I must say, Liberal senators are getting a lot of support from university students. I do not think they are indifferent to our fight.

I just received a letter that I happen to have with me and, I think, it addresses the question as far as students are concerned. It is from Krista Slade of the University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council. It says:

● (2210)

> Dear Senator Hebert
>
> I am writing on behalf of the Students' Administrative Council at the University of Toronto. We represent 32,626 full-time undergraduates at Canada's largest and most diverse university.

[Translation]

Not very many conservatives in there.

[English]

> I wanted to thank you for voting for the amendment which would have protected books and other reading materials from the proposed Goods and Services Tax (GST). We are strongly opposed to the GST as a whole but have been particularly lobbying on behalf of books being exempted. This is a significant issue for us because we feel the GST on books will create a financial burden and hence barrier to reading for our economically disadvantaged citizens. As these are the people who most need easy access to information, to tax them is regressive in the Canada of 1990. Sadly, this is to be our legacy to International Literacy Year.
> I preach to the converted, however, so I will thank you once again for all of your efforts in the Upper Chamber. We congratulate you for truly representing our interests in Ottawa and wish you well in your continued fight against the GST.
>
> Yours respectfully.

I have received lots of letters such as this that I could read ad infinitum. That is why those among—

[English]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Senator Hébert, I wonder if I could just interrupt you for a moment to contrast the type of message you gave there with an extract from a book that I have been reading recently. I do not know if you have heard of the author of this book. It is entitled One Woman's War and the author is a woman who was born in Saskatchewan, Gladys Arnold. She studied and worked in France for some years just prior to the war, and happened to be there for the fall of France and escaped with one of the last groups of people who were taken back, in the first instance, to Britain. One of the interesting things about her is that she was very committed to the French cause and Free France, and she came back here and worked as the information officer with the Free French consulate here in Ottawa for the rest of the war, from 1941 and for many years afterwards. She writes in a very vivid and moving way, but one of the things she talks about is that when she got to London, they were expecting, at that time, in the summer of 1940, that London would be the next point of attack after the fall of France, and all the people were trying to be prepared. She describes them turning in their pots and pans, and using all their articles of household furniture and contributing things to the cause. She describes in a wonderful way the great spirit of the British people when they were facing what they thought would be almost imminent attack. However, I should like to read the paragraph that I thought you would be most interested in. This was in the summer of 1940 when, as I say, the British were expecting to be bombed at any time. She writes:

> A stir of excitement arose when the newspapers announced that the British government intended to tax books. Public indignation almost swept the war news off the front pages. Authors, book publishers, librarians and booksellers called a huge meeting to protest, chaired by J. B. Priestley. The meeting turned into an enormous street crowd. "Tax on books! Never! Not in Britain. What are we fighting for?"—that was the message and it kindled thunderous applause. The British government hastily denied any such intention.

I just wonder if you would like to comment on the contrast of this type of reaction of the people themselves and then of the government, realizing the enormity of what they were doing. In spite of the sacrifices and the necessity for money at that time, they still decided not to tax books.

Senator Hébert: That is a very interesting anecdote. I do not know if it will help in any way, shape or form to change the minds of the people on the other side, but it should. All of the civilized countries of the world that have a GST of some sort—with the exception of Denmark, for reasons that I do not know—have either totally exempted books, as they did in Great Britain, or, at the least, have reduced the tax to a bare minimum, as has been done in France and elsewhere. So Canada and Denmark will be the only countries that will treat books in a different way from all the other civilized countries of the world. It is really a shame, and in reading this letter I wanted to share with my colleagues on this side, at least, the knowledge that we are supported in this fight much more than it might seem from reading a few editorials that seem to imply that we have lost the battle and that we should quit. We on this side know that we have not lost the battle, that we are not ready to quit at all, and that a lot of Canadians feel the same way and give us their support.

I thank them like I thank this student who wrote Liberal senators in the name of 32,626 full-time undergraduates at Canada's largest and most diverse university. I just grabbed a few letters as a diversion, and some are very touching.

Senator Hastings: Read them!

Senator Hébert: I will read a few.

Senator Hastings: Just for a change of pace.

Senator Hébert: This first one comes from the association coopérative d'économie familiale de Québec. Apparently it is a federation of some sort of family cooperatives in Quebec that I do not know, and they say:

[Translation]

> Honourable Senator,
> Since our organization has the mission to protect the interests of consumers in the Quebec area, and particularly those of low and middle income people, the Quebec chapter of the ACEF is very concerned with the negative impact of the GST. We are asking you and all members of the Senate to do whatever you can to beat this legislation which will make the federal tax system even more regressive and which will have negative effects on an economy already in a full recession.
>
> Respectfully yours,

Roger Beaudoin
Coordinator for the ACEF Board of directors

I think it is worth it that once in a while . . . I have received another letter from a doctor, an opthalmologist, Dr. Ross Harris . . . Good Heavens, he seems to have a whole lot of titles. Dr. Keon could help us with the meaning of MD, FRCSC and FAAO.

● (2220)

[English]

Ross Harris, M.D., F.R.C.S.(C), F.A.A.O. from Sherwood Park, Alberta, states:

Dear Senator:

I wish to address the issue regarding passage of the goods and services tax. It is clear that the people of Canada have spoken eloquently against this tax and I wish to add my voice to the populace in hopes that democracy will reign and the Senate will vote against passage of this bill.

For Dr. Harris, democracy commands that we vote against this bill. The letter continues:

With the latest Gallup poll indicating that only 15 per cent of the people support the Conservative government . . .

Dr. Harris is just one poll late.

Senator Hastings: It was 4 per cent in the Montreal-Sainte-Marie by-election.

Senator Hébert: The letter continues:

. . . which has tried to shove this tax down our throats, I think this is the time to show Canadians that the Senate does have an important role to play in the workings of government. I only wish that the mechanisms were in place that would allow the Senate to have a vote of confidence and remove this undemocratic governing party from power.

As a former Conservative, now Reform Party member . . .

Dr. Harris is a former Conservative, but he has had it with the last six years of the Conservative government. He is now a Reform Party member and not a Liberal, so I am not quoting someone from my own party. He continues:

I applaud the Liberal senators who have stood their ground and listened to the people of Canada.

That is the key phrase. We are listening and the government is not. He concludes:

I congratulate the Senate for performing an integral role in preserving democracy in Canada.

[Translation]

Here is a letter written on a piece of paper. It comes from Quebec City.

Dear Sir,

I commend you for defending the poorest people. You are proving yourselves to be democrats by defending the majority against a group of MPs who have sold out to the rich bankers.

I pray that God will give you the courage you need to block this bad proposal. You will go down in history.

Étienne Giguère
321 Père Marquette
Quebec City

That comes from the heart.

Dear Sir,

Allow me to congratulate you for . . .

Doctor Ross Harris is not a white beret. He is a former Conservative, who has now become a member of the Reform Party.

Allow me to congratulate you for your effort in the fight . . .

Senator Lefebvre: Senator, would you allow me a question?

Senator Hébert: With pleasure, senator.

Senator Lefebvre: You have certainly been in the vanguard of the Senate troops, of the Liberal senators who have fought against this harmful tax, the GST. I am aware that you have received thousands and thousands of petitions and letters by the hundreds. Have you analyzed those letters and petitions, and out of the thousands and thousands of Canadians . . .

Senator Cogger: Billions!

Senator Lefebvre: Perhaps it's up to a million. Perhaps you could go count them, Senator Cogger? You don't seem to have very much to do.

Could you tell us whether, among all those letters, there was even one in 10,000 in favour of the GST and condemning your work and all your colleagues on this side of the House in fighting against the GST? Has anyone written to tell you to stop? Or, on the contrary, do they encourage you to do more and more?

Senator Hébert: In all honesty, I must admit that I have received a few letters out of several hundred in favour of the tax. Perhaps I received two or three from people who did not agree with us and who told us we should pass the GST. But . . .

Senator Lefebvre: Is that a letter that was sent by Senator Cogger, perhaps?

Senator Hébert: No, but it certainly came from his friends. They came from people in the chambers of commerce and people close to the Manufacturers' Association, that is to say from rich people whom the tax will profit directly. But the not so rich people, who cry out in this way . . .

Senator Cogger: Just a minute! That's a gratuitous allegation.

Senator Hébert: Senator Murray told you to be quiet.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert, you cited my name; I am answering you. The letters you have received . . .

Senator Lefebvre: You're completely mixed up!

Senator Hébert: He's the one who cited my name, not I. Listen to your leader, who has told you to be quiet.

Senator Cogger: You received one letter in favour of the GST. So be it. What entitles you to say it came from my friends or from millionaires or I don't know what. I haven't seen these people and I don't know them. I have never heard of you tabling a favourable letter when you table the letters. We will analyze them some time in the future. In the meantime, these are gratuitous allegations you are making.

Senator Hébert: First, I remind you once again that Senator Murray told you very clearly to sit down and be quiet. I fail to understand why you have no discipline! If Senator MacEachen told me to be quiet, I would definitely sit down.

Senator Cogger: If Senator Murray told you to be quiet, would you be quiet?

Senator Hébert: If I lacked discipline, yes.

Senator Cogger: I heard you say on television that you had an unlimited passion for the fight against this bill, that there was nothing that would hold you back, not even the health of Senator Hastings. Now you have just told me that, if Senator MacEachen told you to be quiet, you would be quiet. I'm glad to hear of it. I am pleasantly surprised, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: Listen . . .

[English]

Senator Hastings: I wish the honourable senator would leave my health out of the discussion. I am very well and I am going to be around here to oppose this damn tax for quite a while yet. So just forget about my health when discussing what is going on.

Senator Kenny: How are you feeling?

Senator Hastings: I am feeling 100 per cent.

Senator Murray: You look better than you did.

Senator Barootes: Thanks to the physician you used to deride and make fun of.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I never derided the honourable senator.

Senator Barootes: You mocked him.

Senator Hastings: I derided the method of appointment of the eight senators, but I never personally derided anyone and I want the record to indicate that. I did deride the appointment of the eight regional Royal representatives and the method used by the Prime Minister. However, I never questioned the integrity of honourable senators who came forward as a result of that act by the Prime Minister.

● (2230)

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I would like to return to Senator Cogger because he said something that was not correct, but that was perhaps not his fault. He is not always here. When he said I had never presented letters or petitions in favour of the GST, that is not correct.

I did so, I believe, at the start of last week. I received a petition bearing one signature from someone who was in favour of the tax. I tabled it here in the Senate. You can see it in the files. Consequently, when you say I have never done so . . .

Senator Lefebvre: When that person sent you a letter in favour of the GST, did you frame it and put it in your office? That would be a very rare person indeed! When I was with the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in the Atlantic provinces and in the Northwest Territories and Vancouver, no one was in favour of the tax at that time either. Have you taken a small poll to determine whether that person wasn't perhaps the sister, sister-in-law or wife of one of the Conservative MPs or senators, or perhaps the President of the Conservative Party Association in those provinces? Did you conduct a poll on the subject?

Senator Hébert: I didn't frame it. I did the only honest thing. I tabled it here in the Senate. It was the only petition that had one signature. So listen to Senator Murray, when he tells you to be quiet!

Senator Cogger: The only petition in favour of the GST that I've seen recently was signed by your own brother, a car dealer in Repentigny. On the back of his business card, he wrote: "Jacques, please let the GST pass." The MP who represents the region where your brother lives and has a dealership came and tried to table it in the House. He was interrupted and brutally thrown out by your colleagues, Senator Corbin.

Senator Hébert: This story of a business card was obviously a practical joke. I telephoned my brother, and he doesn,t remember the incident at all. So i don't know what's going on. It's obviously a story made up by your colleague on the other side of the House.

I hope that's your last word, Senator Cogger, because I . . .

Senator Lefebvre: I would like to point out that Senator Stanbury was reading petitions one evening and there was one signed, "Ray Hnatyshyn, Rideau Hall". He did ot check to see whether it was His Excellency or not. I don't know whether he was against the GST. So perhaps Senator Cogger could mention his as well.

Senator Hébert: In any case, as I told you, I received a petition bearing one single name. I'm not even certain it was legal.

However, Senator Murray did the same thing a little earlier when he presented us with a petition with a single signature sent by fax by the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I don't think that one was legal either.

In any case, I just thought I didn't want Senator Cogger to criticize me for never tabling petitions. All of a sudden, he's the one who sent it! So I took no chance and tabled it here about a week ago, I think, thinking that it was an exception, that it was the only petition signed by a single person in favour of the tax.

I have here . . .

Senator Lefebvre: I also believe that we received a petition bearing three or four signatures. They were all by people working in the office of the Government Leader in the Senate or something like that. Do you remember that petition?

Senator Hébert: Yes, I don't know whether I have it here, but I have it somewhere. Someone asked me for photocopies.

Senator Frith described to us the scene when it went to Senator Murray's office. Obviously, when he called for his staff, he couldn't find them. They are all on the payroll and they were in a poor position to say no when asked to sign a document.

So we don't know what they really think. We simply know that they signed all the same saying they were in favour of the tax. In the eyes of the Government Leader in the Senate, that was a petition signed by those three employees.

The other petition was a fax signed by one person, the President of the Manufacturers' Association. I don't think that was legal, but, well . . .

In any case, then, I have another one here, which comes from a certain Christin Sheitoysin, who writes:

> Dear Sir,
>
> Allow me to congratulate you on the struggle you and your Liberal colleagues are conducting against the GST.
>
> You are an example of tenacity and hope in a society that has become all too careless of its material, psychological and moral well-being.
>
> My sincerest regards.

Mr. Jean Ouellette, from Sillery:

> I would like you to know I unreservedly support your heroic fight against the GST. Notwithstanding the comments of some . . .

He is alluding, I imagine, to some editorialists, who are not pleased that we listen to people when they themselves do not.

> . . . there is no doubt in my mind that you have the support of the very great majority of Canadian men and women who despair of the day when the Conservative government may accept the obvious and give up its proposal.
> I learned with a great deal of satisfaction that your party is to establish a committee to propose alternatives to the GST. I dare hope you will make recommendations that will ensure a better redistribution of the Canadian tax burden, among other things, to ensure that corporations and high-income earners pay their fair share. They have benefitted too much from Conservative government largesse.
> So I wish you every success. Do not give up, and remember you need not be ashamed of the tactics you employ and that you must employ in future, because the majority supports you.

Well, personally, I prefer to read a letter like this from an ordinary citizen named Jean Ouellette, at 1234 Luxembourg Avenue, in Sillery, than certain editorials by people who imagine that, within the four walls of their little office, they can decide the fate of the world without consulting or listening to anyone.

I have here another letter signed by three persons. It is almost as good as Senator Murray's petition! I have three names: Mrs. Marie-Jeanne Boyer, housewife; Aurèle Boyer, farmer, and Thérèse Eva Boyer, student and teacher. Three people from Saint-Rémy, Province of Quebec, who tell me:

> Dear Sir,
>
> We support your actions against the appointment of the eight senators in conflict of interest and the introduction of the GST bill. What an aberration this bill is. We are going through a period of instability in the world and recession across the country. The result is trouble for the young and the not so young, and worries for the less well-off in our cities, provinces and our country. What is the government in power thinking of?

It isn't thinking of anything, of course.

> They tell us in a mealy-mouthed way that the tax is designed to reduce the deficit. But what are they doing about the debt?
> The policy of our present government is a monstrous farce, a low-grade comedy. What are our politicians, our dear elected representatives thinking of when they think, if they think at all? Of taxing us and reducing us to rags. What a shame for people who are counting on us at the next election.

I don't think they should count on these people all that much next time around!

> Will anyone of these political hacks think of the people one day?
> We are also afraid that the politicians are tricking us by leaving the sales tax in place and adding the GST. If this is true, the worst is yet to come. Canada will be eaten away by the great evil of the century: taxes, taxes and more taxes.

I already mentioned the signatures. Here's another note I have recently received.

> Dear Mr. Hébert,
> I am 21 years old. I want my country to remain prosperous and united. I am sad to see the Upper House and its traditions flouted, but I also know that this is necessary. Please don't give up. I am in the gallery from time to time. I am going to bring my friends. My respects to the senators,
>
> Marc Beaulieu,
> 74 Brennan Place,
> Moncton, New Brunswick.

Here is someone who sits in the galleries and who took the trouble to write on a piece of paper that he supports us. Having been in the gallery, he has seen that the traditions of the Senate were indeed being flouted, but he said: I know that it is necessary.

He understands. He did not take on an outraged tone like some of my colleagues opposite, who rise from time to time to sermonize about the proper comportment of senators.

Dear Senators,

I am a small businessman who sells children's clothing. With the GST, my customers will have to pay an extra 15% to clothe their children.

It's got to be a Quebecer.

7% federal tax and an 8% provincial tax, 15% in all.

This is certainly no way to promote a higher birth rate.

I encourage you to continue fighting this tax which the public does not want. Please don't give up.

Jean Bettez,
46 rue des Braves,
Sept-Îles, Quebec.

Sept-Îles, that reminds me of something. I have another one:

Dear Sir,

You have all my admiration in your fight against this inglobe tax, the GST. It is a tax that will strike the weakest and least well-off in our already sick society.

There must be other ways of attacking the deficit, other ways that will save the least well-off.

I encourage you to continue your fight for this noble cause.

You must not give up until all means are exhausted. Continue the fight. Thank you.

Jean Bettez,

46 Avenue des Braves,
Sept-Îles, Quebec.

I have another one here:

Dear Sir,

I congratulate you for your fight against the GST and support you in your struggle against this tax.

Please accept my highest respects.

Jean Zincovitch, M.D.

So, a doctor.

600 rue Kleber, Duvernay, Laval.

Senator,

I am sending you proof (see newspaper clipping) that the country's debt will not be reduced as a result of the gift Mr. Mulroney is making or of a number of other expenditures of which citizens have not been informed.

He's encouraging us to continue fighting against the GST.

Honourable Jacques Hébert,

Congratulations on your fight against the GST.

We are with you in this fight for the citizens of Canada.

Thank you, Carmelle and Rolland Plante, Joly à Lotbinière.

The Comité d'Éducation Populaire Métis/Nigette Inc., at 88 Avenue Laval, Mont-Joli, Quebec, Writes:

Dear Sir,

Enclosed please find a copy of the resolutions by the General Assembly of the Comité d'Éducation Populaire Métis/Nigette challenging the proposed GST put forward by the Conservative government, as well as the proposed amendments to the present unemployment insurance system.

The latter has been passed. Thanks to eight new senators, it has been passed. People are going to learn what the unemployment insurance program, as revised and corrected by the Conservatives, is all about.

We thank you in advance for your attention . . .

Bill on the GST.

WHEREAS the new act is not yet in effect . . .

And it may never be in effect!

WHEREAS the supplies of volunteer organizations are taxable where the goods and services they produce are sold by for-profit corporations, something that denies the distinct nature of volunteer organizations;

WHEREAS increasing numbers of families can no longer afford the bare necessities of life (this act is very deeply unfair because, in addition to further impoverishing the poor, it will push into poverty people whose incomes are at the survival line);

WHEREAS books will also be taxed and this measure will considerably increase the cost of education for everyone;

You see this committee has very specific concerns, but, in their "whereases", there is one that concerns books.

WHEREAS books will also be taxed and this measure will considerably increase the cost of education for everyone;

WHEREAS the government has not undertaken to amend the GST with respect to volunteer organizations;

BE IT RESOLVED THAT we of the General Assembly of the members of the Comité d'Éducation Populaire Métis/Nigette are opposed to the proposed GST put forward by the Conservative government.

Moved by Pierre Dufort.

Seconded by Gilles Bernier.

Passed unanimously.

Les Boules.

It's signed by the secretary, Thérèse Sheehy.

Senator Lefebvre: The most.

Senator Hébert: Yes, the largest readership response, because they have asked their readers to sign this petition and they have received 800 names, which is the largest they have received in years.

> Hope our petition will buoy your spirits . . .

Well we do not really need that but it helps . . .

However I do not know whether Senator Cogger will respond by reading ten-odd letters supporting the other side, but with the same tone and passion as in these letters.

[English]

> Way to go, Jacques! Do anything you have to do to stop the GST—anything. If this GST passes, I will close my glass shop. Yours truly.

He operates an auto glass distribution centre. He will close it if the GST passes.

Another letter states:

> I want to express my appreciation for opposing the goods and services tax. I don't want it. Keep up the fight. Don't back down. I am 100 per cent opposed to the Mulroney government, 100 per cent opposed as a former proud Canadian. I am no longer proud to say Canada is my country, and I am no longer proud to be a Canadian. I wish I didn't have to say this, but, unfortunately, it is true. The Mulroney government is 100 per cent responsible for my feeling this way. I have zero respect for the Mulroney government. I do not like to live in this country and see how this country is being destroyed.

Do everything in your power to oppose this tax and everything you can to ensure it is not passed. Sincerely, James Bernoise, 390 Princess Avenue, Apartment 9, London, Ontario.

Senator Marchand: Would Senator Hébert permit a question? I want to ask a question regarding publishing by universities.

I am reading a new book by Dr. Paul Tennant of the University of British Columbia. It is entitled, Aboriginal Peoples and Politics, and it is hot off the press.

Senator Hastings: It is ahead of the tax.

Senator Marchand: He has made some interesting comments which I feel are relevant to the tax situation. For example, he states:

I was the first political scientist to conduct such field research in British Columbia.

Before he wrote the book he travelled to many communities in British Columbia and attended many tribal council meetings. He met with several Indian organizations and did extensive research for the book. There is reference to the fact that he had a difficult time putting together the finances for the book. It was published with the help of a grant from the Social Science Federation of Canada, using funds provided by the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. It was published by the UBC Press, 6344 Memorial Road, Vancouver.

Based on your great experience as an author and your knowledge of the publishing industry, not only in Quebec but in the rest of Canada and at universities, how would you say this tax would affect publishers such as the UBC Press? It would be unfortunate if they were not able to publish books such as this. Really, this is a very rare book because of the way it was put together. It would be unfortunate of the tax hindered professors or other authors from using the facilities of a university press. Could you comment on that, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: Of course, the situation is a little different for university presses because they receive grants from their universities and they occupy facilities in university buildings. They do not publish for profit. Nevertheless, we all know that grants to universities have diminished in the last few years, which means that grants to university presses have been getting smaller. They cannot count on an increase in their grants.

Their books already sell for high prices because they are specialized books. They are not printed by the thousands. I don't know about the book you have in your hand, but some of these books have a printing of only a thousand copies or less, which means that each copy is costly to publish and consequently sells at a high price.

With the GST the price will be higher. Fewer people will buy these books because they will be too expensive, and at a certain point university presses will be unable to publish certain books. There is a limit. You cannot print 100 copies of a book. It doesn't work like that. It would be extraordinarily expensive.

One thing is certain. Fewer of these books, such as the one you have in your hand, will be published in Canada because of the stubbornness of this government which does not want to exclude books from the GST. We will all suffer because some important ideas will never be expressed in a form that is necessary for their transmission to others.

[Translation]

I am going to take a short break from my reading of the document I told you about a while ago in order to turn to another document because I would like us to get together on this because time is passing . . . I eventually want to give others the opportunity to speak as well. So in the survey from which I quoted large excerpts and which ended in 1977 . . . The book publishing industry has continued to progress in Quebec and in the rest of Canada since this survey was taken. Thanks to the vitality of this sector and to the assistance of various governments and to the more pronounced interest they have taken in culture and in books in particular over the years. That is why the GST has created such a stir in intellectual circles in English Canada and French Canada. That is because it is contrary to what the governments have gotten us used to in recent years.

And it is because, in recent years, for example, in the early 1980s, the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee was established—it was called the Applebaum-Hébert Committee, named after one of my cousins. The task facing that Committee in the early 1980s was enormous. It worked for two years, meeting people from all cultural circles, including book publishing, in all the provinces.

And since this was a much more recent effort, I would like to make a few remarks about it. I would like to recall that Committee's recommendations concerning books and publishing. As you can see, some of those recommendations were implemented. However, in the best interest of the cultural community, many others went unheeded.

So we are going to shift our sights somewhat to still talk about the same subject, but in the 1980s, to see how far we have come. And the chapter ws entitled, "Writing, Publishing and Reading".

The title of this chapter, incidentally, reflects the spirit in which our report was conceived.

When I say "we", I mean the authors of the report.

. . . The creators and cultural producers do not work in isolation, but form an integral part of a whole. In literature, Margaret Atwood did a remarkably good job in giving expression to our thinking. The writer and his readers are siamese twins. Kill the one and you risk killing the other. Try to separate them and you may very well find yourself with two lifeless half bodies.

That is why, if the GST discourages some readers, you will be killing one of the siamese twins because the author needs the reader. The two are siamese twins.

> One can obviously not dissociate the writer from the publisher or from the reader. An author can certainly exist without readers, just as people can go through life without opening a book, but there will always be a fundamentally important dimension missing from their human experience. The publisher, for his part, can help bring the two together.

This description leaves something to be desired, however, because it ignores the contribution of editors, translators, graphic artists, printers, book store owners, librarians and critics who all play an essential role. One sees therefore that literature is very much a collective undertaking.

[English]

Senator Kenny: Earlier you spoke of writers, and everyone knows they are often on the lower end of the pay scale or impoverished. You have not commented on how poor writers will function at the lower end of the scale. The Banking Committee heard from the National Anti-Poverty Association, which referred to the refundable tax credits and how they discriminate against large families living in poverty and single people living on welfare. In its brief to the committee, the National Anti-Poverty Association said that families of four or more persons who live under the poverty line will not be entitled to the full tax credit. It went on to say that no single person receiving social assistance, with or without disability, would receive full value for their tax credit.

One of the most common objections to the GST is that Canadians would begin to lose those credits because they are not fully indexed to inflation. As taxes and prices increase in the future, the amount of protection for low income Canadians would fall. Virtually all of the social groups were unanimous in saying that lack of full indexation of the refundable tax credits would make an already unfair GST system even more unfair over time.

In the National Council on Welfare's brief to the committee, it said that the shrinking sales tax credit and its falling threshold will weaken its capacity to protect low income Canadians from the GST in the future. In effect, their federal sales tax burden will grow heavier with each passing year because the sales tax credit will offset less of the GST. The sales tax credit would also be targeted further and further below the poverty line, thus leaving more working poor and modest income families with little or no protection from the sales tax. National Council on Welfare also said that within five years 700,000 poor families would be cut off from receiving any refundable tax credits because of the lack of full indexation. Within 10 years over one million Canadian families who need protection would lose their tax credits. Statistics provided by the National Council on Welfare demonstrated how inflation would eat away at the value of the credits over time. Within five years the maximum credit for a couple with two children would fall from $750 to $644 in 1991 dollars, which would take an additional $700 million out of the pockets of poor families within five years.

In response to these concerns, the Minister of Finance has replied that the protection for low income Canadians does not need to be fully indexed to inflation because the government, if necessary, would adjust the credits and the thresholds to protect the poor.

It seems to me that many of these writers you are talking about are the very people who are going to suffer from these inflation-eroded credits, and that, over time, more and more are going to be put in the position where they cannot afford to continue to write. Would you like to make a comment on this?

Senator Hébert: You are quite right. I do not know the statistics for English Canada, but I will give you an idea of the financial situation of writers in Quebec—I exclude from that those who may use their pen to earn money in publicity, writing speeches for government, the Minister of Finance or advertising. I am speaking of those who are writing books, novels, poetry and drama. In Quebec there are possibly four or five who do not have a fat income but who can survive, raise a family and have a decent life. There are only about four or five in French Canada. In English Canada, writers like Pierre Berton must live well, as does Margaret Atwood. How many would you say there are who are making an adequate living from writing?

Senator Kenny: I think there would be 10 or 15.

Senator Cools: Peter Newman does quite well.

Senator Hébert: Let us say there are 20 in English Canada and we could gather six or seven from Quebec. Less than 30 Canadians are earning a living writing books. Imagine what all the others do! They starve or have to work at other jobs at the same time. Some are correcting proofs in newspapers or are salesmen in book stores so they can be near books, which they love, but they have to work at many different jobs to survive. These people will be directly affected by the GST, and some will decide not to write any more. We will lose some good books, perhaps a masterpiece that would have been successful around the world and translated into 25 different languages.

[Translation]

I continue:

> In Canada, governments have supported this collective enterprise to an increasing extent in recent years—promoting writers, translators, designers, booksellers and librarians—without political interference in what is written, published or read.

Of course, the Arts Council was admirable because of what the English call the "armslength" approach which this government finds difficult to swallow. As you know, a number of Tory members who felt this armslength approach to the Canada Council difficult to live with made some rather fascinating statements. They wished they could lay their hands on the Canada Council in order to distribute more easily scholarships to the most talented people in their ridings.

> This approach is essential to preserving freedom of thought and expression as it is native to Canadians' view of their government's relationship to culture.

I am referring here to the armslength approach.

> The federal government in particular has provided that support directly to writers and publishers, leaving readers—the largest group—more or less alone.

Of course, the 7 per cent GST on books is the opposite of this notion which stems from the chapter on books in the Report of the Federal Cultural Policy Review Committee chaired by Lou Applebaum and my cousin.

> There have been good reasons for this particular emphasis in cultural policy. Writers and publishers make up the first two links in the literary chain, setting the process into motion; without them, there would be little Canadian literature for readers to read, critics to analyze, booksellers to sell or printers to print. At the same time, writing and publishing are both extremely fragile activities economically in the relatively small English- and French-language markets in Canada. Those Canadians who choose to earn a living by writing or publishing books and magazines, particularly of an artistic or cultural nature, frequently work within economic constraints that necessitate a measure of financial support in addition to what the marketplace yields. But government cultural policies encourage and stimulate the suppliers of our literature essentially because the ultimate beneficiary is the Canadian reading public.

Providing assistance to the publishing industry was often criticized in certain mainly conservative, circles where the attitude was: Why bother to help publishers? Let them take their own risks, let the market decide, let the strongest prevail, and so forth! However, what these people did not understand was that by helping the publisher, we helped the reader because without publishers books would not be widely available for people to read.

> "These policies have borne abundant fruit. As the Canadian Conference of the Arts reminded us, "Over the past 10 years there has been an extraordinary growth in Canadian writing and in the size and enthusiasm of Canadian audiences for new writing of all kinds by Canadians living in all parts of the country." By contrast, the authors of the Massey-Lévesque Report concluded 30 years earlier that "among the various means of artistic expression in Canada, literature has taken a second place, and indeed has fallen far behind painting."

How odd. Thirty years before, in 1950, painting came first.

> They went on to ask, almost plaintively: "Is it true, then, that we are a people without literature?"

That was one of the "plaintive" questions asked by the authors of the Massey-Lévesque report, 30 years before this one.

> "Such a question need scarcely be asked today. In quantity, quality and public interest, both at home and abroad, Canadian literature has attained a state of development unimagined in 1951. The same may be said of the publishing, bookselling, library and critical professions which sustain our literature. These are manifestations of a maturing society for which the credit does not belong to governments or their policies."

They were necessary and even essential, but they were not the only reasons for this development.

> But it is certainly true that government actions . . .

• (2310)

[English]

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Senator Hébert, may I ask you a question?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Cools: As senators know, we are very privileged in this chamber to have a number of men of letters sit with us, for example, yourself. You have authored several books.

Senator Hébert: Do not forget Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Senator Cools: I will come to her in a moment. Another example I see across the way is our colleague Senator Doyle. When I first came to this chamber and joined you as your seatmate, which I still am—

Senator Hébert: Not tonight, because I need your desk.

Senator Cools: Absolutely. I will lend you my desk whenever you speak. However, when I first came here, you presented me with a book that you had written on William Coffin, and, for me, it was a very great treasure. I really have two questions for you. The first deals with the fact that people who own bookstores are generally quite special people, usually lovers of books and invariably got into the business because they were interested in letters per se. Although I did not hear all of your speech, my question is: Do you have particular information on the impact of GST bookkeeping and administration on the proprietors of book stores?

Before I get to my second question, I should like to tell you that I personally am a collector. I am especially interested in people who describe themselves as antiquarians; in other words, people who are proprietors of old books. For example, if I wanted to purchase a copy of John Dafoe's book on Sir Wilfred Laurier, since I live in Toronto I could phone up Joseph Patrick Antiquarian Bookstore and ask him if he has one in stock. My question for you in that area is: Do you have any idea or any concept of the impact that the GST will have on antiquarian bookstores and book sellers. If you do not have any information in those two areas, that is quite satisfactory to me.

Senator Hébert: Quite honestly, I do not have any special information on that aspect, but it is quite clear that they will suffer, like others. They are selling old books, but they are books and they are aimed at a public that will continue to love books and want to buy books, but if the price becomes too high, of course, they will buy fewer. Some of these bookstores may not be able to continue and will close their doors. I do not wish that and I hope it does not happen, but most likely it will happen to them, as it will happen to the ordinary bookstores.

Senator Cools: Yes. As I said before, I am a collector. My particular interest is the antiquarians. They are very interesting people. In addition to being sellers of books to the ordinary person on the street, they are also very special because they are buyers and sellers of books for libraries. As an example, let me tell you of a dealer in Toronto from whom I have bought several books. He also supplies libraries. I think this is an important subject. It is important for the book industry but also for the sustenance and maintenance of the culture of Canada.

One day during the committee phase of this bill we had an antiquarian appear. Mostly he was a seller of other kinds of antiquarian objects, such as furniture and glassware, but he came to us greatly concerned about what the GST will do to the business in general. I think it is quite interesting and I look forward to hearing what you have to say.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I am sure that we should wish these sellers of old books well, that we should hope they will survive, but it is clear they are going to suffer as much as the others. Seven per cent on a $30 book is one thing, but it is harder to take on an old book worth $300.

> The members of the Massey-Lévesque Commission would have been happily astonished had they been able to foretell the national and international recognition that would be won by Canadian authors in the 1970s and early 1980s: Margaret Laurence, Anne Hébert, Robertson Davies, Yves Thériault, Irving Layton, Antonine Maillet, Margaret Atwood, Marie-Claire Blais, Farley Mowat, André Langevin, W.O. Mitchell, Gaston Miron, Mordecai Richler, Jacques Godbout, Mavis Gallant, Réjean Ducharme and Leonard Cohen are only a few who come to mind, in addition to those singled out for earlier recognition by that commission: Gabrielle Roy, Morley Calaghan, Roger Lemelin, Hugh MacLellan, Gratien Gélinas . . .

who, at 80 years of age, was just snubbed by the government; he was here a few days ago. He came to plead the cause of authors, book store owners and publishers, the cause of books. He was received, as everyone knows—Senator Lefebvre a moment ago read an excerpt from the press report . . .

> . . . Earl Birney. Clearly, the written and published word is flourishing in Canada, signifying that the spirit of artistic and intellectual freedom is alive here as never before.

In our travels across the country and in our own deliberations, however, we have become convinced that there is no room for complacency about these matters, and have detected a number of serious gaps and omissions in the existing federal policy which urgently need to be remedied. In the case of writers, we believe that their financial reward has been woefully inadequate considering the public benefits received.

That's what we said earlier. There are a handful, we said, all in all, less than 30 throughut English Canada and French Canada who live from their books. The others earn only marginal incomes from their writing.

> As for readers, we are persuaded that their interests as consumers of Canadian literature have been neglected (perhaps inadvertently) by federal government policy, a concern that will lead us to suggest ways of improving both public awareness of and public access to Canadian publications. We will also suggest ways in which publishers can be assisted to perform their cultural role.
> Productivity and artistic maturity in Canadian writing might reasonably be said to have proceeded hand in hand since the days of the Massey-Lévesque Commission, and indeed to have followed a certain progression through the various literary forms during the past three decades. In earlier years of that period, the most substantial and most interesting body of work probably belonged to our poets. By the mid-1960s, however, fiction had established itself as an equally fertile and variegated form in both our official languages.

● (2320)

During the past decade—say, since the arrival of Michel Tremblay's plays on the Montreal stage and the original performance of George Ryga's The Ecstasy of Rita Joe or James Reaney's Donnelly Trilogy—Canadian drama has begun to display strengths similar to those found in our poetry, novels and short stories.

> Other equally important branches of literature are also thriving: history, biography, social and political criticism, artistic criticism and children's literature. Popular authors as well as scholars have all made their distinctive contributions. Strength in these fields once seemed more potential than actual, but are now being realized in a steady flow of publications emanating from virtually all parts of the country.

Such a varied and steady flow would not be possible without a diverse network of professional book and periodical publishers. From the small and somewhat unhopeful contingent that visited the Massey-Lévesque Commission public hearings, the Canadian publishing community has grown in several significant ways. Today there are book publishers in every province, some specializing in works by the writers of their particular region. Among the new regional houses are several French-language publishers located in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Manitoba. And among the English-language houses, several have built on a regional base to develop an enthusiastic national market for their works.

> Another aspect of the evolution in Canadian book publishing has been a degree of editorial specialization unknown in the 1940s or 1950s. In addition to the regional presses, we now have both English- and French-language publishers specializing in history, politics, women's issues, children's literature, art books and how-to books. We have publishers serving the popular tastes of the mass > market, but we also have literary presses in many parts of the country producing small printings of exciting and often sophisticated new work by poets, playwrights and fiction writers.

These are the small houses which I told you a number of times will no doubt be forced to close their doors as a result of the GST.

> All these types of publishers—some of them large, but many of them small in scale—add a vital creative dimension to the scholarly lists of the university presses, the textbooks of educational publishers and the output of more general "trade" houses.
> Although some of the largest book publishing companies are foreign-owned, chiefly in English-speaking Canada, today's industry contains a substantial majority of firms owned in this country. Indeed, Canada possesses a remarkably well-rounded domestic publishing industry. That fact is all the more striking considering the relatively modest size of our two markets, the enormous amount of competition within those markets from books imported from the United States, France and the United Kingdom, and the extremely difficult economic times. Canadian book publishing, then, is a success story—at least in cultural terms, if not often in financial ones.
> A similar story may be told about magazines and periodicals. Canadians now have access to an impressive cross-section of periodicals of their own. These range from newsmagazines through broadly based consumer magazines to publications appealing to all manner of specialized interest, whether artistic, scientific or recreational. Some of these are scholarly journals, while others are "little magazines" whose openness to experimental work in art and literature is so essential to a living culture.

I want to stop on this point because the authors are talking about little magazines, which give young authors the opportunity to publish their first works, thus enabling them to publish in more important magazines and, lastly, to publish a book and, perhaps, a major work. It is these little magazines that will die if the GST is implemented. The big ones will survive.

> The emergence of regional voices has also been a recent factor in magazine publishing, and several magazines aimed at the narrower market of a city, a province or a region have experienced success.

What will happen to these regional publications with the GST and the increase in postal rates? God only knows. But one thing is certain: many of them will disappear.

> The periodical industry as a whole, however, resembles the book publishing industry in demonstrating more frequent cultural successes than financial ones. Again, a small population spread across a vast geographical area in two linguistic markets, sometimes overwhelming foreign competition . . .

In the periodical industry, this is even more obvious, or rather, in any case, just as obvious as in the book publishing industry.

> . . . rising costs

● (2330)

and a depressed economy combine to make life precarious financially for magazine ventures, particularly new ones.

Mind you, these remarks are written in a report published in 1982, not so long ago, less than 10 years ago, eight years ago. We were being told at that time that, despite the successes in the industry, the financial situation of the businesses in question was very precarious, particularly that of those starting out, and it is those businesses that will be cut down by the GST.

> In the end, Canadian publishing ventures of all types have been sustained by the creativity of writers and the interest of readers. These forces have converged just at a time when electronic imagery might seem to be diminishing public concern with the written word.

Did we ever hear that a lot when television showed up in our living rooms. We said to ourselves: that's the end of books. People won't read any more. On the contrary, they read more, and successful television programs have even been produced around books, as is the case of Bernard Pivot's program, which has just come to an end.

> Yet there has been renewed interest in exploring and expressing the Canadian reality precisely through books and magazines. Far more Canadians than ever before are becoming writers and publishers, and in the process providing alternative voices to the products of a mass electronic and print culture emanating chiefly from the United States. And Canadians have proved ready for a richer diet of books and magazines of their own in the post-television age, while still keeping their minds and borders opened to publications from other lands.
> Government Assistance to Writers and Publishers. In recognition of these trends, the federal government increasingly placed financial resources at the disposal of Canada's writers and publishers from the late 1950s onwards.

The first federal organization to provide this type of support was the Canada Council, which immediately after its establishment in 1957 began making individual grants to creative writers, scholars and a few publishers of books, literary and artistic magazines, and scholarly journals. In the years that followed, the Council's support to writers and scholars expanded, until in 1972 it undertook the major programs of assistance of publishing which continue to this day, administered in part by the Council and in part under the aegis of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. Since then, the Canada Council has received the means to assist the promotion as well as the publication of Canadian books and periodicals; measures to assist the foreign marketing of Canadian books have been taken; a co-publication program has been instituted at the Department of Supply and Services to cooperate with the private sector in publishing books, in both official languages, originating from federal departments; and the Foreign Investment Review Agency has become concerned with limiting any further expansion of foreign ownership in the Canadian book publishing industry.

That, of course, is an agency which the Conservatives undertook to eliminate upon coming to power in 1984. What is happening as regards foreign ownership of the Canadian book publishing industry? I don't know.

• (2340)

> An attempt to strengthen the periodical press was undertaken in 1976 with the passage of Bill C-58, an amendment to the Income Tax Act to enhance the attractiveness of advertising in Canadian periodicals and broadcasting outlets.

Finally, in 1979, a major new development program for Canadian book publishing was launched within the Arts and Culture Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State. Transferred to the Department of Communications in July 1980, with that department's assumption of responsibility for arts and culture, the program includes substantial support for sales and marketing of Canadian books, as well as for structural and professional improvements within the industry. This branch has been attached to the Department of Communications since 1980.

> Provincial governments, too, provided new forms of direct assistance to literature during the 1970s and early 1980s. Particularly large commitments were made by the governments of Ontario and Quebec, where the greatest concentrations of professional writers and publishers are located, but governments of other provinces also became involved as the literary professions expanded within their jurisdictions.

It is impossible, of course, to quantify the precise relationship between the advent of these forms of government support and the expansion of writing and publishing during the past 25 years. Nevertheless, it is significant that government assistance has remained an encouraging and enabling factor, rather than a directing or controlling one. The degree of government involvement in supporting writing and publishing is considerably greater in Canada than in other nations that share our cultural heritages; citizens of those countries might conceivably ask if the various governments in Canada do not exercise too much influence on what is written and published here. They could be told unequivocally, however, that Canadian governments have not sought to use their programs of support as levers of censorship or propaganda, and that such a policy is consistent with the wishes of the Canadian people.

As I said a moment ago, the Conservatives, particularly when they came to power, had a few hesitations on the subject. They felt that the Canada Council did a little too much on its own and that certain MPs would be in a better position to judge the talents of poets in their ridings. But nothing happened along those lines.

> Writers are an individualistic breed, and it is difficult to generalize about them with accuracy. It is even more difficult in a society like Canada's where there are two official language groups with their own distinctive literatures. Canadian authors writing in French and in English work within different, if intersecting, literary traditions; perhaps even more fundamentally, they write by themselves for different audiences with different sets of experience and expectations. Market conditions facing Canadian writers and their publishers also differ according to language. The French-language market is considerably smaller than the English-language one, but more concentrated geographically and therefore less costly to service. When Canadian writers or publishers look to the international market, those writing in English find their largest foreign audience just over the border, while those writing in French must reach across the Atlantic.

Regardless of language, the briefs we received from writers and their professional associations contained strikingly similar themes and concerns, tending to concentrate on incomes and economic justice. There was little doubt in writers' minds that the federal government should be concerned with these matters.

They definitely did not realize at the time, 10 years ago, that the federal government would in fact concern itself with these matters, but by implementing a tax that would hurt them even more. For them, the question was:

> "Are Canadian writers receiving a fair return for the benefits that the public derives from their labours?" Their answer was a categorical no, and they placed the onus squarely on the federal government to do something about the problem.

Critical attention and media recognition have been coming to Canadian writers as never before, but they are not enough to live on. We have been enriched immeasurably by our storytellers, poets, playwrights, historians and social and political writers, and have gained in self-knowledge from their work. But do we give enough back? do we reward our authors adequately, not only in return for past accomplishments, but so that they will be encouraged and enabled to continue producing in the future? The submissions we received argued that authors continued to be under-remunerated for the physical and spiritual energies they invest in their work, and this Committee agrees with that view.

How many times I remember remitting copyright cheques for several hundreds of dollars at the end of a year to an author who had perhaps spent a year of his life writing a book. I was not too happy about that.

> . . . and this Committee agrees with that view.

Although the problem is partly a result of market conditions and the narrow financial margins in publishing, it is apparent that authors are unfairly treated in certain respects that are in the domain of public policy. Consequently, writers are less adequately rewarded, on average, than the various other professionals whose livelihood they make possible. In spite of the enlarged audiences for their work and the undeniable usefulness of grants to buy time from the duties, authors are scarcely more able now to function as full-time professionals than they were in the time of the Massey-Lévesque Commission. To illustrate this fact, a study prepared by the federal Department of Communications and based on Statistics Canada data for 1978 (the most recent available) shows that the median income from all writing sources of full-time writers (defined as devoting more than 30 hours a week to their writing) was $7,000: a figure that was less than half the median income for all Canadian wage-earners in that year.

The median income for all Canadian wage earners was $14,000 that year, and $7,000 for writers.

> In the case of those writers earning the majority of their writing income from book royalties, the median income from all sources was a mere $3,000. This situation is not only unfair, but a waste of creative resources. When writers are hindered from realizing their creative potential, Canadians are deprived of the full benefits that their authors can provide.
> Not all the problems facing writers are amenable to solution by government.

● (2350)

> Whether an author or book or periodical is critically successful, or widely read, or receives a grant, is not a matter for legislation. But this Committee advocates that insofar as government is able to remedy existing abuses or enhance financial recognition on the basis of equity, it should do so. We endorse the position of the Writers' Union of Canada, stated at one of our hearings, that since writers do not have a fixed income, they need as many sources of income as possible. Financial reinforcement, however, is not the only issue at stake: We would also like to see increased exchange between our two literatures and expanded professional development opportunities for writers. We unreservedly share these concerns.
> There are at least two main ways in which the federal government could increase financial rewards for writers: through grants and through payment for public uses of writers' work.

In writing, as in other fields of artistic creativity during the past 25 years, individual grants have been particularly effective in producing completed works that have attracted significant public attention. A Canada Council or provincial government grant has often provided the free time needed by a professional author to finish a work in progress (although it is also true that most published manuscripts are written without the benefit of grants).

The Canada Council provides grant support in two broad categories of literature. "Creative" writers in the fields of poetry, fiction and drama can apply for the Council's Arts Awards, while writers with nonfiction projects may seek assistance from the Council's Exploration program. Our Committee has received no persuasive arguments that substantive changes are needed in the Arts Awards program for creative writers. In the case of assistance for nonfiction writers, however, there is a genuine case for change. The Explorations program has funded hundreds of valuable projects over the years in many disciplines and in all parts of Canada. The problem is that the average level of financial assistance it provides is considerably below the amounts set for awards for "creative" writers; . . . Obviously, the essayists suffer from discrimination while their works are very often as creative as those of the noveliste or the damatists.

> Nevertheless, more and more of them, experienced and very productive, are turning to the Exploration program. This is because the sales projections for their books on the Canadian market do not allow the editor to consent to sufficient advances when long-term works are involved. Unless the author are university graduates or scholars and in this case they address themselves to the Council on Human Science Research, Exploration is the only federal recourse.
> Historical and biographical works, such as those which ascribe to children's literature or social, political and artistic critic are essential to all literature worthy of that name. Canadians have proven their know-how in these areas, but those who are involved in them are disadvantaged in relation to fiction authors.

Senator Stollery: I had a question, which I wondered if you had a moment to answer. It is just a small question that has come to my mind, Senator Hébert, and it concerns the numbers of copies, which I know you are familiar with.

It is the publishing industry in Quebec which, of course, is of great concern to all of us. And I know that in the publishing industry, as far as French language literature is concerned, it is very problematical.

I guess the question that has not been clarified is that in terms of the numbers of books that are published in Quebec in a year in French, if you could give us any idea of the numbers of books published in French? And more or less an idea of the average number of copies that are printed?

As I understand it, and I learned this only during this debate on the GST from representatives of the publishing industry in Canada, that even in France the price of books is a problem. It is one of the reasons that we see so few hard-cover books when we go to a bookstore in France. Most of the books are in soft cover. It is because they do not have the print runs that we have for books in the English speaking world. The numbers are limited. And transposing that to Quebec and Montreal, where I would assume that the print runs are even less than they are in France, the adding of another tax on to the cost of those books is going to have a detrimental effect on their sales. And I would like to hear if you could tell us just what is the average number of books printed when a book is published in Quebec.

Senator Kelly: I think you should take the question as notice. It is a tough one, but be fair to the Senator. He has been on his feet.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: He's taking advantage of Senator Murray's absence to have a good laugh. There is no discipline on that side of the Senate.

• (0000)

[English]

There is something funny about this question of the soft cover and the hard cover. It is not a question of quantity; it is a question of culture; it is a question of taste. The French people never felt they should spend money on buying a book which is bound. If you don't like the book, why pay $3 more for the hard cover? They would buy a soft cover and, if they really liked it, they would go to a binder and have it bound.

[Translation]

In fact, it's a quesiton of culture—it's not a question of markets at all. We don't want to buy hard cover books because you have to pay 3 or 4 dollars more. We don't want to have to pay 3 or 4 dollars more for a book that we might like only a little and that we might want to throw out, whereas if we really like the book we will take it to a bindery and have it bound. In any case, it is strange because a few years ago, in my youth, and even later, up until the 1960s, there was a tradition in France. The pages of books were not cut. And especially, toward the end of that period, when I first started in publishing in the 1960s, it was more expensive to leave the pages uncut than it was to cut them. It is bizarre. It would be complicated to explain it to you, but no, it wouldn't be too hard to explain it if you insist.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I insist.

Senator Hébert: Well, for a book that is cut on the three sides, the cover is also cut at the same time. That is all. When you don't cut the book, it means that it is all folded and you cannot put a cardboard cover on it like that; you have to have a cover that goes over the edges a little. So, it has to be glued on by hand. In fact, all of this is very complicated, but it is just to tell you that I remember that it was more expensive for me to publish novels, in my collection of novelists at the time, that were not cut than those that were. It's ridiculous, of course, and complicated. You have to have a paper-cutter. But it is a matter of culture, it was the style. It wasn't necessary to cut the pages of a novel.

The Hon. Earl Hastings: I have a question that I would like to ask before your speech this evening is over.

[English]

Let me also express the appreciation of all senators present for the excellent and informative exposé you have given the Senate today. It can only be hoped that some of those opposite have listened.

Senator Hébert: No, no, they won't listen.

Senator Hastings: Before you finish, I will pose this question, sir, because of your knowledge of both official languages of Canada.

It has been brought to our attention just recently that, along with all the other problems associated with the GST, we now find that there is the very grave problem of translation. It came to light at a recent conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation where Mr. Claude Desaulniers, the senior tax partner of Stikeman Elliott, indicated that the French-language version of the federal government's proposed GST legislation differs significantly from the English text and could result in years of litigation. That will please the Canadian Bar Association.

Yesterday he told reporters, on the opening day of the major tax conference organized by the non-profit Canadian Tax Foundation, that as far as he was concerned this will certainly give rise to disputes. He stated that the French version of the 330-page Bill C-62 is more of an adaptation than a direct translation of the original English text and that it is quite different. He predicted that, because the GST bill is also very technical, parts of it are bound to be challenged by unhappy taxpayers in the next two or three years and that the courts will have to find out which version conforms more correctly to the intention of the legislation.

My question to you, Senator Hébert, is: In your reading of the French version of this bill, do you agree that the translation is basically at fault and that it is more of an adaptation than a direct translation, and do you agree with Mr. Desaulniers that this is going to lead to considerable litigation in the future?

Along with all the other problems that this Bill C-62 has created, we now have the final one, which is that the translation is in error.

Senator Hébert: I must admit that that did not strike me at first. But I can easily believe this gentleman, because it has happened so often in recent years since I have been in the Senate that we see enormous discrepancies and differences as between the French and the English texts. Such a complex and complicated tax bill, which was supposed to be simple—you will remember that they mentioned that it was a simple tax—it turns out that it is not that simple and that it will be further complicated because the French text is different from the English text.

What can we say? The lawyers will rejoice, and that's it.

[Translation]

So it was quite interesting because it was a recommendation that was in fact implemented.

> Another concrete way for the government to increase writers' incomes is to compensate them for the public use of their works. After all, a book is used by the public.

In libraries, for example, a book might be read by 100 or 200 people and the author receives no compensation for that. It might be photocopied 100 or 1,000 times and no copyright fees are received. So the committee's task was to find fair compensation for the use made of their work, especially in the case of library loans and photocopies.

> Ten industrialized countries in the Western world already have compensatory mechanisms for library use—the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland and Iceland. These nations feel that authors are deprived of normal income for services rendered if, after a one-time payment that corresponds to copyright fees for the sale of their book to a library, they receive no more money, regardless of how often their books are borrowed from the library.

A library may have just one copy of a novel, or two copies if it is more popular, and lend it out a hundred times without the author's receiving any more than the royalties on one, two or three copies.

> There are very great differences between the various formulae, primarily with regard to the nature of the types of compensation paid to authors and methods of calculations done according to the number of copies held or loaned. Generally, the programs are not funded through user fees, but directly by the public authorities in the form of a lump sum. Whatever the case, the intent is always the same—to compensate authors for the benefits to the public from the loan of their work by the library.

There is nothing of the kind—I should say there was nothing of the kind because one of the report recommendations has now been accepted by the government and is currently being implemented, to the great joy of writers.

> There is nothing of the kind in Canada, but the Canada Council which has been studying the issue since 1976 submitted in 1981 a proposal . . .

In this country, issues such as this one are studied during five years.

> . . . to the government which focussed primary on the number of library copies. The proposal was developed with the assistance of an advisory committee made up of writers, librarians and publishers, in concert with libraries and French and English professional associations. The participation of librarians was of particular importance, for they were—like their foreign counterparts—hostile to the idea from the start for two reasons. Firstly, the administration of a complicated system based on loans would be very onerous for the institutions.

Calculating how many times a particular book was lent and so on to provide royalities to the author according to the number of times the book was read is a little complicated.

> Secondly, the concept of compensation led to the idea that libraries were hurting the writers, which they felt was untrue. Finally, when they thought that their reservations had been considered, they agreed to the proposal.

Our Committee congratulated the Canada Council for the scope and the dedication they brought to their work which led to the public use compensation proposal. It felt in particular that the Canada Council was correct in studying the issue without reference to the reform of the Copyright Act, for including it under the heading of related international obligations would have involved exhorbitant payments to foreign writers, which would have cut deeply into the amounts allocated to Canadian writers while at the same time multiplying the administrative procedures and costs. The Council's proposal is a significant contribution and balances the relationship between the Canadian public and Canadian writers. But we would like to go even further and extend the practice to another procedure for which authors are not remunerated but should be—runaway photocopies.

The "reprographic revoution", as some call it, does not cover just the quasi-universal use of photocopiers in offices, schools, universities, libraries and elsewhere, but also includes new technologies for information storage and retrieval, particularly word processing machines and videotext. While this is a real advantage for society and the people, including writers, this transformation has come about to the detriment of creators of information who receive no compensation for the sometimes very frequent use of their works which are totally out of their control. Legally, these practices are banned under the current Copyright Act, but in reality, faced with the lax behaviour of several thousand citizens, who are normally very respectful of the law, it is very difficult to enforce the provisions dealing with illegal reproduction. Under these conditions, how can we find a method that is both practical and acceptable to the public and writers on the use in libraries and the copying of their work?

Of course, you even have university professors who recommend that their students study a particular novel and who have the book photocopied in its entirety—of course, out of the university's budget—and distribute the photocopies to the students. This means that the author who is being studied receives absolutely no benefit from the students' use of his work. So there was some injustice here that had to be rectified.

> The federal government must immediately set up, beyond the system of royalties, a program that covers the use in libraries and the copying of works by living Canadian authors. This should be done in the form of an annual sum that is paid to authors.
> While we acknowledge the work of the Canada Council, we are alarmed that the compensation it provides is nothing more than symbolic and is limited to $300 per title. Its own survey of Canadian libraries shows that only 12 per cent of English books and 18 per cent of French books would receive the maximum amount.

That is, the $300, which is not a huge sum.

> Its plans regarding annual compensation also appear to us to be inadequate. Just think of a title that remains on deposit, regardless of the number of times it is lent out, if it is lent out at all, or of the author's reduced production in the meantime to see that this procedure tends to favour past efforts to the detriment of current production. We think this distorts the overall policy in this area.
>
> Like the Canada Council, the committee advocates compensation for Canadian authors, but in a neutral way, without the government passing judgment on literary or other value. However, we would like to make a connection between creation and use . . .
>
> . . . Compared to the publisher's statements on copyright, our position has four advantages:
> it is more likely to stimulate creativity, because these are a better indicator than titles held in libraries of whether an author is continuing to produce;

no author with an actively available book would be excluded from the system, which would not be the case for a rate structure based on the number of copies in libraries;

since fees paid give an idea of a work's popularity, it is a valid basis for determining compensation for the public use of works, library loans and reproduction.

This proposal could be adapted for other types of creators who do not receive compensation for the public use of their works either, such as composers.

We know that some authors whose works are out of print would benefit more from the Canada Council plan than from ours. They would receive nothing from our system because they no longer collect royalties. But we do not think that annual government compensation can be justified merely because copies fill up space on library shelves and do not necessarily go out. Works that the public uses fairly regularly tend to be reprinted by publishers and therefore are part of our scheme. We can only repeat what we said: we feel that it is in the general interest to give priority to the creativity/public use ratio. The federal government should seek to compensate active authors instead of correct past mistakes.

We expect another objection. By compensating reproduction, we seem to encourage photocopying and other forms of reproduction, in spite of the Copyright Act. To this we reply that there is no way to directly compensate creators for actual reproduction of their works and that there will be no way to do so in the foreseeable future. Nevertheless, authors suffer every day from this shortcoming in the law and from society's laxness, although they are financially the most vulnerable. Therefore we think that the federal government must intervene on their behalf, even with temporary measures, until a better form of direct compensation is found. That is the spirit behind this recommendation of ours.

Our proposal goes farther than the Canada Council's and therefore requires a much larger budget for the first year of implementation—$1.3 million. We hesitate to give a precise figure, but a reasonable target would be between 50% and 100% of the royalties paid to Canadian writers depending on the category of publication. It would take a multi-million-dollar budget, which is not extravagant, we think, if Canadian taxpayers recognize the intellectual and non-material benefits they derive from their writers and invest in their future productivity.

As I said before, a writer who earns $7,000 could with this formula earn $10,300 or even $14,000, but it has not happened.

We do not intend to go into the details of an administrative structure, but we feel that the following seven basic rules must be respected.

For fifteen years, we have seen a slow steady growth in the number of Canadian titles published in French or English translation. Canada now has many highly skilled professional translators, some of whom specialize in the difficult but creative work of translating literature, poetry, plays and novels. These translations have greatly contributed to enriching the literary and cultural experience of many Canadians. Most of these titles were translated thanks to a Canada Council program.

More use could certainly be made of them to interest Canadians more in the literature and life of the other official-language group. But we must emphasize one point: if the federal government acts in this area, it must not do so to promote national unity or for a political goal, but for non-political cultural exchange. We have two specific recommendations to make about translation.

We know very well that it is a very noble idea or principle, but the GST will hit it particularly hard. Translations that sell are usually those of very eminent writers like Hugh MacLennan, whom Senator Chaput-Rolland knows so well, but in general, translations of a little-known author sell poorly. Therefore, this is the kind of operation that publishers will drop right away, once the effects of the GST start to be felt. As a result, there will be fewer translations from French to English and from English to French. Thus translators who were starting to barely earn a living from their trade will also starve like other writers.

The Canada Council must raise the price per word paid to literary translators because it is the basis used for translation prize, and adjust it to what professional translators are paid in the private and public sectors.

We must say, as I think Senator Gigantès said a little earlier, that there are Canada Council programs to subsidize translations, except that the rate paid is much less than in the private sector, which explains why some of our great translators are sometimes reluctant to accept the Canada Council rate. That is understandable.

It is a matter of fairness. Besides, in practical terms, it is the only way to continue to attract competent translators to this kind of work. Otherwise, there will be fewer translations and Canadian readers will lose as a result.

Federal organizations that assist publishing must give more financial aid to publishers of books and periodicals that include translations in English and French of works produced in either of our two official languages.

In general, these publications are less profitable than those that publish in the original language. Thus, the amount of the grant should be set accordingly.

It is often said that writers are solitary people. Moreover, their relative isolation and the absence until very recently of a dynamic pressure group explain why their interests have been so neglected until now.

In Canada, this isolation takes several forms. Like painters but unlike stage artists, writers work far from their audience. Writers are also often cut off from their peers, with whom they could share the joys and sorrows of their trade. Add to this the geographic isolation of Canadians, whatever their activity.

Recently, efforts have been made to bring authors together with their readers and their colleagues. Writers have formed new professional associations that give them substantial benefits: contacts with colleagues, pooling resources and sharing professional information, stronger position to bargain with publishers and governments.

We saw their position of strength when they came last week to meet the Honourable Mr. Masse. We saw that their position was not as strong as all that, because they were refused and told that the tax on books would go ahead, although 92% of Montrealers are fiercely opposed to it. The government prefers to side with the other 8% who still agree with the GST.

The Canada Council has financed several promotional activities of these associations and has established a program to meet Canadian writers whereby hundreds of meetings of readers and authors are held every year. It also runs a writers-in-residence program on a shared-cost basis with post-secondary institutions. Complemented by a host of provincial programs for primary and secondary school children, this program allows students to work with professional writers, who find it a refreshing experience.

These activities are very rewarding for all concerned. We urge public organizations that fund the arts to continue what they are doing and even expand it by giving it more money. However, there is one related, though distinct, sector where we think a new tactic would be appropriate: professional development for writers.

We want to give writers, even those who are already well known, the opportunity to broaden their professional horizons if they wish and to find out more about the various aspects of their art. This is certainly not meant to encourage uniformity, sameness and orthodoxy in literature or to propose a centralized, centralizing institution like a national writers' school.

Federal aid for workshops and conferences that bring writers together for their mutual benefit must be increased. Emphasis must be put on meetings of writers of different kinds of literature.

We are thinking of events that might last from a few days to a few weeks in various settings throughout the country attended by writers at different stages of their careers but all wishing to share their knowledge and acquire new skills.

A novelist wishing to write for the stage, for example, or a dramatist who wanted to prepare scripts for films or television could register for these sessions to benefit from the experience and talent of their invited colleagues.

For writers, publishers are almost as important as readers. Even before printing was invented, authors were very dependent on intermediaries like clerks and scribes to copy their works and disseminate them.

These days, a publisher can send an author's writings to a thousand or a million people and with videotext systems and computer printouts, new forms of electronic publishing are being used more every day.

But publishers are much more than mere intermediaries or distributors; they can exert great influence on the content of the works they publish and on readers' tastes.

[English]

Were you asking a question?

Senator Cools: I was just getting ready to.

Senator Hébert: I was distracted by your beautiful voice.

Senator Phillips: Behave yourself, senator.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: They have a creative role to play with authors by suggesting themes and touching up manuscripts. It is not unusual for publishers and editors to give writers ideas for books or articles that they want written. That is why for several years this profession has held an important place in analysis, decision-making and public funding with respect to culture in Canada.

Senator Molgat: You talk about copyright and you were talking about fees form musicians earlier. I wonder if you were aware of a letter sent by the Canadian League of Composers last August. If not, I may read it to you and you can comment on it as you like. It is to . . .

[English]

Rt. Hon. Allan MacEachen,
Senate Liberal Leader,
Senate of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario,
K1A 0A4

Dear Mr. MacEachen,

I am writing on behalf of the Canadian League of Composers to state our opposition to the proposed Goods and Services Tax. The Canadian League of Composers is the voice of professional composers of concert music in Canada; we endeavour to represent the best interests of composers and to monitor and influence the conditions that affect their livelihood. As such, we see the GST as having a devastating effect on the already marginal financial existence of composers, and artists in general.

The government argument that the GST will have little impact, since it is merely replacing an unwieldy and inconsistently-applied manufacturers' tax with a more general consumption tax, is simply a distortion of the facts in the artistic sector—

[Translation]

And I think that is the sector you were talking about.

• (0020)

[English]

. . . for the GST will be introducing new taxes—on books, on sheet music, on music lessons, on arts council commissions, on music performance—where none existed before. The Canadian Conference of the Arts has argued eloquently to the Department of Finance that, in a time of reduced government support for the arts, this new "tax on creativity, on the works of the intellect . . . denies the importance of the role of the arts and the cultural industries to Canadian society." We would like to point out a few particular instances in which this tax will adversely affect Canadian composers, to demonstrate that the formulators of this tax, attuned only to the world of business and high finance, have no idea at all how the arts community operates in Canada.

[Translation]

And I think that goes on exactly the same lines you were. I hope that you can comment on it for us. So I continue with the letter.

[English]

First, regarding the commissioning of new music: unlike the United States, there is no tradition of private commissioning in Canada; almost all commissions are funded by the Canada Council, the provincial Arts Councils or the CBC, who pay composers to write music for specific performers. Under the GST, these commissions will be taxable, but the tax will be payable, not by the funding bodies, but by the performers. Now, both composers and performers do not fare well financially in this country—most cannot live on their work as artists, but are forced to work at other jobs. Very few generate more than the $30,000.00 cut-off, above which registration for the GST is compulsory. (Indeed, Statistics Canada figures for 1985 (the most recent available) show that Canadian composers are at the bottom of the list of artists in earnings, generating a mere $400.00 per year!). Thus, many will opt out of the system, since their revenues are not high enough to force them to register, and the benefits of Input Tax Credits will not be offset by the bookkeeping problems of registration. Thus, inequities will arise: when the composer is not registered, regardless of whether the performer is registered, no GST need be charged; however, when the composer is registered and the performer is not, the composer will have to charge the GST, but the performer will not be able to claim the credit. In the very real situation in which a performer is unable to bear the cost of the tax ($350.00 on an average $5,000.00 commission), we foresee composers absorbing the GST themselves, in order simply to receive the commission. The same sort of scenario applies to the relationship between music teachers (some of whom may be registered and some who may not) and their students—the new tax will be applied inequitably across the sector and, in the context of long-standing government policy which has exempted artistic endeavours from many taxes, will, in an ill-considered fashion, impose substantial new financial burdens on a portion of society which maintains a marginal financial existence at best. As the CCA points outs, this is ironic in light of the government's recent public acknowledgement and recognition of the "unique circumstances governing the artistic profession."

[Senator Molgat.]

Second, regarding the application of the GST to books and music sales, we would like to add our voice to that of R. Murray Schafer (who wrote to you on July 14 of this year concerning the impact of the GST on his company, Arcana Editions), and those of other small publishers of music in Canada. As Mr. Schafer argues, he, like many other small publishers of new music, must work extremely hard to simply break even in the Canadian market—the market for new music scores is small at best, and it is one in which interest grows very slowly over the years. The dip in sales anticipated by the sudden imposition of a 7 per cent tax, along with added bookkeeping costs to administer the GST, could spell disaster for companies such as Arcana Editions, which barely survive now. The question here is not a simple one of "bottom-line business" for small, marginal companies under the GST—the question is whether Canada cares enough about its own culture to allow small, but significant aspects of its artistic life to continue to exist, and perhaps, with help, to thrive. The music community and Canada as a whole would be much poorer without companies such as Arcana—and the GST will certainly be a major factor in the loss of these companies if it is allowed to pass.

Finally, may we point out that, while the GST will be imposing new taxes on Canadian artists and artistic endeavours, it will be granting a tax-free status to non-residents, thereby encouraging Canadians to "save" by hiring foreign professionals and purchasing lower-cost foreign goods and services. This is strangely at odds with the government's avowed policy of public support for the arts and cultural products, in the face of already stiff competition in the form of foreign artistic products and services—if put into effect, it could have the effect of drowning Canadian culture in an increasingly cost-effective wave of foreign artistic competition.

Thus, we urgently implore you to do all that you can to block the passage of the GST or, at the very least, to force substantial revisions to it that will reconsider the destructive impact it will have on the artistic community in Canada.

Yours sincerely,

Patrick Cardy,
President

[Translation]

So I want to ask you, Senator Hébert, in line with what you were saying, do you agree with what the League of Composers suggests here? Is the situation really as serious as they tell us?

• (0030)

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Senator Hébert, because of your experience not only as a publisher but as an author and a public servant before being appointed to the Senate—

Senator Hébert: Public servant?

Senator Grafstein: I recall you were a public official at the CRTC.

Senator Hébert: No, I was only a part-time member.

Senator Grafstein: Then you were a part-time public official. The interesting economic point that you might assist the Senate in considering is the thrust of the submission made by the Arts Council and others. This is the same whether it applies to books, artists, actors or writers. In order to facilitate their existence and fulfill the cultural imperatives of the country, all of them require tax dollars. A composer cannot subsist on the marketplace; he has to go to a grant-giving organization such as the Ontario Council, and I am sure in Quebec there is a parallel arts-granting council. There are also the Canada Council, Telefilm, and a number of government tax-funded organizations and institutions in the country that are dedicated to equalizing the so-called "playing field" between the artistic community and the marketplace. The only manner in which there can be even partial equalization is by tax grants.

Since the establishment of the broadcasting system, and even before, there has been a series of sophisticated grant-giving cultural organizations; these organizations have performed superbly in establishing some type of safety net beneath the artists in this country. It is clear that tax dollars are necessary to every aspect of cultural life. In Quebec we find that it is even more necessary to provide tax dollars to maintain and promote that sector of our society.

I would ask the honourable senator to address his mind to this problem: Do we not find ourselves in an illogical circle, if on the one hand we compel taxpayers to allocate an increasing portion of tax dollars for the cultural sector and then the moment these dollars are transferred to this underprivileged sector of society—underprivileged in the sense that they cannot meet the environment of the marketplace—and they enter the stream, we say, "By the way, we want to tax you", causing the artist, publisher and the various elements of the cultural community to put aside a portion of their time to fulfil their obligation to pay the GST, which is essentially a consumption tax? Are we not putting artists in a terrible downward spiral by offering them on the one hand handouts to maintain their cultural existence, and thereby benefit all of society, and, on the other hand, the moment they are able to provide or produce a cultural product, saying to them, "Thank you very much. We would now like you to spend some of your time, effort and energy to repay us some of that"? The cost to society is the cost of providing that grant in the first place, and we now want to add further to that cost by taking part of that away by taxing a portion of it. Does that not, in effect, make the taxpayer a double victim? Is there any way out of this terrible conundrum?

Senator Hébert: The honourable senator is perfectly right. I do not see any way out, other than by changing the government. It does not want to listen and it is simply not sensitive to the issue. I do not think this government is concerned about artists, writers or poets. Otherwise, why would they not have accepted the same measures as the Quebec government accepted, albeit with some reluctance. Gérard-D. Lévesque was not happy with the proposition. He did not seem to care very much for the poets, composers, artists and so on, but under pressure from the young members of his party, the population of Quebec in general and the organization of writers, publishers and booksellers, he had to change his mind. He was not anxious to do so.

I think that there is a general lack of sensitivity at government levels, but particularly so in the case of this government that is in power. They are insensitive to the needs of artists, writers, poets, publishers, booksellers and so on.

What you have just described and what was mentioned by Senator Molgat with regard to composers of music are typical of the inaction of this government. I am not familiar with the issue, but I agree with some of your questions. They were very informative and I am grateful for them. I shall try to learn more about the matter in the future.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Before you leave the subject, in the appendix I read from the Canadian League of Composers, one of the points they made was that the GST will encourage using artists and groups of artists from outside Canada who, it seems, will be exempt. I do not know exactly, I repeat to you what they said:

[English]

Finally, may we point out that, while the GST will be imposing new taxes on Canadian artists and artistic endeavours, it will be granting a tax-free status to non-residents, thereby encouraging Canadians to "save" by hiring foreign professionals and purchasing lower-cost foreign goods and services.

[Translation]

So they say that this is contrary to the government's statement that it is prepared to give support through Canada Council grants. Is it really the case that artists and writers from outside the country will be exempt?

Senator Hébert: I do not think it is true for writers, but you are certainly right about artists. What will happen for writers, along the same lines, is obviously that Canadian books will become more and more expensive . . .

[English]

Senator Cools: What did Senator Cogger say?

Senator Hébert: I am sure that he is about to announce something.

Senator Cools: What did he say?

Senator Hébert: He said that I made a gross error. At least he could stand up and tell us what that error is. I do not want to misinform anyone.

Senator Cogger: It would not be the first time.

Senator Hébert: You see, he cannot answer.

Surely, if I have made a gross error, you can tell me what it is.

Senator Cogger: Foreign artists will get the same treatment as local artists as long as they operate in Canada. That is the answer to your question.

Senator Grafstein: I am sorry, I do not follow.

Senator Cogger: Never mind. Keep up your little dialogue. I am sorry I intervened.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, if the letter to which Senator Molgat referred has a gross error in it, it is our position—

Senator Cools: What was the gross error? Could you read it again?

Senator Grafstein: The honourable senator has indicated that there is a gross error in the argumentation presented in the letter read by Senator Molgat.

Obviously, he can speak for himself, but the letter was written to the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and it is from the Canadian League of Composers. If there is an underlying premise to that letter that is in error, surely we should bring that to their attention and discount the value of the letter. On the face of it, the letter seems to represent a very potent and important part of the cultural life of our community. Surely, if there is anything in the letter that would mislead the Senate, we have a duty to apprise them of that and to ask them to respond.

Please, give us a moment or two—not to take up too much of your time, but a moment or two—to indicate how they are, in effect, misleading the Senate, and we will undertake to bring it to the attention of the composers.

● (0040)

I know a number of composers. I am sure the senators opposite do as well. I cannot say that some of these composers are my best friends, but I certainly have an acquaintance with some composers. If they are participating indirectly in a document that misleads the Senate, I think it is incumbent upon us to bring that to their attention. So I would welcome just a moment or two of clarification on how they are being mistreated or how this letter is in error.

Senator Cools: If Senator Cogger finds himself a little shy or if he is too frugal with his time, I have a suggestion. I know that he gets a little shy from time to time, so I would propose that Senator Cogger frame a response and send it to the authors of the letter so that the authors of the letter can write to us again and Senator Molgat can again read what they have to say into the record.

I think we should assure Senator Cogger that there is no need to be coy.

Senator Grafstein: The only part of his argumentation that I heard is that foreign composers are treated in the same way as domestic composers, and therefore to infer from this letter that somehow Canadian composers were being unfairly treated would be unreasonable. Now is that the point that Senator Cogger was making?

Senator Cogger: I shall respond in writing.

Senator Grafstein: Senator, this is recent history, but I think you really should.

Senator Molgat: But he withdraws.

Senator Grafstein: Well if he chooses to withdraw, he can. But our problem is that we have been castigated in public for being unfair to the institution of the Senate. So in our new-found feeling for the Senate, trying to maintain the highest standards of the Senate, we should not allow an erroneous submission to be presented without bringing it to the attention of the letter writer, or the petitioner, unless we can justify our grounds on some reasonable basis for the alleged error.

But I leave that to honourable senators, because upon reading the rules all that an honourable senator can do for senators opposite is to bring these matters to the particular senator's attention, and it is then up to him to decide what in his conscience he decides to do.

Senator Hébert: I think you should take the opportunity, Senator Cogger, to say that maybe your words went beyond your thoughts, or that you made a mistake, or something like that. I do not see why you are shy about standing up and speaking up, as you do very often, considering that your boss is not around and will not be able to tell you to shut up as he did a couple of time earlier. He is not there, so take the opportunity to stand up and tell us.

Senator Cogger: Senator Hébert, fine, I shall read the transcript, following the suggestion of Senator Cools. I think you are wrong in the answer. I will verify it and if I am right, as I think I am, I will circulate a letter.

As to my leader being here or not being here, I will speak to you or to anybody in this Chamber whenever I feel like it. And contrary to you, sir, who just admitted an hour ago that, when Allan MacEachen tells you to shut up, you do, well, nobody tells me to shut up.

However, I am sorry I interrupted your little mutual admiration society; please keep on lobbying soft questions at one another. I will not say another word. Thank you.

Senator Hébert: I doubt that he will not say another word.

Senator Cogger: By the way, Senator Hébert, you hade better be careful; you are in the process of stealing Senator Gigantès' record. Now I am about to call Senator Gigantès and say, "Watch it. One of your colleagues is stealing your record away from you."

Senator Cools: What record is that of which you are speaking.

Senator Cogger: Sixteen hours and sixteen minutes.

Senator Hébert: I am sure that Senator Cogger did not get my answer right at a certain point. I said that, if I stood up without any reason—as Senator Cogger often does, you know—and was interrupting somebody on the other side, and Senator MacEachen gave me a little sign to sit down, I would sit down. Obviously I would. That is what I have said and I repeat it.

Senator Stanbury: It is a matter of courtesy.

Senator Hébert: Yes, of course. I mean he would remind me that I was doing something improper and I would be modest enough to accept that reminder and I would sit down. But Senator Cogger says just the opposite: "Even if Senator Murray, my leader, tells me to sit down I will not. I will stand up and I will say whatever I want." And we were all witnesses—maybe you were not there Senator Graftstein—when Senator Murray on two occasions, maybe three, but certainly two occasions, turned to Senator Cogger, who was standing up, you know, to tell him to shut up. It was quite clear.

Senator Cogger: By the way it is not Cooger, it is Cogger.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Hébert, I can just say that I was not here to witness that. Obviously, I will look at Hansard, I find that I have no reason to disbelieve what you say, but I find this personally astounding because I have always understood Senator Cogger to be a man of great independence and very candid and very vigorous in his views in the past. I know on many occasions he has violently disagreed with his leaders so I find this news simply astounding and quite incredible; this must be a different version of the Senator Cogger that we have all known and loved in the past.

Senator Hébert: He did not like it, I can tell you that. He did not like it at all.

Senator Grafstein: I will check the record, I will have to examine that carefully for myself, for it is not the Senator Cogger that I know.

• (0050)

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: I will tell you one thing. I will send Senator Cogger a copy of the letter from the Canadian League of Composers. He can then read it at leisure and prepare an answer because he tells us that he does not agree with what the composers say. All I did was read straight from the letter. So I will send you a copy, Senator Cogger, and you can prepare an answer.

[English]

Senator Grafstein: I think Senator Cogger has a valid point, if we could respond to this letter we could then send to the League of Composers not only his response but also Hansard or any amplification that Senator Hébert might want so that the matter can be settled, at least to the satisfaction to the Canadian League of Composers.

Senator Cogger: By the way, this is your filibuster; will you carry it on on your own and leave me alone?

Senator Grafstein: Senator Cogger, the word "filibuster" has a very interesting historical origin.

Senator Phillips: We would much rather hear from Senator Hébert. Would you please let him speak.

Senator Grafstein: But he mentioned the word "filibuster". I would like him, if he could, to give us his version of what "filibuster" means—the origin of the word and how we should take that, because I think we have a view of the word "filibuster" which might be different and distinct from his view, and I think it would be an interesting exercise in semantics to determine what the word "filibuster" means to him and what it means to us. Perhaps in that way we can come to some general agreement as to what the word should mean.

• (0100)

Senator Hébert: In the meantime, I will go on.

[Translation]

Besides, I read to you some excerpts from the report of the committee studying cultural affairs.

> Shortly after this report from the committee studying federal cultural policy was tabled, that is before most of its recommendations could be implemented, the 1984 election was called. Naturally, the committee members hoped that the report's recommendations would not be shelved as so many others were before. No doubt we had forgotten that the main recommendation of the Massey-Levesque Commission, our committee's predecessor, took seven years. The recommendation was to create the Canada Council.

It had been proposed by the Massey-Levesque Commission and only came about seven years later.

> Anyway, in 1984, the country had a different government than the one that had created the committee to study federal cultural policy. The new minister responsible was the Hon. Marcel Masse.
> A few days after he was sworn in as Minister, I met him by chance on Parliament Hill. I congratulated him on his appointment and he said to me, "It is quite ironical that I am the one to implement your committee's recommendations."

I pretended to be pleased and at that time I still had confidence in this new minister who I thought was more sensitive to cultural issues than most of his cabinet colleagues.

I would even say more educated.

> I even admit that at the beginning of his term, I did not systematically throw all his speeches in the garbage. He had the original idea of always beginning with a quotation from a known author.

You have noticed that the Hon. Marcel Masse's speeches always quote a well-known author.

[English]

Senator Cools: May I interrupt, Senator Hébert?

Several weeks ago—or it could even be a couple of years ago—I was reading an article by Allan Fotheringham. He suggested at one point that Marcel Masse had a great knowledge of obscure Sardinian poets. Have you found that to be the case? Apparently, he seems to be quite accomplished in quoting obscure poetry. Is that true?

Senator Hébert: I don't know about that. What I was referring to is the fact that, after the election when I received piles of speeches from ministers—and I must say that quite a few went straight to the waste paper basket—

[Translation]

The original thing about the Hon. Marcel Masse's speeches is that they always began with a quote from a well-known author. He still does that as you can see. I note that you are not fond of Marcel Masse's speeches. Anyway, . . .

If the speech was no good, at least we could enjoy a quote from Victor Hugo, or Saint-Exupéry.

There it was at the beginning of his speech.

According to my humble calculations, using Larousse's dictionary of quotations, that book alone has enough for the next 6,721 speeches by the Hon. Marcel Masse.

Do you believe, honourable senators, that I am making fun of this habit of the minister who shows his consideration for writers not only in Canada but througout the world?

On the contrary, I wish all ministers did the same. Then, instead of tearing up Michael Wilson's speeches with rage, we would at least save the epigraph containing an amusing thought from Steven Leacock or some fine verse by Alain Grandbois.

So in 1984, I hoped that the Hon. Marcel Masse was really interested in culture in general and books in particular.

Two years later, the minister made a speech to the provincial conference of ministers responsible for films and books. Allow me to quote a few excerpts from this speech that deal only with books and publishing.

So what did Marcel Masse have to say in 1986, which is not so long ago, four years ago? What did he have to say about books? What did he and his researchers, the people in his department, have to say?

They show beyond any doubt that Marcel Masse and his researchers were well aware of the problems of the book industry in 1986.

They are not just finding out about them today and the coalition against the GST on books has not revealed any great mysteries to him. He was perfectly aware of it.

But first of all—and I know that you are dying to hear the quote chosen by the hon. minister to adorn the first page of this historic speech. I will read to you the quote from Desmond Pacey, author of the Book of Canadian Stories published in 1947. It is as follows: Literature is to a nation what memory combined with intelligence is to a person.

Now here is how the minister addressed his provincial colleagues:

He was not speaking to ordinary people; he was speaking to other ministers, the provincial ministers.

[Senator Cools.]

Now, of course, I am very pleased to welcome you here today.

Oh, that is less original than his quote, but anyway.

As you know, we are here to discuss the future of books in Canada. It is no accident that Canadians and the governments of Canada increasingly share concern for the future of books in this country.

You see that? The government minister is telling us about the future of books in Canada while with their tax they will destroy the progress made in the last 30 years. Well, Mr. Masse continues.

For about 15 years, Canadian literature has flourished. He is right. We are no longer surprised to see essays on the work of Margaret Atwood, Robertson Davies or George Woodcock in the New York Times Book Review. In Quebec, literature thrives, with new novelists like Réjean Ducharme, Victor-Lévy Beaulieu, Antonine Maillet, Yves Beauchemin and Michel Tremblay, to name only a few. And what about the poets who write prolifically and, despite all the obstacles, are read by Canadians throughout the country?

Literature is alive and takes root in all kinds of soil. Even its most prosaic forms are tied to our identity. Already in 1936, Maurice Hébert—a distant cousin of mine, by the way—wrote in Les lettres au Canada français that people without art and literature have no history.

Well, Marcel Masse continues:

"Literature is the soul of a people."

That is nice, is it not?

Nevertheless, even the most talented actors cannot use their talent to advantage in a hall that has poor acoustics; similarly, even good literature will languish if not given enough room. Here in Canada, the relationships between books, their production and their reception by the public have often been discussed.

So you see, he is quite well aware.

About 100 years ago, the Hon. Marcel Masse continues, in 1986, Sarah Jeanette Duncan, editor of the Toronto magazine The Week, raised the following question: "Why is art so rare in Canada?" She went so far as to reject the idea, saying that through the obscure workings of some natural law, literature is not native to Canada. On the contrary, she believed there was a connection between literature and the social and cultural environment. That idea was far ahead of its time, especially in a era when romantic thinking had it that genius existed by itself, cut off from everything. Nevertheless, we still find that idea today among some critics of our cultural life.

So you see the Hon. Mr. Masse made an effort. Of course, he was talking to other ministers about the problem of books.

Two years after the article by Sara Duncan, a certain Wilfred Chateauclair echoed her concerns. Although his optimism may seem naive today, Mr. Chateauclair nevertheless approaches the question with a particularly modern outlook. In 1888, he wrote: "A refined, aware and vigorous Canadian literature is starting to grow and develop. Its very nature shows that it is an outcome of Confederation. It is the work of a generation that has grown under the influence of a united country".

So already 100 years ago, Canadians were interested in the conditions required for literature to develop in their country. And we are definitely here today to consider these questions.

2. Scope of our discussions.

Therefore, I intend to look at the question with you by raising the following four points:

a) The importance of the publishing industry for the country's culture and industry;

b) The present situation of the industry;

c) How the government sees the development of the Canadian publishing industry;

d) Opportunities for joint federal-provincial initiatives.

He was talking to his colleagues, the provincial ministers, of course.

The publication and dissemination of written material is at the heart of Canada's cultural identity, partly for reasons inherent in the cultural life of all countries. Writing is a privileged means of communication. In practice, publishers choose the authors to present to Canadian readers. Therefore publishers shape the tastes of the community.

I do not understand why those on the other side do not pay closer attention. I am reading a fine statement written by one of their ministers—one of their best-educated ministers—Marcel Masse.

On many occasions, Canadian publishers have tried to feature Canadian writers. To them we owe some key works that shaped public debates in Canada in all fields, from cultural sovereignty to social policy. We would have difficulty correctly appreciating Canadian discourse in the last 20 years without mentioning the work of George Grant or some ideas of Marshall McLuhan that Harold Innis took up, without thinking of the work of a whole generation of literary critics who connect the principles developed by Northrop Frye and the novels of Margaret Atwood, not to mention the valuable insights into our heritage that we owe to works like L'influence de Voltair au Canada by the great Laval historian Marcel Trudel. We cannot overemphasize the contribution of publishing to the creative and intellectual life of the country. Yes, we have every reason to be pleased with the work done.

So, as you see, Minister Masse is quite well aware. Now the economic and industrial importance of publishing.

The publishing industry is equally important economically. In 1983, its sales in Canada totalled $1.2 billion.

You see that we have come some way since the period from 1960 to 1970 which I described to you a little earlier.

In that same year, sales abroad totalled $80 million.

These statistics would lead us to believe in a remarkably healthy industry with great growth potential. But if we look more closely we see it is not exactly the case.

You can see how well the minister understands the situation. Despite tremendous progress, it is still an extremely vulnerable industry that anything can threaten. And the GST is not just anything.

Paradoxically books are part of both our cultural and industrial life.

We write, publish and read a large number of books. Of all books sold in Canada in 1983, 25% had been published in this country. Some observers found it strange that governments were concerned about the health of the book industry, but there is no doubt that this concern about the Canadian publishing industry is justified.

It is not only the publishers who have been making a lot of noise in the last few weeks. The Minister himself understands the situation and has been warning other ministers interested in books.

On this subject let me tell you an interesting story. At the beginning of his writing career Hugh MacLennan—

You know this very good friend of Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland—came to the conclusion that, if he was going to be a writer, he should be a Canadian one because, in the late 1930s, one of his novels had been just rejected by the 22nd publisher in a row. To his manuscript was attached a note to his agent: "We do not know your writer at all. He does not quite write like an American or an Englishman. There is something strange about this manuscript." In fact it was written by a true Canadian writer.

Last week, in the ongoing consultation process with the cultural community, I was hosting in Ottawa a symposium attended by representatives of the publishing industry. This symposium was attended by French- and English-language publishers, by small, medium and big publishers, by general literature and textbook publishers, by Canadian and foreign publishers.

This meeting gave me the opportunity to confirm the findings of the publishing study I asked my Department to conduct.

You see that Mr. Masse had taken the trouble to ask his department to conduct publishing surveys. I am not quoting Marcel Masse just for the sake of it. He is one of those who best know the issue I have been talking about for the last few hours.

These findings show that, in spite of a $1 billion volume of business, publishers of internationally recognized Canadian books experience chronic difficulties.

This is due to several factors. On the one hand, the publishing industry suffers from a chronic lack of capital.

> On the other hand Canadian publishers are at a disadvantage compared with their international competitiors who can benefit from economies of scale. Finally, they lose $600 million a year to foreign businesses. This reduces by half the $1.2 billion in potential business Canadian and foreign publishers and agents stand to make in Canada.

I must say that Marcel Masse perfectly understands—at least he did in 1986—the problems of the publishing industry both in French and in English Canada.

> Allow me to elaborate on each of these aspects so you can better understand how they are related to each other.

Yes, we will allow him to elaborate. It is interesting and exciting to realize that a Cabinet minister who had the crazy idea to tax books for the first time since Confederation is perfectly aware of the situation, as Mr. Masse obviously is. In Item 6, he points out the lack of capital available to the Canadian publishing industry. He knows about this.

> Make no mistake about this. Canadian publishing houses suffer from a chronic and severe lack of capital. Given the assets these publishers can offer as guarantee, that is boxes of unsold books, banking institutions are extremely reluctant to give them loans. These are short-term assets such as stocks and bonds. The publishing industry is very risky, sales estimates are uncertain, and investors are wary. Under these circumstances, publishers are forced to incur short-term debts to finance their long-term investments.

● (0110)

Every Canadian publisher could have said exactly the same thing as Mr. Masse. As you can see, I make no bones about recognizing his competence or at least the validity of the study conducted by his department which resulted in that speech given before other ministers who were also interested in the problems of the publishing industry and who wanted to find common solutions. Since the beginning I have often talked about the problem of American, British and French competition in Quebec.

> In Canada, book publishers enjoy no protection whatsoever against their foreign competitors.

There is no customs duties, for example, on French books coming into Canada as I explained earlier. That is the last thing Quebec and Canadian publishers, writers, and, curiously, booksellers want to do. They have never asked for this kind of protection which would make books from France, Great Britain and elsewhere more expensive. I think it is to their credit that they have always defended the free circulation of books in Canada wherever they come from.

> The Canadian book market remains one of the most open in the industrialized world.

This is something the Minister understands.

> Imported products account for 75% of book sales and 71% of magazine sales.

My English language colleagues are well aware of the fierce competition generated by magazines such as Time and Newsweek. We also have a lot of French competition with magazines such as l'Express that I have here, Figaro, etc.

> Foreign publishers account for 70% of total sales in the English-language Canadian market.
> Foreign companies dominate the paperback market. There are hardly any Canadian hardcover-book publishers—

Senator Stollery was worried about this

> . . . who also publish paperbacks. That is why Canadian publishers cannot compete on the paperback market. The vertical integration of hardcover book and paperback publishers give foreign companies an intrinsic structural advantage over Canadian businesses. Foreign companies can thus offer attractive contracts to Canadian bestselling authors.
>
> That is why Canadian publishers cannot benefit from potential sales generated by the most profitable Canadian authors.
>
> The amounts assigned to marketing and advertising illustrate the situation. In 1983 foreign subsidiaries spent nearly $52 million on such activities compared with only some $16 million for the Canadian industry.
>
> Textbook agencies and markets.

All Canadian publishers make profits from the sale of imported books they distribute.

It is especially true in English Canada because a lot of French Canadian publishers do not sell books.

> They do not represent foreign publishers. In fact, agencies are the engine of the whole industry. Canadian publishers who distribute imported bestsellers can invest their profits into Canadian books and authors. In other words, there is a link between the agencies and the research and development done on original Canadian works.
> However, even though Canadian publishing houses were officially designated as import agents for foreign titles, American distributors tend to rely on mail-order service across Canada. This service, combined with rebate offers, free shipping and toll-free numbers, is at the heart of the Canadian agencies' problem.

But, as you can imagine, this refers to English-language publishing.

> As I mentioned earlier, some $600 million leave the country every year because libraries, governments and various teaching institutions buy their books directly from foreign companies. Also, 60% of agencies are foreign-owned. The proportion of Canadian-owned agencies in this very profitable industry is getting smaller all the time.
> When we look at the textbook industry, which is rightly considered to be the most profitable, we see that the situation is the same. Canadian publishing houses are also excluded from the textbook market. In English Canada the problem is even worse as 65% of the primary-and secondary-level textbook market is controlled by foreign interests.

While it was true in the past, it is not the case anymore in Quebec.

To restore the industry to a more normal state, we should consider whether a larger proportion of our textbooks should be produced by Canadian publishers.

Across Canada some five million children attend primary and secondary schools. If the needs of the students were met by Canadian publishers, the industry would become more stable. Improving access to this market would ensure the cross-subsidization necessary to develop publishing companies facing higher risks. Because they have access to only 35% of the market, Canadian publishing houses cannot plan ahead.

It is worth noting that Quebec gave us a striking example of what can be accomplished in this regard. Mostly due to existing regulations in Quebec, the general situation in that province is much better than elsewhere. (Quebec publishers control 60% of the market.)

Principles underlying the government publishing policy.

The Minister expands on his views and he has been quite right so far.

Let me explain why our government is concerned about this sector of our industy.

It is interesting to know why, according to Mr. Masse, the federal government is interested in books. The same thing could not be said about Mr. Wilson unfortunately.

This analysis suggests that the industry's profile could be improved through government action. However, any government action should assume that the industry can and must be more self-sufficient. The Canadian government is convinced that it is possible as long as the industry succeeds in asserting itself on its own market.

And that the GST is not imposed on it. It is me and not Mr. Masse who say this but it is quite apropos.

In other words, our outlook is essentially market-oriented. We want to ensure that Canadian regulations and market structure allow fairer competition between Canadian- and foreign-owned publishers.

Let us go back for a moment to the vulnerability revealed by the practices of the Canadian publishing industry.

For the third time the Minister talks about the vulnerability emerging from the practices of the Canadian publishing industry. The Hon. Marcel Masse knows very well the book situation in Canada and in Quebec in particular. It is him who says this not me. He goes on to say:

"I would like to see this vulnerability replaced by a normal situation."

He would like the book market to become normal again but he admits that it is the case, that the industry is vulnerable.

Foreign books will always be welcome in Canada.

I agree with him. All publishers and booksellers in Quebec and Canada agree. We support the free flow of ideas.

One only has to look at the data on book import to realize it. Foreign-owned companies will also continue to be welcome in Canada. But a certain balance must be maintained.

Now that the federal budget has been tabled . . .

I remind you that Mr. Masse is talking about the 1986 budget . . .

I am happy to inform you that the Minister of Finance . . .

Mr. Wilson obviously . . .

. . . has allocated $65 million over the next five years to the Book Publishing Industry Development Program.

So, on the one hand, he allocates millions of dollars (over five years so the annual amount is not that great but still) to a Book Publishing Industry Development Program. He wants to help publishing.

This represents a considerable increase from the assistance already given by the Canadian government as well as a commitment by my Cabinet colleagues to this component of the Canadian economy.

In reality, this initiative will only work if every province adopts complimentary measures.

I have not kept track of what happened. I do not know if Mr. Masse's promises were kept because they were linked to complimentary measures from each of the 10 provinces, not to mention the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. So I do not know what happened. But Mr. Masse told us about the need for money. He even invited provincial governments. He had ministers around him during this conference and he was telling them: "We must help publishing as it is an important sector more vulnerable than others."

Both government levels are extremely concerned with budget restrictions. It is very hard to find other funding and impossible to continue justifying extra expenditures in the absence of concrete results. All this means is that the publishing industry must become self-sufficient through financial and structural changes that will happen if it gets better access to its own Canadian market.

My Cabinet colleagues . . .

that includes Mr. Wilson, Mr. Murray and all the others;

. . . know how the future growth of the industry is important to us . . . .

He was talking about the book industry.

I wanted cultural sovereignty to be considered a priority across the country. If I succeed, it will be due to a large extent to the wide consultations held with the industries and the provinces. The process initiated in Vancouver, the commitment we made in Halifax, the meetings held with industry representatives in Ottawa, and now this historic meeting in Montreal . . .

We can see that the Hon. Marcel Masse was not stingy with his time or his trips. He travelled across the country—he went to Vancouver, Halifax, Ottawa and Montreal—to meet with publishers and with his provincial counterparts dealing with the same issue. He worked very hard and he called the Montreal meeting with other ministers an historic one.

> All these events have convinced me that the same deep and ongoing concern is shared by all of us who have responsibilities in this area.
> I therefore suggest that we examine some of the measures that could be taken by the Canadian goverment in co-operation with the provinces.
>
> Possible joint measures.

This is what he proposed.

> The major concerns that came to light during the Ottawa forum are the following:
>
> 1. Access to funding sources;
> 2. Off-shore procurement;
> 3. Textbook development and purchasing policies;
> 4. Access to domestic markets;
> 5. Direct financial assistance.
>
> I would like to deal with the last item on the list. Obviously, in the case of important cultural works, the Canadian government must continue to give subsidies. It is our current policy and we have no intention of changing it.

He is of course referring to the Canada Council.

> The proposal to take joint initiatives . . . .

[English]

Senator Grafstein: I have listened carefully to the minister's analysis of the structural problems relating to book publishing in Canada. Senator Hébert, you are now touching on his four-point analysis, which includes access to the marketplace, access to foreign suppliers, and a number of other principles.

Based on your travels and experience, have you analyzed the comparative prices of books in the United States, France, England and Canada? On a general basis, at this moment is the cost of books in those countries higher or lower?

The reason I ask you to address that issue is because I understand the laudable desire of the Canadian government is to increase the percentage of Canadian books sold in the domestic marketplace. I assume the lower the price, the higher the number of books sold in the Canadian marketplace, because not only is there competition within Canada but also with people who travel back and forth across the border. We have a huge annual migration of Canadians, particularly to the United States. Senators are voracious readers of books. Tonight I notice at least six or seven senators opposite who instead are not only concentrating on your persuasive speech, Senator Hébert, but who instead are also reading books. Therefore, we are here not only as senators but as consumers.

[Senator Hébert.]

I assume the books senators opposite are reading are Canadian books or books published in Canada. So is price sensitivity an important issue on a comparative basis. Will the GST assist in selling more books in Canada? Or, on the other hand, will it allow more foreign books to be marketed here so that the Canadian share of the Canadian marketplace, after making positive progress in the past few years, will be eroded, thereby starting us on a different downward cycle? I ask that question because a considerable amount of institutional grants have been established for books, book publishers and book fairs. Certain grants and certain tax advantages in terms of mailing, and so on, are provided to book publishing companies, and that money, again, comes out of the same general tax coffers.

So, on the one hand we are using tax dollars to assist the book publisher to achieve a greater penetration of the Canadian marketplace and, on the other hand, if we find the cost base for Canadian books higher than the cost base for American books sold in Canada, we may end up in a situation where we are eroding the ability of Canadian books to access the Canadian marketplace.

I know that I have asked you a very convoluted question. In summary, the question is about price sensitivity: Do you sell more books at lower prices or is the book consumer not concerned about prices? How do Canadian prices compare to prices in other jurisdictions, particularly in the United States? I think it would be useful to have the advantage of your experience.

Senator Hébert: I am sure that I mentioned this fact earlier. I know that I intend to mention it again. If the honourable senator will bear with me a little longer, I shall be coming to some documents that will answer that very question; that is, the sensitivity of the buyer to any kind of increase in the price of books. It is a serious question, and it has been one of the main arguments put forth by publishers, authors and booksellers. I thank you for the question, and I am sure that I can give you a better answer if you will wait until I get to the document that is here somewhere in my pile.

In the meantime, allow me to read an extract from a speech made by the Hon. Marcel Masse to a group of ministers, all of whom are concerned with the book industry.

[Translation]

The Minister goes on to say:

> The proposal to take joint initiatives is based on the fact that past provincial initiatives in this area have been beneficial to the publishing industry. I referred earlier to the situation in Quebec where the publishing industry was protected by Bill 51 which ordered libraries to buy their books through approved bookstores.
>
> The industry also benefited from Memo No. 14 in Ontario, the Maritex projects in the Maritimes and the initiatives taken in British Columbia.
> It would be a good idea for the provinces to encourage Canadian publishers to produce textbooks.

In addition, provinces could approve textbooks before they are published, so that smaller Canadian businesses can get the money they need before the final printing stage.

With regard to off-shore procurement, the Canadian government has already taken positive measures by trying to consolidate the Canadian book distributing network through approved investments into the Canadian Telebook Agency. Foreign procurement threatens all Canadian publishers. As long as federal and provincial libraries and institutions continue to buy from foreign sources, it will be difficult to make progress. Each one of us must do his or her part and deal with Canadian distributors whenever possible.

It is incredible to see a minister with a very good understanding of a rather complex situation.

There is an increasing tendency to negotiate separate Canadian marketing rights for foreign books. It is already an established practice in other industrialized countries. One of the most flagrant inconsistencies of our market is that Canadian rights are still considered part of territorial rights for North America and are sold as such to foreign publishers.

It is not enough to establish Canadian territorial rights, we must also find ways to defend these rights. That is why we must change the way we buy publishing rights.

• (0130)

Finally, if the Canadian publishing industry could increase its share of the textbook market, it could improve its financial position. Given the responsibilities of the provincial education ministers in this area, how can we integrate them with our larger cultural responsibilities?

The solution I am suggesting today is the creation of a consulting group with a double mandate. Firstly, to participate in the development of a publishing policy, especially by giving me your ideas on the review of the Book Publishing Industry Development Program and, secondly, to study the issues of interest to our respective government.

I would like you to give me your suggestions on how to initiate other productive measures to revitalize the publishing industry.

He sees the need for revitalization.

The consulting group could review the possibility of creating and managing a textbook development fund for Canadian publishing houses as well as changes to the related procurement policy. Provincial education department representatives should play a major role in these talks.

The committee should also explore the possibility of making federal and provincial institutions change some of their procurement practices in order to discourage buying from foreign sources.

Conclusion and summary of this brilliant statement by the Hon. Marcel Masse and I quote:

The policy we announced in Baie Comeau . . .

What a coincidence!

. . . is designed to introduce a gradual change in the publishing industry. It must be completed by complimentary measures. Our wide consultations with industry representatives and provincial colleagues showed that a gradual implementation of any change in policy was better for the industry. We will continue consulting with the industry in the same way to ensure that our policies meet its needs. We also need your advice.

This is the speech of a model minister who wants to consult, who did consult and who promises that he will continue to consult. The Minister did his homework in the sense that he really studied the subject, and he talks about publishing with a lot of authority and common sense.

What I have just quoted you, honourable senators, is Marcel Masse when he was at his best in 1986. A lot has happened since then and the Marcel Masse of 1990 seems to have forgotten how important it is to protect the vulnerable book industry. To justify the GST he tries to find compromise solutions such as new subsidies to publishers, a crutch that the book industry rejected right away. But like his boss, the wavering Brian Mulroney, and his colleagues such as Messrs. Wilson, Loiselle and Andre, the Hon. Marcel Masse is talking tough. "There is no way books can be exempted from the GST."

His message has come across loud and clear.

However, in its November 3 issue, Le Devoir reported that a source close to the Minister had told its reporter Paule Larivière, and I quote:

We hope the Quebec Government will exempt books from the tax. It would be the right decision.

It was people in Mr. Masse's department who hoped that the Quebec Government would exempt books from the tax. It would obviously be the right decision. It would certainly be easier if it was done by the Quebec Government rather than themselves.

You need a lot of nerve to ask the Quebec Government to do exactly what the federal government refuses to do.

[English]

Senator Grafstein: Could I ask another question dealing with this?

Senator Phillips: Give the guy a chance.

Senator Grafstein: I am trying to give him a chance. The honourable senator raised the question of the minister from Quebec's participation in the last election, or he eluded to that. I am interested, since I did not follow the election promises made by Quebec ministers in Quebec during the last election, whether or not Mr. Masse advised the electorate that he intended to tax cultural products, particularly books? I would like to know whether he made a promise that he now intends to keep. Did the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance in the Province of Quebec deal with the question of the impact of the GST on cultural products? I would like to know what the nature of the public discussion was that took place during the election, because it has been said, I think quite fairly, that as a general principle it is not our duty in this chamber to change the public mandate of the government.

I guess the issue for the Senate, as a precondition for making its ultimate decision on this bill, is whether or not the government indeed had a mandate and entered into a social contract with the electorate to provide the goods and services tax.

Now, just to recall, we have had an exchange a number of times in the Senate, I think Senator Comeau raised this. He at one time indicated that this was part of the government's mandate insofar as it applies to New Brunswick. We have heard from other senators from New Brunswick that Senator Comeau may have been incorrect, because they did not hear any of the government's ministers in New Brunswick dealing with the GST. When you turn to Alberta, we have heard Senator Waters and we have heard two former members of the Conservative Caucus, Mr. Kilgour and Mr. Kindy. Mr. Kindy has made the comment to the press that this matter was not raised in Alberta. I can tell you from direct exchange with Mr. Kilgour that he said there was absolute silence on this issue during the last federal campaign in Alberta.

When it comes to the province of Ontario, all that I recall is that the minister said there would be a tax, and it was mentioned almost as a throwaway line, not to worry because it was tax neutral. Now, of course, we have the minister's statement given to Senator Everett. I heard it read in the Senate just a few days ago, and the minister has now said that indeed the GST, as proposed, is not revenue neutral but he undertakes that any surplus will be dedicated to reducing the deficit. This is a material change, a significant change from the government's mandate. Now we have had word from British Columbia, and we will have Senator Austin speaking later tonight about this. I hope he will be able to give us the record as best he can recall on the government's mandate to deal with the GST in and for the province of British Columbia.

However, I have not heard, Senator Hébert, what if anything was the mandate given to the electorate in and for the province of Quebec. The only thing that we do know now is that the provincial government has clearly indicated it is going to exempt books as best as it can from the tax regime in that province. So I presume that the provincial ministers at least were called to account in this extraordinary meeting that you have alluded to, and they backed off, as unhappy as they are. So obviously they were called to account on their mandate. There are a number of senators in the chamber tonight who represent la Belle Province, and if they could give us their recollection of what was said by any of these public figures, then perhaps senators opposite could tell us whether they agree or not.

Senator Hébert: Well, you know very well that this government, in spite of what they have mentioned a few times, had no mandate whatsoever to impose the GST. I know that a few of my colleagues asked the Leader of the Government, if the GST was clearly mentioned during the election campaign, to give them the text of what was said. They asked for any quotations on the subject from the Prime Minister or Mr. Wilson or any important minister who might have clearly stated the intention of the government to impose such a tax. All they said in Quebec, as in the rest of the country, was some vague thing about tax reform. We all agree on the need for tax reform. I am sure you could find that the same promise was in the program of the other parties. Everybody wants to reform the tax system in Canada.

[Senator Grafstein.]

• (0200)

Certainly, in Quebec—and I am sure of this—there was no mention of a tax that would look a bit like the GST. Certainly, Mr. Masse was not naive enough to mention at any time that his government would dare to tax books. The reaction of the population of Quebec comes not only from the common front which came here, headed by publishers, booksellers, authors, librarians, et cetera, but from the whole population of Quebec, which is angry about this tax. It is everybody—the man in the street—who is angry about this tax on books, more than in any other province.

To answer your question, if Mr. Masse had given even a hint that his government would some day contemplate taxing books in Quebec, he would have lost his deposit, you can be sure. The answer is: He did not mention it, and nobody in his party mentioned anything about the GST in Quebec, certainly not the GST on books.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps I could ask another question, because this is, indeed, a serious matter vis-à-vis the province of Ontario.

Last Thursday or Friday night on CBC's All News channel—and it may have been on CBC's regular channel as well—there was a series of interviews with small business people who indicated that, even if the GST were passed, they would refuse to collect the tax or to remit the tax. They felt it would put small business people in a situation where they would not be able to afford to collect the tax or to remit the tax, because they can't deal with the existing paper work now to conduct their business.

There was a whole series of small business people who employed one or two people, and maybe more, who felt they would disobey—call it civil disobedience, if you will—the GST if it were passed.

I am concerned about this issue. I think all honourable senators should be concerned that we not pass a tax measure or, indeed any legal measure, which has the probability of creating a massive tax revolt, in the same way that we would not pass a criminal law which we know would not be enforced. What it ultimately does, based on any theory of government, is erode the observance of law. By threatening to erode the observance of law, you erode civility and orderly conduct in society.

I have heard about people in the past being very upset with a new tax. I know there was a tremendous outcry when the capital gains tax was first enacted. There was a tremendous outcry when a number of the Carter Commission's recommendations vis-à-vis tax reform were brought in, because nobody likes to pay taxes.

I believe there is a different level of dissatisfaction with the GST, and thus civil disobedience might be lurking in the public mind in parts of Ontario. This is very serious. I know that there is that same attitude in Alberta, for good and historic reasons. They have chosen not to pay a sales tax because they are fundamentally against it. They have a surplus in their government's bank account now, so they can, with some justification, say, "We don't need the money; we don't want the money and, in fact, we don't want to collect the money."

Ontario has never adopted that attitude toward sales taxes or, indeed, provincial taxes. There has always been an amazing public acceptance of even unpopular tax measures. However, I detect a different attitude toward this GST, based on petitions we have received and now these interviews. Some municipalities are even considering passing resolutions such as the tax-free zone that we hear British Columbia intends to establish. Essentially, municipal governments, not individuals, are suggesting they will, in effect, advise their taxpayers not to pay this tax. There are governments, not individuals. It is not Henry Thoreau refusing to pay a poll tax in the last century in the United States, one individual against the state; it is municipal governments against other levels of government, admonishing their citizens not to pay the tax.

That is of concern to me. I am sure it is of concern to honourable senators on both sides of the chamber. I am wondering whether this very dangerous attitude is obvious to you in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I am absolutely convinced that it is the case in Quebec. I do not know about the other aspects of the GST. There might be certain aspects that would be easier for Quebecers to swallow than for people in Albertans or Ontarians. But I focussed on one aspect of the GST, i.e. its application to books. In Quebec, this could really cause the kind of reaction that any democrat would fear, a kind of rebellion against this tax.

For example, when close to 95 per cent of the people surveyed in Montreal, which represents a major part of Quebec, are fiercely opposed to the GST on books, you can infer that people are sufficiently angry to find ways to let the gouvernment know that they reject this tax and that they will not pay it. So, you can expect, in Montreal at least, and maybe somewhere else in Quebec, a kind of rebellion which has not materialized yet but whose potential exists.

I think that opposition to taxing books may be stronger in Montreal than anywhere else in Canada. Again I bet you that neither Mr. Masse nor anyone else said a word about such a tax on books during the last election. Consequently, we were right when we said that this government has no mandate to introduce this tax.

[English]

Senator Lucier: Senator Hébert, I understand what you are saying about the anger over the tax on books in the province of Quebec. Beyond that, the Minister of Revenue has already resigned over Quebec's new GST.

Are the people of Quebec really aware of what is going to happen to them within the next couple of years? I do not think they are tuned into what is taking place with the melding of the Quebec sales tax and the GST. Quebec is now going to drop the sales tax but put a GST of their own on a whole range of new items. It seems to me that within two or three years the people of Quebec are going to come to the realization that they have been conned into an 18 per cent GST on virtually everything they touch. Is that a fair assessment of the situation in Quebec and do the people of Quebec really understand that?

I know the people of Quebec are very angry when it comes to a goods and services tax on books and reading materials, but that is because the people involved have access to the media and have made a strong case on that particular issue. At some point the people of Quebec are going to realize what is going to happen to them with this GST, when they find that they have not one GST but two GSTs on everything they touch. Is my assessment accurate?

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I believe you are in fact right in saying that the people of Quebec are not concerned solely by the book issue. We have received thousands of petitions from all the regions of Quebec. I have thousands more in my office. Average Quebeckers definitely feel that something bad is about to befall them. That's why they are calling their Liberal senators and saying: continue the fight; we're counting on you; you are our last resort, our last hope.

What we must say clearly, however—I don't want the senator to miss my answer because I'm making an effort for him—is that the media, the editorialists and the journalists have definitely not fought against the GST in all areas, and they have not done so for all kinds of reasons which I could explain to you at another time. It is only on books that there is some sort of unanimity in the newspapers, in the media and among the editorialists because, on that issue, they felt that pressure was too great and that an editorialist who dared say we need to have the GST on books would perhaps have been virtually banished from the profession. That would have been incomprehensible; he couldn't have afforded that luxury.

However, you feel there is some sort of agreement in journalistic circles in favour of the GST. They have sided with the rich; they have sided with the employers; they have sided with the Manufacturers' Association. They have also often sided with the Conservatives; that cannot be denied. As for Liberal editorialists, there are not that many of them right now. So that may explain why, in reading the newspapers, you ultimately don't get the impression that the Quebec public is just as opposed to the GST as the population of other provinces. But I'm not sure we are not being tricked by the media in this area, just as we are in others. We have received just as many petitions from Quebec as from elsewhere, if not more so. I have received more from Quebec because I'm a senator from Quebec. I have received petitions from all the provinces including Quebec. Not one is missing. A little earlier, I read some of the letters we received; some of them came from Quebec and some came from elsewhere; they all said the same thing. I have already read them and passed them on. But they were letters from Quebec as well as from elsewhere. I was saying that Le Devoir recently reported that someone in Mr. Marcel Masse's entourage had had the gall to say that it would be a good thing for the provincial government to exempt books from the tax before Quebec changes its mind. That would be the best decision, someone near the minister said. That's quite surprising. It takes a lot of gall to ask a provincial government to do precisely what you yourself refuse to do.

> At least after long saying no, the Government of Quebec ultimately yielded to the pressure of public opinion, represented by the Coalition against all taxes on books.

> After that victory, the Coalition, as you all know, turned to Ottawa where it believed it would be well received at least by the Honourable Marcel Masse because everyone in the profession knew that Mr. Masse was receptive to writers and artists and that he had studied the book issue and had taken certain measures which showed he was aware of the delicate situation in which this cultural industry found itself in Quebec. So they naturally went to see him, but I can assure you they were not received particularly warmly, and I am going to give you a few details that were reported in La Presse on October 29 last concerning this meeting. First of all, they arrived after their victory the day before in Quebec City.
> . . . The Coalition against all taxes on books met with a bitter defeat yesterday in Ottawa.

That's what the journalist called it: a bitter defeat.

> There is no way the federal government will exempt books from the GST, the Minister of Communications, Mr. Marcel Masse, stated bluntly.

This is the very minister whose beautiful speech, which I just read to you, was so full of kind thoughts and compassion for publishers, the book publishing industry and so on. That didn't last for long. He received his marching orders: an exemption ws out of the question. The Minister of Revenue, Otto Jelinek, for his part, suggested that Ottawa could withdraw the GST on books, but not before the act was passed.

Let's give them a blank cheque and they'll give us some sort of refund later on. Do you believe that, senator? They definitely did not want to change a thing. That's the way it is: we can't change a thing before the bill is passed; if we change even a comma, the whole thing will crumble and the GST will come tumbling down.

[Senator Hébert.]

> Encouraged by the Quebec government's decision to cancel the effects of the 8% sales tax on books, a large Coalition delegation of some 200 writers, publishers and book store owners appeared on Parliament Hill during the morning.
> "Quebec's decision will make it possible to save half of the some 30% of book stores that were about to disappear."

They conducted a very thorough study of the situation, and they admitted that, if Quebec withdraws, or rather does not tax books, probably half of the 30% of book stores that were expected to disappear will be saved.

> "Let us hope that Ottawa will also show some understanding of the French-language industry," said the President of the Association of Book Store Owners, Mr. Gérald Caza, shortly before the meeting with Mr. Masse.
>
> But the Coalition quickly lost all hope of seeing the federal government reverse its decision before the planned January 1 effective date of the GST.

You know what we think of their prediction.

> It's always the same old story. Mr. Masse was satisfied to propose compensatory measures for the publishing industry, something that showed a lack of understanding of the issue.

A lack of understanding that was not too obvious in the minister's speech which I read you, but he then did an about face because he, too, received his marching orders from on high. So what did Mr. Masse tell them? Well, look, we can't remove the GST because that would be too complicated. The cash registers and so on; all that would be too complicated. We can't do that. However, we are going to offer compensatory measures, we are going to give the publishing industry money to offset the effect of the tax. He tried to buy them off as a way of calming them down. Well, the answer of the book publishing industry was a unanimous no. No one hesitated and said: Well, we'll take the money all the same in case the GST is passed. They said: No, keep it; that's not what we want. We want the GST to be removed because it affects readers; it affects the average person who will no longer be able to buy books. So it was a no from the President of the Publishers Association, Mr. Hervé Foulon, following the meeting with the Minister of Communications.

> "We were expecting the government would take account of the Francophone reality, but that was not the case."

I'm not saying that the situation of the book publishing industry in Toronto is any better, but, in this instance, the delegation came to explain a particular reality which they know very well, that of Quebec. They discussed the matter with Marcel Masse, who is a Quebecker. They expected some sort of understanding, a reasonably warm reception, a certain amount of sympathy. I quote Mr. Hervé Foulon, President of the Publishers Association:

• (0210)

"We expected the government to take account of the Francophone reality, but that was not the case." Mr. Caza added, "It's not by subsidizing a few publishing houses that they'll solve the problem of access to books.

Because that's the problem. Books must be accessible to the largest possible number of people.

Later that afternoon, the Coalition was able to try its luck with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, but it was not because they had been invited. The opportunity arose following remarks during Question Period by Bloc québécois house leader, Mr. Jean Lapierre. He agreed to meet with writer Gratien Gélinas for a few minutes. The Prime Minister was stuck then, what can I tell you? Gratien Gélinas is a true historical monument in Quebec, a "holy monster", as they say in the business; yes, it's true, a national monument. So it was pretty difficult for Mr. Mulroney, who saw him in the gallery, to tell him he couldn't receive him for two minutes. The thing is he refused to receive the delegation as such, but faced with the personage of Gratien Gélinas he decided to take a few minutes. He was caught in an awkward position.

But Mr. Mulroney's reply was the same: the 7% federal tax will apply to books as planned. That nevertheless contradicted the promise he made to Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, which Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland reported to us. She explained, almost in tears, that she was torn by this bill. I understand her, obviously, because I can imagine the number of people who must have telephoned her from the writers' community, from the publishing community and her publisher, her publishers, and the book stores she regularly goes to. I can tell you that she admitted she was shaken by everything she had been told about the potential threat to the book publishing industry.

She said, however, that the Prime Minister had made a promise: he said he would change, that he would transform . . . I don't remember how it was qualified. What I don't understand is that the Prime Minister did not seem to remember that promise when he met with Mr. Gélinas. He told him, no, the tax would apply to books as planned. No mention of the promise to Mrs. Solange Chaput-Rolland, no brief hesitation such as the one he had before the students in Burnaby when the students told him it was incredible that he was taxing the Bible. Then he said, yes, we're taxing the Bible. He didn't know because he was not aware of that particular aspect. In any case, the secondary students reminded him that the Bible, among other books, was to be taxed. People sensed there that he back-pedalled slightly. He said: I didn't know, I'm going to look into that and examine the matter. Then he said: No, we can't soften our stance; we'll tax the Bible like all goods and services, and tax books like all goods and services. He was just as categorical with Mr. Gélinas.

The debate on imposing the tax on books quickly took a constitutional turn. Obviously, by frustrating Quebeckers even further, Mr. Mulroney will ultimately push them to the limit, with the results that we can all imagine.

"If Canada is to continue to exist, it must one day accommodate the particular characteristics of the Francophone world. Otherwise, we will have to shoulder our own responsibilities and take our own decisions in these areas," said Mr. Caza.

He's a book store owner.

For Gratien Gélinas: "The struggle for Quebec to retain its rights has gone on for as long as Canada has existed. And at a time when Quebec is considering its own future, it is very important that Quebec not be held back in a sector as delicate as culture."

In other words, Quebec's writers, publishers, readers and librarians feel the federal government is directly stifling their culture, their most valuable asset. And I think that it was poor timing indeed on the government's behalf to give such a categorical no to people who are all slightly tempted by the pervasive separatism stirred up, as we know, by Meech Lake and the sorcerer's apprentices in government.

Marcel Masse answered that Ottawa is aware of the Quebec reality in the publishing world.

He repeated that sentiment which was apparent in his 1986 speech.

He cited the federal publishing program, which allocates 40% of its grants—he's always coming back to the money he gives out —to Francophone publishers and a new program that will go into effect in April and will be managed by the Federal Development Bank, which will set aside 30% of its budget for the Francophone sector.

He's trying, he's taking all possible steps, but he still says no to the main question put to him. He doesn't want to hear about exempting books from the GST because he has clearly received his marching orders. It's the same as for Meech Lake; the affair is quite similar by the way. The seamless web: you can't change it, you can't change a thing. You change a comma and the whole thing falls apart.

Incidentally, the Coalition rejected the argument that Ottawa cannot amend the sales tax without endangering the bill's timely passage by the Senate.

But what kind of argument is that? It seems to me that a reasonable amendment such as the amendment concerning books would easily have passed through the House of Commons, without any shadow of a doubt. It would have had the time to go through the House and return here. But they don't want it and are simply offering pretexts. Furthermore, the government could have used the Quebec method; it seems to me that's what they were told here.

"It is possible to introduce a consumer tax credit to offset the effect of the tax on books without amending the bill. That's what Quebec has done," Mr. Caza said.

We are not obliged to delay the legislative process; the government could have done something, as in Quebec. But they clearly do not want to!

> Despite Ottawa's refusal to meet its request, the Coalition felt its trip was not in vain. "Mr. Mulroney indicated to us that his main concern was to pass the bill in the Senate and that he could subsequently review it."

That's a promise I wouldn't trust. I don't know if they are going to trust it. I'll come back to that later. Give me a blank cheque and we'll consider the matter later.

> "He promised nothing, but we feel his remarks were not unambiguous. We're going to keep up the pressure," said the President of the French-language Distributors Assocation, Mr. Gérard Lefebvre.

Yes, they had better keep up the pressure because they are not dealing with people who feel like yielding on this issue.

Since the GST debate began in the Senate, I have, as I have often said, received hundreds of telephone calls and letters from citizens enjoining me to fight with all my strength, and all the other Liberal senators as well, against the implementation of the goods and services tax, and that's not counting the tens of thousands of petitions that so annoyed Senator Simard and the other senators on the other side, the petitions and other documents that I received and which I continue to receive.

I need not tell you that I have also received many reports and briefs from various cultural organizations expressing their views on the issue of the GST and books. All these people have asked me to make their voices heard. I can't read all these documents; I have too many of them. I have piles of them in front of me and others in my office. It would take several days to read them all, but I should at least read a few of the more important excerpts.

There was one, in particular, that I wanted at least to quote for you—it is very brief—that of Mrs. Carole Levert, who is President of the Publishers Association, and of Mr, Raymond Vézina, President of the Quebec Schoolbook Publishers Society. It's very short, but entirely to the point. These two authors write:

> Publishing is a high risk business: it entails high production costs that must be recovered from modest printings. The more complex the production (school books, illustrated children's stories, general and special interest literature requiring illustrations, such as books on history, geography, architecture, "coffee table" books, books on visual arts and so on), the higher the production costs and the harder it is for national producers to offer consumers high quality books at competitive prices.
> Unfortunately, Quebec consumers cannot benefit from the economies of a scale enjoyed by most foreign producers, which operate in countries where the cultural industry is strong enough to be self-sufficient.

In short, the right size population is needed for publishing to be profitable. In France, publishing is not a problem; publishing is not subsidized and can support a modest GST, which is not high, and which is in fact lower on books than on other items. But the industry can survive because there is a large population: France and the entire international Francophone community which French publishers of course can tap into.

> However, domestic books are those that speak of our reality and enable us to expand it.
> The child who grows up reading Émilie or Mafalda will expect to go mountain climbing in the Alps, to go to school on Saturdays and to eat croissants for breakfast.
>
> The example is exaggerated, of course, but nevertheless real and palpable. Successful Quebec books in the field of children's literature are extremely recent. And for them to succeed, original production solutions had to be invented for the problem of manufacturing costs.
> The GST will increase the price of books and limit the number of potential purchasers . . .

That's the key to this issue, which the government does not seem to understand. The tax will limit the number of potential purchasers because book price increases will have a direct effect on sales, on purchases, if you wish.

> . . . And let us not simply put our heads in the sand: foreign firms will continue to take the lion's share of this market (domestic output in Quebec currently represents approximately 30% of general consumption, whereas it scarcely constituted 20% 10 years ago) because the GST will affect them very little since they already enjoy economies of scale so great that, for them, we represent only a secondary market.

If a French publisher produces a 50,000-copy printing of a book, let us say in a large printing, it knows it will be able to sell 40,000 copies in France, 6,000 in the rest of the Francophone world and that 4,000 will be sold in Quebec. The cost price of the 4,000 copies that arrive in Quebec is obviously infinitely less than that of the 4,000 copies which a Canadian publisher will produce in the first printing of a work. And even at that, 4,000 copies is a risky proposition. First novels of Canadian writers are often published in printings of 3,000 or 2,000 copies.

> The proof is that dumping is on the increase and cut-rate book stores are proliferating. The Quebec market is the ideal market for unsold books and for surplus printings which always follow peak sales.

You see a lot of these books stores in Montreal. I know of several of them that sell books at a discount and that in fact dump French books, books unsold by French publishers and which are of course sold dirt cheap, and compete very strongly in the Canadian book market.

> Those who stand to lose the most under the GST are consumers and domestic producers, that is to say the weakest, because it is they who have the least resources.

It is obviously readers who stand to lose the most. The GST isn't going to trouble Hachette or Flammarion or the other major French publishers all that much. Nor should you believe that Quebec books are widely exported.

> The export market for French-language Canadian books is in its infancy.

I have already told you about our misadventures with Hachette in I don't know what year, when they deigned to take a certain number of our books and returned some of them to us four years later without even opening the cases. The books were certainly not bad because they were books of poetry from France. They had been selected by Gaston Miron himself from the best volumes of poetry. I remember that like it was only yesterday.

> The export market for French-language Canadian books is in its infancy.

It has been in its infancy for 30 years now.

> Although there exists no statistics in this area, publishers' efforts to export to international Francophone markets clearly represent only a fraction of the percentage of the industry's revenues.
> In foreign markets, Quebec books face very well organized competitors with more than 100 years of experience in the field. This gives them an enormous advantage. The true challenge in exports will arise in the coming decade, and publishers are working hard to meet it.
> Increasing risk in the Quebec publishing industry will lead to tougher production choices. Houses will choose surer products, potential best-sellers.

That's how publishers are going to react. They will publish less and will choose their products, the manuscripts that are the surest thing. They won't always be the best, I should note in passing. But the risky propositions will be left alone. That's what will happen.

> Stop publishing new or as yet unknown authors. Stop, or at the very least, appreciably decrease the output of more specialized books with limited target markets
> (humanities, essays, specialized topics, science) . . .

Books with limited printings will be abandoned. Publishers will continue to produce good books, novels by Beauchemin and books that sell well by known authors. It's the new books that will be hit, new books by new authors. But these are the major authors of tomorrow.

> Stop all attempts to fight the competition in certain basic sectors . . . Most Francophone university students in administration, science and many other fields currently study using books written in English.

So you see, in administration . . . I said that that was the case of the Hautes études commerciales in the 1940s. Students there had to study accounting from American textbooks. I thought that had changed, but, no, it's still the case.

> . . . because translating and producing them in French would be unthinkable.

It would cost too much. And with the GST it will become completely unthinkable.

It will be even more expensive and so will be put off indefinitely.

> Preserving and improving the quality of the French language spoken and written in Canada is already a sizeable challenge. And the most invaluable tool to the development and maintenance of that linguistic quality is the book.

We have problems with the French language in Quebec; we don't speak it as well as we should, and that may be explained by all types of factors, historical, first, but also because we are a small linguistic group surrounded by Anglophones and are subject to the cultural influence, not so much of English-Canadians, but of the Americans, as well as the English-Canadians, through television, magazines, paperback books and in other ways.

So obviously, by reducing the distribution, sale and publication of French-language books in Quebec, one also undermines the quality of the language spoken by Quebeckers.

> If taxing books and reading in Canada is catastrophic, taxing French books will be truly dramatic. If access to French-Canadian books is governed by discrimination, it is our French-language reality, the quality of our language, which will be the object of that discrimination, and no books imported from France or other Francophone countries will do justice to the French language spoken in Quebec by the people of Quebec.
> The first amendment presented by the Liberal senators was not a chance affair. I certainly hope not; it was deliberate. It was the amendment that called for a GST exemption not only for books, but also, you remember, for periodicals and newspapers.

I focused my efforts on the mortal danger that a tax such as the GST on books represents because this is a more familiar field to me than others since I worked in it for 15 years. However, I would not want to give you the impression that I more readily agree to a GST on periodicals and newspapers.

I would like to advance some of the arguments submitted by the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association. In this case, I have chosen the arguments from the Anglophone rather than the Quebec side because, in the case of magazines, one can say there is considerable similarity between the problems of both sides.

[English]

This submission was prepared by the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association, representing the Canadian-owned consumer magazine industry. They go on to say:

> Members of the CMPA publish over 290 magazines in Canada, ranging from the smallest to the largest consumer magazines.

● (0220)

[Translation]

So I do not know how many of these 290 Canadian magazines will be left after a few years of the GST.

[English]

> Canadian magazine publishers face a threat to their very existence if the proposed goods and services tax (GST) were to be made applicable to periodicals.
>
> Our analysis of the impact of the proposed GST on the Canadian periodicals industry demonstrates the necessity of zero-rating for magazines if our publications are to survive in the future.

[Translation]

It is a question of survival for both books and magazines, and for both English and French periodicals.

[English]

We have developed models of the effect of the tax on representative samples of publications, using assumptions that have been reviewed and accepted by representatives of the industry. The results are devastating. Without zero-rating, the industry as we know it will not survive.

[Translation]

Those are terms which are certainly as strong as any we have heard from Quebec. It is always said that Quebecers have a tendency to exaggerate among themselves, because of their Latin blood and so forth. The people who wrote that didn't have Latin blood, they were from Toronto.

[English]

The imposition of the GST on periodicals would reverse a public policy stance that the Canadian Government has held since Confederation. It has been federal policy to encourage the interchange of ideas and the development and spread of a unique Canadian cultural identity. Magazines are a vital medium in the definition and dissemination of the essence of what makes Canada. Their importance and need for public policy support has been recognized time and again by royal commissions and special studies. The federal government has recognized this in the past, providing postal subsidies,—

That they want to take away.

—that protects the industry from unfair competition from foreign publications and exemptions from tax.

[Translation]

Since Confederation, not one cent on sale or production.

[English]

The Canadian magazine industry has had to face two other economic problems in the same time period that the GST has been under consideration. First, it has to grapple with the potentially severe implications of significant reductions in the postal subsidy.

[Translation]

Of course, that's all to the good, taken as a whole.

[English]

Second, it is a simple fact that a number of magazines have had to absorb significant reductions in revenue because of the ban on tobacco advertising, whatever benefits may accrue to others.

[Translation]

Well, we won't shed any tears over that, but it's a fact.

[English]

As a result the industry is already in a perilous condition. The environment, previously designed to be so carefully benign for periodicals, has turned hostile.

[Senator Hébert.]

Requiring magazines to bear the full burden of the GST will expose them to competition from foreign publications who will largely escape the tax, force the closure of many currently viable businesses and signal Parliament's willingness to turn its back on an essential part of the country's cultural activity. It would be a uniquely perverse public policy decision: to harm an important domestic industry and simultaneously give a significant advantage to its foreign competitors.

[Translation]

It is unbelievable to think that the government is doing that with books and periodicals. But is it possible, when they sleep at night, do they sleep peacefully? When they look at themselves in the mirror in the morning, aren't they a little embarassed by the decisions they made that are going to be so devastating for something so important? I thank God every day that I am on this side.

[English]

The Canadian Magazine Publishers Association, formerly the Canadian Periodical Publishers' Association, is Canada's national association of consumer magazine publishers. CMPA members publish more than 290 magazines. They vary in size from Maclean's, with an annual circulation of almost 35 million, over 600,000 copies weekly, to Dandelion, with an annual circulation of 1,400 copies, 700 copies twice each year.

[Translation]

I think that we can say good-bye to Dandelion. With the GST, it's 'bye, 'bye, Dandelion.

[English]

Senator Cools: What was that?

Senator Hébert: Dandelion. It is a magazine that publishes 700 copies twice each year. I do not know what it is about, but I was just saying that it will be destroyed by the GST because, being that type of circulation, it cannot survive. The submission goes on:

This submission is divided into three parts. The first focuses on the general reason why magazines, along with other published works should not be taxed on cultural/literacy grounds.

In the second part, we represent the results of a detailed analysis of the economic impact of the imposition of the GST on the operations of a representative sample of Canadian consumer magazines. Details of the assumptions underlying the analysis are provided in a separate annex to this submission.

I will provide this information to Senator Cogger, but only if he asks for it. The submission goes on:

In the third part, we focus on a particular problem for Canadian magazines: the administrative obstacles inherent in attempting to achieve a level playing field with U.S. periodicals that are circulated in Canada by mail.

By the way, they tell us that the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association fully supports the brief submitted to the standing committee by the Don't Tax Reading Coalition.

[Translation]

. . . which is the conterpart to the group which came to see us with Gratien Gélinas and the others, but it is the English counterpart.

> While we do not propose to restate the coalition's arguments in detail, the following are the main points they raise.
> The application of the GST would raise the cost of reading and limit the communication of knowledge.

Senator Lucier: Senator Hébert, I wonder if I might ask you a short question. I suppose the effect of the 7 per cent GST on reading material will be somewhat the same as it is on many other items. I have just read recently where the Toronto Sun, which is not one of my favourite papers, is looking to raising the price to fifty cents. I think they said there was not much point in raising the price by ten cents or whatever, but because of the GST they have decided they might as well raise the price to fifty cents. I can't imagine publishers of books or periodicals adding just 7 per cent to reading material. The increase will be 25 per cent or some other figure.

● (0230)

Senator Hébert: You are absolutely right. They will not sell a magazine for $1.07; they will sell it for $1.25 or something like that.

Senator Grafstein: Excuse me Senator Hébert, the question of cost-push is of vital importance. I have just had an opportunity to read a response to a question that I asked the government on November 13, which I think is relevant. I asked about wage settlements and government policy, and I said it appeared that the motivating influence of the Bank of Canada's policy with respect to high interest rates was inflation. I then asked the Leader of the Government to give us an indication, based on recent statistics, as to whether or not there had been a softening of wage settlements that could lead Canadians to believe interest rates would be, in the short term, subject to a reduction.

The full response I got was quite interesting and instructive. It relates to the economic conditions of the business of cultural products. It doesn't matter if we are talking about music or books or whatever. With respect to the question of consumption, because I never quite understood it the first time around, after a period of absence I am re-reading a very interesting book that was written on December 13, 1935, a book that is relevant to both the GST and the question of the government's answer.

The book is entitled, The General Theory of Employment, Interest, and Money, and was written by John Maynard Keynes. What Keynes in effect said is that the key to employment and real wages is the propensity of the public to consume. The economic laws he attached to the propensity to consume was a key element in driving the economy in a proper fashion. I will get back to that in a moment because I want to deal with the government's answer to my question of November 13. The government responded to my question, as follows:

> I know that the government's concern with inflationary pressures—and our monetary response—has been a source of controversy and criticism.

This is, I assume, the Minister of Finance, responding to my question. He then goes on to say,

> However, throughout our mandate, the long-term anchor of our monetary policy has been, and remains, price stability.

You have just talked about price instability, and if in fact the Toronto Sun is increasing its price from 35 cents to 50 cents it triggers price instability, and clearly that is beyond the rate of inflation. So the test is keeping wage settlements below the rate of inflation and at the same time not propelling price instability.

Then he goes on to say:

> As the Governor of the Bank of Canada recently stated, "what we are seeing are gradual but progressive reductions in inflation that will ensure there is no doubt about the commitment of monetary policy to contribute price stability to Canada's economic well-being".

Maynard Keynes, Michael Wilson and, hopefully, the newspaper business. We have got a concern there. They obviously have a concern there. They have to deal with this tax. But let's go on.

> To this end, this government set out and has followed a clear path of responsible fiscal and economic policies aimed at achieving a better balance between demand and the economy's capacity, with fewer inflationary pressures. This will set the stage for reduced interest rates and a return to a balanced sustained expansion.

Coming back to Mr. Masse's point, one of the problems in the book publishing business is high interest rates and failure to get access to capital. So lower interest rates, more available capital, and better allocation of capital investment stimulates the economy, stimulates cultural products, produces jobs and makes everybody smile. But we do not see this here; we see price instability.

The government's answer to my question goes on:

> The recent weakness in the economy has resulted in the easing in monetary conditions that we have seen lately. The bank rate has fallen—

This is good news.

> —180 basis points from its peak in May.

Now, this answer is being given in November.

> Continued easing in underlying price and cost pressures will create scope for further declines in interest rates.

Argument: if you can reduce the price, reduce the cost pressures, the interest rates come down. But the Toronto Sun, a good sometimes conservative paper, is going the other way, not on its own behest but obviously propelled by the GST. But Mr. Wilson, or government spokesman goes on.

However—

And this is a danger point.

> —recent data show no sign of an easing in wage settlement rates. Indeed, quite the opposite has occurred: Negotiated wage increases have risen from less than 5 per cent early in 1989 to about 6 1/2 per cent in the third quarter of this year.

Referring to the third quarter of 1990.

> This has occured in both the private and public sectors.

Bad news!

> The federal government, though, has set a good example of restraint in its wage negotiations. Indeed, we have held the average settlement rates below that of the private sector for each of the last three years.

Good job! Economic experts opposite have said, "Look at what a great job we have done. We have kept wages below the rate of inflation." They patted themselves on the back. I agree, good job; no quarrel there. Then there is a little caveat;

> Except for a few higher settlements imposed by arbitration in recent months, federal settlement rates have been held to less than the rate of inflation in the past two years.

Very, very, good news. So, again, except where wage settlements that were beyond the control of the government through arbitrations, they kept them below the rate of inflation—price stability, wage stability, excellent!

• (0240)

The government goes on to state:

> However, of considerable concern is the recent acceleration in non-federal wage settlements. These high settlements reflect strong underlying inflation pressures which, if they persist, will push the inflation rate higher.

I am coming to the end here, and I think it is important that you respond to this, Senator Hébert.

> It is critical that all participants—

This is the government speaking.

> —in our economy recognize that the government's scope to alter monetary conditions depends directly on the continued reduction of inflationary pressures.

So the government is not excluding itself when it admonishes us and the private sector and the public sector to recognize that inflationary pressures must be reduced. No argument with that, Senator Hébert. Do you have any argument with that?

Senator Hébert: No.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Hébert has no argument with that. Then the government goes on to state:

> If not dealt with, these pressures threaten to become entrenched in the economy—

I repeat, "entrenched in the economy".

> —making their elimination that much more difficult and costly later on.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Now for the summation of this wonderful little tract, consistent with, I believe, John Maynard Keynes. This is what the government states:

> Let it be clear: this government is not prepared to validate uneconomic wage settlements by either loose monetary or fiscal policies. The much slower pace of growth that is emerging in 1990 is necessary to wring inflation pressures out of the Canadian economy. It is also creating the conditions for permanently lower interest rates and balanced, sustained growth. The sooner the inflation pressures ease, the smoother will be the transition period.

Senator Hébert, I detect in your speech that, rather than price stability triggered by the GST, we have price instability; rather than deflationary trends, we have an inflationary trend; rather than triggering greater consumption, we have a government policy which will be a disincentive to consumption. As prices go up, consumption goes down, particularly in the cultural products area.

I am not, nor do I pretend to be, an economic expert. All I am trying to do is to listen as carefully as I can to the economic experts on the other side. Then I listen to you on this vital sector of culture, where we are trying to suggest, as the minister has so brilliantly outlined in some of his speeches, a stable environment for the cultural products industry to flourish. Then, somehow from left field we have instability, inflationary pressures and an unstable context, triggering, if you will, the other killer, high interest rates.

So we have the Toronto Sun falling into the trap. The only way it can keep itself out and, I assume, generate positive cash flow is to increase its prices, not just equal to the rate of inflation but beyond. If we take the 35 cents and move it to 50 cents, that is 15 cents over 35 cents. What percentage is that? It is 50 per cent.

Here the government is arguing that 6.5 per cent is keeping interest rates higher.

Can you, Senator Hébert, clarify for me what appears to be inconsistency, at its highest level or a negligent disregard for good economic principles? By the way, I am not suggesting in any way, shape or form that I am properly laying out the principles of the government, because I find them difficult to follow. All I am trying to do is read the answer.

By the way, honourable senators, I asked one other little question, which has not been answered by the government. It was related to what I understood was the source of, the root of, the basis of, the foundation of the architectonic of this principle, which is that we have to remove the MST. Did it not all start by saying that we had to set up a tax structure that was going to be fair and equitable so that we could absorb the manufacturers' sales tax and redistribute that tax on a neutral basis over the entire base?

I asked this question, and the government has responded with silence. It is a simple question, not difficult. I asked this:

> After consulting with the government economists, could you provide the Senate with an indication of what reduction in interest rates would be necessary to be equal to the revenues accruing to the government by the MST?

I thought it was a fair question. If we have, as we have been told over and over and over again, this hellish burden of debt accumulated because of compound interest rates, because of a little debt that was started back in 1984 and grew and grew and grew, without any explanation of the government's fiscal or monetary or interest rate policies since that time, then, with all due respect, Senator Hébert, you must certainly bear some responsibility because you are and were a friend of the former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau. So you have to somehow bear responsibility for the friends you keep.

The question I have is this: Is it possible that, if you took one or two points from the interest rate on the accumulated debt of the country, you might be able to absorb and dissipate the MST? What does it need? What is necessary? If that were to remove itself, we would not be here today, would we?

Tell me if there is some flaw in this argument and tell me how this applies, Senator Hébert, to the consumption of cultural products which we have been told by Mr. Masse is a benefit to all of Canada.

Senator Hébert: That is a very interesting question.

Senator Cools: It is such a good question that perhaps you could answer it yourself.

Senator Grafstein: I don't have the expert's answer to that, but we do have the advice of a number of economists, and I haven't had anybody tell me it is not correct. This is what John Maynard Keynes has said—and we have been told by Mr. Crow that he is a Keynesian: Passing a GST which implodes inflation at a time of recession is not exactly good economic policy. It does not seem to be logical. Keynes said that the test of good economic policy is counter-cyclical measures.

That is not a complete answer to the senators who have raised this issue. It would be interesting to hear from the other side. I await the other side's economic expertise on this question. We have been told over and over again that we, as Liberals, have been ruinous when it comes to economic philosophy and theory. I would like an opportunity for senators opposite to give us their version.

Senator Hébert: Unfortunately, Senator Simard is not with us.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Simard has not the economic experience to justify this tax.

• (0250)

Senator Hébert: I am not an expert either.

Senator Grafstein: I am interested in your view as to the price of the Toronto Star going from 35 cents to 50 cents. Will the basis for that increase apply to other publications?

Senator Hébert: I will come to that in a moment. I was talking about the submission from the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association. I will repeat two lines because they provide us with a complete picture.

> The application of the GST would raise the cost of reading and limit the communication of knowledge.

That is clear, serious and important for society.

> Besides providing certain financial support to publishers and authors, Canada has historically chosen not to tax their products.

That tradition of ours was established even before Confederation. We never touched books, periodicals and newspapers.

The submission continues:

> There is widespread public support for continuation of this exemption.

Everyone in the country agrees with this.

> Since reading materials are discretionary expenditures previously exempt from tax, the GST would substantially reduce the amount of such material purchased by Canadians. The impact will be most severe for small, or literary, or regionally based companies.
>
> The application of the tax to reading material will fail to achieve the stated objectives of "fairness, simplicity, and compliance . . ."

That is all Wilson's stuff.

> . . . balance and stability," "international competitiveness," and "economic growth".

Mr. Wilson promised that the GST would bring all those things to us.

The submission says that the Canadian Magazine Publishers Association subscribes to these views, and urges that, as a matter of principle, the tax should not apply to reading materials.

The submission continues:

> We also stress the unique contribution that magazines make to Canadian culture. Our publications are a major source of support for writers and illustrators. Indeed, many of the nation's best-known writers were first published and polished their talents in Canadian periodicals. A full 93 per cent of the writing and illustrations in our magazines are created by Canadians. We are a major outlet for creative talent. To jeopardize this industry would deal a severe blow to Canadian culture.
>
> Economic Impact of the GST on Canadian Magazines:
>
> In this part we present the results of a detailed analysis of the impact of the imposition of the goods and services tax on the operations of Canadian magazines. In order to have a clear understanding of the actual financial impact the tax would have, we chose a representative sample of five Canadian periodicals. A study of these magazines was commissioned to determine what the effect of the tax would be.
>
> The study was carried out with the assistance of: Lighthouse Communications (Canada) Incorporated, a consulting firm specializing in the economics of magazine publishing; Clarkson Gordon, one of Canada's best-known audit and management consulting firms; and McCarthy > of McCarthy, Canada's largest law firm, with particular expertise in the application of tax and trade laws to the cultural industries.

We must admit that they have chosen important companies. Then they chose five publications: Canadian Art, an example of a special interest publication supported in part by grants; Canadian Business, one of Canada's best-known general interest business magazines; Coup de Pouce, a large circulation advertiser-driven, French language women's magazine; Eastern Woods and Waters, a regionally based special interest magazine; Owl Magazine, Canada's largest circulation children's magazine, with negligible advertising revenue. It is an interesting sample.

The submission says:

> A detailed description of the assumption used in the analysis is provided in Annex A.

I will provide that to Senator Cogger the moment he asks for it!

> The analysis shows that the overall impact of the GST on the magazine industry will be devastating.

"Devastating" is the word that is always used.

> The overall profitability of U.S. magazines, 12.44 per cent profit as a percentage of revenue, is already far higher than the comparable overall figure for Canadian magazines, 2 to 4 per cent profit as a percentage of revenue.

That is quite a difference.

> In the particular cases examined, however, the existing profit dramatically declines with the introduction of the GST.

I will read the actual results for each of the five publications. Canadian Art is now minus 5.65 per cent, which means they need grants. With the GST it will be minus 12.07 per cent, a difference of minus 6.40 per cent. Canadian Business is making a small profit of 6.59 per cent of revenue. With GST it falls to 0.07 per cent, a difference of 6.52 per cent. Coup de Pouce, which is a French magazine for women, is 7.66 per cent profit of revenue. With the GST it will decrease to 1.10 per cent, which means a loss or difference of 6.56 per cent. Eastern Woods and Waters had a tiny profit, 0.20 per cent profit as a percentage of revenue, but with the GST it will fall to below minus 3.16 per cent. Owl Magazine is making a small profit of 2.09 per cent of revenue. It is a beautiful magazine for children. With the GST its profit will fall to minus 1.36 per cent.

The submission continues:

> There are a number of reasons why the particular circumstances under which magazines operate in Canada will result in these dramatic effects. One of the most important factors to bear in mind is that consumer magazine subscription sales are notoriously price-sensitive.

I don't know if those on the other side have ever heard that word.

[Senator Hébert.]

> Repeated testing by one large publication shows a 16 per cent drop in sales for a 7 per cent increase in price. According to a 1986 study by Coopers & Lybrand, the industry can expect up to a 3.7 per cent drop in subscriptions from a 1 per cent increase in price.

Just imagine, a 7 per cent increase!

> In addition, most magazines are currently priced just below an important price barrier that each has found by testing and experience. In most cases, therefore, to increase prices beyond this barrier to include the tax would result in a disproportionately greater decrease in subscription sales.
>
> This is just one of many factors that needs to be taken into account. All of the assumptions that must be modelled are set forth in Annex A.

Again, I will provide this to Senator Cogger after this speech!

• (0300)

[English]

> What is the result of this analysis?
> First, magazines with "healthy" profits (up to 7%), that are advertising-driven, and have a paid circulation, experience an average decline in profitability of 6.5%, pushing them into a slight loss position or, at best, break-even.

Is that what we want for our Canadian magazines? To be in a loss position or just to break even?

> Second, magazines with marginal profitability experience an average 3.4% drop to show significant losses. Even the example of a grant-funded magazine. (which should benefit under GST since grant funding is to be tax-exempt) experiences a serious negative effect to its overall operation.

We have seen that Canadian Art which receives the grants but which is now in the red, will make a loss of 12 per cent of revenue.

> Third, while the very few Canadian publishers with a significant portion of foreign sales (either circulation or advertising) benefit somewhat from GST zero-rating on these sales, their Canadian sales deteriorate to the extent that the net effect on their overall operation is still negative.
> In summary, therefore, the impact of the imposition of the GST on Canadian magazines would be devastating.

I will not deal with the unfair advantage to U.S. periodicals under the GST system—that would please Mr. Bush.

> It is the Finance Minister's stated intent to ensure that the tax will increase the international competitiveness of Canadian business.

That is what Mr. Wilson said.

> The GST may have this effect for some domestic manufacturing companies. It will have quite the opposite effect for Canadian magazine publishers.

The reason for this is that the GST can be readily collected from Canadian publishers, but involves considerable administrative difficulties when the GST is sought to be collected from U.S. publishers distributing their periodicals by mail in Canada.

These administrative difficulties put in question not only the workability of the system, but more importantly, whether a level playing field could exist for Canadian periodicals.

To understand this problem, which is unique to periodicals, the Committee must understand the system by which foreign publications reach Canadian hands. A large number of foreign periodicals—estimated between 5 and 10 million copies per year—are simply mailed to Canadian homes, using the U.S. and Canadian postal services.

It would be easy to collect the GST on that.

At present, these magazines are not stopped at customs, but are permitted to be delivered directly to the home by the postal service, by virtue of the Postal Import Remission Order.

That Order exempts imported goods from the requirement to pay customs duties, sales and excise taxes if the goods are imported by mail and if either (a) the value for duty does not exceed $40, or (b) the aggregate of the customs duties, sales and excise taxes paid or payable does not exceed $5.

Magazines and newspapers qualified under item (a), so that even if duties or taxes were applicable (which they are not at present) mailed subscription copies would not be stopped at the border.

When goods exceed the $40 limit, the practice of the Post Office is to mail a postcard to the addressee to notify that the goods have been received and to request the recipient to attend at the Post Office within a prescribed time period to pay the duties and/or taxes and claim the goods.

The GST Technical Paper—

And this is from the mouth of Mr. Wilson—

—states at page 71:

These orders [the remission orders referred to above] will be amended upon introduction of the GST to exclude books and periodicals in order to allow for the application of GST to imported book and periodical subscriptions. This will ensure that imports are placed on an equal GST footing with domestic books and periodicals.

Foreign publishers will account for the GST on their subscription sales in Canada.

That is the comforting words of Mr. Wilson.

Now, the facts:

If the remission order is amended as indicated, an administrative nightmare would immediately be created. Starting on January 1, 1991, millions of individually addressed U.S. magazines would begin arriving at Canada Post and would have to be dealt with. If the government were serious about collecting the GST, it would literally have to require Canada Post to stop the magazines at that point. According to the present procedure, it would then forward a postcard to each of the millions of Canadian addressees.

Senator LeBlanc: Then they could talk to their mailboxes.

Senator Austin: I wonder, is that postage paid or postage due?

Senator Hébert:

The postcard would notify the subscriber that the magazine had been received and would seek the subscriber's attendance in order to pay the GST for that copy so that it could be released.

Millions and millions of copies, honourable senators.

Hon Roméo LeBlanc: Would Senator Hebert allow a question? I am very much interested in this matter. Imagine living in Cocagne, where I live, 30 kilometres from Moncton. The only thing I can talk to at the end of my driveway is a series of cubicles with locks of different descriptions. I can not go there and claim my magazine. I am just talking to a pile of boxes. So I say to myself, "In that event, I will go to the major post office," which is in Shediac. I get there, and there I get someone to talk to, but that is not the customs office. The customs office is in Moncton. So I imagine that, in order for me to get Time magazine, I have to drive to Moncton.

Of course, the office hours of Canada Customs are fairly restricted. They are not open on Saturdays. I hope that the government, in fact, stops these magazines at the border, because it will prove the point that we have been trying to make here, which is that this tax has not been thought through very carefully.

Would Senator Hebert like to describe the procedure he would have to follow, if he is living in St. Hubert or Beloeil in the province of Quebec, in order to receive a magazine from France? How will they charge GST on that?

Senator Hebert: According to what I understand of the system, I am living in Montreal right now and I will receive a post card—not the magazine but a post card—that will tell me to go to a little post office in some drugstore located about six blocks from my home. So I would have to go there to this little post office, bookstore or drugstore. Sometimes you arrive there and the lady has gone for lunch and has put up a little card, telling you to come back an hour later with your card to get your Time magazine. That is the way it could be.

The postcard would notify the subscriber that the magazine had been received and would seek the subscriber's attendance in order to pay the GST for that copy so that it could be released.

● (0310)

It is incredible.

Senator Lucier: You pay the GST to the post office?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

The GST might range anywhere from five cents to fifteen cents per copy depending on the subscription rate. In other words, the cost of preparing and forwarding the postcard would vastly exceed the amount of the tax.

They will do it; they like that type of thing.

Needless to say, if this was actually carried out, there would be huge protests from at least two major groups of complainants. First, the Canadian subscribers would protest the whole procedure as being excessive and uneconomic. Why should they be forced to attend at customs, they will argue, to retrieve their copies of a U.S. magazine?

Secondly, foreign publishers will undoubtedly complain that such a procedure or even the threat of its imposition would be an unfair non-tariff barrier contrary to Canada's GATT obligations. They would also argue that no tax should be payable anyway, because all of the copies are pre-paid subscriptions.

This last point deserves underlining, because it contributes to the difficulty in assessing the level of the GST for magazines. The GST technical paper sets up special rules for "prepaid supplies," so that the GST can be collected in regard to payments made before December 31, 1990, for goods or services supplied after that date. At page 156, however, the paper specifically stipulates that the rule "will not apply in the case of prepaid newspaper and periodical subscriptions."

Thus, for a period of up to three years, foreign publishers will be able to argue that virtually all their mailed-in copies were prepaid subscriptions upon which no GST should be levied.

As a practical matter, how can the government or the Post Office determine which import copies are prepaid and which are not?

That is a tricky thing. They will ask Mr. Wilson, I suppose.

It is hard enough to audit this matter when the publisher is located in Canada. It is impossible to tell in the case of a foreign publisher mailing from the United States.

Absolutely impossible.

So how would the government collect the tax? It is unlikely that U.S. publishers will collect tax from Canadian subscribers. Typically, they do not even collect sales taxes for states outside the one in which they publish. Unless they cannot avoid it, they will not, as the government seems to expect, meekly submit tax to Ottawa. The only person from whom a payment can be compelled is the individual subscriber, using the system described above. But even the threat of adopting that system would raise administrative nightmares and the prospect of horrendous costs for the Post Office (asked to be self-sufficient) or for Revenue Canada (asked to help reduce the federal deficit.)

If for this reason the Post Office decides not to hold up any magazines at the border but to forward them routinely to their recipients, where is the leverage to compel any payments from foreign publishers?

In the end, it becomes clear that the government will have no effective way to compel foreign publishers to make GST payments. The only way to compel such cooperation would be to introduce an enormously intrusive, uneconomic and unpoliceable administrative system that would create more problems than it would resolve.

Honourable senators, they will be tempted, and perhaps will choose that way if it creates more problems than it resolves.

Senator Lucier: They would be consistent if they chose that.

Senator Hébert: Yes, they would be tempted to choose that way.

Where does that leave Canadian magazine publishers? All of them will be required to collect the 9% GST—or the 7 per cent now.

—on their subscription copies. Unfortunately their U.S. competitors will escape without any effective payment whatever in regard to subscription copies mailed from the United States.

The result? U.S. publications will have a new 7% advantage over their Canadian competitors on top of the economies of scale that they presently enjoy.

When copies of Time magazine arrive here, they are just left over from their first printing.

This unfair advantage is bound to have an adverse effect on Canadian magazine publishers and makes our 4.5% estimate of subscription loss even more optimistic.

There is no level playing field here, and no equity in the operation of the tax.

The effect of the tax on our magazines' advertising sales will also be harmful. American advertisers will make increasing use of U.S. periodicals with Canadian spillover in preference to their Canadian competitors. Similarly, there will be an inducement for Canadian corporations to use U.S. media in preference to Canadian magazines. To compensate, domestic publishers will have to reduce rates—to bear the burden of the tax themselves. Such action may overcome the cost-competitiveness disadvantage, but puts them in a much less satisfactory financial position. Again, the playing field is tilted.

It is ironic that in only the least rewarding of the major areas of revenue— that of newsstand sales which typically account for only 15% of Canadian magazine circulation and less than 10% of total revenues— our publications will compete on an equal basis with foreign competitors. For the rest, the areas where it really counts, the GST will be the single most unfair measure possible, putting our industry at a significant disadvantage to competitors who already enjoy enormously greater benefits of economics of scale.

Conclusion: There are a number of matters of principle that dictate that no tax should be levied on reading material. Providing such an exemption has been a keystone of federal policy since Confederation.

Until this government arrived.

The industry is already seriously jeopardized by the ban on tobacco advertising and the effect of the reduction of the historic postal subsidy. This is no time to apply the coup de grace to a vital part of our economy and culture.

Magazine publishing is a risky business at any time. Even with the incentives the government has provided, there are still a number of publications that just cannot become viable. Titles come and go. This is natural, unavoidable, and probably healthy. The industry overall has a very low profitability, and a high portion of publications inevitably show losses. Nevertheless, they manage to provide an invaluable service in the dissemination of ideas, of intellectual discussion, of cultural expression in the widest sense of the team.

I do not know if senators opposite are interested in all of these things.

As a country, we need more magazines, not fewer.

Senator Lucier: They will get to read it all later.

Senator Austin: Senator Hébert, I think they are interested, because I notice that senators opposite prefer MacLean's magazine four times more than any other magazine and certainly this evening, although Senator Hatfield seems to have preferred National Geographic for a period of time.

• (0320)

Senator Hébert:

The imposition of the GST on our magazines will, as we have demonstrated using the most conservative of assumptions, ensure the death of a substantial proportion of them.

The death, honourable senators.

Many publishers who now are showing a modest profit will be forced to leave the field. While compelling the collapse of many Canadian publications, the tax will simultaneously give an unfair advantage to foreign competitors, particularly those from the U.S.A.

However, we like the Americans. President Bush will be happy about this news.

Senator Lucier: Standard procedure.

Senator Hébert: Yes.

This is not the intent of the tax. This is not consistent with government policy. This is not what Canadians want.

It is something that Parliament should not allow.

Honourable senators, we are the last part of Parliament that can stop this tax.

We urge you—-

He is talking to us, the Senate.

—to consider this brief with care. We urge you to act on its conclusions.

Then there follow all the annexes, which contain some interesting material. We have plenty of time, in any case.

In this Annex, we present a detailed analysis of the impact of the imposition of the Goods and Services Tax on the operations of Canadian magazines.

In order to have a clear understanding of the actual financial impact the tax would have, we chose a representative sample of Canadian periodicals.

We read that, indicating the other four magazines that they chose. Moving now to "Assumptions and Reasoning:"

Consumer magazine subscription sales are notoriously price-sensitive. Repeated testing by one large publication shows a 16% drop in sales for a 7% increase in price. According to a 1986 study by Coopers & Lybrand, industry can expect up to a 3.7% drop in subscriptions from a 1% increase in price. In addition, most magazines are currently priced just below an important price barrier . . .

I have the impression that I read that. I will deal instead with Newsstand sales.

Magazines are typically sent to distributors on consignment.

I am sure honourable senators know that. You do not sell magazines to newsstands. You merely lend them and the newsstands try to sell them, and whatever they do not sell they give back.

We assume that no tax is payable at that time—

Meaning when you take the magazines to the newsstands. If you bring 50 copies of MacLean's to a newsstand, I do not suppose that you have to pay right away.

Senator Lucier: I don't know.

Senator Hébert:

—nor when subsequent consignments are made to the wholesaler and retailer. Tax should only be payable by the publisher when the actual copies are sold at the newsstand. Even this means a financial drain on publishers, since they usually do not get paid by distributors for four or five months. A similar negative cash flow will result from remitting tax when bills are sent for direct single copy sales, because accounts are often not settled for several months.

The current practice of distributors is to invoice the wholesalers and retailers, which means they will have to pay tax on the gross allocation at the time of billing. Distributors already experience a poor cash position. We expect distributors to react to this further threat to their cash position by getting publishers to decrease the number of copies allotted by 7%, which would reduce newsstand sales by a similar amount. Once more to be conservative—

Why should they be conservative?

—however, we assume that increased efficiency in distribution of copies will cut this effect in half, to 3.5%. There would, however, be some savings in distribution costs and print bills.

It has been common practice for publishers to pay 10% of the cover price to retailers as a retail display allowance in return for having their magazines prominently placed on the newsstands. Collecting and accounting for GST on these sums will be so cumbersome that we anticipate that it will accelerate the present trend to replace this payment with an increase of the discount on the cover price. Currently, publishers sell at a 50% discount off the cover price and grant a 10% RDA—

In return for displaying their magazine, the publishers pay the newsstand operators what they call a retail display allowance.

—to approximately half all retail accounts. Once more to be conservative—

I like to be conservative.

—we have assumed in our model that the same number of retailers will continue to claim the allowance and will pay tax on that. Accordingly, the model shows an average of 55% discount of the cover price, on which the publishers pays GST.

Consumers will be faced with a tax on their newsstand purchases of magazines which formerly carried no federal tax burden. Only in Ontario and the Atlantic provinces are magazines subject to retail sales tax. Consumers cannot pass the tax along, and magazines are quite discretionary purchases. We would expect a decline in newsstand sales equivalent to the tax: 7%. To be certain that we have not overstated the case, however, we use half that decrease, 3.5%, in our model. This is in addition to the similar drop resulting from a smaller total distribution to newsstands.

Assumption about circulation

Publishers will experience an unavoidable 3.5% decrease in subscription sales and revenue.

No tax is payable on pre-sold subscriptions.

That is an assumption about circulation.

For cash flow purposes, we assume that tax is payable immediately on long-term orders, including 100% of open credit orders, on invoicing. Experience has shown that up to half of these "Bill-me" orders turn into bad debts.

I never suspected that half of these "Bill-me" orders might turn into bad debts.

We assume that bad debts will be claimed and credited an average of three months after billing. We also assume that all publishers will have to remit monthly and will receive monthly rebates, although smaller publishers will probably qualify for quarterly payment of tax.

There will be a 7% decrease in newsstand sales, and revenue.

The retail display allowance will drop 7% because of the decline in newsstand sales.

Advertising.

[Senator Hébert.]

Magazines are in competition with other Canadian and American media—not just with other publications—for advertising revenue, as well as for readership. (It is recognized that francophone publications are less affected by U.S. publications and more by those from Europe.)

However, at the end it is practically the same because, more and more, the European magazines are coming by plane and they can also be on the newsstand.

The effect of the tax on advertising revenue will, of course, depend largely on the reaction of the advertisers to the GST.

Reaction of advertisers

If all advertisers expand their ad budgets to cover the GST, and if no other considerations are at play, publishers could expect to sell the same number of pages, to increase rates in accord with inflation, and to pass the entire tax to the advertisers. Advertisers, in turn, get an input tax credit for the same amount.

● (0330)

If no advertisers recognize that they can claim input credits for the tax, or if they all have other reasons for not expanding their budgets, advertising spending will be reduced by 7 per cent. A reduction of 7 per cent in pages sold would result.

Such a decline, however, would not likely be spread evenly among publications. Advertisers typically distinguish between primary and secondary buys and would probably make the severest cuts among the secondary buys. This means that magazines falling into this category (such as smaller and regionally based ones) would suffer disproportionately. It is reasonable to expect that those most in jeopardy could experience a two or three-fold decrease in pages sold: that's an 18-27 per cent decrease in ad revenue. Established magazines would probably maintain their current advertising levels and substantially increase their market share at the expense of new, smaller and regional magazines.

Other considerations affecting advertising

We think it is unrealistic to assume that advertisers will react to the tax in as simplistic a way as outlined above. Other considerations must be taken into account.

For most corporations, advertising is a quintessentially discretionary expenditure. Even advertisers who know they can pass on the full tax will not automatically add 7 per cent to the ad budgets (plus inflationary increases) to hold even. The addition of the tax presents a chance to reassess ad budgets with a view to reducing the cost of this activity.

Because it is a common practice for corporations to set their advertising budgets as a percentage of sales, it is important to understand the effect that the removal of the FST will have on different types of advertisers. We assume that the advertisers using our sample publications fall into the following categories:

25% manufacturers, whose goods are now subject to FST

25% wholesalers, whose goods are now subject to FST

25% retailers, whose goods are now subject to FST

25% sellers of services and goods not now subject to FST.

For manufacturers, ad budgets are normally based on a fixed percentage of sales net of the tax. Accordingly, these should not change (ignoring the effect of the removal of the indirect FST costs) if sales stay constant. For the wholesalers and retailers, however, their sales include a portion of FST. For wholesalers, we have assumed that on average the amount is 10 per cent, and for retailers it is 6 per cent. When FST is removed, their sales—and hence their advertising budgets—will drop by a similar amount if, as the government expects, they pass the savings on to their customers. Sales and ad budgets for service companies and companies selling currently exempt goods would not be affected by the removal of the FST (once again ignoring the effect of the removal of the indirect FST).

On average we assume, therefore, that the elimination of the FST will have the result of a 4 per cent overall decrease in advertising spending.

The GST will make advertising in foreign magazines appear cheaper—by 7 per cent. Although such advertising will still not be tax-deductible expense for Canadian advertisers in certain circumstances, the 7 per cent apparent surcharge on Canadian magazine rates is bound to undermine the effectiveness of Bill C-58, which is intended to discourage advertising aimed at the Canadian market in foreign media. There is already a concern in the industry that some companies are ignoring the provisions of Bill C-58 and claiming full tax deductions for advertising in U.S. publications, confident that enforcement is so lax that they will not be caught. The added 7 per cent may provide further enticement to the unscrupulous.

The Free Trade Agreement has encouraged some U.S. companies with Canadian operations to handle their marketing from the U.S. Such companies are, of course, more familiar with the American marketing scene and less familiar with Canadian media. We expect that many such advertisers will balk at paying the additional 7 per cent to advertise in Canadian publications. Our publishers will not tolerate losing this business for the sake of 7 per cent. They will have to reduce rates and absorb the entire tax themselves. In addition, free trade may encourage U.S. magazines to pay more attention to the Canadian market in the hope of attracting advertisers now using Canadian media, and this could further reduce the advertising revenue available to Canadian publications.

Advertisers are very sensitive to the cost of reaching individual potential customers. This is expressed as cost per thousand (CPM). With decreased circulation (explained in the previous section), advertisers will not tolerate constant costs per page. Publishers who experience a loss in circulation will have to reduce their page rates to keep competitive with U.S. publications and to hold their CPM constant.

Assumptions about advertising

It is clear from the preceding that, if everything works in the same direction, there may be a severe reduction in advertising revenue for Canadian magazine publishers. Nevertheless, to be very conservative, we have assumed that there will be an overall decline of only 4 per cent in advertising sales. We also assume that the reduction in rates occasioned by the losses in circulation will result in a further loss of 4.5 per cent in advertising revenue.

For purposes of modelling, we assume that the chosen magazines will all be affected equally (each are primary and secondary buys for different categories of advertisers) at the industry average of an 8.5 per cent drop.

Advertising in foreign editions or copies directed to a non-domestic audience are zero-rated as exports. Although copies sent to foreign subscribers are not taxed, we assume that publishers can still claim 100 per cent tax credit on all expenses.

Other Revenue

Most magazines receive certain incidental revenue from renting their subscription lists—

To political parties, for example:

and from the sale of ancillary products. Some receive grants—such as literay magazines or heart magazines. The models reflect certain assumptions in these areas.

Assumptions about other revenue

We assume that all list rentals go through brokers, who pay GST on their 20% commissions. Publishers will pay tax on the 80% net fee only. This revenue will decrease by 4.5%, reflecting the smaller number of names on subscription lists.

Ancilliary products, which presently bear the FST, will benefit from the removal of that tax—

If, of course, it is removed;

—and we estimate that sales will increase by 2.25%. Offsetting this is a 4.5% decrease resulting from the drop in circulation and readership. The net effect is a drop of 2.25%.

All grant revenues are assumed to be tax-free, but publishers receiving them will still be able to claim credits for all taxes on expenses.

Expenditures.

The tax will have a direct effect on certain expenditures. Preparation for the tax will involve certain one-time costs. It can be anticipated, for example, that about $3,000 will be required for changing the artwork on forms. A further $5,000 to $10,000 will be needed to modify systems for accounting, advertising tracking, and circulation fulfillment, and $500 for software updates. Their costs are not reflected in the modelling. In addition, its impact on sales will change some present costs. These one-time costs will be onerous, particularly for small publications, and it would be appropriate to allow rapid write-off of these expenses. The assumptions used in the models are outlined below.

The GST will cause an average increase of 5% in bookkeeping and accounting costs . . .

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Could I interrupt you for a moment? Have you finished with the book question for good, or are you going to come back?

Senator Hébert: No, I'm going to come back to it in a moment.

Senator Molgat: I had a question to ask you about libraries. You spoke earlier about authors and companies that publish books, but it seems to me you did not touch on the question of libraries. I have here a letter that was sent to me by the Port Moody Public Library. They have a number of questions to ask. I wonder whether you have looked at the effect of the GST on libraries. Here's what the people of the library in Port Moody, British Columbia, have to say. It's a letter dated May 9 and addressed to me:

Dear Sir:

We request that the Federal Government adopt a tax free approach to books and magazines with a view to combating illiteracy, safeguarding the free flow of information and ensuring our natural cultures.

We have the following concerns about the impact that the proposed Goods and Services Tax could have on the effectiveness of our Library:

(1) Our Library will not be able to purchase, on behalf of our clientale, as much reading material as we were able to before the application of the tax. Books and magazines have been free of Federal Sales Tax since Confederation for a number of important educational and cultural reasons. We would be asked to pay more for these essential materials without a correspondent increase from our funders— the citizens of Port Moody and the Province of British Columbia. As the price escalates we can anticipate that more people who have been buying their reading materials will rely on our Library to provide them; we will be under pressure to provide an increased level of service. Without the hope of increased funding to cover these additional costs, we will be forced to buy fewer materials and the public will suffer from the reduction.

(Translation]

That seems to me to be an entirely reasonable and logical proposal on their part.

They then go on to the second point.

(2) There would likely be, as a result of this tax, less variety and selection of works for us to choose for the Library because the book sellers will restrict their offering to potential "best sellers" with less risk. In our opinion, the public is ill served if such a scenario occurs.

(3) The result of (1) and (2) above is in conflict with our commitment to promote literacy in our community and it also undermines the Federal Government's $110 million pledge to fight illiteracy announced in 1988.

This appears to be a regressive measure at a time when our goal should be to work towards a more literate society; illiteracy carries social and economic costs and the ability to read is absolutely essential for full and productive participation in our democratic society.

Yours truly,

Brian Pulham,
Secretary, Board of Trustees

This seems to me to be a very logical approach on the part of the Library. I was wondering if you have any information from other libraries who have written to you, or have there been any studies made as to the effect on the library system in total. If you have any information in that regard, I would appreciate it now.

I realize that you are dealing mainly with magazines at the moment, and if you want to return to books at a later time, that is fine. I do not want to interfere with your trend of thought. However, I was afraid that perhaps you did not intend to deal with books and I did not want you to cease your very interesting speech without dealing with this matter.

[Translation]

I definitely touched on the problem of libraries earlier on, no doubt when you were not in the house. I'm going to return to it in any case. I'm going to finish with magazines because it was important to talk about the problem of magazines. I concentrated a great deal on books, but I didn't want to give you the impression I was indifferent to the question of periodicals. Far from it because it is very much related to books. Book publishing, incidently, relies a great deal on the preliminary work done by literary magazines, for example, which enable young authors to publish their first works before going on to a more important work in the form of a book. I spoke about the problem of the libraries that will be directly affected. It is very clear, on the one hand, that our libraries, on the whole, particularly in Quebec, but probably in the rest of Canada as well, have increasingly limited budgets. With those budgets, they must purchase increasingly expensive books. If you add the GST to the price of books, the result is that librarians are going to purchase fewer books for their libraries. Libraries are often the only way for certain communities that do not have book stores to obtain books. The same is true of that class of citizens who cannot afford the luxury of buying books which today sell for $30 or $40. However, these people would read those books at the library if they could find them. The problem is they will find fewer and fewer of them. This means that, once again, but this time in the library sector, those who will be deprived of books will ultimately be the least well-off. The tax isn't going to bother the rich. Most of the bills we have seen and debated here in the Senate in the past six years have not been bills that trouble the rich. They were generally bills that troubled the poor and added to the problems of the less well-off. The case of libraries is another example of this.

I'll continue talking about the problem of magazines.
