WORLD WAR II

INTERNMENT OF ITALIAN CANADIANS—APOLOGY BY PRIME MINISTER—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. This past Sunday, in an address to a large group of people, mostly of Italian-Canadian background in the Toronto area, our Prime Minister apologized for the wrong and illegal treatment of Italian Canadians during World War II.

Those who were interned have waited 45 years for an apology. I am delighted that our Prime Minister, Brian Mulroney, apologized not only to Canadians of Italian background but also to all other Canadians who were wrongly treated at that time.

For the record, and on behalf of all Canadians, in particular Canadians from the Italian communities across the country, I would like to say to our Prime Minister, mille grazie.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I too rise on a question of privilege. On Sunday, November 4, Prime Minister Mulroney, in the course of a speech to the National Congress of Italian Canadians in Toronto, formally apologized to the Italian community for the 700 Canadians of Italian origin who had been interned in military camps in Petawawa, Ontario, from 1940 to 1943. During the same period, an additional 17,000 were fingerprinted and had to report to a police station on a weekly basis. My father, a humble tailor, was one of them.

Canadians who were victimized by the War Measures Act in 1940, and the Italian community in general, have applauded the Prime Minister for his symbolic and psychologically important statement.

The president of the National Congress of Italian Canadians, Anna Maria Castrilli, was responsible for spearheading this important issue, and we are very much indebted to her.

I wish to convey to the Prime Minister my praise for his gesture, my congratulations, and my thanks. I am sure that my father, who passed away 27 years ago, would have been pleased with the intervention I have just made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I too rise on a question of privilege, but on a totally different subject.

I would not like this day to pass without some reference on the Senate record to the horrors that took place one year ago at the Institut polytechnique de Montréal. There is little one can say about the horror of that situation, except to remind honourable senators that there is an inquiry on the order paper, inspired by this subject, dealing with the question of violence against women in Canadian society, which I launched, and to which I know Senator Spivak will speak when the opportunity arises. I would like to take this occasion to encourage other honourable senators to speak to that inquiry, lest we forget.

ACCOUNTS STATEMENT TABLED

On the tabling of documents:

The Hon. the Speaker: I have the honour to inform the Senate that the Clerk of the Senate has laid on the Table a detailed statement of his receipts and disbursements for the fiscal year 1989-90.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-86, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act (child tax credit).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, at the next sitting.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Leave is granted. I should say, for our side, that we are prepared to grant leave to deal with this bill either now or later this day.

I have spoken to Senator Doody, who has explained the problem. If it is possible, we would be prepared to support second reading of this bill later this day and refer the bill to the Standing Senate Comittee on Social Affairs Science and Technology. Senator Marsden is ready to try to convene a meeting.

I would like it understood that although the government might not be ready to proceed at this moment, we are prepared to interrupt proceedings to deal with it later this day, to get it into committee if possible.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable senator. Is it the intention of the Senate to pass this bill in all its stages at this point, or has it to go to committee and come back for third reading immediately or the next day?

Senator Frith: I think it should go to committee, especially since we know that the committee is poised to deal with it very quickly. We are certainly prepared to give it second reading today. I doubt very much that the committee will report the bill with amendment, or in any negative way, and, if I am right, we could then give it third reading today or tomorrow.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am not sufficiently familiar with the bill to have second reading today. I would like the opportunity to prepare some notes. I accept with gratitude the offer to put it through, but I think we will have to wait until tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 100 residents of the Cobalt region of Ontario who ask that the Senate reject the goods and services tax. The petitioners are from Cobalt, Haileybury, Orillia, and North Cobalt. Nearly all of the 100 signatories are from Cobalt, Ontario. I have the honour to present that petition.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 35 residents of the region of Lac Lacroix, in Quebec, who urge the Senate to reject the bill on the goods and services tax. Most of these people are from Lac Lacroix, but some of them are residents of Saint-Isidore and Hébertville.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 122 residents of the region of Mascouche, in Quebec, who urge the Senate to reject the bill on the goods and services tax. Most of them are from Mascouche, the others are residents of Terrebonne and Rougemont.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Why not simply table them?

Senator Hébert: Why does Senator Simard interrupt me every time he hears the word petition? You should be thankful I do not read the names of the petitioners.

Senator Simard: That is a slight improvement in your case.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Perhaps you ought to read them.

Senator Hébert: I do not read the names of petitioners, but I want to make sure that the names of the regions I mention are clearly indicated. However if you insist I could read the names.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 31 residents of LaSalle, in Quebec, who urge the Senate to reject the bill on the goods and services tax. I am simply making sure these are all residents of LaSalle. And so they are, without exception. Thank you.

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a number of petitions containing 115 names from a number of large and small towns in southeastern Alberta, from places like Brooks, Duchess, Patricia, Gem, Bassano, Tilley, Medicine Hat, Consort, Drumheller, Cereal, Vauxhall, Hanna, and Sunnybrook, all different towns in southern Alberta.

• (1410)

I have a few names from Big Stone, Alberta. All of these are people who humbly pray that the Senate will stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a petition on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax. This petition contains 27 signatures of people from localities such as Canterbury, Woodstock, and Benton, New Brunswick.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present some petitions. They are from various places in Saskatchewan. There are names of people from Regina, Battleford, Ogema, Indian Head, Yellow Grass, and Estevan. I have the honour to present these petitions.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have petitions from various parts of Nova Scotia asking the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax. There are names from Dartmouth, Halifax, Sackville, Lower Sackville, and Annapolis. There are 90 names in total.

I have a further petition from various citizens of the southwestern part of Nova Scotia. There are names of people from Yarmouth, Meteghan, Hebron, Barrington Passage and Pubnico. All of these people reaffirm historic principles embodied in tax-free status for the printed word and they wish to support the amendment to Bill C-62 to ensure the retention of the zero-rate.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I have the honour to present a petition from 385 residents of Saskatchewan in which they request a tax-free status and zero rating for all printed documents, books and periodicals.

These petitioners come from Regina, Canora, Lumsden, Saskatchewan; Balgonie, Saskatchewan; Wilcox, Saskatchewan; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; Earl Grey, Saskatchewan; Zedner, Saskatchewan; Nacoma, Saskatchewan and a very wide representation of Saskatchewan cities and towns and villages; Selby, Saskatchewan; Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan; Regina Beach,Saskatchewan; Greymore, Saskatchewan; Scout Lake, Saskatchewan, Frobisher, Saskatchewan; Winter, Saskatchewan; Craven, Saskatchewan, Estevan, Saskatchewan.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Where is Estevan?

Senator Buckwold: You don't know where Estevan is? We are building a dam near there. It is all mixed up, as you recall.

Senator Bonnell: What is all mixed up?

Senator Buckwold: The Alameda dam, right beside Estevan. It's going full steam ahead, regardless—

Senator Bonnell: What about the Minister of the Environment; is he stopping it?

Senator Buckwold: I am not quite sure. But just keep asking me questions.

Senator Bonnell: Is the Premier of Saskatchewan pushing onward?

Senator Buckwold: The Premier of Saskatchewan is ignoring any request from environmentalists. It is moving full steam ahead to complete the dam.

Senator Bonnell: What about the court order?

Senator Buckwold: It is a matter of rules. He learnt that somewhere. Rules don't matter. There are petitioners from Stoughton, Saskatchewan. When you have 375 names, it is a lot to read out.

Senator Bonnell: You are going too fast. I can hardly understand.

Senator Buckwold: If you want any names, I will be glad to give you some.

Senator Frith: Give us a large sample.

Senator Buckwold: All right.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Bonnell: A pile of bones.

Senator Buckwold: Regina is a pile of bones. Ask Senator Barootes about that.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Bonnell: Do you know most of these people?

Senator Buckwold: No, I don't know very many in Regina. I will give you some other petitions in Saskatoon, and Senator Barootes will know those.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1420)

That gives you a rough idea of what is included in this petition. I would ask that these names be submitted.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senator, if you submit that petition, we will not hear all of the names that are included in it.

Senator Buckwold: I am sure other senators have many names to read, and I will try to get in touch with those people I know in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have a number of petitions signed by the residents of the province of Ontario who humbly pray and call on the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. I have many names from the Ottawa area.

(Names of signatories read)

We have more names from Ottawa, Nepean, Hull, Dunrobin and Kanata. I have more names from Brockville, Nepean and Ottawa.

(Names of signatories read)

I managed to get a couple of people on this page from Winnipeg. I guess they were visiting the Ottawa area, or perhaps this particular petition was well circulated, because I also see names from Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal.

• (1430)

I think every province west of here, and Quebec, is represented on this petition which contains 25 names.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a petition with 14 names, most of whom seem to come from Iroquois, Winchester and the Brockville area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a petition from the far west of Ontario, the Kenora area. It contains some 53 names, almost every one of whom is from Kenora.

(Names of signatories read)

This petition is from closer to my home area. It contains some 128 names of people from such places as Milton, Etobicoke, Don Mills, Orangeville, Mississauga, Brampton, Cambridge, Aurora, Beeton and Norval and Caledon.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a petition from a number of people from Scarborough, Brampton, Bramalea, Mississauga and Richmond Hill.

I have another petition from people from Malton and Orangeville.

This group of 27 petitioners is from farther west. They appear to be from the Cambridge area, including one from Kitchener.

(Names of signatories read)

This is a petition from an area quite close to mine. It contains 13 names, including several from Bolton, Orangeville and Brampton.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 25 more names of petitioners from the Brampton area, including one from Grand Valley which is slightly north of our area, and Milton, which is slightly west of our area.

Senator Frith: Where do you consider your area?

Senator Neiman: It is Caledon, Bolton and Orangeville.

Senator Frith: These petitioners are generally from your area?

Senator Neiman: Yes. I have a petition with 20 names on it. They are mostly from the Grand Valley, Brampton and Milton area; but there is a signature of someone from Leeds, England. I do not know how that name got there, but I guess the person just got into the spirit of it.

I have 20 names of petitioners from the Burlington area, Orangeville, Scarborough, Toronto and Beeton. These petitioners must have signed at their place of work, because they come from an area surrounding Toronto.

I have names of many petitioners from the Milton, Mississauga, Georgetown and Orangeville area, totalling some 146 names.

I have another petition signed by people from Milton and Acton, which is a nice place to visit. It is just north of Milton. These are all delightful parts of Ontario. It is interesting to see the number of people who have signed these petitions and how they are concerned about what is happening with respect to the GST.

I have another 27 names of people, at least 20 of whom are from the Brampton and Mississauga area, as well as someone from Nepean and Milton.

(Names of signatories read)

These 27 petitioners come from the Campbellville area, which is not far from Milton. It is the home of the Mohawk racetrack, for anyone who is interested in harness racing. Rockwood is a lovely village in that same area.

This group of petitioners comes from north of Toronto, right up Yonge Street, as it were. There are 16 names of people from Newmarket on here. The petition also includes people from Willowdale and Beamsville.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a list of 27 petitioners from the Brampton, Mississauga and Georgetown area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have well over 100 signatures of people from east of Toronto, including Oshawa, Newmarket, Baysville, Don Mills, Rice Lake and other areas in the lake country where people are equally concerned about the possible effects of GST on them.

I have the names of another 20 petitioners from Huntsville and Baysville.

(Names of signatories read)

On this petition I must have the signatures of well over 200 people from the Baysville area alone.

• (1440)

We have a great number from the Richmond Hill area again, from Baysville and Toronto, Burlington, Weston, and Lake of Bays. I have a name from Florida, which we will have to ignore. Of the 20, I count only 19.

Here is another group from the Baysville area. I do not know what is happening in that area, but they certainly are very exercised about the GST. These are petitioners from Huntsville and Toronto, Barrie, more from Baysville, and Brampton. Members of Parliament who come from that area must be getting all sorts of petitions themselves, asking them to do something about changing the government's mind on the GST.

Here we have 20 more names from Baysville, Scarborough, Niagara Falls, Willowdale, Rockwood, all of which are in Ontario, and from Saint Laurent, Quebec.

There are 20 more, again from Baysville, Toronto, Huntsville, St. Catharines, Willowdale and Scarborough, Thornhill and Etobicoke.

Then we have a further 19 from Baysville, Bracebridge, Rexdale, Toronto, Etobicoke, Burlington.

I think I underestimated the number of people in the Baysville area, because here is another petition with 20 names, half of whom appear to be from that area. We also have petitioners from Richmond Hill, Etobicoke, Toronto, and Notre Dame de Grace, Quebec.

We have a group of 17 names from the Barrie area, Fergus, Huntsville, Burlington, Hamilton, and Dorset.

There are 16 names from Bala, Rosseau, Huntsville. This is beautiful lake country in Ontario. A great place to live.

Again, we have names from Baysville, Weston, Dorset, Toronto, and Mississauga.

There are another 20 names from Baysville, Bracebridge, Newmarket, Toronto, and Bowmanville.

There are 20 more, mostly from the Mississauga area. I see one signature from the Bridle Path in Toronto, which is rather interesting. That is a very wealthy area of the city, but even there the people are concerned about the effects of the GST.

Here are 20 names, mostly from the Toronto area; but I see Etobicoke, Baysville again, and Buffalo, New York. I do not know how he got in there. Perhaps he is one of the people who have just moved down there as a result of our problems. Finally, we have Niagara-on-the-Lake, a lovely spot.

Here are 20 names from Baysville, Toronto, and Barrie.

Here is another 20, starting off again with Baysville. Then we have Petorborough, Brampton, Mississauga, Toronto and Burlington.

There are another 20 from Etobicoke, Newmarket, Bradford, St. Catharines, Willowdale, Fonthill, Downsview, Strathroy, Richmond Hill, Baysville, and Bradford, all on the one petition.

We have one with 14 names, of whom about 10 are from Baysville. Then we have Bracebridge.

We have another one from Baysville, St. Catharines and Dorset.

Here is another with 21 names, with about a dozen from Baysville. I have to go there sometime. I am not quite sure where it is, but it seems to be growing. I believe it is in the lake country.

An Hon. Senator: Lake of Bays.

Senator Neiman: It must be in that area. I have another petition from Mississauga, Markham and Oakville.

Here are another 20 names from Rexdale, Burlington, Toronto, Dundas, Etobicoke, Beeton, Thornhill; and another 20 from Baysville, Hamilton, Lake of Bays, Oakville, Toronto, St. Catharines, Mississauga, and North York.

Here are another 20, with some from Baysville. About half of them seem to be from that area. Then we have Muskoka House, Bracebridge, Lake of Bays, Seabright and Orillia.

There are 20 more, all from the Baysville area again. I see one name on here from Belleville.

Senator Stanbury: May we have some of the names? We may recognize them.

Senator Neiman: Yes, you may.

• (1450)

They have added another 24 or 34 names to this petition. It appears they ran out of space and typed names on the front and back of the petition, and then added an extra page.

(Names of signatories read)

There are a number of names which seem to be from the Alliston/Brantford area. There are 34 names in all.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 22 names of people from Kirkland Lake.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 22 names from Kirkland Lake.

(Names of signatories read)

There are names on another petition from Larder Lake and Kirkland Lake.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 22 names from Larder Lake.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 18 names of people from Sudbury.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 16 signatures of people from Sudbury.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with 20 names from the same general area.

I have another petition with names of people from Chelmsford.

I have another petition with 22 names of people from Chelmsford.

(Names of signatories read)

I have at least four more petitions with approximately 88 names in total mainly from people in Chelmsford.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1500)

On this page, we had a couple from Montreal.

[Senator Neiman.]

(Names of signatories read)

All of the other 20 petitioners are from the Chelmsford area.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is another petition from Larder Lake up in our north country. Everyone on this list of 22 except two are from Larder Lake.

(Names of signatories read)

There are a couple of names from Rouen.

(Names of signatories read)

Still in our north country, we have further names.

(Names of signatories read)

Some are from Orillia.

Names of signatories read)

There are 27 names in all. Here we have people from Baysville:

(Names of signatories read)

There are 25 names here from Iroquois and, again, areas to the north. This group is almost entirely from the Iroquois area.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are 18 names in another area north of Orangeville on the way to the lake.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are several more from Flesherton.

(Names of signatories read)

There are a number more names from the Markdale area, as well as seven more on this page.

(Names of signatories read)

There are 32 names on this petition. This is up in our farm country just north of Toronto in the Bradford area, the Holland marsh country.

(Names of signatories read)

There is an entire petition of some 32 names from that area, where farming represents a very important industry. There are only two names on the next petition.

(Names of signatories read)

This is a wonderful geography lesson for everyone. Here is a group of 26 names from the Bracebridge area.

(Names of signatories read)

There are 23 names on this petition, a little closer to my area.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are some names from Mississauga, Brampton; and another name from Norval; and many more from Mississauga.

(Names of signatories read)

There are a couple more from Rexdale and Mississauga, and another from Elmvale.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are 25 names, mostly from small country villages.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1510)

I have several more names from Elmvale and Wasaga Beach, where some people live all year round.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 29 more names from the lake country, Orillia and Barrie.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 27 more names from Severn Bridge. Anyone who is interested in boating through the canals will know of that town.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 27 more names from that same area.

I have 27 more names from the Orillia and lake area, which is a beautiful section of Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 28 more names from the Orillia area. In fact, out of these 28 names, 20 are Orillia addresses.

I have another 27 names, a number from the Orillia area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have 24 names on my next petition. Again they appear to be from the Orillia area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another ten names from the Orillia area.

(Names of signatories read)

I could take you through a number more. As I say, they all seem to be from my area. There are incredible numbers from Orillia, Bracebridge, Wasaga Beach and Barrie, all asking that we listen to what they have to say. There are more names from Beaverton and Britannia. These are from the small towns and villages surrounding the Toronto area, half-way to the north country. As I said, we had names from the far northwest, including Kenora. There are names from Brighton and Tweed. When I was sitting here looking through everything, if my addition is correct, I counted 2,479 names on these petitions; but, I found a couple of American names and at least one Englishman on the petitions, so perhaps 2,470 would be a more correct number.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have petitions from British Columbia, which I would like to table this afternoon before the vote on the amendment presently before the Senate is taken, because they relate to the GST. The first petition I have is dated September 25, 1990. It has 25 signatures on it. It is in the usual form, whereby the petitioners, all residents of Canada, avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to them in the certain assurance that this honourable house will provide a remedy.

I understand that under the rules I should not read the subject matter of the petition, but I will paraphrase it by saying that specifically it has to do with the tax applied against the printed word.

The majority of the petitioners on this petition come from the greater Vancouver area, but there is one from Kelowna, one from Richmond, one from Victoria and one from Robert's Creek on the Sunshine Coast, which is not too far away. I would ask that this petition be tabled.

The next petition I have is also signed by people in the greater Vancouver area. It is in a similar form and again deals with the same subject matter; namely, the application of the GST to magazines, books, newspapers, periodicals and other reading materials. I think it is significant, honourable senators—and I address these remarks particularly to those senators on the government side—that, much as they might have criticized and decried our reading of petitions over the last few weeks, it is significant that the impact of the petitions eventually does penetrate even this government. The outpouring of the feelings of hundreds of thousands of Canadians through the mechanism of these petitions on the particular subject of, for example, the application of a tax to printed material, has even penetrated to the level of the Prime Minister.

It was in Vancouver a week or so ago that I saw Mr. Mulroney on television, where, in answer to a question posed by a student, he came as close as he possibly could to suggesting that we should indeed amend the GST in much the same form as the amendment before the Senate this afternoon. I will not say that he went that far, but he inferred, in language strong enough to cause the student to accept his assurance, that following passage of the GST he would be giving the most serious consideration to the very subject of the amendment before us today. I am sure that many of the thousands of petitioners in British Columbia, and, indeed, across the rest of the country, will all feel that their petitions were not entirely in vain and that perhaps it was of some minor benefit to pursue this subject in the way they have so as to try to bludgeon some sense into the government on this issue.

They have obviously succeeded—not that they will succeed in persuading all of the members on the government side to support this amendment—in at least getting a moral commitment out of the Prime Minister that this subject matter will be dealt with following the implementation of the GST, if, indeed, it gets implemented.

Honourable senators, I have a second petition to table. It is dated September 27, 1990, and is signed by 25 people, all of whom, with one or two exceptions, are from the Lower Mainland. I see one signature from Kitchener, Ontario, but, as I have said, the rest are from the greater Vancouver area.

All of the other petitions deal with the same subject matter of the amendment presently before the Senate. I feel that these petitioners are entitled to have their petitions tabled prior to a vote being taken on this amendment.

The next petition again is in the same form and again deals with the imposition of the GST on magazines, books, newspapers and other periodicals. It is dated September 30, 1990. It contains 25 signatures of Canadian citizens, most of whom reside in the greater Vancouver area. A few, however, obviously were visiting at the time they signed. I see one from New Westminster, one from Shawnigan Lake, one from Campbell River, Vancouver Island, one from Ladner in the Fraser Valley and one from Delta.

The next petition I have is in similar form and also applies to the application of the tax to magazines, books, newspapers and other periodicals. It is dated October 1, 1990. Again, it is signed by the full complement provided for in the printed form; namely, 25 petitioners, most of whom are from the greater Vancouver area. I see that one is from Belleville, Ontario; one is from Victoria, British Columbia; one is from Whitehorse, in the Yukon, where I enjoyed living for a number of years; one is from Kamloops, B.C., and another is from Toronto, Ontario.

It is interesting that Canadians, even in the course of business travel or holidays, are still sufficiently concerned and sensitive to this particular aspect of the tax that they will take the trouble to sign a petition even away from their own homes. I would ask that this petition be tabled.

I might say, honourable senators, that these are not all of the petitions I have, but they were among the ones that I particularly noted dealt with the subject of the amendment presently before the house. I thought it appropriate that these people should have their petitions presented before the vote is taken on the current amendment before the chamber.

The next petition is in the same form and is on the same subject matter as the previous ones; namely, the application of this tax to written materials, particularly school books. It is dated September 30, 1990. Again, these petitioners live for the most part in the Vancouver area. I note signatures from Abbotsford, Vancouver itself, McBride, B.C., some distance away, Langley and Toronto, Ontario.

I am referring only to some of the places other than greater Vancouver which are represented on this petition. All the rest are from Vancouver or suburbs of Vancouver and the greater Vancouver area. I would ask to table that petition.

Of the two remaining petitions I have to present, one is signed by 25 petitioners and is dated September 27, 1990. It is in the usual form and again deals with the same subject matter, which is the amendment presently before the Senate. Two petitioners are from Parksville on Vancouver Island, where my son-in-law and his wife live. Other petitioners are from Vancouver, Abbotsford, from UBC and Kitimat. Others are from Burnaby and West Vancouver.

The last petition I have on this particular subject is in the same form. It is dated September 27, 1990, and contains the signatures of 25 petitioners from the Greater Vancouver area, with the exception of Pitt Meadows, Aldergrove, one from Victoria and another from Surrey.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I too have some petitions to table this afternoon. These petitioners come from my designated area as senator for the south shore of Montreal. The first petition comes from residents of Chateauguay and Huntingdon. These people have asked us to reject the new universal 7 per cent goods and services tax adopted by the Conservative government which will create serious and inhuman difficulties for Canadians.

They go on to say that the implementation of this tax will constitute an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only by forcing them to pay higher taxes but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation and unemployment. They have asked the honourable Senate to present these petitions. We all have designated areas in the province of Quebec, and I was pleased when I received these petitions from my own area. There is a total of 27 names on this petition.

I have another petition containing names of petitioners from Mount Bruno, which also adjoins my constituency. My constituency covers five federal constituencies. This petition also includes the names of several people from Noranda, which is a little further north of my area. These petitioners humbly ask the Senate to present their petition.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from residents of Mount Bruno, with another name from Noranda. There are a total of 20 petitioners from that area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from Huntingdon and St. Luc and Chambly, which is in part of my riding.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from residents of Huntingdon and Valleyfield. Their names were submitted in early July.

(Names of signatories read)

Back to Huntingdon again. I would like to read these names out to you.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another page also from Huntingdon.

Back to Huntingdon again.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from Waterloo, Huntingdon, and St. Jean.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from Pickerel, Ontario and Huntingdon.

(Names of signatories read)

This is my last petition before I give way to someone else. These petitioners are also from Huntington, Waterloo, mostly from my area.

Those are my petitions for today.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have the privilege to present dozens of petitions on behalf of students from the largest university in Canada, one of the greatest universities in the English-speaking world, if not, indeed, the world, the University of Toronto. I am a graduate of that university, as, I am sure, are many other senators on both sides.

There are hundreds of petitions, all urging the Senate to oppose the goods and services tax, and specifically bringing to its attention the wide variety of items that previously were untaxed but which will now cost students 7 per cent more. These include student residence fees, transit fares, locker rentals and, of course, the most invidious tax of all, the sales tax on text books and periodicals which, for the first time in Canadian history, according to these petitions, undermine the importance of education and literacy nationwide.

The University of Toronto Students' Administrative Council dealt with this matter, and I am not sure what the outcome was. However, flowing from their deliberations, they decided to canvass individual students and they have presented us with hundreds of petitions signed by every class at the University of Toronto from the class of 1990 through to the graduating class of 1997.

The students who have signed these petitions come from every college, every department of the univertity, from University College, Trinity College, St. Michael's College, Victoria College, and from all the faculties: medicine, law, engineering, nursing, commerce, pharmacy, and others.

When one examines the names, we see that these students represent the rainbow complexion of Toronto and Canada. The surnames come from practically every ethnic and racial origin. They also represent a wide selection of students from every region, not only of Ontario, but across Canada and from around the world. All of them have one message to give us, senators, as we approach the vote this afternoon on deleting from the proposed GST those portions of the tax which apply to education and to literacy.

I hope, honourable senators, that we take the voices of these thousands of students into account when we proceed to the vote later this afternoon. I was delighted last Thursday when I heard from senators opposite that they were anxious to get on with the debate dealing with the GST, and I noted that one senator, Senator Simard, suggested that senators opposite would consider amendments. It is my hope that you will follow the advice of the Prime Minister and listen to the substance of these petitions and vote favourably for the amendment which I think would not only hearten all of us on this side, but would also restore credibility in Parliament and the parliamentary process with the next generation of students who will bear the burden of trying to sort out the sordid economic mess which we of this generation have bequeathed them.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move:

> That the Clerk's Accounts be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to.

THE HONOURABLE PHILIPPE DEANE GIGANTÈS

ALLEGATIONS OF FRAUD—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—REPLY BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, before Your Honour calls for the oral Question Period, there is a brief statement I would like to make.

Last Thursday, in a statement to be found at page 3504 of the Debates of the Senate, the Honourable Senator Gigantès raised an objection to references made to him in the course of interviews I held with journalists earlier in the day. In particular, he objected to the use of the words "fraud" or "fraudulent" in the course of those interviews.

I want to make completely clear that I did not, and do not, impute fraudulent intent to Senator Gigantès or to anyone else taking part in this debate. My concern was, and is, with a process and its costs. Indeed, I have no hesitation whatever in withdrawing completely any reference that Senator Gigantès or any other senator finds personally offensive. It is not my habit to make personally offensive remarks. Indeed, I try to avoid anything that might be so considered.

In the case of Senator Gigantès, I also, needless to say, accept completely the explanation given by him in this chamber concerning his books and their publication and translation.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to thank the Leader of the Government. I do accept his statement and explanation. One thing that really did hurt was that anyone would believe that someone who has earned his living by writing could possibly dare submit for publication, under his own name, any text in French coming from the hurried translation, under very great pressure, of our translators, who are fine people, but who cannot, in the limits of the time given, produce a decent text. Writing is rewriting. Whenever I submit something for publication, I have written it at least nine times and rewritten it nine times.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ELIMINATION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX—CALCULATION OF REFUND—DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WHOLESALERS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is in regard to the proposed GST. This is a specific question that has been put to me by a wholesaler in Winnipeg. I will read the material so that the minister will have the full knowledge of the problem. The wholesaler writes as follows:

> I would like to bring to your attention a very unfortunate and disturbing situation in connection with the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax on January 1, 1991. As you may be aware, the intention of the Government was to refund the amount of Federal Sales Tax in corporate inventories at December 31, 1990. This was to be done in order to ensure that sales in 1991 do not include this latter mentioned tax. Unfortunately, the Government has decided that a standard percentage of 8.1 per cent will be used to calculate the amount of Federal Sales Tax paid at the rate of 13.5 per cent for these inventories. This 8.1 per cent may be sufficient in some industries and for some retailers, but it is not sufficient to recover the cost of inventories owned by many wholesalers.

[Senator Murray.]

> Our company would normally have about $10 million of inventory on hand at December 31, 1990. The Federal Sales Tax component of this inventory would amount to approximately $1,180,000. The Government intends to allow us to claim as a rebate 8.1 per cent of $10 million or $810,000. The difference between these two amounts, or $370,000, would be a direct loss to this company as a result of the Government's measures. We believe this amounts to highway robbery!

He then goes on to give an example based on $100 of what the specific cost would be. There would be a loss of $4.23 on $100 of inventory.

> I am sure that you can appreciate that our Company cannot afford to incur the loss of $370,000. Our choices of trying to prevent or reduce this loss are but two. One is to try to pass this loss on to our customers who are retailers. This would be a poor choice because:
> a) The Government has stated that all Federal Sales Tax has to be eliminated from pricing after December 31,1990 and, > b) Several of our competitors are manufacturers who sell direct to retailers. These competitors, because they are manufacturers, will not have any Federal Sales Tax in their December 31, 1990 inventories. Accordingly, if we were to include the F.S.T. loss in our price of goods, our prices would be uncompetitive.

My question is: How does the minister propose to avoid discriminating against companies like this one, remembering that in the west, in particular, we do not have the concentration of manufacturing facilities that exist in the central provinces? We have a multitude of wholesalers—this is just one example—who have to purchase their goods essentially from eastern manufacturers and are not, as this individual indicates, in the same position as the manufacturers who will get the full amount of the sales tax back. The wholesalers will therefore be discriminated against.

Can the minister indicate any remedy if the sales tax does proceed?

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Official Languages Act received Royal Assent July 28, 1988. That is 28 months ago. Is the honourable senator aware that the refusal of the government to table the regulations of the Official Languages Act has caused Mr. d'Iberville Fortier to threaten to resign? Also, he was forced to table an emergency special report pursuant to Section 67 of the act. Is the leader aware that by not tabling these regulations, the government is endangering the health and the safety of Canadians? I will give you an example. Announcements on board trains, airplanes and ferries are often not made in both languages. Another situation arising from the lack of regulations is the fact that anglophone inmates in a detention centre in Quebec do not have access to professional care in the language of their choice.

Can the senator tell me when to expect these regulations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I had an exchange on this very matter the other day with our colleague, Senator Thériault. As I explained at the time, the regulations under this act have been the subject of very extensive consultations between the government and the Canadian public, in particular the representatives of the minority language groups. The short answer to her question is that I expect the regulations to be tabled very soon.

Senator Wood: Honourable senators, don't mind if I am sceptic about that, because some time ago when I questioned you—I think it was a year ago, on September 21, 1988, you told me then that they would be imminent. So, today I thought I had better look it up.

Senator Croll: She has a different meaning of "soon".

Senator Wood: Well, I looked it up.

Senator Croll: Delay, inventory tactics.

Senator Wood: It was soon to happen. Well, it didn't happen. I noticed that before that, in reply to another question I asked on the same subject, you said, "very shortly." I don't think those words have the same meaning for each of us. Then in April, 1989, the President of the Treasury Board said, "Long before Christmas." Two Christmases have now gone by and we still haven't seen the regulations. I would like to have a better answer than "very shortly." I would like to have a date.

Senator Murray: The consultation process has taken a good deal longer than we had anticipated, and I appreciate the patience of my honourable friends and others on this matter. I think I can assure her with some certainty this time that the regulations are in their final form and will be tabled very shortly. If later today or tomorrow I find that I am wrong in that expectation, I will say so in the house tomorrow.

Senator Wood: I would like to remind the honourable senator that the consultation with the minority groups has long since passed. They went two rounds on the consultation. I was in touch with them recently and they are not expecting any further consultations.

I believe the government has all the information it needs.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

CANADA'S ROLE IN PROPOSED PARLIAMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday the Council of Europe marked the 40th anniversary of its human rights charter and at that meeting declared that it now wants the United States, the Soviet Union and Canada to join some of its functions. As honourable senators are aware, the Council of Europe is the oldest post-war body promoting European cooperation. Today it will admit Hungary as the first member from the former communist bloc. The 23-nation council issued a statement at the end of the meeting yesterday saying that it wanted to help coordinate human rights issues for the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. That organization, as honourable senators know, is a loosely-defined body of some 34 nations, including Canada, and has been a forum for talks between cold war adversaries.

Yesterday, as well, the Foreign Mminister of Italy opened the session by calling for the council's assembly to develop into a parliament to bring together the former Communist Bloc countries with the West, including the United States. The United States responded by saying that it was unlikely to become a member of the Council of Europe.

Could the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us as to Canada's position with respect to becoming a member of the proposed parliament? What does Canada intend to do in terms of furthering its role with respect to the new functions now proposed by the Council of Europe? Does it intend to follow the lead of the United States and not actively participate in the way proposed by members of the Council, or will it choose to adopt a unique North American path and become active in the deliberations, not only of the Council and its attendant committees, but hopefully the proposed parliament?

TIMETABLE FOR PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. I must be careful because some senators have been objecting to my provision of background information. It has been a long time since we have had a Question Period. I have three areas on which I want to ask questions, but I will only ask one at a time so that other honourable senators, who have also been waiting a long time, may have an opportunity to ask questions.

I have received many inquiries about the administration of the GST. I would like to ask the honourable minister if the regulations are ready or will be ready by a reasonable date, such as December 1, 1990, so that people will be capable of complying with the regulations, if this bill is passed, that will be used to administer it or will we have a problem like the one we had with the Official Languages Act?

Senator Olson: If the regulations are not ready, could the minister tell us what information is used to provide answers to callers of the toll-free number? Replies are being given, but they are not consistent. I have been told that one can be given two or three different replies to the same question in the same hour. Therefore, if the regulations are not now ready, what is the basis for these replies that are being given to the people calling the toll-free number?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have not had a report on the operation of this telephone information service for some time. I suspect that most of the inquiries have to do with the taxation of particular commodities and services, input tax credits, and so forth, which are already covered in the proposed legislation. If the honourable senator could cite specific examples where conflicting information is being given from various telephone lines in response to the same inquiry, I would appreciate having that information so that I may convey it to the Department of Finance.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my problem is somewhat deeper than that. If the minister says that the regulations are not now ready, what is the basis for giving any information?

Senator Murray: To correct the record, I did not say that they were not now ready. I said I would inquire of the Department of Finance as to the state of play and whether they can be made publicly available, and that I would get back to the honourable senator. That was my reply to his first question.

Senator Olson: I guess it was something like that. I think you hedged on whether or not you were going to admit that the regulations were ready.

I hold in my hand an advertisement, paid for by the Government of Canada, headed "Questions about the GST and Prices?" and says:

[Senator Olson.]

> If you're asking how the proposed GST will affect prices, we're here to tell you. Call us toll-free Monday to Friday 9am-9pm.

Then it gives the telephone number. It then says "The answer is to call your GST Consumer Information Office." I will read the number into the record. It is 1-800-668-2122. Apparently all information is available there. I will provide you with some inconsistent answers. I do not know how I am going to do it, because the people I have heard from have not made tape recordings of their telephone conversations. I hope the minister is not asking me to do that; but inconsistent answers have been given. I hope he will tell us tomorrow if the regulations applicable to the administration of the GST on January 1, 1991 are now ready. If they are not, then I think people would like some explanation of why you are passing out information that is not authentic or official.

Senator Murray: The first question the honourable senator asked was whether the regulations were ready. I replied by saying that I would make inquiries and let him know. That answer stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENDED MATERNITY BENEFITS—DATES OF AVAILABILITY TO WORKING WOMEN—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I too should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate the following important and pressing question: Can he tell us today whether he has made the representations that I think he promised to make to his colleagues in the cabinet to take into consideration the requests of those Canadian women who have been paying upgraded unemployment insurance premiums and who delivered babies before we passed Bill C-21? They feel that they should be paid retroactively the extra maternal benefits that are provided for in that legislation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO IRAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to preface my remarks by correcting a statement I addressed to Senator Murray on October 26, 1990. In the course of my questioning, I said: "In recent days Iraq and Iran have rejoined forces against outsiders to the Gulf incident." I never meant to say that. I had something else on my mind and my tongue galloped ahead of my thoughts. I withdraw that statement, because it is a non-truth.

The line of questioning in which I was engaged with the Leader of the Government in the Senate at the time had to do with the appointment of a new ambassador in Tehran following years of non-activity arising out of the incidents, of which we all know, which took place some ten years ago. The ambassador who has been named has a background in international trade and commerce. It seems to me that in the current circumstances it would have been preferable to appoint someone to Tehran who is sensitive to and has wide experience in the field of human rights. Goodness knows what abuses have taken place in those intervening years.

All we have to do is look at the list of people who are unaccounted for—youths and whole families who literally have disappeared from civil lists. There are not only rumours but factual reports of torture, of people being put to death without a proper trial, and so on.

Even though the United Nations sent a special envoy to Iran to inquire into these matters, its report has been widely discredited by most people as being unrealistic. Abuses of human rights still go on there.

Besides questioning the fact that we are now appointing an ambassador to Iran, in my view, our first preoccupation, as a nation which believes in human rights and basic decency, would have been to appoint someone who has the expertise and the background with which to deal with those matters and to carry some weight with the extremist regime that now prevails in that country. I am amazed that that was not done. I can only conclude that Canada at this stage is more interested in rejoining the oil pipeline than it is in dealing with basic human concerns.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only undertake to draw to the attention of my colleague, Mr. Clark, the comments of Senator Corbin. I will ask Mr. Clark whether he has any comment to make. I simply do not agree with the honourable senator that the personal background of a particular Canadian ambassador, whether it be in the law, politics, trade, commerce or whatever, necessarily sends a message about human rights to the country to which he is accredited as ambassador. The important thing is that he represents Canada and Canada's long-standing policy and attitude on human rights matters. I am sure that the ambassador, who is not known to me personally, will be quite capable of stating our views and, indeed, of pressing them in a professional and forthright manner.

CITIZENS' FORUM

ATTITUDE OF CHAIRMAN—COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the Citizens' Forum announced last week. I am sure we all hope that it proceeds constructively to do the work assigned to it. On Sunday, however, during the Cross-Country Checkup program broadcast by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Chairman of the Citizens' Forum, Mr. Keith Spicer, volunteered some interesting views regarding his new mandate.

As a long-time Senate abolitionist, he reiterated his position regarding this assembly by saying that he had not changed his views at all, that he thinks the Senate should be abolished. He said, as well, that the commissioners would not be interested in speaking to members of the old-line parties. Rather, he said they would be interested in speaking to members of the Reform Party and allegedly new groups of that kind.

Are we to assume from Mr. Spicer's statements that this represents part of the mandate given to him by the Prime Minister? Most of the members of the Reform Party are disenchanted Conservatives. The question then becomes: Are disenchanted Conservatives the only ones who are going to have an opportunity to put their views before the commission that is being established?

It seems to me, and I hope that the Leader of the Government can clarify the situation that Mr. Spicer has demonstrated a disturbing naivete, to say the least. I did not think that being involved in public life for a considerable number of years and serving as a member of the Senate, as have many colleagues in all corners of this house, disqualified anyone from being able to contribute to the dialogue on the future of Canada. I want to ask the Leader of the Government whether there is going to be any opportunity at all for senators and members of the House of Commons at least to submit their views in written form to Mr. Spicer and his commissioners.

In my view, it is a healthy exercise to enable citizens from all provinces to be heard in as great a number as possible. However, I do not think it is fair and realistic to adopt the position that those who have made a lifetime vocation out of attempting to serve the people of this country in one of the assemblies, whether it be a provincial legislature, the House of Commons or the Senate, that they should thereby be disbarred from having their views considered by the commission.

• (1630)

In that connection, the Reform Party in the west and other so-called third parties represent not a new phenomenon in Canadian politics but an old phenomenon in a new form. Therefore, Mr. Spicer and his colleagues, being people of inquiring and open minds, would be very interested to discuss with members of that party the grievances unmet, or the objectives unattained, that have led them to form new political parties, whether in the west, in Quebec, or wherever. There is no intention to exclude politicians, serving members of Parliament, from taking part in the process. Indeed, it is encouraged.

I repeat, however, that we want to give centre stage to ordinary Canadians so that they may have their say about the future of their country.

Senator Perrault: As a supplementary, I fully support your expressed view that "ordinary Canadians" should be heard. No Canadian is really ordinary, but I know what the government leader is saying. I think that to single out one party and say that commissioners will be interested in hearing from the Reform Party but not from Conservatives or Liberals because they are so-called "old-line" parties is a bit naive. I believe there are many people in this assembly, sitting on both sides of the chamber, who have some constructive ideas about the future of this country. It disturbs me to think that somehow priority will be given to such so-called "new groups" as the bloc populaire and the Reform Party, and that somehow opinions expressed by others associated with other parties are second rate or irrelevant. I hope we can construe from his reply that the Honourable Leader that the Government in this place shares that view.

Hon. George van Roggen: I have a supplementary question to Senator Perrault's question. As an aside, I might say that the government will rue the day it appointed this particular gentleman as chairman of this commission. However, that is not my question.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate have a view on whether or not Mr. Spicer's reference to old-line parties would include the NDP, or is that a new-line party?

Senator Murray: I would not have the faintest idea; but to take up the point made by Senator Perrault earlier, there will be opportunity not just for disenchanted Conservatives, but also for disenchanted Liberals, although there will not be time to hear from them all.

Senator Perrault: Presumably only so long as they go under a new title. If they are a so-called "new group," would that be acceptable to Mr. Spicer? I am concerned that the attitude is almost one of: "Don't confuse me with the facts, my mind is made up." All options should be open to this committee, even with relation to the Senate. Mr. Spicer should not be saying that he still thinks the Senate should be abolished, but he should approach all options with an open mind. One wonders how open it is.

Senator Murray: We are not seeking from the panel of Mr. Spicer and his colleagues a model for a reformed Senate. We are not seeking from them recommendations as to future amendments to the Constitution. We are sending them out to encourage and conduct a dialogue among Canadians as to the values they hold in common and the kind of country they want to see this country become.

What we expect in the report from Mr. Spicer and his colleagues is a summary of their findings as to where a consensus may lie in this country, what divisions have yet to be bridged, and whether in a conceptual sense there are ways in which these divisions among Canadians can be overcome.

Senator van Roggen: Does the Leader of the Government really suggest that a commission needs to travel across the country to hear the views of individual Canadians just on the nature of a Canada they would liketo see? I would suggest that you do not need a commission of this nature, which will run into millions of dollars, simply to find out what Canadians want. If you had a consensus from 26 million people, you would find that they would like a country that is united, peaceful, prosperous and democratic. Beyond that you get down to technicalities, not generalities.

Senator Murray: I invite my honourable friend to read the speech that the Right Honourable the Prime Minister made in the other place, and the terms of reference that have been issued for this Citizens' Forum.

Let me give some examples of the areas where we think consensus is lacking and where in this country we must try to build that consensus. First is the relationship between Aboriginal Canadians and other Canadians. We think it is quite important that there be a dialogue among Canadians, Aboriginals and others, about their attitudes and aspirations. A consensus is lacking on this subject, and nowhere more so than in my honourable friend's province and other provinces where a majority of Aboriginal peoples live.

A second example is the various competing, if not conflicting, elements in Canadian society, the concept of individual rights versus collective rights.

A third example is the relationship between the French and English-speaking people of this country.

A fourth example is the policy of multiculturalism and how it is reconciled with the desire for national unity.

Another example is whether our institutions, parliamentary institutions in particular, are serving all of Canada as well as they might, and whether there are structural changes that should be made in them.

There is a whole list of very important areas on which it is necessary that Canadians confront some rather difficult questions, and on which the Citizens' Forum, by encouraging dialogue, try to achieve consensus on these questions before we can talk about future constitutional amendments or reform of our institutions.

Senator van Roggen: I am sure we all wish them luck.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

OKA CRISIS—ROYAL COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not want to stray too far from questions raised by Senator Perrault, but last summer was rather long and hot for a number of us, especially those of us in the Indian community. The Oka crisis was on the minds of many Canadians and in our province of British Columbia there were many roadblocks formed by our people in sympathy with what happened at Oka.

If I recall correctly, in his speech in the Commons on September 25 the Prime Minister referred to a royal commission of inquiry. I heard him talk about a royal commission in other interviews, as well as a commission of inquiry into what happened at Oka. Personally, I support both.

There must be an inquiry into what went on at Oka specifically, and, in order to deal with the overall question, there should be a royal commission of inquiry, something which is supported by many people in our community, and by people like Max Yalden and others who have been talking about it for some years.

Where do these matters stand? Is there the possibility of an inquiry into Oka and is the idea of a royal commission still being considered by the government? Will there be an announcement about a royal commission of inquiry into the whole question of Aboriginal interests in the country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): With regard to Oka, I will have to inquire into the situation and the circumstances that led up to it. I will have to inform myself as to the state of play in that matter.

With regard to a royal commission into aboriginal matters generally, we could not exclude that possibility at all. For the moment, we want to give the Citizens' Forum an opportunity to get up and running.

My friend will know that, in the terms of reference, the first area of inquiry listed is the relationship between Aboriginal peoples and the rest of Canadian society. That is for a very good reason.

There is no question more important or urgent, and none with more history, on which the Citizens' Forum must hold a proper dialogue among Canadians. Consensus is lacking. We want to give the Citizens' Forum an opportunity to make some headway. However, I do not exclude at all the possibility of appointing a royal commission into Aboriginal matters generally. The only thing that is on hold is an actual constitutional amendment, for reasons that the honourable senators and others understand.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I am sure the Leader of the Government can understand the position taken by some leaders of the Assembly of First Nations when they say they are not too excited about this latest citizens' group which has been appointed. There have been full-fledged constitutional conferences from which nothing has really come. We had the Meech Lake Accord and the fiasco that developed there.

They are really saying, I guess, that they are not very excited about again making their positions known in front of this inquiry. I am hoping it will be resolved before too long but I am sure you can understand why they are saying that. The constitutional positions they have put forward have been really clear. They have been consistent in putting forward the amendments they wanted in the Constitution.

A royal commission is a whole different ball game. It relates to a lot of other issues. The AFN has put forward some positions saying that perhaps only economic and social issues should be looked into. Other groups say other things. Personally, I favour a full-fledged royal commission of inquiry that covers the whole field. Nothing should be left out.

I would hope that the result of such a commission would be a whole new beginning, a whole new approach, a whole new leaf turned in the life of our people and their relationship with each other, the government and other Canadians. That is how I see a royal commission of inquiry. It should be that complete and comprehensive.

As well, I was rather hopeful that the standing committee concerned in the other place would have started its inquiry according to the agreement made over there. I welcomed it. I thought it was a good opportunity. I think it is most important that we not wait too long before a complete public record of what went on at Oka is established. If the other place is not going to do it, then I hope the Leader of the Government might support the idea that our Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples do that work. We have the talent in this place. We have the commitment. We have the machinery. We can do the job.

I want to impress upon the Leader of the Government most strongly that it is absolutely urgent and important that we have a public record of what went on last summer at Oka.

Senator Murray: Again, honourable senators, I will make inquiries among my colleagues in the other place as to the state of play of that matter.

With regard to the other matters raised, the honourable senator correctly points out that the constitutional positions and aspirations of the Aboriginal peoples are well known, at least to governments. There is, however, as Mr. Spicer said the other night on the program to which Senator Perrault referred, enormous ignorance in the country about many more fundamental matters touching the Aboriginal peoples. Constitutional conferences failed. I attended some of them. It is easy to say that they failed for lack of political leadership, but at the end of the day it has to be recognized that they also failed because there is not a consensus in this country as to how these matters should be dealt with. I would hope that the Aboriginal peoples themselves, as well as their leaders, would look upon the Citizens' Forum as a real opportunity to overcome the depths of ignorance that still exists in this country on some of those issues.

We do not preclude for a moment the possibility of going ahead with a royal commission in the future. We do want to give the Citizens' Forum an opportunity to get up and be running and to try, by means of public dialogue, to identify a consensus on those issues. Meanwhile, as the Prime Minister pointed out in his speech of, I believe, September 25, we are moving ahead on a number of fronts.

The honourable senator is aware that hitherto the government would agree to deal with only six comprehensive land claims at a time. We have taken that ceiling off. That is an important step. We are putting more resources into the negotiation of specific land claims. We are discussing with the Aboriginal leadership how we can accelerate that process.

Mr. Siddon has been speaking to Premier Devine over the last few days about treaty lands. The honourable senator is aware of the situation which has recently shown some hope for improvement in the attitude of the government of British Columbia. There are Indian-run child welfare agencies in parts of the country. We are going to extend those to the rest of the country, including British Columbia.

It should not be thought that, pending the activities of the Citizens' Forum, or some future royal commission, we are marking time. We are not. We are trying to move ahead on a very broad front.

CITIZENS' FORUM

REPORT OF COMMISSION—INADEQUATE TIMETABLE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: May I ask a supplementary question concerning the Citizens' Forum?

I notice that in his statement in the other place on November 1, Mr. Mulroney said that Mr. Spicer will report to the government on the forum's findings by next June 30. There has been a good deal of talk about consensus, and I guess we all agree that consensus is a desirable thing. The Leader of the Government has indicated that consensus is desirable on a wide range of topics. I wonder if the government is not being too optimistic in thinking that a satisfactory level of consensus on this wide range of topics can be achieved by June 30, 1991.

I suggest to him that in this kind of discussion there are at least two phases. The first is a period when different groups define and clarify their stands. After that has been done on any one topic of disagreement, there are modifications and adjustments.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether there is not a real danger, given the short time made available to the forum, that only the first of the two phases will be accomplished and perhaps only on one or two of the topics—that is, that there will be a definition and clarification, and indeed a hardening of positions; and that adequate time is not being allowed, at least as the forum's work is now anticipated, for the other phase, namely adjustment and modification.

• (1650)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator is correct. One of the risks run in an exercise of this kind is that positions will harden, or the dialogue will become so harsh and bitter that in the search for a consensus we lose rather than gain ground. One of the other dangers is that the whole exercise could be taken over by special interest groups.

These are the risks that we run. Let me repeat: We hope that in the process of dialogue and exchange of views the views of all sides will become better known and better appreciated.

At the same time, Canadians must decide, at the outset, whether they still want a country, whether they still want to live together and whether they are prepared to make the accommodations that are necessary to do that, because we all know that there will need to be accommodations on all sides if we are to have any future at all in this country.

We are vesting in this Citizens' Forum a task which is fraught with all kinds of danger, as Mr. Spicer has pointed out, but which is essential to our future. We do not expect that the Citizens' Forum will be able to report that there is a consensus on the wide range of topics that I mentioned. We hope, however, that the forum will be able to report that there has been such a clarification of views, and such an improved understanding of positions that there will be the making of a consensus and that, most of all, Canadians are determined to live together in one country and are prepared to make the accommodations that are necessary. That, in itself, would be a tremendous educational achievement on the part of the Citizens' Forum.

ATTITUDE OF CHAIRMAN—DIRECTION OF COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I know that many people have a great many questions concerning this very important matter. However, I would like to ask if the chairman of the commission runs the commission. Is he a dictator? Does he decide whom the forum will hear? Does he decide who will present their views?

It was my understanding that the purpose of this forum was to listen to what the Canadian people had to say, and report back to the government, not to go around saying, "We will not hear this one or that one. We will decide whom we will hear."

The second point I would like to make is that I understand the Indian leaders are not too anxious to come at all, because Senator Murray has said that it is futile for them to bring their particular issues forward. Yet one of the things that this forum is supposed to do is find out how the Aboriginal peoples feel about the rest of us.

Senator Murray says that it is futile to examine native issues while this national unity debate is continuing. So the Vice-Chairman of the Assembly of First Nations says, "There is no point in us appearing."

I understand also that Mr. Spicer has said that the first meeting will be held in Tuktoyaktuk, but that the only one to go there will be himself. Were all of these other great Canadians who are on this forum consulted? Again, who is running this commission? Is Mr. Spicer a dictator, or is he under orders from the Prime Minister? Is he consulting with the members of this forum and deciding that three or four of them should go to Tuktoyaktuk to hear the views of these people?

Is there any limit to the expenses that this forum may incur, or do they have an open-ended account? Does the Treasury Board say, "Go and spend the money and we will cover the costs"?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: How much are you prepared to spend to save Canada?

Senator Bonnell: If it will save Canada, I will invest quite a bit. But if the government could not save Canada, I do not think this forum can do it. I think there are a lot of questions to be answered. Who is running the show? Who is deciding who is to be heard? Will they go out and dictate to the people what they would like to hear? If they do not intend to listen to the people, they should stay home.

With regard to the commission itself, Mr. Spicer and his colleagues will be holding hearings in various parts of the country and will be encouraging Canadians to come together for the purposes that I have indicated.

With regard to the Aboriginal peoples, I replied in a previous question to Senator Marchand that the only thing that is on hold is a constitutional amendment, and it would indeed be futile to pursue a constitutional amendment under the present circumstances. I have also told Senator Marchand and the Senate a moment ago that we do not preclude the possibility of a royal commission on Aboriginal affairs, and we are moving forward in a broad front as a government regarding land claims and other matters of interest to the aboriginal people. The quotation that the honourable senator refers to is totally out of context and it does not really represent the views that I have just restated in my reply to Senator Marchand.

Senator Bonnell: Why do you not put a press release out and say, "I made a mistake. I did not mean that it is futile for the native people to be heard, and I invite the native people to appear before the commission. I am not just another one who is telling the commission whom they should hear and whom they should not hear."

Why don't you, as a member of the government, back off and let the commission decide whom they want to hear. Just do not tell the native people that it is futile for them to be heard.

Another thing: Do you have an Inuit person on that commission to listen to the views of the native people? If there is a native person on that board, he or she certainly would know how the Indian people relate with other Canadian people. So you should back off and put an apology in the newspaper to make it clear that you never meant to say that their attendance at the hearings of the commission would be futile, and that you are prepared to let the native people be heard.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it happens that there is a native leader on the Citizens' Forum panel, but again, this is not a dialogue among members of the panel. What we are trying to do is provide an opportunity for ordinary Canadians to express their views as to the future of this country. As for senators and Members of Parliament, they have, as I said to Senator Perrault earlier, a platform of their own from which to speak: That is to say, the Senate or the House of Commons or the provincial legislatures or whatever.

In the case of Senator Bonnell, when the panel or some representatives of it come to Summerside, I am sure that he would have every opportunity to appear there and that might be an occasion that he could use, belatedly, to express his views on the fixed link.

COPYRIGHT ACT

IMPLEMENTATION OF SECOND PHASE—EDUCATION EXEMPTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: The Honourable Flora MacDonald, the then Minister of Communications, in speaking to us about the copyright bill, gave us her assurance that the education exemptions which were being discussed, and which she said were already drafted, would be brought in. That is three years ago. In the meantime, because the copyright bill was passed on the understanding that those amendments would be brought in, all educational institutions, as I have said before many times in this chamber, are really suffering from the significant limitations put on them. We were assured once again that phase two of the copyright amendments would be brought in this year. They have not been brought in. In fact, in correspondence and telephone calls over the last three weeks, I have heard many different things:

● (1700)

My question is to the Leader of the Government. I ask if he would please inform this chamber if he has any sure knowledge on this question. First of all, as background, I have received a number of letters, especially from universities and colleges, who were really feeling the cost of having to deal with those provisions of the Copyright Act which, as you know, provide no exemption for legitimate educational uses, or even illegitimate ones, for that matter. There is a rumour that phase two will be broken into two parts, that whatever is to be in phase two may come in small bites. I would like to know whether that is true or not. There is a rumour, a very widespread one, subsequent to meetings held in the recent past, that the minister is no longer entertaining the education exemptions to which he had already committed himself in writing in letters to members of the educational community. There is a rumour that while those education exemptions may still come in, there may be costs attached to them so they will not, in fact, be exemptions at all. I wonder if the Leader of the Government is in a position to confirm or deny any of these rumours, and if he is not, what is the earliest date, on which he can provide some information to this chamber which has quite a number of people who have direct interest in this matter.

CITIZENS' FORUM

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—NORTHERN REPRESENTATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question on the Citizens' Forum. I am just wondering if we are seeing a repeat of the Meech Lake Accord process here, or is it the case that there was no one around from the north when the committee was being made up, and here we go again! We now have the committee made up to go and find out what Canadians think. It would appear that those who live below the Sixtieth Parallel can be members of that committee. Why have you again neglected the people of the north? Why is there not one northerner on that commission? After the Meech Lake fiasco—you found out at that time that Canadians north of the Sixtieth Parallel do count—why could you not, this one time, do something right? Why couldn't you put someone from the north on the commission?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the panel itself is not in the form of a traditional royal commission. We did not try to appoint a panel that could begin to be fully representative of all parts of Canada and of all facets of Canadian society. The important thing is that the exercise, the Citizens' Forum, gives Canadians everywhere in Canada and of all backgrounds an opportunity to express their views and to exchange views with other Canadians about how they see the future of Canada. That is the purpose of the forum, and no significance should be attached to the fact that various geographical ethnic or language groups may not be represented on the panel. The panel was not intended to be representative in that sense.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, that is exactly the opposite of the truth. The fact is that the representatives on the panel come from Eastern Canada, Western Canada, Ontario, Quebec, the Prairie Provinces. They come from all the different regions. We have an aboriginal person on the panel and you are bragging about that token aboriginal. The Prime Minister yesterday was telling some lady in Toronto from the Italian community, "Oh gee, we forgot to put an Italian on; maybe we will put somebody on from one of those communities." What you are saying is exactly the opposite of the truth. The committee is made up of people from different parts of Canada representing different cultures, and that is the way it is supposed to be made up. The only problem is that you stopped short again. You stopped at the Sixtieth parallel. For God's sake, don't you know there is a north in this country!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would have thought that the honourable senator would take some satisfaction from the fact that the panel is not stopping at the sixtieth. It is going north of the sixtieth for its very first series of meetings. Second, I regret very much the manner in which the honourable senator speaks of the "token" aboriginal on the panel. That person is there because of the personal qualities and background she brings to the task. And what his question suggests is that what he is looking for is a token northerner.

Senator Lucier: Senators, here we go again. I know who the token aboriginal on the committee is. I was repeating what you were saying to Senator Marchand. The aboriginal lady who is on the committee is a very qualified, very intelligent, strong representative and I welcome her to the committee.

Senator Murray: You are changing your tone.

Senator Lucier: Why don't you just sit down and be quiet for a minute and listen. You might learn something. You are trying to suggest now that sending Keith Spicer to Tuktoyaktuk should really satisfy the people of the north. Well, I am going to tell you, it is not going to satisfy them, and I am telling you that you are back on the road to making the same damn stupid mistake that you made the last time. You ignore the north, and then you send somebody up there and you say, "By the way, what do you think? Send us your information down south of the border and let us know what you are thinking." This is just a continuation of the stupidity that we have seen from this government since they have been in power.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, by the time this exercise is over, the honourable senator will be trying to pretend that he thought of it.

Senator Lucier: That will be the day! I would like to say, honourable senators, that if I had thought of it—and I did not—it would have been structured a little bit differently. It would have represented all areas of Canada. I am not at all surprised that the minister, who is supposedly the Minister of Federal/Provincial Relations, who is supposed to consider the north when commissions of this type are put together, who is supposed to represent us, does not have the slightest idea what we are all about and has no interest in us. He has shown us this before.

COMMITMENT TO EASE EFFECT ON READING MATERIAL—STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in the course of the debate yesterday on the GST, some comments were made to the effect—and I don't have the precise quotes in front of me, but I think in this context loose quotes are sufficient to understand what I am coming to—comments were made to the effect that, "Oh, by golly, we never seriously looked at the effects the tax is going to have on reading material," and as the Prime Minister said in Burnaby, when someone told him that the tax would apply to the Bible, he reacted by saying something, "Oh no, we can't have that. We will have to have another look at it." Honourable senators opposite, I believe, in the course of debate yesterday said that much. "We have to have the bill go through as is, but come the new year or after the bill is in place, we will do something to get rid of the tax on reading material." The Prime Minister, I am told, said that on the tube last night or on a hotline. Now if anything is confusing the public mind at this stage, it is these pronouncements by government spokespersons, statements by senators who say, "In principle, we are opposed to the tax on reading material, but we are going to follow the party line".

Does the government expect people in the business of selling printed material to go through the expense of setting up—if this tax is eventually given royal assent—the necessary cash registers,et cetera, only to be told by the government that they will be taken care of next year during the course of a budget speech or through changes to the regulations? The government is sending two messages. On the one hand it says that the GST is going to apply January 1; on the other hand, it is starting to leak out the rule of exception, starting with printed material. The government also says it is going to do the same for other sectors. The government is seeding confusion in the business community, which is getting very mad at the government. I am receiving calls to that effect. People want you to stop this nonsense and axe the tax.

Senator Corbin: I got it from your side.

Senator Murray: Let me clear up the confusion in the honourable senator's mind. The government has made no commitment whatsoever to change any particular provision of that legislation at any particular time. The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and others have pointed out that there is a budget in this country every spring. At that time, the government takes the occasion to examine the impact of all of its tax measures on the Canadian people and, as a result, makes timely and necessary changes.

With respect to the tax on books, the honourable senator has referred to the statement of the Prime Minister in Burnaby; and, yes, that is one area of concern.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Do it right now! We will help you do it right now!

Senator Murray: If my honourable friends had not abandoned the technique of pre study, we might have had an opportunity many months ago—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: —to look at possible improvements in that entire bill. But my friends abandoned that practice in favour of confrontation. There is no commitment on the part of the government to make any particular change to Bill C-62 at any particular time. However, we make the commitment that the impact of this tax will be monitored throughout its implementation. We have a budget every year, at which time there will be ample opportunity for us to make whatever changes are desirable.

Hon. Jearahmiel S. Grafstein: I have a follow-up question to that last comment by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. All of us watched the Prime Minister last week on television respond to a student from the University of British Columbia. I do not have the exact text of his comments, but, as I recall, the student asked whether or not the Prime Minister was still prepared to tax knowledge or books, which are the implements of a student. In response to that student's question, the Prime Minister said "Not to worry," or words to that effect, "Not only does the government understand your concerns, but it will resolve your concerns", leaving the student, and certainly the television audience, with the clear impression that the Prime Minister intended to resolve the student's problems. The logical conclusion from that would be that the Prime Minister was going to withdraw or at least ameliorate those tax measures under the GST that cover books and other costs that a student has to pay by the new tax. That was the clear implication of his statement. Subsequently the Prime Minister was asked questions in the House of Commons, and Mr. Wilson moved off that position and said that the government would respond to those concerns in the next budget or at some future time.

If the Prime Minister made that moral commitment to the students of Canada, why does he wait until next spring? Why can the Government of Canada not decide in the next 60 minutes to delete the tax provision, satisfy the concerns of aroused students across the country, and fulfil the Prime Minister's moral commitment to that student and all students?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not now have in front of me the full text of what the Prime Minister said in Burnaby. I suggest a reading of that would support the interpretation I gave earlier; namely, that there is no commitment to make a particular change at a particular time, but that these matters will be monitored during the implementation of the tax, and we will have an opportunity to make the necessary improvements at budget time.

An Hon. Senator: Why not do it now?

Senator Grafstein: If I misquoted the Prime Minister, perhaps the record could be corrected if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would table the transcript of the Prime Minister's comments. I was certainly left with the impression, as were others on this side, that he was going to deal with the concerns of that student who raised the question of the GST as it applies to books.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what I was referring to was a full newspaper account, which I read yesterday. There may also be a verbatim transcript. If there is, I will make it available to my honourable friends.

Senator Grafstein: To help the Leader of the Government, I am referring to the transcript of what the Prime Minister said on television, either CTV or CBC, when he was at the University of British Columbia. That is the transcript I am alluding to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Charles Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto (Bill C-44, Chapter 41, 1990)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1730)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the business before us, it is my understanding that we will hold a vote at 5.45 p.m.

Some Hon. Senators: Ring the bells.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: As whip, I have certain questions to raise. My understanding is that the vote will be called at 5.45 p.m., and then there will be a bell.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is right.

Senator Phillips: I think it is essential for both whips to know that when we defer a vote from one sitting to the next, it is at 5.45 p.m. as stipulated in the rules. It is not 5.30 or any other time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: It has been earlier in the past.

Senator Phillips: It is not Senator Frith's rule, it is from the provisional rules which stipulate 5.45 p.m. for the vote. Subsequently there is, subject to the whips' approval, a 30-minute bell.

I would ask that rather than having the bells begin ringing now, we wait until 5.45 p.m. That is according to the rules.

Senator Frith: Hon. Senators, I want the record to show how delighted I am to hear that Senator Phillips has finally repented and wants to observe the rules.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Senator Phillips: I feel I have always observed the rules.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: You told us that it is not the rules that count, it is the Speaker who counts.

Senator Phillips: My honourable friend opposite is saying that I have not observed the rules. I think I have done a hell of a lot better at observing the rules than Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: I know you think that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I had a couple of questions that I did not have the opportunity to ask. I see that the Leader of the Government is not here, but would the deputy leader take one or two questions as notice?

Senator Barootes: Now it is Delayed Answers to Oral Questions.

Senator Olson: We need an opportunity not so much for hearlin delayed answers as for asking questions.

Senator Doody: I thought we had proceeded to Orders of the Day. I thought the first order had been called.

AGRICULTURE

MAJOR SALE BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. H.A. Olson: I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to ask the leader to advise the House whether or not there has been a major wheat sale by the Canadian Wheat Board in the last few days? The papers are full of rumours that it has been made, but there has been no confirmation. Farmers of western Canada would like to know whether this is true, or whether it is just a rumour mill.

Senator Doody: I assume there is general consensus that we revert to Question Period, in which event, I will take your question as notice and try to find some information.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF MANUFACTURERS' SALES TAX

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: My question is directed to the Deputy Leader of the Government. The Prime Minister was on television last night and appeared to be in good form. In one of his answers he condemned the manufacturers' sales tax as one of the most iniquitous provisions in this country. He said it was wrong and had hampered Canadian trade. Why did the government boost the tax three times since 1986 if it was doing that much damage to the Canadian economy?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I suspect they needed the revenue to cover that amazing deficit the honourable gentleman's party left behind.

Senator Perrault: It was not the iniquitous tax that the Prime Minister described in his rare appearance on the open line show.

Senator Doody: It is a terrible tax, as most taxes are.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to Rule 12, I must leave the Chair, to return at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before Your Honour does so, I would again note—

Senator Barootes: Do you mind?

Senator Frith: Yes, I mind. If the eight senators—

Senator Simard: You can have all the moral victories! You had better get used to it.

Senator Frith: I can wait.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Frith: If the eight senators, whose qualifications are in doubt—in fact, we say they are unqualified—had not voted and if the Speaker had not voted, the result of the count would have been 51 in favour of the amendment, 46 against, and reading material would not be taxed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this order stands in my name, but I yield to Senator Hays.

Hon. Dan Hays: Thank you, Senator Doody. Pursuant to the special order, on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition, Senator MacEachen, I move:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make provision for electricity and heating fuels by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:
> "ELECTRICITY AND HEATING FUELS
> 1. A supply of electricity and heating fuels."

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hays, for the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make provision for electricity and heating fuels by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:
> 1. A supply of electricity and heating fuels."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure for me, to address you on this proposed amendment. I should like to start by explaining its effect. The effect of the amendment is to amend Bill C-62 by adding to the definition of those goods or services which constitute zero-rated supply. Zero-rated supply is defined in the bill at page 36. The amendment, of course, is achieved by adding to the end of the second-last schedule, as the bill is now drafted, a new heading and a new item, namely the goods described, which are electricity and heating fuels.

I think it is clear as to what is meant by the supply of electricity. As to heating fuels, perhaps that is not quite so clear. As I envisage it, heating fuels would include furnace oil, natural gas, propane and wood for heating.

The goods and services tax, as we know, is a transaction-based tax. What attracts the tax is the transaction, and the effect of this amendment would be to make the supplier of these goods a person selling a zero-rated commodity or good and, accordingly, no tax would be attracted. The supplier of the zero-rated good is, of course, entitled to tax input credits, which are extremely important to the concept of Bill C-62 and the goods and services tax.

I think that perhaps a few words about the effect on industrial users of these commodities would be in order. The industrial user who sells a good or service which is taxable would, as Bill C-62 is now drafted, pay seven per cent on, let us say, electricity, but would then be entitled to an input tax credit and would recover that. The tax would then be borne by the ultimate consumer. This amendment would have the effect of removing that from the chain of transactions, and would essentially make no difference to the industries involved. In other words, they would not pay the tax and they would not be entitled to claim it back as an input tax credit.

As a matter of further interest, however, there are some exceptions to the rule of its not having a major effect on an industrial user of these commodities. Some industries would be affected differently, and they would be producers of a good or a service that would be subject to a tax-exempt transaction. As we all know, tax-exempt is about the worst thing possible, because you sell the good or service as a tax-exempt good or service but you are not entitled to claim the input tax credit. Accordingly, those people would benefit by this amendment, because there would be no amount payable on using, say, electricity as the particular input. An example would be a lessor of a residential property, or a municipal government authority such as, for instance, a transit authority. Interestingly enough, about the only example I can envisage where this amendment would be of benefit beyond the normal use of the good, be it electricity or heating fuel, would be in the case of a transit authority that uses electricity as a motive fuel. Honourable senators may feel that perhaps this should be taxed. However, I think there is a very good argument why the tax should not apply to electricity, because most subway systems or light-rail transit systems with which I am familiar receive heavy subsidies, and the effect of their paying the additional tax would simply mean that the authorities that now subsidize them, which mainly are the municipal authorities, would simply be more heavily burdened and more problems would arise, as with the tax-exempt sector, in terms of how they recover their additional costs.

That, then, is my attempt to explain briefly the proposed amendment and how the legislation would be changed by accepting it. I should now like to turn to the issue of why this amendment is proposed. What is the main reason for this? What motivates us on this side to propose such an amendment? Well, honourable senators, the motivator is that if we are to have this tax, then surely it should remain true to the principles the government stated would be observed in implementing the legislation, one of which was that it would not be a tax on necessities. The examples of necessities that have been dealt with effectively in the legislation are such things as basic groceries, prescription drugs and certain medical devices.

There is in the legislation preferential treatment for housing. For example, rents are tax-exempt, which, as I earlier touched on briefly, is not necessarily all that easy for the lessor to deal with. The lessor will pay the goods and services tax, but, upon entering into a tax-exempt transaction in the case of a residential lease, will not be entitled to pass the tax on, and so must recover the additional costs in extraordinary ways such as by increasing the rent, and sometimes that is difficult. I happened to be sitting in the committee when we heard of a difficult case in Edmonton, where the medical profession was having quite a lot of difficulty with that problem. In addition, on the subject of housing, used housing is not taxed and new housing is taxed at seven per cent minus a 2.5 per cent rebate where the value of the home is under $350,000.

Other examples of recognized necessities are day care, medical services, and—a striking example—water and water services, which I hope will become evident from my comments this evening.

The other argument in favour of this amendment is that it avoids the imposition of a tax that middle- and low-income people will find difficult to bear, particularly as it will raise the price of electricity. According to the Consumer Information Office, which is sometimes characterized as the "GST Watchdog," the increase in the price of electricity as a result of the imposition of the GST will be approximately 6.6 per cent.

As I envisage it in the proposed amendment, furnace oil, which is one of the heating fuels, would rise by something like 5.7 per cent. The difference between 7 per cent and the numbers I am quoting is the withdrawal of the manufacturers' sales tax. In these areas there is not much difference. In some areas it can be argued validly that the 7 per cent goods and services tax net is not all that great, but in this particular area that argument does not apply. According to the Consumer Information Office, in net terms it is 6.6 per cent in the case of electricity and 5.7 per cent in the case of furnace oil.

It will be extremely unfair on people with lower and middle incomes. Using 1986 Census figures, it is clearly illustrated that a person whose income is $10,000 to $15,000 spends 5.6 per cent of his or her income directly on electricity. A person earning $20,000 to $25,000 spends 3.5 per cent directly on electricity. Those who earn $60,000 or more spend 1.8 per cent of their income on electricity. There is no more classic illustration than that of the regressivity of the tax and how it will fall more heavily on lower-income Canadians than on those who are fortunate enough to be in the higher income bracket.

Heat supplied by electricity or fuel is a necessity in Canada. Spending a short time outdoors today was sufficient evidence that there is absolutely no question but heat is an absolute necessity. Water is a classic example of a situation where the government has recognized that. The same right to acquire basic groceries and prescription drugs without extraordinary burdens should apply to the right to purchase utilities necessary to heat one's home.

Later I wish to address the point that high energy prices encourage conservation and therefore a tax on energy is not a bad thing.

I wish to reinforce some of the points I have made by quoting from a presentation that was made to the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee on June 27, 1990. On page 48:8 of Issue No. 48, Mr. Hueston, a representative of the Municipal Electric Association of Ontario, stated:

> It is the MEA's (Municipal Electric Association's) position that electricity should not be taxed throughout the distribution chain. We feel that it is as vital to our economic growth and standard of living as water, which has been exempted.
> I recently had the opportunity to attend the American Public Power Association's annual meeting where Congressman Peter A. Defazio, a member of the Water and Power Resources Subcommittee of Public Works and Transporation Committee, referred to electricity as, and I quote, "Not nice to have but an absolute necessary contingent part of our modern way of life."
> Interestingly enough, almost half of our members also deliver water and are having great difficulty in understanding the distinction. Not only would this inconsistent policy introduce burdensome administrative procedures for these utilities, but it would directly contradict the government's stated objectives of minimizing pro-rating.

In terms of the goods and services tax, pro-rating is required of a taxpayer who provides both exempt and fully taxable goods or services and the obligation to allocate costs that relate to each of those types of goods or services as between them. There could be a third category which would be for a good or service that results in a zero-rated transaction. If ever there was a call for simplicity to avoid problems, and the government recognizes it by having it as an objective, this would be a situation where a strong argument could be made not only on the grounds that I have made but also on the grounds of complexity. As we are all too familiar, that is one of the great drawbacks of this legislation.

As an aside, I spent the weekend at home and I learned of the 15 members of the Department of Justice in Edmonton, six of whom are assigned to handle litigation which will result from the goods and services tax. I was also told that they will probably be overworked and used, as an indicator of this situation in Great Britain, where there are some 200 reported cases a month on problems associated with the value-added tax.

In any event, Mr. Hueston further stated:

> What baffles the MEA and its membership even more is why electricity distribution is not considered part of the "mush" sector; i.e., municipal, university, school, and hospital. The fact is that in some of our smaller municipalities the council is the utility commission.
> Like water distribution, the electrical distribution system actively develops and maintains the municipal infrastructure. It is an integral part of the municipal government system. And unlike other utility services, electricity in Ontario is supplied by local or provincial levels of government, as it is in most of Canada. Members are likely aware that there are a few exceptions in Alberta, P.E.I. and Newfoundland, et cetera.
> Electricity, like water, is an important service and is treated as such in various pieces of legislation. Its usages are numerous and go far beyond the more limited applications of alternative fuel. It is certainly as vital a service as municipal transit, which has also been exempted.
> In short, we do not believe there is any valid policy justification for treating electricity differently from water supplies, municipal transit or any other exempted standard municipal services.
> Electricity has been exempted since the manufacturers' tax was introduced early this century. This exemption clearly shows that the federal government has always recognized the importance of electricity to Canadians and to our industrial sector.

I will not read it, but there then follows an exchange between the chairman, the witness, and Senator Poitras which illustrates that has not been the case in the last two years and that the manufacturers' sales tax now applies to the electrical sector. There has been no evidence in terms of statistical information because no new power facilities of any consequence, to which the manufacturers' sales tax would apply, have been constructed in the recent period.

I will continue with a few more words from Mr. Hueston:

> The government wants to tax electricity, yet our municipal electric commissions do not benefit from tax dollars. They are, by law, non-profit, public sector suppliers who must operate on a break-even, non-profit basis. All costs are recovered by rates. Funds raised may not be used for other purposes.

● (2020)

> Our consultant's review of Statistics Canada data shows that removing the federal sales tax from manufactured goods used in producing and distributing electricity would reduce the impact by only about one per cent. As mentioned, the GST would mean high-rising administrative costs for our members, and it would be their customers who would ultimately bear this cost. For example:
> One advisor suggested that a small utility, with two persons handling accounting and billing, would likely need to hire a third person;
> It appears that the MEA would have to charge goods and services tax on all or most of our services, many of which are really just cooperative money saving efforts by our members. While members would be able to offset the direct tax impact against the tax they collect, there would be needless, costly administration involved at both the collective and individual level. Again, the customers would pay for that;
> And the GST could discourage such cooperative efforts, like large utilities preparing and mailing invoices for smaller utilities; developing of industry standards and guidelines through membership in the MEA, and jointly run training and educational programs.
> There are still further ramifications. Because electricity has traditionally been tax free, subjecting it to the GST means it would carry a disproportionate amount of the GST tax burden.

Later on he said:

> In closing, we would like the Senate to note that in many of the European countries with the value-added tax system, electricity is afforded special treatment. In the United Kingdom and Ireland, electricity is zero-rated, while others like Norway, Sweden, Portugal and Belgium offer reduced rates.

That is about as good an illustration as can be found on why electricity should be zero-rated. I submit that these arguments apply equally to heating fuels. I shall not relate heating fuels to specific witnesses or instances as I have done with electricity. However, I have thought about it, and, for the most part, electricity and heating fuels are used for the same purpose, that is, as a source of energy for space heating, and to drive equipment, and so on.

One of the MEA members, the Halton Hills Hydro, wrote a letter to its customers. It is from the Commissioners of Halton Hills Hydro, the Chairman, Vice Chairman and Mayor of the city involved, which is Acton. I have been advised by the staff of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee—and I have here some 130 letters—that this particular letter, addressed to the users of the utility, has produced an unprecedented response. Essentially the responses are statements of opposition to applying the GST to electricity, a vital municipal service. The purpose of this amendment is to present the facts and to respond to the pleas made before the committee to change this aspect of the GST. Perhaps we will hear from those on the other side who may have some ameliorating testimony from other witnesses. In any event, it is a strong plea from a particular sector asking that electricity and heating fuels be treated in the legislation as other similar necessities are treated.

I want to say something about the unfairness of the tax on people in remote regions, such as the north, because they will have to pay GST on the transportation cost to move the fuel as well as on the electricity they use. I believe that some other honourable senators intend to speak on this topic at some length. However, let me just say that it does not take very much imagination to picture someone in a remote area attempting to hold on to a reasonable standard of living faced not only with the GST on high transportation costs but on the fuel itself. This unfairness could be addressed by zero-rating electricity and heating fuels.

An argument that I hear frequently is that energy should be taxed, that its cost should be kept high because it encourages efficiency. Perhaps it is true, but the argument is a cruel one, particularly when applied to people in middle or low income socio-economic levels, because they do not have the capital to invest in greater efficiency. It is just not available to them. The government should ensure that there is adequate funding and adequate incentive to develop means of using energy more efficiently, whether it be through better insulation in our houses or whatever.

On June 13 of this year I gave a speech on the report of the Energy and Natural Resources committee on Petro-Canada. In that speech I quoted the Minister of Energy, the Honourable Jake Epp, who spoke about funding for programs. I think you will find that most of his announcements are in areas where there were severe cutbacks in funding, particularly on programs that would develop more efficient means of using energy. In fact, the government is beginning to reinstate some of those programs. It is again starting to spend money on programs brought in by the previous government that were terminated early in the administration of this government, programs which benefitted all Canadians.

We must recognize that we must remain competitive in an international sense. We often fail to recognize that other countries are doing a better job of using higher prices in combination with incentive and direct spending on research and development to achieve a more efficient use of energy, all of which makes those countries more competitive. Our failure to follow that example will result in a trade disadvantage.

Honourable senators, the amendment is a simple one. It would add electricity and heating oil to that class of transactions that is zero-rated. If this amendment is accepted, it would be consistent with the government's implicit and stated policy that necessities will not be subject to the goods and services tax. Clearly, heating oil and electricity are a necessity, and they should be exempt, because they work a hardship on people in lower-and middle-income groups. These people need nothing less than an additional tax burden.

The few statistics I have quoted show the greater percentage that a lower income family spends on electricity, which would also apply to heating oil, as compared to a higher income family. This illustrates how the goods and services tax works an unacceptable hardship, and I submit, honourable senators, that this amendment should pass.

[Senator Hays.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Austin: May I ask if the honourable senator has been able to examine the constitutionality of this tax in terms of asking provincial crown corporations such as Quebec Hydro or Ontario Hydro to collect this particular tax? Does Senator Hays have information on whether provincial crown entities, 100 per cent-owned crown corporations, have any obligation whatsoever with respect to this tax?

Senator Hays: I have had some discussions on this issue with a colleague. This, in fact, is the issue that arose at the time of the National Energy Program, when the petroleum and gas revenue tax and the natural gas liquids tax were introduced. There was a reference by the Province of Alberta which they won. They now submit that the goods and services tax, which is now in the process of litigation, falls into a similar category, although it has nothing to do with resources, and that the federal government cannot impose the tax.

A classic example of this is a landlord in my city of Calgary, who is letting premises to the Alberta Liquor Control Board. He is obliged to pay the goods and services tax and his tenant, the Government of Alberta, refuses to do so. There is no relief for that individual. Although this is not a resource example—and there are many—that is one of the unresolved, difficult issues that we have before us with respect to the goods and services tax as a general question. Of course, there is no better illustration than that of why it is not possible to proceed with this kind of tax without having come to grips with the problem of the two levels of government agreeing about what is to be done.

Senator Austin: Senator Hays, it is my understanding of the provisions in the British North America Act—which were carried forward in the Constitution Act—is that no level of government can tax the other level of government or involve that government in acting as a tax collector. The honourable gentleman has said that the province of Alberta is testing this proposition in its courts. I believe that, along with the Province of Alberta, the Province of British Columbia and one other province are joining with Alberta in that litigation.

Senator Olson: I believe it is Ontario.

Senator Austin: Is it Senator Hays' opinion that leaving this area of authority open will cause a great dislocation among many who will, presumably, not pay this tax, because provincial agencies will not collect it until the constitutional question is resolved? What is the position of the federal government, as the honourable gentleman understands it? Will they go after thousands of Canadians, should they be successful in the courts; or, if they fail to be successful in the courts, will they find another way to collect those taxes? What does he think will be the result?

Senator Hays: The two levels of government face a very serious problem, and I do not know what the result will be. My information is that, at this point, there is an uncompromising confrontation on the part of the two levels of government. The GST requires payment and the provincial level is saying that it will not pay. Those people who are obliged and liable for the payment of the tax are going to be in an impossible position. I am not sure how that will be resolved if this unfortunate tax should come into force on January 1. Some solution will have to be found, because it leaves those people in between the two levels of government, who are obliged to collect and pay the tax, in an impossible position if someone will not render the tax.

In the example I gave earlier, a colleague in the chamber explained this evening that the resolution of the situation would be by an agreement between the two levels of government, and added that there was no legal solution to it, that it has to be resolved by an accord. I believe it was this government who said it did not do it forever, that it did it for periods of time. It is a good question respecting a very difficult problem, and at this point in time there is no solution on the horizon.

Senator Austin: Since Senator Kelly, the sponsor of the bill, is not here, could Senator Murray assist us before the end of the debate on this amendment by telling us what measures the government has taken with the provinces or what it sees as necessary to deal with the lacuna in the application of the GST which has just been discussed by Senator Hays.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will obtain what information I can on this matter.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, this evening I wish to speak on this amendment which could remove heating fuel and electricity from the ravages of the GST.

Honourable senators, the GST is obviously seen as one of the most regressive, unfair treatments that could be imagined. Normally, a tax is designed to be fair to the people who are most needy. In this case, we have the exact opposite effect of that particular rule taking place. Surely we all understand that when the cost of fuel to heat a department store is increased, in a region of Canada that has severe, long winters, the price of all goods in that store will increase and a seven-per-cent tax on one item is more than a seven-per-cent tax on the same item where the cost of doing business is lower. That should be a fairly simple formula.

While the amendment before us deals mainly with heating fuels, it must be noted that significantly increasing the price of heating fuel and electricity has a domino effect that would be destructive enough during good times but would be devastating during the recession in which we presently find ourselves, and much more so in the north than anywhere else. It should not be too difficult to understand that there are parts of Canada, because of climate and extra hours of darkness, where more heating fuel and electricity are used. It will increase the cost of doing business in those regions.

It should be clearly understood at the outset that, while I speak as a senator from the Yukon, my remarks will show that the unfair, callous results of the Mulroney GST will be felt by many people in other provinces such as Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, Manitoba and, in fact, all of the provinces across Canada, because the further you go from the source of the goods being purchased, the higher the percentage of GST you must pay. Does that unfair formula not register with senators opposite who are hell-bent on shoving this deplorable tax down the throats of the people they are supposed to represent? Does it not scare you to stop and think what you are doing to the people whom you are supposedly here to represent? I heard Senator Chaput-Rolland say something last night about how she deplored the tax on books and reading materials, but that she was going to vote against the amendment in any event, because she owed her allegiance to the Prime Minister. Surely, she owes some allegiance to the people of the province of Quebec who will be adversely affected by this legislation.

It should not be too difficult to understand that the cost of doing business—and I have used Churchill, Manitoba as an example—is higher than doing business in Winnipeg. They are both in the province of Manitoba, but it costs more to do business in one of the areas than it does in the other.

Northerners accept that fact and are prepared to pay the price to live in northern areas. Does it follow, then, that they should be taxed more heavily because they are prepared to reside in the northern areas of their province or territory? In fact, should we not be moving in exactly the opposite direction and encouraging Canadians to inhabit the more remote areas?

Does it not offend your sense of fairness that the citizens of northern Manitoba will pay a higher percentage of tax on a gallon of heating fuel than a person living in Winnipeg?

I wish my friend Senator Everett were here—and I will be bringing this to his attention at a later date. Whatever you want to say about Senator Everett, he has always been a very fair-minded and open person who, I believed, has always been prepared to listen to a reasonable argument that was being made. I would like to ask him how he could justify, just in his province—not even moving from his province to the Northwest Territories or Yukon—the fact that the people in Churchill should be penalized for living in Churchill. That is what this tax does. It penalizes people the farther they live from Toronto. It does not make any sense.

Have we already forgotten that this is the very same incompetent government which promised an icebreaker and some submarines so that we could establish sovereignty in the north? That was not very long ago. We were going to have an ice-breaker and to have some nuclear submarines so that we could establish sovereignty in the north.

Northerners have been saying for years that, if the government wants to show the flag in northern Canada, it should put some people up there; it should make it possible for people in the north to exist. The people would then wave the flag, and the government would not have to do all these other things.

You need not make it easy for people to live in the north. You need only be fair. That is not asking too much.

We need icebreakers in the north, but we need them to break ice, not for sovereignty. We do not need nuclear submarines at all. We need people in the north, and we need fairness for those who are currently there. That should not be very difficult to achieve.

Honourable senators, I would hope that at least some Conservative senators opposite, from regions such as Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Manitoba, northern Alberta and British Columbia, who intend to vote against this particular amendment, would at least justify their actions to their constituents either by denying what is being said here today or by admitting that they knowingly support unfair taxation for their regions. Surely, their silence in the face of 85 per cent objection from their constituents, the signing of millions of names on petitions and the mounting opposition to this hideous tax, can only be interpreted as an abandonment of their principles and of their constituents.

If you are going to vote against the wishes of your constituents and for a tax which treats them unfairly, why not at least stand in this chamber and tell the people why you are doing that? Why not at least stand up and deny the things that I am saying are happening here? Why not stand and tell the people in your ridings why you are supporting this tax?

You don't have the guts to do it.

I have here some figures which I want to put on the record. I have made a few telephone calls and I have talked to some people in the north. There were even some people in Toronto who contributed.

To heat a 1,000-square-foot home in Toronto—and 1,000 square feet is not very big; that is a small condominium—on average it costs 20 cents per cubic metre for natural gas. It costs $74 per winter month or approximately $410 per year to heat an apartment in Toronto.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I would like to hear a very interesting and informative speech. Quite frankly, there is so much noise at the end of this room that I cannot hear it. I know that noone on that side is interested, but I would like to be able to hear what Senator Lucier is saying.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: I will go back to heating a 1,000-square foot home in Toronto with natural gas, at 20 cents per cubic metre on average, which amounts to $74 per month in the winter months and approximately $410 per year. The GST on that amount is $28.

Senator Molson, I know this is not very important to the people whom you represent. Senator Molson?

Senator Buckwold: I wish the Speaker would ask for order. I would like to hear what is being said.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Lucier: I know these things don't mean very much to the people from your area, sir, but they are damned important to those whom I represent. I would like to have your attention, or at least quiet, while I am speaking.

The GST on heating fuel for that home in Toronto is $28. That is not an exorbitant sum. I am sure that, while it is not easy, the people in Toronto could live with that.

[Senator Lucier.]

Yesterday I spoke to a lady from Dawson City. She has a 980-square-foot house. She has plastic on the windows, and the house is insulated. She has two children. It certainly is not an elaborate home, but it is a very liveable home.

Her fuel bill, which would be $400 in Toronto, is $2,700 in Dawson City.

Senator Perrault: What is 7.0 per cent of that?

Senator Lucier: Seven per cent on $2,700 means that the lady in Dawson has to pay $193 GST on her fuel bill.

Senator Perrault: Disgusting!

Senator Lucier: In fairness, if someone in Toronto is heating with oil, his GST will be $72 rather than $28. The GST on the fuel bill for the lady in Dawson is $193. And let me make something clear: She does not have the option of converting to natural gas. That cannot be done up there. People in Toronto, who would pay $72 GST, have the option of converting to gas. People in Dawson City do not have that option.

Senator Buckwold: And the tax credit is exactly the same.

Senator Lucier: The tax credit is exactly the same. The above cost does not include the electrical bill, which can be $100 to $150 per month in Dawson City. The GST, just on the lady's electrical bill, is $30 per month. What kind of fairness is that? I do not like to pick on the new senators who are here, such as Senator Keon. I have said before that I expect Senator Castonguay, Senator Eyton and Senator Molson to vote for this bill. I have no problem with that. I respect that because the people they represent are not going to be affected by this, other than that they are going to pay less tax. We are going to pay more but they are going to pay less.

Senator Perrault: Tory justice!

Senator Lucier: It is no secret that the reason the manufacturers are supporting this tax is because it is good for them; so why shouldn't people who are here to represent the manufacturers vote for the tax? I have no problem with that. However, as I have said before, Senator Cochrane, Senator Muir and Senator Keon, you are here to be fair, which you have been all your lives.

I was on a call-in program in Whitehorse a few weeks ago, and talked to a person there named Lance Houston. Lance is a good Conservative and he and I have always been very good friends. I always send him a copy of our Hansard, and he called me on the program and gave me hell for having brought into the debate the names of Senator Keon, Senator Cochrane, Senator Muir and Senator Marshall. I told him at the time that the reason I brought those names into the debate was not because I have anything against those senators but because of their decency. I brought them in because they are decent people, not because they are not—and I would like them to know that. I would like Dr. Keon to know that I do not use his name because of any disrespect. I do so because of my respect for him. I am just trying to make it understood what is happening to people in other parts of Canada and what this tax will do.

It seems that, when the bureaucracy decides to draw up a law, since the laws, of course, are drawn up in this part of the country, the first thing they do is draw a circle from Montreal to Ottawa to Toronto and ask, "What is good for that area?" We keep running into that problem all the time.

Senator Murray has said that no amendments that we put forward will be passed. The Prime Minister has said—and I even heard Senator Murray say this—that perhaps, after the bill is passed, the government will look at making some changes.

Senator Buckwold: In the next budget!

Senator Lucier: Shades of Meech Lake! Here we go again! "Trust us! Let us put this in and then we will change it."

Senator Frith: "And your cheque is in the mail!"

Senator Lucier: Yes, "And your cheque is in the mail."

Senator Perrault: Don't hold your breath!

Senator Lucier: I am not a lawyer, but I know there are quite a few lawyers in here, and it would seem to me that it would make a lot more sense to amend this bill and pass a good law rather than to try to correct a bad law after it is in. Why does the government keep trying to get poorly drafted laws passed, and then say, "Let us see if we can fix them"?

Senator Grafstein: I thought that was the role of the Senate.

Senator Lucier: I think it probably is the role of the Senate to ensure that bad laws do not get passed.

Senator Grafstein: We were told by Senator Murray that if we had not been so nasty, he might have fixed some of these problems in a prestudy. So he is punishing the Canadian public because we were not good boys.

Senator Lucier: If we believed what he tells us, especially in this particular case, there would not be a lot that we would not believe.

Honourable senators, I do not know how anyone in this chamber, regardless of what side of the chamber he sits on, could justify causing a person in Dawson City, who is just as Canadian as anyone else and just as entitled to be treated fairly, to be treated in this way. How can you justify voting against an amendment that would allow this person to be treated not better than the person in Toronto but just the same? The people in the north have to heat their houses and they have to use electricity, and they are just asking that the situation be the same for everyone in Canada. What is wrong with that concept? Why would you take the people who need the most help and give them the least? On the fuel bill for a home in Toronto, the GST will be $28. For the exact same home in Dawson City, the GST will be $193. What kind of sense does that make? If it does not make any sense, then how can you just ignore the problem and vote for it? It is absolutely baffling to me.

I should like to discuss another problem that was put to me by some people in the north over the last few days. How do we deal with Aboriginal Peoples on this? Senator Lang may be able to relate to this. He has a nephew who lives up there and he would know exactly what I am talking about here. If you go to Whitehorse or Dawson City to deliver oil to people's homes, do you go into the house after you fill their fuel tank and ask them if they are status Indians or non-status Indians or white? How do you decide whether or not you will charge the GST on the fuel? People cannot get an answer to that. They phone the numbers that are put in the papers but they cannot get answers to those questions. How do people know who will be charged this GST and who will not be?

Honourable senators, I can tell you something. The cost of heating fuel in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories—as well as in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia—has gone up considerably in the last few months, and it will be going up considerably more in the next few months. I can also tell you that the GST will not stay at seven per cent. I have said that before and I say it again. Regardless of who is in power, the GST will not stay at seven per cent. I am sure that within a year or two the people of Dawson City will be paying $250 GST per year on their fuel bill.

Senator Perrault: That is indefensible!

Senator Lucier: It just does not make any sense. Honourable senators, I know that I get a little steamed up when I get talking about the people that I represent in the north—

Senator Frith: And you will pay seven per cent on that steam!

Senator Lucier: —but I can tell you that they are very discouraged and very offended by this piece of legislation. They are fighting it every way they know how. Was it not something last night to see on the news the people of Powell River withdrawing their Canada Saving Bonds to try to get some sense into this government, to try to wake them up. These are Canadians! These are people who honestly want to be good Canadians and they are being forced to do this sort of thing, to try to pound some sense into some people's heads.

Honourable senators, I know that I should not be insulting people when I am trying to get them to vote for my amendment but I really do not give a damn if you vote for it or not. I just want you to know that, when you vote against this amendment, you are voting for an unfair situation for the people of northern Canada, and for the people of the northern parts of every one of the provinces of Canada.

Some Hon Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: If you want to do that, then go ahead and do it, but as I said before, don't try to do it pretending you don't know what you are doing, because you do know.

Hon. Willie Adams: I have a question for the honourable senator. During your speech, you did not mention food and freight rates. I think the airlines will be raising their prices as well. The rate has already gone up quite a bit, even before the GST. Right now, for a flight from Montreal to Resolute Bay, one kilogram costs over $6.50. Could you discuss the effect on costs to bring in the food to some of the communities once the GST is in place?

I also have a question regarding the number of hours of daylight in Whitehorse and the high Arctic, from the beginning of September until about the middle of April. Many communities in the north, such as Resolute Bay and Pond Inlet, have no daylight for eight months of the year. You were discussing the cost of fuel and electricity. Could you discuss the effects of that?

I see my colleagues across the floor from places like Toronto. We do not live in an area like Toronto; we live in the high Arctic. Could you compare the effects of the problems I have just mentioned between here and the Arctic?

Senator Lucier: Thank you, senator. I appreciate the questions from Senator Adams because he, better than anyone else—even better than I—understands the problems that are faced by the people up north. It is hard to believe that those who draw up legislation would not take into account what Senator Adams has just described, that is, that there are areas where it never gets to be daylight for long periods of time. And then to stick a tax on electricity! How can you draw up a bill that puts a tax on electricity and then say that it is the same whether you live in Windsor where—

Senator Stewart: It's known as a level playing field!

Senator Lucier: —you get sixteen hours of daylight, or whether you live in the high Arctic where you get none and you obviously have to use six times as much electricity.

Senator Perrault: Only a Tory could come up with an idea like that!

Senator Lucier: With all due respect to the people who draw up the legislation, surely they are not always going to catch these things, but once we catch it here, how should we deal with it? What are we here for if it is not to deal with exactly that situation? What is the role of the Senate if it is not to inject some fairness once we find out where the unfairness is taking place?

As far as the freight cost that Senator Adams was asking about, that is what I was trying to discuss in the earlier part of my remarks. When you live in an area of Canada where it costs more to get supplies and costs more to do business, then your products are going to cost more. However, is that a reason for putting a higher tax on them? I would have thought it would be a reason to put a lower tax, or at least the same tax, on them and deal with the problem in some other way. How can you justify saying to somebody, "Gee, you live up there and it costs you a lot of money to live up there, but we are going to raise your taxes and we will be able to get more money out of you than people in the south"? Is that what being a Canadian is all about?

Senator Perrault: That is what being a Tory is all about!

Senator Lucier: I do not think that that is what being a Canadian is all about. Senator Adams will be saying more about freight and about other parts of the legislation as we go along, but I appreciate his questions on this particular section.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I have a question. Could you give us any figures, not just on the cost of the heating and electricity and the length of the heating period, but on the general income status of the people who are affected? How many people are there in the Northwest Territories?

[Senator Adams.]

Senator Lucier: Sixty thousand.

Senator Buckwold: Could you give us some breakdown of their general income levels? I presume they would be very low in view of the fact that most of them are native and Inuit people with low incomes, but who require heating just as much as those who earn substantial incomes. Perhaps you could give us an incidence of the burden of that tax on the general population, keeping in mind that the tax credits are exactly the same in Toronto or in Inuvik.

• (2100)

Senator Lucier: Senator Buckwold, I cannot give you specific figures. However, the number one industry in the Yukon is mining. Senator Austin would have better figures on this than I do, but probably 40 per cent of the mining economy in the Yukon is from one mine. Since the number one industry is mining, if a person is employed in that mining town, he or she does earn a pretty good wage. However, the second industry in the Yukon is tourism. Dawson City lives on tourism. From October to June there are not many tourists around. It is very difficult for those people to earn a living during those months. Many people have to collect unemployment insurance over the winter. Even the ones who are employed very often earn a lower wage.

The tax credits are the same everywhere. Generally the cost of food and living is much higher, and that is accepted. People in the Yukon want to live there. They know it costs more to buy a head of lettuce in Whitehorse than it does in Vancouver, and it costs more in Dawson than it does in Whitehorse. The people accept that and are not asking for any favours on that basis. However, they are saying, "Don't make the situation worse than it is by taxation". Taxation should have the opposite effect. Taxation should not be implemented in such a manner that it is more expensive for the people who are making the least amount of money, and at the time of the year when they are making the least amount of money. The same month that the extra costs for heat and electricity kick in is when high unemployment takes place. The highest expenses come for people in Dawson City when they are least likely to be working, and already have enough things going against them.

Honourable senators, I want to say one more time that the people of the north are not cry-babies. They are not asking for anything extra. They are asking for fairness. I have discussed this with them on several occasions. I have been on open-line shows up there and all they are asking for is fairness. If you can find a way to make this tax fairer, you would be doing them a great favour.

Hon Willie Adams: Senator Buckwold, you were the chairman of the Senate committee studying the GST. School teachers and civil servants working in the north pay approximately 25 per cent of their salary on accommodation. Although the average salary is $40,000 to $50,000 a year, at the present time accommodation consumes 25 per cent of their salary. Even a family with three or four members working and living in the same four-bedroom home still pay 25 per cent each of their salary. In some areas in costs $3000 to $4000 a month for that four-bedroom house. Some members of local communities do not receive a northern allowance. People from the south receive a northern allowance of somewhere between $2000 to $4000 a year. However, people who were born in the community do not receive a northern allowance.

Senator Buckwold: I am not sure if that was a statement or a question. However, we heard that from witnesses who appeared before the committee. One of the most moving witnesses who appeared before the committee came into Yellowknife from the far north. It was a very long distance for her to come, and I think it was her first time so far away from home. She outlined the very things Senator Adams mentioned. The burden is extraordinary because of the immense expenses. The extra 7 per cent will be added to those goods which sometimes cost more than twice as much as those same goods or materials in central Canada. The tax burden then becomes double because it is based on the price of the goods.

The maximum rebate for a family of four earning $28,000 or $29,000 a year will be $580 a year to help pay for the extra cost of the goods and services tax. The figure is exactly the same in the north as it is in the south, although the tax incidence will be two or three times higher. This was one of the major complaints. I am only repeating some of the information, and I do not know if I have answered your question.

We all agree that there is an immense burden being put on northern people, and there will be further amendments involving the general position of those in the north, over and above the motion we have before us right now which relates to heating, because the problem goes much deeper than that in the north.

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I have two questions for Senator Lucier. In northern Quebec, electricity costs 48 cents a kilowatt hour. I understand that in the Northwest Territories electricity costs 34 cents a kilowatt hour. What is the rate per kilowatt hour in the Yukon.

Senator Lucier's topic was more directly related to the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. Those two areas are pretty highly subsidized by the central government by way of channelling money to the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. It is difficult to find knowledgeable and experienced educators who are willing to move to the north. Those people are highly subsidized by the government. At times it is difficult to find qualified teachers, and I am curious as to who will pay the 7 per cent? Will it be the Government of Canada indirectly? If not, will it be the individual teachers who will have to be paid higher salaries to attract them to the north? Will they be paid an extra 7 per cent? Will they have any more purchasing power, since the high cost of living is tremendous in those two areas, and also in northern Quebec and Labrador? What is your interpretation of this, Senator Lucier? Perhaps you can enlighten me on it.

Senator Lucier: Senator Watt, I thank you for the question. I do not have the precise figure for the cost of electricity per kilowatt hour in the Yukon. However, it is not as high as one would expect, since we generate most of our own electricity through hydro. There are three hydro developments in the Yukon. We are running short and reaching the point where we will have to come up with something else, but presently there is a pretty good hydro production in the Yukon.

It is difficult to compare the Yukon with the Northwest Territories or northern Quebec or Labrador, because those areas are spread out. The Yukon is fairly compact. It has some 26,000 or 28,000 people, and 18,000 live in Whitehorse. There are 2,000 here and there in different communities, but mostly they are centralized. The other thing is that there are many roads in the Yukon. In fact, Old Crow is the only community one has to fly to. In northern Quebec or the Northwest Territories it is the opposite. There are few communities that can be driven to; most of them have to be flown into.

Make no mistake, school teachers, professionals and all the people who go to those communities and keep the north operating are the very people that the government wants in the north, regardless of which government it is, because that is how sovereignty is displayed in the north. Sovereignty is not displayed by icebreakers or submarines under the ice, but by people. Whether directly or indirectly, teachers, professionals, doctors and miners who come to live and work in the north will have to pay this themselves one way or another. It may be that the Territorial governments will hire them and pay the bills originally, but it will come out of the pockets of the teachers and the workers, and that is where it is supposed to come from. It is designed so that it will be the people of the north who will pay those taxes, not the governments of the north. Quite frankly, unlike in some other places, the government of the north are the people of the north, so it will work its way right back down to the people who will have to pick up the tab.

Senator Watt: The purchasing power of welfare recipients and pensioners in the north is almost nil even before the GST. Could you elaborate, Senator Lucier, on what that means to you as a Yukoner and also from having a certain amount of experience with what is happening in the Northwest Territories? Do you foresee this government increasing pension cheques and welfare cheques in order that these people can sustain their purchasing power? I know for a fact that today, because of transportation costs and the high cost of living, their purchasing power is almost nil, and this at a time before the GST. How do you foresee this matter being dealt with?

Senator Lucier: I know what the honourable senator is saying. I have spent a number of years in Whitehorse, including eight years on city council. I know that seniors in the north cannot be moved, even with dynamite. They have spent their lives there and they do not intend to leave. They do not want to go to Jamaica for the winter months. It is very difficult for those people to survive under present circumstances. Frankly, I do not think, when the government drew up the GST, that it purposely said, "Let's draw up our policy and let the chips fall where they may." I do not think the bureaucrats were paying attention to detail and I do not think the government was on top of the matter when it was introduced. I do not understand why we cannot take out the offensive parts of the legislation.

I could understand the government saying, "We did not know they were there." However,once you are made aware of these offensive measures, that someone in Toronto pays $28 in GST whereas someone in Dawson pays $193 to heat exactly the same house, why not remove that part. Just get it out of there. It does not seem complicated.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: I wonder if I might ask a question of Senator Lucier. I have listened to what he has had to say about the effect of the GST on the north country, and I cannot help but be in substantial agreementwith what he has said about the problems there. I am interested in what is happening in the north country, and I am wondering if the problems he has just related to us could not have been raised in time for the Senate committee to do the job that it should have been doing, in my humble opinion, which was to have these amendments considered before the last minute. As matters have unfolded, these amendments can only be considered as a means of delaying the progress of the legislation. Senator Lucier would have received more support and interest had he persuaded the committee to bring in amendments to help relieve some of the situations he has described this evening. As I said in this chamber the other day, to wait until now to bring in amendments is to begin a process that cannot possibly work very well. We had time earlier, and had he raised these points for the committee to put forward amendments to correct them, perhaps they would have received a better hearing and a lot more sympathy, because we would have had more chance to understand and to participate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: Senator Molson, that is an excellent question. I think you are trying to be fair and that you honestly believe what you have just said. However, there is one thing wrong with what you have said. These problems were raised before the Blenkarn Committee and the House of Commons by the government of the Northwest Territories and the government of the Yukon at the start of the process, and yet the provisions remain in the legislation. As far as the Senate Committee is concerned, I agree that it would have been nicer had we brought these issues forward sooner. However, I can tell you that these same problems were raised before the Blenkarn Committee and in the House of Commons at the beginning of this process, and there has not been one change. They have been rejected holus bolus. In fact, Mr. Blenkarn said at one point that if the government had been a little more open from the beginning, amendments may have been possible and some of these things could have been corrected.

Senator Grafstein: Mr. Blenkarn said that the government refused because the committee system was too partisan, that the government knew about these matters a year ago and refused to make amendments.

Senator Molson: I am talking to Senator Lucier.

[Senator Lucier.]

Senator Lucier: I simply want to say that the government knew of these problems more than a year ago.

Senator Molson: I just wish that our committee had brought these problems to this chamber. I quite understand what Senator Lucier has said, and I understand that the government is completely intransigent on the matter. However, that does not alter my opinion that when a Senate committee deals with something, it can report in any way it chooses, and if it finds inequities and so on, it should bring those forward to us. We cannot get at Mr. Blenkarn and we cannot deal with the problems here if they are introduced at the eleventh hour.

Senator Olson: Why not?

Senator Austin: An injustice is an injustice.

Senator Lucier: I guess the question is, why not? Why can we not deal with these problems now? In fact, would it not make more sense, in the face of a recession and in face of all the opposition, to delay the legislation for one year to make the proper adjustments?

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable Senators, I would like to start out with one or two little observations. To borrow a phrase, it seems more than passing strange to me that this bill is so terrible, so poorly constructed, so flawed, so inoperable, so inoperative, such a jungle and so complex that it could not be changed and had to be rejected totally; that there was no other way, that it was unamendable. I am so pleased to see that there will be eight or more amendments introduced to patch up this thing.

Senator Haidasz: Then why don't you vote for the amendments?

Senator Stanbury: If you want amendments, you have them.

Senator Doody: One sentence and he has got you going already!

Senator Austin: We are competing for the "Simard Cup."

Senator Barootes: Senator Olson has remarked that these changes could have been brought in on September 24 or 25 if there had not been so many questions of privilege. On September 24 and 25 we were presented with the judgment that the bill had to be rejected.

Senator Olson: No, you weren't. You were presented with four possible options.

Senator Barootes: We did not have much of a chance to discuss the four options. As I recall, we were told very early in the committee meeting what was to be done.

Senator Grafstein: We were told that the government would not accept any amendments!

Senator Barootes: Majority ruled then, but, somehow or other, you do not seem to want to have the majority rule now. That is a rather unusual situation. I believe that the minority should have an opportunity to put its points forward, and we, as a minority, were not given any opportunity to put our views forward.

Senator Olson: You wanted to stop everything, and that is all!

Senator Barootes: Be that as it may, I will accept all the criticism that the honourable senator wishes to give afterwards, because I see that he wants to have a last crack at this topic.

Allow me to make some general remarks. I congratulate Senator Hays for presenting the viewpoint of his side, with respect to this amendment, as cogently as he did. I regret that I have had to patch together my information on the spur of the moment, not having prior knowledge of the amendment and the supporting arguments that would be put forward for consideration. So I ask honourable senators to bear with me if, in my confusion and haste to prepare a few remarks, some of them may appear at times to lack cohesion.

Senator Buckwold: As usual.

Senator Barootes: In view of that comment, I would like to make one other remark. I do not mind personal attacks; in fact, I enjoy them, as they have been part of my life. However, I decry those people who, when an argument is put to them, or a point is made on an inconsistency, rely on their paranoia of personal attacks as a means of rebuttal. Have I made that clear?

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Stewart: Give us more.

Senator Haidasz: Try again.

Senator Barootes: In other words, instead of answering an inconsistency, they feel that it is better to attack a person by saying, "I am being picked on."

Honourable Senators, unlike the existing federal sales tax that was imposed previously at a multiple rate on only one third of all the goods and services consumed in Canada, the GST will apply at a lower and uniform rate to most goods and services. Consequently the sectors across our economy are likely to be treated more equitably.

Senator Buckwold: The rate is not lower; it's the same rate.

Senator Barootes: Honourable Senators, I do not intend to give a two hour address; I intend only to speak for about ten minutes.

Senator Haidasz: Seven per cent for Senator Eyton is not the same as seven per cent for John Kowszlawski on Adelaide Street in Toronto!

Senator Barootes: I want to point out that the nature of the policy behind this measure was a comprehensive tax on a much larger base of industry and people paying for it. As a consequence, and in order to make it simple and understandable, the government decided to apply it to as many goods and services as possible, omitting only those that are basic—

Senator Buckwold: Like heating oil and electricity!

Senator Barootes: I refer to food, medical care, drugs, rent, and so on, all of which were exempted from the GST. If we were to apply all the exemptions that have been requested, it would not work. We have had representations from citizens and sectoral industries requesting exemptions for fuel, funerals, clothing, footwear, books, restaurant meals, and the list goes on. The complexity would then be really enormous and there would be a loss of the revenue expected to be yielded through the GST. You would have to either raise the rate or apply it at a higher level to some products and goods. We want a level situation. I will show the corrections that can be made.

Consistent with this principle, the GST will be applied to electrical bills and to heating fuels. In order to generate the same net revenues as the existing tax, which the GST will replace, the 7 per cent rate must be applied on that broad and comprehensive base. Clearly, the more items that are included in that base, the lower the rate; the more that are excluded, the higher the rate will be. In this context, it would be appropriate to increase the GST rate in order to provide special treatment for electricity or for some of the other items it has been suggested should be exempted. However, you may not be aware that your electrical bill today contains a fairly significant, if hidden, amount of existing federal sales tax which the GST will remove. In order to produce electricity and to operate their businesses, utilities purchase numerous items on which federal sales tax has to be paid. These include power transmission lines, service vehicles, motor fuels, computers, tools and maintenance equipment, office equipment and furniture, telephone services, and even stationery supplies. The consumer is paying a fair amount towards these things.

I should also add, parenthetically, that, in Saskatchewan up until the present administration came into power, electricity rates were subject to provincial sales tax at a rate of 5 per cent to 7 per cent. An electricity or natural gas bill included the 5 per cent. I would also point out that transportation and utilities sectors are projected, by this method, to have a real output gain of 3.1 per cent as a result of the GST. In other words, the economy, their jobs created and their activity, will increase ultimately by 3.1 per cent.

Residential electrical users will benefit from the elimination of the current hidden tax burden on this electricity. As you know, the representatives of the electrical utilities, who appeared before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs, publicly committed themselves to passing along this federal sales tax saving to their customers. We wait to see if that shall come to pass.

Let us talk a little bit about fairness. To ensure that lower-income and middle-income earners are treated fairly under this new tax system, the government will be providing, quarterly, a tax credit. This will go to 8.7 million families in Canada, families whose income is under the $30,000 level. The achievement of greater fairness in the sales tax system has been a fundamental objective of this government since coming into office.

Senator Haidasz: And they failed.

Senator Barootes: The government has worked to eliminate special treatments that used to be permitted to some industries and to some investors, allowing them to pay less tax. Consequently, higher-income earning Canadians and profitable large corporations now pay taxes which are more commensurate with their earnings. I thank this chamber for finally passing that bill which allowed the application of a corporations tax to those large corporations, capitalized over $10 million.

Senator Haidasz: They still defer too much.

Senator Barootes: I think you are in the wrong party, my friend.

The government converted personal exemptions and many deductions to tax credits in order to improve fairness, and they reduced or eliminated many of the special tax breaks which former administrations had made available. The government also eliminated or reduced many of the corporate tax breaks and broadened the tax base so that many of the profitable associations, organizations and corporations now pay tax.

I am sorry to see Senator Perrault leave because my next point touches on one of his major complaints. A week ago we heard that the major banks in Canada will now be paying $100 million in tax in the coming year under the new act. In the 1989 budget, the government announced that these large corporations would be paying this tax, if capitalized, over $10 million. Effective January 1, large corporations' tax on capital will be raised from .075 per cent to .2 per cent, a 15 per cent increase in their tax rate. This tax will help ensure that big business pays its fair proportion of taxes.

In 1986, you will recall, the government introduced the sales tax credit where nothing of that nature previously existed. This credit was enhanced in 1988, in 1989 and again in 1990. These increases almost tripled the amount of credit, far exceeding the rate of inflation.

To illustrate how this will affect low- and modest-income groups, I will quote some tables. As I said once before in speaking to the GST, my interest was not in those earning $50,000, $60,000 and $100,000, but in those earning around $15,000 to $20,000. Let us look at how a single wage earner under 65 will benefit from this GST which he will be able to apply to his electrical bills, to his water bills, to his food and to everything else.

Senator Grafstein: Would Senator Barootes tell us what he is referring to?

Senator Barootes: I am referring to tables on the goods and services tax issued by the Government of Canada.

Senator Grafstein: What date is on that?

Senator Barootes: December 19, 1989.

Let us look at a person earning $15,000. As a result of the GST instead of the FST—that is, the goods and services tax instead of the manufacturers' sales tax—that person earning $15,000 will be $150 better off. If he is in the $20,000 bracket, he will be $250 better off.

Let us now look at the single individual over 65 years of age. I will use the same two levels. At $15,000 he will be $150 better off and at $20,000 he will be $250 better off. In other words, these are the people who I think will need help.

[Senator Barootes.]

Last but not least is the group we always harp on about and for whom our hearts flutter, the single parents with a couple of children. A single parent who has a couple of children and is earning $25,000 would be $550 better off. If the income were $20,000, he or she would be $325 better off.

These tables help to illustrate that this government not only has a heart, not only has compassion, but also has the financial tables to prove that it is doing something for this group of modest- and low-income people.

Senator Grafstein: Would the senator entertain a question at this point? I think he has given us a different insight into the figures we have on this side. When he says that a family earning $25,000 will be $550 better off with the removal of the FST, has he added in the additional cost of the GST, or is that a net figure?

Senator Barootes: That is the net figure, taking the FST and subtracting the GST from it. They will be that much better off. I will give the honourable senator the tables and he can study them. I know he is a very acute economist on these matters. Perhaps Senator Austin would also like to have them.

The proposed goods and services tax is designed to further improve the fairness of taxation in Canada. Under the GST the distribution of the tax burden will be more progressive than what I have heard from the other side.

Wealthy Canadians will pay their fair share and they will not be able to avoid the GST. They tend to consume more and therefore they will pay more on average. In other words, those people in the $20,000 to $25,000 bracket expend 3.5 per cent of their income on electricity and those in the $60,000 bracket expend only 1.8 per cent of their income on electricity. Here we are talking pure percentages, proportionally speaking. On the other hand, I would point out to you that persons earning $60,000, although the percentage of the income they are spending on electricity or heating fuels is lower, the number of dollars that they are paying for their heating fuels is considerably higher, because usually they have larger homes to heat, just as they have larger cars to drive, which use more gasoline, just as they spend more money on food, and so on. Although I have great empathy and sympathy for them, you could apply that to almost any expenditure of the low- to modest-income groups because they do spend nearly all of their income.

With the GST tax credit, families with incomes of up to $30,000 a year will have more after-tax income than they do today. There is no refuting that. This includes three quarters of the families in seniors or singles groups. As I said, 8.7 million families will be receiving an income tax credit and will be better off.

Before this government introduced a refundable sales tax credit in 1986, low-income Canadians paid much more federal sales tax as a percentage of their income than those in the higher-income brackets. With the introduction of the GST, the refundable sales tax credit will be enhanced once again. The monetary value of the credit will be increased and the income eligibility threshold of those who receive the credit will be raised. It has been raised already to around $30,000, and I have no doubt that this compassionate government or any other government that follows them will also see that it is indexed in proportion to the buying power of their income.

As a result of what I have just said, there is no doubt that low- and modest-income earners will pay much less as a percentage than those in the higher-income brackets. For these reasons, the GST tax credit has been recognized by experts as a major advance in Canadian social policy and I am surprised that sociologists in Canada—those bleeding hearts, all of those non-government funded organizations—do not come around and hail this as one of the greatest social measures that has been undertaken in Canada in many a year.

As well, basic groceries, residential rents, drugs, appliances, and so on, will all be exempted from the GST.

Senator Olson: Appliances?

Senator Barootes: Medical appliances.

On indexation, the intentions and record of the government are quite clear. The GST tax credit will be reviewed periodically and, I hope, adjusted appropriately. This is the approach that was used with the child tax credit which, since 1985, has been increased much in excess of the rate of inflation.

These actions, honourable senators, speak for themselves. The government's fiscal initiatives show a commitment to a fairer tax system and to the targeting of assistance, especially to those in need.

An amendment of the nature that has been suggested, therefore, is not, in my opinion, warranted or useful.

Let me make one or two comments off the cuff about the comments made by the last two speakers. I, too, have been up north. I have an interest, as do most Canadians, in what is going on in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and northern Ontario. I wish that we could transfer our manufacturing industries to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Senator Doody: I think you have lost some of your audience.

Senator Barootes: I just don't think it can be done. I wish we could change their climate and make it warmer for them so they would not have to use as much heating fuel and electricity in the winter, but those are things over which we have no control. However, if we are to ameliorate some of the things mentioned by Senator Lucier, that would be only a very small part. It would not, in any way, change the other aspects of their living which would continue to be more expensive than they are in Toronto or in Regina. Those things would continue.

If we are looking for a way out, it is not through the GST with its wide base and the purpose we have given it. It should be through an observation or two with regard to the Income Tax Act, whereby their incomes may be taxed at rates different from those who live below the 60th parallel. Those are the things to which our governors may be giving some attention—perhaps higher exemptions; perhaps lower rates for those people, bearing in mind that they do have some additional costs.

Some of the other things that have been said are a little troublesome to me. One observation related to transportation systems in the cities. We must realize that many of the transportation systems which use electricity or fuel are subsidized from general taxation.

The water system, to which some reference was made, is not the same as electricity. In many cities the water costs for household use—and Montreal is a good example—is not billed; rather, it is taxed and paid out of general revenue. So, it would be an inequity to try to apply the same to electricity that we apply to water. In your city, Senator David, I understand there are no water bills sent to people. In many other cities, as well, it is included in the general tax case. So we are not dealing with the same situation with water that we are with electricity. Moreover, in some centres, electrical generating and distribution systems are privately owned, not owned as they are in Saskatchewan. Even in Ontario there are some private organizations distributing electricity. So there is a difference in that regard.

Although I have some sympathy for some of the things suggested, on the basis of the philosophy of the GST and on the basis of its thrust and its help to low- and modest-income people, I cannot accept this amendment, and I will vote against it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Barootes.

Senator Barootes made some mention of the fact that electricity costs would be lower as a result of eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax. Let me remind you that for the purposes of my address I obtained information from the GST watchdog group, which indicated that the increase would really not be very much, 6.6 per cent. So we are talking about less than 0.5 per cent being applicable to the reduction. In the case of furnace oil, it is something like 5.7 per cent. I don't have the numbers in front of me.

Perhaps you could comment on that or try to put your comments into perspective. You left me with the impression that there would be a great reduction. The information I have is that there would not be a great reduction.

The other question I have arises out of an article I read over the weekend in the May-June issue of the Canadian Tax Journal which contains an article by Mr. Patrick Grady relating to an analysis of the distributional impact of the goods and services tax.

You were quoting figures which indicated that a lower-income family would be much better off. The conclusion which the author draws in this article, at page 643 of the May-June 1990 issue of the Canadian Tax Journal, Volume 38, No. 3, is that three-quarters of Canadian families will pay more taxes in 1991 because of the introduction of the GST package; that the increase in the sales tax credit will help to ease the burden on low- and middle-income taxpayers but that, nevertheless, families who earn less than $30,000 will pay $20 more in tax, on average, because of the GST package and that 46 per cent of families who earn less than $30,000 will face heavier tax burdens; and that, if the government wishes to live up to its commitment to ensure that families earning less than $30,000 are better off as a result of the sales tax reform, it will have to increase the sales tax credit.

This author has provided a table through the use of a model based on Statistics Canada information. I am wondering, Senator Barootes, whether you are familiar with this and, if you are, how this squares with the information which you were giving us. It is a very different view and, I believe, a reasonably objective view, having regard to the reputation of the Canadian Tax Journal and the kinds of authors which it publishes.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, first of all, the reduction arising from the input tax credits to which I referred, which will occur for the electrical utilities over a period of time, and bearing in mind that they are going to lose the 13.5 per cent on their costs and will have a considerable reduction on the equipment and inputs which they have, will probably yield for Canadians cheaper electrical rates.

As for the table in the Canadian Tax Journal, as with medical journals, scientific journals, tax journals, accounting journals, the article from which you quoted is no better than the author who prepared it. As you know, sometimes people write articles for great journals, and later we find 10 people refuting them.

I am not saying that that gentleman's article is or is not correct. All I am saying is that I have looked through this table and I will say this: Single wage earners under 65, single individuals over 65, a one-earner couple with two children, a two-earner couple with two children—and, in that case, it assumes that 60 per cent of the income comes from one earner—a single parent with two children, every one of them, Senator Hays, at $30,000 or less per year appears in these figures to be better off, according to figures tabled in the House of Commons on December 19, 1989.

If there were people who intended to refute that, surely they would have done so by now.

Senator Buckwold: Are those Department of Finance figures?

Senator Barootes: They were tabled in the House of Commons by the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, Minister of Finance.

Senator Buckwold: Those are Department of Finance figures. That is all they are.

Senator Lucier: I presume they are.

Senator Stanbury: The book is known by its cover.

Senator Barootes: This is discredited and that is credited; is that your point? You quoted that journal once before. It was issued just after you tabled your report in the Senate.

Senator Buckwold: Everyone has discredited the submission of the Department of Finance in the projection of figures. That is why all the poverty groups and the low-income groups and the church groups expressed in their presentations the fact that this regressive tax, in spite of the tax credit, will very seriously adversely affect low-income people.

[Senator Hays.]

Senator Barootes: That reminds me of the fellow who always starts off with: That is a good question and I am glad you brought it up. I am glad that you brought it up. You are again quoting from people like Neil Brooks. I have it here. I saved it just in case you brought this up.

Here we have a comparison of the great champion of the progressive income tax system versus the GST. We have the figures of Mr. Neil Brooks, the darling of the CLC, of CUPE and of the PSAC. If you look at these figures, and I quoted them to you before, Senator Hays, you will find that his proposal is the regressive one in the lower- and middle-income groups and that the GST is the progressive one.

Let me give you some figures. According to the professor at the University of Toronto, of those earning $15,000 or less, 54.6 per cent would be worse off under his system. The percentage that might be better off is 20 per cent. Whereas, under the GST, it is indicated that 30 per cent to 40 per cent will be better off.

All I am saying to you is that I have these figures. I have quoted them at our meetings in western Canada, and I can quote them to you again. With regard to unattached elderly individuals, 74.5 per cent—that is, three-quarters—are worse off under the system you have praised, whereas 40 per cent are better off under the GST.

I can use figures, too, if you want to be bamboozled.

Senator Hays: Who knows? This debate may go on another day, maybe not on this amendment. I will look at your numbers and, hopefully, you will get a chance to look at the article from which I have quoted. Perhaps we can come up with what are the better numbers—those generated by the Department of Finance or by this independent writer.

It is so easy to cast doubt on an article in a journal by saying that sometimes they are not all that reliable. But sometimes they are.

Senator Barootes: I agree. As I say, I would like to study the tax journal you are referring to. Maybe there are some comparisons we can make between them.

There is one other point on which I wish to comment, honourable senators. That is in respect to the old CHIP program and programs with rising costs. Rising costs of services and rising costs of energy usually result in people as stupid as you and I in this place beginning to observe some husbandry in the use of those expendable services. You find that, as the price of gasoline or of natural gas or of electricity and heating fuels goes up, more and more people may say: Maybe I will use a little less electricity. Instead of using a 250-watt bulb here, I will use a 100-watt bulb, and instead of a 60-watt bulb, I will use a 40-watt bulb. Maybe I will insulate the house and maybe I will, when I am going to work I will put the thermometer down to 60 degrees, and when I come home I will put it up to 68 degrees. These things are not bad for conservation of a depleting resource in this country. So, I say to you that that would be helpful.

Finally, it has been brought to my attention that for some industries utilizing electricity and fuel, the cost of electricity will go down because they will get an input tax credit. I don't guarantee there will be, but there could be some depletion of the rate of inflation, or COLA in this country, not that it would not rise, but it would not rise as fast. In fact, I will suggest to you that the GST will have less effect on the cost of living in this country than has the rise in cost of oil through the Iraq war. I believe that will have more effect on our cost of living than will the implementation of the GST with a once-only rise of 1.0 per cent to 1.25 per cent.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Barootes, I agree with you: There are statistics and statistics and then damned statistics. Obviously, it is vital, in aid of the amendment proposed by this side, to determine the impact of the GST on families in those sectors of the economy that are less able to protect themselves against costs. We have heard Senator Lucier make a very eloquent plea for those in the north who are not able to protect themselves in terms of choice for fuel. We in the south can choose among hydro-electricity, gas, oil, wood or even coal heat, but those in the north do not have those same choices.

I have been trying to examine carefully, and independently, statistics regarding the impact on lower-income families, whose income is less than $30,000. We have not generated these figures ourselves. We have had to rely, being the opposition, on independent bodies to prepare statistical data for us, and we realize, as some will suggest on the other side, that some independent studies are more valuable than others, but that only goes to the weight that you put on those studies.

Obviously, the government is convinced that its figures are correct. Having been on the government side, I can tell you that whenever we received statistics from any government department, our first job, as it is of any thoughtful political figure, was to question the figures that we received from the bureaucracy. We on this side have been injured badly by statistics we received from the Department of Finance and Treasury Board when we were on the government side.

Senator Doody: Question!

Senator Grafstein: My question to you is this: Can you make available to us any independent studies that have been done that support your position that family households, with two children, earning $30,000, will be better off? I believe you indicated they would be better off by $150. The statistics that we have show that there will be an increase in tax anywhere from $20 to $100 for them, and that, when you get below $30,000 the number spirals so that a $25,000 household, instead of being better by $550, will be substantively behind. Those households with $25,000 in income will probably be in a position the reverse of what you have said, possibly by hundreds of dollars the other way.

Are you able to present us, or other senators opposite who have given this careful thought, any material, any independent figures, aside from the government figures, to support your contention?

Senator Barootes: I do not know what you are quoting from to get your figures.

Senator Grafstein: I was quoting from the Canadian Tax Journal. The Brooks study came up with different figures, as did the Canadian Tax Foundation when it examined the bill. We on this side have received a series of so-called independent studies that have demonstrated that the impact on families at $30,000 and under will be greater rather than lesser. All I am asking is that you give us something other than the government figures, because we know that government figures can change due to economic conditions. I should like to know whether or not you have any independent studies, outside of the government, that have so convinced senators opposite of the fact that this tax will be fair and equitable. We have heard, from Senator Lucier and from others from different regions, that the tax will not be fair. We have heard from certain sectors that the tax will not be fair. I am only asking that you give us, if you could, the independent studies that have been done that support your contention. Then, after sober second thought, we may be able to come to a different conclusion about our concerns.

Senator Barootes: Yes. I do not have any of them here with me, but there were some presented to us by various organizations, and if I can get my hands on them I will be pleased to pass them over to you and then you can study them in comparison to the government figures. All people within the government are not dishonest. Your figures from the Journal and perhaps some others, such as from the CLC, have not been accepted by everybody. It would be interesting for us to examine them, I agree. Incidentally, when I hear somebody say to me that the person in the $20,000 to $25,000 earning group spends a larger percentage of his income on electricity and heat, I agree, but I again point out that he also spends a larger percentage of that income on clothing and lodging and recreation and everything else. However, if you want to put it into actual, hard dollars, the low-income person may spend many fewer dollars than does the fellow, like yourself, living in Forest Hill in a 20-room house. I will leave it at that.

Senator Grafstein: I have a final question. I know that Senator Barootes is always candid to members on this side. Over the weekend, I read an article in one of the papers dealing with comments made by Mr. Blenkarn, who is chairman of the Finance Committee which reviewed this bill when it was in the other place. He apparently indicated that there were serious flaws in the bill, and he went on to suggest that, had the members in the opposition in the other place been less partisan and more cooperative, a number of amendments would have been obtained. Earlier today we heard the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggesting—and you have confirmed this in your comments, Senator Barootes—that, if we had used a different process here, if we had pre-studied the bill or, according to your suggestion, if the Senate Banking Committee had been more open-minded at an earlier stage to amendments, then the government might have accepted those amendments.

Senator Barootes: I did not say that.

Senator Grafstein: I am suggesting that it is a logical consequence of what you were implying. My question to you is this: Based on your attendance at those many hearings across the country over several months, and based on your own research, did you detect any flaws in this bill that we might, at this last juncture, correct? I am not talking about minor flaws. Are there any significant flaws in this bill or is this bill beyond correction at this stage?

Senator Barootes: As to your last statement that the bill was so flawed it could not be corrected, quoting from the New Testament: You said it, I didn't! To begin with, regarding Mr. Blenkarn, I have not read the article. I presume it was in the Toronto Star. I think that is the only paper you fellows read.

Senator Grafstein: I believe it was in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Barootes: I have not read it and I do not know what he said, but if he said something with which you agree, then you should go and talk to him about it. We are not talking about that here. We are discussing what we have seen and heard. As for my impressions of the presentations made to us, I think we were told that there were three hundred some odd presentations made, of which two hundred some odd were opposed. I think you should look at those figures a little more carefully. It is easy to make the blunt statement that two hundred some odd were opposed. However, they were not so much opposed as they were presenting a lobby for their sectoral group, for their industry, for their chocolate bars or their biscuits or whatever business they were in, to point out that there were some anomalies that applied to them that they felt should be corrected to make the tax fairer for them, to make their industry more profitable, or to make it more profitable for them to sell tourist packages in Minneappolis for people to come up and fish in northern Saskatchewan. Those people did not come and say, "Throw the bill out."

Senator Olson: Yes, they did. They sure did.

Senator Barootes: They did not, even though our friends tried to persuade them repeatedly, with all kinds of intimidation, that we should do away with the bill. The fact of the matter is that many people presented a view that they thought the bill could be corrected or improved and that the Senate was to present their views. I say to you, as our Prime Minister has said, and as the Minister of Finance recently said, if there are anomalies or inequities or difficulties when the bill is passed and put into operation, then there will be an opportunity to have them corrected. They may not need amendments. Some of them will only need regulatory or administrative or interpretive changes. So I say to you that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have said that they are willing to examine some of these things once we get it into operation, and I think that is the reasonable way to do it. That is the way other new taxes have been implemented and corrected in the past when there were difficulties.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Barootes, you really did not respond to my narrow question.

Senator Barootes: I did my best.

[Senator Barootes.]

Senator Barootes: I tried to answer before and I will try it again, but this will be my last try at it. I am doing my very best to tell you that I agree with the thrust of the bill, its principle and its intent, which I know you understand. The intent is to have a broad-based, lower-rate consumption tax to help our exports and our industries to compete, and ultimately to increase the economy of this country by $9 billion over a period of time, and I am fully in support of that. The little corrections that different little groups may want, if there are any, should be done only after the tax has been tested, and that may come to be.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: —it is fairly late so I will be brief.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I thought that would get some response. I hope that honourable senators, particularly the ones who have been here only since we were swamped, will listen carefully.

There are all kinds of criticisms that can be made of Bill C-62, because as we travelled across the country, we found, if not hundreds then certainly scores of inconsistencies and injustices which I heard members of the Conservative Party who were there on the committee say needed to be corrected; no doubt about it. I am not going to deal with all of them. I am only going to deal with the ones that apply to the amendment that is before us now, and I will try to confine my comments to that area.

Honourable senators, why we have to make a plea now is that tomorrow afternoon at 5:45 we are going to be called upon to vote as to whether or not we are willing to take heating fuel, in all its forms, out of this iniquitous tax.

I think that most of us who have been here for some time—and perhaps even the new senators—understand that, above everything else, the job of the Senate is to try to identify and then correct regional disparities.

Senator Grafstein: Absolutely!

Senator Olson: People talk about sober second thought, and I think that is a good thing, too. If the House of Commons, its committees and legislative process have made a mistake, when a bill comes here we can have another look at it, a sober second thought. I have not seen that practised as much during the time I have been here because, usually, governments—whether it is this government or the previous government—have been perhaps a little reluctant to admit they have made mistakes. Every time we found a serious discrimination in the application of the law with respect to the regions, the Senate, almost unanimously, indicated that it would remedy that situation. Honourable senators, there is absolutely no question that that is what we are faced with tonight. I suggest to honourable senators opposite that they think about this seriously. The government is not even doing what it stated it would do; therefore, you have a serious obligation to amend the bill and send it back to the House of Commons so that the government can at least keep its word.

It is implicit in the government's position and in its statements with respect to the GST that basic necessities are to be exempted. The list includes basic groceries, prescription drugs and certain medical devices, as Senator Barootes has pointed out, day care, medical services and water. Why did the government stop there? In Canada's climate, is heat not a basic necessity? I do not care whether one lives in Alert Bay, Old Crow or Toronto, surely we understand that in North America north of the 49th Parallel some fuel is required to heat residences for a large part of the year. If the government believed that it was going to exempt basic necessities but then included fuel, surely it made a mistake and overlooked fuel. In my view, it is ludicrous even to think that, for people living in Canada, heating a house is not a basic necessity. That is what we are asking you to consider tonight, honourable senators.

I do not want to repeat the arguments that low-income people will be hurt the most in terms of a percentage of their income, or that a residence with the same square footage as one built to a higher set of building standards because of higher incomes will cost more to heat on a square-meter or square-foot basis. However, that is what will happen. Not only that, but to make matters worse, 7 per cent GST will be added on to the cost of the transportation of the heating fuels. Surely hononourable senators opposite must realize that the transportation cost on fuel is a large part of the selling price, and the farther north the higher the cost. It seems to me that the problem is easy to see and to understand, because this whole tax will be based on price at the point of sale to the consumer. Therefore, everything that makes up the price, such as handling charges and transportation costs will be used to calculate the selling price and then 7 per cent will be added to that price.

Honourable senators, it is not fair. Senator Lucier made a great speech, pointing out the difference in costs as between places like Dawson and Toronto. If I remember correctly, he said that the same goods actually cost seven or eight times as much in the north as they do in Toronto.

Many times in the past several months the complaint has been laid before the Senate that in almost every aspect the GST is a regionally discriminatory tax. Tonight we are talking about heating fuel and electricity, probably the worst example of discrimination. It is the best example to prove the point, but the worst example of discrimination against various regions, because the cost of transporation is such a high percentage of the cost of fuel. I think of fuel oil in particular, but coal would be even worse, although not nearly as much coal is used for heating any more.

It is the Senate's responsibility. I cannot understand why senators opposite do not understand that fuel for heating is as basic a requirement to living in Canada as almost anything else, such as basic groceries, certain medical devices, prescription drugs and water. One needs to buy fuel for heating to live in Canada. Therefore the tax is regionally discriminatory.

The point has been made that the situation is exacerbated by regional considerations, because the further north one goes the longer are the periods of darkness and cold. No reasonable member of the Senate would deny that. Yet the way this tax is structured and designed exacerbates the problem.

If the tax had been applied on litres of fuel oil and was the same for everyone in Canada, north, south, east and west, there would be some justice and people would pay essentially the same federal tax on the same thing; but that is not the situation. At the refinery in Edmonton, Sarnia or Montreal the fuel is a certain price. I will not go into how fuel is priced, but everyone knows that it is based on the market price using west Texas intermediate crude, and freight is added or subtracted along the way until it comes into the refinery. Fuel is based on the market price and all the other factors are included. The further north the oil is transported, the higher are the transportation costs, and more fuel oil is used in the north. In some parts of Canada for several months there is no daylight at all. Averaged over a year, in some areas houses would probably require two or three times as much electricity for lighting than houses in other areas of Canada, and in addition, the winter is much longer.

Honourable senators, that is not fair. Senator Barootes suggests passing the GST and amending it afterwards. But that is not the job of the Senate. After we have identified severe regional disparities, those disparities should be corrected. Tomorrow afternoon, honourable senators, you will have an opportunity to correct one of the severe injustices in this bill. I plead with you to take up your responsibilities. It will not be the end of the day for the Conservative government, or for anyone else, to bring in a bill and have the Senate correct a few things. Someone stated that it was not done before 1984; but it was done before 1984.

Senator Lucier: Many times.

Senator Olson: Many times we found inequities and in most instances the government would listen and make adjustments. Senator Murray has been here long enough to know that happened.

Senator Murray: Before the disappearance of prestudy.

Senator Olson: So you are going to penalize everyone because there has been no prestudy. Senator Murray knows as well as I how he abused prestudy until it stopped. Why does he not admit that?

Senator Murray: Abuse? How?

Senator Olson: Yes, he abused it. He said that if we were going to do all these prestudies, we did not need the Senate committees.

Senator Grafstein: Why would you not correct a clear and present danger? Is that not what a legislative body is for?

Senator Murray: We only did prestudy when the Senate agreed to it.

Senator Olson: Are you going to tell the people in Canada that there are regional disparities because those Liberal-type senators did not do a prestudy? Is that a good reason not to correct a very serious injustice when it is right in front of your nose and you have an opportunity to correct it by voting the appropriate way tomorrow afternoon? It is ridiculous.

Senator Barootes states that it might be a good thing to maintain the high price of heating oil. I could not believe that anyone would say anything like that. He said, "Make heating fuel expensive enough and people might use a little less." Do you want people to freeze a little more? That is exactly what you said, that there would be some incentive to conserve heating fuel by turning the thermometer down to 65. I do not like to be in a house when it is at 65 degrees, and I doubt whether many Canadians like it either. I like the heat to be around 70 degrees, and if there is enough fuel in the country to meet the supply, I do not think the government should try to set up a taxation structure that will force people to live in misery. Is that what you want to do? That is what you said.

Senator Barootes: That is somewhat out of context.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators opposite have complained every time I have tried to point out that there are many other situations where regional disparities exist in the application of this tax. However, I said at the outset that I did not intend to address all of those disparities tonight. The people in my part of Canada will be paying approximately 20 per cent more federal sales tax because of the way this bill is structured, because almost all of the manufacturing plants are located in central Canada and we have to pay the high cost of freight. That is not fair. However, I will not pursue that matter tonight. I am talking about fuel and electricity costs, because those are outstanding examples of the unfairness and regional disparity in the way this tax is structured and applied.

I was impressed by questions asked by Senator Austin, following the speech made by Senator Hays, concerning all the legal problems. I do not believe that honourable senators opposite have thought those points through. We face enough problems with the provinces regarding unity and their right not to pay federal taxes. I will not get into the matter, but I am sure that there will be legal battles for years to come if this tax is brought in in its present form.

The spokesmen for the government, including particularly the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, who was supposed to promote peace, harmony and tranquillity between the two levels of government, say, "Not one amendment. No way. We're not going to make any amendments."

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Who said that?

Senator Olson: You did. That is exactly what you told us about the Meech Lake Accord, a seamless web that could not be changed without it all coming apart.

Senator Murray: I heard Senator Lucier quoting me as having said the same thing. Senator Lucier is clearly your authority. Tell me when and where I made such a statement.

Senator Grafstein: We made amendments in this place and you would not accept them.

Senator Olson: Perhaps I will have to take that remark back until I can find the source.

Senator Lucier: Senator Olson, you will not have to take it back. He made the comment on the news. He said that he would not accept amendments because there would be no time because they would have to go back to the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: I heard about that.

Senator Murray: I never said that.

Senator Olson: I have witnesses who heard you say it.

Senator Murray: I said that there was great difficulty with it.

Senator Austin: Can anyone show us a single time when Senator Murray has accepted an amendment to any government legislation?

Senator Murray: Senator Lucier quoted me as saying that no amendment would pass. How could I possibly take that position in a house that is as evenly balanced as this one about amendments I have not seen?

Senator Lucier: I thought it was a little strange myself.

Senator Murray: It is fiction.

Senator Olson: Can I take it that Senator Murray has softened his attitude slightly from what he said the other day? Now he is saying that if we come up with an amendment that is good enough, he might accept it.

Senator Grafstein: Ask him if he can suggest any.

Senator Olson: I suggest that there are no better examples than the one in front of the Senate right now. By this measure we are trying to correct a regional discriminatory inequity. It is part of the Senate's role. There are all kinds of regional discriminations in this bill, but this is a bad one. It is so simple to fix it. The government could do it tomorrow.

Honourable senators know that our objective is to kill the bill. We have reached the point where it may not be possible to achieve that objective, so we are ready to look at some improvements. Here is one suggested improvement. I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government would give us an undertaking that he will at least correct this provision.

I will conclude by appealing to senators opposite to set aside their partisanship and take up their responsibility as senators. When Confederation was discussed approximately 124 years ago, between 1864 and 1867, there was probably more discussion on how to protect the smaller provinces, particularly Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, against the larger population in what was then Upper Canada and Lower Canada, than on anything else. There is no doubt—and I have not read all of the debates, although I have read some of them—that if Upper and Lower Canada had not agreed to a bicameral system with an upper house known as the Senate with the authority that it presently has, there would not have been a Canada. The other provinces would not have joined the federation if they had not received that undertaking. That is why the Senate has the power to reject measures that are discriminatory against regions.

Members opposite should take these responsibilities seriously. It did not say in those debates that the Conservatives should do one thing and that the Liberals should do another. It said that this house should examine legislation and specifically identify and correct any discriminatory matters in the legislation. The Senate was given the power and authority under the Constitution to do it, and that is why I plead with members opposite now. It is so clear that if the Senate intends to discharge its responsibilities to the Fathers of Confederation and the people of Canada, this is what it ought to do.

Some 85 per cent of the population does not like this tax. Members opposite say, "Nobody likes taxes." That is not quite good enough. That is not what I heard as I travelled across the country with the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. People asked us over and over again to find a way to reduce expenditures and to increase taxes. They are ready to pay more taxes, but they do not want this kind of tax with all its injustices. Of course, they went on to point out the injustices. We will introduce six more amendments that deal with some of the injustices. Here is an opportunity for the Senate to perform its function. I do not think that anyone over there would disagree that this measure is an injustice against certain regions. So, in conclusion, I plead with honourable senators opposite to take up their responsibility as senators and as part of the body that is supposed to protect the regional interests of this country.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I wonder if Senator Olson would permit a question. I have been listening to what he has been saying, and I suspect that his pleas are falling on deaf hears.

Senator Olson: I hope they are not.

Senator Stewart: If the honourable senator will look at what has been said by the ministers of the present government for the past five or six years, he will discover that their position with regard to the Senate is almost virtually the same as that of the CCF and the NDP since 1933. They argue, as did the Labour Party in England, that there is no place in a modern democratic country for a body such as the Senate of Canada. The NDP argues consistently for the abolition of the Senate. In contrast the Progressive Conservative ministers say, " You have no role. Oh, yes, you have the role of doing a little, minor, sober second thinking, so long as you do not touch anything that is important, so that you can maintain the illusion that the Senate is doing something. Then, of course, we will make lots of patronage appointments to the Senate." That is really the function of the Senate, a place that receives patronage appointees.

I can document those comments and I intend to document them, from the mouths of Senator Murray, Prime Minister Mulroney, Harvey Andre, and on and on and on.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: And John Turner.

Senator Stewart: And John Turner. It is a consistent view that has prevailed in this country. Some of us came here in 1984 with the notion that if this place could not be changed, it ought to be abolished. We knew that we could not make it equal, that we on our own could not make it elective, but we thought that perhaps we could make it efficient. However, we ran into a general attitude that the Senate had nothing important to do, that it was improper for it to do anything.

Senator Cogger: What is the question?

Senator Stewart: John Turner and Brian Mulroney have the same attitude. Of course, the NDP has a hostility toward the Senate because as long as the Senate is here and has a legitimacy, they anticipate that it will veto their socialist measures. We understand that, but it amazes me that the Progressive Conservative government has taken exactly the same position.

I ask Senator Olson —

Senator Cogger: He does have a question!

Senator Stewart: I ask Senator Olson perhaps to save his efforts. Why should he plead with people who have taken a position that is even more hostile to the Senate than that of the CCF or the NDP?

Senator Olson: Honourable Senators, I am always hopeful. I travelled across the country and listened to many presentations on this tax. If the witnesses did not volunteer during their opening remarks that they believed that the Senate should take a hand in the matter of this bill, and, indeed, kill it, I would ask them: "Never mind wether the Senate has the authority under the constitution, do you think, in this modern age, 1990, that the Senate ought to assert its authority and defeat or, at least, severely modify this legislation?" Of those I asked, 137 said, "Yes, the Senate ought to use its authority now."

I will not say that I despair. I am still hopeful that enough of the Senators opposite will take their responsibilities seriously and correct this situation with respect to the discriminatory practice of taxing heating fuel. You could do that tomorrow, and people across the country would cheer for you.

Senator Grafstein: Tell them to sleep on it.

Senator Olson: Think about it carefully. The Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations has indicated that he would be interested in modifying Bill C-62 as it applies to fuel oil and electricity. He realizes that his government faces trouble in the courts. Some provinces are already taking the federal government to court over a measure that requires them to pay taxes to the federal government.

Senator Murray: It doesn't though.

Senator Olson: Oh, but it does.

Senator Murray: Oh, but it does not.

• (2210)

Senator Olson: That is their interpretation of it, but my guess is, whether it is direct or indirect taxation, they do not have a right to do that either. You are going to run into those kinds of problems.

My understanding is that the main job of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations is to make peace.

Senator Murray: Who told you that?

Senator Olson: Your Prime Minister told me that. He did not say it to me directly, but he has made several speeches indicating that there was going to be a new order in Canada and that there would be no more confrontation with the provinces. Do you not remember that? There was going to be "new civility". He used nice words like that.

Senator MacEachen: "National reconciliation".

Senator Olson: Yes, "national reconciliation". I do not want to be unkind, but since I started my political career 34 years ago, I cannot remember any time when there was more tension and complete disgust displayed by the people with respect to the way in which the two senior levels of government are carrying on. Now you have a chance to correct some of that. If you have made mistakes in the past, we will forgive you, but only on the basis that you will admit it and start doing things that will correct these mistakes. You can start that process tomorrow afternoon by saying you want to have better relations with the provinces and not get mixed up in this electricity issue with crown corporations that belong to the provinces. That is one step you could take.

Senator Grafstein: Ask Senator Barootes to talk to his caucus tomorrow.

Senator Olson: Another thing you can do is show you are on the side of the people. People out there do not believe that this government cares about them, and that is not good. I think it is very dangerous to continue to demonstrate that you do not care what the people think. That seems to be what is happening. You will not accept any amendments. Some people have heard you say, "No amendments." I have heard Harvie Andre say a number of times, "The Senate has no business in any budgetary matter."

Senator Bosa: He said it yesterday.

Senator Olson: He has said it a dozen times. The other day the Prime Minister stood outside the Commons and said, "The Senate has no business sticking its nose into this." I know that the people of this country believe that, if you are going to bulldoze this bill through, the Senate has not only the right and the power but an obligation to get involved in this situation.

I plead with you. You still have time because we are going to introduce some other good amendments that you can accept. However, here is a typical example of an amendment that you could make that would improve the situation, and I am sure Canadians all across this country would cheer for you if you did.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, earlier in the debate this evening, Senator Molson, in reply to Senator Lucier's appeal on this amendment, said that it was too late. At that time my colleague, Senator Riel said to me, "It is never too late to do the right thing." Indeed, that is what we are dealing with in this amendment: doing the right thing by Canadians.

I was encouraged earlier in the week when I heard Senator Castonguay say on television that senators on the opposite side were prepared to look at reasonable amendments.

Senator Grafstein: I believe Senator Simard said that.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, there can be no more reasonable amendment than the one that is now being proposed. I am disappointed that more senators on the other side are not taking part in this debate and explaining how they can defend this particular action. I wonder how Senator Cochrane is going to defend this measure in Newfoundland. How can she explain to Newfoundlanders, who are already the most disadvantaged people in Canada, that they will have to carry this extra burden? Honourable senators, it is not an equal burden but an extra burden over and above what other Canadians will be paying in other parts of the country.

Senator Grafstein: They already pay 12.4 per cent.

Senator Molgat: Last week when we were in the midst of Presentation of Petitions, I heard a number of senators on the opposite side say, "Let us get to the bill. We want to discuss the bill." My neighbour, Senator Sylvain, was making that very point last week. However, we do not hear a defence from the other side except from Senator Barootes.

What remedy did Senator Barootes offer this evening? He said that we have to go ahead with this; we have to have this tax on heating fuel. He said that the way to correct it is through income tax. I think Senator Barootes must be aware that in the past two years the government has attempted to make some amendments to the Income Tax Act with respect to where the boundaries should be drawn for northern allowance; it simply has not worked. It just does not work that way. It is true that in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories costs are higher, but even in my province, and in Senator Barootes' province the situation may vary. Living in Churchill is quite different from living in Winnipeg because costs in Churchill are substantially greater. Certainly the cost of heating fuels is greater and residents there use an awful lot more of it. They have no choice. There is no way out of it. Here we are imposing this extra burden on these people.

The solution cannot be found in the Income Tax Act. Where do you draw your boundaries? Are you going to draw the boundary halfway between Saskatoon and Regina? There is no way you can do that.

Honourable senators, I recently received a copy of a letter written to the Prime Minister and to Senator Lowell Murray.

The letter comes from Winnipeg and it is dated October 17. The writer of the letter says:

> I would appreciate the answer to a few questions concerning the GST. I have an eight room, 1,800 square feet house. My electric bill and my gas heating bill total $22 hundred per year. Seven-per-cent tax will be $154. I have a friend in Richmond, B.C., with the same size house. He pays $900 for electric and gas heat. Seven-per-cent tax equals $63.
> Why should I pay $91 more a year? We are both 70 years of age and have the same retirement income.

He then speaks about some other matter not related directly to heating fuel but to air fares for northern regions. That is a separate question so I will not read that part of the letter now.

He carries on to say:

> Why are you penalizing the prairies and the north? This is not New Zealand with an overall moderate climate.

Senator Buckwold: And a defeated government.

Senator Molgat: I think that explains the exact problem we have in Canada. It gets worse the further north you go but it is equally bad when you compare the prairies to Victoria.

Senator Barootes: If you live in Toronto you have to look at the poor areas and the rich areas. You cannot correct them all.

Senator Molgat: It is not a question of poor areas and rich areas: It is a question of geography and climate in this country.

I do not blame honourable senators across the way because they have been conned in this matter. This is a bureaucratic nightmare. This has been imposed on them by bureaucrats and it has not been looked at by people with common sense. In this country the climate varies as the geography varies, and to impose a tax like this on heating fuels is manifestly unfair to certain parts of the country. I repeat: Senator Cochrane's area is going to suffer a great deal more than, say, Windsor. Is that reasonable? Is that a proper way to levy taxes in this country? Bureaucratic systems are in place. This is not a system which deals with the problems of people. That is what we have to look at. You cannot do this by drawing an imaginary line so that someone above that line will get an exemption from income tax. You cannot place that line in a reasonable place. It does not work that way.

Honourable senators, let us follow Senator Castonguay's proposal of yesterday and deal with common sense amendments. Surely, when you look at this you have to recognize that it is an unfair tax to load on certain parts of the country, and that the only solution at this point is to remove the tax on that particular item just as the bill provides for food. You have agreed that food should not be taxed. In Canada heat is an equally essential commodity. There is no question about that.

The impact of this is worse than the impact of the tax on food because the consumption of heating fuels varies very much more than the consumption of food. Northerners, by and large, do not eat more food than southerners. They pay more for it but they do not eat more of it. However, when it comes to heating fuels, they certainly consume a lot more than people in the south. If there is a logic in not taxing food, there is a double logic in not taxing heating fuel. Quite frankly, you are discriminating against my province when you proceed to do that, because my province is a lot colder than central Canada. Honourable senators, it is a lot colder in Manitoba than it is in Ottawa or Toronto and we burn a lot more fuel. Our fuel costs us more. You are going to force my people to pay an extra tax—a tax that they cannot get away from. They have no choice.

Honourable senators, I ask you to reconsider. Do not let the bureaucrats push you into a tax like this one on this particular item. This is one area where we can make a change and we deserve to make that change to equalize the system for Canadians.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, earlier this evening in this debate I raised the question of the constitutional application of the GST to electricity and fuels, where they were supplied by crown agencies. Senator Murray invited me to put these questions in writing and submit them to him.

I would now like to put the questions on the record and I look forward to the response from the government side. Question one is: With respect to the tax provisions of Bill C-62 as they relate to electricity and heating fuels, what is the constitutional authority of the federal government to compel provincial crown corporations such as B.C. Hydro, Ontario Hydro or Quebec Hydro or cities and municipalities chartered by provinces which supply electricity and/or heating fuels to collect GST from non-governmental consumers and/or from consumers which are provincially or municipally owned?

Senator Balfour: Are you asking for a legal opinion?

Senator Austin: I am asking for the federal government's constitutional opinion. Perhaps you would let me finish the questions, Senator Balfour.

Question two is: Section 125 of the Constitution provides that "No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation." This provision has received judicial interpretation in the Alberta natural gas tax reference. The Supreme Court gave the provincial agencies immunity from the tax process. Does this immunity apply to the GST? Here the paramount purpose of the GST is to raise revenue. The Privy Council decision in Attorney General of British Columbia v. The Solicitor General of Canada, (1924) Appeal Cases, at page 222, would suggest that Bill C-62 is unconstitutional as it purports to apply to crown-owned agencies. What is the position of the federal government and why?

There are raised here constitutional questions and, of course, they are of a legal character, but the most grievous accusation that is made in terms of the inequity of this legislation, Bill C-62, relates to harmonisation. It is simply unworkable legislation. There is no harmonisation with provincial governments. There is no sign, with the exception of Quebec, of any agreement and we may well find ourselves in a situation where the tax is not going to be collected by crown agencies or municipalities and the federal government will have an administrative nightmare on its hands.

I am asking Senator Murray to respond to these issues and to assure us that the federal government is satisfied as to its constitutional entitlement. It is a rule of parliamentary practice and convention that parliament will not pass legislation that is palpably unconstitutional and I believe that this legislation has that character. I look forward to Senator Murray's response.

• (2220)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Austin points out that section 125 of the Constitution Act provides that lands or property of a province are not subject to tax. There is nothing in Bill C-62 which subjects the provinces to the tax.

At the same time, there is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits the federal parliament from requiring a provincial agency to collect the tax, and that is what we are doing in Bill C-62.

Indeed, in respect of the honourable senator's second question, the bill expressly provides that the taxing provisions of the bill do not apply to Her Majesty in the right of a province—that is, a province or entities which are crown agencies. Municipalities, which the honourable senator mentioned, universities, schools and hospitals are not crown agents.

The short answer is that the bill does apply to provincial agents but only to require them to collect the tax which is imposed on others.

Senator Austin: I appreciate the timely answer, Senator Murray, and I don't intend to enter into a legal quarrel with you. But I will go this far: As you know, three provinces are testing the constitutionality of this legislation and its applicability to those provinces. Litigation has been commenced by the Province of Alberta, which is supported by the Provinces of British Columbia and Ontario.

My own view is that the government should have this issue settled before this legislation proceeds. If the government opinion, as expressed by Senator Murray, is found wanting, there will be an administrative nightmare, and many tens, if not hundreds, of thousands of Canadians will be caught up in it.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by Senator Hays, for Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Molgat:

That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make provision for electricity and heating fuels by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and part as follows:

"ELECTRICITY AND HEATING FUELS

1. A supply of electricity and heating fuels."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to provisional Rule P(3)(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

An Hon. Senator: Well done!

Senator Petten: Not necessarily, senator. We can ring the bell for 30 minutes. Ask your whip about it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to Rule P(3)(a), Senator Petten is suggesting that we vote on the motion tomorrow at 5:45 p.m.

Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

That having been done, honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

ABORTION

REQUEST FOR BALANCED IN-DEPTH STUDY OF BILL C-43 BY LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first opportunity I have had to raise this question of privilege.

On October 25, 1990, I gave notice in this chamber that I would like to move an urgent motion having to do with the study of a most important bill, Bill C-43, which deals with abortion. However, the current rules with regard to debate on third reading of Bill C-62 prevent me from now getting to my motion, which is Motion No. 3, the last item of business under Motions.

The work of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee has already begun. The way it is unfolding has given me some concern, as well as disappointment and frustration. On June 26 there was final debate on second reading of Bill C-43. The bill's sponsor, Senator Doody, spoke of referring the bill to committee. What he said is recorded in Hansard at page 2154. He said:

> I should stress again that this is not the last time honourable senators will have an opportunity to speak on this . . .

and I underline these few words,

> . . . enormously important bill. We simply ask at this time that it be referred to committee for study and for consideration.

Honourable senators, I note that Bill C-43 is acknowledged to be an enormously important bill and that correspondingly it is referred for study and consideration.

Prior to this speech by Senator Doody, I had spoken to second reading of Bill C-43 on the serious flaws and the current wording and design of this important bill. Senator Doody went on to say:

> I am sure that many of the points raised by Senator Haidasz this evening will be reviewed at that time.

He meant in committee. He continued:

> At third reading stage the concerns that many senators have may be addressed again.

Although Senator Doody did not say it, I am sure he allowed for the additional treatment this "enormously important bill" ought to receive also at the committee's report stage.

Immediately following these remarks by Senator Doody, Senator Frith, on the motion to refer the bill to committee, said:

> . . . I think it is worth noting that Senator Haidasz has provided a very detailed critique of the bill, which, if I heard him correctly, contains some 14 flaws. I refer them to the committee for particular study.

Honourable senators, it is the understanding in this house that the work of a permanent standing committee is serious business.

Committees act as an arm of the house, undertaking to study a bill clause by clause or even word by word, identifying any weaknesses and proposing such amendments as may render the bill acceptable to good legislative sense. By third reading of a bill, our rules and practice foresee that we in this house will derive informed debate from the process already achieved in committee, where legislation is supposed to be thoroughly appraised and sometimes, after much effort, proposed for amendment. The debate in this house at third reading of a bill may, of course, reconsider matters dealt with, though incompletely, at second reading. In Appendix 1 of the current Rules of the Senate at page 64 we find:

> In general, the same kinds of amendment may be moved on third reading as may be moved on second reading . . .

The text goes on to say:

> . . . the Senate has exercised flexibility in this regard.

Many examples can be taken from the Journals, where at third reading a matter was added to the objects of a bill.

It is clear, therefore, that by the time a bill is given third reading a member of the house is sufficiently apprised of the nature and ramifications of the bill so as to debate proposed amendments or knowledgeably propose others.

Knowledgeable preparation of honourable senators can only be the result of the painstaking work at committee stage, rendered to the whole house at report stage. Nothing else lies between the cursory debate at second reading and the commencement of debate at third reading. This reveals the mandated thoroughness that is the responsibility of any select committee. The learned editor, Sir Charles Gordon, in the twentieth edition of Erskine May's treatise on Parliamentary Practice, at page 527, states as follows:

> The various stages through which a bill progresses are intended by the practice of Parliament to provide so many opportunities, not only for consideration, but also for reconsideration.

By third reading, a bill is generally reconsidered in its final form after the shaping it has received in its earlier stages. This is maintained by Erskine May in his work at page 528. What is this shaping, to use May's term, that a bill has undergone by the time it is examined at third reading?

Honourable senators, what lies between the first look at second reading and a knowledgeable review at third reading is the work of the committees and their reports. How important, therefore, is a committee's thorough examination of a bill and proposal of various amendments for the consideration of the Senate. The British experience in 1945 is instructive. Sir Gordon records, at pages 536 to 537, that a government witness, speaking to the Select Committee on Procedure about the committal of bills to standing committees, recommended that an exception would have to be made if any bill of first class constitutional importance were introduced. Bill C-43, I maintain, is of first-class constitutional importance.

The British House of Commons has since then regularly committed such bills to a Committee of the Whole house. Bills of prime constitutional significance deserve all the more to be dealt with in a full scale committee, not merely at second reading, as though that were sufficient to appraise the objects, and not left to third reading.

Erskine May, for example, states at page 499 in the twentieth edition of his work, where he is addressing second reading in the Upper House, as follows:

> It is irregular at this stage to examine minutely the details of the clauses, which can be discussed more properly in committee.

By third reading any possible amendments will have taken shape for informed debate, a shape conferred in committee where senators should conduct a thorough study of a bill.

There can be no doubt that a committee given a bill as controversial and far-reaching in its ramifications as this abortion bill is bound to be, and should undertake the serious work of amending its legislative weaknesses. It is possible that a bill flawed as Bill C-43 can be sufficiently amended so as to produce sound law, and a law that can be abided and obeyed by all who respect life in all its stages.

Beauchesne, at paragraph 764.(2), Fifth Edition, states:

> The committee may so change the provisions of the bill that when it is reported to the House it is in substance a bill other than that which was referred. A committee may negative every clause and substitute new clauses, . . .

That is provided if the committee is so instructed, and if the new clauses are at least relevant to the bill as read a second time.

Following British practice cited in Erskine May, twentieth edition, page 539, Beauchesne also notes at paragraph 764(3) that even with reference to the long title of the bill, which should include its objects, amendments are not necessarily limited to these. He explains further, as pursuant to Standing Order No. 44 in 1854, that all committees were empowered—and here I quote from Erskine May:

> . . . to make such amendments therein—

That is, to committed bills—

> as they should think fit, provided that the amendments were relevant to the subject matter of the bill;

Beauchesne in paragraph 764(4) clarifies that without instruction from the house—and this concerns my question of privilege and especially the topic of my motion—"an amendment which is outside the scope of the bill cannot be entertained."

With or without an instruction, therefore, it is assuredly in the interests of complete and detailed consideration of a bill, according to parliamentary principles, that there exist abundant measures for committees. These measures in our rules and practices include, among others, first, committal of a bill after second reading to a special or joint committee or Committee of the Whole; second, withdrawal of a bill from one committee and committal to another committee—this can be substantiated by reading Beauchesne, on page 755, paragraph 4; third, instruction to the committee to give prior consideration to a portion of the bill and report separately on it. That authority can be found in Beauchesne, at page 761, paragraph 4.

The fourth measure is a combination of the latter two with the effect of treating parts or aspects of bills in separate committees, as happens in the British Parliament. That can be found at page 537 of Erskine May.

The fifth measure is a mandatory instruction of a committee to go beyond its usual acceptance of the bill's principle for the sake of argument, to the consideration of amendments

> "which extend its provisions to objects not strictly covered by the subject matter of the bill as agreed to on the second reading, provided that these objects are cognate to its general purposes."

That authority is also from Beauchesne, page 761, paragraph one.

Honourable senators, there exists a unique Senate rule in our house, rule 78(4), which provides that if, after the expected thoroughgoing assessment of a bill, a committee finds no reason to recommend any amendments at all, which I fear might be done in this case, then its report is tabled without debate, and the third reading commences. Such a rule can only be understood to entail that a committee has made every due consideration of all known legislative weaknesses, and found none worth amending.

Honourable senators most assuredly entrust their privileges to the learned efforts of their colleagues who undertake the thorough business of committee. The streamlining rule 78(4) in our rule book does not mean that a committee is free to dispense with its mandate. Again, to quote Beauchesne, this mandate is to "make such amendments . . . as may seem likely to render a bill more generally acceptable." That authority is found at page 763 of Erskine May.

The point of my motion, honourable senators, to instruct the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs regarding Bill C-43, is therefore the following. At the outset of the sittings of that committee I received the impression, from listening to the comments of my colleagues on the committee, that of the various groups and individuals who had been selected as witnesses, the pro-choice representations outnumbered the pro-life side of the issue almost two to one. Reading the summarized briefs of these witnesses revealed that none of the pro-choice advocates were considering amendments to the bill, but instead were recommending that it be dropped with no criminal legislation to replace it. Of prospective witnesses, the ones who offer debatable suggestions for shoring up the deficiencies of the bill are generally pro-life.

Therefore, since the bill was government initiated, it seemed very odd that the number of witnesses who could expertly recommend amendments to keep it afloat in some legitimate sense was overwhelmed by those who seek to negate this and all future criminal legislation on abortion.

Moreover, I have copies of briefs from at least four other pro-life groups who have requested invitation to appear and who have received no invitation. These are: Campaign Life Coalition, Right to Life of Toronto and Area, Action Life, and Alliance for Life of Southwest Ontario.

In reality, it is up to a committee to send out a summons to appear, and this it can do unsolicited. The larger denominations that have a necessarily pro-life stance, Jewish or Christian, have not, to my knowledge, been summoned up to this date.

All these witnesses to the important committee process are able to speak substantially to the legal, constitutional, ethical, sociological, and scientific implications of this bill, than what is presented in the pro-choice briefs that I have read—since the pro-life masses are, like the true mother before Solomon, willing to discuss terms.

As well, society is known to lean more than just half way toward the legal protection of the sanctity of human life. My own 1988-1989 survey of 65,000 persons across Canada obtained a response rate of 16.4 per cent, which is far more than Gallup polls and most of the media polls on the issue for whom 10 per cent is considered excellent. The results of my survey substantially clarify what several media polls had begun to find, in spite of their methodological bias. Seventy-three per cent of the respondents to my survey consider an unborn child at any stage to be a human being. Sixty-nine per cent, more than the two-thirds majority we require for leave of the rules in this house, believe that all human beings have absolute right to life at every stage of development. Disturbing enough that there should be any, those who would have abortion on request were only 14 per cent.

The public support for defence of unborn Canadians is overwhelming. Already, in 1975, some 35 boxes of petitions from over 1.027 million Canadians who sought such protection were presented to Parliament. This is several times more people than filed petitions at any other time in Canadian history. With increasing awareness of post-abortion syndrome and a blood tide of 70,000 killings a year of innocent and helpless preborn children, the public demands for legislation protecting its first interest, human life, is only increasing. It would be only fair, therefore, to try to balance fairly the proportion of pro-life witnesses in a committee studying Bill C-43.

In addition, I noted the conspicuous absence of medical and scientific experts such as the world-renowned geneticist and Nobel Prize laureate, Professor Jérôme LeJeune of Paris, the doctor who established uncontroverted evidence in the Borowski case of 1987-88 that human life begins at conception. Instead, we were to hear from Henry Morgentaler, whose only real expertise I shudder to describe.

At the outset of committee sessions, I was given to believe that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee does not anticipate recommending amendments to the house, except perhaps to report an amendment formerly dealt with in the House of Commons Legislative Committee, as brought up for mention by the Minister of Justice. That does not amount to a recommendation for amendment, as she herself did not recommend it.

The preponderance of witnesses already selected by the steering committee do not recommend anything that endorses the principle of criminalizing abortion. I could be tempted to wonder if the committee had decided in advance to let the bill die because of its great unpopularity. It could do this by reporting the nearly unanimous objections of its selected witnesses to criminalizing abortion at all. After all, even the Justice Minister changed her tone to avow that she could just as happily live with no law on abortion.

Upon making these observations, I rose in this chamber on October 25—which was my earliest opportunity—to give notice of my motion now before honourable senators. My motion was that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be instructed to act fully as a committee and try amendments, after calling pertinent witnesses from the major fields that Bill C-43 will dramatically affect. Without a law protecting preborn children, the research and experiments on human beings in fertility labs and other clinics have no ethical guidelines for the sanctity of the conceived life itself. All the believers in one God, who live in this great land, could not brook lawlessness; and where there is utter disregard for the innocent and the helpless, the seeds of deepest civil strife are sown.

Honourable senators, as I mentioned upon rising, in my research outlined on June 26 in this chamber, I found in Bill C-43, as presented to us from the other house, some 14 major flaws to which Senator Frith drew our attention. I strenuously argued against its design in the received form. However, I for one have studied amendments that would greatly improve this bill and perhaps render it acceptable to this whole socially-sensitive house and to Canadian society. I fail to see how the government side could object to that, as Canadians far and wide have for some three years besought solid legislation in this field.

The Supreme Court, in the 1988 Morgentaler case, speaking of federal abortion legislation, acknowledged that:

> The primary objective... is the protection of the foetus... a perfectly valid legislative objective.

This statement was made by Madam Justice Wilson. It spoke of the state's interest in the life of the preborn child as "pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society." This was emphasized in the judgments rendered by Justices Beetz and Estey.

The Supreme Court did impugn the administrative procedural design of the 1969 law. It left Parliament to legislate in this field. The court merely required a closer attention to avoiding unwieldiness in the escape clause or exculpatory provision of the law. Most major criminal offences require an escape clause for the absence of mens rea or ill will on the part of a defendant. While the escape clause of Bill C-43 is convoluted as part of the offence itself and may be far too destructive of the principle, it remains possible to amend it. At least such amendments are debatable.

The Daigle case of 1989 spoke positively of this important need in legislation on abortion. Speaking of policy, which in Morgentaler it was also careful not to adjudicate, that court said:

> "Decisions based on broad social, political, moral and economic choices are more appropriately left to the legislature."

Here is our opportunity. As in Morgentaler, the court did not state that the parlance "everyone" in section 7 of the Charter should not include the preborn child, but rather called the settlement of that question of "normative task." A normative task, honourable senators, is a definitive task, belonging exclusively to legislature in clarifying its own legislative will.

Help in this direction is available in the findings of the learned Quebec Judges Nichols and Bernier. Judge Nichols found that, regardless of their accorded legal status, narrowly understood, the interests of the preborn "have been recognized by custom and implicitly consecrated in our laws." That, I believe, is a beautiful touchstone of French civil code as compared with other common law. Judge Bernier argued that the child "en ventre de sa mère" is entitled to be carried to term. The child, he said, "cannot be deprived of his natural right to life without cause which is just, sufficient, and acceptable in a free and democratic society."

Genuine legislative work on Bill C-43 is possible, given that the committee treating it pursues analysis and substantial amendment, helped by the best of jurisprudent advice and fundamental principles of justice. The power of Parliament to legislate is plenary, and its sensitivity to society should consider in depth the submissions of genuine experts yet to be called.

I believe, therefore, that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee stands in need of an instruction to pursue the failures of Bill C-43 at substantial and penetrating depth, as is proper to a committee looking into a bill of such first-class constitutional importance as Bill C-43.

Beauchesne tells us that an instruction may be required to direct a committee to do something which it might otherwise not do. At the present time, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee perhaps does not believe that it is within its understood scope to consider amendments which extend the objects of the bill so as to render Bill C-43 more generally acceptable. It is appropriate, therefore, for this house to issue a mandatory instruction to broaden the objects in keeping with the constitutionally-valid intent of a law on abortion to the full extent that the house as a whole or a committee of the whole would entertain. It is suitable to instruct the committee to hear from experts and pro-life groups who have positive suggestions for rendering Bill C-43 a valid criminal law, rather than to hear from a disproportionate number of witnesses who desire to negate the whole principle of Bill C-43. The debate about acceptability, for social policy, of various valid amendments, could then informatively be taken up at the report stage and at third reading.

The abortion of some 1.5 million of Canada's progeny in one generation, added to the fact that many of the killed preborn would now have reached child-bearing age themselves, is immoral. It is national genocide. It is a travesty of the fundamental principle of respect for life from its very beginning. The abortion rate, less measurable since 1988, may have saturated itself at the 70,000 plus per year level reached since the Morgantaler decision.

Canada could not sustain the loss of 20,000 soldiers per year in the First World War, the war to end all wars, which we dare to remember at this time of year. Let us also remember for whom those men died and women suffered: for the future of Canada, their children and their children's children. In the face of a full-tilt annihilation rate of 70,000 a year, a bill regarding abortion certainly does have prime constitutional importance, and not only.

If there existed no committee competent to deal with the various profound ramifications of such a bill as C-43, we would most certainly have resolved ourselves into a Committee of the Whole to deal with it, following British practice since the Second World War. Otherwise, we would have assembled a special committee. As it is, we do have a committee which can at least address the most salient constitutional ramifications of Bill C-43, since justice and rights extend to every sphere of human life. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is competent to deal with the ethical, sociological and scientific ramifications of Bill C-43 in addition to the manifestly legal and constitutional ones which some members of that committee want to emphasize.

I move, therefore, that an obligatory instruction be given by this house to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to give particular study to the individual flaws of Bill C-43 as identified, for instance, in my speech on June 26, and that the committee give full study and call expert witnesses to address all issues that are cognate to the bill, including its legal, constitutional, ethical, sociological and scientific implications, and to consider appropriate amendments to Bill C-43.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Haidasz rose on what was purported to be a question of privilege. Perhaps there is, somewhere in that long and lucid address which he gave us, a point of privilege. If so, I did not detect it at the time. I was loath to interrupt him—

Senator Haidasz: I mentioned it at the outset—

Senator Doody: Senator Haidasz, I did not interrupt you for a minute and I would ask you to sit down, please.

Perhaps in the text of that long and interesting document there may be the germ of a question of privilege, honourable senators. After I receive a copy of today's Debates I will take a look at it and see if I can comment on it. At this point, of course, I am not in a position to do so. I do not think there is any immediate urgency about this matter, because the bill has gone through the proper procedure. It has received first and second reading and has been referred to the committee, which currently is studying it, calling witnesses, and so forth.

I should like at this point to take the adjournment of the debate, read the transcript of comments of Senator Haidasz and reserve the right to comment on them at a later time.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we know, Rule 19 provides for the order of business as called by the Chair thus: Presentation of Petitions, Reading of Petitions, Reports of Committees, Notices of Inquiries, Notices of Motions, Question Period, Orders of the Day, Inquiries and Motions. Senator Doody and I have had a discussion about a possible change to that order for today, for which we will therefore need unanimous consent. It is proposed that we proceed to the fourth order on the order paper, the second reading of the Bill C-86, with a view to giving it second reading and referring it to committee today. The committee is poised to deal with it a 4 o'clock.

It is also proposed that, because of some commitments of the Leader of the Government, we then proceed to Question Period and, at the end of Question Period, revert back to Presentation of Petitions. Then, in due course, we will no doubt find our way to the Orders of the Day. Therefore, if there is unanimous consent, I propose that we follow that procedure.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honorable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-86, to amend the Income Tax Act (child tax credit).

[Senator Haidasz.]

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is a fairly simple but important one. I should first like to thank honourable senators for giving me leave to proceed with it at this time. It went through all stages in the House of Commons the day before yesterday and although it received first reading here yesterday I was reluctant to proceed with second reading because, quite frankly, I was not familiar with the contents of the bill. However, I appreciate the opportunity to do so now.

Bill C-86 will raise the income ceiling with respect to prepayment of the refundable child tax credit. The refundable child tax credit was established in 1978 at a maximum rate of $200 per child, and the income ceiling was set at $18,000. The credit was modified in 1982, being set at $383, and the indexing feature was then modified to be 3 per cent lower than the increase in the consumer price index.

An important set of changes was made in 1986. As well as substantial improvements to the amount of the credit and changes to the threshold, the concept of prepayment of a portion of the benefits was introduced. At that time, the amount of prepayment was set at $300 and the threshold for prepayments was set at $15,000.

Finally, in 1988, a number of changes were made, which included a new supplement relating to child care expenses. As well, the law was amended to produce the present arrangement. Under this arrangement, there is prepayment of up to two-thirds of the estimated refundable child tax credit, if the family's income does not exceed two-thirds of the family income ceiling for the credit itself.

This situation, however, does not make adequate allowance for those families with three or more children whose incomes fall in the zone between the two-thirds limit and the income ceiling.

The budget proposal rectifies this situation. By raising the income ceiling for prepayment to 100 per cent of the family income ceiling for those families with three or more children, the government is recognizing the special needs of such families. This is particularly helpful at the normal time the prepayment is received, which is at the beginning of the winter season. It means that families with three or more children, whose income in 1990 falls between $16,513 and $24,769, will qualify for the prepayment of their child tax credit.

It is estimated that close to 70,000 families with an estimated 236,000 children will benefit from this change. After the change is made, some 730,000 families will qualify for the prepayment. After being announced in the February budget, this proposal was incorporated in the package of technical amendments released on July 13. We have now brought it forward in separate legislation so that consideration of the measure can proceed as quickly as possible. This is important, as it will allow the change to be implemented in time for those qualifying under its provisions to receive their prepayment in November.

I urge all honourable senators to move this bill forward as quickly as possible, so that the measure can be implemented in time to benefit those it is intended to help.

I thank Senator Marsden and her committee for preparing themselves to receive the bill so quickly, and I commend it to the Senate for second reading.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On a point of order, Senator Doody, normally when you introduce a piece of legislation on second reading someone on this side adjourns the debate. We then have an opportunity in the interval to study your remarks in the printed Hansard. In order to expedite matters, would you be agreeable to providing us with copies of the notes that you have just read? They contain a number of figures, and we should like to be able to quote them accurately. Is there any objection to that?

Senator Doody: I have no problem with that, Senator Corbin. I should be pleased to do so, if the page would now take my notes and have them copied.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, we welcome Bill C-86. If fact, we wish we had seen it sooner. This bill does everything that Senator Doody has described. The problems faced by families with children all the time, but certainly in this economic climate, are ones that we should like to alleviate as quickly as possible by the rapid passage of this bill through the Senate—I hope today.

The minister has told the public that the cheques that those families will receive can be in the mail by the end of the week. The families who were expecting this money were told that the cheques would be mailed on November 1. We are already a week late. The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is prepared to meet at 4 o'clock this afternoon. We have a witness coming from the Department of Finance to speak to some of the intricacies of this bill. It is simple, but, at the same time, there are questions that arise concerning it. Certainly from this side of the house we give full and as rapid support to this bill as we can.

Before resuming my seat, I wonder if, with leave of the Senate, I could move that the committee be authorized to meet, even though the Senate may still be sitting.

Senator Doody: Wait until the bill is referred.

Senator Marsden: I make the request to move that motion because we may not reach "Notices of Motions" before 4 o'clock.

Senator Doody: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak on the bill, I move second reading.

Senator Corbin: I should like to say something.

Senator Doody: I am sorry. Does Senator Corbin wish to wait until the notes are here?

Senator Corbin: I am quite agreeable to that. I just want to put on the record that I wished to speak on this, but changes in today's Order of Business were made at the last minute and I am not now in a position to speak. I do not have the honourable Senator's notes. He may do whatever he wishes.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marsden, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lorna Marsden, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable sentors?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN HOSTAGES IN IRAQ—PROPOSAL TO SEND PARLIAMENTARY NEGOTIATORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I heard that three members of the other place are going to Iraq to try to bring home some of our Canadian citizens who are held hostage in that country. I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell me, first, why there has been a change in the stance of the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Clark?

Secondly, why did he not approve of the change in the first place? Finally, what made the difference? Is the situation in Iraq much improved or much worse? Why did the government change its position?

I have another question on that subject. Will a member of the Government of Canada—not a member of the Conservative Party—be part of the delegation to bring some higher prestige and a higher government profile to the group going to Iraq to intercede on behalf of Canadians held hostage there?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, unless something has happened in the past few minutes, I think I can assure the honourable senator that there has been no change in position on the part of the government with regard to this matter.

Senator Bonnell: It is not going to agree to send someone over?

Senator Murray: If, indeed, some members of the other place intend to go to Baghdad, it would be on an unofficial basis. While our embassy in Baghdad might offer them the usual courtesies granted to members of Parliament visiting foreign countries, they would not have any official status. In other words, they would certainly not be there on behalf of the Government of Canada, nor authorized to enter into any discussion on behalf of the government.

● (1450)

I am not aware that there is any plan on the part of the Progressive Conservative caucus to send one of its members to Baghdad with this delegation, if indeed there is such a delegation.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I understand that Mr. Bob Corbett, an M.P. from New Brunswick, has received the approval of Mr. Joe Clark, M.P. from High River, to go as a member of the group with Mr. Axworthy of Winnipeg and Mr. Svend Robinson of B.C. in order that the three political parties be represented.

They have the approval of Mr. Clark and the Prime Minister. They are receiving advice from the Department of External Affairs, as well as the Canadian ambassador to Iraq. They have already been in contact with the Canadian ambassador to Iraq to obtain information on how to go about meeting these people over there.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if, indeed, my friend Mr. Corbett is going to Iraq with the Hon. Lloyd Axworthy and Mr. Svend Robinson, he will have the same status as Mr. Axworthy and Mr. Robinson—that is to say, an unofficial status. It is an unofficial visit.

As I explained a few moments ago, the Department of External Affairs and our embassy in Baghdad will offer to these people the same courtesies that they offer to my honourable friend during his frequent trips abroad, or to any other senator or Member of Parliament.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am not 100 per cent convinced as to that last point. When I have gone abroad, it has not been through the Canadian embassy, and Joe Clark, Secretary of State for External Affairs, arranged nothing for me.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Bonnell: However, on this occasion I understand the trip has been arranged through the Department of External Affairs. These three gentlemen are being briefed by the Department of External Affairs and the Hon. Joe Clark is agreeing to their taking the trip. Is he agreeing to the trip with one eye shut and the other eye open; or does he openly say that he supports it or is against it?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government has declined to send official representatives on this kind of mission. As I explained earlier, they are being briefed, of course, by External Affairs, as my honourable friend would be briefed by External Affairs if he were going to Baghdad and asked for such a briefing. When Messrs. Axworthy, Robinson and Corbett arrive there they will be given the usual courtesies that are extended to parliamentarians by our embassy in Baghdad. That is the end of it.

The honourable senator should not seek to attach an official label to what is essentially an unofficial and, indeed, private visit.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not want to give the impression that I am against this visit. I think it is wonderful that three Members of Parliament are so concerned about Canadians being held hostage that they are trying to get them home. I wish to give them my full support. I think Bob Corbett, Svend Robinson and Lloyd Axworthy deserve a great deal of credit from Canadians. I am surprised that the Government of Canada is not more actively trying to save the lives of those Canadians who are being held hostage. Why does the government not come out and say why it is against this? The Japanese sent over a delegation to bring their people home, as did Germany. There are also other countries which are bringing their citizens home.

I simply want to congratulate those Members of Parliament for taking this initiative on their own. The government does not seem to care about Canadians who are being held hostage abroad. If there is any reason why the government is not doing anything about it, I would like to have the minister tell us.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, so far it can be said of the government's policy with regard to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the threat that it poses to peace and stability in that area of the world, and in the world at large, that the government's policy is Canada's policy. It has enjoyed, generally speaking, bipartisan support. I think it ill behooves the honourable senator to try to make cheap political points from it.

However, let me tell him that Canada, through our ambassador to Iraq, and through the Iraqi ambassador to Canada, continues to press Iraq to release the 13 Canadians trapped in Kuwait and the 24 who are in Iraq. We have been doing that through the normal official channels.

We also fully support the UN resolutions which condemn the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq and which also condemn the refusal by Iraq to release trapped foreign nationals.

Having said all that, I should state for the record, and in reply to the honourable senator, that Canada and other governments are unwilling to allow Canadians trapped in the Middle East to be used as bargaining chips in Iraq's attempt to wrest concessions from the world that is arrayed against it.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not know anything about bargaining chips. However, I do know that we have Canadian boys and girls over there whom we would love to have back home safe on our Canadian soil. I think the government should do everything it can to protect the lives of those people and to get them home into safe territory.

It seems that countries such as Japan, Germany and others can go over there to negotiate bringing their people home. I am not suggesting that we say that we will give them free wheat or that we will buy all their oil just because they will agree to send someone home. Certainly, by negotiating and sitting down to talk it might be found that we might be able to save the lives of Canadians if we try. However, when we do not try, I do not see how we can do much about it.

I am not one for electioneering, nor am I interested in making political points, since I am not running for election. Perhaps the Leader of the Government is interested in it and that is what he is trying to bring into this situation. I was giving him credit because Mr. Corbett, who is a Conservative Member of Parliament, is going. I think it is a great thing that he is doing for us.

DISPOSITION OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN MIDDLE EAST

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Is it true that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said as much that, regardless of the United Nations or the Americans, Canada will be sending our troops over there to solve the crisis in the Middle East. Is he not going to wait for the United Nations to make up a peacekeeping force? Are we going to send our troops over there when we could not stop 12 Indians in Quebec?

With regard to the second part of the question posed by the honourable senator, the answer is no.

PERSIAN GULF

COMMAND STRUCTURE OF JOINT FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, my question deals with further amplification of the government's policy concerning the Gulf crisis. The U.S. Secretary of State, Mr. Baker, is currently on a trip to the Middle East. One of the reports flowing from his trip is that the Americans appear to have agreed with the Saudis that there would be a joint command structure with the Americans taking command for at least the land forces, and probably the air cover forces, in Saudi Arabia. Apparently the Saudis have also agreed to allow offensive actions as opposed to purely defensive actions to be launched from Saudi territory.

What agreement, if any, has been reached with respect to the command structure as it applies to Canadian forces in the Gulf, first with respect to air and then with respect to sea?

• (1500)

Senator Grafstein: Will you also at that time advise us more fully as to the government's response to the Auditor General's criticism that the Canadian forces do not have sufficient medical logistics in order to support the Canadian forces in that area? Finally, will you outline to us at the earliest possible moment what, if any, plans the Canadian government has, on a contingent basis, to employ additional forces in the Gulf if hostilities break out? What would be the services employed? What number of Canadians in the services would be employed? What would be their mission?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to the first part of the question, I will obtain a report from Mr. McKnight, the Minister of National Defence.

I can only tell the honourable senator that the government has committed itself to bring another resolution to Parliament in the event that hostilities break out.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

REFUNDABLE TAX CREDIT—PURPOSE OF PAYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: I have a question for the Leader of the Government. One of the positions taken by the government in proposing the GST and relieving lower-income families of the burden of additional taxation is the refundable GST credit. We know this is to be paid in advance, and December 1 is the date for the first payment of quarterly payments which would bring in for a family some $580 a year. That represents some $140 coming to them on December 1.

My remarks pertain to what happened in the House of Commons yesterday when the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, complaining about the Senate holding up the goods and services tax legislation, indicated that this seriously affected business because the money is not going forward yet. It was proposed to be paid on December 1 to some 6 million to 7 million taxpayers, which represents an enormous amount of money.

During the Senate hearings the question was asked whether it was proper to advance the money before it was spent. By giving the money in advance to people who need it, quite rightly, many witnesses indicated that this might not lead to proper disbursement of the funds when they are needed.

All of this is preamble to a statement made by the minister in the House yesterday that the Senate opposition should be pressured to get this legislation through so the money can go out to "help lower-income Canadians purchase things during the pre-Christmas period". That is contrary to the purpose of subsidizing the cost and effects of the goods and services tax. The credit is there to ease the burden during the period that the money would be spent, yet the minister is suggesting to spend the money during the pre-Christmas period. If this money is spent during that time, how will that help low-income people for the next several months when they will depend on this extra money to pay additional tax on their kids' clothes, shoes and other necessities? It completely disregards the alleged stated intention of the government—

Senator LeBlanc: It also applies to pens, papers, books—

Senator Buckwold: The government is saying to spend the money in complete disregard for the reason it has given for the credit: To finance the additional cost to families as a result of the goods and services tax.

Will the Leader of the Government reconcile these two statements? If they spend the money for Christmas, which will obviously be part of the problem, it may not always be spent wisely. I am not suggesting that will happen, but where will these people have the funds to take care of their essential needs which will be affected by the goods and services tax?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: Indeed, I quote his exact words, that "they may not spend the money wisely." Presumably he is making a case out of a guilty conscience or out of a very reactionary policy, he is making a case to justify the delay in the tax credit. Perhaps one of the eight amendments which he will move on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition will be to delay the payment of the tax credit until a later date. He may try that, but I suspect some of his colleagues will be diving under the desks rather than supporting him.

Senator Buckwold: I can assure you that I will not give away any secrets of what the amendments may be. We will keep you guessing.

I was not being paternalistic. I say that there may be some cases in which the money is not spent wisely. I think you might agree with that.

Senator Murray: I used to hear people making that argument about family allowances.

Senator Buckwold: Certainly it was pointed out to us in the committee that this was one of the very obvious forms of bribery the government is using, to pay in advance the extra cost of the tax, putting in the hands of the people in advance a nice little cheque that will come in very handy.

I suggest that the words of the minister are such that they will encourage the money to be spent now rather than used for the benefit of the families who will need the money in the months ahead. Instead, he is urging them to spend it for pre-Christmas purposes.

[Senator Buckwold.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MULTIJURISDICTIONAL DISCLOSURE SYSTEM—SALARIES OF EXECUTIVES—ROLE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, this morning I received a number of calls with respect to wire reports that have been circulated in the country. Apparently, these reports originated in yesterday's Toronto Star. The account reads, in part, as follows:

> Million-dollar executives may have found a way to conceal their big pay cheques from Canadians.
> Under proposed new regulations, Canadian companies that list their shares on U.S. stock exchanges would be exempted from the requirement that top executives disclose their compensation.

The article goes on to say:

> Canadian executives have tried for years to keep their salary information confidential but failed to gain an exemption from U.S. disclosure requirements.
> The move comes at a time when the gap between the pay of top bosses and ordinary workers is growing wider than ever and Canadian executives are winning bigger pay increases than their ordinary employees.

The article further states:

> Companies listed on Canadian exchanges alone must reveal only the compensation of the top five executives in aggregate.

The allegation is that there was government cooperation to assist in having these regulations changed.

The report goes on to say:

> The new proposals, known as the Canada-U.S. Multijurisdictional Disclosure System, are designed to ease cross-border stock issues and takeover bids by eliminating the need for companies to file two sets of documents and meet two sets of regulations.

Arthur Earl is quoted in this report which says:

> "If what we're going to see is even lighter disclosure regulations regarding executive compensation, it's a very retrograde step," said Arthur Earle, a businessman and academic who recently completed a study for the University of Western Ontario recommending more detailed disclosure of salaries in Canada.
> "I have been urging that Canadian requirements be brought up to U.S. standards."
> Earle said the current requirement that Canadian companies reveal only the aggregate salaries of the top five executives is meaningless.

My question is this: Did the government play any role in negotiating with U.S. regulatory authorities to make it possible for million-dollar executives in this country to conceal their big pay cheques from Canadians? Were any representations made to the U.S. governmental authorities or authorities concerned with the issue in the U.S., expressing the Canadian government's official support for this alleged concealment of Canadian salaries and indemnities?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, what my friend is referring to here is in some ways the extra-territorial application of U.S. law, which is something that successive Canadian governments have always resisted and resisted successfully. I cannot tell the honourable senator today, because I do not know, whether the matter came to the attention of the government or our embassy in Washington, but I shall inquire.

Senator Perrault: If the Leader of the Government would take the question as notice, it would be appreciated.

Senator Murray: If my honourable friend feels that the disclosure requirements in Canada are inadequate and that he does not have sufficient information about the remuneration offered to the executives of publicly-traded Canadian corporations, then he can pursue that in the normal course of events—in debate, by a private member's bill, or in committee—as he wishes.

Senator Perrault: If the Leader of the Government will take the question as notice, that is satisfactory. There are some legitimate concerns out there, and I am sure there are senators in this chamber who are concerned.

I should like to add that in a survey of 244 organizations, it is revealed that executives last year won salary increases averaging 6.6 per cent, compared with 6.1 per cent for clerical and other administrative workers and 5.6 per cent for hourly workers.

Members of the GST committee, while travelling across the country, got the impression that, while Canadians are willing to help wage the battle against the debt and the deficit, they want to feel that they are being treated fairly regardless of the amount of money they make. The people at the lower end of the pay scale especially want to feel that they are being justly treated. Indeed, the only way in which any system of taxation will be successful is if it has public acceptance and if it is reasonably fair.

I know the Leader of the Government may not be interested in my observations, but I urge him to become concerned with this issue, as are many other Canadians.

CITIZEN'S FORUM

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—REPRESENTATION OF LINGUISTIC GROUPS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I should like to return to the issues raised yesterday concerning the Spicer Commission. First of all, I must now accept the fact that, in spite of suggestions made to the Prime Minister to the contrary, that the number of commissioners will not be increased. By raising this issue, I want to object, on behalf of all Francophones outside Quebec, to the fact that a million French-speaking Canadians, excluding Quebecers, are not represented on the Commission. It is a fact that I regret, and so do Francophones outside Quebec and Acadians.

I do not agree with my collegue Senator von Roggen. I praise the government for setting up this commission. Among the qualities which I recognize in my Prime Minister, and there are not many, I think he is thoroughly Canadian. It is probably the last quality he is left with as a Prime Minister, but he certainly has this one.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government, in view of what is going on in Quebec, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission and what have you, if he does not feel that it would be appropriate for the Prime Minister to ask at least his Quebec ministers who are in favour of Quebec separating from the rest of Canada at least to keep their collective mouths shut for awhile. I do not think I need go any further into this. Over the past few days, ministers as well as backbenchers—I understand it would be near impossible to try and control between 50 and 75 people—have made all sorts of comments. But when they are part of a government and when a country is faced with the difficult problems we know, I am afraid we are quickly nearing the end of Canada as it has existed since Confederation.

Two years ago, I directed questions to the Leader of the Government concerning this. If Canadians outside Quebec, both Anglophones and Francophones, are currently having difficulties with Quebec's demands, it is probably due to the fact that we have had at the federal level a government made up of too many separatists who made proposals and statements which were badly received by the rest of Canadians generally and ethnic groups outside Quebec in particular.

I suggest to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he tell the Prime Minister to ask his Quebec ministers to keep their mouths shut until the two commissions have made their findings known. As Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Parizeau were both saying yesterday, the Bélanger-Campeau Commission has nothing to do with Canada, it is only Quebec's business. In Canada, a commission will open a so-called dialogue. Would it not be proper for Quebec ministers who are not pro-Canadians to keep their mouths shut for awhile.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, my friend has no right to call "separatists" all those he disagrees with.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I may disagree with them, as you say, but when you consider what Canadians are thinking today, you must admit—if you did not, you would be the only one—that there are serious problems in this country.

Whenever I try to open a dialogue with Canadians who are not Quebecers, either Francophones, Anglophones or from any other ethnic groups, I wonder really if there exists in Canada, outside Quebec, a will to give Quebec what it wants within Canada. You may not agree, but all the polls show that what I have just said is true. I hope the Leader of the Government will recognize it.

Two years ago, Mr. Lucien Bouchard, as a minister, made some statements. What purpose did they serve? Did Mr. Bouchard's statements bring anything positive to the country?

Senator Murray: The honorable senator just mentioned the name of Honorable Lucien Bouchard. If I wanted, I could mention the names of Honorable Jean Lapierre or the other fellow who lives across the river.

Mr. Jacques Hébert: The great Hull gentleman!

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators, I mean Mr. Gilles Rocheleau, but what purpose would it serve carrying out such a dialogue in the Senate?

One of the major difficulties in this country is the tendency by some people to make disparaging remarks about those they disagree with. It is not fair to call "separatists" or "ultranationalists" those who support a certain option.

During these proceedings chaired by Mr. Keith Spicer, we hope that all Canadians will use this opportunity to open a dialogue between one and other, express their views on the future of Canada and describe how they feel people could live together in this country in greater harmony.

However, I feel my honorable friend's remarks do not bring anything positive to the debate or dialogue. There is no purpose in ridiculing the positions taken by other Canadians.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I should like to tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he can mention the names of Mr. Rocheleau and Mr. Jean Lapierre. As far as I know they are not members of the Canadian government. I did say that I do not see how the Prime Minister or the government can silence all these backbenchers. I am talking about members of the Cabinet. Again I repeat my belief that if the Leader of the Government in the Senate is sincere, and I have no reason to doubt that, if he wants Canadians to learn to live together—and that is what I wish, as he does—then there are times when we should temper our remarks and try to establish a dialogue. Mr. Rocheleau and Mr. Lapierre may say what they want, I have nothing to say about that and I have nothing to do with them. I believe my colleague Senator LeBlanc has a supplementary question.

NATURE OF COMMISSION

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Honourable senators, this is not a supplementary concerning the representation of Acadians or Francophones outside Quebec, although on that point I would say that the myth some people are trying to substantiate to the effect that Mr. Roger Tassé is the representative of Francophones outside Quebec is a figment of someone's imagination.

[English]

The question I wanted to ask of the Leader of the Government is based on an article taken from yesterday's Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick. Unhappily, articles from that newspaper are not reproduced in the Quorum, which tends to be based on papers delivered in Ottawa, as if Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto were the only places where news was ever produced. But that is not my point.

My point, honourable senators, has to do with the Citizens' Forum. I might comment that when I heard that title, "Citizens' Forum", my memory was jarred, especially when Mr. Spicer declared that it would be super high tech. Obviously, they were looking at great futuristic inventions with which to consult Canadians and to take their blood pressure. I suddenly realized that "Citizens' Forum" was a program on the school broadcasting system in the early days of steam radio. If Mr. Spicer is looking to the future, perhaps he should also examine the past.

My question is based on statements made by the panel member from my own province of New Brunswick, Madam Elsie Wayne, who is purported to have stated—this is not a direct quote—that she has been advised by Commission Chairman Keith Spicer that he will likely be the only one travelling. Honourable senators, this is very interesting. I had visions of this great new commission holding meetings all across the country, but obviously it is destined to be a commission of one.

As a result of what Mr. Spicer told her by phone yesterday, according to this newspaper article, Mayor Wayne believes that not all 12 commission members will travel across Canada. And listen to this, honourable senators: She doubts that many of its meetings will be held in public.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator LeBlanc: Where will they be held, in the residence at Meech Lake? Are we back to that again? Is this to be another meeting of 12? They are not premiers this time, but representative citizens.

The article goes on to state:

> Wayne told Common Council last night she has been appointed to the commission "on a regional basis" to gather opinions only in the three Maritime Provinces.

I do not know whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the minister responsible in this case—

Senator Perrault: Oh, he is.

Senator LeBlanc: —but I think it would be interesting to know if what we have here is a one-man show with the assistance of a number of people who are defined as "regional panellists", who may not, in fact, meet in public. I think we would all be interested in having that information.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I think Mr. Spicer has made very clear that the dialogue among Canadians that he and the panel is encouraging will be a public one. As for Mayor Wayne, I can state with certainty that no restriction of the kind mentioned was intended or placed upon her when she was invited by the Prime Minister to join the commission.

Finally, as to whether the 12 commissioners will travel together to every public hearing in the country, that is a matter that really remains to be decided by Mr. Spicer and his colleagues. They will have to decide on their own division of labour, bearing in mind that we have set a deadline of June 30 for them to report their findings.

Senator LeBlanc: The article also states that one of the councillors of the city of Saint John described Mayor Wayne as "the first Mother of Confederation". I would hope that she will not be defined as a "stay at home mother" but, rather, that she will be encouraged to travel across the country. It is also my hope that Mr. Spicer will not be the only one to report to obedient students in private sessions. Perhaps the Government Leader would wish to send to Mayor Wayne the information and the Order in Council, and perhaps we should see the Order in Council, too, if it has not been made public.

Senator Murray: I would be glad to table it, honourable senators.

TERMS OF REMUNERATION OF CHAIRMAN AND COMMISSIONERS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the same subject. It is found in The Citizen of November 7, as quoted in Quorum. This is an article on the commission. Part of it states:

> Spicer, as chairman, is the only full-time member; he is assisted by an "advisory group" of 11 people who work part time.

As I read more about the commission, it gets "curiouser and curiouser." Here we are to have this great dialogue with 26 million Canadians and it seems to be boiling down to be just Mr. Spicer with some of his rather preconceived notions, if you can believe the quotes that have been attributed to him recently.

If the question has not been already asked, may I ask the Leader of the Government—and if he does not have the answer today, I will understand—to let us know what the terms of remuneration are for Mr. Spicer on a per diem basis or on an annual basis? What will the remuneration be for the other 11 members who apparently are only to be part-time and may be working on a regional basis, or whatever. I assumed that they will all be part of the commission travelling the country, but apparently that is not the case. If that information has not been tabled as yet, I would appreciate that being done.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can obtain that information. I should tell the honourable senator that Mr. Spicer, in reply to a similar question at his news conference the other day, stated that he would be paid exactly the same rate that he has been paid up to now as chairman of the CRTC. The other members of the panel—

Senator Bonnell: How much is that?

Senator Murray: I do not know, but I am sure the information is available. It is a matter of public record, and I will obtain it. The other members of the panel will be paid a per diem rate.

Senator Perrault: On piece work, are they?

Senator Murray: Again, I want to emphasize that this is not a traditional Royal Commission which necessarily journeys from one community to another across the country to sit at the front of a hall and receive briefs, written and oral, from interested citizens and then present a series of recommendations to the government. The mandate that this Citizens' Forum has been given is not to dialogue with Canadians but to promote and encourage a dialogue among Canadians themselves about the values we hold in common, and the kind of country—

Senator Bonnell: Have a tea party at your house! Quite neighbourly!

Senator Murray: —that we want, what we expect of this country, what we expect of government in general; and some of the other hard questions that I mentioned yesterday in reply to questions from the honourable senator.

Among those questions on which it is necessary to build a consensus in this country, or rebuild one, is the relationship of aboriginal people to the rest of Canadian society and the relationship between English and French-speaking Canadians. Where does multiculturalism fit in vis-à-vis official languages and vis-à-vis national unity? What about the apparent conflict between individual rights and collective rights? What about the influence of regionalism in our country versus national unity? How much centralization or decentralization do people want? How much control over matters at the local level is desirable—

An Hon. Senator: When do they want an election?

Senator Murray: —vis-à-vis central authority? There are many, many questions. Some of them are very hard, but it will be necessary for Canadians to focus on those questions. I am confident that when they have done so, it will be possible to rebuild a consensus, because the answer to the first questions: Do we still want a country? Do we still want to live together? Are we willing to make—

Senator Frith: Or would we rather have an election?

Senator Murray: —the accommodations that are necessary will be answered resoundingly in the affirmative everywhere in Canada.

PLANNED HEARING IN ARCTIC—COMPOSITION OF TRAVELLING PANEL

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I have a supplementary question. Will some of the questions asked of Canadians coast-to-coast involve such questions as: Would you like an early election? Would you like a change in government? Would you like the GST? Will we get into these areas?

Another question relates to the first Citizens' Forum safari of Mr. Spicer. When Canadians heard the first reports of this expedition to the Arctic and the sub-Arctic, they had visions of another Amundsen and a modern-day expedition of discovery to the north. As honorable senators know, Amundsen tok a crew of people along to determine where the North Pole was located. Perhaps the Spicer expedition is designed to find out where the real Canada is located.

But the startling fact is that Mr. Spicer is apparently donning a parka and snowshoes this week and he is heading for the frozen shores of the Beaufort Sea, well above the Arctic Circle, all by himself.

Senator Steuart: No! He will get lost!

Senator Perrault: Is it safe, honourable senators, to send this national treasure to our Arctic climate by himself without any protection of any kind? Surely the RCMP will be there to stand by in case of need.

Senator Bonnell: He is going to university!

Senator Perrault: Can we actually imagine Mr. Spicer on snow-shoes, equipped only with a tape recorder under his arm to solicit opinions from the people, for example, in Tuktoyaktuk?

While it is important that the north be given significant attention by the Citizens' Forum, the idea of sending Mr. Spicer on a one-man expedition boggles the mind.

Senator Lucier: We can hardly wait!

Senator Perrault: Surely there should be more committee members than Mr. Spicer along on this almost twenty-first century Arctic exploration. That is my first question.

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—ADDITION OF MINORITIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: My second question concerns this. On the weekend the Prime Minister, at his ingratiating best, told a group of avid television watchers in Ontario, "Of course this government will consider adding minorities to the panel." He said, "We are certainly going to consider adding representatives of ethnic communities." Now it is disturbing to note that in response, Mr. Spicer, in effect, says that the Prime Minister does not know what he is talking about. He said that adding more visible minorities to the forum is "A tempting but resistible trap". He went on to say:

> I am very pleased with the group we already have, (thank you,) and I am convinced that we can do a fine job just as we are.

"Apparently, just as we are" means that only a one-man expedition is heading north this week. Will Mr. Spicer return? That is the question that should be asked. Will he survive the experience of this solo safari?

He has an advisory group of 11 members. Does he really think that Jack Webster of B.C. will accept his role on a "standby basis" with Spicer calling him from time to time saying, "How are things going out there, Jack;" and Jack replying, "Just fine, sir. Contact me any time, sir, as I await your further instructions."

Senator Fairbairn: That is not the Webster I know!

Senator Perrault: That is not the Webster any one of us knows. Yet Mr. Spicer states that "I am assisted by an advisory group of 11 people who work part-time."

When these appointments were first announced by the Prime Minister one would have thought that they were tantamount to appointments to the College of Cardinals, or to some other prestigious body. We now understand that the committee members are only to be employed on a part-time basis. Apparently, they are to do "piece work," perhaps to bring peace to the country at some point. The question was asked earlier, how much they will be paid, and I think that too, is a relevant question.

We should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us this afternoon—

Senator Bonnell: Be honest!

Senator Perrault: —is Mr. Spicer right or is the Prime Minister correct in his assessment? First, the Prime Minister said, "Yes. We are to consider adding other people to the panel." But Mr. Spicer said that he did not think the Prime Minister knew what he was talking about.

Senator Haidasz: Spicer says that to a lot of people!

Senator Perrault: The Prime Minister said that more members might be added to the advisory group, but Mr. Spicer said that it would create a lot of problems. Apparently, the committee chairman believes that we can have too much democracy. Mr. Spicer said that the advisors were not there as specific representatives of the community. He said, "What we want are good listeners and good communicators."

Senator Fairbairn: Good listeners?

Senator Perrault: Yes, good listeners. We need to know more about this committee.

Senator Haidasz: Are they good looking, too?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I hope my friend does not attend the Citizens' Forum and inflict on them the kind of bombast he inflicts on us. If he does, Jack Webster will make quick work of him.

Senator Perrault: That is no answer.

Senator Haidasz: How many blacks were appointed to that committee? Tell me how many blacks were appointed.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Government can trade insults all he wants across this chamber. The matter of this committee and those appointed to the committee could be of extreme importance. Will we have representatives of other ethnic communities on that committee or not? Is the Prime Minister correct when he told the people of Ontario that he will consider appointing new members while Mr. Spicer is saying that they will not be appointed? That is a serious question. It cannot be dismissed with the snide remarks of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Haidasz: And how many members are from the visible minorities?

Senator Barootes: What about the invisible Liberals?

Senator Perrault: What about the invisible Conservatives?

• (1540)

Senator Murray: Let me say en passant that I am quite struck by the personal animus that I detect among a number of honourable senators toward Mr. Keith Spicer. I had not expected this at all.

So far as adding members to the commission is concerned, what the Prime Minister said is that it would be up to Mr. Spicer. In the light of his experience, if he felt—

Senator Bonnell: Who is running this country?

Senator Murray: —after some experience, that further appointments were necessary or desirable, we would cooperate in that endeavour.

Senator Haidasz: You mean you did not think about it before making the announcement?

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—INUIT AND NORTHERN REPRESENTATION

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question similar to those that have been asked already. I met this morning with an assistant to Mr. Dennis Patterson, the government leader of the Northwest Territories, who has a similar concern about the Citizens' Forum. Those of us from the Territories feel that we are being left out.

Yesterday, Senator Lucier asked a question about that very point concerning representation of the Yukon and others appointed to the commission which is to deal with constitutional reform. I think that many people in our community did not learn very much, the first time around, with regard to the Meech Lake Accord. What we heard had to do with a distinct society in Quebec. Most of us who have lived in the Territories for many years really do not understand what the Constitution is all about. All the members who will serve on the commission have been appointed, and not one is from the Territories. I know there is one from the native community in British Columbia.

My concern is this. How will those appointed to the commission communicate with some of the citizens in our communities who do not understand English? The same translator cannot go to every community, since there are different dialects spoken in different communities. Colleagues of mine in the Senate believe that we should have an Inuk appointed to the committee, something which would help us to feel that we have not been left out of the process. I do not want to see what happened the last time happen again. At the last meeting of First Ministers, decisions were made to talk to the Prime Minister, forgetting about the other leaders of the Northwest Territories and Yukon. I hope that will not happen again.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I hear the honourable senator. I simply repeat that the members of the advisory group are not appointed to act as representatives of any particular group or point of view. The major purpose of the forum is to ensure that Canadians from all regions, backgrounds and walks of life are given full opportunity to participate directly in the forum and to speak for and represent themselves.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, when I rose yesterday to question the minister on this issue, I was rather angry because those of us in the Northwest Territories were again being treated as second-class citizens, something which is not unusual. However, that seems to be consistent with this government. Today I am not sure if the anger has not turned somewhat to fear.

Is the Minister saying that this commission, which has been set up to perform the important task to unite Canadians, is now totally in the hands of Mr. Spicer? If he decides that 11 members are enough, is that what it will be? If he decides that he has too many members, can he then decide to knock off Jack Webster and four or five others? Is the forum being structured whereby Mr. Spicer has a complete say as to the number of appointees and the role of the forum?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have appointed 12. The Prime Minister has made it clear that Mr. Spicer is free to recommend additional appointments after he and his colleagues have assessed the work that is involved here.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, that is a very interesting answer. The government leader has just said that after Mr. Spicer consults with his colleagues, he can make a decision on whether or not they wish to add more members to the commission. The Prime Minister made a statement and Mr. Spicer refuted it right off the bat. He has not met with the people involved. The commission has not even come together yet. He has decided that is what the number will be. If he decides that it should be less, does he have the same power? The Prime Minister is saying that he has the power to increase it. Does he have the power to decrease it?

Senator Murray: The Prime Minister has not said that Mr. Spicer has the power to increase it. If Mr. Spicer and his colleagues feel, after they have had an opportunity to assess the work involved, that additional members are required, then additional members will be appointed in the same way that the original 12 have been appointed—that is to say, by order in council.

Surely it must be obvious to the honourable senator that appointments that have been made by order in council could not be unmade by the chairman of the commission or by anyone else.

Senator Lucier: Since Mr. Spicer, who perhaps is bitter because he is not a senator, has said that there will no additional members added to the forum, can Senator Adams and I go back up north and tell everyone there to relax, that they have been ignored one more time? In a country with ten provinces and two territories, 12 people have been appointed from the ten provinces, and the territories have been forgotten. Can we go there now and tell the people to relax, to forget it, that Mr. Spicer will show up with his snowshoes and parka in Tuktoyaktuk, and if someone wants to come and talk to him, he can? Can we assure the people up there that they do not have to worry about getting all exercised about having someone on this forum, that under any and all circumstances there will not be any northern representation on the forum?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sorry that Liberal senators have such a hate on for Keith Spicer. I do not quite understand the reason for this.

Having said that, with regard to the question asked by the honourable senator, I answered it several times yesterday and several times again today.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I would like to say that I have never met Mr. Spicer, so I really do not have much time to hate him. I have a hard time hating people I know, let alone the ones I do not know. I have never met him.

Senator Haidasz: You are fortunate.

Senator Lucier: I have never even spoken to him. I do not hate him, and I never have.

I very much detest the position he has been put in. I also detest the fact that the Prime Minister has structured this board so that there is no northern representation. Mr. Spicer did not structure the board; it was the Prime Minister who structured it.

Senator Haidasz: Be glad you never met Spicer.

FITNESS OF CHAIRMAN TO PURSUE OBJECTIVES OF COMMISSION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that Keith Spicer as former editor of the Ottawa Citizen wrote many abusive articles about this chamber and its members, to which even Senator Marshall objected and moved a motion, does the Minister think that Keith Spicer is fit to study the objects of the commission which the Prime Minister announced the other week?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, we all have our eccentricities. Surely, we can permit Mr. Spicer that one.

Senator Haidasz: Eccentricities do not have to include abuse.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

SPEECH BY SENATOR CHAPUT-ROLLAND—POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO BILL

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, on another topic.

[Senator Lucier.]

It is about a rather surprising statement. I will just read a few lines from the impassioned speech made by Senator Chaput-Rolland on October 30. I quote:

> Honourable senators, I do not think I made myself clear.

Perhaps not.

> I explained the position I took as an author, saying . . .

I beg your pardon!

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, on a point of order.

Is this some kind of new initiative, a warning to Canadians that Liberal senators will attack people who are not in this Chamber, including Mr. Keith Spicer and my colleague, Senator Chaput-Rolland?

Why don't you wait until these people are in the Senate or until you meet them outside Ottawa or in committee, to tell them what you have to say?

Is this an indication of your arrogance and despair? Are you crazy or what! This is cowardice!

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that I have no intention of attacking Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Senator Simard: But you are!

Senator Hébert: No, I am not, I am quoting her.

You just assumed that I wanted to attack her. Typically, you always assume other people react the same way you do. I have no intention of attacking Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, and I said it one last time because I am not sure you were listening.

I simply want to quote a paragraph from the impassioned speech she made yesterday on books, and then I want to put some questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am referring to a very serious statement that should be of interest to all senators, including yourself.

Senator Simard: Wait until she's here!

Senator Hébert: I don't have to, since my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Simard: That's the problem . . .

Senator Hébert: Senator Murray, would you ask him to calm down!

So I will continue my quote from Senator Chaput-Rolland's speech. She said:

> I explained the position I took as an author, saying that I was afraid of this tax . . .

The GST, of course.

> . . . and as an author, I hoped with all my heart that the Prime Minister of Canada . . .

And this is where it gets interesting.

> would keep his promise and amend the bill . . .

You see, she is asking the Prime Minister "to amend it, to correct it". The bill must be pretty bad if he has to amend and correct it.

> . . . that he would change it, but out of loyalty to the Prime Minister of Canada, I would vote in favour of this tax, as a general rule . . .

And so forth, and so forth.

I imagine you guessed what I wanted to ask, honourable senators. If the Prime Minister of Canada promised to amend, correct and change the GST bill, I want to know if he made this promise in public or privately, to Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland, or somewhere else.

So what is the exact nature of this promise?

I think it concerns us all.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That's quite a change!

Senator Hébert: Quite a change indeed! What does he want to amend and what does he want to change?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, statements by a colleague like Senator Chaput-Rolland are not part of my ministerial responsibility. It is therefore not up to me to answer on her behalf. I understand, however, that she was alluding to a speech or a reply by the Prime Minister to questions asked the other day by students in a school in Burnaby, British Columbia.

I have already promised to get at least one copy of the article I read in the Globe and Mail and lay it on the table. This article contains direct quotes from what the Prime Minister said on the subject, and it was on these quotes that Senator Chaput-Rolland based her statement.

Senator Hébert: I repeat, this is not a question for Senator Chaput-Rolland. I am asking you the question because you are in a better position to know what these promises by the Prime Minister were.

She says that the Prime Minister of Canada made her some promises. That is why she voted against the amendment, with the government, because "her Prime Minister", as she says, had promised and she expected the Prime Minister to keep his promise and amend, correct and change the bill.

These are not loose words. It's all there in black and white. Senator Chaput-Rolland is a writer and journalist. I hardly think she was making this up as she went along.

Senator Simard: Wait until she is here!

Senator Hébert: That isn't the point. I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to find out when the Prime Minister made such promises.

If he doesn't want to do it now, let him come back and give us the facts.

If the Prime Minister did not promise Senator Chaput-Rolland or anyone else that he would do this, do you realize how embarassing it will be for the senator, who voted with you because she believed those promises?

Senator Frith: She was counting on it!

Senator Hébert: Yes, she was counting on it. She said: "I realize that the publishing industry is at risk in Quebec, and so forth. However, I am going to vote just the same with my Prime Minister because he promised to correct, amend and change".

So could you give us some explanations about this promise made by the Prime Minister, since this is quite serious?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, unfortunately Senator Hébert missed an opportunity the other day to put the same question to Senator Chaput-Rolland.

Senator Simard: He was absent!

Senator Murray: It is up to Senator Chaput-Rolland to explain what she said in her speech.

I would suggest that the senator take advantage of the next opportunity he has to put this question to his colleague.

Honourable senators, I must leave. I have an engagement at 4 o'clock.

SPEECH OF HONOURABLE SENATOR CHAPUT-ROLLAND— PROMISE BY PRIME MINISTER TO AMEND LEGISLATION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a follow-up to that response. I am curious about Senator Chaput-Rolland's promise. I am reading the English translation of that—

Senator Barootes: It loses a bit in the translation.

Senator Grafstein: Let me read the particular translation. Perhaps Senator Doody and Senator Castonguay might assist in this response. At page 3546 of Senate Debates on Tuesday, October 30, 1990, the Monday volume, the English translation states:

> . . . I was afraid of this tax, but I wished very strongly that the Prime Minister of Canada would fulfill his promise to amend or transform it, and that, out of loyalty for him, I would vote in favour of this tax because, generally speaking, Canada needs it.

Then she went on to say:

> I have now said everything I had to say and I certainly cannot be blamed if you do not understand me.

There was then an interjection by Senator Castonguay who said:

> Honourable senators, had Senator Hébert been here when Senator Chaput-Rolland had the floor he might have understood.

Senator Hébert then went on to say:

> Perhaps I understood better than you think, but if you want the floor I will listen.

Senator Castonguay then responded:

> You missed most of the remarks of Senator Chaput-Rolland. No wonder you cannot understand.

The question I would like clarified by the representative of the government is whether a promise was made—

Senator Barootes: Promise?

Senator Grafstein: Promise. The French and English were the same. The word promise is easily translated. The question that I would like to have clarified is this: Was a promise made by the Prime Minister to senators opposite—Senator Chaput-Rolland, Senator Castonguay or any Conservative senator—that the GST would be amended? I believe that is an important question, and I would like to have it answered.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: Amended, corrected and transformed.

Senator Grafstein: The words are "amended" or "transformed". The French translation may be different.

Senator Hébert: The French is the original.

Senator Grafstein: I do not quarrel with that. I am suggesting there might be a change in translation.

The question for the government is this: Were promises made by the Prime Minister to senators opposite that the GST would be amended?

Hon. C. William Doody Deputy Leader of the Government): I can add nothing to what Senator Murray has stated earlier. There was a reference made to comments that the Prime Minister made to students in British Columbia. He has quoted that and that newspaper article is available. Presumably Senator Chaput-Rolland was referring to it, but I do not know anything beyond that. Certainly the Prime Minister made no promise directly to me or to anyone that I know of in terms of the question that the honourable senator asks.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, why is Senator Murray not here? We received unanimous consent to change the order of business, to put Question Period ahead, and he is not here. What has happened?

Senator Doody: Senator Murray asked us to change the order because he had a cabinet meeting a 4.00 o'clock. You were standing here, Senator Frith, at the time.

Senator Frith: Yes, he told me he had a meeting and that he wanted the order changed.

Senator Grafstein: I take it Senator Doody is now telling us, contrary to what we have heard from Senator Chaput-Rolland, that the Prime Minister has not made any promises to the Conservative caucus or whatever, aside from the promise made to the student in B.C.? We are not talking about the promise to the B.C. student; we are talking about promises made to Conservative senators. I take it Senator Doody is saying that no promises were made by the Prime Minister to amend the GST?

Senator Doody: It is the same answer as the last answer, honourable senators. Senator Grafstein can look at Hansard if he wants to, but I find it tedious to say the same thing over and over again.

[Senator Barootes.]

HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

PRESENCE ON PARLIAMENT HILL—CAPACITY AND PAYMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, many weeks ago we gave a former colleague of ours, the Honourable Jacques Flynn, a great send-off.

Senator Frith: He is back.

Senator Corbin: Many speeches were made outlining his great contribution to Canadian parliamentary life. That was followed by a reception in the Speaker's Chamber, which was the last time I ate the Speaker's chips and pretzels, by the way. I do not intend to set foot in there for some time.

Senator Flynn is now, as I understand it, in the employ of Senator Murray, the Tory caucus, the government or the Privy Council—I do not know which one. He is presently working on the Senate side of the Hill, as I understand it. If I knew exactly his status, I would not be asking these questions.

I would like to know if he is in fact employed, by whom, who is paying his salary, and what the salary or the retainer is.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no knowledge of any salary or hiring of Senator Flynn by anyone. I do know that he has been here giving us advice, which we welcome very much. As a matter of fact, I regret that he retired so soon.

As for his terms of employment, if any, I have no knowledge of them.

Senator Corbin: That is certainly a mysterious answer. Are you suggesting that he is providing his services—his time away from his beloved Quebec City and his wife—free of charge to anyone? That seems to be your suggestion, but I would warn you about Senator Flynn's advice. When he was in this house and gave the Conservatives advice, you got yourselves in trouble.

COST OF PUBLIC OPINION SURVEYS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have had a busy summer with the GST hearings. The hearings were opposed by a number of Conservative members of that committee. This process of consulting public opinion was described as being very wasteful.

Information has just been tabled in the other place that the Department of Finance has spent $413,700 in the past year on six public opinion surveys that told us that most Canadians hate the proposed goods and services tax and do not trust the government to spend GST revenue wisely.

The members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce were attacked regularly by certain members, such as Senator Simard, for wasting money. He blasted this expenditure involved in hearing the views of Canadians from coast to coast regarding the GST. We now find out that the government spent almost the same amount of money on six public opinion surveys. I should like to ask the spokesman for the government what makes it so virtuous for the government to conduct six public opinion surveys and to resist so strenuously the process of consulting Canadians regarding the GST? Do you have more faith in the polling organizations of Canada than you do in the people?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must admit that during the course of the hearings I did suffer some pangs of doubt about the objectivity of the committee. It seemed to me from time to time that they were not quite as balanced as one would like.

I have no knowledge of the public opinion polls other than what I have read in the same newspaper article that the honourable senator referred to.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

ABSENCE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL AT CENOTAPH

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of Senator Doody. I know that he will not be able to give an answer right now.

The veterans of Canada have been insulted by the fact that for the second time since World War II—the first time was because of illness—a Governor General will not be present for the unveiling of the wreath at the Cenotaph. Has there been any discussion to convince the Governor General that the veterans of this country should not be insulted, that the Governor General should be here and should not be in Japan at this time of the year?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no information with regard to that, but I shall attempt to get an answer for you.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PRESENT DEFICIT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: The Deputy Leader of the Government will need to obtain an answer to my question at a later date because it is a factual answer that I seek.

On Friday, October 26, on "Canada A.M.", a commentator made the statement that the UIC would be $4 billion in the red by 1992. Could that figure be confirmed? Could you obtain for us the amount of the present deficit and whether the projection is, indeed, for a $4 billion deficit in 1992?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will make the inquiry senator.

• (1610)

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have twelve delayed answers to questions.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DECISION TO DISCONTINUE SATURDAY RURAL SERVICE IN P.E.I.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 23, 1990, by the Honourable Senator M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding Canada Post Corporation—Decision to Discontinue Saturday Rural Service in P.E.I.

(The answer follows:)

I have been informed by the Minister Responsible for Canada Post Corporation that the standardization of rural route mail delivery in Prince Edward Island to five days-a-week was done in order to bring the Island into line with the majority of rural routes in the rest of the country. Moreover, this initiative brings mail delivery into line with what the majority of Island residents receive, i.e. five-days-a-week.

Canada Post is continually reviewing its operations with the objective of improving efficiency of the mail processing and delivery system and has therefore moved to end this long standing anomaly.

The Honourable Senator may also want to know that this initiative has improved for those customers on the Island who were previously receiving rural route delivery less than five days a week.

THE ECONOMY

HIGH INTEREST RATES—RELATION TO INFLATION—EFFECT ON WESTERN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 23, 1990, by the Honourable H.A. Olson, regarding The Economy—High Interest Rates—Relation to Inflation—Effect on Western Canada—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Canadian Wheat Board initial payments are set prior to the beginning of each crop year in relation to the best estimates of market returns available at that time, with a view to avoiding deficits in the pool accounts. When the 1990/91 initial payments were announced on May 1, 1990, world wheat and coarse grain crops were forecast to be larger than the 1989/90 crops and were expected to exceed world consumption for the first time in several years. World wheat stocks were forecast to increase by 10 million tonnes in 1990/91. When there is a rebuilding of stocks, this normally leads to a reduction in prices. In addition, the United States and the European Community were expected to have larger exportable supplies of wheat and coarse grains in 1990/91 which could lead to an increase in export subsidies from the 1989/90 levels.

At this time, world wheat production in 1990/91 is estimated at a record 584 million tonnes, an increase of 46 million tonnes from last year. Larger wheat crops have been harvested in the United States, the European Community (EC) and Canada as well as in the world's two largest wheat importing countries, the Soviet Union and China. World carryover stocks of wheat are expected to increase by 17 per cent, with much of this increase held in exporting countries. A larger world coarse grain crop is also having a negative impact on coarse grain prices despite a further decline in world stocks forecast for 1990/91.

Exporters are, therefore, competing forcefully with larger supplies for a smaller market. The major buyers appear to be holding back on their purchases because of sufficient short-term supplies. At this time, world grain price forecasts for the remainder of 1990/91, in particular for wheat, are not encouraging. The substantial decline in international grain prices over the past several months is of concern. In addition, the use of export subsidies by the United States and the EC, has resulted in a further decline in wheat prices. In recent weeks, export subsidy levels of wheat and barley under the American Export Enhancement Program have reached $60.00 Canadian per tonne, while the export restitutions of European wheat and barley have exceeded $150 Canadian per tonne.

The key to strengthening western agriculture is a successful conclusion to the Uruguay Round in Brussels in December. Canada is committed to establishing a fair, market-oriented agricultural trading system with international rules applying equally to all participants and is forcefully pursuing this objective in the current round of Multilateral Trade Negotiations. Canada is seeking an agreement in which all countries would make significant reductions to their trade-distorting support programs.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

REFUSAL OF PRIME MINISTER TO MEET WITH DALAI LAMA

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the third delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 23, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein, regarding Dalai Lama—Refusal of Prime Minister to Meet.

(The answer follows:)

The Dalai Lama made a pivately organized, unofficial visit to Canada which had a religious and human rights focus. The Dalai Lama, in his capacity as a spiritual leadere, met with the Secretary of State, the Honourable Gerry Weiner, during this visit to discuss religious and human rights issues. He also addressed a joint meeting of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade and of the Sub-Committee on International Human Rights. This is in accordance with the reception given to the Dalai Lama in many other Western nations which he has visisted unofficially, where the Dalai Lama has not met the most senior leaders.

The Canadian Government recognizes and respects His Holiness the Dalai Lama for his unquestioned contributions to human rights and the pursuit of peaceful international relations.

The Dalai Lama is, of course, also a political figure who leads a Tibetan "government-in-exile", with which Canada does not maintain any official relations.

PERSIAN GULF

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—POSSIBILITY OF WAR—ARRANGEMENTS FOR COMMAND

Hon. C. Willima Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the fourth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 25, 1990, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Escalation to War by Allies.

(The answer follows:)

The Rules of Engagement now being followed are appropriate to the role currently assigned to the Canadian Forces in the region and deal exclusively with self defence and the enforcement of the Un sanctions.

The objective of this ongoing multinational effort to enforce UN Security Council resolutions in the Gulf is to bring about the withdrawal of Iraqi forces and to restore the sovereignty of Kuwait.

If the situation should change and military conflict be initiated by any party, the Canadian government would carefully review its options and make its decision in light of the prevailing circumstances.

Canada will not, under any circumstances, "automatically" become involved in a war initiated by other countries. Canadian Forces deployed to the Gulf, are, and will remain, under Canadian command and control.

AGRICULTURE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF GOVERNMENT LIST OF FARM SUBSIDIES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 19, 1990, by the Honourable H. A. Olson, regarding Agriculture—GATT Negotiations—Request for Tabling of Government List of Farm Subsidies.

(The answer follows:)

As agreed, Canada tabled on October 1st, 1990, in Geneva ita baseline data on agriculture. They were prepared following guidelines defined by the Chairman of the negotiating committee on agriculture, Mr. Aaxt de Zeeuw. Canada has expressed, in the covering note accompanying the data (The attached copy will now be tabled with the Clerk), some reservations on the methodology proposed by the Chairman.

The total support to Canadian agriculture, as measured by an Aggregate Measure of Support (AMS), was estimated to be $8.8 billion. This value does not represent any specific year since due to the severe drought in 1988 numbers from 1987 were also used. It includes not only expenditures by government, both federal and provincial, but also the estimated effect of support provided by other measures, including internal support, border protection and export competition measures. Of this $8.8 billion estimate of total support, $2.8 billion resulted from direct government payments, $3.3 billion came from reductions of input costs (e.g., credit concessions, transportation subsidies, etc.) and general government services, (e.g., Inspection Services, research, etc.). The remaining $2.7 billion was accounted for by market price support resulting largely from import controls in support of the supply management system.

Canada submitted this data in accordance with the Chairman's report and without prejudice to our negotiating position.

In accordance with the Chairman's report, all measures in use in the base period were included to provide the best possible "snapshot" of the situations in all countries. Participants will receive credit in the negotiations for programs eliminated or changed since then.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

PROPOSED LOCATIONS OF EXPANSION TEAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 23, 1990, by the Honourable Keith Davey, regarding National Hockey League-Proposed Locations of Expansion Teams—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

To support an earlier response I gave to Senator Davey regarding expansion of the National Hockey League, I wish to table the following letter by the Minister of State, Marcel Danis, to the President of the National Hockey League, John A. Ziegler, Jr., as follows:

I understand that the NHL Board of Governors will be called upon to make a preliminary selection of three cities from among the candidates for franchises within the framework of a planned major NHL expansion as early as the 1992-93 season.

Several Canadian cities have indicated their interest in securing an NHL franchise, should expansion occur. Various media accounts have suggested, however, that a first phase expansion would consider applications from U.S. cities only.

Canadians have always had a passion for the game of hockey, and you are doubtless aware of the enormous contribution Canada has made to the development of hockey and of the NHL, not only in Canada but throughout the world. For many Canadians, hockey and the NHL are rooted solidly in Canadian history, a history which is close to their heart, I would therefore ask you to ensure that this contribution is recognized so that the NHL Governors may be encouraged to give equal consideration to the Canadian cities which are candidates for expansion franchises.

Thank you for your consideration of this matter.

PERSIAN GULF

INDEPENDENCE OF FRENCH FORCES—RULES OF ENGAGEMENT—UNITED NATIONS SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on October 24, 1990, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Independence of French Forces—Rules of Engagement—United Nations Security Council Resolutions—Request for Tabling.

(The answer follows:)

As requested by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen the following are the Resolutions adopted from the United Nations Security Council. The full text of each resolution will now be tabled with the Clerk.

Resolution 660 (1990)

Adopted by the SC at its 2932nd meeting, on 2 August, 1990—Determined that a breach of international peace and security had taken place (i.e. that it was a legitimate issue for the Security Council); condemned the Iraqi invasion; demanded its withdrawal from Kuwait; and called upon Iraq and Kuwait to negotiate.

Resolution 664 (1990)

Adopted by the SC at its 2937th meeting, on 18 August, 1990—Demanded that Iraq permit the immediate departure from Kuwait and Iraq of third-country nationals and that Iraq take no action to jeopardize the safety, security, or health of such nationals; demanded that Iraq rescind its orders for the closure of diplomatic missions in Kuwait.

Resolution 669 (1990)

Adopted by the SC at its 2942nd meeting, on 24 September, 1990—Entrusts the 661 Committee of the Council with the task of examining requests for assistance under the provisions of article 50 of the UN Charter. Under this article, states can consult the Council for a solution to economic problems arising from carrying out sanctions imposed by the Council.

Resolution 670 (1990)

Adopted by the SC at its 2943rd meeting, on 25 September, 1990—Extended maritime embargo to air traffic by "taking such measures as may be necessary, consistent with international law, including the Chicago Convention"; affirmed that UN specialized agencies must comply with sanctions; decided to consider measures against sanctions-busters; and reaffirmed that Iraq is liable under the Fourth Geneva Convention (war crimes).

COST OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on October 25, 1990, by the Honourable Azellus Denis, regarding Cost of Government Advertising.

(The answer follows:)

Recently, my honourable friend, Senator Denis, inquired about the advertising costs related to the GST. Today, I am pleased to be able to supply him with that information.

The reform of the Canadian Sales Tax System is a major fiscal initiative. It involves the coordination of different departments from the development of policy to final implementation. It also requires the cooperation and participation of the business community and the Canadian public. To ensure a smooth transition from the outmoded and damaging FST to the modern and efficient GST, the Government must actively inform businesses about how the GST will operate. Moreover, the Government has an obligation and a responsibility to explain to the Canadian public the need for sales tax reform as well as its impact on the Canadian Economy and their everyday lives.

The importance of public understanding is a key lesson learned from other countries where similar tax systems have been introduced. Where business people and consumers have been well informed, implementation has gone smoothly.

To this end, the Department of Finance, Revenue Canada, and the GST consumer information office have allocated funds to advertise the proposed sales tax reform.

For the fiscal year 1989-90, the Department of Finance spent $9.3 million on advertising and related communications activities, including the publication and distribution of the booklet, GST: INFORMATION FOR SMALL BUSINESS. For the fiscal year 1990-91, $8.7 million has been budgeted for advertising and related communications activities to provide Canadians with factual information on the GST.

In June 1990, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable Pierre Blais, announced the establishment of the GST consumer information office, an independent agency responsible for looking after the interests of consumers prior to, and during, the implementation of the GST. For the fiscal year 1990-91, the consumer information office has budgeted $7.4 million to advertise its existence, its objectives and its toll-free information line for consumers, as well as to provide consumers with factual information on the price impacts of the GST.

For the fiscal year 1990-91, Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, has budgeted $8.9 million for advertising in print and on radio and television to encourage businesses to pre-register for the GST as well as to announce the business information seminars and office openings.

DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT

PROPOSED SALE BY BOEING—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT AS GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on October 26, 1990 by the Honourable Jack Austin regarding De Havilland Aircraft—Proposed Sale by Boeing—Effect on Employment as Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

A&A are currently negotiating with Boeing, having spent August and September performing a due diligence analysis of the de Havilland operation. As of October 31, 1990, the companies had not reached a buy/sell agreement. Consequently, Investment Canada has not yet received an application for review of the potential acquisition and none of the details of a proposed transaction are known. The implications of possible A&A ownership on employment, sales, product development, engineering design and technological development cannot be assessed until A&A's plans are known. Informal discussions between government officials and the companies concerned are taking place.

The Investment Canada Act requires that an application be rigorously scrutinized to ensure that the transaction yields net benefit to Canada. In a case of this magnitude, it would be necessary to examine all the direct and indirect impacts so that a comprehensive analysis is available to the government so that a decision can be made.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

ALL-PARTY LEGAL CHALLENGE TO APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL SENATORS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this delayed answer is in response to a question raised in the Senate on May 24, 1990, by Senator Perrault, regarding British Columbia—All Party Legal Challenge to Appointment of Additional Senators.

(The answer follows:)

The Government of Canada is seized with the B.C. court challenge and the Prime Minister has been informed of this action.

The Government does not doubt its Senate appointments are valid.

We have the advice and counsel of the most senior law officers of the Government that our position is the right one. Not exclusive. The most recent judgment from the Ontario Court of Justice (General Division).

The Senator is attempting to muddy the waters by mixing the issue of the popularity of the GST with a false constitutional issue.

ENERGY

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on September 25, 1990, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding the Tax Credit for the Scotia Synfuels.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, the proposed Scotia Synfuels project is a very large project with capital costs of about $500 million. The tax credit for the project under the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit Program would exceed $200 million. While the benefit of this program is delivered through the tax system, that have been approved by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology (DIST). Consequently, officials from that Department and of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency have worked very closely with Scotia Synfuels to evaluate this project carefully. The review process is close to completion and a decision by the Minister of DIST on Scotia Synfuels' application for the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit is expected in the near future.

SENATE REFORM

PROCESS OF FUTURE APPOINTMENTS—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the final delayed answer is in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 13, 1990, by the Honourable Joyce Fairbairn regarding Process of Future Appointments—Request for Clarification.

(The answer follows:)

The Constitution Amendment, 1987 provided that, pending Senate reform, Senate vacancies be filled by persons proposed by the Government of the Province concerned and who were acceptable to the Government of Canada.

Under the Constitutional Accord of June 3, 1987, it was agreed the Senate nominations provision would apply until the proposed amendment came into force.

With the failure of the Accord, the interim nominations procedure no longer applies.

THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of 40 citizens from the area of St-Polycarpe, in Quebec, who ask the Senate to reject the GST bill. I would wish to read their petition verbatim because it is using very old English and it always makes for interesting reading.

Petition to the honourable Senate in Parliament assembled. The undersigned citizens of the Dominion of Canada, now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right (except by senator Simard, of course) to present a grievance common to your petitioners, in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy. They humbly sheweth whereas the 7 per cent goods and services tax, the univesal federal tax brought in by the Conservative Government, will cause serious, unfair and inhuman hardship for Canadians.

Whereas such a tax will constitute the worst ever grab on the already low income of Canadians, not only because of higher taxes but also because of the higher cost of living due to the higher inflation, interest rates and unemployment brought about by this new tax.

Wherefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax and in duty bound, your petitioners will ever pray.

Don't worry, I will not read it all, but I will read a few names of the good people from St-Polycarpe.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, can you tell me why it is you have reverted to this tedious and time-consuming process of reading names and addresses? Yesterday at least it seemed just as boring to use a procedure more in line with our rules. Yet, it was more cursory.

Senator Hébert: In any case, you just said that that process was as tedious. If that is the case, I do not see what you are complaining about?

Senator Cogger: It was also tedious but at least we always had new players speaking then.

Senator Hébert: I will hand over to someone else in a few minutes.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, if you prefer the sound of my voice to his, I am prepared to take over right now.

Senator Hébert: I will not be long, I will leave you the floor in a few minutes. It all depends if I am inspired or not, senator.

(Names of signatories read)

Well, it seems as if all of Trémollière Street is opposed to the TPS.

Senator Cogger: Are you sure the whole street is against it?

Senator Hébert: That is a tiny street, you see. You know that street of course since you have been to St-Polycarpe, I am sure.

Senator Cogger: What about you? Did you ever go there?

Senator Hébert: Of course.

(Names of signatories read)

In other words, each and every member of the Poirier family opposes the TPS, including the children who could not add their name, unfortunately, because it would have been illegal.

(Names of signatories read)

I will read another petition and then, to accommodate Senator Cogger, I will ask someone else to take over. We have tens of thousands of them anyhow.

So, honourable senators, I have the honour to present another petition signed by citizens of L'Avenir, Quebec.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1620)

I still have tens of thousands of them left, but maybe a senator from another region—

[English]

Perhaps someone from another region—for example, my friend in front of me—would read further petitions.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have a group of petitions from Ontario. It is my honour to present them today. They are worded in a way which indicates the petitioners are greatly annoyed and unhappy about the GST and are asking us to do our best to see that it does not pass. The first group of signatories are from the Ottawa area. There are nearly 250 signatories in the one group of petitions and nearly all of them are from the Ottawa area—that is, from Ottawa, Kanata, Nepean and Aylmer. I have a group of 25 signatories on this particular page.

• (1630)

I am assuming that members opposite will recognize some of these names as people who have supported the Conservative Party in the past but who are making it very clear that they are now opposed to what the Conservative Party is doing in trying to ram the GST down our throats.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is the name of a Ray Hnatyshyn.

Senator Haidasz: Is it Ramon?

Senator Stanbury: It just says "Ray Hnatyshyn." Is that not marvellous? It's a dandy!

Senator Fairbairn: That is a heart-stopper. We must report it to the Prime Minister.

Senator Stanbury: I cannot guarantee which Ray Hnatyshyn it is.

Senator Fairbairn: I would like a Xerox copy of that petition.

Senator Stanbury: We should Xerox it and then start sending him Liberal policy material.

The next petition I wish to read has 25 names on it. The people who have signed the petition are mainly from the Ottawa, Kanata and Nepean areas.

(Names of signatories read)

I have here another petition containing 25 signatures from the Ottawa area.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition containing 25 names from people who are generally from the Ottawa area. The Ottawa people seem to be particularly interested in this piece of legislation and seem to have signed unanimously. It is important that honourable senators opposite hear their names, because they may be people they know. In this way, senators opposite can understand how important it is to hear their point of view.

Senator Frith: For them to go to all that trouble.

Senator Stanbury: They have gone to a great deal of trouble. It is up to us to recognize the trouble to which they have gone in making themselves heard, and to give them an opportunity to have their names recorded as having objected to the GST here in the Senate.

• (1640)

I have another petition containing the signatures of 25 residents of Ottawa, Cochrane, Nepean, Kars and Woodlawn.

(Names of signatories read)

I want to file another petition containing 25 names of people from Ottawa, Nepean, Aylmer, Kanata and Osgoode.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honorable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from the residents of central Newfoundland on the subject of the goods and services tax. These petitioners, along with others, are praying that the Senate will do something to stop the introduction of this tax.

I have been waiting for some time to present this petition, because I believe it will have some significance for Senator Kelly. He raised a matter some weeks ago on this topic, and I will come back to that in a minute. These petitioners are from Grand Falls, Lewisporte and Botwood.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I ask a question? Is that Kelly spelled with an "ey" or "y"?

Senator Lewis: It is k-e-l-l-y.

Senator Kelly: Oh dear.

Senator Lewis: Perhaps we can find another one.

• (1650)

I come now to a point raised by Senator Kelly a few weeks ago. There is a Roy K. Parsons of Grand Falls. The next name is Tim Parsons of Lahr, West Germany. I recall that when we were reading petitions earlier Senator Kelly was quite irate and raised a question about a petition being signed by someone who gave an address which was not in Canada. This is probably a father and son, or brothers. Tim Parsons is probably with the Canadian Forces in Lahr. He was in Grand Falls and signed the petition.

If Senator Kelly has any question about this, perhaps we should recess for a few days and investigate it.

Senator Kelly: I would think it would take until at least next Wednesday, honourable senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Marsden has a committee report to present on a bill that passed second reading this afternoon. If Senator Lewis will allow us to revert back to Reports of Committees, we will do that now and then continue with petitions afterwards.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have pleasure in presenting a petition from 27 residents of the south coast of Newfoundland on the subject of the goods and services tax, praying that we will provide some way to remedy the situation.

(Names of signatories read)

It is too bad that Senator Cochrane is not in the chamber, because these are names of people in her area. She told me earlier that she had not received any petitions.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): These people are well scattered. That must have been quite a canvass.

Senator Frith: It sounds like the title of a sea shanty from Newfoundland.

Senator Lewis: It is like a 12-gauge shotgun in full choke.

Honourable senators, I have another petition on the same matter signed by 24 residents of Newfoundland. These residents, for the most part, are from communities along the south coast.

(Names of signatories read)

I should like to table that petition, honourable senators, and hope that their prayers will be answered.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have petitions from various localities in New Brunswick. These petitions are signed by people who oppose the proposed goods and services tax. The first petition contains six names.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have another petition from the great province of New Brunswick, signed by Canadian citizens opposed to the proposed goods and services tax. This petition contains 16 names.

THE HONOURABLE PHILIPPE DEANE GIGANTÈS

A QUESTION OF FRAUD—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—CLARIFICATION OF SENATE RECORDS

Hon. Philippe Dean Gigantès: Honourable senators, on a point of privilege, yesterday the Leader of the Government said in the Senate—and I have the blues—that I particularly objected to the use of the word "fraud" or "fraudulent" in the course of the interviews he gave to the press. He went on to say—and I quote:

> I want to make it completely clear that I did not,—

That is, the Leader of the Government did not—

> —and do not, impute fraudulent intent to Senator Gigantès or to anyone else taking part in this debate.

The Canadian Press has an interview on tape. In the article they distributed, CP1916ET01 11, 1990, it states:

> All speeches in Parliament are transcribed and translated and are available in the official record of Hansard. The Tories said, "That is why Gigantès read it, his book, to get the translation done for free so that it could be published in French. Conservative Senate Leader Lowell Murray levelled the accusation saying it constituted fraud."

I should like to ask the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. I accept his apology of yesterday and I ask him to tell me if he is telling the truth, and, if so, whether the Canadian press has a trick tape, or what?

[Senator Lewis.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I had thought that my statement yesterday would have sufficed. I said yesterday that whatever the interviews or the tapes may show, I did not, and I do not, impute to the honourable senator, or anyone else, a fraudulent intent. I think I went on to say that my concern was, and is, with the process and with the expense of that process.

But, in any case, I said for the record yesterday—and I repeat it today in reply to the honourable senator—that I accept completely the statement that he made in this chamber about the books in question and about their publication and translation. I do not know what more I can say.

Senator Gigantès: If one reads this freely, it sounds as if the Honourable Leader of the Government, by his statement yesterday, implied at least that he had not used the word "fraud;" but the tape from the Canadian press shows that he did.

Senator Murray: I saw the Canadian press report. It does not have the word "fraud" in quotation marks. But certainly I may well have used the word "fraud." What I said yesterday, and repeat again today, is that, first, I did not impute fraudulent intent to the honourable senator or anyone else; secondly, that I accept completely the explanation that he gave about the books; and, thirdly, I withdraw completely anything there that the Honourable Senator Gigantès, or anyone else, finds personally offensive. I do not think I can do any more than that.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I insist on this, because "fraud" is a fairly heavy word. Senator Murray used it and I want the record to show that he used it. By his statement in the house and his apology, which I accept, he implied that he did not. I want the record to show that.

Senator Murray: I implied no such thing. I told the honourable senator that I did not impute fraudulent intent to him or anyone else; that I accepted his explanation on the matter; and that I withdrew, and had no hesitation in withdrawing, any reference that he or anyone else found personally offensive.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I will continue with the reading of the petition containing 27 names from citizens for New Brunswick who live in the Hartland, Bristol, Woodstock and Stikney area.

(Names of signatories read)

I would ask a page to lay on the table these precious petitions. I yield the floor to my colleague, Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to introduce some names of petitioners from Southern Alberta who have sent along their petitions in many numbers.

The first one here is from a well known school teacher and member of the police commission in Lethbridge, Barbara Nault. She is very concerned about the GST as it applies to printed material and books. Next is Tyler Hahn of Lethbridge. Another petitioner who is concerned about the effect of the GST on his restaurant is Tony Rose, who manages one of the best Italian restaurants, Trevis, that I have been in anywhere in this country.

● (1720)

I now wish to read names of people who come from my particular area of the province of Alberta. These people will be most disappointed at the outcome of the vote in this chamber yesterday since they are very concerned about the tax on books. No doubt they hope, in the final analysis, that the bill, which we have failed to have amended, will be defeated, so that books and printed material in Canada can remain tax free as they have been since Confederation.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from the University of Lethbridge area signed by people who are very concerned about the tax on books.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negative.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, your groans are music to my ears, because, as you know, the most recent poll shows that some 70 per cent of Canadians oppose the appointment of the eight additional senators. If they had not voted or had been disqualified from voting, and if the Speaker had not voted, rather than 48 to 54 votes, the vote would have been 48 to 45 votes in favour of the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I have something to add to the remarks made by Senator Frith concerning the vote of eight senators.

This being my first intervention in this chamber, naturally I would have much preferred a more serene and favourable climate, but of course I have no choice.

Ever since we were sworn in on September 27, 1990, we eight senators have been the subject of disparaging remarks, to put it mildly.

This may indeed be my first intervention, but I have pleaded court cases before, I have a good voice, so I intend to speak and say everything I have to say.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I will not refer to the remarks made about us—I am speaking on behalf of the other seven members of the team—by Senator MacEachen who has been calling us the "British" senators. Senator MacEachen, I wish you would look at the proclamation you must have received when you were appointed to the Senate. I got mine a few days ago. I looked at it and saw that I was "summoned by the Queen". You too, Senator MacEachen, were summoned by the Queen.

Senator Frith: Not under section 26, he wasn't!

Senator Grimard: And Senator Grimard is no more British than Senator MacEachen is.

I will not say anything about the remarks of Senator Hébert who has been calling us senators, quote, unquote. I prefer to ignore these remarks from Senator Hébert. But the purpose of my intervention is to comment on the sophism of Senator Frith. Let me explain.

Hon. Peter Stollery: It is not a sophism.

Senator Grimard: First, a small digression. Contrary to what you may think, I want to congratulate you, Senator Frith.

[English]

Senator Frith: Talk about a sophist! One thing you guys have a lot of is brass!

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: First, I want to congratulate you. Do you object to my congratulating you? I want to congratulate you for your three interventions in the debate on Senator Buckwold's report and in the debate on the last two amendments. You rose and said: If the eight senators had not voted, the results would be as follows. Continue to do just that.

[English]

Senator Frith: Just a minute, get it right. I said if they had not voted or if they had been disqualified from voting, which they ought to have been. Get it straight!

[Translation]

Senator Grimard: As far as I know, we have not been disqualified. You say: If the eight senators had not voted the results would be as follows. Do you realize that when you say that you are the best lawyer for our cause? Do you realize that you are saying the Prime Minister of Canada was right to invoke constitutional section 26? Do you realize that I need you, that we need you, that you are our best lawyer and that your services are free? I thank you for this service, but I have something else to tell you.

Senator Frith: You are welcome!

Senator Grimard: This is where your sophistry comes in. You know, I have been pleading before the courts for 41 years, so you people are not going to scare me. I am referring to your sophism when you say that we should not vote until the courts have ruled on our case. That is a sophism which does not rest on any legal basis. Let me explain, and I choose my words very carefully. You want to enforce immediately against us a ruling which has yet to be made. That is a sophism. You would like to make binding a decision which the courts have not yet reached. If we listened to you, Senator Frith, and if we accepted your theory, Canada would end up in a state of anarchy, and I will explain to you why. I will use a very simple example to help you understand better.

I live in Rouyn-Noranda. Last Sunday, in my hometown, people had to go to the polls to choose a new mayor and six new aldermen. If we were to apply your theory to the effect that as soon as legal proceedings are instituted, the people against whom—

Senator Frith: You might continue after eight o'clock, for it is now a quarter past six.

Senator Grimard: Apparently, honourable senators, you do not like what I am saying since you are trying to cut me off. However, if we followed your theory, this would mean that a Rouyn-Noranda citizen could institute proceedings to disqualify the mayor, as well as four or five aldermen, so that these people could not sit as long as a court has not ruled on their status. This would be anarchy. This example could apply not only to municipal corporations, but also to school boards, public and private corporations, as well non-profit charitable organizations. To claim that the eight of us could not vote as long as the courts have not ruled on our status is absurd. Listen carefully, I am about to conclude. Senator Frith, my other seven colleagues and I—

Senator Frith: So-called colleagues.

Senator Grimard: —have the same privileges and rights as you, Senator Frith. We are here as full-fledged senators, you understand? We have every intention to take part in all debates, to be involved in all committee meetings and especially to vote on all bills, all amendments and all questions of privilege.

To conclude, let me say this: We have the same rights and privileges as you—listen to this, because you are a lawyer—and as long as the Supreme Court of Canada has not ruled on our status as senators, we will stay here, the eight of us. We will stay, whether you and your friends opposite like it or not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now 6 p.m. Pursuant to our rules, I must now leave the Chair to return at 8 p.m.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

THE CONSTITUTION

QUALIFICATION OF EIGHT SENATORS APPOINTED UNDER SECTION 26—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to give notice to honourable senators that I will raise a question of privilege on my own behalf and perhaps that of others who were not appointed under Section 26, arising out of the remarks made by Senator Grimard just before adjournment. However, I do not want to proceed before I have an opportunity to study the remarks when we get the Debates of the Senate in due course.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Allan MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to discuss the impact of Bill C-62 on the co-operative movement in Canada and propose an amendment that will remove at least a number of the discriminatory features in this bill as it affects co-operatives in this country.

Perhaps I should begin by reading a letter which I received from James Murray, 13 Dobson Lane, Rothesay, New Brunswick, a member of the Ken Val Co-Operative Ltd. I also received all these letters from members of the same co-operative in New Brunswick indicating their dissatisfaction with the proposed GST legislation. So may I read the letter in question, because it gives me the opportunity to introduce a number of the items I would like to discuss in more detail? It reads:

> As a member/owner of Ken Val Co-Op Ltd. I wish to express my dissatisfaction with the proposed GST legislation in that it discriminates against the co-operative movement.
> A Direct Charge Co-op such as mine uses the weekly service fees to help recover overhead costs in a way that is both shared and visible among Co-op members.
> Because fees generally are subject to tax under the proposed legislation, this weekly service fee is treated as if it were the same as a fee for a golf course, as an example, and does not recognize non-taxable food items on the shelf.
> Additionally, the taxing of share capital as proposed is a direct tax on the capital formation of my Co-op, as opposed to a consumption tax as was intended.
> Why not the same recognition of the legitimate difference of a consumer co-operative as that already provided to the Canadian Credit Union System through Bill C-62, Section 140?
> I ask that you support my co-operative's stand in its endeavour to be treated justly and fairly.
> Yours sincerely,
> James Murray,
> 13 Dobson Lane,
> Rothesay,
> New Brunswick.

James Murray, in his brief letter, raises two of the three issues which have been underlined by representatives of the co-operative movement in their testimony before the Standing Committee of Banking, Trade and Commerce. These three issues are, first, the impact of the GST on direct charge co-operatives; second, the unnecessary administrative costs which are imposed on co-operatives as a result of the GST; third, the taxing of the share capital in co-operatives. I would like to discuss each of these in turn.

As is pointed out in the submissions by the co-operative movement, the fastest growing co-operative in the retail sector is described as the direct charge co-operative. It is different from the conventional consumer co-operative in that the merchandise is sold almost at cost, and the overhead of the co-operative is met by a weekly direct charge which varies from co-operative to co-operative but which amounts to several dollars a week. I understand that this form of co-operative organization is growing rapidly because it is regarded as fair and the method of doing business is transparent and visible to the consumer.

In my own area of Nova Scotia there are a number of direct charge co-operatives. For example, at the Straight of Canso there is the Straight Co-Operative. In Sydney there is a co-operative called the Modern Co-Operative. Outside North Sydney there is the Bras d'Or Co-Operative. All of these are direct charge co-operatives.

Not only do they operate in this way in meeting the overhead charges through weekly payment, but they also build up their capital through a weekly share purchase. Apparently it is a satisfactory system.

The brief of Co-Op Atlantic explains quite clearly how the GST treats this direct charge co-operative. Stores which are not direct charge co-operatives recover their overhead completely through shelf markups. If they sell a $10 non-taxable item there will be no tax on the markup. If the direct charge store sells the same item, consumers will pay GST on that part of the overhead which was collected by the direct overhead charge. This would amount to a significant level of unfair tax.

In 1989 direct overhead charges amounted to $5.6 million. This is in the system that is serviced through Co-Op Atlantic, which is the wholesale owned by the consumer co-operatives which are distributed throughout the Atlantic Provinces. In 1990 those direct overhead charges will amount to $6.3 million, and in 1991, $7 million. A review of direct charge store sales shows that in 1989, 56 per cent of the goods they sold would not be taxable under the GST. This means in effect that if the GST had been in place in 1989, direct charge consumers would have paid $222,000 more in tax than if they had purchased their products elsewhere. Assuming that the percentage of taxable goods does not change and past sales growth continues, the additional and unfair tax paid by direct charge co-op consumers would grow to $246,000 in 1990, and $274,000 in 1991.

The simplicity of the injustice is very clear. The direct charge which is paid by members of direct charge co-operatives does not take into account that portion of the overhead charge which relates to non-taxable merchandise in which they deal. So that in a conventional co-operative, and any other consumer operation, the consumer escapes that portion of the tax which is imposed upon the customer at the direct charge co-operative.

I believe that the case made by the co-operatives is unanswerable. The case could be dealt with easily by the proper tax changes. It amounts, certainly in Co-op Atlantic, to several hundred thousand dollars a year. The same argument was made by other co-operative submissions, including the Canadian Co-operative Association, which speaks for all English-speaking co-operatives in Canada, and also by the Federated Co-operatives Limited in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. The same point is made and clearly requires some correction. That is the first problem with the GST with respect to co-operatives.

The second problem has to do with the unnecessary administrative burden displaced on the co-operative system in Atlantic Canada. Co-op Atlantic is the wholesaler which is owned by the member co-operatives located throughout the Atlantic provinces. The GST is levied upon Co-op Atlantic when it purchases merchandise for distribution throughout its network of retail outlets. Of course, the tax is paid, and there is a rebate or an input tax credit, whichever is the correct designation. Then the merchandise is delivered to the local co-operative, let us say the Brador Co-operative just outside Senator MacDonald's city. At that point the GST is charged to the local co-operative which then seeks a rebate. The final product is sold to the consumer who bears the tax as it is intended, because it is a consumption tax. There is a two-stage tax charge and a two-stage tax rebate or tax credit. That is the situation in Co-op Atlantic.

Let us take one of the co-op's main competitors in Atlantic Canada, Sobey's. Sobey's operates as a wholesaler with retail outlets throughout the communities of Atlantic Canada, but its tax treatment is different. Sobey's will pay the GST on the original merchandise which it purchases, and a rebate is then granted. Then the product is delivered to the retail outlet, but no tax is charged, and no rebate is granted. Naturally the consumer will pay the tax. Why is there a two-stage tax collection system for the co-operative family and a single-stage system for the competitors like Sobey's? I believe it is because the Department of Finance officials still don't understand the nature of the co-operative movement in Canada.

Senator Simard: I think the Prime Minister will know. He went to see Levesque.

Senator MacEachen: If they do know, then the injustice is even more indefensible.

Senator Simard: No, your system will be more complicated.

Senator MacEachen: The interesting point is that the system which is supplied to the co-operative movement does not yield any more revenue for the government. All that happens is in addition to the administrative burden, both of the co-operative movement and of the government itself, because in tracking this two-stage collection and tax rebate system the additional tax burden or the additional administrative expense is about $300,000 for the co-operative system in Atlantic Canada.

That is manifestly unfair. It is manifestly unnecessary, because there is no reason why Co-Op Atlantic, for example, or a co-operative wholesaler, is not given the same treatment and the same opportunities or the same system as big business, or Loblaws, or Sobey's—all the more because the government does not collect any more revenue. All the government does is impose additional administrative costs on itself and on the government itself, because the paper trail, the transaction trail, has to be followed by the government and by the co-operative wholesaler. It is mystifying that such a system is proposed in this particular bill.

I believe it would be interesting for honourable senators who are concerned about the impact of the tax, and whether it is just or unjust, to read the briefs which have been submitted to the committee. Do not take my analysis; make your own analysis. Read the briefs and conclude for yourselves whether there is not a case crying out for corrective action.

Honourable senators, there is another aspect to which I should draw your attention. The Co-op Atlantic, which is a wholesaler—and no doubt other co-operative wholesalers would find themselves in the same position—provide business goods and services to their member units, such as management assistance, advertising material, or a variety of services. Those services are taxed by the GST. The cost of administering these taxes or recovering these taxes to the Co-op Atlantic is about $100,000 a year.

The retail competitor—the Sobeys, for example, escapes that administrative cost. In this second set of problems, the objection, I should make clear, is not the tax itself; it is the administrative burden caused by the system that is applied. Surely that is unjust.

Finally, I turn to the taxing of share capital. It is interesting and appalling that the bill treats the share capital in a co-operative in precisely the same way as it would the membership of a golf club. We know that consumer co-operatives, for example, must have capital for investment, and that capital is provided through the membership in the form of either an initial purchase of capital through a single payment or through a commitment on becoming a member to accumulate a level of capital over a period of years. Now, these are not huge sums. For example, in Shediac, New Brunswick, I think the share capital required for a member is $400, or so I am told. A member who wished to join the Shediac Co-operative, and paid his share capital payment would pay a 7 per cent tax on it. If that same person bought a private share in a commercial corporation, there would be no tax. That is what is so objectionable to the treatment of the co-operatives under the GST.

I should point out that that is the situation in Shediac, as I understand it. A new member would have to pay $400 as the required capital subscription in order to become a member and pay 7 per cent tax. The same would be true of a co-operative like the Brador Co-operative when the minimum share capital per member is $400, and that tax would have to be paid on that initial contribution.

A number of us in the Senate know about consumer co-operatives. We know that individuals in local communities have joined a co-operative. They accumulate their share capital through the rebate on what is known as the patronage refund, but, at the end of each year in the co-operative, a surplus is declared which is distributed among the membership in accordance with the business done in the co-operative, and that amount is payable each year; and often in the old days—maybe it has changed—because of the poor circumstances of many of the members served by the co-operatives, they built up their share capital and their membership over the years by dedicating their patronage refunds to the capital of the co-operative.

That is the situation, and the GST treats the share capital of a co-operative similar to membership of a golf club—overlooking the history of the co-operative movement in Canada, and overlooking the way, for example, that credit unions are treated in Bill C-62, because the share capital of a credit union is not taxable, but the share capital of a consumer co-operative is. Why is that?

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Olson: Good question.

Senator MacEachen: Nobody who knows anything about the co-operative movement can understand why one form of co-operative organization, namely its operations in the financial field, are not taxable and those in the consumer field are taxable.

I believe this to be a rather serious question, because there is considerable growth potential in Canada at the present time for worker co-operatives. I was told today, for example, that there are, in a vast region of Spain, about 122 industrial worker-owned co-operatives with about 25,000 employees, and I asked how many there were in Canada. I am told that in Canada at the present time the worker co-operatives number about 446, with considerable potential for the future. Quebec has 323, Manitoba 32, Saskatchewan 9, British Columbia 20, Newfoundland 4, New Brunswick 12, Nova Scotia 39, and, I believe, Prince Edward Island, 12.

The share capital in these worker co-operatives will vary greatly depending upon the capital intensity of the operation, and what interests me is why there has been no representation from the province of Quebec, keeping in mind that there are 323 worker co-operatives in that province. Do they understand that now the share capital of those worker co-operatives will be taxed 7 per cent? I am told that the co-ops in the Atlantic provinces discovered this by looking at the bill that an exemption had been granted to the consumer, to the credit unions, the financial co-operatives but not to the consumer co-operatives. It may be that that has been unnoticed by others, but it will have considerable repercussions if the share capital, as it may be, amounts to $5,000 per individual in a worker-owned consumer co-operative.

What is asked for is not a benefit or gift, but the same treatment that is now granted to the capital of ordinary corporations, which is non-taxable. These points are carefully reasoned in the documents that were tabled in the committee. As honourable senators know, there are a lot of consumer co-operatives in Nova Scotia. The newest and apparently fastest growing are the direct-charge co-operatives, but there are many conventional co-operatives operating from the capital that is contributed by the members in the way that I have described. There are many in my part of Cape Breton: Chéticamp, Inverness, Port Hood, Mabou, Victoria Farmer's Co-operative in Baddeck, the Whycocomagh Co-operative, the co-operative in Petit-de-Grat, and so on. This reaches into the grass roots. It is not a matter that affects the elite. It affects many ordinary people. That is why we have had representations in great abundance.

Having the case on that ground, what is disappointing to me is that the GST does not understand, as it were, the social and developmental role of the co-operative movement in this country. The co-operatives are not businesses like other businesses. They have the same characteristics. They have to be efficient and have good management, but they have a different philosophy and structure. Their capital comes from a different source and follows a different regime than that of an ordinary corporation. I am disappointed that this tax law ignores the history of our country of the last 40 or 50 years and treats these organizations as golf clubs.

When I went to St Francis Xavier University in the early 1940s, it was alive with talk and action with respect to the co-operative movement. The Antigonish movement was instrumental in providing the impetus to the organization of the co-operative movement in many parts of Atlantic Canada. It was regarded as business, but business with a social purpose. A few years before I went to the university—and Senator MacDonald was there at the same time—Dr. M.M. Coady published a book in 1939 entitled Masters of Their Own Destiny, The Story of the Antigonish Movement of Adult Education Through Economic Cooperation. It was prescribed in one of my courses at the university, and in those days I knew it virtually word by word. I sent for it today to re-enlighten myself on what was promulgated as the purpose of the co-operative Antigonish movement in the 1930s and 1940s, and which still has a place in the life of the Atlantic provinces and of Canada. At the university where Senator MacDonald (Halifax), Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), Senator Graham, Senator Theriault, Senator Murray and Senator—have I missed anyone?

Senator Stanbury: They are all here.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, I am informed that there is a small fire in the Library, which is the reason for the alarm you are now hearing, but apparently it is nothing serious. We will recess for a few minutes.

Upon resuming:

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, the sitting is resumed. Senator MacEachen has the floor.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable Senators, as I said, I sent for Dr. Coady's book, Masters of Their Own Destiny, because I wanted to refresh my memory on the social and developmental impulse of the co-operative movement. I will refer to only a few chapters listed in the Table of Contents and then draw one or two conclusions from them. Chapter 4 is entitled, "The Spread of Adult Education". In Atlantic Canada then education was an integral part of the co-operative philosophy, as it is even today. As honourable senators may know, there is an institute in operation Antigonish called the Coady International Institute which trains students from underdeveloped countries—if we can call any country underdeveloped—in the techniques of adult education and the development of co-operatives that are particularly relevant to the stage of their economies.

Chapter 5 is entitled, "Development of Good Co-operatives," with a good historic reference to the origin of the co-operative movement in Nova Scotia through the establishment of the British-Canadian Co-operative, which predated any co-operative that had been established by the Antigonish group. It was economically successful and had a strong membership base.

The next chapter deals with the significance of credit unions. That leads me to the conclusion, which is self-evident, that the credit union movement and consumer co-operative movement are part of a single whole because they operate under the same philosophies and principles. So it is unusual that this new tax be applied to one wing of the co-operative movement and not to the other. Therefore, I would include in my amendment the change that would put consumer co-operatives on the same basis as the credit unions or the caisse populaires.

What is basic to my position is my disappointment that tax changes do not recognize the special significance of the co-operative movement in Canada and place—the way the GST is to be implemented—extra administrative burdens on the co-operative for the collection of the tax. That means extra burdens for a certain class of consumer co-operatives, which are not applied to their competitors in the so-called private sector. I am also disappointed by the fact that the shared capital of the co-operative member is taxable, while capital of other corporations is not. Why this discrimination? It does not make sense. More disappointing than all of that is the fact that the tax itself seems to fail in any recognition of the history and social significance of what the co-operative movement has been in Canada, especially in Atlantic Canada. I hope it will be possible to do something about it in my amendment.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I move:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Bill be amended to make membership in a co-operative a zero-rated supply and to make provision for that portion of direct charge service fees of co-operative corporations that finances the overhead for the supply of goods and services listed in Schedule VI,

(a) by striking out line 28 on page 44 and substituting the following:

"share in a credit union or co-operative corporation as defined in the Income Tax Act issued by a person"; and

(b) by adding to Schedule VI on page 342, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:

"DIRECT CHARGE SERVICE FEE OF A CO-OPERATIVE CORPORATION

1. That portion of a direct charge service fee levied in a period by a co-operative that bears to

(a) the total direct charge service fees levied in the period

the ratio that

(b) the total value of zero-rated supplies (other than those under this Part) made by the co-operative corporation in the period

(c) the total value of supplies (other than direct charge service fees) made by the co-operative corporation in the period."

I regret the use of the term "co-operative corporation" because it tends to obscure the difference between a co-operative organization and a corporation, but it is used in the Income Tax Act to define a co-operative organization; therefore, it seemed appropriate to include it in this amendment for the sake of uniformity. I should add that this amendment addresses two problems I outlined in my speech. I did not deal with my third problem. Perhaps it will be possible to deal with it later if a suitable amendment can be constructed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

QUALIFICATION OF EIGHT SENATORS APPOINTED UNDER SECTION 26—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senators, Senator Graham has agreed to yield to me. I am not speaking to the amendment. I want to make an explanatory addendum to the question of privilege I gave notice of when we resumed at 8 o'clock. With reference to my motion on the qualifications of Senator Forrestall, the point of privilege I am raising and the points I am going to make are purely political, not personal. I feel no animosity toward the eight senators, who, as far as I know, are all fine Canadians. That applies to every one of them—to Madame Lavoie-Roux and to Senator Grimard, who made his points from the quick look at the "blues" on a professional basis.

Senator Molgat: He has disappeared.

Senator Frith: Yes, and I will take him on on the same basis. I say that about Mr. Meighen, certainly about my friend Dr. Keon, about Mrs. Johnson, Mr. Berntson, Mr. Ross and Mr. Forrestall, who have all had distinguished careers as Canadians. My motivation is purely political and professional. I think they are not qualified for constitutional reasons only, and I am not making a personal attack on them. I understand that someone opposite objects to my explaining that this is not personal.

• (2040)

I explained, had you been listening, that I had said it once with reference to Senator Forrestall on another point—which was not related to the point raised here—pursuant to section 26. I said that I was repeating it so that it would apply to this question of privilege, not just on the motion I made in respect to Senator Forrestall.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that Bill C-62 be now read the third time.

In amendment, it has been moved by Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Fairbairn:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the bill be amended to make membership in a co-operative a zero-rated supply and to make provision for that portion of direct charge service fees of co-operative corporations that finances the overhead for the supply of goods and services listed in Schedule VI,
> (a) by striking out line 28 on page 14 and substituting the following:
> "share in a credit union—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I will be very brief. I wish to deal with the matter of amendments.

Let me say at the outset that repentance is a very precious thing. I have been hoping that it might occur around here to change the nature of the very partisan struggle for power in this Parliament.

Yesterday there was a sign that the Senate would return to its traditional responsibility of amending and improving legislation, making it possible for the government to govern, which would permit me to vote in favour of yesterday's amendment proposed to Bill C-62. Unfortunately, before we reached that point, I read the article in the Globe and Mail quoting Senator MacEachen as stating:

> If you expect this thing will be over in 96 hours, just wait. You're going to be surprised.

A little later, it is stated:

> The clear strategy now is to kill the GST, Mr. MacEachen said, and not just so that the Liberals can replace it with a different form of a similar tax. Asked whether there is a Liberal form of GST waiting in the wings, the Liberal Senate leader stated: "I hope not. That's no my intention."

This means that the proposed eight amendments may be used only to delay the bill until it is too late to make it effective. If the amendments being proposed had been studied, prepared and recommended by our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee at an earlier date, they would have been a successful and a correct answer to an extremely complex fiscal and financial problem facing Canada.

At this late eleventh or twelfth hour, the process of returning a series of amended bills to the House of Commons will only mean that all concerned—government, business, small business and the public—would find themselves in a quagmire from which there would be little hope of escape. The taxpayers, small and large, and our ability to manage our affairs would be completely frustrated.

As I said before, I am not enamoured of the tax as it now exists, but the alternative now is worse, and perhaps disastrous.

Had the Senate committee chosen to make use of the eight months possibly available to make amendments, I would probably have supported these amendments. However, I now find myself compelled to act in a way which I would not have chosen. I can only vote against these late amendments, however much they might have appealed to me if they had been offered some months earlier.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Molson.

I respect everything you have to say, as you would expect. However, when you talk about bringing in amendments, I presume that you are aware that many of the amendments which have been proposed in this chamber, and which will be proposed, had already been proposed in the House of Commons and rejected by the government as unacceptable.

How do you relate that to your position that these same amendments should have been made again, in view of the fact that they had already been rejected?

Senator Molson: I believe I made that point earlier; perhaps I did not.

What happens in the House of Commons and what happens in the Senate must be treated separately if we are going to maintain the bicameral system of government. I believe that we in the Senate have a perfect right to amend or to reject bills—although I do separate money bills, I must admit, and I have said so.

I do not believe that the fact that these weaknesses and suggested amendments had occurred much earlier in the House of commons and had been turned down by them, in any way prevents the Senate from dealing in this chamber with similar amendments, or even with amendments of the same nature.

We are supposed to have experience and so-called sober second thought, and I believe that we have every right to consider the weaknesses of this bill and to try to bring forth amendments which would help the process of governing this country.

When the committee set out determined to axe the tax from the word go, that was where the mistake was made. Had we not in this chamber decided to forgo our prestudy, Senator Buckwold and his committee would have had eight months to consider doing a job on this bill.

Since we do not have prestudy, which has been eliminated thanks to the decision made some time ago by the other side, it had only three months and the month it took to write the report. Certainly, if one is travelling, one cannot possibly be doing the job of studying and getting expert advice in the same way that one normally would in studying any of these complex undertakings.

In this case, the eight months would have given us a wonderful chance to do a really good job of dealing with all the inequities which have been pointed out. I agree that there are problems with this bill. As I have said all along, I do not like the bill. But that is not the point.

As I have said from the beginning, it is not our role to set out to axe the tax. Our role is to try to improve the legislation of this country, to try to help the people of this country, and to try to further government, not to try to block government from this house.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: For the record, more than to respond to Senator Molson, whom I am not going to impress, it should be very clearly stated that the committee did not start out with the idea of axing the tax. Absolutely wrong! Absolutely wrong! And some friends on the other side are well-aware of this.

The intention of the committee was to review the legislation; hopefully to come in with some amendments; if necessary, to suggest improvements; and to go through the normal procedures. I am not talking now about the principle of pre-study. We have gone through that many, many times and it has been discarded. That is the way the Senate has been operating for the past several years.

Senator Molson: By whom?

Senator Buckwold: By our decision, and I respect that. However, Senator Molson, with the greatest of respect, I think you are dreaming in technicolour. You are not in the real world. You know that we were told time and time again, quietly, that the government was not going to accept any amendments, any more than it will do so today. No way! It was not prepared in any way to have it go back to the House of Commons. Let's be realistic.

Senator Molson: What are you doing now about sending it back to the House of Commons?

Senator Buckwold: If people across the way would vote their conscience rather than the dictates of their party, amendments would be made now. I do not think anyone honestly wants to tax books or see an inequitable tax applied to electric power and heating bills. You have said yourself that you do not support that.

The fact is, the instructions are that there will be no amendments, period. Even if they were the best amendments in the world, demanded by 99.99 per cent of the people instead of 85 per cent, they would not be accepted. The government is not going to send these amendments back to the House of Commons and start a fiasco that will make the confusion in this chamber look like a kindergarten party. We know what the instructions are, so, please, let us not mislead anyone by saying that the committee started out to axe the tax.

Let me tell you that if you had been with us when we moved across the country you would have been slowly but surely influenced by what you heard. No one came and said, "Axe the tax." I think one day several weeks into the process some of us sat down and said that this bill could not really be amended.

Senator David: Who said that?

Senator Buckwold: You fellows.

Senator Barootes: If it can't be amended why are you trying to amend it?

Senator Buckwold: You have asked that before. Keep quiet!

Senator Barootes: You can't repair a car that is a total wreck.

Senator Buckwold: That is what you say.

Senator Barootes: Now all of a sudden you want to amend it. That is very interesting.

Senator Cools: Senator Barootes, you agreed with that. The day the committee brought back the report we had four recommendations and one of those—

Senator Barootes: Senator Frith got up and told us what you were going to do.

Senator Cools: You did not care to discuss it. You filibustered. You did not care to amend it.

Senator Barootes: I apologize for interrupting you, Senator Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold: That is fine because I am glad to hear you say the bill is comparable to an absolutely wrecked car that is impossible to repair. That is what you just said. The fact is, we have to get something done to get the old wrecked car off the street because it is blocking traffic. As the second best thing, we are bringing in some amendments.

Senator Molson: Senator Buckwold, you asked me if I would accept a question. Would you like to put your question?

Senator Buckwold: I asked the question earlier. You responded and I was responding to your response and you were quite welcome to respond to my response before we were so rudely interrupted.

All I am saying to my friend Senator Molson is do not try to give the impression that our committee was out, as you said, to axe the tax. This is absolutely wrong. I want it on the record that as we moved across the country the committee had to respond to the wishes of the people. That is how we brought in our report and we meant it. But amendments were out of the question.

Senator Molson: I congratulated you on the speech when you explained that. I still congratulate you on a splendid speech but I was simply trying now to accept your question.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Hon. Alasdair B. Graham: I thank honourable senators for allowing me to participate in this debate. It is very difficult to cover the same road or follow in the tracks of someone so experienced and who speaks on this subject so eloquently as one of my former professors, Senator MacEachen. Perhaps at the outset I should, as I did at the hearings in Halifax, declare a conflict, as did Senator Robertson at the time. She is a member of a co-operative in her own area, as I am, obviously, in Sydney.

If Canada possesses some of the attributes of an economic democracy today, it does so partly because of the strength of our co-operative institutions. Today, a vast profusion of local co-ops enhance our national social fabric, making Canada a very special community indeed. Grain handling co-ops serve farmers; consumer co-operatives dispense goods and services from coast to coast; credit unions and marketing co-ops exist in even the most remote areas. The principle of democratic control, ensured by the principle of one vote per member regardless of the number of shares owned, anchors the day-to-day activities of daycare co-ops and housing co-ops and fishery co-ops. As of 1989, our top five non-financial co-operatives had sales and service revenues of $7,004,200,000.

So the movement has grown and ordinary Canadians have benefited and we have become a pretty good neighbourhood through the power of community association. We owe much of our present inheritance to people like Robert Owen, the 19th century British philanthropist and industrialist who argued that the evils of the industrial revolution and unchecked individualism were due to reckless competition and the greed which had debased the living standards of the working classes of that country. The objective of workers must not be to destroy industrialism, but rather to control it, he argued. This meant the transformation of society by voluntary co-operation. And Canada became a laboratory for social change as waves of immigrants washed through the peaceable kingdom from sea to sea leaving much of the landscape irrevocably changed. The prairies, for example, were dotted with the re-assuring and familiar presence of grain-handling co-ops.

In my own province, Father Moses Michael Coady, the "Humble Giant," as he was known affectionately—the man from North East Margaree in Cape Breton—became synonymous with the movement for economic self help. Coady witnessed at first hand the semi-famine conditions that haunted the fishing villages, as well as some of the coal and steel towns of Eastern Nova Scotia. He saw the wretched housing and sanitary conditions of these catastrophic times which worsened as the Great Depression began to take its toll. He saw the appalling abuses by company stores, the low wages, the unfair and irregular shift work. In short, conditions not unlike those of Owen's 19th century England.

It was Coady who believed you had to give ordinary people hope and that you did that through practical adult education, and through programs of economic self-help. His Antigonish movement has been emulated throughout this country. Indeed it has been emulated throughout a host of third world countries. The Coady International Institute was set up in his honour at St. Francis Xavier University and remains a day-to-day tribute to his wisdom and fundamental common sense. If we have some of the attributes of an economic democracy in our country today it is because of the inheritance of men like Robert Owen and Moses Coady. They understood that if you give people ideas, they will put them to work. They believed in self-help. They had faith in the fact that uneducated men and women could learn and educate themselves.

The co-op movement was then founded on three basic values: mutual self-help, equality and equity. As Father Jimmy Tompkins, one of Father Coady's associates once pointed out, ". . . the little people together is a giant. You've got to give them ideas, then they'll blow the roof off."

In Atlantic Canada, the people have blown the roof off. Co-op Atlantic is owned by 174 co-operatives. These 174 co-ops are, in turn, controlled by one third of the population of Atlantic Canada, being 169,000 families. The total annual sales for a Co-op Atlantic network are in excess of $1 billion. They employ 3,550 full-time employees and over 1,700 part-time employees.

There is a philosophy behind this spectacular illustration of human self-help and it is a philosophy which has aided in shaping Canada's national soul. Hopefully Canada still has one, even though it has been sadly neglected, I believe, by the present government. That philosophy was outlined in Coady's, The Common Man is Capable, which was also written in 1939.

Monseigneur Coady said, "If we are seriously interested in raising the cultural level of the masses of men, we will help in solving the economic problem first so that they may cease to worry about bread and begin to enjoy their Brahms . . ." He went on to say, "From the people, raised to new levels, will arise poets, painters and musicians to give expression to the new and eternal truths that beat within their breasts. As in nature, so in man, the lofty mountain peaks shall rise not from the level plain but from the foothills."

We must remember one basic truth about the government we are dealing with. This, I submit, is a government of merchants. As John Adams so astutely observed, "merchants have no country. The mere spot they stand on does not constitute so strong an attachment as that from which they draw their gains." As illustrated in our vote last night on the amendment concerning reading material, this is not a government that cares about books and education, about our novelists, playwrights and poets, and certainly, in this instance, about our co-operative institutions. This government does not see virtue in the greatness of economic co-operation or, "in the greatness of littleness" as Father Coady once observed. He said, "We have no desire to create a nation of shopkeepers whose only thoughts run to groceries and to dividends." Senator Finlay MacDonald will remember that quote very well. Father Coady went on to say, "We want our people to look into the sun, and into the depths of the sea." Senator MacDonald has quoted that to me on a number of occasions.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I said "spinach" before "spinose".

Senator Graham: I am afraid, honourable senators, that we are dealing with a government of merchants which is not interested in raising the cultural level of the people. This is a government which neglects, indeed imperils, our social fabric, our so-called "good neighbourhood." This is a government which is discriminating against co-ops, and indeed, as Senator MacEachen mentioned earlier, looks upon membership in a co-op much like membership in a golf club.

Co-ops are owned by the people. We have to understand clearly that the people are our social fabric. The people have share capital invested in co-operatives. Co-op Atlantic discovered last March that the GST legislation had written them off as a legitimate business enterprise. The legislation was designed to require payment of a 7 per cent tax on co-operative share capital. Co-ops in the Maritimes have to compete with firms such as Loblaws who will not have to pay that tax. So much for economic democracy; so much for the encouragement of democratic institutions.

As I mentioned, if a person joins a golf club, he pays the 7 per cent. If he joins a co-op, he pays the 7 per cent. The tax on share capital is treated then as a membership fee. The playing field tilts towards big business. The 7 per cent on co-operative shared capital, it has been estimated, will cost the co-op system at least $600,000 in the first year alone. The whole philosophy of the progressive co-op movement in this country will be savaged by the antediluvian antics of this government of merchants. A tax on shared capital means an attack on the fundamental assumptions which anchor our national experiment with voluntary associations. The President of Co-op Atlantic alluded to this in his recent presentation before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pobihushchy has this to say, "I think it would seriously jeopardize our idea of co-operation, the co-operative enterprise. How can you have a co-operative enterprise without capital? How can you have a business enterprise without capital? This law requires our co-op capital to be taxed. I do not know how we can change that so it would not be taxed. I am not sure that any Government of Canada, any political party, any politician, any parliament should require the people, who have together decided to pursue the satisfaction of their needs within the law, to be penalized by another law. I do not think that is fair; I do not think that is right. I do not think that Canadians would agree that that is right."

The Prime Minister recently sent best wishes to the members of Canadian co-operatives during Co-op Week, held October 14th-20th of this year. In his note to the Canadian co-operatives the Prime Minister had this to say:

> Canada's credit unions and co-operatives have made a significant contribution to our country's economic growth. They are part of communities across Canada and have contributed in a meaningful way to the social fabric of our nation.

It appears, honourable senators, that the Prime Minister has no understanding of what that social fabric is.

I am reminded of the old expression about being nice to the people on the way up because you are certainly going to meet them on the way down.

In 1959, while a senior Arts student at St. Francis Xavier University, our Prime Minister won first prize in the Nova Scotia Co-operative Union public speaking contest held at St. Mary's University. In the March 1959 edition of the Halifax Chronical Herald, Mr. Mulroney is shown accepting a cheque for $100 from one Mr. Alex (Tando) MacIsaac, Managing Director of the Nova Scotia Co-Op Union. Honourable senators from Nova Scotia would certainly know that the late Mr. MacIsaac was at one time a Conservative member of the Legislative Assembly in Nova Scotia representing Guysborough County, and was, indeed, a member of the Stanfield Cabinet of that day. I wonder what Tando would be thinking now. I wonder what he would say, Senator MacDonald, if he were in this chamber. He certainly would be voting against the GST and supporting Senator MacEachen's amendment.

I suppose in my historic references, I could go back four years earlier and refer to an article in the Cape Breton Post of March 24, 1955. The headline reads, "Lowell Murray, New President, College Society." The article says, "Lowell Murray, a St. Francis Xavier junior arts student from New Waterford has been elected President of the Students' Co-Op Society at the Annual Meeting of the Association." It goes on to say that Mr. Murray will guide a twelve man board of directors, and the Co-Op Enterprises, including a book store, a canteen, a barber shop, a laundry and dry cleaning services, and even a skate sharpening service. I am sure Senator Murray will want to make use of that last service during the course of this particular debate.

Senator Corbin: He has been skating ever since.

Senator Graham: How quickly we forget; but the people of Atlantic Canada will certainly not forget, and indeed the people of Canada will not forget.

I have here the latest Gallup poll with respect to the GST, which says that more than three quarters of Canadians oppose the proposed goods and services tax, according to a Gallup Poll released today. This is from the Toronto Star of November 1. I looked quickly to find out what they were saying in Atlantic Canada, and I found that three per cent are in favour of the GST and 92 per cent are opposed.

It is clear, honourable senators, that this is a government that has broken its social contract with the Canadian people, and they are certainly not going to forget. If Canada's co-operatives have made—as the Prime Minister said in a statement during Co-Op Week—such a significant contribution, then why, in heaven's name, does the Prime Minister so significantly debase them with this regressive and unfair tax? This is particularly so in Atlantic Canada, a region which has experienced the visible helplessness of economic dependency on large corporations whose ownership is often external to the region—a region where the vigorous application of principles of voluntary association and cooperation provide the only real relief from a kind of neo-Colonialism.

So why this regressive tax—a tax that will be paid by our direct charge co-ops—co-ops in which there is no profit orientation; co-ops which sell groceries and housewares to their owner-members. The GST will be paid by these same owner-members on direct charges levied for overhead. So why is it, honourable senators, that Loblaws, across the street, will not have to pay such a tax? This tax will cost those co-ops approximately $275,000 in the first year of the GST. This is a penalty for economic democracy. It is an outrageous tax on a good neighbourhood, a neighbourhood which through self-help has struggled to overcome the disabilities of dependency, a region which has struggled to overcome the debilitating impact of regional disparities.

I shall read another article to illustrate what I am talking about, namely, regional disparities and the difficulties of the GST. This is from the Chronicle Herald of Halifax, Tuesday, October the 23rd, under the headline "GST Already Damaging Nova Scotia's Economy-Streatch". The article says:

> The Mulroney government's imposition of a Goods and Services Tax against the will of the people is dead wrong and Nova Scotia's economy is already being damaged by it, the provinces minister of small business development said Monday.
> Ken Stretch said the planned GST "is already contributing to a downturn in consumer confidence."
> "It is creating fear and uncertainty in the small business community which will only result in confusion among business people and confusion among consumers."
> The consequences of this uncertainty include lagging sales, dwindling profits and a rising jobless rate, he said.
> Mr. Stretch said Ottawa "should forget about the GST."

There are other ways the playing field has been unfairly tilted against the people. Co-op Atlantic will have to pay the tax on all products it buys; then a rebate will be claimed, except for food items which are, of course, zero-rated. Co-op Atlantic will then distribute the goods to local co-ops, and they, as well, will have to pay the GST. These, in turn, will claim a rebate. The products will be sold to the members, and the owner-members will pay the GST.

There is a heavy burden of administration implicit in such complex-multiple chains of GST payment. There is no equity in this. The direction of the present government's tax policy is inequitable because Loblaws, for example, will pay the tax, claim the rebate, and, in so doing, halve its administration costs.

• (2120)

There is no doubt that there is no fair or level playing field anticipated under the present legislation. The GST hits the co-ops harder than the competition. The GST hits the ordinary guy harder than the large corporation. It is estimated that the co-op system will pay over $1.3 million more each year than would the similarly sized chain store. So much for the social contract.

Honourable senators, I have always believed that Canada was one of the few countries in the world where the truth would out as a result of logical arguments among the members of an informed electorate. Before this debate, I did not view this as a polite fiction. I think Mr. Pobihushchy, President of Co-op Atlantic, believed this when he argued his brief in front of our Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in Halifax last July. Senator Poitras, vice-chairman of the committee, asked Mr. Pobihushchy on July 12 in Halifax — and he was trying to be helpful, accommodating and courteous at the time:

> Do you have documents or copies of correspondence so that we know where we are going in looking into this? Could we have a copy of the letters you have sent? I understand some senators have been aware of this for the past two months. Personally, I was not made aware of it, but if we can, we will try to help you.

Senator Corbin: That is exactly what he said.

Senator Graham: You were there, Senator Corbin. Mr. Pobihushchy replied:

> We can provide that information.

Then Mr. Tom Webb said:

> I would just like to add that the remedies are there. In every single issue in the brief, we have identified remedies. We have looked at those remedies closely. There are no great problems that flow out of those remedies. So each of the three problems can easily be solved. The remedies that would be open to the Senate may be more difficult because you are limited to dealing with the legislation but, nevertheless, that does not make the remedies impossible from the point of view of the Senate either.

Senator Poitras interjected and said:

> Perhaps the Minister of Finance or Revenue Canada could help. Have you been in touch with Revenue Canada?

Mr. Webb said:

> No, we contacted the Minister of Finance.

Senator Poitras replied:

> You have not contacted the Minister of Revenue?

Mr. Webb said:

> When we met with officials in Mr. Wilson's office, they offered to deal with Revenue Canada on the matter. We are waiting for that process.

Senator Poitras replied:

> I thank you for your brief. We will do everything we can.

At the time I thought that was a reasonable statement. I think it is safe to say that other honourable senators present expressed similar sentiments.

What has been the response from government? In my hand I have a communiqué addressed to all members of Parliament and senators from Co-op Atlantic. I will not read the entire communiqué, but it says in part:

> In March of last year, after having the opportunity to examine the GST legislation, Co-op Atlantic discovered to its dismay that the legislation had been written as if co-operatives were not a legitimate form of business. The legislation discriminates against co-operatives and tilts the "playing field" in favour of capital based business. The impact of the tax was assessed for the Co-op Atlantic system. It amounts to a competitive disadvantage of more than $1 million dollars in the first year alone which increases yearly.
> Co-op Atlantic wrote to the Minister of Finance and contacted officials through the Canadian Co-operative Association. A meeting with officials and a meeting with Minister's Office were held in June. Officials were indifferent to the problems. The Minister's Office expressed sympathy and undertook to co-ordinate responses on all points by the end of July.
> July stretched into August and August into September with no reply. Finally on September 7 another meeting was arranged with Finance. There were no answers. Officials raised the same questions they raised in June. They suggested that we should really be talking to Revenue Canada and hastily set up a meeting. Revenue Canada told us that for the changes we were seeking we really should talk to Finance. Subsequent contact with officials has proven fruitless and frustrating. It seems clear that the Government has no intention of finding solutions to any of the problems which this tax imposes on co-operatives.

To me, that is an incredible catalogue of events. It is obviously clear that the government has not responded to any of the reasonable and serious representations made to it by Co-op Atlantic, which I believe is nothing more than contempt for the people.

At the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee hearings in Halifax, I talked about the options open to the committee—indeed to the Senate. I said that we had several options with respect to the legislation. We could pass it as is, we could kill it, we could amend it, or we could delay it. I asked Mr. Pobihushchy if he thought it would be legitimate for the Senate to kill the bill. I want to quote his response:

> I wanted to preface my response with a reminder that the delegates at the last annual general meeting of Co-op Atlantic overwhelmingly—

Remember the membership is over 500,000

> —mandated the leadership to express the view to the government that they did not want the GST. They do not want this kind of taxation system, they want it killed. That is what they said, and I agree with them.

He went on:

> With respect to whether or not the death of the GST should come by the action of the Senate, there has been a lot of talk in the recent past about Senate reform. Some of the talk has been interesting; most of it has been irrelevant, but at the apex of the Canadian democracy sits Parliament. Parliament is charged with a particular mandate by the Constitution—that is, to provide peace, order and good government. We are talking here about good government. That charge in the Canadian Constitution is not merely a charge to the House of Commons or to the Senate, but to Parliament. The House of Commons, as we know, is an intergal part of Parliament, as is the Senate. The House of Commons has rules under which it operates, as does the Senate. Sometimes it happens that the two houses of Parliament have less than a consensus or an agreement between them, and then they have to rely on the rules, which, by the way, define, in large measure, the nature of Canadian democracy.

He concluded:

> We know that in the present case we have a government in place that was elected by something in the order of 43 per cent of the electorate. It is a powerful government. It has a healthy, handsome majority in the House of Commons, a majority that is not a function of the people's choice, but a majority as a function of the rules. Those rules also give the Senate an authority to act on behalf of the pursuit of good government, and it uses those rules, whatever they are, however they are designed, in that pursuit; and if the rules permit it, and it is required to stand opposed to a particular piece of legislation, action, or policy, it is duty-bound to do that. That is part and parcel of the Canadian democracy. I do not think we have any real serious difficulty with the Senate doing its job. We have difficulty with a Parliament that does not do its job, whether it is the House of Commons, the Senate, or both.

Honourable Senators, for co-operatives, for all those institutions involved in practical community education, the task is virtually unending. Indeed, co-ops are agents of community development. This is an unending process. The road is long. The task is never completed. If justice is the best word in the English language, as June Callwood once so well point out, we had best exercise it over and over again and keep faith with our co-operative inheritance. We must nourish our national soul, exercise it and give it sunshine. We must not neglect our good neighbourhood because our society is well worth preserving.

● (2130)

Honourable senators, if politics is the art of the possible, it must be recognized that statesmanship is the art of making things possible, as Kenneth McNaught pointed out in A Prophet in Politics. Statesmanship is all about raising the social and cultural levels of the masses of men and women in this, our peaceable Northern Kingdom. It is, indeed, about preserving our good neighbourhood.

[Senator Graham.]

We see no statesmanship being exercised here. Indeed, there is malice aforethought in the Conservative government's fiscal strategy. We might argue that the social contract between the government and its citizens has been broken beyond repair. Hopefully, that is not so. But that would not be the fault of the citizenry, honourable senators; that would be the fault of a government which never understood the Canadian social contract to begin with.

That is the fault of a government which neglects and humiliates our national soul. That is the fault of a government which does not understand that greatness is littleness.

Our good neighbourhood has been battered. "Justice" is no longer the best word in the English language. The masses of our workers and primary producers find no place in the Mulroney millennium. It is certainly not a millenium where the righteous would find sanctuary.

I urge all honourable senators to support this amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Graham, you mentioned Senator Poitras' comments, and you then alluded to the Co-op Atlantic memo which was circulated to all members of Parliament, in which they tell us about the run-around they were given between the Department of Finance and Revenue Canada.

Are you also aware that during that meeting, Senator Simard, who will enlighten us with some appropriate comments, I am sure, stated at page 53:101 of the proceedings of the committee, when he was responding to Mr. Webb—and I will not go into all of the comments which Mr. Webb or Mr. Pobihushchy made at the time

> You have said that your membership told you to tell the Senate to kill the bill. Is that mainly because of the three points you have raised? We will see what the minister has to say, because we know that the co-op movement is important.

Senator Simard added:

> You are with a friendly crowd here.

Senator Graham, how would you interpret Senator Simard's comments? Would you take that as a commitment to the effect that he and his colleagues—Senator Poitras and Senator Robertson, who did not go that far but who almost slipped into the same commitment to the witnesses—would indeed have spoken to the Minister of Finance or to the Minister of Revenue to explain the conundrum of the Atlantic Co-op?

How in the world can one understand that following these commitments absolutely nothing happened in either the Department of Finance or Revenue Canada? I am totally amazed.

Senator Graham: I am sure that Senator Simard will want to answer that question when he speaks, and I understand that he is going to speak next.

I can say that it was a very interesting two days in Halifax. I honestly came away with the feeling that, indeed, the Conservative members of the committee were going to make very strong, forceful and powerful recommendations to the Minister of Finance and, indeed, to the Government of Canada, to ensure in this particular instance that the concerns which were being addressed by the spokesman for Co-op Atlantic would indeed be addressed and that they would find room for an appropriate amendment.

I am sure that Senator Simard will want to address that.

Senator Corbin: I look forward to his response because, once again, he has not delivered.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Graham.

I want to understand clearly, Senator Graham, what you are asking. Is it simply that the co-operatives be treated equally with corporations? Is that the simple, short answer to what you are asking?

Senator Graham: Yes, exactly.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate today. It will be the first time that I speak to Bill C-62 and, more specifically, to the amendment of Senator MacEachen.

Before discussing the merits of the amendments and my own position, in this respect, I would like to add a few opening paragraphs, for the record, and say that as far as I am concerned, what is at stake in this debate is fiscal accountability—in other words, the government's responsibility for taxation.

[English]

We were reminded of this responsibility by John Murphy, Mayor of St. John's, Newfoundland, when he appeared before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in July. He stated:

> For 20 years politicians have not faced up to the financial reality, and the result is that we are now borrowing to pay the interest on money we have previously borrowed. The present situation is financial madness. Irresponsible people will attack the GST, as it is popular to be against any tax. We can only hope that common sense, reason and a sense of responsibility for the future will prevail.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, ever since the government came to power in 1984, it has been committed to putting the country's financial house in order, as was pointed out by the mayor of St. John's, Newfoundland.

The government promised to introduce a set of policies to review and control government spending and create a favourable climate for developing the potential of Canadian businesses and Canadian workers, in order to generate sustained economic growth and new jobs for Canadians.

I wanted to start my speech this evening with this preamble because I believe that is the background of this legislation. We can discuss individual amendments but we must never forget the broader objectives of this bill.

However, I am afraid I will let myself be tempted to respond to certain comments made by Senator Corbin.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: It wasn't my comment, it was yours, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Senator Corbin asked me what I meant in my reply to one of the witnesses that appeared before us, and I am referring to a Mr. Pobihushchy who spoke for Co-op Atlantic. His name appears at page 53:93 of the committee proceedings of July 12, 1990.

Senator Corbin, you asked me a moment ago what had happened since that day that could possibly have made me change my mind. I agree that at the time, I had an open mind, like all my other colleagues. We travelled across Canada. We had no preconceived ideas. We felt that listening to the people was a matter to be taken seriously.

Senator Hébert: As seriously as on our trips for Bill C-21.

Senator Simard: That was the spirit in which we made the trip and listened to the co-op people, for instance. A number of unpleasant surprises as a result of unexpected and I would say deplorable decisions by the chairman, Senator Buckwold, and by his colleagues, led to some equally unpleasant developments. In fact, after spending one month travelling to listen to Canadians, I, like the witnesses and my colleagues, expected to have a report that could be discussed, considered and analysed, in consultation with the Department of Finance and the minister, and we expected to be able to consider possible amendments. However, that was not the case, because after three or four more public hearings in Ottawa, at the end of August, nothing more was done until noon on September 24, when we were handed a report that, the Liberal senators said, had to be adopted at six o'clock.

This means, Senator Corbin, that although we were well disposed all summer long and were acting in good faith, we did not have enough time. What has occurred in this House since September 25 was not conducive either to an exercise in reflection or an attempt to bring in amendments which could have been considered differently; that is what happened, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: If I may, I should like to make just a brief comment, because I know that you are going to abandon this argument or difference of opinion, and we might as well settle this matter right away. You said: We shall see what the minister will reply, because we know that the co-op movement is important. You are here among friends.

All through the hearings, Senator Simard, there were I do not know how many people from Senator Murray's office and many hired students who were there to pass notes on to you. Whenever something important occurred, one or two of these people would rush to the phone to call someone in Ottawa. I have no idea whether they were calling Senator Murray's office, Minister Wilson's office or the Minister of National Revenue's office. I admit that you did your work. You followed the committee all summer long, you were honestly and profoundly involved in the process. Therefore I cannot accept what you have said in view of the fact that you had all these people at your service—at times, they were as many as six or seven, at least in the Maritimes, elsewhere, there were sometimes more, sometimes fewer. How is it that these comments were never brought to the minister's attention? Why did the people at your service not do so? They were paid for that. I suggest you have no excuse for not having brought right away this issue of major significance for Maritimers to the attention of the ministers concerned.

Moreover, when co-op representatives came to see the Minister of Finance, a meeting was hastily arranged with the Minister of National Revenue, but nobody wanted to make any commitment. You had them running around. The government had them running around.

Senator Simard: Who organized a meeting with co-op representatives?

Senator Corbin: For your information, I can quote part of the memo which was sent to you, to me, to every senator and Member of the House of Commons:

> July stretched into August and August into September with no reply.

The Atlantic Co-op people wrote to us. They had received no reply to their own initiative and we had received even less of a reply concerning the commitment Senator Poitras and you haf made to convey their grievances to the ministers concerned.

> There were no answers. Officials raised the same questions they raised in June. They suggested that we should really be talking to Revenue Canada.

From one thing to the next, they kept running in circles. In September, they had not yet received any reply. The inequity is maintained in the bill we have before us tonight. I find this altogether unacceptable. I have known you for quite some time, Senator Simard, and I am surprised that the government has failed to respond to their grievances. I am sure you have had an opportunity, even if you were quite busy, to convey this grievance to the ministers concerned. Yet, nothing was done. We find this quite distressing.

Senator Simard: I beg to differ as to the sequence of events.

Almost daily, either verbally or in writing, or even through a third party, the Minister of Finance was informed of our concerns. Moreover, early in August, we were provided with a very preliminary and incomplete report from the clerk, dated August 14 (I thought that this practice would continue) under the signature of Senator Buckwold indicating that some points had been brought to our attention. So I started to put together a list of possible changes in the hope to be able to discuss them with the minister and his staff. Honourable senators, I can tell you that the events which I described a while ago to you, Senator Corbin, and to the other hon. senators, discouraged us from pursuing the discussions in a friendly fashion. We were running out of time. The situation was already serious on September 24. We would have liked to receive the report 15 days earlier. We could have saved two weeks. You can imagine what could have been achieved since September 25 if we had not lost nearly five weeks. All that contributed to the present situation.

I think you will agree, Senator Corbin, that before making a final decision on the co-operative's request and all those submitted by other witnesses who had asked for changes, the minister had to have the complete list of amendments. In fact, I do not expect that the minister would decide, piecemeal, to allow this or that. I suggest it would have been wise to wait. It is understandable that he would want to have before him all the amendments originating from the committee or from senators of either side. But that was not possible.

[English]

You were quoting what I said before the committee. Yes, I think those co-op people were in friendly territory. We would have liked to have had a reasonable debate and further discussions with them. The co-op movement is very strong in the Maritimes, especially on the Acadian side of New Brunswick. Not only are they involved in the savings sector but also in the manufacturing and service sectors, and so on. That is what I meant. We know what the co-op movement has done for New Brunswick. It was with that situation in mind that I made the comment. However, honourable senators, you will realize that my 25 minutes have not started because I was just answering Senator Corbin. I hope I can carry on uninterrupted.

Senator Lewis: Senator Simard, just before you go on, I would like to draw your attention to one thing. Earlier you spoke of the hearings in St. John's, Newfoundland. You made mention of Mr. John Murphy, who happened to be the Mayor of St. John's. I would just like to make it clear, and I think you will agree, that Mr. Murphy, who happens to be a businessman, was at the committee in his own capacity. He was not there as the Mayor of St. John's.

Senator Murray: What are his politics?

Senator Lewis: I don't know what his politics are. He has been many things as far as that is concerned.

Senator Simard: You are probably right. I take your word for it. I have no problem with that. I have always found it difficult to accept that a person who is holding public office can present himself solely as a private citizen. Whatever he says is repeated and published. It definitely has an effect on his career, on his mandate even though he doesn't have a mandate from city hall to speak on behalf of the citizenry. Surely he doesn't do th is kind of thing lightly. Usually he has to weigh both things. I don't think that the people of St. John's will hold it against him because he went there and might have spoken more as a private person. I think he quoted the sentiments of a large category of taxpayers in St. John's.

If I may be allowed to continue here.

Senator Petten: If I may be permitted one small comment here?

Senator Simard: I would like to give my speech.

Senator Petten: I apologize, but I would just like to say that John Murphy won't have that problem any more because he is not going to run again for mayor. He is a businessman now.

Senator Simard: He bragged for many years, as many people in Atlantic Canada and elsewhere do, that he voted Liberal. It is easy for him to speak as mayor of that city when he was Liberal. I hope you will not hold it against him. He might be considering voting Conservative.

[Translation]

I just read a quote from the the mayor of St. John's. I should like to read now another one, very short, which appeared in the November 6 issue of the Financial Post. It is from another very important person in the Maritimes, namely, Premier McKenna of New Brunswick, who stated—

[English]

"In the big league of world globalization, if you are not part of a team, you will be sitting on the bench."

I guess what Premier McKenna is referring to is the measures, the need for Canada to update, improve its policies, whether you are talking about free trade or GST or whatever. He said this is what Bill C-62 is all about, getting Canada ready to compete internationally with competitors from abroad. That should convince you that there is something in the legislation that you have not seen. Surely you don't want Canada to be "sitting on the bench."

These comments are of a general nature as an opener, but I think it is important to situate the debate here and the amendments to Bill C-62. We know that economists don't always agree. That's fine. Some people say that it is the worst possible time to introduce a goods and services tax. This is what the Liberals opposite say. They keep quoting economists to support their thesis, their opposition to GST. They say it is the worst of times, that we are close to a total recession, that it is going to be inflationary, and all that. We know the GST will be inflationary, one shot, in the first year, but not for three or four per cent but maybe one to one and a quarter per cent. Senators opposite, of course, have quoted the president and spokesmen for the Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses. We know they are the harshest critics of the GST. We know that. That's their ball game. Mrs. Catherine Swift, speaking for that organization, said—and this quote was used by people opposite, "There is never going to be a good time for a new tax, but why pick the worst possible time? You don't introduce it in the middle of a recession."

Another economist, Todd Rutley, chief economist at the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, a chief supporter of the tax says, "The inflationary impact of the GST is less significant when the economy is in a recession than during the period of rapid economic growth." So we have professionals on both sides.

We have not heard senators opposite trying to have a fair debate, balanced debate, so I am using my few minutes here to balance the record.

The manufacturers say that they want the tax because it will treat imported and domestic products equally and remove the existing disadvantage under the federal sales tax. I will come back to that. People made the same comment on the same subject a few years ago in a previous career. I will get to that in a minute.

Senator Olson: Why don't you talk about the amendment?

Senator Simard: You want to isolate yourself. I will show you a wider perspective.

Mr. Rutley says:

> . . . manufacturers are concerned any decision to delay the unpopular tax until the economy improves could prove fatal for the GST. While the GST is expected to make life better for manufacturing companies, it could delay any relief from high interest rates and prolong the recession, some economists believe."

Here is what Lloyd Atkinson, the well-known, respected chief economist at the Bank of Montreal said just recently in his latest appraisal of the system. He pointed out, "The GST is expected to raise the federal tax take by more than $3.5 billion, but most of the extra money will be paid back to low- and middle-income earners through GST credits. At the end of the day, by the second or third quarter, it is going to be basically construed as having been not a big deal."

I would invite Senator MacEachen, who knows this organization, to get together with Mr. Atkinson. After all, Mr. MacEachen is a professional politician and Mr. Atkinson is a professional economist working for a renowned organization, the Bank of Montreal. They both work, I am told, for the same organization. But let's not spend too much time on that.

I am putting this on the record because two weeks is a long time. We will get another crack at it. It will be seen that so far all the amendments of honourable senators opposite have been hand picked. They took the book this week because they knew they could possibly embarrass our friend Chaput-Rolland and a few others from Quebec. Yesterday they were on the oil business. We know why they picked that one. Now they are on the subject of co-ops, and because Simard, Robertson and Finlay MacDonald come from Atlantic Canada, they think they are going to try to embarrass us. And throughout they continue to present themselves as the only defenders of the poor, people on welfare or with low incomes. But here is what the Director of the National Council of Welfare for Ontario, Mr. Ken Battle, said recently: "The main thing that we like about the sales tax, from the point of view of its impact on poor Canadians, is that the government is proposing to substantially increase the credit." We haven't seen that in the Buckwold Report. They were very selective.

Mr. Battle continues, "That is nothing to sneeze at; it is something we have been pushing for some years, and we welcome it. The sales tax credit is going to be increased substantially beyond where it would have reached by 1991 under the old manufacturers' sales tax."

Of course, they would have preferred to have this sales tax indexed, but that will be for another day, and we have already discussed that previously. Then, it goes on, "This is going to be an additional $140 for adults, including single parents, in recognition of the fact that it is harder for them to run a household than a household with two adults. That is a welcome credit" Mr.Battle concludes with. That is pretty good. I am going to skip the other one. I will save that. That is a pearl. I will save that for the next time. We don't want to give all the ammunition tonight.

Senator Stanbury: We haven't heard anything yet.

Senator Simard: Do you want to see it? You are going to have to wait. I talked generally about the need to have the director, the Mayor of St. John, and other people.

Senator Stanbury: What about the Minister of Finance of New Brunswick? What did he say to the committee?

Senator Simard: He said, "Too bad." he said, "He is going to cost his government $20 million." Well, I don't have much sympathy for his government, to start with. What I am more interested in is the people of New Brunswick; and if they are going to be relieved of $20 million dollars, I will support that. If I were you, senator, I wouldn't stick my neck out too far, because I will say that in a couple of months he will have harmonized his tax with the GST; and he had better do it too, because manufacturers in New Brunswick will want to be similar to people in Quebec and in Maine and with the retailers in Madawaska on the borderline. They do not want to be penalized. They do not need further hesitation. The clients do not need more incentive to go and buy in the States or in Quebec. So they will put pressure on these people. It has already started. So do you want to talk about Mr. Mayor any more? I have other things I could say about him, because he is just waiting. I think he is waiting for the December 10 election to be behind him. We will have a good debate, I am sure, next week.

So, here is the time. People say "Let's wait. That is another study." Well, for the record, there have been all kinds of work on these things.

[Translation]

I believe the time has come to get to work, because for the past 50 years governments have been looking into ways to get rid of the manufacturers' sales tax. Enough is enough. In 1940, there was the Rowell-Sirois Commission; in 1956, there was the sales tax committee set up by the then Minister of Finance; in 1966, there was the Royal Commission of Inquiry into the tax system, also known as the Carter Commission; in 1975, those who drafted the Department of Finance's working document on the Federal sales and excise tax recommended to review the tax structure and suggested alternate solutions; in 1977, officials of the Department of Finance, again, and National Revenue Canada were part of a tax force on goods taxation which after consideration of the working paper suggested a TVA at the retail level; in 1983, those who drafted the report of the Federal sales tax review committee, also known as the Goodman committee and Mr. Goodman appeared before our committee and supported the idea of a GST. I will stop in 1983 to return to that topic in a few moments.

[Senator Simard.]

As a matter of fact, I should like to quote at this time what the Minister of Finance First, I would like to quote what the newly appointed Minister of Finance was telling us in 1978. His name was Jean Chrétien.

Senator Corbin: You are living in the past.

Senator Simard: He said:

> Mr. Speaker, members of the Committee, the House has delegated upon you the important responsibility and great challenge of considering the report on consumption tax. I support this referral wholeheartedly. You now have an opportunity to contribute to the improvement of our tax system, which generates more than six billion dollars every year. You will also have the opportunity of promoting public participation to the development of a tax policy, which I suggest is desirable. My understanding of the report is that the burden might be spread quite inequitably and that there might be disparities between the tax imposed on imported and domestic goods for instance, because of the deficiencies of the existing tax structure.

That is what Mr. Chrétien said in 1978. Now, let us see what Mr. MacEachen had to say about the sales tax in a former life, when he tabled his complete expenditure plan before the House of Commons on November 12, 1981:

> "The present manufacturers federal sales tax has a number of structural flaws. These were examined extensively. The most serious consequence of these flaws is that it puts the domestic manufacturers at a disadvantage by comparison to competing importers."

He believed that the effective rate of the federal sales tax on a variety of products manufactured in Canada was approximately twice the rate imposed on similar products that were imported. That is what senator MacEachen said and he advocated setting up a committee a few months later. On November 12, he also said this:

> After a thorough examination of the available options, the government came to the conclusion that imposing the tax at the stage immediately preceeding retail, e.i. on wholesale, is the most direct solution to the flaws of the present system. The necessary legislation will be introduced at the beginning of 1982. In order to give businesses the time to adjust, the new system will not be implemented until July 1, 1982.

It was not a radical reform, but one that he believed could correct the problem by removing the tax on products manufactured in the country. Note that he gave only six months to businesses to prepare for that change.

He formed a committee, and Mr. Lalonde listened to its recommendations. At the time, in May 1983, Mr. Lalonde announced, when he became Minister of Finance, that the committee created to correct certain structural problems resulting from the manufacturers' sales tax had tabled its report.

The committee, and I suppose the government as well, had reached the conclusion that the slight improvement that might be obtained by shifting sales tax to the wholesale level would not justify the resulting upheaval in a system that was already in place.

He therefore recommended a number of measures which I call stopgap measures. They did not dare go any further.

The following year, in February 1984, he announced more stopgap measures. I could read a whole list. My point is that at the time, those people, the same people who are now in the Senate, many of whom used to be in the other place—starting with Senator MacEachen—had identified a number of problems. They wanted to correct them but they held back. They were not the first to do so. I mentioned this because it goes back to 1940.

Before proceeding with the amendments—I know you are anxious to get to the amendments—I would like to point out to this Chamber the many changes that have taken place in the attitude of the present Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada to the GST.

In March 1990, when he was running for the Liberal leadership . . . I think he is worth a few moments of my time since after all, the Liberal senators are working for someone! The real boss is Jean Chrétien. Senator MacEachen is the straw boss.

In other words, Mr. Chrétien is responsible for guiding his caucus and indicating to Canadians what they would do if they won the next election.

In March 1990, when he was running for the leadership, and at this point I would like to mention what was said in the Toronto Star in a news bulletin from Vancouver, which said, quoting Mr. Chrétien:

● (2210)

He said that it would be irresponsible for Liberals to promise to scrap Ottawa's proposed goods and services tax without offering an alternative. He also said that it would be irresponsible at this moment to say that we will cut it without offering any alternatives to it. This is the candidate speaking.

A month after that statement, Mr. Chretien, still a candidate, said:

> It would be irresponsible, however, to say now, a Liberal government would scrap the GST. That is $28 billion. At this point I won't say that I will abolish the GST and I won't say I will keep it.

[Translation]

On October 21, Mr. Chrétien became the leader of the Liberal Party. According to La Presse, quoting a statement made by the Liberal leader in Halifax:

> "I am already setting up a committee within the party that will start looking at other alternatives", said the former Liberal minister after a speech before a Liberal audience in Halifax, Nova Scotia. "We could simply get rid of it."

A few hours after he arrived in Montreal, he said, probably to cover up a number of problems he was having with his Montreal delegates:

[English]

> I am opposed to the GST. I have always been opposed to it and I will oppose it always.

You will see that he did not always oppose it. Anyway, it suited his purpose at the time. I have another quote, but I will keep it for next week. I will now turn to the amendments.

[Translation]

With regard to the co-operative movement, honourable senators, the important point to remember is that when they developed the GST, the government tried to balance two major concerns: first, to make sure that businesses selling identical goods and services be treated equitably. In other words, on the same basis.

Second, to make sure that businesses of a different kind, such as co-operatives, are not put at a disadvantage by comparison with others. I suggest that, generally speaking, the operation was 90 per cent successful.

Businesses, co-ops as well as others, selling the same taxable or non-taxable goods will be treated on the same basis. This basic characteristic results from the reimbursement mechanism of the total tax on the purchases of these businesses selling taxable goods and services.

So, as provided in Bill C-62, the GST does not create any incentive for businesses to modify their structures, including co-ops with their particular and unique structures.

I insist on the word "structure". I shall return to it later. I suggest co-ops will find there solutions to a great many problems which they brought to the attention of the committee and which Senator MacEachen would like to correct through amendments which, unfortunately, would create other problems and other exemptions. I suggest that is not what really matters. What really matters is hopefully to eliminate most of the problems which the co-ops have identified. It would be by changing their way of doing things without modifying their basic structure. But to that later.

I mentioned a reimbursement mechanism. For instance, when a co-op purchases something from another co-op, the GST will apply to this sale, but, generally speaking, the purchasing co-op will be completely reimbursed for the GST it paid. This applies to other non-credit co-ops.

As to the credit co-ops, one of my friends who is involved in the movement told me the other day: these people are as happy as larks. At first, they felt threatened believing that the co-op movement would be put at a disadvantage in comparison with other banking and financial institutions whose services had been tax exempted.

The government has treated co-operatives equitably by exempting all financial transactions affecting them. Consequently, credit co-ops and "caisses populaires" will continue to provide financial services which will be entirely GST exempt.

I think that Senator MacEachen has recognized that the government did the right thing; so, that is that.

Senator MacEachen has told us that there was a problem with the purchase of shares. Apparently, there is a problem.

There is indeed a problem, but I am not sure it is as enormous or expensive as the co-ops have indicated. As I said earlier, I think the co-operative movement could deal with the problem by changing its way of doing things.

I said before that all companies in all sectors should be treated the same, on the same basis. I have not changed my mind.

The parallel drawn by Senator MacEachen a number of times between the purchase of co-op shares and buying a golf club membership is not very convincing. I cannot take that seriously.

I realize he wants to label us by saying that, but I don't mind. I don't have a problem with that.

I think that if every local co-operative decided to identify and isolate amounts paid for shares from membership fees, it could be done.

If you sell a share for $100 but decide to keep your membership in the credit union for that year, the amount will be $5. The shares will be sold for the difference and will be tax exempt, the same as when you buy shares in Canadian Tire, Alcan or any other company.

As you know, all shares in all companies are tax exempt. There is no reason why shares in co-ops should be taxed. That is one solution.

Senator MacEachen said earlier that he wasn't sure about some co-operatives. He told us that was the procedure in his time and that dividends were paid at the end of the year, so-called patronage dividends. That is common knowledge.

Today, more specifically with respect to the GST, clause 233(2) of the Bill will allow co-operatives, when they decide to pay patrongage dividends at the end of the year because they have made a profit . . . they will be able to prepare a form, advise the co-op member and identify the total share of the dividend that may be applied directly to taxable goods purchased during the year.

Credit union members will receive a refund for the GST on that part of the patronage dividend that applies to puchases made in the previous year, and this refers to taxable goods.

Senator MacEachen mentioned $5,000 as an example. At $5,000, if they purchased goods for a total of $3,000, which is then pro-rated, they will receive a refund for 3/5 at 7 per cent. I don't think the amendment to exempt these transactions was accepted.

As for direct charge service fees, Senator MacEachen called, and I am aware of this practice, that some co-operatives charge their members $3 or $5 weekly, whether they purchase anything or not.

For them it is a way to recover a portion of cost overhead by charging fees to persons they consider as members. Since some members are bigger buyers then others, I suppose that as a general policy, co-ops have decided that a minimum amount of purchases was required and a fee charged.

[Senator Simard.]

We must understand why those $3 or $5 a week should be zero-rated before moving any amendment to that effect. I have said earlier that we were talking about the co-ops overhead.

As Senator MacEachen said before, that practice also exists with Loblaws or Sobey's.

When Sobey's passes on its overhead to its customers, they are the ones who foot the bill. Now, when that portion of overhead is included in taxable goods sold by Sobey's, it is also taxable under the GST.

I fail to see why things should be any different with the credit union or caisses populaires. If everybody is to be treated equally . . . and I believe that is what the honourable senators want first and foremost, equal and fair treatment for everyone.

But there is another alternative. The government will not change its policy on that because it is a matter of membership or participation fees. Although I do sympathize with the co-operative movement, I do not see why the government should provide a tax exemption for them and not for other sectors. The alternative is to provide a tax exemption for those who are most likely to muster up some political support for you or for those with whom you have a special affinity. We know that the bill already provides for 22,000 administrative measures, tax exemptions and what hve you. We would not want to add to it, I suppose.

If co-ops ever decide to abolish the $3 or $5 charge spread over all taxable and non taxable items, consumers will pick up the difference as they do at Loblaws.

The third point raised by Senator MacEachen deals with purchases made at the wholesale level.

● (2220)

[English]

It is said that the wholesale branch of a co-op group which buys goods and sells them to the local co-op, because of the nature of the organization, will have one more transaction, one more cycle: to pay the GST and get a reimbursement.

First, as far as I am concerned, the co-op movement has failed to convince me that it will cost $275,000. It has failed to convince me of that. These people are well-equipped, and they can do this operation within their own business.

I am not sad or happy that he did not propose an amendment. He did not. He made the argument and then left it up in the air. Perhaps he feels that he is not on solid ground. Perhaps he feels, as I do, that the cost is not that important.

If we were to accept that amendment, co-operatives would have to have another set of books, and I am sympathetic to that. They would have to open another account to segregate all those goods they buy from the wholesale branch of the co-op group. They would have these taxable goods and all the other taxable purchases made from other sources. That would cost money, too, so I don't believe the government should make an exception for that. That would just be creating another exemption.

For all these reasons, let me say that the amendment dealing with the zero-rating of the share cost is not acceptable. It is not needed. The co-op movement, by changing the way in which it allows its members to invest in capital, can be accommodated in another way, for example, by changing the way it has been doing it for the last 25 years.

With regard to the $3 and $5 direct charges, I believe that also can be accommodated by a change within the organization. However, I have not checked lately the importance of the preferable tax treatment which the co-op movement has enjoyed over the years. There is still some special treatment given to the co-op movement. I am not criticizing it. Maybe they should have more. But it is not true that the GST legislation should be amended.

If there is some minor additional cost because of the GST, double counting or whatever, I think that is more than compensated by the measures in the Income Tax Act, and so on. That is something we should look at another day.

● (2230)

I am inviting my colleagues to say no to these amendments and to please get on with approving this legislation.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would Senator Simard allow me to ask a question?

Senator Simard: Yes, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: I really enjoyed Senator Simard's outstanding speech which dealt with a number of points. I was very glad indeed because I hope that on future occasions it will enable us to speak to issues wider than the particular matter we are now considering.

To get back to the subject under study, the specific amendment, do I understand correctly that Senator Simard agrees that co-operatives ought not to be treated the same way as corporations are?

Senator Simard: No, Senator Molgat. My whole argument was based on the need to treat everybody equally and equitably even if the structures are different. I would suggest that both sides of the chamber endorse that principle.

If the bill before us . . . given the procedures, the past policies, the distribution and sale of shares by co-operatives or the way they recoup the overhead through the direct fees to which Senator MacEachen referred and which are the subject of the amendment, if that creates a problem I would urge the management of co-operatives to change the way they operate. This is where I relate to your question, just so the customers of Loblaws are treated the same way as the customers of co-operatives. In the final analysis, the overhead of co-operatives must be paid by their clients, much the same way as Sobey's or Loblaws customers do. If the overhead is spread out over the whole range of taxable and non-taxable products, people buying taxable goods will pay the GST, while others who buy food or incur expenses for medical care will not. This is how people would be taxed equitably and on the same basis, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: So, Senator Simard, you are not in favour of the propositions made by the co-operatives of your region in particular. These propositions did come from the Atlantic region. Their requests were categorical, yet you say they are mistaken.Is that what you are saying?

Senator Simard: I said that their problems can be solved in a way other than by adopting the amendments they proposed.

Senator Molgat: You tell that to the co-operatives, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I will indeed, Senator Molgat. They know I speak my mind and I see no problem there.

[English]

Senator Graham: May I ask Senator Simard a question? In answer to a question from Senator Corbin following completion of my remarks, I mentioned that I left the hearings in Halifax with what I thought was a good feeling after the submission made by the representatives of Co-Op Atlantic. I honestly felt that our representatives on the Conservative side were indeed going to make representations to the government in order to accommodate the representations that had been made. I wonder what happened between July 12 and today; or, July 12 and August 31; or, July 12 and September 30; or, July 12 and the time the report was concluded. Did members on your side make any representation to the Minister of Finance? If so, what were those representations?

Senator Simard: I have answered that and I will try to answer it again. I said that as early as August, upon our return, some of us started drawing up a list of possible areas of concern. We relayed those concerns to the minister verbally or through third parties. Do not ask me for a compilation of this list. Even if it existed, I consider it to be caucus material and you are not going to get it.

However, true to our word, we did make a list and we were hoping to pursue it further. We got the preliminary report dated August 14 from the Clerk, I suppose with the benediction of Senator Buckwold, and the next one we received on September 24. But your chairman played politics. He allowed the staff to send us a second report, possibly at the end of August, with a more final indication to come early in September, as we had been promised.

With good spirit, and all that, we would have pursued these things. With the final report from Senator Buckwold we would at least have had some idea as to the magnitude of what was involved, so that we could have made plans to meet with Mr. Wilson. But after August 14, that was it. We were informed that we would not get anything more. We were inclined to this in working together with members on the other side.

But the spirit changed completely in early September. Senator Buckwold decided that he was going to report to Senator MacEachen or Senator Kirby, and that was it. Never mind Senator Poitras. It then became evident that we were running out of time. The Liberal Party made its own bed on September 24. After that, that was it.

This is what changed. We have been here while you people have been filibustering since September 25. So we are definitely out of time. You have scored in your own net. You are not going to make Canadians believe that you are serious today. You are not going to make Canadians believe that you were serious on Monday when you introduced the amendment dealing with books. You are too late. You have wasted time. You have cost taxpayers money. You have reduced the time we would normally have for the bill to go back to the House and return. You scored in your own net.

We used to have a liberal leader in New Brunswick whom we called "Wrong-way Joe." He thought he was going that way, and he was going this way, with the result that he was scoring in his own net. You remember "Wrong-way Joe"? You did that. You deprived yourself, and you have deprived us, of the time needed to consult with Michael Wilson and the Prime Minister and consider some possible amendments. You said "No; axe the tax." We will tell people you have scored in your own net. It is too late; get on with the business of the house.

Senator Graham: Senator Simard, we are talking about July 12. That is when these concerns were raised.

• (2240)

I answered that I don't want to belabour the point, I want to go home sometime. I expect most of you want to go home tonight.

Do you really expect the Minister of Finance to make a piecemeal decision every time one of his caucus members comes with a possible amendment, or what have you? We had a first answer on July 8th, because somebody had raised the point in Halifax, and another answer on July 9th, another on August 1st, another on August 15th. That is not the way to run a country, I would hope. We never got the whole list, because you failed to do your work. You only had one question throughout. You were there, Finlay, you were there, senator, for many meetings. There was only one question that came back all the time.

Senator Stewart: Kill the GST.

Senator Simard: The question was, "Here we are, we are going to cost the Canadians a million dollars, but you tell us what you want to do." I think that was a leading question.

The next most famous was Senator Olsen here. You were not far behind too. Senator Stewart, for the few times he was there, raised, "Well witness, what do you think we should do? Do you think we should kill the tax?" So the question came, "to kill or not to kill?" You were not interested in amendments.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Senator Simard, on a point of privilege—

Senator Simard: You are not interested in amendments tonight, Or the amendment on July 8th or the following days.

Senator Stewart: On a question of privilege. Senator Simard just referred to my attendance at the meetings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. Let me say, honourable senators, that I hope that some of the things that he said here this evening are truer than what he just said now about my attendance at that committee.

Senator Simard: You were not there?

Senator Stewart: Exactly. I did not attend one meeting of that committee.

Senator Simard: Your ghost was there. While we travelled your province your ghost was there throughout.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I rest my case.

Senator Graham: Senator Simard, you have made an admission that startles me, and that is that all of the weight on that committee from that side of the house, could not have any kind of influence on the Minister of Finance. You should have stayed home.

Senator Barootes: Did the chairman try to communicate with the department on this?

An Hon. Senator: No, sir. He did what he wanted to, but not on this.

Senator Davey: He worked for the Senate, not the department.

Senator Simard: I apologize, Senator Stewart, I thought you were there. That person looked very much like you.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Richard Stanbury: Honourable Senators, I am confident that no one will be surprised if I say that I speak in favour of the amendment put by Senator MacEachen.

I am confident that no one will be surprised if I say that Senator Simard did not manage to convince me of very much, except that the reason that the other side is not willing to take amendments now is because they are mad about something that they think happened to them in connection with the committee. If pique is the excuse that is going to be given to the Canadian people, I am not sure if it is going to wash very well.

Having had conversations with the co-operative people—and I mean the people from the co-operatives—that may be different from "Cooperative people"—but the people from the co-operatives today and yesterday, I really look forward to getting the Hansard report of Senator Simard's speech because they are going to eat it up. It is going to be wonderful.

Honourable senators, my feeling is that if the government isn't willing to withdraw this terrible bill, then at least it should make the necessary changes to make it at least a more sensible and just law.

One area where an amendment is clearly in order is in the field of co-operatives. Senator Simard has even said he agrees, but that the government should not have to change, it should be the co-operatives that change. The co-operatives have had a major beneficial impact on commercial and social activity in Canada over the years. They are an essential element of Canadian society. Not only will this new tax make life harder for the members of co-ops and their administrators by raising their costs, but co-ops themselves will be denied the same sort of beneficial tax breaks, that their competitors will receive. That should not be permitted to happen. I can't imagine why people on that side of the house are going to allow it to happen.

As many of you know, if you have any experience with co-op societies at all, a co-op is a business, voluntarily owned and controlled by its member patrons, operated for them and by them on a non-profit or cost basis. Co-ops are owned by the people who use them. They are organized and incorporated to engage in economic activities. They have ideals of democracy, social consciousness, and human relations. I realize that none of those characteristics is particularly well known to the Tory party. Otherwise there would be no necessity for this particular current debate.

A co-operative provides services and benefits for its members in proportion to the use they make of the organization, rather than earning profits for the shareholders of the commercial corporation as an investor. While some members opposite may therefore think of co-ops as anathema to their conservative philosophy, they should remember that co-ops are part of our free enterprise system and our competitive system, and are not welfare agencies or charitable societies.

To meet their expenses, co-ops depend upon income earned from rendering services rather than on donations or government hand-outs.

The primary objective of co-ops is to meet their members' needs in an economical and efficient manner, unlike investor-oriented businesses whose main concern is the bottom line—to generate profits and capital gains for their shareholders.

Today the co-operative movement consists of organizations with significant influence in agriculture, finance, insurance, oil refining, fishing, retail and housing industries. The grain and dairy marketing co-operatives dominate their industries. The retail co-operatives play significant roles on the prairies, where it is probably the largest industry, and in Atlantic Canada. They are particularly strong in the regions where equalization payments are needed. To apply the GST to disable co-ops is a disservice to the people who need co-ops most.

In 1988 the total assets of Canadian co-ops was reported to be $68 billion with total membership of approximately 14 million people. Co-operatives are worthwhile organizations that deserve a fair deal, but they are another people-oriented organization, which this government loves to kick around. Co-operatives share a number of principles that set them apart from other organizations as adopted by the International Co-operative Alliance in 1966. Their six basic principles are, 1) Open and voluntary membership, 2) Democratic control, 3) Limited return on shares, 4) Return of surplus to members, 5) Co-operative education, and 6) Co-operation among co-operatives. While not all co-ops subscribe to each of these principles, most Canadian co-ops do.

For a history of co-ops, I refer you to a very good publication, A Co-operative Development Strategy for Canada, which was the report of the National Task Force on Co-operative Development in May of 1984 set up by the Government of Canada. I would also refer you to Co-operatives, Principles and Practices by Marvin A. Shaars, and that was a project of the Co-operative Extension Programs of the University of Wisconsin. The co-operative principles first enunciated in England during the 1840s had an impact in British North America when immigrant British labourers attempted, by the mid part of the last century, to start stores similar to those which were common in Britain. These were early attempts at co-operative marketing organizations. Since then, co-operative principles have been applied in many experiments in an ever-growing number of industries. Although many efforts soon collapsed as a result of depression, recession, poor management or membership indifference, others grew.

Farmers were the first Canadian group which successfully developed co-operatives. Between 1860 and 1900 farmers in Ontario, Quebec and Atlantic Canada developed over 1200 co-operative creameries and cheese factories to meet the needs of the rapidly growing dairy industry.

Mutual insurance companies were then organized to provide inexpensive protection against the ravages of fire, hail and early frost.

During World War I, co-operative organizations flourished as more farmers became concerned about marketing, as consumers sought cheaper food in an inflationary period, and as hard-pressed Canadians explored alternative means to save and borrow money. While many co-operatives folded during the depression, others found it to be a period of increased interest and new strength.

During the 1940s, the war and post-war prosperity allowed the movement to gain more power and influence. Since then, they have grown in every region of the country.

Despite these successes, however, co-operatives have faced many problems since the mid-1980s. Their strengths lie largely in rural areas where declining populations will ultimately result in reduced total support. The sad plight of our farmer and our "Made-in-Canada" recession only exacerbate their problems.

There has also been lately a decrease in the number of larger co-operative organizations. This may not be such a bad thing since it is difficult to maintain a sense of ownership in a large corporation and the degree of commitment normally found among the smaller operations. The fact that they form a multiplicity of smaller organizations now makes it even more important not to discriminate against them.

The Standing Senate Committee on Baking, Trade and Commerce heard from three major co-operative groups: The Canadian Co-operative Association, Co-op Atlantic and The Federated Co-operatives Limited. None of these groups is a small-time organization with a fly-by-night operation. All are umbrella groups for many co-op organizations. They raised a number of significant and alarming issues in their submissions and testimony before the Standing Senate Committee on Baking, Trade and Commerce. Those issues deserve our attention. The most important among them can easily be cured by the Senate accepting this proposed amendment.

The Co-op Atlantic is a sixty-three year old co-operative which is owned by 175 co-operatives throughout Atlantic Canada and the Magdalen Islands. The 175 co-ops are themselves owned by 160 thousand families in Atlantic Canada. That huge number of families comprised half a million individuals, a substantial proportion of the 14 million co-op members across Canada.

Co-op Atlantic is reportedly the seventh largest enterprise in Atlantic Canada owned by Atlantic Canadians. Over the years Atlantic Canada has been one of the more depressed regions of the country for whom economic stimulation is of vital importance. During the past six years the record of the Tory government in this field has been dismal and the current recession will obviously make matters worse. The Co-op Atlantic is therefore a boon to many Atlantic Canadians. It allows them to lower the cost of living, while, at the same time, employing thousands of Canadians in a high unemployment area.

The Canadian Co-operative Association represents 35 central, regional and national co-operatives across Canada. These co-operatives currently have a reported 14 million members, eighty-six billion dollars in assets and employ 70 thousand people across the country. Now, that 14 million is three-fifths of the population of Canada. The top five co-ops in the country had sales in 1989 in excess of seven billion dollars.

The Federated Co-operatives Limited is owned by 329 independent retail co-ops which form what is known as the co-operative retailing system in Western Canada. These retail co-ops operate branches providing services to more than 500 communities from Manitoba to British Columbia. Retail co-ops are owned by the people they serve, an estimated 750 thousand people, with total sales in 1988 of more than two billion dollars.

In their submissions and testimony before the committee, the three co-operative groups identified a number of significant problems with the proposed GST which must be addressed. The three of them included—and these have already been indicated—

(1) The taxation of fees called "direct charge" which co-ops must levy on their members to recover a portion of their overhead costs,

(2) the taxation of shared capital, and

(3) the additional accounting step, and therefore administrative cost, required for co-ops because of their structure, which their competitor supermarket chains will not be subjected to.

Concerning the first problem, direct charges are the fees that co-op members have to pay in order to pay for the overhead of their co-ops. Direct charge co-ops sell goods to their members at cost and must therefore charge a weekly or a monthly service fee in order to remain in operation.

The direct charge co-op is the fastest growing form of retail co-op in the Atlantic region. The fee is charged instead of a higher price markup under the proposed GST. This direct charge would be subject to tax.

Normal supermarkets recover their operating costs through the price markup. Under the GST, the total price of most goods will be taxed, but some items such as food and prescription drugs will not be. Neither will be the hidden overhead markup component of the final retail price. In other words, normal grocery stores will not have their prices of basic foods go up by this new tax. But the co-op members will find that the direct charge will increase their costs because of the GST, simply because the taxes are not allocated and included in the price of each individual item.

Some co-ops have reported direct charge fees of about seven million dollars, so the increased tax will be significant.

The witnesses before the committee testified that the co-op members will have to pay out an estimated $275,000 more in the first year of the GST. That will be neither fair nor equitable. It will even defeat the purpose of having co-ops in the first place. It will make co-ops less competitive and less attractive to their members. That is where Senator Simard's solution of asking the co-ops to change their way of doing business makes no sense at all. It means that co-ops will become useless.

The manner in which a business is structured should have no bearing on the GST. Common sense would dictate that the service fee charged should be taxable only to the extent of the ratio of the co-op's taxable sales to its total sales. This part of the GST legislation needs to be amended, and I hope it will be.

The next way in which the GST would tilt the playing field against co-ops and in favour of corporations, with whom they must compete, is in the area of taxation of share capital. Each co-operative is owned by its members who have share capital in their co-op. For GST purposes, these investments will be regarded in the same manner as a membership fee at a golf club, as stated by Co-op Atlantic, and will be taxed. On the other hand, shares in profit-oriented corporations will not be taxed. However, the money invested in share capital in a co-operative serves the same financial function as money invested in competing companies. It is interesting to note that financial services are exempt from the GST, yet financial services are defined as including the issue, allotment or repayment of a financial instrument. A financial instrument is then defined as, among other things, equity security. The ironic part is that, as the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee report on the GST showed, co-operative shares have consistently been regarded as equity.

First, for income tax purposes, co-operative capital is treated like any other corporate capital. Second, in accounting practice, co-operative capital is indistinguishable from the capital of other businesses in the equity section of a balance sheet. Third, a statute of Canada, the Canada Co-operative Associations Act, defines a co-op share as a financial instrument. Therefore, from an accounting and income tax perspective, along with the special legislation dealing with co-operatives, co-op shares are an equity security.

What are some of the practical results if there is no amendment? Let us use the example of a housing co-op. Housing is supposedly preferentially treated under GST, although I have had many representations from house builders to the contrary. You cannot be a member of a housing co-op without buying shares in the co-op. Of course you have to pay 7 per cent on the value of the shares, but not if you buy shares in a commercial company.

Suppose the employees of a company that is going out of business—and there are a lot of those these days—form a workers' co-op to buy the business. Each worker would have to pay 7 per cent on the shares he buys to participate in the co-operative.

I have one last example. Suppose a co-op, which is non-profit, wishes to distribute its patronage surplus without destroying its cash reserves. It therefore distributes that surplus in the form of equity shares. The receiver of those shares, being a member of a co-op, has to pay 7 per cent goods and services tax on the value of those shares. Why should co-ops be treated differently from credit unions, which are exempt?

I agree with the Canadian Co-operative Association when it says it would be inequitable to tax equity investments in this sector while exempting investments in competing corporations and similar industries. The GST bill should be amended to add co-operatives to the exclusion already given to credit unions.

Another way in which the tax is tilted against the co-operatives concerns the administrative burden. Consider the example of Co-op Atlantic. The tax will have to be paid by Co-op Atlantic on all the products it buys, at which time it can claim a rebate, with the exception of food items which are zero-rated. Then Co-op Atlantic will distribute those products to the local co-ops, which own Co-op Atlantic, and they will have to pay the GST. Those local co-ops will then claim a rebate and sell those products to their members, who will pay the GST. Co-op Atlantic and the local co-ops will have to bear a heavy burden of administration, while the competitors of Co-op Atlantic will bear only half the burden of that administration. Other large chains will pay the tax, claim the rebate, and that will be the end of it. Local franchisees will not have to pay and, hence, will not have to claim the rebate. So the administration cost will be only half of what is required of co-ops. There is a doubling of administrative costs to co-ops because the GST will have to be collected twice.

Then there is a sillier example. Co-op Atlantic also provides business goods and services to local co-ops, which are its owners, just as Loblaws provides business goods and services to its retail outlets. Co-op Atlantic will have to charge local co-ops the 7 per cent GST. The local co-ops will then be able to claim a rebate. In both cases the government will have to incur an administrative cost, yet it is not earning any revenue.

As Co-op Atlantic pointed out, it is an investment in nothing with no return. The system will burden the taxpayers and the co-ops, yet see nothing in return.

As I have demonstrated, the impact of the GST on co-ops will be severe and harmful. Increased costs and a less competitive position will undoubtably have a negative effect on Canadian co-ops at a time when Canadians need them the most. Although the GST, in its entirety, should be scrapped, the government would be doing Canadians a great service by adopting Senator MacEachen's proposed amendment. The GST legislation should provide that memberships in co-ops would be treated the same as memberships in a credit union.

Having read the evidence of the parties that would be affected by the GST and having spoken to a number of them recently, I can only conclude that this amendment is a common sense approach to removing one of the inequities that infect this legislation at the present time. I urge members opposite to vote for this amendment. It will simply remove some of the inequities being imposed on the co-ops by Bill C-62. The government should be trying to promote co-operatives instead of sowing the seeds of their destruction. They serve three-fifths of the population and are one of the mainstays of our society.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator H. A. Olson: Honourable Senators, Senator Stanbury's speech provided a clear explanation of the problems, and, as a result, I have shortened my speech considerably. At the outset, I want to decare that I am a member of several co-operatives. But one point has not been covered in the debate so far. By way of background, Calgary probably has the largest consumer co-operative in Canada. Last year it did nearly $800 million of business, and I think it is fair to say that the Calgary Consumer Co-operative commands a larger share of the grocery market in that city than any co-operative in any other city in Canada. It is an enormous organization. It is well run and is supported by thousands of people because of the way it is run.

● (2310)

I simply cannot believe that the government understands what it is doing. I cannot believe that it would run up against the problems which it will have with the co-operatives and the public relations capability of those co-operatives if it understood what it was doing.

Senator Stanbury has just explained very well what happens with the method that co-operatives have used to accumulate their share capital. It is charged on co-operatives, but it is not charged on other private corporations. First of all, that is not fair, but that is the way this bill is designed.

Every year these co-operatives declare a patronage dividend, whatever it happens to be. Then, almost every year, they pay a portion of it in cash—sometimes a very small portion, 20 per cent—and the rest of it is transferred to capital as accumulated savings, which is the same as the share capital of a private corporation. Of course, the money that goes into the share capital of a private corporation is not taxed. But the co-ops will be taxed.

[Senator Stanbury.]

I will tell you what is going to happen. They will comply with the law, but they have a very large and very effective public relations organization. They will send a letter along with every member's patronage dividend every year telling them what the government has done to them and explaining the injustice that is involved. As Senator Stanbury pointed out, there are 14 million co-operative members. That overlaps somewhat because some people belong to more than one co-operative. I understand that, and so do they.

I caution the government that what it is doing is, first of all, not fair. Second, it is going to turn on a very effective public relations organization in those co-operatives which will do a great deal of damage to the federal government and its activities. Canadians do not like laws that are manifestly unfair. That is what will happen in this case.

In conclusion, you should at least go to the trouble of finding out what you are doing. I really don't believe you know or understand what is going to happen with this provision in Bill C-62 which deals with co-operatives, particularly with regard to their share capital. As you know, share capital in corporations is tax-exempt. Membership in co-operative corporations performs the same function. They represent the share capital of those corporations.

You have an opportunity to correct that. This amendment provides that the GST does not discriminate among corporations according to the way in which they raise their share capital. That is all it does.

At least take the time and make the effort, before we vote on this tomorrow, to understand what the consequence of defeating this amendment will be. I am sure, honourable senators opposite, that if you really understood what is going to happen, you would not support the government in bringing out a bill like this. You would ask the government to change it, because it is unfair and it is attacking a structure which has been very important to the development of many parts of Canada. I know that Senator Molgat will agree with me that it has been especially important to the prairie provinces.

Senator Molgat: That's right.

Senator Olson: We have heard a lot about the Atlantic Co-operative, and I know that it is important there, too. They were the first ones to advise the committee that this iniquitous provision was in Bill C-62. I heard it explained in great detail in Halifax on July 12.

I cannot understand why you have not carried that message to the Minister of Finance. I hope Senator Simard is not speaking as the spokesman for the Conservative Party. But he is the only one who said anything, so we have to assume that he is speaking for the Conservative Party. He said the problem is that the Liberals did not prepare the amendments or a submission to the Minister of Finance. Do senators opposite have a piano tied to their legs, or something? Can they not do their own amendments?

You were there. You gathered all the evidence. A couple of times the vice-chairman of the committee, Senator Poitras, asked for the briefs. We brought him boxes and boxes of briefs. What did he do with them? What did he want them for if he was not going to read them and prepare some amendments? I believe Senator Graham asked him what they did after they made that promise in Halifax. It is clear they did nothing.

Senator Murray: He had no opportunity to influence the committee's report.

Senator Olson: Isn't that awful! They promised right there in Halifax that they understood that this was an injustice and that they were going to communicate that to the Minister of Finance and have it corrected.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Olson, perhaps I could add a comment.

You were at the meeting in Halifax, and you questioned other witnesses; you did not question those particular witnesses. Is it not a fact, Senator Olson, that there were several people surrounding the PC senators at that meeting? They were people from Senator Murray's staff. They were hired university students. They had a press person there, and other people. They were on the phone all the time to Ottawa. Every time we said something, they were on the phone to someone in Ottawa. Was it to the Minister of Finance or National Revenue?

Could you imagine that the Department of Finance, Senator Murray or the Minister of National Revenue did not get an hourly report of everything that happened in that committee? Could you imagine that that did not happen, and that the excuses they present tonight are just lame excuses?

Senator Olson: I don't know what they have done. That is why I find it so hard to believe that they have not done anything about it. In Halifax—and Senator Simard will remember this—I looked around and there were six people who were running with messages.

Senator Simard: You called them flacks.

Senator Olson: No, I called them flunkies, and I believe the chairman called them gremlins. They were running with messages all the time, but only to the Conservative members of the committee. They never came and offered me any advice. They were phoning to Ottawa. As a matter of fact, I believe there were one or two people there from the office of the Minister of Finance.

Now here we are. They promised they were going to do something about this injustice, this inequity, or whatever you want to call it, in respect of the proposed law with regard to co-operatives. They promised. I heard them myself. They said: We have to fix that. What did they do?

It was spelled out in great detail exactly what was needed to be done. I do not know, Senator Corbin, what they did. It is obvious that they never got the message back here—or was there some kind of blockage here? I don't know.

I am quickly coming to the conclusion that the government does not listen to their so-called supporters. That is sad. I always thought that if you could be on the government side and in its caucus you could have a chance to influence the government. These people have been at it since July 12. I believe Senator MacDonald was in Halifax too.

• (2320)

I also thought it was amazing that Senator Simard went through a 35 or 40 minute speech and never once touched on the subject matter of the amendment before the House. I asked him two or three times if he was going to talk about the amendment.

Senator Simard: You had left.

Senator Olson: Be serious.

An. Hon. Senator: Three minutes at the end.

Senator Olson: Let's find out what you are going to do, if you are going to do anything. Or are we going to get the same old excuse that we have to pass it the way it is first but we have promises that they are going to fix it up afterwards. Is that what is going to happen again? I do not know if Senator Murray wants to tell us or not, but surely you do not think you can live with this part of Bill C-62 for very long? I have been up against the public relations efforts of co-operatives across Canada and if you think they do not have some political impact, you just do not live in the real world.

Senator Stanbury: They have 14 million members.

Senator Olson: Yes, 14 million people and they all know what they have to do to put pressure on politicians and government.

Senator Barootes: Is it 14 million people or 14 million memberships, some of which have eight, ten, twelve memberships?

Senator Olson: However many they have, I will tell you that in Saskatchewan, Senator Barootes, when the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool turned on their public relations campaign against the government down there it was usually defeated. That is exactly what is happening now, so you had better have some respect for what you are up against.

I have an idea that if the co-operative in Atlantic Canada does what it is capable of in the public relations field, you are going to have the same thing happen in every province that happened in New Brunswick the last time. Surely that is not the way governments should act. I am pleading with you, more out of kindness than severe criticism. I just do not believe you know what you are up to. For goodness sake, inform yourself. You should ask the co-operatives in Quebec what this kind of legislation is going to do to their competitive position with respect to private corporations who have to accumulate capital. Then you must act responsibly.

As I said, I don't think you know or understand. I do not think you have done the research to understand what this is going to do to the co-operative movement and what they are going to do to try to defend themselves against it. You still have time. We are not going to vote on this until tomorrow at 5:45 p.m. You can at least partially overcome the difficulty with Bill C-62 if you support this amendment, so I recommend that to you.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am not accustomed to making long addresses at this hour of the night, but by reason of the experience we have had during the last few weeks we should be prepared for a good effort this evening. I had hoped to get on earlier but obviously Senator Simard was still—-

Senator Simard: Since you are on your feet, I recall now vividly that it was on the Bill C-21 expedition that you and I travelled extensively to the Maritimes. I apologize. I had several repetitions of the same question by Senator Hastings on my mind. So I am sorry if I mistook you for Senator Hastings. I really think, though, your ghost was there.

I know Senator Stewart is very interested in the co-op movement, as he is in representing his area. Maybe he will tell us what reason kept him away from these sittings now that he has told us he was not there.

Senator Hébert: Since your memory is coming back to you, Senator Simard, do you remember exactly the terms of the promise that you made to these poor people over there when you said to them that you would take care that an amendment would be brough in? It is not on this subject.

Senator Simard: Don't paraphrase, just get the right quotation. I answered that question earlier.

Senator Stewart: It seems to me that Senator Simard had the same problem with regard to Bill C-21 as he has now with regard to Bill C-62. I remember very well the way the faces of the people lit up in Canso when he made his commitment regarding Bill C-21. However, that is an episode which is behind us, I hope.

During the debates on amendments this week, again and again the question of the role of the Senate with regard to legislation has come up. It came up this evening in exchanges that Senator Graham had. Senator Molson raised it this evening as he did yesterday. I want to say a few things about this, because the question of the proper role for the Senate in legislation is on all our minds.

There are those who see no use whatsoever for the Senate in the legislative process. They are abolitionists. They contend that the Senate really has no legitimate part to play in Parliament as a legislative body.

They reach that conclusion by a three-step thought process. The first step is the assertion that a Senate active in legislation is inconsistent with responsible government. That argument was made before Confederation. It was made in 1865 in the Confederation debates. It has been made again and again and yet again since 1867. Prime Minister Brian Mulroney constantly makes it.

The argument is that the executive government is responsible to the House of Commons, and that the House of Commons, in turn, is responsible to the people. A second house, whether appointive or elective, is unnecessary. It has no proper role to play in the legislative process. That argument failed in 1865 and 1867. Confederation would have been impossible on the basis of a single responsible government. I remember Senator Roblin making that point in a notable speech which he gave to this house in 1987.

Let me quote a former member of the Senate of Canada on this very point. I am quoting Senator Arthur Meighen from a paper which resulted from a speech he delivered in 1937:

> "Our Maritime Provinces declined to enter Confederation if the control of Canada's parliament was to be wholly in the hands of a majority, because under those circumstances they felt their views would be swept out of effect by the larger populations in our mid-continent areas. Lower Canada also insisted on the territorial principle, and that principle is still the basis of the Senate's composition. From this it is clear that there devolves upon the Upper House a duty of having special and peculiar regard to minority and sectional rights in Canada, to see that the majority exercises its full force in the representative chamber where population control is not permitted to ride over the proper rights and privileges of minorities.
> Or—to put the point in another way, the Senate has the particular duty of standing guard over the Constitution as it applies to all sections of Canada, of making certain that provincial rights are maintained inviolate, that the relationship which the British North America Act established between the provinces on the one hand and the Dominion on the other hand is respected, whatever may be for the time being the arbitrary action of a bare majority."

That is from page 153-154 of the Queen's Quarterly, 1937.

A few lines further down in his article, Senator Meighen said this:

> The Senate is not a representative chamber; its personnel does not spring directly from the spoken word of the people; yet it is as much a chamber of the people as is the House of Commons. Its members do not come from any special class or caste, as in some lands; they come from the ranks of the people; they have popular sympathies and popular interests at heart. The Senate was constituted by the people through the Fathers of Confederation, and ratified by the vote of the country, because in the belief not just of a few but of this whole Dominion it was in their interests that there should be a review of Commons legislation, with special protection of minority, sectional, and territorial rights. Of all these delegated duties the Senate is the trustee; most of them it shares with the Commons and has responsibility just as direct as has that House, and it should make it a duty hour by hour to live up to the full standards which were doubtless in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation and which today are as vital to Canada as they were at that time."

Then Senator Meighen says this:

> There are those who say: You should be very chary about reversing the will of the elective chamber; in fact, if you do so more than once or twice, you should prepare for your demise. You are not elected and, therefore, you have not the same rank and status as those who are elected.

Senator Meighen proceeds to rebut that position and comes to the following conclusion:

> If those considerations are to be in the mind of members of the Senate, they never can discharge properly the functions which are theirs, nor can the Senate in these circumstances be more than a mere replica of the Commons, and its performance will become a wasteful repetition of the debates and controversies which take place in the other chamber.

He undertakes to talk about the situations in which it is proper for the Senate to alter, and indeed to reverse, the policies set forth in bills from the House of Commons.

"Here would be my answer", says Senator Meighen:

> Where there is a mandate for legislation which comes before the Senate; where such legislation was clearly discussed and placed on the platform of the successful party in an election, then only in most exceptional circumstances should there be any attempt or desire on the part of the Upper House to refuse to implement a mandate by its concurring imprimatur. No one, however, who has thought the subject out, can say that under no circumstances should legislation coming to the Senate from the Commons, though clearly supported by a popular mandate in an election, fail support in the Second Chamber. It has been plainly and tersely enunciated by Sir John MacDonald, by George Brown and by Maritime statesmen, as well as by Taché of Quebec, that one of the Senate's duty, or one of its duties, is to see that wise legislation, having for its purpose nothing but the public good, is allowed, irrespective of mandate, to become law, but in certain conceivable events to see to it as well that the public of Canada, which may at one election have endorsed extraordinary proposals, has opportunity, if such proposals are of a particularly dangerous or revolutionary character, to think the subject over again; in a word, that the Senate may, under certain circumstances, be allowed to appeal from the electorate of yesterday to the electorate of tomorrow.

He then talks about bills where there is no clear mandate. What he has said in the passage that I have just now read is that sometimes even when there is a mandate, it is the duty of the Senate to refuse to co-operate. Then he turns to the situation where there is no mandate. This is what he says:

> The great mass of legislation has, however, no relation to any special dictum of the people in an electoral contest at all. The great mass of legislation springs from circumstances of the hour. Something has to be done, in the judgement of the administration, and the administration works out its solution in such manner as it deems fit, and submits that solution to Parliament. There is no question of a mandate at all in the case of at least ninety-eight per cent of the measures which come to either House.
> In such a situation the Senate does what it thinks best without any thought of the government having a mandate for that particular measure.

What do our abolitionists say at this point? "Nice theory! Nice rhetoric!" That is what they say.

The truth of the matter, argue the abolitionists, is that rarely, if ever, have senators consistently represented the interests of the people in their provinces. The reason that they haven't done so is obvious. They have no genuine motivation to represent them. They become lazy. They join the club patronage, and then they doze off.

Senator Frith: Then they what?

Senator Stewart: Doze off. I don't mean tonight.

"Regardless of the rhetoric," says the abolitionist, "the Senate is useless. The Senate never does anything worthwhile."

The defenders of the Senate have a reply. They say; "But that is not true, it is not true that the Senate is always inactive. Think of those great years after 1896, when the Conservative senators were giving the Laurier government a hard time. Think of the great years after 1911 when the Liberal senators were giving the Borden Conservatives a hard time. Think of the years after 1925 when the Senate was giving Mr. King's government a hard time. Think of what happened after 1935. Think even of what happened in the period of the Diefenbaker government." "Ah", replies our abolitionist, "that brings me to my third point. What you have said is that the Senate comes to life only when motivated by partisanship. Having no independent motivation to do anything, most senators run with their own herd. True, sometimes some of them rise in their places to reveal deep and earnest concerns about government bills, but then, making a virtue of faith and obedience, they announce that they are prepared to follow the leader."

The opposition plays the same game. "You quoted Arthur Meighen," says the abolitionist; "now it is my turn." And what did he say in that very same speech?

The Senate is worthless if it becomes merely another Commons, divided upon party lines and indulging in party debates such as are familiar in the Lower Chamber, session after session. If the Senate ever permits itself to fulfil that function, and that alone, in the scheme of Confederation, then the sooner it is abolished the better." "Once it becomes partisan," says Arthur Meighen, "the sooner it is abolished the better. This practice is not to be deprecated in the House of Commons. If we are going to have a democracy, the practice must continue. There has to be parties and party manoeuvres. There have to be conflicts and controversies inumerable in variety and wearisome in length."

● (2340)

> The great scheme of bringing sections together, letting each see the viewpoint of the other, has to be worked out in the representative chamber. Sometimes, we are too impatient and critical of governments in allowing what seems an inordinate time for the discussion of public business. That discussion is good, but it is not the function of the Senate. Members of the second chamber must get away, lift their minds far from these hard-drawn lines of party or they cannot serve the country.

The Senate has a more prosaic task. Its duty is to see that great principles upon which the Dominion has reposed are carefully reflected in its statutes, to design legislation so as to meet the realities of business, to review and temper proposals of the other House so as not necessarily to discourage enterprise or restrict the area of employment; to oppose the ravages of partisanship from whatever source they come, and at least to give public opinion time and opportunity to be deliberate and to be understood; to be governed not so much by emotional appeal or fleeting spasms of popular fancy, but to listen to the accountant, the operator, the employer, the employee and the unemployed, and to make sure that legislation when finally passed will work with fairness and facility. The Second Chamber should be a workshop and not a theatre. For this function the Senate was created, and this function it must with thoroughness and fearfulness perform.

"So you say," says the abolitionist, "that from time to time the Senate has come to life, but you admit that it has come to life only in situations where party motivation operated. Senator Meighen himself has said that if the Senate becomes motivated by partisanship, it should be abolished. So, Arthur Meighen is a witness on my side," says the abolitionist. "Conclusion: Partisan motivation corrupts the Senate. Senators, however, lack independent motivation. Ergo, the Senate is useless. It should be abolished."

Now, honourable senators, that is precisely the conclusion that was reached by John N. Turner in 1960. He set forth his conclusion in a paper entitled, "The Senate of Canada-Political Conundrums." I will not read as many passages from this paper as I had intended.

Senator Doody: That would be nice.

Senator Stewart: Well, honourable senators, we can adjourn, if they wish.

Senator Simard: We might as well use the six hours.

Senator Stewart: Thank you, honourable senators. This is what Mr. Turner said, in his concluding paragraph,

> "Now, finally the conundrum can be stated. The Senate in terms of current facts no longer plays a useful part in the Government of Canada. Its historic purposes have been lost. It no longer operates, albeit through forces beyond the control of its own members, as a restraining influence on legislation. Its initial historical function, that of representing and protecting the rights and interests of the provinces was never discharged, and it is scarcely equipped with the necessary mandate for that role today. Consequently, the argument for its abolition is difficult to resist."

[Senator Stewart.]

Then he goes on to state the conundrum: How can we get rid of this dead body, how can we bury it? His final sentence is this: "Political bodies are notoriously long in dying. In a federal state they live well past the age of usefulness." That was Mr. Turner's conclusion in 1960.

His conclusion was that the Senate is a constitutional relic. It does no good, and in that judgment, Mr. Turner has been supported by Ed Broadbent and by Brian Mulroney. The NDP is perfectly delighted to have the support of the Prime Minister and of Mr. Turner because the NDP seeks to destroy the Senate.

The Labour Party in Great Britain saw the House of Lords as an obstacle to its policies. Likewise the NDP sees the Senate as an obstacle to what it calls "democratic socialism." The more the leaders of the Liberal Party and the Progressive Conservative Party destroy the credibility of the Senate, the more the members of the New Democratic Party rejoice.

Some of us came here in 1984 knowing what the academic and the popular views and, indeed, what the political leaders' views of the Senate are. We thought we would experiment. True, we could not make it elective. We could not make it equal on our own. But we might try to make it more effective. That is something of what has been behind the activities of the last six years, the activity in which we are engaged this very day.

Senator Murray is here tonight and I am glad he is.

Senator Murray: We waited until after the government changed before you began to introduce these ideas.

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray, history will show that that is not a fair comment. If you check the record of the Senate, what you will find is that it was not until there was a disagreement on a major constitutional principle concerning the borrowing authority bill that the Liberal Opposition became active in relation to the new Conservative Government. That is a matter of fact. We felt that the members of the Opposition Parties in the House of Commons had not defended the principles of the Constitution properly. They had not insisted as Mr. Wilson and Mr. Clark had insisted back in 1982 that the borrowing authority bill be in proper form. We were drawn into that controversy. It was only then—it was not as if the first day we were back here after the 1984 election that the Liberal senators suddenly started the effort to which I have just now referred.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: They even said they would do that when they came back.

Senator Frith: No, they did not.

Senator MacDonald: They were on record as saying that they were not going to let—

Senator Stewart: That is very helpful. It is nice to have this interruption.

Senator Murray: The fact is, you were completely docile during those months in 1983 and 1984 while your friends were still in power.

Senator Stewart: I was summoned to the Senate in January of 1984. I was not able to attend here regularly because of my academic duties until the end of the academic year at Saint Francis Xavier University. I came in about one day a week. Senator Murray, please do not make these gross generalizations when you have not checked the record. It only serves to prolong the discussion and to show that Senator Simard is not the only one who is haunted.

Senator MacDonald: What did you do to change his place?

Senator Stewart: Well, we have been active, Senator MacDonald.

Senator Simard: Since September.

Senator MacDonald: What did you do specifically?

Senator Stewart: It will take me some time, Senator MacDonald, but I would be more than happy to describe what has gone on since 1985.

Senator MacDonald: Did you do anything more important than the principle of establishing that the bills were going to be handled consecutively?

● (2350)

Senator Stewart: Senator MacDonald raises the question of pre-study. Is that what you wanted to raise, Senator MacDonald?

Senator MacDonald: Did you do anything more important than that?

Senator Stewart: Yes. There is. For example, the transportation deregulation legislation in 1987. You were there. You know members of that committee worked very hard. Mr. Crosbie was prepared to accept a large number of amendments, much to his credit. His attitude toward amendments from the Senate was very different from that of some other ministers.

I come now to the Emergencies Bill, Senator MacDonald. I know you remember it because we dealt with it in Committee of the Whole. That bill came to us from the House of Commons with a clause that permitted the governor-in-council to introduce conscription for overseas service without ever coming to parliament.

Senator MacDonald: I remember that. You made the amendment on third reading.

Senator Stewart: Not at third reading, in committee. I do not know the point of your question. You seem to say, yes, you did this, and yes, you did that, but I thought the thrust of your question was that nothing had been done since 1984.

Senator MacDonald: I was asking you what was important. There is nothing different about the way in which the legislation is being handled. What did you do that was different?

Senator Stewart: We offered a number of amendments, many of which were highly contentious. In some instances those amendments were accepted by enlightened ministers in the other place. Many were turned down, not on their merits, but on the basis of the modern Conservative interpretation of the Constitution. If you want me to take you through this verse by verse, I will but I do not think that this is the best hour of the day for that kind of detailed work.

Senator David: We are in the morning, sir.

Senator Stewart: I meant the 24-hour day.

What has been Senator Murray's attitude toward the Senate? As I said, I am pleased he is present. As I read his attitude, when he thinks of the Senate, he sighs a little. It is here, and, like John Turner, he must live with it. He asks himself how can the Senate play any legislative role without getting in serious trouble with the prime minister and his ministerial colleagues? His answer is "pre-study." Senator Finlay MacDonald, too, has, from time to time, advocated the revival of the practice of pre-study.

According to Senator Murray, if I understand him correctly, pre-study has two important merits—it may have others, but these are the most important. First, with pre-study, when the House of Commons sends up a clutch of bills shortly before Christmas or the end of June, they can be dispatched rapidly. They have been pre-studied by Senate committees, and the government has incorporated amendments, sought by senators in committee, in the bills as presented in the House of Commons. In other words, the Senate should act as a lobby, not as a major part of parliament.

Second, pre-study avoids confrontation—that is a word Senator Murray likes—between the Senate and the Government. After all, confrontation serves to annoy the prime minister and remind the public that the Senate still exists. Senator Murray has deplored the unwillingness of Liberal senators to engage extensively in pre-study since 1984.

Senator Molson is an even more ardent supporter of pre-study if that is possible. Again and again he has lamented the abandonment of pre-study in the last few years. I spoke with Senator Molson earlier this evening and told him I was going to say a word or two about his attitude toward pre-study. He said that he would like to be here, but he had other commitments.

Yesterday, November 6, Senator Molson told us that if Bill C-62 had undergone pre-study, it would be unnecessary to debate amendments at this stage. This evening he told us exactly the same thing. He said that if the topics of the amendments put forward this week had come up in pre-study, they could have been dealt with by the government, probably accepted and incorporated into the bills before they came to the Senate. That is most interesting.

There is another side to this pre-study story. There are those who believe that whatever was intended in practice, pre-study came to discredit the Senate. With pre-study, so the argument goes, the Senate ceased to be merely useless—it began to exert a positively bad influence. That view has been stated again and again. An early version, which was not exactly pre-study, appeared in the Globe and Mail back in 1965. The classic statement appears in a book entitled The Canadian Senate, a Lobby from Within published by McMillan Company in 1978. The author is Dr. Colin Campbell, S.J. Dr. Campbell has had a distinguished academic career. He was at York university until he was called to a professorship at the Catholic University. I am told that his departure from Canada was a genuine loss.

What did Campbell conclude after his careful study of the Senate? I will summarized his conclusions. First, he concluded that certain senators were keenly interested in improving bills that dealt with business matters, especially with corporate and financial institutions. Second, he shows that these senators came chiefly from Toronto and Montreal. Third, he shows that they controlled the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. He argues that, through prestudy, they attempted to assure that bills were "improved," quietly if possible. Fourth, he concludes that the Banking committee became an institutionalized lobby on behalf of business, particularly of financial business. Fifth, this lobby differed from ordinary lobbies operating around Parliament because its members were Members of Parliament in the Senate. They had special access, extraordinary bargaining power and were paid and housed at public expense. In short, it was a lobby from within.

Honourable senators, I would be happy to document my summary of his argument by reading passages from his book, but I will spare you at this hour.

● (0000)

Senator Frith: We accept what you say.

Senator Stewart: If anyone doubts this, I would be more than happy to make the book available.

The point is that, if pre-study is ever again to be considered seriously by honourable senators, Father Campbell's argument must first be refuted. It may be that he overstates his case, and he may have overstated it deliberately. He says at page 163:

> These proposals are meant to stimulate discussion. They follow an essential theme in this series of books on Canadian controversy.

It may well be that he is overstating his case so as to bring on a lively discussion.

But I cannot conclude my reference to Father Campbell's book without reading one or two quotations, and I will be brief. At page 147 he states:

> The Senate primarily protects the interests of major business and financial concerns. To do this, it regularly challenges, delays and, at times, amends or deletes legislative provisions that might endanger major business and financial concerns or might overlook "good" business practice. This role is called business review.

In his conclusion, he states:

> After an in-depth analysis of Canadian senators and their legislative roles, this book urged that the Senate be abolished because it fosters a haven for the lobby from within.

An Hon. Senator: In what year was that book published?

Senator Stewart: In 1978. He names some senators who are well known to us, some by recollection and some who are here currently.

Senator Corbin: On both sides of the house?

Senator Stewart: Yes, on both sides of the house.

Senator Frith: Does he identify the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee as the lobby from within?

Senator Stewart: Yes. The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee is the locus of the lobby from within. That is where the lobby from within operated.

Senator Simard: Are we dealing with the amendments relating to co-operatives?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator Simard. The amendment relating to co-operatives has to be set in this background, as it was set in this background by Senator Molson.

If honourable senators are really interested in reviving pre-study, that they have to take on Dr. Campbell's argument. It is believed from coast to coast in universities where our young people are taught. I am sure this is what premiers of some provinces—and perhaps the premier of the Province of New Brunswick—were taught as undergraduates.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I had the opportunity to debate Father Campbell on this very subject. In the course of cross-examination I asked him to cite specific instances in which improper influence had been exercised by senators to influence bills or to favour corporations. He was unable to cite one specific example—no evidence whatsoever.

I also had the opportunity to meet him in Ottawa, and I would regard his survey of the Senate operation as rather superficial.

Senator Stewart: That may be your reaction. But that, in a sense, has to be qualified in two ways. First, you have to read the book. He does cite instances there. He cited one case where Senator Hayden had actually described how they had gone about their work. I went to the Library to get a copy of the page to which Dr. Campbell referred and, sure enough, it was there.

The book, from an academic viewpoint, appears to be sound. I would not say "excellent," but "good to very good."

The second thing you have to remember, Senator Perrault, is that, even if the book is totally wrong, this is what is being taught about the Senate. This contributes in a serious way to the hostility which prevails in the minds of people, particularly of the young people in Canada, toward the Senate. If it is not true, it ought to be refuted by those who are advocates—

Senator MacDonald: Senator Perrault has just come into the chamber. Could you start all over so that he can catch up with you.

Senator Stewart: If you wish, Senator MacDonald, I would be more than happy to comply with your request.

Senator Frith: He did not just come in.

Senator Stewart: If honourable senators wish to move the adjournment, I would be delighted to resume tomorrow.

Senator MacDonald: You are taking in vain the name of a great Liberal senator, Salter Hayden. You should be ashamed of yourself.

Senator Stewart: Senator MacDonald, you have to face the facts. The facts are that a reputable scholar has published a book which states that some senators acted as a lobby from within. He mentions the senator whom you have named. He mentions others.

Whether we like it or not, this book is in the public domain. It is required reading in universities. In this democratic era, authority is not a matter of office; it is a matter of opinion. If the people do not believe that the House of Commons or the Prime Minister or the Senate are legitimate, then they are not legitimate. A book such as this erodes the legitimacy of the Senate. That is my point.

This kind of thinking influences people, Liberals and Conservatives—and New Democrats, of course, rejoice in it. They knew it all by intuition.

Honourable senators, I come now to Bill C-62.

Let me suggest, honourable senators, that this bill has been badly managed by the government. I do not say that this was done deliberately. But, for one reason or another, the bill was badly mismanaged.

Evidently, the government wished the Senate to give the bill its second reading before Easter. The Liberal senators would not agree to an "Easter closure" on the second reading debate. Rather, they proposed on April 11, 1990, at page 1499 of the Debates of the Senate, to send the bill to a committee after first reading—after first reading.

Senator Frith: That whole idea was instituted by Senator Murray and Senator Flynn—to send a bill to committee before second reading.

Senator Stewart: Senator Roblin's face lit up at that suggestion. He said: "Ah! That will be pre-study." But that course of action was rejected out of hand by Senator Murray. He thought there was some great Liberal plot.

Then, immediately after the Easter recess, the bill was given second reading, on division. That took place on May 3. It was sent to committee.

On June 27 the government had the Senate adjourn for three months. There was no urgency. The government refused to call Parliament back earlier than September 25 to deal with public business, such as the Gulf crisis or Bill C-62.

The truth is that for months the government has misread the situation with regard to the Liberal attitude toward Bill C-62. There are three basic truths that have to be remembered.

The first is that the reaction of the Liberal members of the committee to Bill C-62 was determined in the hearings. Otherwise, the bill would have been axed, to use Senator Molson's term. It would have been axed on the second reading motion on May 3.

● (0010)

We know that is what the New Democratic Party is saying. They are saying that the Liberals had no intention of killing Bill C-62. It is all a little charade. If they had wanted to kill the bill, they would have done so on May 3 when they had a majority in the Senate. That is what the NDP is saying.

I tell you, honourable senators, there was no intention on May 3 to axe the tax. We could have done it quite simply and cleanly. The attitude of Liberal senators changed dramatically over the summer. I know that is true of Senator Olson. I know it is true of Senator Buckwold.

Senator Frith: And Senator Lucier.

Senator Stewart: I don't know about him. It was the hearings that made the difference.

The second truth that has to be remembered is that the Mulroney government would have rejected any Senate amendments to this bill. I say that with Senator Molson particularly in mind because he was talking about what would have happened had amendments been sent over earlier. By postponing the third reading stage to this point the Senate, he says, has deprived itself of a realistic opportunity to have the bill amended. He argues that these amendments are good and ought to have been sent to the House of Commons, but that now it is too late.

I say that the truth of the matter is that the present government, as a matter of principle, would not have accepted any amendment regardless of its merit. That position was asserted by the government in the message sent from the House of Commons on June 18, 1990, with regard to Bill C-28 where the amendments are rejected because:

> . . . the amendments violate the traditional legislative role asserted by the Commons in fulfilment of its obligations under Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 . . .

Senator David: Who said that?

Senator Stewart: That was the message from the House of Commons regarding Bill C-28. It was dated June 18, 1990, and appears at page 1167 of the Debates of the Senate.

Senator Molson misleads himself if he thinks that three months ago or six months ago or eight months ago anything would have happened had we sent amendments to Bill C-62 to the House of Commons. On the grounds of constitutional principle, as understood by the present government, those amendments would not have been received.

Senator Frith: Wrong grounds but right, they thought.

Senator Stewart: I do not concede that the grounds are right but certainly that is the position the House of Commons stated, and that is the position that Senator Murray has repeatedly stated. With regard to Bill C-28, I said, "Can you not consider these amendments on their merits without getting into this interminable discussion about the implications of Sections 53 and 54?" He said, "No, we cannot." So the same argument would have applied in the case of Bill C-62 today, two months ago, four months ago, six months ago.

Why, then, are we moving these amendments now? Not because we think Liberal senators, even if they were a majority, could persuade the Mulroney government. However, we know there are independent senators in this place who believe some of these amendments are very good. We also know there are some Progressive Conservative senators who would like to be able to vote to remove the tax on books, to remove the tax on fuel in remote areas of the country, and to change the tax on co-operatives.

I can look across the floor and see people who, from personal experience, think these are good amendments and who lament, perhaps quietly, that they were not accepted when they were moved in another form in the House of Commons. So our hope is to persuade independent senators and some others who because of their experience realize the implications of the bill as it now stands. That is why we are moving the amendments. We know that with their support the government may listen. It will not listen to Liberals, but it may listen to Conservative senators and to the independents.

The third truth is that when you come right down to it, the basic strategy of the government has been to impose a form of closure on Bill C-62 in the Senate. It would have preferred what I will call an "Armistice Day" closure so that the Prime Minister could have the two houses away for December, January and February. Alternatively, as a backup, it proposed to have "Christmas closure."

Why are independent members of the Senate being "Christmas closure?" It is because the government believes that by imposing this kind of closure it will be able to keep some senators—independent senators such as Senator Molson and perhaps some Progressive Conservative senators—from voting for amendments which commend themselves on their merits to those senators. They are boxing them in. They are saying there is not enough time for amendments.

Senator Frith: And Senator Molson snapped at it.

Senator Stewart: And Senator Molson snaps at it day after day after day.

I have to congratulate Senator Murray insofar as Senator Molson is concerned. He has Senator Molson swallowing hook, line and sinkder.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

The Hon. the Speaker: It has been moved by Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Fairbairn:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that the Bill be amended to make membership in a co-operative a zero-rated supply and to make provision for that portion of direct charge service fees of co-operative corporations that finances the overhead for the supply of goods and services listed in Schedule VI,
> (a) by striking out line 28 on page 44 and substituting the following:
> "share in a credit union or co-operative corporation as defined in the Income Tax Act issued by a person"; and
> (b) by adding to Schedule VI on page 342, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:
> 1. That portion of a direct charge service fee levied in a period by a co-operative corporation that bears to
> (a) the total direct charge service fees levied in the period
> the ratio that
> (b) the total value of zero-rated supplies (other than those under this Part) made by the co-operative corporation in the period
> (c) the total value of supplies (other than direct charge service fees) made by the co-operative corporation in the period."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to provisional Rule P(3)(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the division is deferred, and therefore, pursuant to the Order of this Honourable House, I declare the Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

"LEST WE FORGET"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as is our custom in this chamber each year, I rise to join with Canadians who will gather at memorials across the country on Sunday, November 11, to pay tribute to more than 100,000 veterans who gave their lives at the call of their government leaders to help preserve peace not only in Canada but throughout the world.

Since the two world wars and Korea, many thousands of tributes are paid each year to fallen comrades in cities, towns and villages across the nation. Certainly contained in those tributes are exclamations of the preservation of peace and freedom which we enjoy through the sacrifice of young patriotic Canadians, both men and women.

But today the growing unrest around the world and even in Canada seems to portray a different picture, which begs the question: Is anyone listening? To emphasize, honourable senators, I offer a contrast with the threat of the Iraq crisis and a significant ceremonial event which took place in neighbouring Turkey just a few months ago, when I had the honour to lead a Canadian delegation to commemorate the 75th Anniversary of the Battle of Gallipoli in which the now-Canadian Royal Newfoundland Regiment fought. The President of Turkey, in his welcoming address, uttered remarks that were unusually touching and worth repeating many times over. This is what he said:

> This year 1990 is a special one for all of us here. We have come together to consolidate our friendship, to immortalize our dead who have fallen on this land and to remember and better appreciate the respective qualities of all those who were involved in the campaign.
> This indeed is a special anniversary, for we have among us a handful of the original landing and defending parties still alive and determined to travel to the spot, to embrace each other with affection and respect in the presence of high level official delegations from their respective countries.
> Perhaps ten years hence, no one would remain to come back again to Gallipoli, but they would adorn for ever one of the brighter pages of history. Their bravery and gallantry will remain as exceptional examples for the admired virtues of our race.
> On the 75th anniversary of the Gallipoli Campaign we recall in reverence and with gratitude, the memories of those who have given their lives in the service of their respective countries and we solemnly declare that we shall cherish, treasure and pass on this valuable asset and common heritage of ours intact to the generations to come.

He went on to say:

> I have no doubt that the deep feelings we all share today are best reflected in the following words of Kemal Ataturk, the founder of the Turkish Republic.
> "To heroes who have shed their blood on the soil of this country:
> "You rest here in the land of a friendly nation. Sleep in peace and tranquility. You lie together side by side with Turkish soldiers in each other's embrace.
> "To mothers who have sent their sons to war from distant lands:
> "Shed no more tears. Your sons are now in our hearts. Calm and serene, they will sleep in repose and tranquility. In losing their lives on our soil, they have become our sons as well."

Honourable senators, as we contemplate our future expressions of freedom, peace and unity, we should remember those words of the leader of a country which was our enemy, and to reflect on the real meaning of remembrance while we ponder our future in this great Canadian nation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on behalf of members on this side, I join with Senator Marshall in his words of trubute, which are always apropos at this time when we stop to consider for a moment those who laid down their lives to keep our country free. Earlier this year I had the privilege of going to Holland to celebrate the forty-fifth year of the liberation of that country by Canadian troops. Senator Barootes was a member of the delegation, and he will know that, as a result of the efforts of our men and women, Canadians are much appreciated by that country. Everywhere we went there were signs, banners, and placards saying, "Thank you Canada for your efforts." It is a time that we should all stop and remember. Many times I think we do not remember often enough. I noticed in Holland that thousands of schoolchildren were out on the street to thank Canada for saving their country. Our own schoolchildren do not seem to realize what Canadians have done in the fight for freedom. I sometimes think we should take young Canadian students on pilgrimages to other lands to show them how the people of those lands appreciate what Canadian forces did to relieve them of the tyranny of Germany and other countries.

I am rather saddened to think that as we remember our war dead and our veterans on Armistice Day, our Governor General is leaving Canada and will not be here with the rest of us Canadians, particularly those who were prepared to lay down their lives. Forty-five years ago we were at war with Germany and Japan. On November 11, for those two minutes before 11 o'clock, it would be nice if history were recalled and the Governor General was at the Cenotaph to remember those Canadian who gave their lives for this country. However, let us remember, and let us try to be present at the various cenotaphs in our homeland, rather than here in this chamber, where we sometimes get carried away and tend to forget that others were prepared to put up the real fight for this country, for freedom and for democracy.

[Later]

So let us move forward to November 11 and remember those who laid down their lives, and those who were prepared to lay down their lives, not only in the morning but with the going down of the sun.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I would like to join in the sentiments expressed by Senators Marshall and Bonnell on the occasion of Remembrance Day. Since those senators raised this very important issue, I thought that perhaps Senator Marshall and the veterans would appreciate it if we called attention to the symbol, the poppy, that many of us are currently wearing, and will be wearing, for the next several days, which is a flower that grew in what was known as Flanders Fields. If senators will turn their attention to the above painting on the walls of this chamber which was donated by Lord Beaverbrook, they will see that the painting on the wall is that of Cloth Hall, at Ypres, Flanders, which was destroyed during World War I. It was in this area called Ypres-Salient that John McCrae wrote the poem In Flanders Fields, and that large numbers of Canadians died. It is this particular area that the painting depicts.

Honourable senators, I share these sentiments with you on the spur of the moment, because that is what remembering means; it causes us to bring to mind the rites, the symbols and the memories of those Canadians who died and of those Canadians who are buried in this area of Flanders, now in modern day Belgium.

A few yards from the particular building in this painting, which has now been rebuilt, they still play taps every night in remembrance of the vanquished soldiers. In this particular area in Flanders, which is a very small community, Canadians are well received beacuse Canadian participation in Flanders is still very much alive in the minds of the Flemish people.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, on behalf of several petitioners, I should like to present some petitions. I know that many senators opposite consider this to be a very boring process, quite unexciting and uninteresting, and they have told us so on several occasions. Try as I might to make it more exciting for them, I find that essentially, there is no way to make them exciting for the honourable senators opposite.

This particular petition states: "Wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon your Honourable House to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

Again, I would assure honourable senators that upon receipt of these petitions I took the time and the trouble to peruse them carefully to ascertain whether they are true documents; that they are what they purport to be; that there are no duplications in the signatures; that there are no forgeries that I can discern; and that, in point of fact, they are legitimate documents bearing legitimate signatures. I have examined them carefully and I notice that the ink is different, the pens that were used were different, and the handwriting is different in each case.

These are all from citizens of Canada and, in particular, from the province of Ontario, who are availing themselves of the ancient right of praying to us to have this particular grievance redressed.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, as I have said on many occasions as we have presented these petitions to the chamber for consideration, these petitions and the petitioners seem to be representative of the area from which they come. It is worthy to note that these petitions seem to be coming from all the little hamlets and towns, and the municipalities and districts of Ontario. Honourable senators will also note that these petitioners reside in northern Ontario, eastern Ontario and, in fact, in every area of this province.

● (1420)

Honourable senators, I observe here a signature of someone who resides in Newcastle. Newcastle is a small community that many would think has no particular interest. However, it does have some historical interest. Newcastle was the area where Daniel Massey established a company that was then called the Newcastle Foundry which, over time, grew and became the Massey Ferguson Company. It was in that community that the Masseys put down roots of what was to become considerable wealth and, as was the tradition of the Massey family, considerable civic involvement.

The Masseys, with the exception of Vincent Massey, were strong Methodists and were very much part of the Methodist tradition of Toronto, which played a critical and crucial role in the financial, religious, civic and social life of the community. Another famous Methodist in Toronto was Timothy Eaton of Eaton's department stores.

Newcastle is also of historical interest because it was the birthplace of Joseph Atkinson. If my memory is correct, Joseph Atkinson's mother made a livelihood from operating a small boarding house for the workers of the Newcastle Foundry.

I feel fortunate that I live in Ontario. It is interesting that one can reach out and touch people and the the history of Ontario and Canada by reviewing and tabling these petitions. Again, from the very same township, Newcastle:

(Names of signatories read)

The next petition is from Ontario:

(Names of signatories read)

I must say, honourable senators, we should, with some diligence and care, attempt to pronounce these names properly and to spell them correctly, because I have been informed that many people in this country, and particularly in my area, are extremely proud that their names are being mentioned in this chamber. So I would seek the indulgence of honourable senators if I attempt to pronounce these names with some precision, because these little things are very important to people.

I see Senator Kelly getting up to speak, but I am not too sure whether I should stop to let him speak.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I rise on a point of order? I do not object to the position Senator Cools is taking on the pronunciation of the names, but I might suggest that honourable senators who have received the petitions may want to check the names ahead of time in the interests of expediency. Page 57 of our rules makes it very clear that only a brief summary of the petition is required and that the names are not reported. The honourable senator has chosen to read the names, and that is fine, but it seems to me that she might want to check them out ahead of time. It must be embarrassing for people who have signed a petition to have senators stumbling over the pronunciation of their names.

Senator Simard: Good point! I second that!

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Senator Kelly, I shall endeavour to satisfy you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): At least Senator Kelly is listening to the petitioners. That is a major step forward, and I think they will be glad to know that petitioners have a new champion on his side.

Senator Kelly: Thank you.

Senator Cools: I must concur, Senator Kelly. As a matter of fact, it was in response to your comment some weeks ago that I said that we should all be very diligent to ensure there are no fraudulent names; but I must tell you, Senator Kelly, that my upbringing is a little different from that of many in this room. I still stumble over non-English names, because where I was born and grew up I heard no names that were not English.

Senator Doody: You heard a few Irish names.

Senator Cools: I heard names like "Doody" and "Hastings," but I never heard names such as Hnatyshyn or Paproski. Where I grew up the names were all Humphrey, Frith, and so on, but no Greek or Ukrainian names. They are all part of the great multicultural heritage of Canada. I crave your indulgence, Senator Kelly, if I pronounce incorrectly a few names here and there.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

The next petitioner is a name over which I will not stumble at all.

(Name of signatory read)

In the interests of what over the last several weeks I have learned to be your concern, Senator Kelly, regarding attentiveness to detail, probity and propriety, I should like to call the honourable senator's attention to the fact that this particular page of the petition contains instructions to the people who are signing. I know that Senator Kelly wants to be sure that all of these petitioners are properly verified and checked. Those instructions to the people signing the petition state that signatures and addresses must be handwritten originals. All of the names on this petition are handwritten originals. The next instruction states that each petitioner must indicate his or her address, and then states that the petition must be free from erasures or interlineations.

• (1430)

The petition gives a return address. It does not say anything about legibility. Perhaps we could address those concerns in the future.

I assure the honourable senator that there are many people circulating these petitions. I am sure they could use all the help and instruction they can get. I also have no doubt that they are getting very good at availing themselves of their ancient rights.

I thought that this information would give some comfort to Senator Kelly, so that he could be assured that all due process was being observed. I would now like to table this petition.

I have the honour to present another petition signed by 25 people. This petition has the same instructions with regard to signature, and so on. "Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon your honourable House to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

These petitioners come from Toronto, which is major city not only in Canada but in the world. For many years it had the nickname of "Toronto the Good." In more recent years, however, there has been some deterioration in the city for reasons that I think concern us all as legislators and human beings.

As a resident of Toronto and a senator from that area, some of the changes that have taken place in Toronto have been particularly disturbing to me. I will illustrate one of those changes by sharing with honourable senators the fact that for the first time in my life I saw syringes used for narcotics on the streets of Toronto. Never before have I seen that. I am one of that group of people who would not be able to identify drugs even if I saw them. Yet to my shock, when I was in Toronto recently, I saw syringes on a street corner, and I saw policemen picking them up. I have been told that this is a common occurrence in major American cities, but unfortunately it seems to have become part of the life of Toronto. It is a great tragedy, and something that we should be working to overcome.

Toronto, formerly known as "Toronto the Good," is home to many of us here in this chamber. I believe there are many senators from Toronto, which seems to be a prolific area for procreating senators. Is Senator Poitras questioning the meaning of procreation or the meaning of Toronto?

(Names of signatories read)

An Hon. Senator: What is the nationality of that petitioner?

Senator Doody: Canadian. They have to be Canadian.

[Senator Cools.]

Senator Cools: Actually, I do not think a person has to be a citizen to sign a petition. I am sure you will quickly ascertain the facts and share them with us. If you cannot find it in Beauchesne, you may find it in Erskine May.

Senator Doody: Is that the same one who lives on Bloor Street?

Senator Cools: I do not know if it is the same one, but in lots many of these matters it used to be said that only the grandmother or grandfather knows for sure. While Senator Doody avails himself of the facts of the matter, so that he can enlighten us, may I respond to Senator Bonnell. I would hazard a guess that the name Sexton is an English name. In any event, the name is A. M. Sexton at 50 Bloor Street West. Because I am eagerly awaiting the information from Senator Doody as to whether or not one has to be a citizen to sign a petition, I should inform him that there is a section in Beauchesne which states very clearly—but I see the honourable senator is rising; so here comes the enlightenment. Let us be attentive.

• (1440)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an alien resident in Canada is entitled to sign petitions. An alien not resident in Canada may not sign petitions.

Senator Frith: How about a resident of Canada who is living with an alien outside Canada, just to complete the possible combinations?

Senator Doody: They are not mentioned here, but they may be mentioned in Erskine May.

Senator Cools: Senator Doody is quite right: there is no prerequisite that the person has to be a citizen; but he or she must be resident in the country. Thank you very much.

Senator Doody: You are welcome.

Senator Cools: As always, Senator Doody has again contributed to our intellectual and parliamentary development.

Senator Gigantès: If all Tories were like him, this would be a better world.

Senator Cools: Absolutely. I am having difficulty reading the signature of the next petitioner. One might think that some of these people must be doctors, because some of the signatures are so difficult to read.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, for the time being I shall abandon my petitions. I should tell you that I was able to attend to only 28 of the signatures, and I shall return to this most noble task.

ABORTION BILL

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-43

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to present to this chamber some petitions dealing with Bill C-43, the abortion bill, which a great many Canadian oppose and on which they are petitioning the Senate not to proceed. I have a petition containing 15 names from Kingston, Ontario. It is presented by a group of mostly retired women.

All of the petitioners call upon the Senate not to pass Bill C-43. The petition is accompanied by a letter explaining their circumstances and hoping that it will be included in the record of the Senate.

I have another petition of 31 names, which I was given last night after speaking to a women's group in Pembroke, Ontario. They all belong to the Women's Information Network in Pembroke, and they too are calling on the Senate not to pass Bill C-43, not to recriminalize abortion, and to pay attention to public opinion. The group is chaired by Jean Lopushanski, and the names and addresses of the petitioners are on the petition.

The next petition comes from Quebec, from places like Ste. Hyacinthe, Montreal, St. Jean and Philipsburg.

All of them call on the Senate not to recriminalize abortion and not to proceed further with Bill C-43.

This petition is signed by 79 people from Toronto, all of whom have the same purpose in mind. The signatures on these pages come from people across the City of Toronto, men and women who call on the Senate not to pass Bill C-43 and not to recriminalize abortion. Among the names I see one of Canada's most distinguished demographers, Professor Nancy Howell, who is a great authority on, among other things, fertility studies from around the world. I see the names of a great many other people who are leaders within the Toronto community.

I have a great many petitions from London, Ontario. Some of them are from a group of people who have been organized by a Mr. Bernie Koenig of London. He is one of the many who are leading the gathering of petitions and who oppose the passage of Bill C-43. Some of the petitioners come from Moore Avenue in London, which, I believe, is next door to Senator Turner. I am sure that Senator Turner will know many of the names. They are calling on him and all of us not to pass Bill C-43. The petition is signed on both sides and, like many others, is distinguished by the fact that it is signed by almost as many men as women.

Here is another petition containing 55 names.

All of the petitioners urge us not to pass Bill C-43.

I have another petition from London, Ontario, again with 59 names, and again on the subject of Bill C-43, urging us to pay attention to public opinion. It is their view that the House of Commons does not consider public opinion. However, the Senate is seeking public input on major bills, and, on that basis, these citizens of Kitchener, London, St. Pauls and the surrounding communities have petitioned us not to pass Bill C-43. Again, senators will see that at least a third of the names among the 55 people who have signed this petition are male.

I have another petition of 40 names, again largely from London, Ontario, but with some others from Thorndale, Hanover, Strathroy, Simcoe, Kitchener, and so on. Again, these are men and women who believe that the passage of this legislation will be very deleterious to health, safety and the rights of the citizens of this country, and they call on us not to pass Bill C-43.

I am going through these petitions very quickly. They are piling up because hundreds are coming in on a regular basis.

The next petition contains 43 names from residents of St. Thomas, London, Manotick, Lambeth, Ingersoll, Brighton, Arcola, Thamesford, Strathroy, and Woodstock, all of whom are calling on the Senate to listen to the concerns of the citizens and not to pass Bill C-43. It is important that these petitions be put on the record, since the vote on this bill is going to be a free vote and the circumstance is such that every individual senator consulting his or her own views on this matter will want to know the input of the citizens.

The next petition lists 53 names from Dresden, Waterloo, London, Iona Station, Kitchener, Hamilton, and a great many signatures from all parts of London, Bridgetown and St. Thomas, the home of the elephant, Jumbo. He died a tragic death in St. Thomas. He was a popular character in St. Thomas. St. Thomas is also the home of some of the most brilliant minds in this country, including the great constitutional lawyer, Mary Eberts. The 53 men and women who have signed this petition from those communities in southwestern Ontario are calling on the Senate, and the senators individually, to consider their views and not to pass this piece of legislation.

The next petition contains 44 names, largely from London, Ontario, but there are also names here from Dunnville, Brantford, St. Marys, Windsor, Chatham, Sarnia, Stouffville and Vienna. All of these petitioners have signed this petition and given their names and addresses in order that senators will know how strongly they oppose the passage of Bill C-43.

The next petition is full to the brim with 55 signatures.

(Names of signatories read)

This petition contains the signatures of many residents of London, all Senator Turner's neighbours, and therefore, presumably, splendid citizens who want their voices on the record in this chamber in terms of their opposition to the passage of Bill C-43.

(Names of signatories read)

The next petition contains the names of people who are all under the age of 18, who are all non-voters: but, at the same time, this group of 53 young Canadians wish to express opposition to the passage of Bill C-43.

These young people are from London, Talbot; there is one person from Regina, quite a few from the surrounding areas of London and rural routes, and someone who lives on Richmond Street, which is close to the university. The names include those from St. Marys, Aylmer, Ayton, and Perth. They are all people under the age of 18. I do not know if people who are not yet voters can present petitions; but I do not know why, since the legislation will affect their lives as much as it will affect the lives of everyont else. I think we are very glad to see these young people participating in this expression of their views, and we appreciate it very much indeed.

The next petition contains 23 names from London, Ontario.

• (1500)

I also have a signature from Beachville, Ontario, which is milk and cheese country as opposed to tobacco country, and obviously the home of a number of good citizens who have taken the time to urge the Senate not to pass Bill C-43.

Senator Turner: They are asking us to vote against the bill.

Senator Marsden: In the case of this bill, we all know that the circumstances are slightly different, but, nonetheless, they want us to listen to their view that the House of Commons did not consider public opinion when passing Bill C-43, and they would like the Senate to consider public opinion on this matter.

Honourable senators, I also have some names of people from St. Thomas, London and Brantford, the former home of Wayne Gretzky.

(Names of signatories read)

The next two petitions contain names from the London area of Ontario. There must be hundreds of names here, all urging the Senate not to pass Bill C-43.

(Names of signatories read)

I have yet another petition containing the names of 23 citizens from the London area. All of these people are calling on the Senate not to pass Bill C-43.

(Names of signatories read)

I have yet another petition from London, Ontario. The majority of names on this petition are of men who have signed this petition calling upon the Senate not to pass Bill C-43.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, this is only a small portion of the many petitions I have received and which, I am sure, others have received. There are many more to come. They all urge the Senate not to pass Bill C-43.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also would like to present a number of petitions, including the latest the one I received this morning. It was accompanied by a letter which I will read to you because it explains the purpose of the petition. The petition is from Baie Comeau—what a coincidence!—dated November 2, 1990 and sent by the Syndicat de l'enseignement de la Haute-Côte-Nord in Baie Comeau.

Dear Sir, please find enclosed . . .

Yes, it is a petition from Baie Comeau. It arrived this morning.

[English]

Senator Fairbairn: This must be very recent.

Senator Hébert: It is very recent. It is dated November 2, 1990.

Senator Stanbury: Did you say, "from Baie-Comeau"?

Senator Hébert: I certainly did. Apparently the Prime Minister did not convince his own people or his own family, because they are against the GST. It is an astonishing fact.

Senator Stanbury: You will have a good audience across the way.

Senator Hébert: They will certainly transmit the news, because this is an important petition.

• (1510)

> Dear Sir, please find enclosed a petition bearing the signatures of 71 teachers who urge the Senate of Canada to use every means at its disposal to prevent the adoption and coming into force of the federal goods and services tax.

The petition is signed by the president of the union, Anne-Marie Hickey.

I will read the text of the petition:

> Regarding the proposed federal goods and services tax, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to use the means at its disposal to prevent the adoption and coming into force of the federal goods and services tax which they consider to be an unfair tax.

(Names of signatories read)

There must be friends or relatives of the Prime Minister on this list, amazing!

(Names of signatories read)

I now have another petition from Sainte-Aurélie, Quebec, but this one doesn't have as many signatures. There are only 25 from Sainte-Aurélie.

(Names of signatories read)

And now, honourable senators, I have 442 residents in the Quebec City region, and this is starting to look serious—442 residents of various municipalities in the province of Quebec.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Corbin: Did you know there is a very interesting shipyard at Islet-sur-Mer and that Captain Bernier, the famous navigator who was the first to sail a ship through polar ice, was born there?

Senator Hébert: No I didn't. I thank Senator Corbin for this piece of information.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1520)

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: May I ask the honourable senator a question?

Senator Hébert: Yes, of course.

Senator Haidasz: These petitioners come from the village or town of St-Stanislas?

Senator Hébert: That is right.

Senator Haidasz: Would you be more precise and tell us whether St. Stanislas, after whom this town or paroisse was named, is the young Jesuit novice who died in Rome, the patron saint of Poland, or St. Stanislas, the Bishop and martyr who was killed on the order of the Polish king? Do you know anything about that town or village? Were you ever there?

Senator Hébert: No; I do not know. I am not too sure, but St-Stanislas-de-Kostka is a saint whose name I heard when I was a youth; so it might well be—because, as you know, we have so many saints in that church that we have to choose—between the two Stanislases my grandmother chose St-Stanislas-de-Kostka.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you.

Senator Hébert: It is most likely that one, but they both must be Polish, so you cannot complain.

Senator Haidasz: I was not complaining. I just wanted to know which one it was.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: I have another page, but I see some of my colleagues are getting nervous about reading their petitions.

Senator Fairbairn: We don't want to miss out!

Senator Hébert: I have just a few more.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1530)

Hon. Dalia Wood: That is in my riding. Is it the St. Bruno near Lac St. Jean or near Montreal?

Senator Hébert: St. Bruno on the south shore.

[Translation]

I still have 62,450 names left, but I will yield the floor to my colleague, to show I am not the only one who gets petitions.

[English]

Senator Wood: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure to table a petition from Dolbeau in Quebec. In this petition the undersigned residents of Canada now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy.

The new universal goods and services tax, if adopted by the Conservative government, will create serious, unjust and inhuman difficulties to Canadians. Implementation of the tax will cause an unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians, not only forcing them to pay higher taxes, but also by confronting them with a rise in inflation, interest rates and unemployment.

This petition contains 100 signatures of people from the region of Dolbeau which is in the riding of Roberval. It is comprised of such towns as Dolbeau, St. Emond, Girardville, Noranda, St. Laurentide and St. Félicien. It totals some 8,000 people, including some 35 anglophones.

(Names of signatories read)

I have further petitions from people residing in Dolbeau, Linton, St. Emond, Normandin, Albanel and St. Félicien.

(Names of signatories read)

I wish to present another petition containing 20 names of people from La Prairie.

• (1540)

Giordano is a name that brings back memories to me. In 1940, overnight the RCMP wiped out most of the leadership of the Italian community of Montreal by sending them to the internment camp at Petawawa. Italians who up until then had increasingly been accepted by the French and English communities were suddenly shunned. Italians themselves played down their nationality. They had suddenly become enemy aliens.

The people paid dearly for the government's confusion over questions of nationality, citizenship and ideology. Mussolini declared war on Great Britain on June 10, 1940, and the Canadian response was immediate. The then justice minister announced in Parliament that the very minute news was received that Italy had declared war on Great Britain and France, he had signed an order for the internment of many hundreds of men whose names were on the list of RCMP suspects. Those arrested were denied their rights, and the minister refused to publish their names, as he had been asked by the head of the mounted police not to do so because it might hamper his work. This denial of civil liberties extended not just to known Fascist sympathizers, but to all enemy aliens, and even to all of those of Italian racial origin who had become naturalized British subjects since November 1, 1929.

This was a particularly trying time in our home, because my father was one of those Canadian citizens who was sent to Petawawa. That is why the name Antonio Giordano of La Prairie is so important to me.

I have another petition from Jonquière and La Baie.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are some names from Bedard, another small town in that region.

(Names of signatories read)

Here are names from a region called Evain which is part of Temiscamingue.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is another petition from Evain.

● (1550)

The next petitions are from Rouyn-Noranda, which is in the riding of Témiscamingue. I believe that if Senator Grimard were present he would recognize some of the names, because they are from his home town. All 181 petitioners are obviously against the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

I am sure they are all neighbours of Senator Grimard, because they are all from his area.

The next petition contains 20 names from Rouyn-Noranda.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from the same area, Rouyn-Noranda.

Honourable senators, those are all the petitions I have for today.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would not like to have a day go by without being able to put before the Senate the names of people from my province of Alberta who are very concerned and are opposed to the GST. To date I have dealt mainly with people from Lethbridge in southern Alberta, but today I have a petition from the central part of the province.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1600)

That completes the 25 names from that area of Alberta.

I should like to continue reading the names from the same petition.

(Names of signatories read)

I also have the names of people from the central part of my province.

(Names of signatories read)

The next names on my petition are those that Senator Olson might recognize, because they come from the Brooks area.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I will end at this point in time to return another day.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have petitions from citizens of the province of New Brunswick who are opposed to the proposed goods and services tax.

Honourable senators will recall that some weeks ago I started in Passamaquoddy Bay, the islands of Grand Manan, Deer Island and Campobello, and I am now working my way up the St. John River valley on my way to the border between Quebec and New Brunswick. Who knows, some day I may have a petition from someone by the name of Simard from Rivière-Bleue.

Senator Simard: Is it from Rivière-Bleue?

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Here is someone from Rivière-Bleue in the province of Quebec, the place where you were born, Senator Simard. Of course, we all know that the Madawaska claims you as her adopted son.

Senator Simard: I hope you will get there pretty soon, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: Well, I have so many petitions from central New Brunswick that it will take a few months for me to get to the Quebec border.

Senator Simard: You are not in a hurry, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: This is not something we can hurry, Senator Simard. It is the undoubted right of these people to send petitions to Members of Parliament, in the House and in the Senate, and it is our duty to present these petitions to the Senate. In fact, I have an obligation to do so.

Senator Simard: Do you intend to be as brief as possible?

Senator Corbin: I do. For your sake, Senator Simard, I will not read all the names.

[English]

The handwritten signatures on the petition are opposed to the goods and services tax.

● (1610)

I would remind honourable senators that Hartland is the hometown of an illustrious New Brunswicker, the Honourable Richard Hatfield. Hartland has changed very little over the years. The longest wooden bridge in the world is there, as it has stood for the last 100 years.

Senator Fairbairn: Is Senator Hatfield's family home still there?

Senator Corbin: I believe it is. I have no reason to believe otherwise, unless flood or fire has destroyed it.

During the spring breakup, Hartland has serious floods. The ice piles up around Woodstock. Some islands were flooded while building the Mactaquac Dam, which is approximately 25 miles up river from Fredericton. In the spring the ice rushes down from northern Maine and Madawaska, and the beautiful town of Hartland is sometimes inundated with water.

I once studied handwriting. I can tell by this person's handwriting that he is an older person. Signatures tell much about a person. You can detect traces of character. You can also detect the degree of their wrath. These people are writing their signatures as opposing the GST. The way they dot their i's shows that they are very angry with the government. A precise dot indicates a person who pays great attention to detail. When someone is angry, they only scratch a line.

I will not indulge in a free course on grapho-analysis. If you want to know more, I will give you a lecture outside of this chamber. You will pay for the knowledge I have acquired.

Senator Simard: Would you charge the GST on the lecture, or would you be looking for an exemption, Senator Corbin?

Senator Corbin: I was giving you a sampling of what I know. If you want to know more, pay for it.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, that petition contained 27 signatures. I would ask a page to lay this petition on the Table of the Senate.

I have another petition containing 26 names from citizens of the Hartland-Woodstock area who oppose the GST.

(Names of signatories read)

When one signs a petition, that person does not have to print his or her name. Some of these names are difficult to read. A signature is a very personal mark. It is quite difficult to forge a signature. In fact, I know of no perfect forgery when it comes to signatures. It is as unique as your fingerprint or toeprint. There is nothing else like it in the world.

● (1620)

Florenceville is the home town of McCain Foods, one of the greatest multinationals ever to come out of New Brunswick. Florenceville is the home of the McCain boys. They started very small with potato chips and then went to French fried potatoes. However, one of their biggest and best plants is in my own home town of Grand Falls, New Brunswick.

Senator Bonnell: Is that where the French fries with no cholesterol are made?

Senator Corbin: I do not know about that. I believe you are referring to the truth-in-advertising legislation and some incident that happened many years ago.

Senator Bonnell: No. I am referring to the little girl on television who asks her father whether the French fries have cholesterol.

Senator Corbin: I suppose they do, depending on the oil you fry them in.

Senator Steuart: Do you pay GST on that?

Senator Corbin: That is quite relevant. If you buy McCain's frozen French fries in the market, in a one or two kilogram bag, it will be tax-free, but if you buy the very same type of McCain's fries in a fast food outlet, such as Wendy's or McDonalds, you will have to pay the GST on them.

Senator Bonnell: What about the young fellow down the street who has a little van and sells you nice French fries? Will he have to pay the tax?

Senator Corbin: Of course he will.

Senator Bonnell: The little vendor on the street trying to make a living?

Senator Corbin: Yes, and there are thousands of people in the Atlantic area whose chief income is from little shops.

Senator Simard: By way of explanation, Senator Corbin, to put Senator Bonnell's mind to rest, anyone with a sales volume of less than $30,000 will not have to pay the GST. I thought I should put that on the record.

Senator Corbin: Yes, but, Senator Simard, your government is still going to put those people through a whole accounting process which will cost them money.

Senator Simard: Not if their business volume is less than $30,000. There are many canteens whose volume does not reach that amount, so there will not be any business tax to worry about.

Senator Bonnell: How am I, or you, or the Department of National Revenue, to know if those people make $29,999 or $30,001?

Senator Simard: We, on this side, will take the taxpayers' word. We believe Canadians. Most Canadians are very honest. It is the same thing with the Income Tax. We have to accept their figures, until, I suppose, they cheat and get caught.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, you are going to take the Canadian taxpayers' word; that is what you have said. Are Canadian taxpayers to take your word?

Senator Simard: The law provides that people with a total business volume of $30,000 or less will not have to charge the tax to their clients. They do not have to remit anything. They do not have to do anything. We take their word. The whole taxation system in Canada is based on that, and the GST will be no different. Of course, if cheaters try to say that their volume is under $30,000 when they are really doing $60,000 worth of business, they will get caught, just as they would get caught by the Income Tax people, and they will pay. However, in the meantime, we take their word.

[Translation]

Senator De Bané: If you will allow me, Senator Corbin, I think we can draw scant comfort from Senator Simard's comment about businesses with a sales volume of $30,000 per year. They do what most businesses do in Canada which is take a 10 per cent net profit before taxes, which in this case would be $3,000, about one-third of the poverty-line income in this country. When the senator says that businesses making $3,000 a year before taxes will be exempt from the goods and services tax, I don't think it is anything to brag about.

Senator Simard: Senator De Bané, I accept your comments. My remarks, however, were made in response to the concern raised by Senator Bonnell about what would happen to the owners of small vans who operate more or less during the summer, and whose profit margins are much higher than 10 per cent, and I am sure it is much more than 10 per cent on French fries, especially if the French fries come from New Brunswick, because they can sell for more since they are better prepared, and so forth. So their profit, even on a sales volume of $30,000, may be as much as $12,000 or $13,000 for an operation that lasts two or three months. Those are the people I had in mind when I made my remarks. These people will not have to worry about administrative problems when the GST comes into force.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: May I again correct Senator Simard for the misinformation that he gives us? It is quite true that if you do not have a volume of $30,000, you do not have to charge the tax. What he does not tell you is that you have to pay the tax. In other words, you get no input credit and you will pay the tax. If you are charging the tax, you get it back. If you do not charge the tax, you assume it yourself. As an example, taxi drivers will pay the tax on anything they buy. If they do not charge the tax, they absorb it themselves.

Senator Simard: They are paying 13 per cent already.

Senator Buckwold: I just want to tell you what the facts are, so you do not get carried away and say that suddenly people who are doing less then $30,000 worth of business are not paying anything. They will be paying the tax, but they will not be able to collect it back; so they will bear the burden.

Senator Simard: Senator Buckwold, you have just demonstrated why it is so urgent that we get back to third reading; that we stop reading those petitions so that you and I can debate. You have accused me of mischief. That is totally ridiculous.

Senator Buckwold: I have accused you of a lot more than mischief.

Senator Simard: People doing $30,000 or less in business have until now been paying taxes through the nose at rates as high as 13.5 per cent on some items. There is nothing new about that. The point raised by Senator Bonnell was being discussed by Senator Corbin and me until you came in and accused me of mischief. You have raised the point, and I am prepared to debate it, but we should not be doing it on Reading of Petitions. Let us get on with the business of the house. Get your amendment in and we can debate it.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I was listening with interest to the response of senators on the other side, the government supporters, to the amendments we have been making.

Senator Lucier: Like heating fuel for the north.

Senator Buckwold: Like heating fuels and bibles and books and co-ops. I have sat here and listened hour after hour. Believe me, I have heard all kinds of talk, but I have not heard anything about the amendments. There was talk about the Senate, about the chairman, about the economy—

● (1630)

Senator Simard: Where were you last night?

Senator Buckwold: I was here last night and I heard the diatribe you gave. If you read it over, you will see there are very few lines about co-ops and how you support them and enjoy being a member of them. Ultimately, of course, we heard nothing.

I am simply saying that if you want to debate, then why not do your job and debate the amendments that are here. We have one amendment now and we will have more. I would like to hear your side of the argument.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the following senators for their contribution to petitions: Senators Simard, De Bané, Buckwold and Bonnell. I appreciate your input into the presentation of petitions. I think all comments have been extremely useful.

[Senator Buckwold.]

However, I am afraid Senator Simard has boxed himself in again. We will talk about that later.

(Names of signatories read)

I lay the petition on the table.

QUESTION PERIOD

CITIZENS' FORUM

CONFLICTING STATEMENTS OF PRIME MINISTER AND CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION—TIMING OF APPOINTMENTS OF COMMISSIONERS—FREQUENCY OF MEETINGS OF COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I note in the Globe and Mail of November 8 that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, the Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada, has promised that his government will act on the findings of the federally-appointed national forum. So says Keith Spicer, commissioner of the panel. Will the Minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs advise me if it is a fact, that if Mr. Spicer recommends something, the Prime Minister of Canada is prepared to carry out that recommendation and change the whole country of Canada if necessary?

Senator Bonnell: Mr. Spicer apparently says one thing about the Prime Minister, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate says something else. We were not at those meetings. We do not understand why Mr. Spicer took this job on three days' notice, unless he made a certain promise. He said that he had only three days' notice to consider whether he would accept the job. Some members have had only a few hours in which to decide, such as the Mayor of St. John's.

Senator Fairbairn: Seventy-five minutes!

Senator Bonnell: She had only 75 minutes to decide before she accepted the job. Mr. Spicer said that he does not know exactly what Canada will get from the national unity exercise, whether it will be a new Constitution, new legislation, or another type of government. He said that Mr. Mulroney has promised concrete action, and that persuaded Mr. Spicer that this national unity effort was genuine. Who is telling the truth? Is it Mr. Spicer, yourself or the Prime Minister?

Senator Murray: It is much to be regretted that the honourable senator should pose his questions in such pejorative words. Secondly, it is much to be regretted that the honourable senator would not take more seriously an exercise which has been launched with the utmost seriousness, in an effort to bring Canadians closer together and to promote a greater degree of mutual understanding and respect in this country.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, there is nothing I would like better than to realize and be sure that the Government of Canada is really sincere in trying to promote regional understanding in this country. However, the chairman of this panel says that most members of the panel will sit only one day a month, which means that in the seven months before July they will sit seven times to discuss the future of this country.

Senator Fairbairn: Half an hour a week, some of them.

Senator Bonnell: That would be about two hours a month. According to the Globe and Mail, a good Conservative newspaper, the chairman of the panel has stated that we have to believe that this will solve the future of our country, when the Prime Minister and all his cabinet, and all the first ministers of the country, could not do it; yet this one man will be able to do it with 11 advisors, working one day a month at $400 a day in expenses and $145,000 salary. I believe that kind of answer suggests that the whole thing is a charade to try to fool the people of Canada with this kind of forum.

Senator Murray: First, I neglected to point out, in answer to an earlier question, that Mr. Spicer was not given two days' notice. He indicated in his first news conference after his appointment that he was first approached on the matter several weeks prior to the announcement.

Some of the other members were indeed contacted a very short time before the announcement was made, but the honourable senator will realize that the government had been considering the creation of the Citizens' Forum, its terms of reference, and so on, for many months. We had before us lists of possible panelists and the last decision we made was the appointment of the people who would serve as panelists in order to promote this dialogue among Canadians.

With regard to the unfortunate tone and temper of the honourable senator, and his unfortunate attitude toward this commission, let me simply commend to him the far more positive response taken by a number of Liberal leaders, including Premier McKenna of New Brunswick and Premier Wells of Newfoundland, who welcomed the creation of a Citizens' Forum as an essential first step in promoting greater understanding and mutual respect in this country, toward rebuilding a consensus as to our future.

Senator Bonnell: I understand, honourable senators, that apparently an office has been set up in Ottawa and approximately 100 people have already been employed. Will Canadian citizens across Canada be given an opportunity for jobs here, or were these people all hand-picked by the PMO or Mr. Spicer himself? How does an ordinary Canadian from British Columbia, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland get one of these jobs in Ottawa, answering the telephones, or in the administration, and other offices? I never saw advertisements in the paper. Are they all chosen in the PMO?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this Citizens' Forum will be in operation at least from now until the end of June, 1991. I trust my honourable friend does not expect that I or any other Minister of the Crown will be in a position to take responsibility and answer questions as to their operations on a day-to-day basis. In creating a Citizens' Forum of this kind, the government must ensure a very considerable autonomy to the chairman and his colleagues in their operations. They would be completely responsible for the support and other staff that they will require to conduct their operations over the next six to nine months.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I understood my history studies in my younger days, democracy meant that there was a Parliament, that people could elect different parties to Parliament to form a majority, a government, and so on; and the government would be responsible for taxation and expenditure of tax revenues. The members of Parliament, who come from different provinces and different parts of the country, could stand up in Parliament and ask the government how it was spending the money it was collecting. If we have come to the point where one man can be appointed, and he can pay out money and hire people on his own with no responsibility to the responsible government, then responsible government in this country is gone.

In my opinion, the government should introduce a budget to be approved by the members of Parliament. The government should be able to say how the money is being spent, who is on the pay roll and how they got there. As I understand this news release, the people are coming over from the PMO and the bills are being paid by the PCO. There is no limit on the budget, and the taxpayers and their representatives have no control over how much is spent. It seems to me that it is a free line for Mr. Spicer and his fellow commissioners. They intend to meet for one day a month or for two hours a week, but the other members will not travel with him. He will do it all. He will call a commission when they report back in July, and whatever he says, the Prime Minister has promised to carry out, even if it changes the whole country.

Honourable senators, I think the Parliament of Canada should have more discussion on this panel. The panel should be given more direction; there should be a budget, and that budget should be controlled. There should be more than one man, whose views will change the whole countryside. If that is what they want to do, let that man run for Prime Minister; and if he becomes Prime Minister perhaps he will give us some direction. He is not even a civil servant, but just an appointee, and he should not have this kind of power. Is it true that the other members of the panel will sit only one day a month between now and July?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to Senator Bonnell, and I can say that all the statements he made in the preamble to his last question are unfair and untrue.

MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR COMMISSION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government tell us who is the responsible minister? Who is the minister of the Crown to whom Mr. Spicer will report? Is it the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations?

Senator Haidasz: The Prime Minister.

Senator Olson: If it is the Prime Minister, and not the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations, why are we unable to get answers to the questions just raised by Senator Bonnell?

Senator Olson: Things were run by different rules.

Senator Murray: No, they were not.

Senator Olson: They seemed to be.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator, once again, is totally mistaken. The members of the Citizens' Forum panel were appointed under the Inquiries Act. When that happens, it is done almost invariably by the Privy Counci,l or, in effect, by cabinet on the recommendation of the Prime Minister.

Secondly, with regard to detailed questions as to budgets, and so forth, the honourable senator knows that the way to obtain that information is to put a written question on the order paper, and it will be dealt with in the normal course of events.

Senator Simard: Right on! Do your homework.

Senator Olson: That is the first time in the exchange with Senator Bonnell and me, that the minister has offered to answer the questions or has even indicated that he thought it was any business of parliamentarians to pose such questions. So we have come quite a way in the last few minutes.

May we now have an undertaking that if we put some questions on the order paper we will get replies to them before all the arrangements are made and the money is spent? That is one of the reasons why we have the Estimates. The government is obliged to lay before Parliament its spending intentions, and that is all that Senator Bonnell now wants to know.

Reading this article, and particularly the explanation given by Mr. Spicer on how he will run the panel and the authority he has been given by the Prime Minister, it is a little scarry. He says that he will not ask anyone, that he will just hire all the staff he likes. He now says that the members of the panel will meet only one or two days a month. That is not a very significant effort, and that is all that Senator Bonnell is asking about. He wants an indication of how this panel will be run.

The people of this country need to have some confidence in the commission, and that is slipping already because of Mr. Spicer's explanations today.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, permit me to say that I cannot believe that the negative and, indeed, destructive attitude toward this serious exercise, which has been taken by Senator Olson, Senator Bonnell and others over the past few days, represents the authentic and official attitude of Mr. Chrétien and the Liberal Party. I certainly hope not.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have never claimed that it does.

Senator Murray: Good. I wanted clarification on that.

Senator Olson: I am concerned about getting answers to questions that Senator Bonnell and others, as members of Parliament, have a right to ask. That is the point. We are not trying to pretend that we are representing someone else. We are trying to fulfil our obligation and ask questions, as Senator Bonnell properly pointed out, about how the government intends to spend the taxpayers' money. If the government is not going to give us the explanation, then I guess we will have to take, as the explanation, what Mr. Spicer has said, and accept that as the mandate he received from the Prime Minister. Senator Bonnell has quoted the article. So far, the commission does not look like one in which people should have a lot of confidence. So why does the minister not try to give explanations on how the commission was set up, the authority granted and how it will do the job that he claims is so important? I think it is important too, but I am afraid that it is getting off on the wrong foot. If the minister does not want to answer the questions, will he please say so? We are curious, because Mr. Spicer's explanation of how he intends to conduct things does not look so good.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have already offered to obtain all the information that is available in a timely fashion if my friends will simply put down written questions, because so many of their questions are quite detailed. They look for rates of remuneration, budgets, and so forth. I do not carry those figures around in my head, and I do not intend to.

What concerns me greatly, coming as it does, in the case of Senator Olson and Senator Haidasz, from senior privy councillors in the Liberal Party, is the very negative and destructive attitude toward an exercise that is intended to build a consensus in this country and to promote greater understanding and mutual respect. I hope my friends will not allow themselves to be blinded by their obvious animus toward Mr. Spicer.

Senator Haidasz: Love thy neighbour!

Senator Olson: That is not the case.

Senator Murray: Perhaps they will consider a full discussion of this matter in their national caucus, because I cannot believe that very negative and destructive view is shared by the Honourable Jean Chrétien.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has no right to put that kind of construction on what we have been saying. That is his interpretation, and, for his benefit, I should like to tell him that it is a wrong interpretation. We are just as interested in finding some reconciliation in this country as anyone else, including Senator Murray and the Prime Minister. Surely we do not have to accept the image of the panel created by Mr. Spicer in these interviews, because if that is what it will amount to, it does not look like it is worth much. We think that Canadians are entitled to a little more.

• (1650)

He also does not have the right to put an interpretation that, somehow, Senator Haidasz, Senator Bonnell and I do not like Mr. Spicer. I do not know him from a hole in the ground—

Senator Murray: Obviously not.

Senator Olson: —but I can read what he says in the paper in direct quotes and there are some problems with that.

Instead of the minister's becoming antagonistic with our asking a few questions for clarification, why does he not try to clear up the matter? If this exercise is going to be as good as he claims it will be, and as useful and beneficial to Canadians, why does he not attempt to clear up the wrong impression that is being given?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what my friend is talking about when he speaks of wrong impressions.

Senator Olson: You stated an impression that was absolutely false.

Senator Murray: Over the next six to nine months in the course of this Citizens' Forum, my honourable friend will hear, and no doubt I will hear, things that we do not like. We are going to hear them from members of the panel and from Canadians as they discuss with each other the values that Canadians believe our country should espouse, as they discuss and face the hard questions, from their vastly different perspectives, as to the relationship between regionalism and national identity and national unity, the apparent competition or conflict between individual rights and collective rights, the relationship between multiculturalism and national identity and national unity, the relationship between the English and French-speaking Canadians, the place of Quebec in Confederation and the amount of centralization or decentralization that we want to see in the future. In connection with all those questions my friend will hear many things he does not like; but the purpose of the exercise is to allow ordinary Canadians to speak to each other about these matters.

Senator Frith: It's about time.

Senator Murray: I would hope that the Honourable Senator Olson would not allow his partisanship and his obvious animus for Mr. Spicer to blind his attitude to this matter.

PERSIAN GULF

THREAT OF WAR—POSTURES OF IRAQ AND UNITED STATES—SUGGESTED DELAY OF ALLIED OFFENSIVE—CANADIAN POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, events in the past few days in the Gulf appear to be moving the world closer to war. We have just learned that the chief of staff in Iraq has been removed by President Hussein. Earlier the oil minister of Iraq was removed by President Hussein. It appears that the voices of dissent at the senior echelons of the Iraqi government are being removed as President Hussein moves closer to war.

On the other side, the world seems to be divided into two schools. The American-British-Saudi school appears to be gearing up for offensive action. The Americans have called up another 200,000 troops to support the troops already stationed in the Gulf area.

Yesterday we heard that President Mubarak of Egypt has suggested that there should be a delay of months while the economic sanctions have an opportunity to erode public confidence within Iraq against the President.

The question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: To which school does Canada belong?

Senator Bonnell: Are you for war or peace?

Senator Murray: It seems to me that the discussion in the media and elsewhere seem to centre on two other scenarios. One is that we are all in for a long seige in the Gulf, but that, as time goes by, the sanctions will continue to bite more heavily into the ability of Iraq to find replacements for its military-industrial complex. Whatever is the present internal situation in Iraq, at some point in the coming weeks and months those sanctions would bite with sufficient severity to cause some change to be made, not necessarily in the leadership of Iraq but in Iraq's policy.

The other attitude one sees, with increasing troops and tanks in the area, is that we are heading inevitably and truly to an outbreak of hostilities there. I am no more a seer than the honourable senator and I cannot state which is the most likely hypothesis. I think it would be quite inappropriate and imprudent of me to express an opinion or to try to obtain an opinion from cabinet colleagues or from our military, political or diplomatic advisors.

We continue to do everything possible to reinforce the position and the authority of the United Nations and to seek diplomatic solutions to this very dangerous problem.

Perhaps we can have some discussions on this informally, but I hope it will be possible to bring forward Senator Macquarrie's inquiry at an early date and have a proper, organized and coherent debate on these matters.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would follow the suggestion that I made to him earlier. Obviously I have no objection to hearing the sage counsel of Senator Macquarrie. I think it would be more appropriate in the circumstances, if the minister chose not to speak at the ourset of such an inquiry, to give us a written statement of the principles and policies of the government with respect to the Gulf crisis so that we can at least examine those. We can then hear from Senator Macquarrie, and that would give us an opportunity to respond.

This is not in any way, shape or form to discount any material or advice that we will receive from Senator Macquarrie. However, I think it would be more appropriate to hear an official statement on behalf of the government. That could be laid down. We could then hear from Senator Macquarrie, and senators opposite could respond. As we move closer to the appearance of war and hostilities, it is incumbent upon us to let the Canadian public hear the views of this chamber and how we feel about pressing matters of war and peace and life and death.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would be prepared to take part in the debate on Senator Macquarrie's inquiry at an early stage. Meanwhile, the honourable senator is not totally in the dark on these matters. While the statements have not been made in the Senate, the Prime Minister and the Right Honourable Secretary of State for External Affairs have both made formal statements on the situation in the Gulf.

● (1700)

They have given progress reports from time to time in debate and in Question Period in the other place. In the case of Mr. Clark, he appeared before the standing committee of the other place and had lengthy discussions and made a statement there. Therefore, I do not understand why my friend would say that Canadians are not being kept up to date and informed on this matter. They are.

Having said that, I will undertake to take part, at an early stage, in any debate on Senator Macquarrie's inquiry.

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

RECOGNITION OF TIBETAN GOVERNMENT IN EXILE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, my question arises out of one that I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate which related to the visit of the Dalai Lama to Canada. At that time no official reception was given to the Dalai Lama either by the Prime Minister or by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark.

My question which was to the effect that, since Canada has never recognized China's occupation of Tibet, why was the Dalai Lama not officially received, and the response was that, while the Canadian government respects his contributions to human rights and to the pursuit of peaceful international relations, and, while the Dalai Lama does lead the Tibetan government in exile, Canada does not maintain any relations with that government in exile.

Honourable senators, my question today is: Has Canada ever recognized China's occupation of Tibet? If not, why has Canada not recognized the Tibetan government in exile?

[Senator Grafstein.]

FINANCE

RESPONSE TO RECESSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Now that the Minister of Finance has admitted that this country is in a recession, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the cabinet has prepared any economic measures, or a package of economic measures, to either cure this recession or to cut short its devastating effect on the Canadian people. Will there be either an announcement of measures or perhaps a budget before the end of this year?

Honourable senators, in 1989 and 1990 the budgets presented by Mr. Wilson stated quite clearly that a slowdown in economic growth was to be expected and that, indeed, the almost unprecedented rate of economic growth that the country had enjoyed for the past number of years was not sustainable. Further to that, he stated that it was necessary to make special efforts to contain the growth of inflation.

The recession that has taken place was not unexpected. We believe that the best contribution we can make at this stage to ensure a renewal of non-inflationary growth at the earliest possible time is to stay on course with the fiscal and economic policy we have been pursuing.

Senator Haidasz: Since economic experts across Canada have stated that the economic course the government has been pursuing since the beginning of this year was bringing on a recession, how can the minister state that it is good to remain on the same course that produced this recession?

Senator Murray: My honourable friend refers to economic experts. I do not know which ones he has in mind, but I would draw to his attention the most recent report of the Economic Council of Canada which, while it was critical of the government in some respects, offers the forecast of a renewal of economic growth in the vicinity of 3 per cent per annum.

Senator Olson: When?

Senator Murray: This is very good and positive news.

Further to that, I think I should draw to the honourable senator's attention that, in the view of the Economic Council of Canada, the range of fiscal and economic policies that the government has been following will provide the framework for renewed growth in this country. The Economic Council of Canada had high praise for the labour force development strategy that the Honourable Barbara McDougall announced some time ago and which is being implemented. They agree with what was done with the passage of Bill C-21, which was recently given Royal Assent. They also agree emphatically with the GST, which is going to add $9 billion in increased production to this country's GNP and which will be of considerable assistance in making our exporters more productive.

Frankly, we are absolutely convinced that the structural changes that we have been making, and the fiscal and economic policies that we have been pursuing in this country, are such as to ensure a renewal of sustained non-inflationary growth in this country which will provide the jobs and opportunities Canadians are looking for.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, the minister must know that the real estate industry and the construction industry in Canada are both flat. The result is that there have been an increased number of bankruptcies and people have been losing their houses because they cannot keep up with the high interest rates.

Can the Canadian people expect something from this government that will bring down the interest rates, especially on mortgages on houses, and will the government infuse some assistance into the building industry in order to maintain the jobs that still exist?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first of all, with regard to interest rates, I had hoped that Senator Olson would have put a question to me today.

Senator Olson: Give me time. I can get to it.

Senator Murray: Perhaps, because it is Thursday, and perhaps because he was preoccupied with petitions and other matters in this chamber, he did not notice that at the usual time, over the lunch hour today, the Governor of the Bank of Canada announced another reduction in the bank rate, this time by about 12 basis points.

Senator Olson: Big deal!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator says, "Big deal!" but it reinforces the point I have been trying to explain to him for many weeks. The trend line in interest rates has been down. Although I should not be advertising for the Bank of Montreal, I notice that it anticipated the reduction in the bank rate today by bringing its prime rate down yesterday or the day before.

My friend, Senator Haidasz, also mentioned real estate and the construction industry. I would point out that 215,000 homes were built in 1989 as compared to 135,000 in 1984.

Senator Haidasz: How many of those were sold?

Senator Murray: Very good progress is being made there.

My friend also talked about the construction industry. Business spending on construction machinery and equipment is expected to climb by 10 per cent this year. Business investment in new machinery and equipment has climbed by 73 per cent in real terms since the 1984 election.

These are some of the facts. I do not want to take the time of the house, because we will be having Royal Assent shortly and I must meet the judge. I thought my friend would be interested in having a few facts placed on the record as distinct from the dire prophecies and interpretations that he has put on the record.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, if things are so good, why are we in a recession?

Senator Murray: I have just explained to the honourable senator that the slowdown in economic growth was expected. Indeed, it was forecast in the 1989 and 1990 budgets brought in by Mr. Wilson, because we could not expect to sustain the rate of economic growth that we have known in recent years.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Charles Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Acting Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act (child tax credit) (Bill C-86, Chapter 42, 1990)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—SALE OF GRAIN—IDENTITY OF CUSTOMER, PRICE AND AMOUNT

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a number of other questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I presume he will be back shortly. The deputy leader has always been very meticulous in taking notice of these questions and coming back with a good response.

My question is fairly important to a number of grain farmers in western Canada. The Honourable Charles Mayer, the Minister of State responsible for grains and oilseeds, has confirmed that a significant sale of grain has been made which will keep the transportation system busy until early next year. Unfortunately, he went on to say that, in keeping with the Canadian Wheat Board's policy, he will not identify the customer, the price, or the amount of grain sold.

He claims that this is in keeping with Canadian Wheat Board policy. It is not fair. We know that there are some parts of western Canada that had a good crop. Indeed, there are no cash advances any more because the government wiped them out.

Will the deputy leader make an inquiry of the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds to find out what kind of grain was sold? There are rumours that it was some very low quality grain that is more animal feed than bread wheat, and I think the producers have a right to know whether or not they can expect any of the type of grain they have in store on their farms to find its way into the market as a result of this sale?

While he is making that inquiry, perhaps he could ask whether the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds has authorized the cash advances so that these people can have access to some money until the grain is actually moved out?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will try to get answers for the honourable senator.

FISHERIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES LOBSTER AGREEMENT—REJECTION BY CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I understand, from the Globe and Mail, that Ottawa rejects the lobster agreement with the United States. There was an agreement that the Americans would not increase their size requirements for the next three years, and that Canada would try to limit sales of lobster along the north shore of Canada and along the south shore of Nova Scotia. Apparently Canada will no longer agree. While independent fishermen, who were opposed to the agreement, were elated, other fishery groups and trade experts said the rejection sets a dangerous precedent in Canada-U.S. trade relations. Where does the government stand on this question? Where does the Department of Fisheries stand? I understood that Canada was quite pleased with the agreement.

Senator Comeau: Where do the Liberals stand?

Senator Bonnell: We want to sell as many lobsters as we can to the Americans as well as to Europe and other countries. We need promotion of sales because sales are down.

Senator Doody: Regardless of size?

Senator Bonnell: We do catch small sizes along the south shore of Nova Scotia and the Gulf. We have to can them, but we were able to sell some live until this agreement was reached. Apparently, Ottawa rejects this agreement. I would like an explanation of the government's policy and why there was a change in the position it seemed to take last week?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I shall try to get the information for the honourable senator.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—ASSESSMENT PROCESS FLAWED—FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. D. G. Steuart: I want to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. A senior Saskatchewan judge says Canada's environmental process is faulty, and the federal government is to blame. Chief Justice Donald MacPherson of the Court of Queen's Bench told federal lawyers arguing for a stop-work order on the Rafferty-Alameda Dam's project yesterday that: "It's been a pretty flawed process up to this point and the flaws have been on the part of your client." He was referring to the client of the federal lawyers, the federal government.

Chief Justice MacPherson noted that two federal court judges have found Canada's environmental assessment process to be seriously wanting in the case of Rafferty-Alameda.

The chief justice said that Ottawa's most recent bid to halt work on the controversial $154 million project would not seem to hold water if a federal-provincial agreement signed in January to restrict work on the project had not been approved by the federal cabinet, as Saskatchewan contends. He went on to show evidence how no order in council was passed and that it had never been approved. He went on to ask how he could get an injunction to stop work on the project if the agreement had never been formalized by an order in council. Do you have any information on that? What is the situation?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no information, senator, but I will attempt to obtain some for you.

Senator Steuart: While you are looking for that information, might I point out that the judge asked the federal lawyer, Mr. Semenchuck, whether cabinet approval was needed for Mr. de Cotret's predecessor, Lucien Bouchard, to make the January 26 deal with Saskatchewan. The federal lawyer, Mr. Semenchuck, conceded there was no order in council formally appointing the review panel and outlining its terms of reference. But he said an order in council was not necessary.

The chief justice then wanted to know why Mr. de Cotret had not appointed another environmental review panel to replace the one that resigned on October 12. He asked:

> Should I be concerned that the minister is not in a position to comply with his part of the January 26 agreement because there is no panel? There is still a responsibility on the part of the minister to appoint a panel. There is no panel—how can I grant an injunction?

Perhaps you can find an answer to that as well.

Senator Doody: I will certainly try.

VIA RAIL

FREQUENCY, ROUTING AND DISCONTINUANCE OF SERVICES—REQUIREMENT TO FILE APPLICATIONS RESCINDED—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I presume Senator Doody will have to seek the information, and I do not expect an answer right now; but on Tuesday, October 30, the National Transportation Agency announced that it was rescinding certain orders relative to VIA Rail, and that VIA Rail would no longer have to file applications regarding frequency, routing or the discontinuance of certain services.

I am concerned about one service in my province of Manitoba that I had understood was guaranteed. That is the service on the northern line through The Pas, on to Thompson and Churchill. This line is extremely important from a grain standpoint, but I am thinking particularly of the passenger side' which had been guaranteed. Will that guarantee continue? We had been assured of continued passenger service on that one line that is left in Manitoba.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will make an inquiry on your behalf, senator.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have one delayed answer to a question.

CITIZENS' FORUM

NATURE OF COMMISSION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 7, 1990, by the Honourable Roméo LeBlanc, regarding a request for the tabling of the Order in Council for the Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future chaired by Keith Spicer.

P.C. 1990-2347

Certified to be a true copy of a Minute of a Meeting of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 1st day of November, 1990

WHEREAS Canada and Canadians must be prepared to respond effectively to the challenges of international and global pressures which bear upon the social, economic, and environmental well-being of Canadian society, and from which Canada cannot be isolated;

WHEREAS the trust and confidence of Canadians in each other, in their institutions and in their future together have been strained by tensions and misunderstandings among Canadians of different regions, language groups, and ethnic and cultural heritages;

WHEREAS the Government of Canada believes it is essential that Canadians from all regions, from all linguistic, ethnic and cultural backgrounds, and from all walks of life increase their understanding of each other and identify interests and values they can share, as prerequisites to the development of a consensus on how their governments and institutions can better reflect and promote their shared interests and values in the future;

AND WHEREAS the Government of Canada believes it is essential to ensure genuine public participation in decisions affecting Canada's future in the coming decade and century; to assist him as an Advisory Group, to lead a process of public discussion and dialogue, hereafter also referred to as the "Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future", with and among Canadians: particularly but not exclusively with a view to identifying the characteristics of Canadian society which are valued by Canadians in all regions and all walks of life, and which are considered to be fundamental to the continuance and well-being of Canada; the social, economic or other challenges that are perceived by Canadians as threatening those characteristics; and the actions which Canadians think would strengthen a sense of healthy dialogue, perspective, common interests, and confidence in their ability to devise relationships based on mutual respect, equal dignity and solidarity; and

The Committee do further advise that, with the assistance of the Advisory Group, the Chairman will:

1. without precluding the discussion of other issues or limiting the substance of public contributions to the "Citizens' Forum on Canada's Future", ensure that the views of Canadians are obtained on:

a) what Canadians value most about their country, province, and community;

b) what characteristics they consider to be fundamentally Canadian;

c) what they perceive as being the major challenges Canada faces over the coming decade;

d) what actions should be taken, by citizens and governments, in the face of these challenges, to strengthen the fundamental characteristics of Canada, renew and reinforce the values Canadians share; protect the interests of the Canadian society; and ensure that governments have the capacity to meet the challenges, and to reflect needs and aspirations of Canadian society;

e) in a context of increasing global interdependency and international competition, combined with the continuing requirement for effective responses from governments to the needs and aspirations of individual citizens and to those of collectivities and regions within Canada, what areas of government require action on behalf of Canadian society as a whole, and what areas are better addressed locally;

f) the characteristics of the collective rights which are accorded to certain groups of Canadians; the role of such rights in defining Canada's identity; and the nature of an appropriate balance between Canadians' rights as regional, linguistic indigenous or ethnic collectivities and as individual citizens.

4. ensure the participation of a broad spectrum of Canadians of all ages, backgrounds, regions, and walks of life through approaches on which the Chairman may obtain proposals from Canadians, and which may include but will not necessarily be limited to:

iii) be authorized to rent office space and facilities as deemed necessary in accordance with Treasury Board policies;

iv) be directed to submit a report, in both official languages, to the Governor in Council by July 1, 1991; and

v) be directed to file with the Clerk of the Privy Council the records of the process as soon as reasonably may be after the conclusion of the process.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

DIVISION OF MOTION IN AMENDMENT DEFERRED PURSUANT TO PROVISIONAL RULE P-3.(a)

7th November, 1990—That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Bill be amended to make membership in co-operative a zero-rated supply and to make provision for that portion of direct charge service fees of co-operative corporations that finances the overhead for the supply of goods and services listed in Schedule VI,

(a) by striking out line 28 on page 44 and substituting the following:

"share in a credit union or co-operative corporation as defined in the Income Tax Act) issued by a person"; and

(b) by adding to Schedule VI on page 342, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:

"DIRECT CHARGE SERVICE FEE OF A CO-OPERATIVE CORPORATION

1. That portion of a direct charge service fee levied in a period by a co-operative corporation that bears to

(a) the total direct charge service fees levied in the period the ratio that

(b) the total value of zero-rated supplies (other than those under this Part) made by the co-operative corporation in the period bears to

(c) the total value of supplies (other than direct charge service fees) made by the co-operative corporation in the period." (Honourable Senator MacEachen P.C.).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that a vote is scheduled for 5:45 p.m., pursuant to provisional rule P-3.(a).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not fully understand this rule, but does someone not have to put a motion that we go to the Orders of the Day, or is that automatic?

Senator Doody: The Speaker has called Orders of the Day; the Table has read the first Order of the Day, and we are now on that order.

Senator Bonnell: Is that the way it works?

Senator Doody: Stick with me, son.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to provisional order P.3(a), the Senate will now proceed to the vote on the motion in amendment.

Please call in the senators.

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

• (1800)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators know what I am going to say. The numbers would be 51, minus 8, minus 1, which would be 42. Therefore, the vote would have been 45 to 42.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The eight did not vote.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-1.(a), I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Honourable senators will remember that, according to rule P-1,(a), our sitting will be suspended until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith that, according to Provisional Rule P-1.(a), the sitting of the Senate be suspended until tomorrow, Friday, November 9, 1990, until 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION TO AMEND WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the motion that was made yesterday about adjournment was made under rule P-1, which you will recall states—and I am paraphrasing—that if after 5:45 o'clock p.m. on a Monday, Tuesday, and so on, there is a motion that the Senate do now adjourn, the sitting shall then be suspended for the day until 2:00 o'clock p.m. the following day, at which time the Senator then in the Chair shall order the bells to be sounded to call in the senators.

> If at any time before the Senator then in the Chair calls for the yeas, nays and abstentions pursuant to Rule 49,—

That is the rule where people stand up to ask for a vote—

> —the Senator who proposed the motion asks leave to withdraw the said motion the same shall be deemed to have been withdrawn; otherwise, the said bells . . .

I was the senator who proposed the motion. I now ask leave to withdraw the said motion, and if you grant leave the same shall be deemed to have been withdrawn to save us going through the vote.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while we are talking about leave, I ask leave temporarily to revert to "Notices of Motions" so that I can make a motion about Remembrance Day.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): May I ask how "temporary" is temporary?

Senator Frith: Temporary in the sense that if I am granted leave to revert to "Notices of Motions", I will then also require leave to move the motion. If leave is granted, then we will simply deal with that one motion and will not of necessity be back at that point in the Order Paper. In other words, we will return to where we are after the suspended sitting period.

Senator Doody: I certainly appreciate the ambiencethat has been established here, the mystery and intrigue.

Senator Frith: I will tell you what it is.

Senator Doody: The temptation to leap fully into this is almost irresistible,but, nevertheless, I have to ask the honourable senator to give us his assurance that we will be back on Bill C-62 in the event that all these things do not happen.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Doody: By that I mean almost immediately, or immediately.

Senator Frith: Well, it will, depending on what happens to my motion.

Senator Doody: I know. That is what I am getting at. Even Agatha Christiewould not have tackled this!

Senator Frith: Let us get this clear, then. If I am granted leave to return to "Notices of Motions", I want to make it clear that there is no ulterior motive in the sense that this is not an attempt to get us off Bill C-62. The motion that I am asking about deals with Remembrance Day.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): It is a motion to get us off!

Senator Frith: It might "get us off", but it will not get us off the GST. So there is no ulterior motive.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: You are not jumping head first into an Olympic pool, are you?

Senator Frith: First, I must have leave to revert to "Notices of Motions". If you give me that, you will still not have given me leave to move the motion until you hear what it is.

The Hon. the Speaker: I see, honourable senators, that confidence reigns. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO OBSERVE OFFICIAL HOLIDAY BY NOT SITTING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask leave, seconded by Senator Molgat, to propose the following motion:

> THAT, as an expression of respect to Canada's War Veterans and War dead the Senate observe Remembrance Day on the official holiday, November 12th next, by not sitting on that day.

I have not checked to see whether I need to give notice, but I suspect that I do. I would not want to proceed with it unless I have everyone's consent anyway.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Just like mother love!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I guess we are in the same situation. I do not think that anyone here wants to sit on Armistice or Remembrance Day, but we do have a situation with regard to the GST and the debate that we are into. We have to receive some assurance that the time limits will not be affected by this motion. Perhaps Senator Frith could explain.

Senator Frith: Yes. I am proposing the motion—and why I had hoped that it would receive support on all sides—based on the assumption that we all think it would be a good idea, to quote the motion, "as an expression of respect to Canada's War Veterans and War dead" to observe the official holiday, November 12th next, by not sitting on that day.

We have a situation in which the Governor General will be outside the country on that day. It is not a good idea for us to exacerbate that situation by having the next element of Parliament, namely, the Senate, sitting on that day.

I do not think we should talk about it in terms of assurances that deal with our legislative calendar. I say that because it is one day. It will happen however it happens. I say that because I assume that the Conservative Party and the government wish to pay their respects just as much as the Liberals do.

Perhaps I misunderstand Senator Doody, but I do not think the government would respond by saying, "Well, we will do that. We care enough for the veterans that we will do that, providing you give something up,"—

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: We can sit tomorrow!

Senator Frith: —as if there should be some conditions. Why should there be conditions? Will the Opposition have to pay in some way? Did the veterans not pay enough? Are we supposed to pay, too?

Perhaps I misunderstand, but I do not understand why the Senate should approach this occasion, on either side, on the basis of saying, "Okay, we will pay our respects to the veterans and the war dead, providing we receive some assurances" from one of the parties in the senate. I cannot see why it should be on that basis. The implication, then, is that the Liberal party cares more about the veterans and, therefore—

Some Hon. Senators: No!

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Frith: I am glad to hear you say that, because I am sure that that is not the case. The implication of saying that the Senate will agree unanimously not to sit on the official Remembrance Day—that is, to say that "we will do that providing the Liberals give up something" gives the impression—and I know that you do not want to give this impression—that you will be doing the Liberals a favour because they care more about it than you do. I know that that is not true. You care just as much about it as we do.

An Hon. Senator: Do not say it, then!

Senator Frith: Why do we talk about it in terms of conditions? We either do it or we do not. I think we all agree that we should, so why should we put conditions on it? That is the motion that I want unanimous consent to move.

Senator Barootes: You will not get it!

Senator Frith: I will not get it? Is that correct? One senator says "no"? Does Senator Barootes say "no"?

Senator Barootes: I will wait until I hear you out.

Senator Frith: No; you cannot do that. You have to give me consent to proceed. Are you saying "no"?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Ask for unanimous consent!

Senator Frith: I am asking for unanimous consent. Do I have it?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Doody: Are you finished, Senator?

Senator Frith: No. I am not finished until I hear whether or not I have unanimous consent.

Senator Doody: It is not quite as simple as that.

Senator Frith: But it is!

Senator Doody: But it is not! There we are again.

Senator Frith: Is it not? Do I have it or not?

Senator Doody: There appears to be a fundamental difference in our understanding of the situation.

Hon. William J. Petten: He said "no".

Senator Frith: Who said "no"? If someone said no, then it is over. Is that not right?

Senator Doody: I think he said no to doing it immediately. He wanted to find out exactly what was entailed in this. To you it is a simple situation, Senator Frith. You say that we take Monday off and that is the end of it because it is Remembrance Day and you feel that everyone wishes to pay due reverence and respect to Canada's gallant heroes. I agree with that. No one feels more deeply about that than I do. As a matter of fact, many times, on behalf of my father who was a member of the Royal Newfoundland Regiment, I have placed a wreath at the Cenotaph in St. John's. I am very proud and honoured to do so. No one has to give me any lessons in the sacrifices—

Senator Frith: No; I am not trying to do that.

Senator Doody: —and the respect that Canada and Newfoundland owe their heroes.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Doody: But I want to say—

Senator Frith: I am not trying to give you a lesson!

Senator Doody: —is that we have a house order that was agreed to by all sides. It sets out a specific time frame of six hours of debate on amendments and six hours on the main motion, and so on. We have been living with that and should like to continue to live with it because it is the whole basis of the civilized way that this place has been functioning over the past few days—a welcome change from the exhibition that we had in early October.

I should like some assurance that that time frame will not be interfered with and that we will manage to keep the amendment process and debate going along the same lines as we have been doing in the past. I am not asking for anything special, I merely want the assurance from people on the other side that the spirit of the agreement that we have will be honoured, We can then all together honour Canada's war dead in a way that we all wish to.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, when I say that I am asking leave, I am not suggesting that the Provisional Rules or the house order be suspended. I am simply saying that I need leave to move this motion because of the requirement of notice.

• (1410)

I am not asking for the suspension or changing of any rules.

Senator Doody: The best way to demonstrate that is to bring forward the next amendment, and we can debate it this afternoon so that we can take Monday to do the right thing in terms of our veterans. Why not get the amendment on the table now?

Senator Frith: Then there are conditions to the support? Is that what you are saying. So I do not have unanimous consent. The condition is that I must give some assurance that we are not asking for the suspension of rules. We are not asking for any change in the spirit of the agreement. I am simply asking for leave to move this motion. Do I have it?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Doody: Can we discuss it?

Senator Frith: I thought that is what we were doing. The only issue to discuss is that the government is indicating there must be some conditions for the giving of leave. In that case, say no. Tell me whether or not I have leave. Why is it that we have to accept conditions on this motion and you don't? Do I understand it is the position of the government, if you support the giving of leave, that you are doing us such a favour that we should accept some condition? That is exactly what you are saying. I cannot proceed any further on this unless we have leave. Do I have leave or not?

Senator Cogger: No.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On a Question of Privilege, I say it is not desirable for the Senate to sit on Remembrance Day.

Senator Murray: Sunday is Remembrance Day.

Senator Frith: That is correct. That is why the motion indicates that we should observe it on the official day, which is November 12. That is the official holiday. The ceremony in Perth, as is the case everywhere else I assume, is on Sunday. The motion reads, "Observe Remembrance Day on the official holiday." If the response of the government is, "No we are not going to observe it on the official day", so be it. Since I could not get leave to move it that way unless I accepted certain conditions or gave certain assurances—although I did not require any one to give assurances—I think the assurances should be that we want to express our respect to Canada's war veterans and war dead by observing Remembrance Day on the official holiday, November 12. I feel that puts the Senate in a bad light and I raise it as a Question of Privilege. I know there are many veterans on both sides of the chamber. I do want to turn this discussion into an odious comparison.

Senator Phillips: You are really labouring at it, aren't you?

Senator Frith: Senator Phillips indicates that I am labouring at it. I do not really know what he means by the word "labouring"? I presume he means that by saying that I do not want it to be partisan, he considers that to be labouring. I do not understand what "it" is. I presume "it" is my motion. Am I working hard on my motion, which is another meaning of "labour"? Yes, I am.

I believe that some senators on both sides are embarrassed by the fact that the Senate is not observing Remembrance Day on the official holiday. That is why I brought the motion forward, because I think it affects all of our privileges, in that sense that we have taken calls from veteran's organizations asking, "why are you not observing the official holiday?" To that extent, I intend to be at the Cenotaph in Perth on Sunday. I said "some senators;" I did not say "all senators." I did not mean to include Senator Barootes, who does not feel embarrassed by the fact that we are not taking a holiday on Monday.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: I want to honour Remembrance Day as I have always done, and you won't tell me whether or where. It will be on November 11 at eleven o'clock in the morning.

Senator Frith: I must say that Senator Phillips is right. I am being forced to labour at this. Let me make it clear; I am not trying to tell Senator Barootes when he should be at the Cenotaph on Sunday, or if he should be. That is up to him. I will decide about that, just as Senator Barootes will decide when he goes to the ceremony on the eleventh.

What I am saying is that I find it embarrassing to try to explain the letters and phone calls that I have received, asking why it is that the Senate is making an exception, when the rest of the country is celebrating Remembrance Day on the official holiday.

Senator Murray: Not true. The overwhelming majority of Canadians will be at their jobs on Monday.

Senator MacDonald: What is our primary responsibility?

Senator Cools: To honour the living.

Senator Frith: I will propose a motion under Rule 33. I see there are some sentors opposed to it. It is as if we are told that the Senate deos not care about the veterans.

I am trying to deal with the interventions. The first intervention was that my motion is politically motivated. Then, when I speak to the implication that I do not care about Remembrance Day, that I am only interested in politics, everyone gets upset. But you are the ones who said that my motion was politically motivated, not me.

Senator Barootes says this is nonsense. If this is nonsense, then he can vote against it. I find this similar to what we were told about the co-ops. We were told that we did not care about the co-ops, that all we cared about was a partisan motion, and therefore whatever we were doing was contributing to partisanship. So be it. If you feel that we should sit on Monday, because any motion to have us not sit on Monday is merely a partisan Liberal move, then vote against the motion. I tell you that it is not. I expect some of you to take my word for it. I don't expect Senator Cogger to, nor Senator Barootes. If you believe there is no purpose in our adopting a motion to not sit on the official holiday, obviously you will vote against it.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

MOTION TO OBSERVE OFFICIAL HOLIDAY BY NOT SITTING NEGATIVED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will now move my motion under Rule 33, which provides that:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen,

—and I have raised such a question—

> a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon . . .

—which I move—

> may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that as an expression of respect to Canada's War Veterans and War dead, the Senate observe Remembrance Day on the official holiday, November 12th next, by not sitting on that day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I resent the cheap, crass way this motion was made. I am a veteran and I saw as much action as any member of the Opposition, and—let us make no mistake about this—I can point to others on this side—to Senator Doyle, Senator Sylvain, Senator Kelly, and Senator Barootes, whom you were so anxious to blame—who saw far more action than you did, Senator Frith. Senators on this side, such as Senator Marshall, have as much respect and understanding for veterans as you have over there, despite—

Senator Frith: Exactly what I said.

Senator Phillips: —of your crass, political attempts.

Senator Frith: Exactly what I said. If you had been listening, you would have heard me say that there is as much care on this side as there is over there.

Senator Phillips: I want to make it clear to you that November 11th is Remembrance Day.

Senator Frith: I know that.

Senator Phillips: You were in this chamber when that rule was made, Senator Frith. You were the one who insisted that November 11th would not necessarily be a complete holiday. I remember your remarks in committee. You did not want November 11th to be a full holiday. Look up your remarks to Senator Davey. When you were Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Davey asked you to introduce legislation to have the stores and schools closed on Remembrance Day. Did you do that? No, you did not. Then today, you stand and adopt this cheap, crass political attitude of yours.

The idea that you were asked to give up something in return is completely wrong. You were given the opportunity to move your motion today, and you were given that opportunity earlier in the week; but you refused to act on it until today.

Senator Frith: That is not so.

Senator Phillips: That is quite correct.

Senator Frith: It is not.

Senator Phillips: I make you this offer. If you move—

Senator Frith: What are you talking about.

Senator Phillips: —your amendment today, we will sit beyond 5 o'clock—

Senator Frith: What are you talking about?

Senator Phillips: —to give you the time to complete your amendment and—

Senator Frith: What are you talking about?

Senator Phillips: —we will take Monday off, if you would like to do that.

Senator Frith: That is not true.

Senator Phillips: That is true. There were discussions—

Senator Frith: It is not true. What the devil are you talking about!

Senator Phillips: Come on, now!

Senator Frith: Explain what you are talking about. No one came to me and told me to make a motion like this. Never!

Senator Phillips: No, no one would dare tell you to make a motion like that.

Senator Frith: What are you talking about?

Senator Cogger: Move your amendment on Bill C-62.

Senator Frith: No one ever suggested that at all. All of our discussions were quite clear as to what was going to happen to the amendments this week; and you, in fact, said the same thing to Senator Petten. You knew what was going to happen.

Senator Phillips: We have now made you that offer. There is nothing wrong with it. You have three hours this afternoon. We will stay until 8 or 10 o'clock tonight and give you the opportunity.

Senator Frith: You want conditions?

Senator Phillips: It is not a condition. It is an opportunity for you. Take it.

Senator Frith: If you want to do something, then you will do this.

Senator Phillips: Take it or keep quiet, Senator Frith! Take it or keep quiet!

Senator Frith: Just vote for it, or vote against it. Do not give us conditions.

Senator Phillips: I asked the Table to find out how many times the Senate and the House of Commons had sat on November 12th, and I think you will find there are a number of times. I sat in the House of Commons and in the Senate on November 12th, if my memory serves me correctly. I do not like the way the Honourable Senator Frith is treating the memory of the fallen. I do not like the way he is respecting the survivors by being crass and political about it. It is cheap, and, of course, we should not expect an awful lot better from him.

Senator Frith: You are lowering the whole thing to a personal question.

Senator Phillips: Your idea is to take cheap, political advantage whenever you can. Now, I would expect that of you, but I am rather surprised at the Leader of the Opposition. He is, at least, a Maritimer, even if he is not a veteran. I am sure he shares that deep respect that Maritimers have for veterans, and I am surprised that he would take advantage of that.

Senator Hastings: Talk about cheap, boy!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I deeply regret the tone that this discussion is taking on an issue that should not be dividing us as Canadians. There is a very practical reason for not sitting on Monday. It is fine for the people who live in Ottawa, or in Toronto or Montreal. There is no problem getting back to Ottawa for Monday, but for those who live in distant regions, the matter is not the same. I wonder, for example, how someone from Vancouver can attend any activities in that city on Sunday and be in the Senate on Monday. Even for others who do not live as far as Vancouver, it becomes extremely difficult.

In my own case, in my regiment, we have a standard practice on Remembrance Day. We hold the ceremony at 11 o'clock in the morning in our armouries, and the rest of the day is spent visiting those of our veterans who are at home and who cannot participate in the activities. The senior officers of the regiment spend the whole of that day travelling through Winnipeg to the various hospitals, homes, and private homes, wherever there are veterans who are unable to attend. It then becomes extremely difficult for me to get back to Ottawa in time. I can manage it, but it is not that easy. Winnipeg is not a difficult point to reach.

There are many others here—I can think of Senator Marshall from Newfoundland, and others—who will have extreme difficulty in participating in the ceremonies on Sunday and be here for Monday. So there is a very practical reason why we should support this motion.

There is a further reason. It has now been established that the holiday stipulated for November 11th, falling this year on a Sunday, will be celebrated on Monday. Our staff technically are on holiday on Monday. Members of the Public Service will not be working on Monday. Banks and businesses are closed on Monday. Why is that? The reason is that they wish to honour the November 11 celebration properly.

Let us not get into arguments as to who has more war service or whether someone is more of a veteran than someone else. That is a degenerating attitude. We should not approach the issue in that way. What is it that we are trying to do? We are trying to honour those Canadians who served willingly. I would point out that Canadians who served in both World Wars were strictly volunteers, young Canadians who chose to serve. That was not the situation in most other countries that participated. This is a Canada. This is a great honour to Canada. We owe these people respect.

• (1430)

I should like to ensure that those senators here who want to participate in Remembrance Day activities can do so to the fullest extent and return to work on Tuesday. I submit that that is what we should do. Let us not get involved in partisan discussions on this. Let us not get involved in discussions of who is more of a veteran than someone else. That is not the issue.

The issue is to permit members of the Senate to participate in their regions in the ceremonies on Sunday and to properly honour the veterans of this country.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: I agree with Senator Molgat that the tone of the debate is not perhaps what it should be. Honourable senators, I am going to risk being irreverent myself when we are discussing such a deep and solemn matter as the question of Remembrance Day.

I would like to take a moment of your time and take you back to 1942, which was during the war. At that time I was stationed at a British Commonwealth Training Camp in Jarvis, Ontario. On Remembrance Day, we were called upon to provide a guard of honour at the cenotaph at Simcoe. We marched down Main Street in Simcoe to the cenotaph. We were wearing jackets because, while it was cool, it had not been particularly bad weather for that time of the year. Quite a snowstorm was blowing up. Indeed, through the hymns and the sermon the snow came down. When we got to the two minutes of silence, we stood with bowed heads while a squad of approximately 200 school kids practised throwing their snowballs on the back of our necks.

At the risk of being irreverent, I will never go back to Simcoe without making sure that there are no snowballs. I feel the same way today, Senator Frith.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a point of privilege has been raised by Senator Frith. It has been demonstrated in this place that a motion of privilege cannot be put until a prima facie case has been determined. The Speaker has to decide whether or not a prima facie case of privilege has in fact been proven, in which event the motion can be put. We have precedents to establish that. That is the procedure that has been followed on many occasions and that is the procedure we should follow at this time.

If indeed there is a prima facie case, then we will have a vote on the motion. At this point it is up to the Speaker to determine whether a privilege has been breached.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I take it that Senator Doody is raising a point of order. I specifically moved my motion under rule 33, which I will read again. Rule 33 states:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen . . .

which it had,

> . . . a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon . . .

which my motion does,

> may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

The motion is before us. I heard the Speaker put the motion. I have just spoken to the Clerk. I went to the Clerk and asked, "Has the motion been put?" He said, "Yes, we are on debate."

Why are people shaking their heads? What sort of Alice in Wonderland is this place turning into? The motion has been put. The motion is before us and is being debated now.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Doody: It has to be determined if a prima facie case has been established. Senator Frith argued that that was necessary; Senator Olson argued that that was necessary; Senator MacEachen argued that that was necessary. It was proven to be necessary. We, on this side, were found to be wanting in terms of proving a prima facie case regarding the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and its consideration of Bill C-62. The Speaker followed the logic, reason and force of the arguments put by senators on the other side. He ruled that no prima facie case had been established by us and, therefore, our complaints about our treatment in that committee were out of order, were not well founded and there was no privilege. We took the Speaker's ruling for what it was and that is the procedure we have been following ever since. I see absolutely no reason why it should be changed this afternoon to accommodate honourable senators opposite.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Doody has overlooked a couple of points. After the debate that he is talking about, the point was specifically raised by me and others that questions of privilege should be determined on the basis of Rule 33, which is a specific rule of the Senate.

Previous to my calling attention to Rule 33, I said that I had overlooked Rule 33. The proceedings in the House of Commons, which place the Speaker in a position of authority on the question in making the decision Senator Doody has referred to, do not apply here. There is no need to look at the proceedings in the House of Commons because Rule 33 is a clear rule in the Senate. Whatever has happened, my motion is made under Rule 33. Moreover, the motion has been put by the Speaker. So there is a motion before us and that is the motion.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have not spoken often in this place in the last six weeks. To be candid, there are times I have felt uncomfortable even being here.

I would never proselytize or tell other people what to do, but I feel very uncomfortable because we seem to be moving from a discussion on how we observe Remembrance Day to partisan confrontation and prolonged discussion about rules and orders. In all my years in Parliament, not much was gained by appeals to the Speaker or long and protracted discussions on order. Common sense and good will is usually a far better guide to a legislative body, just as it is to humankind in general.

We will enter into the spirit of an important day if, rather than pushing together Remembrance Day and our procedures and confrontations here, we keep them separate. There is a grave danger that we are living in a time when our young people may well be in a confrontational situation in which there will be wounded veterans and, God help us, dead veterans. Surely on this day we can make a quick decision about what we are going to do on Monday and not prolong the discussion. Let us arrive at a clear view of our respect for this day and be done with it, one way or the other.

• (1440)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, encouraged by Senator Macquarrie's remarks, I would like to say that surely there is no one in this chamber who has any disrespect for the significance of that day, and no one would rather have Monday off than I would. As a World War II veteran, the only thing that inspired me was the matter of duty. I do not see how anyone can accuse anyone here, now that we are parliamentarians, of thinking that our duty to the legislation before us is paramount. There are some things we must sacrifice, and sacrificing Monday to do that which we would like to do is secondary to our duties as members of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, we have heard the word "sacrifice" from Senator MacDonald, and that is what inspired me to stand up. We all had comrades who made a sacrifice, and some of us are prepared to honour them in observing Remberance Day. I draw honourable senators' attention to the remarks of the Leader of the Government, who said that the overwhelming majority of Canadians do not observe the holiday on Monday. In fact, in many provinces in this country it is a statutory holiday. If the holiday happens to fall on a Sunday, the observance of the holiday—not necessarily involving the ceremony at the Cenotaph—takes place the following day. In my province Monday will be a holiday.

Those of us involved with veterans organizations are busy Sunday participating in a variety of events honouring our comrades. As Senator Molgat pointed out, it is very difficult, if not impossible, for those of us who live far away to participate in those events and return in time for the sitting of the Senate on Monday. It is not physically possible. I suggest it is not unreasonable that we in this chamber—the chamber that represents all Canadians—should do our duty to those who, as Senator MacDonald has said, made sacrifices, and we should pay our respects by not sitting on that day. There should be no deal involved. It should not be "We will do this if you do that." It seems natural and normal that we should respect this important observance and support the motion moved by Senator Frith. Personally, I hope we will not fight over one day extra—which our friends across the way are worried about—which will result in the debate being delayed by a few hours. We owe it to our veterans to support the motion.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I would like to speak as a non-veteran. I think I represent a fair number of people in this chamber who are not veterans of any of the great wars. I would not like to hear it suggested—it almost was in a couple of cases, although not intentionally—that if one were not a veteran, then one was less than others in this chamber when it came to dealing with this motion. I want it clearly understood that I was not a veteran. I was too young to serve in the war, and probably I would have been too chicken to serve had I been old enough. But I had five brothers who served in the war; so the family made a contribution without me.

I would like to make a small point, strengthening what Senator Molgat and Senator Buckwold said about the regions. I direc my remarks particularly to the eight new senators who were appointed by region. The Senate is supposed to represent regions of the country other than central Canada, and we have made gains in recent years with increased representation from outlying regions. It may be simple for those members from Ottawa, Montreal or Toronto to visit their regions, but it is not that simple when one lives in Whitehorse. Whether the holiday is on Sunday or Monday, I cannot hope to visit my region and return within a day or so. It cannot be done even from Vancouver. Unless one takes the "suicide special," which arrives at 9 o'clock in the morning after flying all night, one cannot do it.

Honourable senators from British Columbia do not all live in Vancouver, where the airport is located. Some live in other parts of British Columbia. Senator Marchand is from Kamloops, and sometimes it takes as long to get from Vancouver to Kamloops as it does to get from Ottawa to Vancouver. When you are dealing with this kind of issue, do not assume we all live in the Golden Triangle, because we do not. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Anne Cools: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to speak to the motion before us, not only to honour those here who fought and remember those who died, but to remind us that the reason we would like to have Monday to celebrate the dead is, in point of fact, to celebrate the living.

In this country we find ourselves at a point in history when it appears that we may be on the verge of being involved in another war. We may be entering into another situation in which more lives will be lost. For those of us who are pleased that Senator Frith has expressed his concern, I would like to review some of the matters I raised yesterday in response to Senator Marshall's speech.

Before doing so, I would like to refresh our intellectual memories with some of the words that have been traditionally said about war. For example, I would ask senators to be reminded of Goya's famous painting "The Disasters of War," which is a magnificent piece of work. Another masterpiece by another master, Picasso, is "La Guernica."

• (1450)

These are pieces of art that depict the disasters and horrors of war.

Senators could cast their eyes to the painting that is above our heads, which was donated by Lord Beaverbrook. It is called, "The Cloth Hall at Ypres." Another of the paintings depicts Flemish peasants returning home. It is named, "Returning to the Reconquered Land."

Honourable senators, I want to put this matter in historical perspective. The purpose of Remembrance Day as a symbol, is in the long run to avoid war. I see Senator MacDonald looking at me with great attentiveness. Senators have all heard of Flanders Fields. Those senators who served in the war are well aware that it took 35 human lives for every square meter to regain the area called Flanders Fields.

Senator Marshall, Senator MacDonald and other veterans know the names of the battlefields of both wars: Passchendaele, St. Julien, Ypres and so on. Senators know of the monument erected at St. Julien called "The Brooding Soldier". We know very well that that monument was erected in honour of 18,000 Canadian soldiers who withstood the gas attacks in World War I.

Senators know that around the altar in the Memorial Chamber in these Parliament Buildings are the following words, taken from Pilgrim's Progress by John Bunyan:

> My marks and scars I carry with me to
> Be a witness for me that I have fought
> His battles who now will be my rewarder,
> So he passed over, and all the trumpets
> Sounded for him on the other side.

We know that in the Throne Speech of 1984 the government promised us renewed Canadian internationalism. The experience of many honourable senators is that, for the most part, war has been a very ugly and awful business which has been carried out and fought, for the most part, by men. Many honourable senators know, for example, that when soldiers were killed, frequently they were found in a particular position, holding their hands to the left side over their hearts, where they would often keep pictures of their mothers, their wives and their children. Honourable senators, that is why we remember them at the 11th hour of the 11th day of the 11th month.

I am a woman and I have been very fortunate in that the disasters of war have not been visited upon me. I have never had to fight in a war. Most women do not discuss—and the women's movement ignores—the disasters and the torment that men have had to endure as they have faced combat. Very few authors have written about that torment. Personally, I have never had to experience that torment. I have admired all of those who have endured it, those who have survived it and those who have shared that experience with us in the hope that we never have to go to war again.

As we remember, let us understand the phenomenon of Monday and the wish to observe it, looking towards the future while redeeming all those who have perished. In that way, we may learn our lesson and never return to war.

As I look at Senator MacDonald, I realize that I promised him faithfully that I would look up a statement written by the famous poet Rudyard Kipling, who spent weeks upon weeks in the fields of Flanders in search of his own son who had perished there.

War is a nasty business and the intention of war is death. War in this contemporary century is unthinkable. Honourable senators, some weeks ago some of us felt terribly reduced and violated when the Speaker locked us out of the chamber. I remember that night, on a question of privilege, saying that this particular country had chosen to find political solutions rather than military solutions. This country was conceived as a country in an attempt to avoid conflict. When we think about the disasters of war, let us understand that because of people like General Sherman, after whom Sherman tanks were named, the Fathers of Confederation contemplated the design of Canada so as to avoid war and conflict. General Sherman and others like him introduced war to the modern era in a way that no one ever thought was possible.

[Senator Cools.]

Honourable senators, we stand poised perhaps on the brink of another war. Perhaps that is a part of the human condition; I do not know. Perhaps it is a part of man's inhumanity to man. However, it is something that we should think long upon, ponder and pray on.

I hope that honourable senators will not view any of this as a ploy. I hope that honourable senators will decide not to sit on Monday. I hope that honourable senators will use Monday to reflect, to meditate and to muse on the disasters of war. I hope that senators will pray that we may never again go to war.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to the motion of Senator Frith and perhaps comment indirectly and in a non-partisan way on his question of privilege.

I believe I have always taken the position that Remembrance Day is a day that belongs to all Canadians. We want to commemorate those men and women who made the supreme sacrifice of their lives, who lost their limbs or suffered psychological harm and made so many other sacrifices, they and their families, to save democracy.

Remembrance Day belongs to all Canadians, although veterans and the men and women who now serve in Canada's Armed Forces appropriate this day as their own, and rightly so.

It was Canada and Canadians who during the World Wars contributed in so many ways to the final victory and helped crush the totalitarian regimes that wanted to impose the night of fascism on this century.

Honourable senators, I was born in 1934. Of course, I was not old enough to enlist. Like other senators in this Chamber, members of my family served in the armes forces, but they were too young at the time to serve overseas during the Second World War.

However, I have a brother, who has died since, who served in Korea. I have another brother who served with the UN Forces in Cyprus and elsewhere and was a member of the Black Watch Regiment, now disbanded. Personally, I am very receptive to the feelings of veterans, their families and members of the military.

I think it is unacceptable for the Senate of Canada not to take the time, like the rest of the country, to pay tribute to the sacrifices made by our valiant soldiers who died or were or were otherwise affected.

If the Canadian people cannot, are not in a position to . . . yawn all you want, sir, I will get back to you in a few minutes! I think you are particularly ill-mannered to yawn, particularly ill-mannered!

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Do we need your permission to yawn?

Senator Corbin: My remarks make him yawn, Madam. You continue to read!

If you want to stand up, do so and make your speech. Stand up!

Hon. Paul Lucier: He lacks courage!

Senator Corbin: That is the kind of attitude we are faced with today.

I will address my colleagues on this side of the chamber if the others feel like yawning!

Dear Liberal friends, if Canadians cannot turn to the Senate and us to commemorate and honour Remembrance Day with dignity, what is going to happen to other institutions in this country?

What is going to happen to our democratic institutions? Talk about giving a good example to the younger generation! Such is the kind of example they want us to give. Why, I cannot say.

I do not want to impute motives. I do not want to interpret anybody's feelings about this issue but this is the first time in my life and in my numerous associations with the wide variety of undertakings as well as private and public companies with which I have been associated that an attempt is made to prevent us from commemorating Remembrance Day with dignity.

I worked in the Province of New Brunswick. I worked in the Province of Quebec, in the City of Montreal for companies which did not rank particularly high in terms of social justice, working conditions and what have you. But there was always heart-felt respect for Remembrance Day. We were given time off to commemorate the memory of the dead.

And the Senate will not do that? I think it is quite inappropriate and quite unnacceptable, and I do not want to be associated in any way with that kind of attitude.

Thank you, honourable senators.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have two points I wish to make. I want to follow on in the spirit and the tone set by Senator Macquarrie, in that we should make a decision on this matter without dragging in all the arguments about who is a more loyal and patriotic Canadian or who is more loyal and patriotic toward the veterans and their right to be respected. Such arguments could go on for a long time. I do not think either side of the house has any greater claim than the other.

I find it difficult to understand that we have to renegotiate the agreement that we made prior to bringing in the provisional rules. It took a long time for those discussions and those negotiations. Surely, senators opposite could have seen that today, Friday, we would come to this spinning out of the provisions of the agreement that were made and that it would not have to be renegotiated to come up with certain things which were not provided for in the agreement.

Senators opposite knew very well yesterday that under the provisional rules there was the possibility that the motion made by Senator Frith yesterday to suspend the sitting until today would have to be dealt with. There is no question about that. Surely, senators opposite cannot deny that they understood that. They knew very well that we were to meet today at 2 p.m. They also knew very well that at 5:15 p.m. we would have the right under the provisional rules to move a motion for adjournment or to suspend the sitting until Monday. Senators opposite must also know that from 2 p.m. to 5:15 p.m. is not six hours; it is but three hours and 15 minutes. Under the rules that are in place, if such a motion were made then senators opposite would be forcing us to do one thing or the other, that is, either to debate the amendment in three hours or else to go beyond the time that was agreed upon. I do not understand people making deals like that. There are all kinds of funny names—and I will not use them—to describe reneging on a deal like that, something which senators opposite are doing.

I say very sincerely to all senators that if they want to have it that way, if they want to respect the official Armistice Day, which is Monday next, then let us just do it.

Senator Barootes: But it is Sunday.

Senator Poitras: Work today.

Senator Olson: It is nice of honourable senators opposite to say that. I said to myself before rising to speak, "Keep cool, Olson, this is not one of those partisan debates that you get in to". But senators opposite must understand that I live 2,000 miles from here.

I know Senator Lucier lives a little further away than that. If I am to get to the area that I come from and then to Calgary and back here, then I have to go the day before. There is no other way. I am not complaining about that, but surely you cannot sit here and say "You could get back here if you fly all night." I used to do that but I do not do it any more, and I do not feel obliged to do it any more, because you want to renege on your agreement.

It is sad but true, but that is what you are doing. You do not intend to follow the rules we agreed to unless we give up something. That is what it really boils down to. You are saying to us "You must agree that will move that motion one day ahead of when you are required to so we can have the vote on Tuesday instead of Wednesday." That is what you are saying, so you are reneging on the agreement, and I think that is sad.

How do you expect to generate any confidence in this place? The people who negotiate these matters should respect each other and stick to the deal they make. If we are to accept this motion, let us do so without conditions. That is what Senator Frith has asked for, so why not just do it.

Senator Simard wants to make my speech again. I never got very far by following his instructions on how to make my speeches.

Senator Simard: You heard what I said.

Senator Olson: I know what you said in Edmonton, too, and you should never have said any of it.

There is another matter I want to discuss. Senator Doody keeps bringing up this business of a prima facie case of privilege with respect to Rule 33. I think Senator Frith explained that very well. We do not have to have a prima facie case of privilege established or determined by the Speaker or by anyone else. That is not what the rule says. We operate a little differently here than they do in the House of Commons and we always have. In many respects, it is better here.

You keep tightening up the rules, pulling the strings tighter and tighter with your majority, thinking you can squeeze out the opposition so that we cannot do our duty. But you will regret it in the end.

Senator Simard: Do your duty here and pass this legislation. What have you been doing?

Senator Olson: Senator Simard always wants to tell us how to behave ourselves.

Senator Simard: Get ready for January 1.

Senator Olson: We are doing what the overwhelming majority of people want us to do.

There are some rules in the book here about senators keeping quiet while someone else has the floor. Have you noticed that? If not, read them, or do you want me to read them to you?

Senator Simard: You said you had no use for the book; throw it away.

Senator Olson: I think the word "asinine" describes what Senator Simard is doing now.

Senator Simard: We do not have that word in French.

Senator Olson: Look it up in the dictionary. It will increase your vocabulary where it needs an increase.

Honourable senators, I hope Senator Doody never brings that up again because what goes on in the House of Commons with respect to a question of privilege is not the same as what happens here, and ought not to be. Therefore, do not ever try to argue that we have to use the rules and procedures and practices of the House of Commons. That is all he is trying to do. We have a perfectly good rule under Rule 33 to deal with questions of privilege.

In conclusion, I hope honourable senators opposite will see that what we need here is a very simple expression of whether or not we intend to honour Remembrance Day on Monday. I hope you will do as Senator Macquarrie and I have tried to persuade you to do, and that is either vote for or against the motion on the basis of what it contains and not on some other basis.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I will not keep you long. I have just a few things to say. It follows on what Senator Molgat said a little earlier about some of us who come from far-flung regions of the country and who cannot always get home on short notice. I come from Kamloops and, as Senator Lucier mentioned, it always takes extra time for me to get home.

I want to put on the record what has happened in my case concerning this Remembrance Day. On the basis of the negotiations and discussions that had gone on in this Chamber up to this point, and the plans to sit today and possibly on Monday, I decided that I could not attend the ceremonies in Kamloops on Sunday and get back here to Ottawa in time. I like to attend those ceremonies, and I have many times, to honour the many veterans from the area. All of us here have cousins, brothers, sisters or other relatives who have gone to war.

This Sunday in particular was one occasion when I wanted to be home, because the Kamloops Indian Band, for the first time, is holding a special ceremony honouring local native veterans. They asked me a few days ago if I would come home and be with them, and lay a wreath at the reserve on behalf of the many who had died. I am very sorry that I will not be able to attend the ceremony. If we sit on a Friday and again on the following Monday, I cannot get to Kamloops and then get back here in time on Monday.

I an sure everyone here will join with me in congratulating the members of the Kamploops Indian Band for holding this ceremony to honour the many native veterans. There are a number of those veterans who are from the Kamloops Indian Band Reserve and a number from other reserves close by, including the Savona and Vernon areas. Certainly, there were a number who were killed in the war.

There is a cousin of mine who went through almost the entire war. He was one of the lucky ones. He started off as a gunner in 1940 and went right through to the end in 1945. The Kamloops Indian Band is to be commended for their efforts in putting together a special ceremony to honour the many natives in that area who spent important years of their lives in the war, and the many who gave their lives in the war.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I was not in the service because I was working on the CNR. The railroad did not have enough employees, so the CNR had to get deferments for us. We were working day and night, 16, 18, 20, 24 hours a day in the yard. When we went out on the road we were gone for two or three days, sometimes five or six. We hauled troop trains and prisoners of war. I saw with my own two eyes the prisoners of war. They ate the best of meals in the CNR dining cars. We hauled gas trains which were filled with guards who looked after those trains when we stopped for water and coal.

We hauled train loads full of trucks and army tank cars. All the railway cars were full of ammunition, trucks and cars—you name it and we had it—and the dispatcher would send you any place but home. We had to get off the engine after five or six days on the road. Relief came for the dispatchers wo that they could go home for a change of clothes.

I hauled thousands of troops from the army camps and air force stations located all over southwestern Ontario. Jarvis, St. Thomas and Fingal had air force trains running out every Tuesday and Thursday and returning on Wednesday, Friday and Sunday with train loads of air force people going to new bases.

I met airmen, sailors and soldiers from all over Canada and many parts of the United States of America. We all had one objective in mind: to do the best job possible with the least loss of life.

During my political career I have always given veterans and armed forces personnel the best of service when called upon for a helping hand.

Honourable senators, I take my hat off to all the veterans of all the wars in which Canada has been involved, because they gave their all so that all the members of Canadian society, the British Empire, and all our Allies could have the freedom we have enjoyed for many years.

I think we should take Monday off. We can then all work a little overtime and give the government the extra time it requires.

My brother-in-law served in the forces along with many of my friends and school chums. Many of my personal friends never returned. I sincerely believe that we should take Monday off and remember them, wherever in the world they are laid to rest.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

> THAT, as an expression of respect to Canada's War Veterans and War dead, the Senate observe Remembrance Day on the official holiday, November 12th next, by not sitting on that day.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the third reading of the Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I yield to Senator Marchand.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, in rising to speak in the debate on the main motion, as so many other senators have done, there are a number of things to say about the GST, the goods and services tax. Like so many senators, I have received thousands of letters from people in my area about this tax. People have been telling me about a whole range of things concerning this tax. Before the Gallup poll was issued, which indicated that about 76 per cent of Canadians were opposed to this tax, it was not difficult to see, from talking to a number of people in the area, that it was an unpopular tax. Pior to the poll I thought about 80 to 90 per cent of people were opposed to this tax.

After listening to people in my area, and after reading the many letters that I have received from Canadians across the country, it is clear that the overwhelming majority of taxpayers are opposed to the implementation of the GST. They are opposed to the tax for a number of reasons, but mostly they feel that it is a tax that is discriminatory and regressive.

In talking to people on the street in my hometown, a number have said that they were concerned about the deficit. They said, "If Mr. Mulroney had come out in the beginning and said that the tax would go towards paying off a lot of the deficit, we would have gone along with it." Many people have come up to me and said "We are concerned about the large deficit. We want to see it go down, but Mr. Mulroney did not come out and tell us that this tax would go towards paying off the deficit."

Both Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson said, first, that the tax was revenue neutral. Later in the debate they said it was not really revenue neutral, but that it would go toward paying off the deficit. If Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson had come clean in the beginning, they would have found that many more Canadians would have been sympathetic toward the GST. Even though it is a bad tax—and the people with whom I have talked have all told me that is it is a bad tax—people would have appreciated hearing that from Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Wilson.

A number of people have told me why they feel that this is a bad tax, and why they oppose it. The GST will not be revenue neutral, as Michael Wilson first led us to believe. He then told us that the GST was an intregal part of the Conservative deficit reduction plan. Mr. Wilson's budget indicated that the GST rebates to corporations in 1990-91 would increase the deficit for the first two years. How are Canadians to believe that the GST will be used to reduce the deficit?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Under the GST, Canadians will pay more taxes and corporations will pay less. The GST removes about $4.6 billion in sales taxes from corporations and transfers them directly to average Canadians. Is this fair? A Canadian family with children, on an average income, will pay approximately $684 more every tax year under the GST. Why must Canadian taxpayers take the load and the manufacturers get off? These are some of the things that people in my area have been telling me.

Another group that has approached me are the representatives of small business. Much concern exists in the Kamloops area about what this tax will mean to small business. One person sent a letter to Mr. Brian Mulroney. She runs a small business called Lynne's Special Place. In conversations with Lynne over the last few weeks, she told me that if this particular tax goes through, she does not know how much longer she will be in business. She sent a letter to the Prime Minister on April 16, 1990. It reads:

> Dear Mr. Prime Minister:
> Attached is a photo copy of a petition that I gathered from my store in Kamloops, B.C. Our M.P. Mr. Nelson Riis has the original.
> These names were gathered in just two weeks.

She goes on to state:

> I truly believe that Canadians would take whatever measures necessary to assist in reducing the deficit. What is truly sad is that many federal government employees commented to me about the waste they witness within their own departments. Everyone wonders how much unnecessary spending is taking place throughout the country, when we consider the stories we hear, and witness the inefficiencies in our own little area.
> The money that is collected through taxation is money that belongs to the people of Canada. The federal employees are people entrusted with the responsibility of taking that money and providing necessary services for Canadians. On one side there should be trust and comfort, and on the other side there should be a feeling of pride and responsibility.
> From talking to people, we all feel that our money goes into a pot that the federal government thinks is theirs, and seem to think has no bottom.
> Once elected, it seems that many politicians lose sight of how the common person lives, and throw all financial caution to the wind. You are not royalty. You have been elected to represent me, and I can tell you, your lifestyle is far from mine. I would like you to represent me with dignity and respect.

● (1550)

> But if you want to throw my money around and away, then I would rather you develop those habits with your own personal money.

> Using common sense, and taking the position of looking for the win for all sides in a situation would be a tremendous asset in making your decisions.

There are many names from the city of Kamloops and surrounding area and I would like to put just a few on the record.

(Names of Signatories read)

One of the signatories has been a Conservative from day one. He used to work very hard against me in my campaign.

Honourable Senators, that is just a sampling of the many people who signed this petition, indicating that they were fed up with this type of tax that is being imposed upon them.

A few days ago a number of senators from western Canada met with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations. They came to us with some immense concerns, feeling that the GST was going to contravene their treaties, that the GST was in contravention of the treaties. Here are some of the things they had to say:

> The Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations (FSIN) is opposed to the application of the Goods and Services Tax (GST) to Treaty Indians. The FSIN is of the opinion that the limited exemptions granted by the current legislation do not go far enough in protecting the immunity from taxation enjoyed by Indians with Treaty and inherent rights.
> Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, has the effect of constitutionally recognizing and confirming existing inherent and Treaty rights. Unfortunately, the GST legislation takes an extremely narrow view of the inherent and Treaty rights of the Indian people to be immune from taxation. In fact, the GST legislation makes no mention of the tax treatment of Indian people. Rather, this important issue is left to the relevant sections of the Indian Act and such policy documents as may accompany the GST legislation.
> The FSIN believes that at the time of first contact, its member nations were autonomous, independent nations. This status was ratified by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, and further confirmed by the fact that the Crown of Great Britain and, later, the Government of Canada, chose to deal with Indian Nations by way of Treaties—a type of agreement relegated solely for use with equal sovereigns. The Indian Act, a piece of legislation which was drafted and promulgated without the input or advice of Indian people, makes a half-hearted stab at protecting the pre-contact status of Indian Nations. However, in the view of FSIN the Indian Act does not go far enough in protecting and promoting the autonomy of Indian Nations.
> This is not to say that the FSIN advocates any form of complete sovereignty such as was demanded by Mohawk warriors earlier this summer. To the contrary, the FSIN believes that its role, and the role of its member Bands, is within a larger Canadian federation whose attributes will, in time, be properly defined in concert with the wishes and aspirations of the First Nations of this great country.
> Similarly, the FSIN does not advocate the setting up or perpetuation of "tax free" zones such as those sought by the Mohawk peoples at Akwisasne. In fact, in relation to the Goods and Services Tax, suffice it to say that Indian businesses will, like any other businesses, collect GST from non-Indian customers on or off reserve.

● (1600)

At the time of the execution of the Treaties, the leaders of the Indian Nations were assured that they, and their citizens, would not be subject to taxation or conscription. This statement is corroborated by the statements of the Treaty Commissioners who negotiated, for example, Treaty No. 8 in their report to Parliament in 1876. Similar promises were made to all of the leaders of the treaty nations in the province of Saskatchewan, and this is echoed in the memories of our elders.

The FSIN view is that Indian nations and their people prepaid for the right to remain immune from taxation when they agreed to share their land with the federal government. Accordingly, immunity from the GST is not a grant of special status to Treaty Indians but, rather, a recognition that this was, in part, the consideration paid by the federal government for the ability to use the land provided by the treaty nations for the purposes of settlement.

Policy analysts of the Department of Finance have indicated to the FSIN that bands will not be taxable in respect of their purchases of goods and services. This immunity, according to the analysts, flows from sections 87 and 90 of the Indian Act. Unfortunately, the immunity which has been recognized is insufficient from the point of view of the FSIN. First of all, immunity flows from the inherent sovereign status of Indian nations, not from sections 87 and 90 of the Indian Act. Second, tribal councils and creatures of bands such as development corporations, children's aid societies, school boards, FSIN institutions, and the FSIN itself, should be the recipients of similar immunity. All of these entities, be they Indian governments or Indian institutions, rely almost solely upon moneys appropriated by Parliament for their funding. The inherent right of first nations to govern themselves and the notional situs provided by section 90 of the Indian Act should protect them from the incidence of taxation.

The imposition of the GST will cause Indian people in the province of Saskatchewan, and across Canada, severe hardship. Many Saskatchewan Indians, especially elders, are unaccustomed to the filing of income tax returns. They will, accordingly, fall through the cracks of the system and not receive their GST credits. More importantly, however, from a philosophical point of view, it might not be appropriate to apply for credits since this may be construed as implying that Indian people have embraced the GST, and are willing to pay the tax. This is simply not the case. Indian people will apply for GST tax credits as a result of economic desperation, not due to any notion that they have agreed to give up their inherent or treaty rights.

Immunity from taxation is a right which is specific to the person. It ought not to have as its prime determinant the location of the person on reserve status lands. The latter proposition, which seems to be the modus operandi of the Department of Finance policy analysts, makes treaty Indians the prisoners of their reserves by denying to them the right of mobility from reserve status land to other locales within the country.

Indians are already the most economically deprived group within Confederation. Most Indian reserves are not large enough, or lack the economic infrastructure, to make them attractive havens for economic activity. In fact, in Saskatchewan, major reserve-based economic enterprises consist of farms, convenience stores, laundromats, school bus services, medical taxis and the like. Hardly the type of activity which can be counted upon to create a great number of jobs or other economic activity.

Indian people have little choice but to leave their reserves in order to find a better life in the urban centres. In most cases their quest is not met with success, and urban Indians either drift back to the reserve or are forced to seek welfare. Many of them turn to crime, out of desperation, and are incarcerated.

In the province of Saskatchewan it is likely that the GST credit, like its counterpart, the Child Tax Credit, will be taken into account by the provincial department when calculating family income for the purpose of determining the quantum of welfare credits. In this manner the intended recipient of the credit gets no advantage and, instead, the federal government subsidizes the provincial government in respect of the province's obligation to provide social services.

It is the view of the FSIN that Indians are a federal responsibility regardless of their residence. Saskatchewan's treaty Indians should have absolutely nothing to do with the provincial Department of Social Services or, for that matter, any other provincial department.

It should be noted that if treaty Indians are forced to pay GST off the reserve, eventually more and more businesses will be located by Indian entrepreneurs on reserve. While this may be desirable from the vantage point of Indian economic development, it will do nothing for the communities surrounding reserves whose businesses depend very heavily on Indian customers for their livelihood. The town of Meadow Lake is but one of many examples of a community whose lifeline is inextricably linked with its surrounding Indian reserves. Meadow Lake, like its many counterparts in Saskatchewan and elsewhere, will feel the brunt of any enforced imposition of GST on treaty Indians.

The Chiefs' Assembly has instructed the FSIN to take legal action to protect the treaty rights of their constituents in the area of taxation. Prior to taking such a precipitate step we wish to engage in a course of dialogue with the ministers in charge of Indian affairs, finance and revenue, with a view to finding a political solution to the problem.

We would respectfully request that the federal cabinet impose a moratorium on the imposition of GST vis-à-vis Treaty Indian people until a political solution is found to this fundamental philosophical and legal problem. In the event that we are unable to agree upon a solution, perhaps the matter could be turned over to the Office of the Treaty Commissioner for his input and recommendations.

Honourable senators, I told the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians when they met with us last week that I would put this on the record for them, and I am glad that I have had the opportunity to do so. I understand that there have been some discussions going on around the room, and I think I will end my remarks there.

Senator Nurgitz: I understand—

Senator Frith: Do we have to put this in Senator MacEachen's name again?

Senator Doody: The debate, no, we can yield to Senator MacEachen on Monday. We do not want it, I assure you.

Senator Frith: Just before you do, I move the adjournment of the debate on this order in Senator MacEachen's name.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: Is that agreed by all?

Senator Doody: I think Mr.—

Senator Simard: Can we not hear him? Do we know what he is going to say?

Senator Frith: Yes, I do. What he is going to say, I think, is going to be to move a motion under Provisional Rule 2, but I thought we had agreed on the main motion that it was to stand in Senator MacEachen's name each time because the amendments had to be moved either by him or by me. This is all. I was just trying to get it into his name, and I think that is the right order to do it in.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I appreciate that Provisional Rule P-2. requires that the clock shall show 5 o'clock p.m. Although it is not yet that time, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed, under Provisional Rule P-2.

Hon. the Acting Speaker: Pursuant to Provisional Rule P-2, the sitting of the Senate is suspended until Monday, November 12, 1990, at 2 p.m.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Monday, November 12, 1990.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Issue No. 108C.]

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 8, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 108B.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 2 p.m., Monday, November 12, 1990, the Honourable Senator Bélisle, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

"LEST WE FORGET"—SILENT TRIBUTE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for reasons you will understand, I hesitate to make this suggestion, but please hear me out.

Debates of the Senate for Friday last concerning Remembrance Day will record only the animated discussion that took place. I mentioned to Senator Doody that perhaps our record for today should show that we started our proceedings, since this day has a certain official standing for Remembrance Day, by observing the traditional two minutes of silence to respect and honour our war dead.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Honourable Senators observed two minutes of silent tribute.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Nurgitz, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-2, I ask leave to withdraw the motion proposed by Senator Nurgitz on Friday, November 9, relative to the adjournment.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

EXCISE TAX ACT
CRIMINAL CODE
CUSTOMS ACT
CUSTOMS TARIFF EXCISE ACT
INCOME TAX ACT
STATISTICS ACT
TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—DEBATE ON THIRD READING CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, for the third readingof the Bill C-62, An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act, the Criminal Code, the Customs Act, the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Income Tax Act, the Statistics Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator MacEachen I have the honour and pleasure to move:

That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time but that it be amended by changing the tax credit threshold provided thereunder

(a) by striking out clause 46 on pages 293 and 294 and substituting the following:

"46.(1) Section 117.1 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto immediately after subsection (2) thereof the following subsection:

Indexing

"(2.1) The dollar amounts referred to in subsection 122.5(3) shall be adjusted for each taxation year after 1990 so that the amount to be used thereunder for the year is an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the amount that would, but for subsection (3), be the amount to be used for the immediately preceding taxation year, and

(b) the product obtained by multiplying

(i) the amount referred to in paragraph (a)

by

(ii) the amount, adjusted in such manner as may be prescribed and rounded to the nearest one-thousandth, that is determined by the formula

A is the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period that ended on September 30 next before that year, and

B is the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period immediately preceding the period mentioned in the description of A."

(2) Subsection (1) is applicable to the 1991 and subsequent taxation years." and

(b) on page 296, by striking out lines 39 to 41 and substituting the following:

"(ii) $24,800.00."

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, for the Honourable Senator MacEachen P.C., and seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin, that Bill C-62 be not now read the third time—.

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Are copies available, senator?

Senator Gigantès: Presumably, copies will be made available as soon as a photocopier can produce them. That is an excellent suggestion of Senator Doody's who comes to the rescue of the party at all times—one of the reasons why he is so lovable and why we like him so much.

Senator Doody: There goes my reputation.

Senator Gigantès: That is not a remark that applies universally. It applies only universally in describing those who like him but not as the object of the verb "to like."

Honourable senators, paragraph (a) of this amendment establishes that the maximum amount of GST credits and the turning point shall be indexed to the rate of inflation as measured by changes in the Consumer Price Index. At present the bill provides for indexation at the rate of inflation less 3 percentage points.

Paragraph (b) of this amendment establishes that the turning point of the GST credit will be set initially at $24,800.

The government has argued that the regressivity of the GST—regressivity in the sense that it does not tax ability to pay but that it taxes the expenditures of people regardless of their income—is overcome at low- and middle-income levels because of the system of enhanced tax credits. With only partial indexation against inflation, the real value of these credits will erode over time and the GST will become increasingly regressive at lower income levels.

It is quite easy to demonstrate what happens if it is indexed at only 2 per cent. In effect, the predominant rate of inflation in the past few years has been 5 per cent. Assuming, optimistically, that it will be only 5 per cent in the years to come—say in the next 10 years on average—we arrive at this calculation: If we take the quarterly rebate for the poorest people, which is $66, and we index it for 5 years at 5 per cent, it will become $84.

In other words, if the inflation rate is five per cent, and if the people who receive this rebate should be able to buy the same amount in five years as they buy now, then they should have a rebate in five years of $84 per quarter. However, if it is indexed at only two per cent, the rebate becomes $73. In other words, over five years, in terms of purchasing power, the people at the lowest end of the scale who receive this rebate will have lost 13 per cent of the purchasing power of this rebate, or $11 out of $84.

If we look at it over ten years, indexed for an inflation rate of five per cent, their rebate ten years from now should be $108 quarterly. However, indexed at only two per cent, three less than the inflation rate, they will get only $80, which means they will have lost $28 out of $108, or they will have 26 per cent less purchasing power from that rebate than they have today. That is a considerable blow.

By the way, the formula I used for calculating this is $A=C(1+\text{Interest})^t$, where "A" is the final product and "t" is the number of years. It is the standard formula used in calculating interest and growth of capital.

So let us look at the cut-off point. The $24,800 cut-off point, indexed at five per cent over five years, should rise to $31,652, if the same people at the lowest end of the scale are to benefit from the same equity five years from now, and from the same protection against regressivity five years from now as today, or when this tax goes into effect. However, suppose it is indexed at only two per cent, which is the inflation rate minus three, what they will receive five years from now will be $4,271 less than they would have if the cut-off point were fully indexed for inflation. It means that, in today's dollars, five years from now the cut-off point will have gone down by $4,000. Poor people, who will be protected in the first five years, will not be protected five years from now. We are not talking about rich people who can afford this extra tax. We are talking about the poor. The number of poor, poor in today's terms, will be considerably reduced because the level at which they receive rebates will have been pushed down $4,271 in five years.

Let us now look at ten years. The $24,800 cut-off point, indexed at five per cent for ten years, if we assume inflation of five per cent, becomes $40,397. So, ten years from now, for the cut-off point to mean what it means now, $24,800, as a measure of the level of well-being—or not well-being—of poverty of these people who are supposed to be cushioned from the ravages of the tax by the rebate, that cut-off point should not be $24,800 as it is today but $40,397. Now, let us suppose that for ten years they have received only two per cent protection against the five per cent inflation. The cut-off point will go, at two per cent per year, from $24,800 to $30,231. So even more families will fall below the point at which they are protected; $10,166 lower down the scale of income is where the cut-off point will be applied. Clearly, this will be a very heavy drain on these people. We are not talking people who buy caviar untaxed. We are talking of people who have to think twice about whether to buy their kids a new pair of winter boots. If the boots are too small, because the child has grown, the parents may decide they cannot afford another pair. It is these people, for whom a small amount of money counts, who will have this amount of money taken away from them.

We are told that if the government finds that it is visiting hardship on these people, on the poorest of the poor, it will then change the figures to give them relief. Well, which government? If it is a Liberal government, it will have abolished this sort of GST. If it is a Conservative government, we have to consider the record of this Conservative government with regard to taxation. The Tax Foundation has convincing figures which show that, in the past six years, those in the upper income brackets pay no more than they paid six years ago, but all those below pay considerably more in stable dollars after inflation. So the record of this government is one of making concessions to the rich and hitting the poor. If anyone really expects this government to push down the incomes of the rich in order to benefit the poor, then they have not read the record of the past six years. The government simply is not going to do it, and, therefore, we propose an amendment that will protect the poor by fully indexing the cut-off point and, therefore, fully indexing their rebates.

I really do not expect that Mr. Mulroney or his Minister of Finance will be responsive to such a proposition, and I do not know how many senators opposite will vote with their conscience, or make speeches about their conscience and then vote Mr. Mulroney's way. Admittedly, there is a certain loyalty due to someone who appoints you to the Senate, but there is also a certain loyalty due to fellow citizens, especially the weak.

Those who say that society is known by the way it treats its weakest members have a point, because it is Remembrance Day, and many people from the lower strata of the income scale gave their lives as willingly as those from the upper scale in all the wars this country has fought. They served this country as loyally as the rich, and they served this country under conditions that were often worse than those encountered by the rich. In Her Majesty's Royal Navy I had a cabin; I was a young officer. Ordinary sailors, who faced as much danger as I and who lived on a much lower income than I, were packed like sardines in tight, smelly, always-wet spaces, sleeping in hammocks, in tiers of three.

The poor have always served their country well, and they deserve protection. This amendment is designed to try to protect the poor from having this protection taken away by the philosophy of the government, which is best represented by one of the first statements Mr. Wilson made, as Minister of Finance, which was that this country needs more rich people.

Senator Frith: "Let them eat cake"!

Senator Gigantès: Yes, or, of course, there is the trickle-down theory. You feed oats to the rich horse and perhaps one of them comes out at the other end for the poor sparrow to pick up.

Senator Murray: More rich people and fewer poor people! We want the poor to become rich.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Frith: This ain't the way to do it!

Senator Gigantès: Let us look at the tax on corporate profits. I mean, people who head corporations and make profits are not generally considered as being poor. Not only are there many of them who can defer taxes, and not pay them at all, but there are enormous loopholes and the rates are lower. At one committee meeting Senator Barootes disputed this, and I showed him figures from Statistics Canada, from the OECD, and from the Bureau of Labour Statistics in the United States, which compared taxes on corporate profits in Canada and in the United States. I know that one can play tricks with rates, but there is one way where the comparison stands and where the rates really do not matter; and one does not have to consider what is provincial, federal or state.

• (1420)

What proportion of the gross domestic product in each country is represented by corporate profits? What proportion, in terms of fraction of the gross domestic product, is taken from the corporate profits as tax? The second figure divided by the first gives one the rate, the real rate, regardless of what are the published rates, at which the aggregate of corporate profits is taxed in each country.

The tax on corporate profits as a percentage of the GDP is lower in the United States. In every year since the first Tory budget, corporate profits tax has been lower; and if the profits of corporations in Canada had been taxed at the same rate—no higher, just at the same rate as profits of corporations are taxed in the United States—the government in each of the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 would have made respectfully an extra 6.7 billion, 2.5 billion, 2.7 billion, 1.2 billion and 7.8 billion in revenue. Those figures are not fantasy. They are actual figures. People immediately say, "Oh yes, but everyone is going to flee to the United States, because this is not as good a country as the United States in which to invest." Well, I do not think so. When it comes to investing, this is a country that has enormous resources, an educated electorate, a well-trained workforce, and much more peaceful cities than those in the United States—where in the large U.S. cities there exists practically a civil war—and a country that has a magnificent record, not just recently, but over the years. If honourable senators care to look back, they will find that Canada has outperformed most other countries in most respects. If, honourable senators, you do not want to believe me, believe this statement: "We believe the success of our efforts is reflected in the fact that over the past five years Canada has enjoyed the second highest rate of economic growth among the G-7 countries and the fastest pace of employment growth." This record speaks for itself. That was before the recent downturn, and the author is Mr. Wilson writing to the Wall Street Journal.

We cannot, at the same time, say that our very patriotic corporate giants will flee to the south if we tax them at the same rate as corporations in the United States are taxed, or that we will face similar problems that exist in the large U.S. cities, with their crime rate and tense race relations, and say that we are also the best performer. They are not fools; they know we are the best performer. They know there is space, that there is an abundance of resources; so we could have taxed them at the same rate.

The total of extra revenue in billions of dollars for the years 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 was 21 billion which the government could have accumulated had it taxed corporate profits to the same extent that they are taxed in the United States.

I then went on to do another calculation. I took the debt of each year, starting with the debt in December 1984, and I added to it the 1985 deficit. In this case, the debt was 160.8 billion in December 1984, the famous debt that they inherited from us and which, of course, is at the source of every single problem.

I will digress. I remember speaking to a group of Greeks on the 28th of October, 1989. That date in October is the anniversary of the Italian attack against the Greeks in the Second World War. On the occasion of the first attack, they suffered because the Greeks pushed back the Italians and overran Albania before Germany came in to help the Italians: I was asked at that lecture, "What happened during the occupation of Greece? Why were the efforts of the Greek resistance movement less successful than one might have expected?" I said, "Well, you know, they could never agree among themselves on a set of rules or on obeying that set of rules"; and one of the fellows in the audience said to me, "But, senator, you forget that Greece had been five centuries under the Turks." I said, "Please, that is 160 years ago. I mean, are we going to go on blaming everything on the Turks? Isn't anything our responsibility?"

I would like the Conservatives opposite to ask themselves. Isn't anything their responsibility? Have they mismanaged not at all? Have they been the image of perfection at all times: just, efficient, honest, perfect, guessing everything wonderfully, calling every shot perfectly, playing 1000 in baseball and doing an eagle on every hole? Is that it? Do they want us to believe that?

Senator Stanbury: That is certainly what the people of Canada think.

Senator Gigantès: Yes. So, there was the debt that the government inherited from us. These are the figures of Statistics Canada: 160.8 billion, national accounts figures. Because there are games played by the government when it wants to talk about the debt left by Liberals, it refers to the general accounts basis. The government refers to the general accounts basis when it speaks of debt and borrowing requirements. When the government wants to refer to the Liberals, it uses other figures to make the bill bigger. Here I am using the same figures for the last Liberal year as I used for the Tory years. The debt was 160.8 billion at December 1980, according to Statistics Canada. The 1985 deficit was 31.5 billion. If we had used in that year, the same interest rates as in the United States—and the same argument applies—we would not have to have higher interest rates than the United States. We are as good a country as the U.S.A. in which to invest money, especially in terms of the Free Trade Agreement. So we have to subtract from that deficit 2.8 billion, because the interest rates would have been lower, and we then have to subtract the 6.7 billion dollars in higher revenue if corporate profits had been taxed at the same rate as in the United States. Having done this operation for each year, I come out at the end with a figure which shows that the national debt today would have been $85 billion less than it is now if the Conservatives had used the same rate of corporate taxation as is used in the United States, and if they had used the same interest rates as are in place in the United States.

It is difficult to cut expenses, especially those that are tied into agreements with provinces, such as fixed program expenditures. However, there is one category of expenditure which the federal government has the right to cut. I refer to the purchases of goods and services for the federal government alone, leaving aside what it gives the provinces for medicare, post-secondary education and social security. Those are the actual costs of running the federal government.

If one takes the trouble to look at the historical figures put out by Statistics Canada every year in the month of July, one will see that the rate at which Tory expenditures on goods and services increased from the time they took power in 1984 until today is twice the rate at which the same category of expenditures increased under the Liberals in the six previous years. We have a strange government which tells the poor that it has to fight a deficit which it has created by pleasing its friends. If taxes on corporate profits are cut, then the people who generally support the Conservative government are pleased. The government supporters are ready to jump and say, "Ready, aye ready" and say that whatever policy the Mulroney government wants is best for the country. They are certainly best for the government's corporate toadies.

The government tells us that the GST will be good for the country. It is transferring part of the tax burden from corporations and financial institutions to the lower middle class and the working class whose taxes have increased substantially in the past six years, whereas the taxes of those in high income brackets, the top 5 per cent, have not increased. Why do we have these big deficits? Why do we have $85 billion more in accumulated deficit than we need to have? It is because corporate taxes were cut and because interest rates were higher here than they were in the United States.

Why do they need to be higher? The Latins always said cui bono?, in whose benefit is it? Who is interested in having higher interest rates? Those who have money to lend. It is not the poor who lend money. It is not the lower middle class who lend money. People from those groups are borrowing it. Who is raking it in? The supporters of Mr. Mulroney who take out full-page ads in newspapers to say that his policies, especially his taxation policies, are wonderful for them. I understand that. However, a Prime Minister is not elected to serve only a small coterie. He is elected to serve the country as a whole.

I listened to the brief delivered by the Quebec Chamber of Commerce which was against the status quo. The arguments put forward were pretty pertinent. The Chamber of Commerce refuses to take a position on sovereignty. What it objects to is the size of the national debt and the high interest rate policy. That has had an effect on national unity. Through the types of policies which ignore the masses and help the few who are rich, which policies ignore the middle class, the government is affecting the ties that bind the country together.

The GST and the almost total disintegration of the cutoff point is typical of this government. It forgets the poor, saying they should not exist. Why does it not go to euthanasia directly? That would be one way of getting rid of these people. This is a government which tries to make people believe that if things get bad it will increase, eventually, the cutoff point; adjust it to take into account the rate of inflation. We need an explosion of grey power in this country to make this government rescind its ignominious, despicable and heartless decision to de-index the pensions of the old. It is bad enough to be old. If anyone doubts that, all he has to see is that I am old and they must put up with me. It is bad enough to have me around at my age to be annoying; but when one gets old, must one also have one's small pension de-indexed? What is it that we want in ten years? Do we want our old people dying of hunger in the streets, as they used to in the time of Dickens in the early part of this century?

A senator opposite, whose name I will not mention, because that senator is not present, gave a solution to youth unemployment in a committee meeting. The solution was the deductibility of payments to domestic servants. That particular senator wanted the young to go to work as maids, valets and chauffeurs in the houses of the rich. The rich, who would pay for these services, would be able to deduct their payments to these young people. Hundreds of thousands of jobs would be created, said the senator. I do not think our young people want to be servants. It is not funny to be a servant. Not every master or mistress of a servant is as perfect as Tories would believe. A servant has to put up with bad temper, with smells, bad behaviour, harassment, insensitivity and a feeling of being subjected to the will of someone else on a one-to-one basis. People do not want to be servants. Yet, a Tory senator thought that this approach was a way to solve the problem of youth unemployment. The solution was to turn our young college graduates who cannot find jobs into housemaids, valets and chauffeurs. In this way, the Tories could feel a little more comfortable, at least those with money. In admiring her new dishwashing machine a Tory lady once said to me, "It's a great device, but a housemaid is a hell of a lot better." Yes, but the young do not want to be housemaids and valets licking other people's boots.

When the government says it will adjust, I do not think anyone in the country believes it. Tories manage mentally to insulate themselves from the misery around them. All of us who are more or less well off are insulated from the misery around us. Look where we live. Where I live in the Gatineau hills there are no poor people around. All of my neighbours are in my income bracket. We do not see the poor. We get in our car in the morning and drive down here to our big offices, and there is not one poor person around except for the cleaning lady who comes to our house once a week, or to the houses of my neighbours a little more often because they are a little better off. I am glad to say there is not a Tory among them. There are even some well-off Liberals, but Liberals, at least, feel uncomfortable about the poor around them. Tories feel uncomfortable if there are no poor around them.

No one is going to believe that a Tory government is going to redress the injustice it is perpetrating in Bill C-62 by de-indexing the cut-off point. Everybody is absolutely and totally right not to believe it.

We are objecting to this aspect of the bill, but we object to the bill as a whole. You say: How can we deal with a growing national debt? I have just given honourable senators some arithmetical proof that with better management and different policies—not Tory policies; I admit, that is a problem—the national debt today would be $86 billion less than it is. That is an extra $86 billion added to the national debt which the Tories could have avoided by pursuing reasonable policies. They did not; but, of course, they are Tories.

Now, that is only one aspect of the bill. I personally object to the bill as a whole, because any system of taxation every now and then must be re-examined as to whether it is still viable. Do we have to change it? It is like a car. There comes a time when we look at our old jalopy and we say: "Do I trade it in, get a new system all together, or do I keep the old one?" The Tories are saying, "Let's keep the old one for a while, but let's improve the upholstery where the master is sitting. The mechanics, and so on, have to deal with this, but the upholstery must be nicer. Maybe we can improve the heating system for them for the winter. Let's add to the old jalopy an air conditioning system." But it may no longer be the right car. It may be reasonable to want to change it, not to improve the lot of their friends but to improve the shape of the whole economy.

What the Tories are doing in Bill C-62, as with their other tax measures, is shifting the burden from the rich to the poor. They are ignoring the evidence coming in that the consumption taxes, which have been used in Europe and elsewhere, are not producing the expected results. What I mean by results is a beneficial result of growth and development of the economy. Already there is an intellectual revolt all over Europe against these taxes because of their insensitive treatment of the economy.

When we raise our objections, there are automatic responses in some editorials. Most editorials are written in newspapers whose editors respond to the wishes of a publisher, who responds to the wishes of an owner, who is generally a friend of Mr. Mulroney. So the editorials on economics, especially in the Globe and Mail, are very conservative. Even if they were not, our young economists, some of whom are now middle-aged and are editorial writers, have been taught in Canadian universities where the textbooks are American and where Keynesian theory lost its credibility because of the mishandling of those theories by Lyndon Johnson in particular.

As well, everyone is feeling the grip of the Chicago school. The Chicago school is very much the economic descendant of Spencerism. Herbert Spencer, at the end of the last century or the beginning of this, put into economic and social terms what Calvin had said. In effect, if you are rich you are the elect of God. The converse therefore must be true: if you are poor, it is because you do not deserve to be the elect of God. It is better for an economy not to take care of its weak, but to let them sink because we will be healthier.

If you project that sufficiently far, you should let your own mother and father die. You should let a sick child die. You should let the poor die. That is the Spencerian philosophy. It imbues the teaching of the Chicago school. That teaching was greatly influenced by Fredrich Von Baer.

Yes, it is, in a sense, efficient in cold, calculated economic terms; but society is made up of those impossible, unpredictable, pesky human beings whom you cannot easily put in a mathematical equation. Input, output, econometric models—those things deal with abstractions. Ordinary human beings do not want to be servants; they want to have something approximating the luxury of those who like to flaunt their luxury.

I remember wondering why Chrysler was objecting to increases in pay for its workers back in 1957 when its advertising line was: Move up to Chrysler. Abandon your Plymouth and move up to Chrysler. All advertising in this marvellous market economy of North America is telling us to move up to something or other. At the same time, do not ask for more money. That is the economics of Spencer, and Toryism in general.

There is no logic to it, because in the long run it will not work. There is a rebellion against the consumption tax, because that tax, like it or not, is inequitable. It taxes the poor more harshly than the rich. The Tories think they can slip one through by saying: "We will give you a rebate." That rebate will disappear, because it is only partially indexed. It is typical Tory thinking about rebates.

It taxes the poor more harshly than the rich. The Tories think they can slip one through by saying: "We will give you a rebate." That rebate will disappear, because it is only partially indexed. It is typical Tory thinking about rebates. If people were less demanding, and if they were prepared to accept the prevailing available rate of wages, then there would be no unemployment. So in 1985, we had in Saskatchewan—and I am sure the 1985 figures are comparable with those of today—an allowance for a four-member family on welfare of $600 per month—$600 per month for four people. Every dollar that the father or mother earned on the side to make the lives of the children a little better was immediately taken away. That is 100 per cent taxation.

Mr. Jacques Parizeau demonstrated, in his green paper introduced in the last year that he was finance minister in Quebec—that is not so long ago—that the take-away rate—in other words the taxation rate of the earnings of someone on welfare—was much more than 100 per cent, because those people not only lost the whole amount of what they earned in excess of their welfare, but they also lost free dental care for the children, subsidized rent, and so on. Then people turn around and say, "They tried to hide this. They are cheaters." Hell, if the children were starving and the parents cheated to ease the hunger of the children, I take my hat off to them. Those parents are good citizens and good parents. Of course, they do not have expensive accountants and expensive tax lawyers to do their cheating for them in a socially-acceptable way so that they may live high off the hog at the expense of other taxpayers. The gnashing of teeth, the wailing and lamentation when someone tries to suggest that expense account luncheons should not be deductible, is unbelievable: "My God, we will not be able to make business deals unless we are bombing one anothers' minds with Perrier. We have to be allowed to go to an expensive restaurant. How else can we be true Tories, unless someone's face is ground under our heal?" I am talking about the extremes of the Tory philosophy, but it is at the bottom, at the pit of the stomach of Tory economic and political thinking. Compassion is not there.

However, I do not expect compassion from Tories, but I would like to see some scholarly understanding of the issues. There is no doubt that, although the Tories hate and have always hated it, income tax is superior to direct taxation. One of the great experts on taxation in North America is not a Canadian. However, what he has had to say is relevant because what we do here in Canada is so influenced by the United States. For example, when they went to open classrooms, we went to open classrooms. However, we went to open classrooms 10 years later when the United States had discovered they did not work. We seem to pick up every bad habit of the Americans with a lag and imitate it after they have found that—excuse my cough; I am not losing my voice. I do not want any of you to fear that I will not be able to regale you endlessly on every subject under the sun—

Senator Frith: Good. I was getting worried.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. If I have to be brought here in an ambulance I will be here, all the time.

In any event, there is a piece by Professor Richard Goode in a collection of essays called "What should be Taxed, Income or Expenditures?" It is quite brief, honourable senators will be glad to know. The quotation is only about 23 pages, so it will not take too long. He is arguing the superiority of the income tax over the consumption tax, and this is what we are talking about. I shall give the Hansard reporters the titles, and I shall read verbatim unless I am interrupted. However, I do not see Senator Simard or Senator Barootes, although Senator David, who occasionally interrupts, is here.

Senator David: How many pages will you read?

Senator Gigantès: Not very many, about 23 or 24. Mind you, it is in small type and there are many lines. In any event, Professor Goode has this to say:

> Although the possibility of a direct tax on consumption expenditures has attracted support from distinguished economists since John Stuart Mill, it has not figured prominently in public or political debate. Recently efforts have been made to broaden interest in the subject in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Sweden. The report of the U.S. Department of Treasury, Blue Print for Basic Tax Reform . . . and in the United Kingdom, the Meade committee report supported the principle of expenditure taxation and treated in some detail the design of an expenditure tax and its effects. In Sweden . . .

Even socialists go wrong; that is why I am a Liberal. Professor Goode went on:

> In Sweden a Government Commission on Taxation requested a study of the expenditure tax, and in its final report, presented in 1977, noted advantages of that tax, though it remained uncertain whether personal expenditure is a more suitable tax base than income. These reports and other recent discussions may help attract the attention of moulders of public opinion and politicians.
> Only two countries—India and Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon)—have actually experimented with an expenditure tax.

This was at the time that Goode was writing, in 1980. He went on to say:

> In each country the tax was adopted as a minor supplement to the income tax, in response to a persuasive report by Nicholas Kaldor.

There were two Hungarian economists operating in Britain. One was called Kaldor and the other was called Beloff, and they were known as "Buddha and Pest." One worked for the Tories and the other for the Labour Party. Goode goes on:

> Both countries abandoned the expenditure tax after brief trials. Sri Lanka tried it again in 1976, but in 1977 decided to give it up a second time. In proposing its repeal for the second time, the minister of finance of Sri Lanka characterized the expenditure as "unworkable and impracticable in an economy like that of Sri Lanka."
> This paper argues that the income tax is superior to the expenditure tax. After brief comments on the nature of the two taxes, there follows a comparison of them with respect to equity, efficient allocation of economic resources, and compatibility with the full utilization of resources.

These are the key points economically, because if there is no equity there will not be sufficient compliance, and if there is no efficient allocation of resources and compatibility with the full allocation, the economy will not work well. Goode is going to argue and, in my view, prove that expenditure taxation is much less efficient than income tax.

> The discussion is conducted initially on the assumption that both taxes are well designed and administered and without regard to the special problems arising from the existing remediable defects of the income tax or from the transition to an expenditure tax. Consideration is then given to some of these problems and to the complications caused by inflation. They lead to some remarks on the practicality of the expenditure tax and on the combination of that tax with other taxes.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (1500)

> These sections, however, are greatly abbreviated, since the technical features of the expenditure tax and the possibility of using the expenditure tax as a supplement to other taxes are treated in more detail in other papers.

I would highly recommend that reading. This particular book is called What Should Be Taxed: Income or Expenditure? edited by Joseph A. Pechman—Studies of Government Finance: The Brookings Institution.

This book goes on to state:

> The income tax is initially assumed to be a comprehensive tax, with income defined essentially as proposed by Schanz-Haig-Simons (S-H-S) and many other supporters of the tax. According to this definition, income is the accretion to power to consume. It consists of a person's actual consumption plus or minus any increase or decrease in the value of his power to consume in the future as measured by his net worth.
> The base of an expenditure tax has been less discussed. Here it is initially assumed to equal S-H-S income less net saving (or plus net dissaving). Broadly, net saving is equal to the increase in a person's net worth (net dissaving, to the decrease in net worth). Certain difficult conceptual problems, having mainly to do with the distinction between intermediate and final goods and with fringe benefits of employment, relate to the definition of both income and consumption. But some of the troublesome problems in the measurement of S-H-S income would be irrelevant or unimportant in the measurement of taxable consumption. The most prominent of these are depreciation (capital consumption) allowances and increases or decreases in the value of investments held at the end of the tax period (accrued but unrealized capital gains or losses). Appreciation in the value of a dwelling, a work of art, or another durable good used by the owner should be taken into account in assessing his taxable consumption because the appreciation implies that the annual service value of the durable good has increased.

I am sure that those of you who are interested in such matters are following this excellent text by Mr. Goode in some detail, although I do not have very high hopes. He goes on to say:

> Except for increases in nominal values caused by inflation, however, these gains appear to constitute only a small part of consumption. Their omission from the base of an expenditure tax would be far less significant than is the omission of accrued capital gains on all kinds of assets from the base of the income tax.

As you can see, he is very fair in beginning to lay the ground work. He goes on to state:

> Recent discussions have maintained that an expenditure tax is equivalent to an income tax on a base excluding the yield of capital. This proposition and its implications are examined in a later section.

The author then goes on to deal with the subject of equity. He says:

> An equitable tax system must take proper account of ability to pay. This may be defined as "the capacity for paying without undue hardship on the part of the person paying or an unacceptable degree of interference with objectives that are considered socially important by other members of the community." The idea that ability should be measured by a comprehensive index is attractive. Lately it has been argued that a person's "endowment" is the best indicator of ability to pay. Endowment, in a broad sense, includes not only the value of the marketable goods one can consume but also the value of the time one can devote to leisure activities and household production. The restriction of taxation to marketable activities omits important aspects of welfare and therefore results in an incomplete measure of ability to pay. However, the concept of endowment is nonoperational, since all will agree that no practicable way of evaluating it exists.
> Indicators of ability to pay. The meaningful question is whether actual income or consumption is a better indicator of ability to pay. In my view, the total increase in a person's power to consume marketable output has greater intuitive appeal as an indicator of ability to pay than the exercise of the power to consume has.

Senator Doody: Are we breaking new ground?

Senator Gigantès: I was asking Senator Corbin to what extent he wanted me to push my instructing. Senator Corbin, being merciful and more attuned, I suppose, to how realistically one can expect senators opposite to absorb any of this while hearing it—it is a difficult subject matter and hard to absorb while hearing it; it really has to be—has suggested that another 15 or 20 minutes will be enough.

Senator Doody: Is Senator Corbin instructing you?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, so that there is no misunderstanding, I do not instruct anyone in this place. I do not instruct the government and I do not instruct my colleagues.

For the information of Senator Doody, I can say that Senator Gigantès simply wanted to know if he was trespassing on my time because I intend to speak at some point this afternoon. He simply wanted to ensure that I will be given enough time to make my remarks. It is an "accommodation," if you wish to call it anything.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Senator Corbin: We are always very courteous to each other, as we are to you.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Corbin's opinions on exercises, such as the one in which I am engaged, have much more bearing on what I do than he is willing to say. I listen to him with great respect. "Discipline" is what it is called. I am using my naval training. I would not say "military" because people would think I was in the army. I will abridge my remarks to some extent.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh no!

Senator Doody: Say it ain't so.

Senator Gigantès: All right, I won't.

The text continues as follows:

> Advocates of an expenditure tax tend to contrast an idealized version of that tax with the existing imperfect income tax. Experience has familiarized us with the problems associated with the taxation of income but not with those that would arise in taxing consumption. It may be reasonable to prefer the expenditure tax if careful consideration leads to the judgment that it would be easier to apply a comprehensive expenditure tax than to remedy the defects of the income tax. Acceptance or rejection of such a judgment should take into account conceptual problems, practical difficulties, and politics.

That is one thing you did not take into account with this tax. It goes on as follows:

> While recognizing that a more thorough study and extended discussion are needed, I shall touch on some of the issues.

The next paragraph is headed "Gifts and Bequests" and it states:

> The treatment of gifts and bequests poses similar problems under the income tax and the expenditure tax. If these items are included in income and consumption, the need for a suitable averaging system is accentuated. In my opinion, gratuitous transfers can be better treated under a separate tax on gifts and estates, or on accessions, than under either the income tax or the expenditure tax.

• (1510)

Perhaps it was a mistake to do away with the inheritance tax.

> Legislators have shown no inclination to classify receipts of gifts and bequests as income, and there is no reason to expect them to consider these items as consumption of the donors.

The next section deals with inflation. It would not be feasible to make the satisfactory adjustment for inflation under the income tax, say those who criticize tax.

> Although some of the main items in the income statements and balance sheets of business enterprises and the basis of assets for capital gains tax could be adjusted—the argument runs—appropriate allowances for changes in the real value of cash balances and certain other monetary assets and liabilities could not be made. Under the expenditure tax it might be advisable to index the rate brackets and personal exemptions, but items entering into the tax base would need much less adjustment than under the income tax. This is a valid argument so far as it goes. But it should be noted that, according to the recommendations of Blueprints for Basic Tax Reform, the items that would be most difficult to index for inflation under the income tax—currency holdings and checking > accounts—would not be registered or qualified assets for the expenditure tax—as they are not in this tax, > —and they might not be so classified under the Meade committee proposals.

Those are proposals for moving to an expenditure tax, which have much influenced the thinking behind the GST.

> If they were not registered, saving in the form of additions to cash balances would be taxed as consumption, regardless of whether the additions were necessary to maintain the real value of the holdings.
> I find it remarkable, moreover, that advocates of the expenditure tax, who are ready to base tax policy on the assumptions of efficient capital markets, rational planning by individuals, and full employment, presume that inflation will continue. If other problems can be solved or assumed away, why not inflation too?

Honourable senators may remember a speech I gave the other day. I showed you a way of fighting inflation other than by interest rates. Goode continues:

> I doubt that it would be prudent to adjust the tax system to make us more comfortable with chronic inflation. Much can be said for the contention that, in conditions of moderate inflation, an unadjusted income tax helps compensate for inequities and also slows inflation.

This is from 1980.

The next section deals with capital gains.

> The prevailing, though not unanimous, opinion is that the application of the income tax to capital gains and losses on an accrual rather than a realization basis would not be practicable. Taxing gains only when realized diminishes the equity of the income tax and imposes a tax penalty on changing investments. This penalty may lock in investors in appreciated assets. It would not occur under the expenditure tax.

Goode says that there are international aspects of the choice between an income tax and an expenditure tax that extend from technical complexities to sensitive political issues.

> These have been largely neglected by American advocates of the expenditure tax. They have been considered systematically by the Meade committee and by Lodin, but on several points doubts and difficulties have not been fully resolved.

The next section deals with the transition to an expenditure tax.

> Important transition problems would affect persons of mature years who had accumulated savings under the income tax regime in the expectation that these could be drawn down to finance consumption during retirement. They would be faced with a radical change in the rules of the game and would have to pay a graduated expenditure tax on the use of their savings . . .
> Unless it were considered acceptable to allow full exemption from expenditure tax of consumption financed out of assets held at the time of transition—which seems to me quite unlikely—widespread tax evasion could occur. At the time of transition a person might conceal his assets and later liquidate them without reporting the proceeds, thereby financing consumption that would not enter into the tax base, computed either by the comparison of balance sheets or on the basis of cash flows.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Goode continues:

> Finally, the items that are commonly classified as examples of the erosion of the income tax base, or "tax expenditures," should be considered. Is it likely that they would be more rigorously and equitably treated under an expenditure tax?

This is something that business people should worry about before they support the GST.

> Although some of them—notably tax deferral through qualified pension plans, retirement plans for the self-employed, and individual retirement accounts—move the income tax in the direction of an expenditure tax, I do not think they reflect a deliberate decision . . . to favor saving, nor do I detect any trend in that direction.

They talk that way but it is not true. What they are doing here, actually, is trying to combine the expenditure tax with other taxes.

> An income tax imposes a check on both consumption and wealth accumulation. Replacement of the income tax by an expenditure tax would allow accumulations of wealth that . . . would be objectionable unless a significant wealth tax were also levied.

Of course, one cannot expect the Conservatives to think along those lines.

> The expenditure tax would impose a check on accumulation only if gifts and bequests were included in the taxable consumption of donors—a step that has not generally been proposed. In the absence of an annual wealth tax or heavy taxes on gifts and bequests or accessions, the substitution of an expenditure tax for the income tax would be likely to result in an unacceptable degree of inequality of wealth.

Now, Kaldor, whom I mentioned earlier,

> . . . visualized the expenditure tax as a comparatively minor supplement to the income tax, and the two countries that accepted his advice, India and Sri Lanka, took that approach.

Which is what we are doing here.

> In the United Kingdom the maintenance of lavish standards of living by rich people using up their wealth impressed Kaldor as a social evil that should be combated by taxation.

In conclusion, since others may want to join this debate—it is quite technical, I admit—when one examines the arguments in favour of the expenditure tax, one finds them incorrect, doubtful or valid but unconvincing.

> The brilliance and literary ability of its advocates cannot be denied. Indeed, they have been far cleverer than the supporters of the income tax. The members of the expenditure tax faction speak of the double taxation of saving and the justness of taxing people on what they withdraw from the common pool. They use harvest metaphors that have a reassuring sound of rustic virtue. They compare a perfect expenditure tax with an income tax whose defects are well known, thanks to the efforts of its supporters. And they sometimes call the tax that they favor an income tax. The members of the income tax faction have not responded by talking about the exemption of unearned income under the expenditure tax or by being ironical about the "abstinence" of the rich. They are preoccupied with financially sophisticated transactions and sound like city slickers. They are acutely conscious of the shortcomings of the existing income tax and are busy measuring and publicizing these. Perhaps they do not bother to attack the expenditure tax because they know they have both good arguments and the weight of inertia on their side.

Goode says he is convinced that the income tax is clearly superior to the expenditure tax, and he summarizes:

> Income is better than consumption as a measure of ability to pay, and the reduction of income inequality is a more meaningful political objective of taxation than the lessening of consumption inequality.

I think it is important to repeat that:

> . . . the reduction of income inequality is a more meaningful political objective of taxation than the lessening of consumption inequality.

If we are interested in political stability and social harmony, it is a very important sentence.

> As regards efficiency of resource allocation, both a comprehensive income tax and a comprehensive expenditure tax have advantages; here a clear-cut choice between the two taxes does not emerge. If full utilization of resources could be assured, any increase in saving that might be desired could more easily and certainly be obtained by reducing the budget deficit than by replacing the income tax with an expenditure tax.

That is what I was saying earlier. You could have reduced your budget deficit by a total of $85 billion over the past six years, but you failed to do it. So now you are going to tax the poor a little more in order to pay for your spendthrift habits.

● (1520)

> Although it would be much less difficult to adjust for inflation under the expenditure tax than under the income tax, some versions of the expenditure tax that have recently been proposed would not go much beyond what would be feasible under the income tax, because they would not exclude from the tax base additions to cash balances needed to maintain their real value. Furthermore, the advisability of inflation adjustment is questionable. A shift to the expenditure tax would involve transition problems and could be disturbing to international tax relations, capital flows, and the movement of people. It is unrealistic to expect that in practice the expenditure tax would be free of loopholes and other special provisions similar to those that have caused dissatisfaction with the income tax.

Tax-free caviar for Mr. Wilson's colleagues on the stock market, but taxed four ounce cans of yogurt.

> The substitution of an expenditure tax for the income tax would open the way to unacceptable accumulations of personal wealth.

I will repeat this.

> The substitution of an expenditure tax for the income tax would open the way to unacceptable accumulations of personal wealth unless special taxes on wealth were introduced.

I maintain that, as in other countries, this is the first step towards moving more and more of the revenue-gathering by government to expenditure taxation, which would, of course, as Goode says, produce unacceptable accumulations of personal wealth—unacceptable from the point of view of social peace, social harmony, but not, of course, unacceptable to Mr. Wilson who says that what this country needs is more rich people.

> Although such taxes would have merits of their own, their use would be inconsistent with some of the principal arguments for the expenditure tax and would entail considerable problems of administration and compliance.

He is talking of special taxes on wealth. If you are going to have expenditure of tax, to try to correct its misdeeds for a wealth tax, you are getting to a system that is too complicated and too difficult.

> Recent attention to the cash flow version of the expenditure tax has not turned up any ideas that, in Goode's opinion, could eliminate the long-held doubts about the practicality of and personal expenditure tax with wide coverage and large yield.

I have skipped a lot, and perhaps I have not done justice to what Goode is saying. What Goode is saying is that an expenditure tax favours the rich. There is no way of getting away from it. It favours the rich and it hits at the poor and the lower middle class. Adam Smith said that in 1776. Adam Smith, if read—and he is not read by those who quote him correctly—was really wary of the tendency of the well off to grind the faces of the poor.

Senator Stewart: That is right.

Senator Gigantès: What we are seeing here in bill C-62 is the first step towards a change in the tax system, and, as another step—because we have the considerable reduction of corporate rates of taxation—the increase in the taxation of the poor and the lower middle class and the non-increase in the taxation of the rich. We are seeing the first step towards moving revenue collection to expenditure taxation more and more, which is part of the pattern that makes for greater increase in personal wealth, and an increase in the inequality of income which is already grave in this country. If we take the differentials between the salaries of presidents of companies in North America and that of a skilled worker, we find they increase in ratio 40 times. If we look at the same ratios for United Germany or Japan, we see that it is between five and seven times. That is why, I submit, they have more efficient production, because they do not feel they are being run by somebody too high for them to talk to, or too high to care about them, because they have organizational charts that are flat with just one knob at the top, instead of very steep pyramids which are characteristic of North America, France and Britain. The United States, Canada, France and Britain are inefficient economies compared to Germany, and Japan, compared with countries that are making great strides in improving their productivity. There is an element of social justice there, an element of taking care not to have too much inequality in income, because inequality in income is translated, in the minds of those who have to work hard—the servants, in other words—as uncaring behaviour towards them, and they will not produce.

That is why I would like the whole of bill C-62 rejected; but if you insist on putting through this iniquitous tax temporarily—because we will abolish it—then, at least, do not de-index the protection for the poor.

Thank you.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I wonder whether I could ask you a question, Senator Gigantès.

You gave us a remarkable hour-and-a-half long speech. I am not sure I could summarize the last part of your speech which I did find very interesting, nevertheless.

Senator Tremblay: We can't hear you, Senator David.

Senator David: Excuse me. Should I start all over again? I will simply start with a summary of my first question.

At the bottom of the page, the French version of the amendment, small "b" on page 296, reads:

. . . en remplaçant les lignes 39 à 41 par ce qui suit:

So several lines are to be replaced by the following:

"rajusté du particulier pour l'année sur $24 800."

Could you perhaps tell me whether it is a matter of changing figures? You don't seem to have very—

Senator Gigantès: This is not a change in figures, it is supposed to be indexed—

• (1530)

Senator David: Is the $24,800 supposed to be indexed?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that is the amount that is supposed to be indexed.

Senator David: Thank you. I thought you talked mainly about the tax credit amounts.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: I talked about the credits, but both the amount and the credits are supposed to be indexed.

If the $24,800 is not indexed, indexing the credits won't do any good. You have to index this figure which, as a result, indexes the credit, and in order not to reduce the accreditation rate, that has to be indexed as well.

Senator David: If I understand correctly, both the figure itself and the credits will be indexed, so that it all boils down to the same thing if you index both?

Senator Gigantès: It doesn't boil down to the same thing. It will remain at the same level in terms of constant dollars, at the level we indicated today, instead of dropping in value every year if inflation is over 3 per cent.

Senator David: Thank you for clearing that up. You said you had absolutely no confidence in adjustments. In fact, your tone reflected a complete lack of confidence in the present government which never took any action in this respect.

If I remember correctly, and unfortunately, I don't have the figures in front of me, it seems to me there were several adjustments of tax credits and family allowances in recent years. If we compare these tax credit adjustments with indexation, the adjustments were a far better deal for poor families than indexation. However, to be quite sure I would have to check the figures.

I wonder if you could get those figures for me, your knowledge being so great?

Senator Gigantès: I don't have them here. You will recall that various organizations that are concerned about the incomes of Canadians at the bottom of the ladder in our society, told us this year that these people's real incomes, if you consider all the changes that were made, had dropped by $1,500 since the Conservatives came to power.

So, after all these adjustments and all this fancy footwork, the bottom line, as you people are so fond of saying, is that these people have less money today, less puchasing power, than they did before you came to power.

Senator David: You did not answer a very specific question I asked. I told you that as far as I knew, the adjustments that were made were far more worthwhile in terms of the amount they produced than indexation of the initial amounts would have been.

In fact, you failed to give me a straight answer to a very simple question.

Senator Gigantès: Senator David, I am sorry, but do you want me to tell a poor person that what counts is this or that figure? I say that what counts for that person is his purchasing power.

The Mulroney government's actions since 1984 have reduced the purchasing power of low-income Canadians. That is quite clear.

Senator David: My third question is more difficult. You compared at length the Americans' fiscal policy with our policy. You said that if we had imitated or copied the American formula to some extent, we could have reduced the national debt by $83 billion.

Senator Gigantès: It was $85 billion, Senator David.

Senator David: I wasn't far off with my $83 billion!

Senator Gigantès: Not bad at our age!

Senator David: And how! Not to mention the fact that I am older than you are!

Senator Gigantès: No way, you look younger than I do!

Senator David: And this is on the basis of corporate taxes and interest rates.

I simply want to know whether the United States levy two-tier corporate taxes—that is the central and the state administrations—as we do here at two levels, federal and provincial?

Senator Gigantès: Senator David, this is why I referred to total taxes. I had this sheet distributed and I can do so again because I have it in my office. It is the total taxes paid on corporate profits expressed as a percentage of the gross national product. It includes taxes at all levels. Therefore total U.S. corporate taxes on profits are higher than in Canada. The Americans take a bigger corporate tax bite than we do here, yet none of the companies has left the United States to come here, quite the contrary.

Senator David: I appreciate your willingness to send me that table. If I understand correctly, it includes all systems, Canadian and American both, that is provincial and federal taxes on the Canadian side, and all taxes levied by the central and state administrations in the United States.

I did not quite understand your reference to Mr. Parizeau's remarks concerning social welfare in Quebec. You seem to be saying that it is not normal—or something to that effect—that welfare recipients who hold part-time jobs be subject to taxation.

I fail to see where that fits in your argument. I should like to have more information, if only because I probably missed the import of such deep thinking.

Senator Gigantès: I quoted from a Green Paper released when Mr. Parizeau was Quebec Minister of Finance in which he proposed—I am not quite sure but I think it was on an experimental basis—a universal minimum guaranteed income scheme.

Part of this Green Paper describes the inequities and shortcomings of the current social welfare system in Quebec and elsewhere. It indicates that we are confining the very poor people to their sorry plight because of the minimum amount of benefits they received.

Not only do they lack any incentive to work and improve their standard of living, but on top of that, if they try to improve their lot, we tax them. In 1985, in Saskatchewan, they were being taxed at 100 per cent, which means that they were deprived of the total amount they had earned. In Quebec, Mr. Parizeau said that it was over 100 per cent, because they would lose not only the dollars they had earned on top of their social welfare benefits, but they lost also part of their benefits as welfare recipients. He said that this could mean much more than 100 per cent of their earnings.

Mr. Parizeau felt that such a system did not make much sense. He was right.

Senator David: What did Mr. Parizeau propose to replace this incongruous system?

Senator Gigantès: I had an interview with him which I summarized to his satisfaction in the Senate Report entitled Il n'y a que le travail qui vaille, published in December 1987.

He felt that we should be moving toward a minimum gauranteed income system. Ideally, there would be an income threshold over which the recipient would pay income tax to the State and under which he would receive benefits.

As I mentioned on previous occasions, I asked the Parliamentary Library Research Service to look into this issue. Mrs. Marion Wrobel carried out a very good study which is available. Her findings were that the problems and the complexity of the whole issue are such that it would be probably impossible to abolish the current system and that we can only hope to improve it. There would be too many exemptions. Then, what would we do? Personally, I had suggested some parameters, namely that a universal guaranteed minimum income scheme should not exceed the current expenditures earmarked for Old Age Security pensions, unemployment benefits, etc. The cost of the garanteed income scheme should not exceed the cost of the current "social safety net".

Such a system would reduce the incomes of senior citizens and of the unemployed reaching, say, age 55. Overnight, after having contributed all their lives to the unemployment insurance fund, they would receive a lot less money that they could rightfully expect, in view of the social contract and the commitment made to them.

Therefore, we could only adopt this system by informing those who are now joining the labour force that when they are unemployed or when they reach retirement age, they would get the guaranteed minimum income, but would no longer be eligible for the Old Age Security pension, the Unemployment Insurance benefits, or the Social Welfare benefits. The situation would be exactly the same for everybody because now they would have entered a new contract.

However, the administrative complexity of having several categories of people operating under different systems was such that the ideal economy Milton Freedman proposed, when he was the first to do so, did not exist. it would have cost more. It would have been too complicated to administer.

[English]

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I do not intend to respond to Senator Gigantès's exhaustive treatment of the issue this afternoon. Most of you in this chamber know that my remarks, because of my interests, will be directed to social fairness, and I think the record of the government is important. Senator Gigantès is somewhat concerned about that, and so, before I speak to the amendment before us on the indexation of the GST credit, I will speak specifically about certain issues related to the Government's record on fairness in the sales tax system. I believe, honourable senators, it is important to get the record straight and understand precisely what has been happening over the last six years.

The achievement of greater fairness in the sales tax system has been a fundamental objective of the government since coming to office. The government has worked to eliminate the special treatment that used to permit those of greater means to pay less tax. Consequently, higher income Canadians and profitable corporations now pay taxes which are more commensurate with their earnings. We converted the personal exemptions and many deductions to tax credits to improve fairness, and reduced or eliminated many special tax breaks. We also eliminated or reduced many special corporate tax breaks and broadened the tax base so that many more profitable corporations now pay taxes.

In the 1989 budget the government announced a new large corporations' tax for Canadian corporate capital in excess of $10 million. Effective January 1, 1991 large corporations' taxes will be increased by 15 per cent. This tax will help ensure that big business pays its fair share of taxes. I think it is important that this happens.

In 1986 the government introduced the sales tax credit where none existed before. This credit was enhanced in 1988, again in 1989, and again in 1990. These increases almost tripled the amount of the credit, far exceeding the rate of inflation.

The proposed goods and services tax is designed to further improve the fairness of taxation in Canada. Under the GST the distribution of the tax burden will be more progressive. Wealthy Canadians will pay their fair share. They will not be able to avoid the GST. They tend to consume more and will therefore pay more on average in sales tax.

With the GST credit, families with incomes up to $30,000 per year will have more after-tax income than they do now. This includes three-quarters of families headed by seniors or single parents, and totals some 8.7 million families and individuals who will receive credit cheques.

Before the government introduced the refundable sales tax credits in 1986, low income Canadians paid much more federal sales tax as a percentage of their income than those in higher income brackets. With the introduction of the GST the refundable sales tax credit will be enhanced once again. The monetary value of the credit will be increased and the income eligibility threshold to receive the credit will be raised. As a result, lower and modest income earners will pay much less as a percentage of their income than those in higher income brackets.

For these reasons, the GST credit has been recognized by experts as a major advance in Canadian social policy, and I believe that is very important.

As well, basic groceries, of course, and residential rates will be exempt under the GST, further reducing the tax burden on lower and modest income Canadians.

[Senator Robertson.]

As to indexation, the intentions and record of the government are quite clear. The GST credit will be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate. This is the approach used with the child tax credit which, since 1985, has been increased in excess of the rate of inflation. Senator David has since left the chamber, but I believe that was one of the points he was referring to in his questions to Senator Gigantès. I believe the actions of the government speak for themselves. Its fiscal initiatives show a commitment to a fairer tax system and to the targeting of assistance to those in need. Therefore, I believe the amendments to Bill C-62 are not necessary.

The new GST credit is a substantial improvement in the design and implementation of fairness in the sales tax system. First, the amounts have been increased. The new GST credit will be set at $190 per adult and $100 per child. Second, single parents will be able to claim an adult credit in respect of one dependent child. In addition, single adults, including single parents and seniors, of course, who maintain their own household, will be able to claim an additional credit of up to $100. This is a major change from the existing system which recognizes the special circumstances of single parents, single adults and students.

Third, the threshold at which the amount of credit begins to be reduced has been raised from $18,000 to about $25,000. This means that many more families will receive credits under the GST as compared to the current system. Surely that has to be fair. The GST credit will be paid before expenses are made in four equal instalments so that Canadians will have their credits in hand before they pay the GST.

Senator Simard: If the Liberals do not stall it.

Senator Robertson: That is right, if they do not stall it too long. We hope to pay it in advance, and a lot of people are waiting for their cheques. This is a major innovation, of course, which substantially improves the fairness of the sales tax system. So you can see that the GST credit is a major improvement over the current federal sales tax system.

Regarding the amendment at hand, whether the GST credit should be fully indexed to inflation is really the issue. The report suggests that because the GST credit is not fully indexed to inflation it will erode over time. The government has ensured that Canadians with incomes less than $30,000 will be better off after sales tax reform than they are now. This figure has been repeated before, but I want to repeat it again. The one-earner couple with two children will be $245 better off.

I know honourable senators will say: Where do you get those figures? When I say the Department of Finance and other consultants to that department, they say, "Well, that does not matter because we really cannot accept the Department of Finance figures."

• (1550)

I think, in fairness, having looked at other studies in this regard, that the first few months of the GST will probably not show the numbers by which people will be better off. It will take a little maturing before those numbers begin to show, and probably, after the first six months, you will see the savings falling in place quite accurately with the projections of the Department of Finance. After the GST has been in place for six to eight months, it will be interesting to look again at these projections. So much work has been done on this analysis that I do not feel at all uncomfortable with the results.

However, as with other credits and thresholds in the income tax system, the GST credit will be indexed to increases in inflation in excess of 3 per cent. That seems to be the problem. It will also be reviewed periodically and adjusted as appropriate. Let me demonstrate how this approach of reviewing periodically, and adjusting when it is appropriate, ensures that people are better off. It has worked in the past for lower and modest-income Canadians, and I am sure that it will in the future. Since its introduction in 1986, the sales tax credit has been increased regularly. In 1986 the maximum benefits were $50 per adult and $25 per child. These benefits were paid to families with net incomes of $15,000 or less.

The credit was enhanced in 1988 to $70 per adult and $35 per child, and the maximum benefits were then paid to people with incomes of $16,000 or less.

In the 1989 budget further increases to the credit were announced. For 1989, maximum benefits will be $100 per adult and $50 per child. These amounts will be further increased in 1990 to $140 per adult and $70 per child. The maximum income threshold will rise to $18,000. Over all, the value of the existing credit has been increased from about $300 million, when it was first introduced, to somewhere around $1.2 billion for this year. This more than offsets any increases in inflation and adjustments to the tax rates. The important point to note is that these increases are in excess of inflation even though there is no automatic mechanism for introducing them. I am sure that the government will be following the same practice with the GST credit. Likewise, even though it is not fully indexed, because of the goodwill demonstrated by the government in the past, I do not think we have to worry about indexing fully this particular tax credit.

Mr. Ken Battle, the Director of the National Council of Welfare, appeared before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee in September and said at that time:

> The main thing that we like about the sales tax, from the point of view of its impact on poor Canadians, is that the government is proposing to substantially increase the credit.
> That is nothing to sneeze at; it is something we have been pushing for some years, and we welcome it. The sales tax credit is going to be increased substantially beyond where it would have reached by 1991 under the old Manufacturers' Sales Tax.

Senator Thériault: Read everything he said!

Senator Robertson: That is an interesting comment by Mr. Battle, and I am sure there will be more debate in this regard.

I am sorry that Senator MacEachen is not in the chamber right now. Perhaps he will come later and will be reminded by someone that today is the ninth anniversary of his infamous budget.

Senator Simard: Oh, tell us more.

Senator Robertson: There were so many changes in that particular budget that it was withdrawn totally.

Senator Thériault: And that is what should happen with the last one! Admit that you are wrong and withdraw it!

Senator Robertson: Have you finished shouting, Senator Thériault? Subsequently, as you well know, the Prime Minister had to withdraw the minister as well. It is interesting to note that this opposition—

Senator Corbin: Let's not be partisan now.

Senator Robertson: Oh, please—to the GST is being led by this financial wizard—

Senator Barootes: Wizard or lizard?

Senator Graham: Be careful over there!

Senator Robertson: —who is now trying to prove to the people that it is wrong for the country. There is one sensible thing that came from that budget speech or the documents that resulted from it. One document said the following:

> The federal sales tax which is imposed at the manufacturers' level suffers from a number of structural defects. These have been the subject of extensive review and comment. The most serious consequence of these defects is that they place domestic manufacturers at a substantial competitive disadvantage in relation to importers.

I will not speak about the flip-flops of the new leader of the Liberal Party. He should perhaps be in the pancake business, or something.

In any event, there is another aspect to this debate. Perhaps we should be talking about credibility and honesty, and about hypocritical behaviour. When the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee—I am not a member of it, but I fill in from time to time—reported on Tuesday, December 1, 1987, some of its members were Senators Kirby, Buckwold, MacEachen, Perrault, and a few others. One of the main recommendations of that committee, which was studying the tax position of Canada, was that as soon as practicable the government should introduce legislation to implement a broad-based multi-stage sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

Senator Simard: A Liberal majority report.

Senator Robertson: Yes.

Senator Simard: That is good stuff, Brenda.

Senator Robertson: I must come back to Senator MacEachen. Surely the public sees through the shallowness of honourable senators opposite as they speak from both sides of their mouths.

Senator Simard: To put it mildly!

Senator Robertson: Let me refer honourable senators to the debate on Bill C-21, and, in particular, to comments by Senator MacEachen on May 22, 1990 as recorded in Debates of the Senate at page 1710. He is talking about closure, and he has said that it was not used at all in the 1970s, that it was used two or three times in the 1980s by the Liberal Government and that for over 22 years in Canadian history it was not used at all. He said that if he recalled the facts accurately, it was used only two or three times by the Liberal Government in the early 1980s. He went on to say:

> We will find that practice fell into disuse and then was revived, because it is part of the Standing Orders of the House of Commons and the Senate, presumably.

I am not sure whether Senator MacEachen or senators opposite see any difference between closure and time allocation, but, as you know, there is more debating time in the other house under closure than there is under time allocation. In any event, Senator MacEachen has said that it was rarely used in the 1980s. I should like to point out to honourable senators opposite that time allocation and closure—we might as well put them together, as they mean the same thing, except that one is more generous than the other with debating time—between 1980 and 1984 were used by the Liberal Government 27 times in that four-year period. From the period 1984 to 1988 they were used by the present government 22 times. I am pointing this out because members opposite have said repeatedly in this chamber that the Senate has to amend bills because they cannot get any amendments through the other chamber because the government is always using time allocation or closure to terminate the Opposition there. My point is that they seem to think that because closure and time allocation are supposedly being used more excessively than ever before in the other place, the Senate has repeatedly to make amendments. They then go on to say that this government never accepts any amendments from the Senate.

• (1600)

Senator Simard: They are twisting the truth.

Senator Robertson: Yes, I do believe they are twisting the truth.

Honourable senators, I have some figures here which date to June 7, 1990. Since there were no desk officers available in the other place, I was unable to update these figures. However, even in this last year—which seems to have upset senators opposite immensely—it has only been used 12 times, and this in a period of very difficult legislation demanding concentration and commitment to the improvement of Canada.

It is being said that the government of the day will never accept an amendment. I had the Library of Parliament compile for me all the amendments from the Senate that were accepted by the House of Commons between 1974 and 1984 and from 1984 to 1990. It is a comparison of ten years to six years. In the ten years I speak of, only nine amendments which came from the Senate were accepted by the Liberal government of the day.

Senator Simard: From the Liberal majority in the Senate.

Senator Robertson: Yes.

Senator Simard: Listen to this.

[Senator Robertson.]

Senator Frith: I can hear it. I can walk and chew gum at the same time. I can read this and listen.

Senator Robertson: You are very talented, senator. In the six years from 1984 to 1990, 15 such amendments were accepted by the House of Commons.

Honourable senators opposite say that we must do things in the Senate that have never been done before, because the House of Commons will not listen to debate. It is said that the government closes down debate and will not accept recommendations or amendments from this chamber. On this anniversary date of Senator MacEachen's infamous budget, it surely is a time to look at the hypocrisy of all of this. If honourable senators opposite wish, they may read the amendments I have just outlined.

Honourable senators, I would like to see a little honesty and fairness around here. I would like a recording of events as they were, not as some may want to remember them. When you are being offensive to someone, it is easy to forget how many times you were offensive to those opposite when you are on the receiving end.

There is another element that I find very strange about the present situation in the Senate. Some senators who worked on Bill C-21 will remember this. How many times did we hear about the infamous occasion when the Honourable John Crosbie said there would be no change in the UI? Because he said that on Friday, October 14, 1988, it was said that Bill C-21 should not pass—that there should be no changes to the UI. Now that we are dealing with the GST we have heard in committee and in this chamber that this tax was an unknown tax, that it was never mentioned during the last election campaign and that, therefore, this government has no business imposing this tax on the people. We have heard that argument at various times.

Senator Frith: We never said that.

Senator Robertson: We heard it in committee and we heard it in this chamber. I will go back and review the record of the chamber and find it.

Senator Frith: We did not know about this specific tax. Are you going to tell us that this specific tax was referred to?

Senator Robertson: It is just the same as using Mr. Crosbie's comment. You cannot use one situation without using the other. Sit still, Senator Frith, for heaven's sake!

Senator Frith: Relax, senator, for goodness' sake!

Senator Robertson: I have about 15 news clippings here of where Michael Wilson spoke to this tax.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: He spoke to this tax?

Senator Robertson: Yes.

Senator Frith: Put them on the record. Table them.

Senator Robertson: Oh, settle down!

Senator Frith: There is a rule in Parliament that if you refer to a document you must table it.

Senator Robertson: I will table everything.

Senator Simard: She will not do it because you asked. She volunteered. We do not need pressure from you.

Senator Frith: I just asked her to table some documents. What are you getting so excited about?

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I will not go on much longer.

Senator Simard: Please do.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I wish to quote a writer of whom I am not particularly fond but who has written some interesting things. Some of you may have heard of Margin of Error by Claire Hoy. On page 77 he writes:

> "The original idea on trade, which Marty—

He is referring to Marty Goldfarb.

> —suggested in a strategic survey before the election," says Webster,—

I believe Webster was the Executive Director of your campaign—> —"was to be used to harass the trust and credibility of Mulroney because Canadians did not believe the guy. Our numbers showed us that. Trade was supposed to be used to raise doubts about Brian Mulroney, as opposed to trade itself.

> "And the second front on the credibility issue was the national sales tax. We tried some other issues in the beginning, but they didn't catch on. At the end, when we wanted to switch to the sales tax, the leader refused to give other speeches except his free-trade core speech, the 'cause of his life' speech.

On page 133 of this book I found the following:

> On the November 2 show, for example, Goldfarb talked about the "extremely volatile" electorate, said it "looks like the Liberals have a shot at forming a government," but added that the numbers were "fragile." However, Goldfarb went on to talk about free trade and the leaders' personalities being important issues, and said the national sales tax was the "sleeper" that the Liberals could turn into a "big issue, just as they've done with free trade." That, of course, was precisely what the Liberals were hoping to do. Certainly Goldfarb was. He told the author in a post-campaign interview, "We begged him [Turner] and pushed him to get off free trade. We felt from our polling that the value-added tax was the best issue to go to. We tried, we really did. But you're dealing with an individual and he just wouldn't change.

Honourable senators, I quote this to highlight the foolishness in saying that no one knew about this tax. It is simply foolishness and hypocrisy to say that, and I would ask honourable senators to vote against this amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: We did not hear very much about indexation which is the subject of the amendment. Are you going to get to that later?

Senator Robertson: The hypocrisy is worse.

Senator Stanbury: She is in favour of the amendment.

• (1610)

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, after hearing that speech, I think I will keep to my notes.

Senator Frith: Good! Yes! Let's hear about indexing for a change!

Senator Corbin: I did not find one comment in Senator Robertson's remarks relevant to the amendment that is before us.

Senator Frith: She had fun, though! She had a jolly good time!

Senator Corbin: Yes, she had a jolly time. It would have been an excellent speech, Senator Robertson, for the election process, on the hustings—

Senator Frith: It must be worth something. Perhaps it has a certain therapeutic benefit.

Senator Corbin: —but I think it is totally unbecoming to the august character of this chamber. This is a place for sober second thought, Senator Robertson. It is obvious that you have been served a bad example by some of your old-time colleagues around this place, and I regret that very much, because I had been really looking forward to your positive and constructive suggestions during this debate and I am really disappointed.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, today more than ever before, the Tory Government seems to have lost every sense of the daily reality confronting Canadian.

For instance, 92 per cent of respondents in a Gallup poll taken between October 10 and 11 in the Atlantic region, were opposed to implementation of the GST. Neverthless, the government insists on storming like a raging bull through both chambers to impose the GST.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Would you entertain a question, Senator Corbin?

Senator Corbin: Actually, I would rather you waited until the end of my speech. But I will accommodate you, Senator Bolduc, provided your question is a serious one.

Senator Bolduc: Senator Corbin, you say that the public is very angry, that people are "mad as hell" across the country. However, people in Montreal organized a parade yesterday. That parade was something else! Do you know how many people were there? That is my question. How many people do you think took part in this parade yesterday in Montreal, Senator Corbin?

Senator Corbin: Senator Bolduc, you are asking the wrong person. Yesterday was Sunday, and I attended to my religious duties. If there were any parades, I was not aware of the fact.

Senator Bolduc: You don't keep up with current events.

Senator Corbin: Seldom with what is going on in Quebec. That is your problem, not mine. As a senator I represent the Maritime provinces division: Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. From time to time, I listen to constructive suggestions from Canada's other regions.

At a time when this country is going through a serious recession, the government still does not seem convinced that its GST will have a devastating impact on the Canadian economy. Day in, day out, during the last few months, we hear about plant closures, about businesses closing down, about hundreds, thousands and hundreds of thousands of layoffs and about a great number of bankruptcies. This recession is having a severe impact on millions of Canadians. It took the Minister of Finance a long time to admit that we were, in fact, in a recession. Some economists go even further and say that some regions and sectors of our economy are actually in a depression.

What is the government proposing to alleviate the impact of this crisis? Almost nothing.

It may wake up some day when it is too late. But be assured that the price to pay then unfortunately will be much higher because of all the bankruptcies.

Like a kamikaze heading for disaster, Hon. Michael Wilson, our Minister of Finance, could not care less about the consequences of his policy on Canadians. This Minister of Finance has completely lost the confidence of Canadians ages ago.

By the way, Mr. Wilson and his colleagues could envy the credibility of a shady horse dealer. Although this government is well aware that it enjoys very little credibility and popularity, it is determined to administer on Canadians a very bad medicine which they reject and, what is worse, it does it at the worst time possible.

Canadians will be used as guinea pigs for the economic policies of a government which has apparently lost all credibility. In addition to this recession, the country is living through very difficult times at the constitutional level. Its unity seems to be increasingly in jeopardy.

The man who had presented himself as a great national conciliator who would put our public finances on a sounder footing is bringing Canada to the brink of disaster. Canada is living its darkest hours. History will judge very harshly the administration of the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney.

This famous GST, which has become the hobby-horse of this government, will bring about the worst taxation scheme in the world. Countries with such a taxation system are unitary countries. Canada is a federation with two levels of government and with definitely shared jurisdiction in some areas and quite separate jurisdiction in others.

That i s the very reason why our neighbour to the South have given up on the idea of such a taxation scheme. Under our present federal system, it would be ridiculous to revamp our present taxation system as a unitary one before being first assured of the co-operation of all the provinces.

This lack of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments will surely result in total chaos. Nevertheless, such a likelihood has not dampened the government's enthusiasim for this tax.

Some government members seem much less convinced of the benefits of such a tax. Some senators opposite have given up their principles in the name of party loyalty. Fortunately there are still men and women of principle left in politics.

For instance, let us take the case of Mr. Yves Séguin, a former Quebec Minister of Revenue, who resigned recently because he felt that the GST was an unfair, expensive, complex and hard on an economy in full recession.

Here are some of the things Mr. Séguin said in an article published in the Quebec City newspaper, Le Soleil, on Tuesday, October 23, 1990. That article appeared under the heading Ideas of the day, and is entitled "A complex, unjust, expensive and harsh tax". It is written by Mr. Séguin, who still is MLA for Montmorency, even though he resigned as Revenue and Labour minister. Here is what he said:

> Today, it is said that the GST will be revenue neutral and that it will even help reduce the taxpayers' burden. That's ridiculous. With the GST, the federal government will collect a lot more money than with the old tax, and it is rather surprising that no one has contested the anticipated revenue mentioned in the official documents. In fact, the GST will bring in 30 billion dollars, as opposed to 18 billion under the old system.
> Curiously, the companies which payed these 18 billion dollars—

—and still do

> —will now pay only 9 billion, that is a reduction of 50 per cent. Of course, this important reduction of the companies' tax load explains why they support the GST, but they should worry about its complexity.

I received today, like all senators, a memorandum dated November 8th and sent by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. During the third quarter of 1990, the Federation asked 10,539 of its members across Canada the following question:

> Do you think that the Government of Canada gave you clear and accurate information on how the GST will affect your business?

Here is the national breakdown:

> Yes—

—responded that, in their opinion, the governement gave them accurate and clear information on how the tax will affect their business.

> Yes: 16.3 per cent. No: 74.4 per cent. Undecided: 7.4 per cent. No opinion: 1.9 per cent.

We can then say that only 16.3 per cent of all respondents believe that they have accurate and clear information on how the GST will affect their business.

Honourable senators, if this is the case for business people, independent businesses, small merchants, what will it be for the rest of Canadians? I exclude however large companies. But what of the other Canadians? Have we not reason to believe that the majority of Canadians feel even less informed about the impact the GST will have on them?

Mr. Séguin also appeared on French CBC's in-depth analysis Le Point, Wednesday, October 24, 1990. He was interviewed along with Mr. Alain Dubuc, who is, I believe, an editorial writer for La Presse.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Corbin, you have said earlier that what is happening in Quebec was not all that significant and that you did not have that much interest in it.

Is it because it suits your purpose at this time to quote Alain Dubuc?

Senator Corbin: I thank you for this clarification, dear colleague. I said I took an interest in serious matters happening in Quebec.

The parades are one thing. There is the St. John the Baptist parade, the GST parade, and there used to be parades by the League of the Sacred Heart and the Children of Mary. I do not consider them as being very serious matters.

It is nevertheless an opportunity for citizens to make themselves heard. Whether or not they are only ten people, it is their business if they want to go on a parade. As for expressing their opinion, I know that the great majority of Canadians, whether or not they participate in a parade, are against the GST.

So in the Le Point segment of CBC's french network nightly newscast, on September 24, Simon Durivage was interviewing Mr. Séguin, the Quebec minister of Revenue and Labour who resigned because he opposed the GST and Mr. Alain Dubuc, the editorial writer who apparently is in favour of the GST.

Simon Durivage asked the first question and I quote:

> The first question everybody asks is this: Is it really what one can call a regressive tax—a consumption tax because everybody pays the same tax of 7 per cent whether you are a millionaire or on welfare—everybody pays the 7 per cent, consequently it is unfair as compared to the income tax where the rich pay more than the poor.

I am quoting Simon Durivage. Mr. Dubuc, who is in favour of the GST, I am told, made some remarks and concluded:

> Yes it is regressive, particularly for the middle classes when you compare them to the rich, but not for the poor.

So, Mr. Durivage yields to Mr. Séguin, who says:

> Well, I agree somewhat with Mr. Dubuc—of course, the credits will alleviate the tax burden, but as far as I am concerned, I would qualify that statement; I am somewhat more skeptical as to whether the credits will indeed—in global terms, the credits represent approximately $2.4 billion out of the $30 billion expected from the GST—that . . .

Here, there is something missing.

> . . . not even 10 per cent. The credit amounts to $750 per individual, $100 per child . . .

At this point, Mr. Durivage intervenes:

> You are going a little fast, there. Of the $30 billion that you think the GST will produce, will the government reimburse as credits $2.5 billion to low income families?

• (1620)

Mr. Séguin answers:

> The government will reimburse $2.5 billion as credits. Those credits, as you know, go to families earning between approximately $18,000 and $37,000 only, and I do not think that they will totally make up for the additional taxes, paid by even the low income families. But, of course, I recognize that middle income Canadians, those earning $25,000, $28,000 or $30,000, are going to pay more under the GST scheme.

So, that is what they had to say in this program section. Later, Mr. Durivage went on:

> But who will bear the brunt of the burden? Is it once again the middle class, because low income families have sales tax credits. Even if the credits do not, compensate for everything, at least, they will alleviate some of their burden. Of course, the rich consume more, but beyond a certain point, they stop consuming, and start saving.

Says Mr. Durivage. And Mr. Séguin answers:

> Oh, we are talking about the average consumer. Approximately 80 per cent of those who will pay the tax belong to what we call the average consumer category, that is the average Canadian working family with two incomes of $25,000 or $26,000 each. Those are the ones who really—

And Mr. Dubuc steps in:

> —people who spend to the last cent of their after income tax income—Quebec and Ottawa income tax—without anything left to save will end up being taxed the most one way or another. While of course the richer you are, the more of your income you can spare for—

And Mr. Durivage said:

> Without confusing our viewers—
> This exchange was not very clear, I admit.
> . . . because I gave examples this week that a family earning up to $35,000 would receive enough sales tax credit to ensure its tax burden is not worse than before. So you disagree with that, Mr. Seguin?

And Mr. Seguin answered:

> No. I think that the figures provided in the background briefings and documents are based on working assumptions.

—and which do not reflect reality.

Mr. Séguin understood that the tax burden of companies decreases while that of average consumers earning between $25,000 and $30,000 increases. Thus, the average Canadians will bear the brunt of the tax burden. That is why one of the measures of Bill C-62 is so important. The sales tax credit system is the major method to soften the impact of the tax on families earning less than $30,000 a year. The problem with those credits is that they are not indexed to inflation. That is why, today, we present an amendment to index those credits to the consumer price index.

As we all know, having heard many statements to the effect from the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, inflation is that insidious evil that threatens our economic well-being. Inflation may well go up many percentage points with the arrival of the GST. But Mr. Wilson does not dwell on that fact. Inflation will also decrease the real value of the non indexed tax credits.

It is important to mention also that the effects of the GST on inflation will not be measured in any comprehensive way. On May 9, we learned from Statistics Canada that the agency had dropped its idea of a monthly report on the impacts on inflation of the tax on goods and services.

The following comments appeared in the newspaper La Presse on May 9 last, and I quote:

> Mr. Ivan Fellegi, Chief Statistician, said that that decision was made last week because it was too difficult to measure precisely, on a monthly basis, the extent to which the 7 per cent tax will increase the Consumer Price Index. "Nobody, and I mean nobody, could have actually measured what the Consumer Price Index would have been on a monthly basis without that fiscal amendement", noted Mr. Fellegi during an interview. "That is why we have decided that it would be pointless to try to mislead anyone, ourselves included, with the idea that it was possible to work out the price increase". It was an internal decision by Statistics Canada, he said, adding that the agency had not been subjected to any political interference.

I repeat that last sentence to the effect that Statistics Canada, that is the agency, had not been subjected to any political interference.

Nevertheless, certain malicious comments have been made to the contrary. The following appeared in the Toronto Star on May 8 1990, that is the day before the previous article was published in La Presse, and I quote:

● (1630)

[English]

> Statistics Canada spokesmen deny that the decision to cancel the net price index had anything to do with politics.
> However, according to a source—

Another mysterious source, honourable senators.

> —the decision was made in the Prime Minister's Office by his chief of staff, Stanley Hartt, and passed on to StatsCan through the ministry of finance.

[Translation]

According to other sources this decision is due to the fact that the minister of Finance insisted to get a monthly computation which would back up his figures. This was mentioned in La Presse issue of the 9th of September that I quoted to you.

I can easily understand the government's position. It would have been quite embarrassing to triger a sudden rise in the inflation rate, when you had sworn to fight inflation by all possible means. The implementation of this tax will surely be an inflationary factor and the governments, the experts, the senators are very aware of it.

This fact however is not reflected in the minister of Finance's forecast. To do his calculations, he would have to prove that a family earning less than $30,000 would be better off after the implementation of the GST, using the most favourable scenarios in terms of the product prices. That is an inflation rate not exceeding 3 per cent and the complete removal of the manufacturers' sales tax. I would like at this stage to dwell a bit on this issue. Can we believe that consumers will really be better off with the complete removal of the manufacturers' sales tax?

Here is what Mr. Yves Séguin maintains again in his article published in the 23th of October, 1990 issue of Quebec Le Soleil, and I quote:

> In Canada, the corporate tax burden has been decreasing for the last decade at least and is now at 9 per cent. Hence the GST is going to decrease further the corporate tax burden without giving us any hope that prices are going to fall or employment is going to increase, since there is no control mechanism.

I don't quite agree with what Mr. Séguin is saying, and I must assume that he is not aware of the fact that the federal government has set up an effective control mecanism, or so it believes. Mr. Séguin must have overlooked the fact that a Consumer Information Office was created on June 12 of this year to inform consumers about the GST. It will be responsible for monitoring prices during the transition from the manufacturers' sales tax of 13.5 per cent, which will be abolished, to the new GST of 7 per cent. The agency will also examine complaints from consumers about any irregularities during the changeover. But, and this is the snag, this agency has only limited powers.

The government has admitted that it was relying much more on competition to force companies to adjust their prices. Companies themselves are saying that competition will come into play. This remains to be seen since as, in the past, consumers did not benefit from tax reductions. Very often, in many industries and in many areas of the country, prices remained at the same level and increased later.

Consequently, the said control mecanism might be as effective as a toothless watchdog. In this regard, here is an excerpt from an article intitled The GST's Keystone Kops published in The Citizen of June 15 last. The title is:

● (1640)

[English]

> The GST's Keystone Kops:
> It's straight out of Kafka.
> At a time when we have AIDS patients in desperate need of home care, a hospital crisis and no money for environmental cleanups, the Mulroney government is frittering away $19 million on an agency that's supposed to tell us, sort of, about the price impact of the goods and services tax.

Officially, the Consumer Information Office will monitor prices for irregularities once the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax is replaced by the new seven-per cent GST. During his GST sales pitch, Finance Minister Michael Wilson promised that the prices of big ticket items such as cars, household appliances and furniture will go down while the cost of clothing, footwear and most services will increase.

Just what the office will be able to do other than publicize price gouging is mysterious indeed. It has no legal powers of investigation and a staff of 20 to monitor the pricing practices of 1.7 million Canadian businesses.

What's more, even if the price police do stumble across an example of gouging, they can't do anything about it. The office has no power to order price rollbacks and no way of punishing businesses. Legal experts say the office would need an iron-clad case before it could even contemplate naming an offending company. And iron-clad cases aren't easy to come by.

Businessmen across the country must be cowering behind their cash registers at the very thought of such a bold initiative.

[Translation]

This blatant lack of control will open the door to abuses. So it would be really ridiculous to believe that the Canadian consumers will have the opportunity to enjoy the full savings or at least a reasonable part thereof, if savings there are.

This context underlines even more the importance of indexing the sales tax credits as proposed in this amendment, which would protect the progressive nature of the sales tax credit. In the report of the committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on page 25 and 26, two charts show clearly that the real value of the sales tax credit will decrease over time. The hardest hit will be the household whose annual income ranges between $25,000 and $30,000 in constant dollars of 1991.

The absence, in Bill C-62, of a clause providing for the full indexing of the sales tax credits is denounced by the majority of opponents to the GST and even by some of its supporters.

Let us take, for example, the case of Mr. Goodman, a lawyer and sales tax expert, I am told. An ardent supporter of the GST as he is, he recognizes that the bill has some flaws, particularly the absence of a clause on the indexation of the sales tax credit. Here is an excerpt of his evidence to the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, on June 5 of this year, on page 11 of volume 41.

[English]

I should not want it to be thought that I do not have misgivings about various features of the GST, because I have a number. First, the system of sales tax credits is to be indexed in order to take account of inflation, but it will only take account of inflation in excess of 3 per cent. The effect of that is that if inflation continues at the rate of 5 per cent a year for 10 years . . .

And no one in this country can predict accurately what inflation will be next month, next year or ten years from now. It continues:

. . . $100 of tax credits will be increased to $122 because the indexing will only be to the extent of 2 per cent a year. But buying power is being reduced at the rate of 5 per cent a year, which means that this $122 in real terms will buy the same amount as $75 would have initially bought at the beginning of the period. There was a 25 per cent erosion in the value of the sales tax credit, assuming only a 5 per cent inflation rate. I submit that this is grossly unfair to the poorest and most vulnerable people in our community.

[Translation]

The case of Mr. W. Goodman is not unique. Professor Robert Clark, of the University of British Columbia, a great supporter of the GST, is concerned that the GST credit is not fully indexed to inflation in order to reflect the real cost of living. Here is what professor Clark said before the Committee on August 1st, page 61 of issue 66, and I quote:

[English]

My third concern about the refundable sales tax credit is one you have heard in numerous presentations. To allay the anxiety of many recipients of the credit, I urge you to recommend that the government should commit itself in the bill to fully index annually for inflation as measured by the national consumer price index the following: the sales tax credit itself; the maximum net income threshold at which it starts to be reduced, and the maximum total receipts received in a year by a business or a non-profit organization before it is required to be a GST registrant.

• (1650)

[Translation]

Mr. Patrick Grady, an economist associated with Global Economics Limited, and strong supporter of a goods and services tax, also denounced that inequity in Bill C-62. Let me quote his testimony before the committee on May 30. That quote is taken from page 32 of issue No. 39.

While I think about it, I would like to make a recommandation to the translaters of quotations, particularly when the quotations are from Senate documents. I am quoting from a presentation made before a Senate committee and that text is printed in both official languages in the proceedings of the committee.

Often, when I speak French and quote something in English, that quotation is translated a second time. As a result there is no concordance with the original French version which is the one from the committee. When I quote a text from a Senate document, it seems to me that since all Senate documents are published in both official languages, the quotation should be taken directly in the original translation, which is the one in the committee documents, instead of being translated a second time. Otherwise, there is a risk of mistakes and nonsense like I saw a few times. This is only a suggestion on my part.

[English]

> The other issue is that it is important over time to make sure that the sales tax credit and the income threshold levels are fully adjusted for inflation. This is to make sure that low income families don't see their sales tax credits taken away by inflation. If you use the current limitation on indexing only to increase the consumer price index over 3 per cent, and assume that inflation is in excess of that for the next ten years, the currently proposed increase in the credit and threshold would be entirely consumed over a ten-year period, leaving low income families with no real increases in the credit or threshold and facing sharply higher sales taxes. If this happened, the sales tax couldn't be considered to be equitable. That is my first point on the adequacy of the sales tax credit.

[Translation]

For his part, Mr. Terrance Hunsley, Executive Director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, is opposed to Bill C-62. You can see how objective I am: I refer to people who are in favour of the GST as well as people who, for a variety of reasons, are against GST, in whole or in part. Mr. Terrance Hunsley is seriously questioning the government's sincerity in its intention to compensate the low- and average-income families, since it is not introducing at the same time a clause indexing credits to the Consumer Price Index. Here is what Mr. Hunsley said, as reported in issue No. 49, dated June 28, 1990, on page 55:

[English]

> The other concern with the credit is that it is not indexed to inflation—neither the amount of the credit nor the point at which it starts to phase out. That indicates that the plans of the government are to reduce the value of this credit almost immediately upon its going into effect, and that will mean a regressive impact on low-income people.

[Translation]

If that is not the case, the government should respond to Mr. Hunsley's accusation and simply accept our amendment, and all those problems would be solved.

The merit of an indexation clause to the Consumer Price Index is obvious. The example found on page 23 of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce illustrates graphically the impact of not having such a clause:

> A family with an income of $25,000 in 1991, whose income only keeps pace with inflation, will see the real value of its GST credits decline by 50% over 5 years. This is equivalent to about $300 per year.

[Senator Corbin.]

Most proponents of the GST acknowledge the importance of the GST credits system, because credits will alleviate the regressive impact of the GST on Canadian families. However, if we want to preserve the fragile fairness of these credits we must maintain their real value. The amendment proposed today by Her Majesty's loyal opposition in the Senate simply aims at maintaining the value of these credits. The amendment will ensure that the credits do not lose their progressive characteristic.

I urge all Conservative senators to support this amendment whose sole purpose is to lessen the harmful and regressive impact of this tax on millions of Canadians. Thank you for your attention, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: I want to take about ten minutes to debate the seriousness and appropriateness of this amendment which we are asked to accept.

But first, if I may, I should like to report briefly on a trip I made to Madawaska over the weekend, if only to remind you of the background details which, I think, should guide us in this debate.

Over the weekend I had the pleasure of going back to my country to celebrate Remembrance Day and meet with veterans, the eighteenth time I have done this in the last twenty years. I must tell you that nobody enquired why the Senate would be sitting today, supposedly a failure on our part as parliamentarians to give Remembrance Day all the importance it ought to have. There was not a single question on that subject. People expected us to work on Monday, as usual. So I came back to Ottawa to debate the GST with you.

When I was in Madawaska I went to the Canadian Legion as I do every year. I went to meet people who were organizing a telethon for the Victorian Order of Nurses. Needless to say I talked to a lot of people and, of course, the issue of the GST was raised a few times during our conversation. I would not say that they are resigned and willingly accept the bill. They say it is probably inevitable. Considering the information they have been given, they do not seem to be overly concerned about the tax.

What they recall and what the French network of the CBC is making sure that citizens of Madawaska and Canadians in general will never forget, are the scenes that we witnessed in this chamber three weeks or one month ago, those scenes that we can still see on the news. People ask us: are there no rules in government or in the Senate to make the Liberal senators stop what they are doing? This is what people told me. I wanted to report it to you.

First, contrary to what we heard last Friday, people do not resent the fact that we are sitting today. Quite the opposite, they commend us for it. Second, they are looking forward to this bill being passed after serious consideration.

• (1700)

That is what I wanted to tell you.

Senator Corbin said that this place was a chamber for sober second thought.

Senator Corbin: My exact words were "de réflexion"!

Senator Simard: That was what I thought until I came here.

Senator Corbin: I said it was a chamber for second thought because I was quoting Senator Beaudoin. I read two hundred pages from his thick book over the weekend. So, I said to myself that it was a solid foundation to work upon, that is actually a chamber for second thought.

Senator Simard: So, following the speech delivered by my colleague, Senator Robertson—whose comments might well not have pleased him too much—Senator Corbin felt he had to say that because of some speeches, this institution was not always the chamber for second thought it should be. If it is to change us from that petitions reading chamber that it has been for the last three weeks, so much the better!

Since we are talking about Senator Robertson, I must say that I have known her for many years. She worked in New Brunswick for 20 years. She was a member of the New Brunswick government for 15 years. She is still working with the same talent and dedication to thorough research, accuracy and common sense. I think she will get the same results with us. By condemning injustice and opposition propaganda and schemes, as she did in New Brunswick, she will get the same results here.

In other words, when bills are explained, even though they may be hard to accept, people will usually make their judgment based on information they receive from both sides. So, I encourage her to carry on and I congratulate her for that wonderful speech even though it could hardly be accepted by members opposite.

That being said, Senator Corbin told us, and I am getting back to the amendment for a moment, that to show its sincerity, the government should fully index credits to the Consumer Price Index.

If we are talking about showing the government's sincerity, we need only look at the short period during which the child tax credit has been in effect, after being introduced by this government in 1985. This was a new program to deal with a problem . . . I am referring to the $50.

This is a program that started with $50. Senator Thériault doesn't seem to understand. This is a new program.

Senator Thériault: Nobody will believe you!

Senator Simard: It is the child tax credit. It started in 1985, as proof of this government's sincerity. Payments under this program exceeded the level of inflation in 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990, even though they were not fully indexed.

Senator Thériault can be as incredulous as he likes, that doesn't change the figures I have here.

So I don't think we need a yeardstick, and I urge my colleagues to vote against this amendment. It is unnecessary to have a clause or legislative provision to ensure that the government will pay enough money to counteract the effects of inflation. That is why I urge my colleagues to vote against this amendment.

Senator Bolduc briefly referred to . . . I will not spend too much time on this event. Because of the weather or poor press coverage, as some organizers of these anti-GST demonstrations said, there were probably several reasons why the crowds expected in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto were not as big as organizers had hoped.

In Montreal, there were five people. In Ottawa, 500 were supposed to come, but only 200 showed up. This is no problem to me. I said earlier that I would report to you on what I heard during the weekend.

I told you what veterans said. On the way, I was listening to the French network of the CBC on the radio. One of my favourite programs was being broadcast on Saturday afternoon. I was driving from Quebec City to Edmunston. It is an excellent program. I surely would recommend it if you have time to listen to it during the coming weeks. It is a serious program that lasts one hour or 90 minutes and deals with five or six subjects. Experts are invited. The program's title is Les affaires et la vie. It is one of those excellent programs that this CBC French network so often produces.

This morning I asked an Ottawa company which does this sort of thing to prepare a transcript of the program. I will have a transcript of both sections.

The first one was a talk with Robert Tremblay, who is president of the Fédération anti-pauvreté du Québec. I am sure Senator Chaput-Rolland knows him. So the president of the Quebec Anti-Poverty Federation was interviewed on this program and, to the host's great surprise, he said he agreed with the GST. I am going to be very careful with what I say, but he surely supported the tax quite strongly.

I will distribute to the honourable senators, within the next days, the transcript of the program which lasted about—

Senator Thériault: I would not blame you. This is quite an exceptional situation!

Senator Simard: As I mentioned, to the host's great surprise, Robert Tremblay said on the program that he himself and his group support the GST. He explained why. I think the host could not believe what he was hearing. But Mr. Tremblay explained his position.

He asked: Do you know what the alternative to this consumption tax is? He answered: Liberals and others advocate changes or an increase in the income tax. He went on: This will not affect me personally at all. I do not mind the GST as long as my food and housing are not taxed. I earn $10,000, my pension income is $10,000. I will not be paying more.

Those are his figures. He also said: These same people—probably referring to Liberal senators and former Finance ministers—want to eliminate the GST and increase the income tax. These same people were in power and they made laws to give all kinds of credits to those with high income, the millionaires as Senator Thériault says so often. He said they gave so many exemptions for rich people that they do not pay their fair share.

And he added: With a consumption tax, they will pay something. There will not be too many in our situation. Honourable senators, I told you many times that the middle class is the one that pays. Robert Tremblay said the same thing. He told the host: If you want to go to a restaurant after work, you will go with friends and it will cost you $200 and you will pay tax on that. But I will not have that problem. I will simply go home with my kids and buy food for $25 or $30 with no tax.

He went on: After you go to the restaurant in the CN Tower in Toronto, you will come down and go shopping at The Bay or some other place. If you see a nice fur coat, you will buy it for your wife and you will pay tax on that. That is good. But you can afford it.

He gave more examples. I will give you the transcript.

On a more serious note, Senator Thériault! It was the President of the Fédération anti-pauvreté du Québec speaking. He is for the GST. He said: I am going to pay my small share, I will get the credit, but it is the middle and high income people who will have to pay when they buy their fur coats and other things.

He blamed those who, like Dennis Mills, would like to put together a tax scheme under which everybody would have to pay. Then he said: Such people as Senators Thériault, MacEachen and Perreault, when they were there, provided a whole series of credits, including savings credits.

I will conclude with this.

There was also another part of this program which dealt with indexing. At that time, there were no doubt some well-intentioned governments—I was a member of such a government at the provincial level as others were in Quebec—but in the year 1972-73, what did well off governments come up with?

They decided to legislative the quarterly indexation of expenses. Do you remember, Senator Bolduc? As you want to do now, these well-intentioned governments wanted to protect everybody. So they indexed expenditures. It was a great idea! They even decided to do it on a quarterly basis.

They went even further. During the program on Saturday, we were reminded that they had indexed even personal income tax exemptions. The experts said that they had created a system (I am no longer talking about Robert Tremblay, but somebody else) whose transcript I will table.

A system was set up. All the governments were indexing, placing an automatic charge to continue increased payments on expenditures, family allowances and other benefits. Government revenues were cut by indexing personal exemptions, as well as all pension funds.

It seems to me that we should learn from their experience and be more careful before moving amendments such as the one before us today. This is what I invite you to reflect upon.

Senator Hébert, did you understand earlier the message which I am bringing to you from the Madawaska people?

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I am taking a break from you!

Senator Simard: It is precisely that you stop . . . I don't want to exaggerate but I saw at least 200 persons at the Canadian Legion, at the Air Force Club, and another 150 at the VON telethon in Edmundston. I met in all at least 350 individuals.

Some 25 to 30 persons at least came to see me on their own initiative. Introducing themselves with a jolly "How are you today, Jean-Maurice? We are happy to see you. You never miss the chance to see us on Remembrance Day". I told them I was happy to be there.

● (1710)

They said, "Would you tell Senator Hébert to stop fooling around?" They mentioned three or four of the better known senators. Senator Gigantès' name came up five or six times. So, Senator Hébert, here is the message they gave me; you can do with it as you will. You are stubborn enough to do as you please, and it is okay by me.

Senator Hébert: It is so reassuring!

Senator Simard: You are reassured. I can now conclude my remarks by inviting you to give up on your amendments. Even though the past is not always a promise for the future, considering the government's record as regard to indexation of the child tax credit, having the means to do so, the government could reassess the needs and, in the budget or at another time, increase the GST credit annually.

Senator Corbin: I have a question for my honourable colleague from the Republic of Madawaska. Is he aware of an article published in The Globe and Mail on November 10, 1990, under the title:

[English]

> Legion angered by Senate's decision to hold session on Remembrance Day.
> The decision to sit on Monday has Canadian war veterans up in arms over what they see as the latest slap in the face against the memory of the country's war dead.
> Already angered by the planned absence of Governor-General Ray Hnatyshyn from Ottawa's Remembrance Day services, the Royal Canadian Legion condemned the Senate for its decision to sit on the Remembrance Day holiday, a day parliamentarians usually spend in their constituencies.
> In a news release from the legion's Dominion Command, the veterans group said it "regards this . . . as another indication of the waning respect for the memory of the 114,000 men and women who gave their lives in military service to Canada during two world wars and the Korean War."

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: I know I have no reason to doubt the comments as reported by Senator Simard. I did not go to Edmundston. I stayed in Ottawa. I must admit that I am exhausted. Had we had today off . . .

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: My God!

Senator Corbin: What's this? Are you talking to God? Madam, be my guest anytime you feel like leaving by car with me because I have to travel by car to go to New Brunswick. I saw you once in P.E.I. I do not know whether you went by plane or by car, but I met you at a street crossing one evening in the village of Malpèque. You did not know that. I knew who you were. You travelled in the Maritimes. Follow my example—I think Senator Simard does the same—and jump in the car, drive for nine or ten hours, spend a day or only a few hours home and drive back in time for a sitting. I did not feel up to that this weekend.

I notice the heart doctor, doctor Keon, is listening. There are things you cannot do past a certain age. I ran that stupid race between the Senate and my riding every weekend for 16 years. I am not young anymore and I need a little more time.

I would have wanted to attend the Remembrance Day celebrations in Edmundston and see my many friends in Grand-Saut, in Clairs, in Baker Brook, you name it, but there is no way I will travel under those conditions anymore. The question was asked before and this was my answer: It is out of the question for me to travel if I do not have the time to do the trip and recuperate once in a while. As you know, we sit on Friday and have to be here by two o'clock on Monday afternoon. Do you think I am going to travel all night. That is a bit much!

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Talk about it to Senator Frith.

Senator Corbin: The Senate is sitting and the veterans are darn upset at you. As I just said, Senator Simard may say that the people—

• (1720)

[English]

Senator Barootes: Have you a question?

Senator Corbin: The question has been asked. Why do you not listen to the interpretation, sir.

Senator Barootes: Are you answering your own question?

Senator Corbin: I am making the allowed commentary. Put the question and then the commentary. I did not make a preamble. I put the question. I am making the commentary. You keep quiet!

[Translation]

So, does Senator Simard realize the seriousness of the decision made by his party to force the Senate to sit today for the first time in History? I do not want to be associated to things like that. I am under the impression that the veterans from Edmundston were not aware of your party's dealings to force us to sit today. If they had known, you would not have been congratulated the way you want us to believe you were.

Senator Simard: So you asked me a question and I will give you a very brief answer. It's been a long day. I got up at five, and travelled from Quebec City to Edmundston. I can well understand Senator Corbin. I certainly don't do it every week; even though I can fly to Quebec City, it still leaves three hours of travelling time and that's very hard. One makes the decisions one has to make and so on, but since you asked me a question as to whether he was aware of the decision of the national office for veterans, the answer is yes indeed, and that was on Thursday or Friday when this was brought up; it might even have been on Sunday.

I don't know if people from the Madawaska area were aware of the decision made by this illustrious national group. I think they must have been aware of it because people from Edmundston listen to the radio and watch television, and they know pretty well what is going on. They didn't talk to me about it.

One thing is sure, there was no exaggeration on my part. People were happy to see me there. They were not shocked at all by the fact that we were sitting today. They asked me when I was leaving and I told them: "I will leave tonight or Monday morning at five o'clock." When they asked my why, I told them that we were sitting this afternoon. They said that it was all right. They certainly were not mad at me because I didn't take Monday off even though the school board gave its students the day off, et cetera. They expect senators to do their job.

People from the Madawaska area are guided by their instinct, their feelings and their principles much more than by decisions made by a national group whose head office is in Toronto, Winnipeg or elsewhere. That is how I see things.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, before the debate ends on this amendment, during the intervention by Senator Robertson, she—I was going to say "brandished"—showed us a sheaf of documents to which she was referring, particularly on the question of Mr. Wilson's clarifying or describing this tax as a part of the last election campaign; and I asked that she table them. She was out of the chamber when I checked, so perhaps she was out making copies; but when I checked with the Table a little earlier I found that they had not been tabled. There is no need for them to be tabled today, but I want to be sure that we understood each other and that she is going to table those documents.

Senator Robertson: I have every intention of tabling them. I was going to table them this afternoon, but those who record our comments have asked for my sheaf of documents, and as soon as they are returned, I will be glad to table them.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DIFFERED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Gigantès on behalf of the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Corbin:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that it be amended by changing the tax credit threshold provided thereunder

(a) by striking out clause 46 on pages 293 and 294 and substituting the following:

"46.(1) Section 117.1 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto immediately after subsection (2) thereof the following subsection:

Indexing

"(2.1) The dollar amounts referred to in subsection 122.5(3) shall be adjusted for each taxation year after 1990 so that the amount to be used thereunder for the year is an amount equal to the aggregate of

(a) the amount that would, but for subsection (3), be the amount to be used for the immediately preceding taxation year, and

(b) the product obtained by multiplying

(i) the amount referred to in paragraph (a)

by

(ii) the amount, adjusted in such manner as may be prescribed and rounded to the nearest one-thousandth, that is determined by the formula

where

A is the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period that ended on September 30 next before that year, and

B is the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period immediately preceding the period mentioned in the description of A."

(2) Subsection (1) is applicable to the 1991 and subsequent taxation years." and

(b) on page 296, by striking out lines 39 to 41 and substituting the following:

"(ii) $24,800.00."

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William J. Petten: Under rule P-3.(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: I wish to make a point of order at this point. It has become customary several times now for the speaker to say, "Is it agreed?" The rule is there and it does not require any agreement from anyone. Once the request is made, it is automatic.

Senator Roblin: I thought you were going to say on division.

Senator Frith: Senator Roblin does not want us to explain these things.

Senator MacEachen: This formula has been used at least once earlier, but I do not want the impression to be created that this is now subject to a decision by the house. It is not. Once the request is made, it is automatic.

Senator Simard: Good point.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, November 13, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE LATE HUGH MacLENNAN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I sought the floor for five minutes to pay tribute to an outstanding writer who died last week, Hugh MacLennan, a personal friend of mine.

I realize I am somewhat late, but various events prevented me from paying tribute to him before this day.

Hugh MacLennan was known as a great novelist both in Canada and in other countries.

[English]

He was a great writer, a great Canadian and a good friend of mine. He was also known for his book called Two Solitudes, which we are still experiencing. Many people thought he invented that phrase to describe English and French Canada, but he took the title from a famous book by a German poet. I am sure most of you know of it, and please forgive me if I repeat it, because I feel it is important.

[Translation]

The words came from the book by Rainer Maria Rilke, Briefe an einen jungen Dichter, "Letters to a Young Poet", where he wrote "Love is two solitudes that sometimes touch, respect and protect each other".

[English]

Love is two solitudes that sometimes touch, respect and protect each other.

[Translation]

I think that Hugh MacLennan put that in practice in all his books. He was one of the rare Canadian authors who won five or six Governor General's awards. He did his best to bridge the gap between these two solitudes. We now know that he was unsuccessful.

As a writer and not unlike a good many of you in this chamber, I think we had to mention his name if only to remind one and all that the two solitudes we make up in this institution might forge links of friendliness so that we rediscover the kind of solidarity he suggested in his works.

Honourable senators, thank you for letting me pay homage to the great Canadian write that Hugh MacLennan was.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that I too knew Hugh MacLennan. Senator Chaput-Roland, I can assure you that had he been in this chamber the other day he would have voted against the GST, something which you did not do.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I appreciated the comments of Senator Chaput-Rolland—

Senator Simard: What about the last comment of Senator Hébert?

Senator Grafstein: —about Mr. MacLennan. Perhaps because this is an oversight on the part of all of us, we should also note the untimely passing of Morley Callaghan, who was an equally great Canadian author. Is it not tragic that two such great authors have passed away at a time when we need their voices, minds and hearts to tell us what Canada is all about? So I share in the condolences to both those families. When we read their eloquent works, we are reminded how small we are and how great they are with respect to their visions of Canada.

Senator Barootes: Let us hear from Senator Hébert on how he second-guesses Morley Callaghan on this matter!

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP IN SENATE—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I should like to relate it to the Orders of the Day, Order No. 8, dated October 26, 1990. The issue concerns the question of Senator Forrestall's property qualification, which, as of today's date, is an unproven accusation. I believe that it casts a shadow over the entire Senate and all of its members. How can the Senate ensure—and that is our responsibility—that justice be done unless it deals with this matter expeditiously? What is to be gained by delay?

In all fairness to Senator Forrestall—and I delayed raising this question of privilege until he was present in the chamber—this is a situation that demands a quick and fair resolution by all honourable senators. Candidly, I am a little disappointed that the issue has not been raised by Senator Forrestall himself, because the accusation is levelled at him. I would like to think that today we can reach a conclusion on how we are going to deal with this quickly and fairly, not only in the interests of Senator Forrestall, which is important, but in the interests of all of us in this chamber.

I close with my usual admonition: that the Senate must be reformed.

THE HONOURABLE CLAUDE CASTONGUAY—TRIBUTES ON OCCASION OF NOMINATION AS A "GRAND MONTRÉALAIS" OF THE YEAR

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, last Thursday, November 8, our colleague Senator Claude Castonguay was selected as one of the three Great Montrealers of the year. He has now become a member of l'Académie des grands Montréalais.

The first official reception goes back to 1978 when the Queen Elizabeth Hotel in Montreal which was then celebrating its 20th anniversary, decided to pay tribute to 20 Montreal men and women. Since then, every year, from one to three people are so honoured. I personally received that distinction back in 1981.

The Académie des grands Montréalais was created in 1984. It is made up of about 50 members who every year select three outstanding individuals from the cultural, social and economic areas.

For 1990 the winners are Mr. Denis Arcand, a film maker whose latest movies, "The Decline of the American Empire" and "Jesus of Montreal" attracted considerable attention, Sister Denise Lefebvre, from the Grey Nuns Community of Montreal, who founded and directed for 20 years the first university nursing school in the province of Quebec, and our colleague Honourable Claude Castonguay.

Our colleague was born in Quebec city. He attended Laval University and the University of Manitoba. From 1966 to 1970, he chaired the Commission on Health and Social Welfare. He implemented that reform in his capacity as Minister of Health and Social Welfare from 1970 to 1971, and it is especially during this period of his life that I had the pleasure to get to know him better.

Senator Hébert: Because he was a Liberal!

Senator David: No, not because he was a Liberal, but because he was Minister of Health and I was managing a hospital. Then he became President and Executive Director of "La Laurentienne" Life Insurance Company and chaired its board of directors until he was called to the Senate. At the time of his appointment, he was Chancellor of Montreal University. He has received many honorary degrees and awards including the Order of Canada as a Companion in 1974.

It is therefore with utmost pride and friendship that I beg Senator Castonguay to accept our most heartfelt congragulations and I urge him to share them with his wife and three children. Honourable senators, thank you very much.

STATUTE LAW IN RELATION TO WAR VETERANS

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-87, to amend the statute law in relation to war veterans.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

● (1410)

THE HONOURABLE J. MICHAEL FORRESTALL

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not want to leave unacknowledged the question of privilege raised earlier by our colleague, Senator Waters. I appreciate the concerns he has expressed, not only as they relate to Senator Forrestall, but to seven other senators who have been named in the motion proposed by Senator Frith.

In the normal course of events, that motion could be placed on the order paper and we would debate that motion and, presumably, vote on it. For reasons that the honourable senators know as well as I, we have not, in the rather extraordinary circumstances under which we have been meeting lately, reached that point. It is always difficult to attempt to arrange the business of the house on the floor of the house, as it were. These matters are usually done in consultation between the house Leader of the Government, Senator Doody, and the house Leader of the Opposition, Senator Frith.

For my part, I would not require much notice to be ready to participate in the debate, and I understand that Senator Forrestall would also be ready to participate.

VOTING ON QUALIFICATION—MOTION TO EXCLUDE EIGHT SENATORS APPOINTED UNDER SECTION 26—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree that we should not leave Senator Waters' Question of Privilege dangling, as it were. A very important preliminary decision, which the Senate has to decide before proceeding to deal with the motion that is number eight on the order paper, referred to by Senator Waters, is the question of whether the senators whose qualifications are in question would be permitted to vote in their own cause, thereby acting as judge and jury in that cause. In order to assist the process mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate—that is, to perhaps come to an arrangement as to a time when we might be able to debate this question—I will move under Rule 33 on this question of privilege. It provides that:

> When a matter or question directly concerning the privileges of the Senate, of any committee thereof, or of any senator, has arisen, . . .

As has been raised by Senator Waters, I continue:

> . . . a motion calling upon the Senate to take action thereon may be moved without notice and, until decided, shall, unless the debate be adjourned, suspend the consideration of other motions and of the Orders of the Day.

In order to have these two matters brought together—as I believe Senator Waters wishes, and, apparently, Senator Murray also wishes—I believe that we should first decide that Mr. Forrestall and the others appointed under section 26, for the reasons outlined in support of my earlier motion, not be permitted to vote on the question of their own qualifications.

I make that motion under rule 33. I propose that we not now get into a full debate about it, because it is a matter on which I am sure, all senators will want to reflect—including the eight senators more directly concerned, who may wish to reflect on whether they themselves feel it would be just for them to act as judge and jury and to vote on their own cause. Therefore, having made the motion, I propose the adjournment of the debate on the motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to impose a caveat that I have proposed prior to this on points of privilege. It has been the custom of this house to present a point of privilege and then prove to His Honour's satisfaction that a prima facie case of privilege actually exists.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: No.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

Senator Doody: Senator Molgat, in his usual calm, reasoned and rational way, disagrees.

Senator Molgat: I do.

Senator Doody: There is a way of expressing that disagreement. Nothing will be accomplished by the mob howling. A precedent has been established in this place. His Honour has ruled on several occasions that a prima facie case has to be established before such a debate can take place.

I now present the same case for His Honour's consideration. That is the custom of this place, and that is the procedure that I feel we must follow.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand Senator Doody's caveat, as he calls it. We have a fundamental disagreement on this issue.

I should like to remind Senator Doody of an occasion when a point of privilege was raised. Senator Ottenheimer laid down the procedure that he thought applied—namely, the procedure to which Senator Doody has referred. The Speaker, after hearing what he considers to be enough evidence, decides whether a prima facie case has been made out. Senator Ottenheimer supported that position by reference to that tradition and proceeding in other houses.

I accepted that analysis, and the Leader of the Government pointed out that I had accepted it. I explained later that Senator Bonnell had pointed out to me rule 33, which is the rule that applies in the Senate. It clearly requires no resort to the proceedings of any other house. Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada says that if we cannot find an answer in the Senate rules, then we go somewhere else, either to practices in the Senate or rules and practices elsewhere. However, there is no need to go to Rule 1, because there is a specific rule on the question—namely, rule 33—which is absolutely clear and unqualified.

I point out, honourable senators, that the most recent practice that this house has followed was last Friday when, on a question of privilege raised under Rule 33, there was a motion which was then voted upon. That is the most recent precedent in this place.

I understand that Senator Doody has raised this caveat because there is a fundamental difference of opinion on this subject. However, I wish my motion to stand. My motion is that under rule 33, on the question of the qualifications of Michael Forrestall and the other seven senators appointed pursuant ot section 26, those persons not be entitled to vote, because they would otherwise be acting as judge and jury in their own cause.

• (1420)

I am not asking that the motion be put now. I am asking that it be reflected upon and that we can debate it on another occasion.

I am not averse to having a decision made subject to who can vote. Something that we might examine and explore during debate is whether we can agree that it be settled by the independent senators. That is one possibility.

However, at the moment, in order to pull together the remarks of Senator Waters, my earlier motion, Senator Murray's remarks and Senator Doody's remarks, I make this motion under Rule 33 and move that debate on the motion be adjourned so that we can have an opportunity to consider it.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I have a written motion? Perhaps I can read it later on.

Senator Frith: Your Honour, I do not think I need a written motion under Rule 33. A motion can be put at any time. However, if we can adjourn the debate at this time, perhaps I can retrieve the wording of my motion from the blues and translate it into a piece of paper that can be laid on the Table.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that debate on this motion be adjourned?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 60 residents of St-Paul La Doré and St-Eugène La Doré, Quebec, who call upon the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: When was it dated, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: The petition is dated August 1990. I will read you the names of these petitioners.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, we now go to another region, and I have the honour to present a petition signed by 97 residents of Plessisville, Quebec, who call upon the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I now have the honour to present a petition signed by 66 residents of St-Ambroise, Quebec, who call upon the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, Senator Hébert's mail is late. You say that these residents are asking you to reject the GST. I suggest you stop these dilatory proceedings which are merely delaying the inevitable, and I am referring to the moment when we will be able to start debate on the main motion. Then you will have an opportunity, if you want to take that chance, to let all senators vote. If you have more votes on your side, you will defeat the motion. You will reject the bill as your petitioners asked you to do. I therefore suggest you stop your filibuster and at least give your petitioners a chance to see their wishes come true.

Since I am on my feet, honourable senators, I would like to table . . .

Senator Hébert: That's a bit much . . .

Senator Simard: Excuse me, but it will only take a minute. I know Senator Frith, like all Canadians, wants us to keep our promises. Yesterday, I promised to table a document related to the GST, a transcript of a Radio-Canada broadcast heard last Saturday, on November 10, and I am referring to the radio program Les affaires et la vie, when the executive director of the Fédération québécoise anti pauvreté said that he and his group were in favour of Bill C-62. I think that is self-explanatory.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What date was this?

Senator Simard: I think it is self-explanatory.

Senator Frith: When did you make a reference to this statement?

Senator Simard: Yesterday, and since we on this side keep our promises, I wanted to take this opportunity to show you we intend to keep all our promises.

Copies have been made, and they are available behind the Speaker's chair. You will see that Mr. Tremblay . . .

Senator Hébert: Mr. Robert Tremblay is one individual. With all due respect he is only one individual. I have to talk on behalf of tens of thousands of people.

Senator Simard: You haven't been elected, but he has. For you people, it's important to be elected. He was elected and appointed president of the Fédération québécoise anti-pauvreté, a position which he held for several years. It's more than you will ever accomplish. You have never been elected.

Senator Frith: Can you check and see if the documents to which senator Robertson referred to yesterday were tabled today?

Senator Simard: I am not the runner for our side. Senator Hébert is for the senators opposite. I said I would table the documents, and I did. Senator Robertson will table hers in due course.

Senator Hébert: I get more mail than you do.

Senator Simard: Concerning the same subject which Senator Robertson dealt with, since I am being forced or urged to do so I should like to table a few statements made by the Prime Minister during the 1988 campaign.

Senator Hébert: Are we talking about promises made to Senator Chaput-Roland.

Senator Simard: If you would care to sit down, you seem to be curious, I will do that.

Senator Hébert: I had the floor.

Senator Simard: You asked me a question, but I cannot sit down and answer your question at the same time. I will table a few quotations from statements or interviews given by the Prime Minister on October 1, 1988, November 1, 1988, November 17, 1988, November 10, 1988, November 4, 1988, and November 3, 1988 to various media representatives. The Prime Minister was explaining that there would be a bill to do away with the unfairness of the existing sales tax legislation, and that this bill would replace the current law and repeal this regressive legislation which is killing jobs in Canada and harming Canadian manufacturers. In short, that is exactly what the GST will accomplish. Well, Senator Frith, are you satisfied?

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

[English]

Senator Simard: Are you happy, Senator Frith?

● (1440)

Senator Frith: I am always happy. Are these the documents to which Senator Robertson referred?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: I have said, senator, that I am not responsible for Senator Robertson. She is old enough to assume her responsibilities. She will table them. I am not your postman. I do not work for the post office. I can only speak for myself, and I tabled the documents that I said I would table. She will table those documents in due course.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Then, in answer to your question, I am not completely happy; but I am also quite glad that you are not my postman. I prefer the one I have.

Senator Simard: Keep him!

[Translation]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. What Senator Simard has done, is doing or is trying to do is totally contrary to our procedures. The Chair called for the reading of petitions, but the honorable Senator Simard is using petitions to introduce a substantive point. That is totally contrary to the practice, usages and conventions of this House. It is called bootlegging, and this is bootlegging of the worst sort because Senator Simard is trying to prevent Canadians from making themselves heard in this House by stopping Senator Hébert reading petitions, giving the names of the signatories and tabling the petitions.

That is the question before us at this point. It is one of the routine proceedings before the orders of the day. That is true in this House as well as in the other place and in the parliament of just about every Commonwealth country where the British parliamentary system was adopted, even partially.

Basically, Senator Simard is telling Canadians:"Shut up." By trying to prevent Senator Hébert from presenting these petitions, he is telling the people who want to avail themselves of their ancient right to petition: "We do not want to hear you. We do not care if you are for or against the GST." In fact, he is denying Canadians their right to petition. This is a very old right prescribed by statute in the Bill of Rights of England, which applies in Canada as part of our parliamentary traditions.

It is disturbing and appalling that, almost every time senator Hébert stands up to present a petition, Senator Simard does his best to interfere and prevent him from doing it.

This a an ancient and sacred right that commoners have in this country and I appeal to . . . No, I will not appeal to anyone since I will probably be wasting my time, but I want to say to Senator Simard that what he is doing is wrong. It is wrong because it is contrary to one of the most basic democratic rights that all citizens have in a free nation. I am asking Senator Simard to stop these tactics and to let honourable senators who wish to do so read their petitions and the names of their petitioners. This is in the best parliamentary tradition. Nothing in our rules prevents us from doing it. As a matter of fact, we have the duty to present these petitions.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, you are accusing me in your point of order of trying to hold up the routine proceeding of presenting petitions. I think that for a month now, it has been more than routine, it is becoming dull. I do not wish to prevent any Canadian from being heard. I was just trying to follow up on the promise I made yesterday of tabling the transcript of an interview relating to the GST given by Mr. Tremblay on the radio.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: This has nothing to do with petitions.

● (1450)

Senator Simard: It has everything to do with the GST. Here is a Canadian who was elected and confirmed as executive director of the Fédération québécoise anti-pauvreté. He has something to say. It may not be to the liking of Senator Hébert and Senator Corbin, but Mr. Robert Tremblay expressed the opinions of his group.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: You seem to know him well!

Senator Simard: No, I don't know him. I never met him.

Senator Thériault: You know him a lot better than the executive director of the Federation in New Brunswick.

Senator Simard: I simply ask that his interview be tabled in this Chamber. Senator Hébert, you may proceed. It is always a pleasure to listen to you.

Senator Corbin: On the point of order. Senator Hébert, I would like to refer to the serious error made by Senator Simard. I think that although he may have the right to mention the views of certain citizens with respect to what is going on in the Senate today, he should do so at the appropriate time. He should not rise to prevent Senator Hébert from continuing to read his petitions. It is not the right time to do what he wants to do, and that is the point I am trying to make.

Senator Hébert: Thank you, Senator Corbin. I do think Senator Corbin, if he doesn't mind my saying so, is a bit hard on Senator Simard.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Not a nice thing to say.

Senator Hébert: Senator Corbin isn't listening. Senator Corbin, I think you are a bit hard on Senator Simard. Sometimes I try to put myself in Senator Simard's place. I say to myself: Here I am, defending the GST, a very poor cause. Canadians have let us know in every way possible, through petitions and polls, that they are opposed to the GST, and in spite of all that, I must defend it, come what may. And when, in some cases, our colleagues on the other side start having trouble with their consciences, like Mrs. Solange Chaput-Rolland the other day . . . When I put myself in their place, I am really glad to be on this side! Don't be too hard on Senator Simard who is defending a weak cause, with 85 per cent of Canadians against. I realize he must be most unhappy when I rise and tell him that 66 residents of St-Ambroise, Quebec, are asking the Senate to reject the GST bill. He sits there most of the time—of course he talks most of the time—but he sits there and hears, minute after minute, the names of real people who are against the GST and who took the trouble to sign a petition and send it to me with the request to read it here in the Senate, well, Senator Corbin, put yourself in Senator Simard's place. It can't be much fun for him, day after day.

Senator Corbin: Senator Hébert, my problem with Senator Simard is that I have known him for 22 years.

Senator Hébert: In that case . . . !

Senator Simard: Follow the advice of Senator Corbin, Senator Hébert, and go on reading your petitions.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: To continue:

I understand Senator Simard; it is certainly not funny to hear all this.

Senator Simard: Leave me alone, please, Senator Hébert!

Senator Hébert: It would be my pleasure, Senator.

(Names of signatories read)

And now, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 90 citizens from the St. Charles de Bourget's region, Quebec, that are asking the Senate to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

Of course, I have 54,000 other names, but if one of my colleagues wants to take over... they all look a little absent-minded!

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: If I may, Senator Hébert.

Senator Hébert: Go ahead, Senator Thériault.

Senator Simard: You have had enough, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: No, not at all, Senator Simard, I am just generous. I want to allow all regions to express themselves, not only the ones from Quebec.

[English]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a petition that I am anxious to present and place on the record of this house because it was handed to me and not sent by post. At a gathering I attended, I promised the people who signed the petition that I would place their names on the record of the Senate.

[Translation]

I should say, in French, that I did not have time to read carefully the document that Senator Simard sent us.

I ask my colleagues, above all my serious colleagues from Quebec, to read this interview again and to realize by themselves if it has much worth considering the kind of language used by that individual and which did such an impression on Senator Simard. As far as I am concerned, he is welcome to receive his support.

As it has often been said, I can easily understand that Senator Simard has to turn his ears toward Quebec. Polls show, I believe, that 26 per cent of Quebecers support the GST. It is the region in Canada where it gets the highest support. The same goes for the Prime Minister and the Conservative party—26 per cent. I don't blame them for taking advantage of every possible opportunity to prove that someone in Canada supports them.

Seriously, I ask for the second time my French colleagues from Quebec to read this interview again and to judge its worth by themselves.

● (1510)

[English]

As I said, I promised that I would read the names of the people on these petitions, because they are representative of the whole Miramichi area, the area from where I come, and is the riding that I represented in the legislature for 20 years.

Senator Frith: It has perhaps the best salmon fishing in Canada.

Senator Thériault: The best salmon river fishing.

Senator Frith: I said "perhaps" because of Newfoundland.

Senator Thériault: It is the best. It is not as good as it used to be, but some day, when they clean up the pollution mess that is occuring in the river at the moment, due especially to the mill in Newcastle, perhaps it will again become by far the best salmon river in the world.

Senator Frith: That saves me. It used to be the best.

Senator Thériault: I will read the names of the petitioners.

(Names of signatories read)

There is the name Richard McAllister on this petition. I think that at one time he was a Tory candidate, if I remember correctly.

Senator Frith: Hesaw the light.

Senator Thériault: Another name is Marianne Haché. She was a hospital administrator in Chatham for a long time.

(Names of signatories read)

I think I will have to skip the next one because it is so well written that I—

Senator Doody: No, no, say it is not so.

Senator Thériault: Alphonse Way, Newcastle, New Brunswick. By the way, this man, Alphonse Way, is a paraplegic in a wheelchair, and he insisted on having his name placed on this petition.

(Names of signatories read)

As I said earlier, that is the promise I made; and now I have fulfilled that promise, as Senator Simard has said, about the Prime Minister. I want to tell you that there is a petition coming that I am sure Senator Simard and Senator Robertson will be anxious to see, because they are forever quoting Premier McKenna. On the last day of their sitting last week, the New Brunswick legislature passed unanimously a resolution praying that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Government in the Senate stop their bulldozing tactics in trying to impose the GST on the people of New Brunswick.

Honourable senators, like many other senators, I have a large number of letters which I have received over the past weeks and months. I have found that impressive because, as honourable senators will know, I have, like a number of other senators in this chamber, been around for a while. For a number of years, I was part of the government or the Opposition in New Brunswick, and from time to time I am sure there were unpopular measures passed by the legislature. However, never in my life, at the local, provincial or federal level, have I had so many people write to me personally, asking me, as a senator, to do what I can to try to prevent this terrible tax from being imposed on the people of Canada.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! Absolutely right!

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is incredible. Never before, as the Prime Minister travels this country, as he is doing now—and he has been in office for six years—have people tried so hard to give him a message. One would have thought that someone in this place, or in the other place, would have had enough common sense to admit that there are sections of this legislation that will hurt people very badly.

• (1520)

I know that my colleague from New Brunswick, Senator Robertson, is determined about the work she is doing in trying to help with the illiteracy problem that we have in this country and, in particular, in my province. But she then turns around and votes on a tax on books.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Thériault: This was an amendment that was made in good faith and honesty by the Opposition. It is an amendment that the Prime Minister himself states he should like to favour. But, no, the government does not want to admit that the tax is wrong. If it does not want to admit that the whole tax is wrong, then surely someone must have enough common sense to admit that there are things included in the bill that should be taken out.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: The exemption that we asked for on reading material would amount to peanuts in dollars.

I watched the interview that was mentioned here yesterday with Yves Seguin, the former minister in Mr. Bourassa's government. He stated that he was prepared to bet money that this tax would bring in $30 billion in the first year. Sentors on this side of the chamber, have received numerous requests from different levels of society regarding the taxing of reading material—and the Prime Minister has said that he does not feel good about it; yet the government is still too stubborn to admit that it can accept the amendment.

Yesterday in this house we heard from my colleague in New Brunswick, Senator Robertson, about the MacEachen budget. I do not remember in what year it occurred, but it was presented in good faith by the government of the day, and by Mr. MacEachen, who was then the Minister of Finance. When people got hold of it, however, they started to raise objections to it. As any government should, when the mass of people whom you are elected to govern are dissatisfied with your policy, changes were made to that budget.

What is wrong with a Prime Minister, or a government made up of men and women who are human beings, admitting that sometimes they can be wrong? In this case we have a government led by a person who for the first four years in government would not move unless the polls told him what he should do. He then lost some credibility because he would not do anything unless he was in agreement with the polls. This time, he turns it around—he will show them how tough he is. But he is wrong on both counts.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Thériault: He was wrong in the first term by doing nothing, and he is wrong in this term by being so stubborn that he has 80 per cent of the population against him. He is imposing a tax at the outset of a recession, if not a depression, that will hurt the economy across this country.

Senator Perrault: There will be no amendments to this, either!

Senator Thériault: He will also not accept one single amendment, even if it costs only a few million dollars out of a tax revenue that will amount to $30 billion.

Senator Lucier: It is a seamless web!

Senator Thériault: I said this before—and I will repeat it, because I mean it—this country is in terrible shape. People have lost faith in their government; they have lost faith in politicians; and they are cynical of every measure that has been taken, especially at the national level. The country is on the verge of breaking up. At the same time, we have a government that is so determined that it is right and cannot be wrong, and that the people are wrong, that it will not listen to anyone.

Senator Haidasz: It is inflexible!

Senator Thériault: So, honourable senators, I again tell my colleagues across the way that you are the ones who used to accuse the Liberal Party—and perhaps with some justification at one time—of governing with divine right. They were wrong if they ever thought that. In the 30 or 40 years that the Liberals were in government, they never showed the kind of arrogance that this government has. According to some people, Prime Minister Trudeau was the most arrogant person that ever lived in this country. But he never showed the kind of arrogance, stubbornness and carelessness that is being displayed by the government and the Prime Minister today.

Senator Haidasz: You mean stupidity!

Senator Thériault: The government of the day said it wanted to reduce the deficit. According to the government, we have just gone through six of the best years of economic growth that we have seen for a long time; but the government did not take advantage of that economic boom by tremendously increasing the revenues to reduce the deficit, as it should have done and as it said it would do.

What do we hear now? We hear from enator Castonguay, and others in this place, that we are paying because of the mistakes made by the Liberal government six years ago.

Senator Perrault: They are living in the past!

Senator Thériault: Yes. In Ontario there was a change of government just two months ago. I do not hear Premier Rae crying and blaming the former government. Premier Rae, who was the leader of the provincial opposition party, knew what the situation was and asked to be elected premier. The people elected him premier and he has to face the responsibilities inherent in that position.

We had a change of government in my province in 1987. We had a terrible increase in the deficit in the province during the 17 years that the Tories governed, but the Leader of the Liberal Party knew about it. He was a member of the legislature and knew what the finances of the province were. He asked the people of New Brunswick to elect him, and they did. I have never heard Premier McKenna blame the former government. He is the premier, and he has to accept the responsibility. When will you people on the other side accept the fact that you are the government and you have to accept the responsibility for your actions?

If you want to try to make cheap politics out of it, fine; but everyone knows that in 1984, when the Conservative government was elected, we had just gone through one of the worst recessions in the western world since the Great Depression.

● (1530)

But we turned the corner in 1984. In fact, the state of the economy of Canada in 1984 was one of the best we ever had. Six months of that period were under the Liberals and six months were under the Conservatives. Those are the facts. Since then there has been an increase in the growth of the economy, but the deficit has also increased. One of the reasons for this is that the government did not cause a reduction in the unemployment rate. From 1945 to 1984 we had in Canada an unemployment rate of 4 per cent, and the government's economic policies were based on those facts. Now, at the beginning of another recession, we have an unemployment rate of almost 9 per cent. What is going to happen to the country during this recession? Gradually the government has eroded the social safety net that protected the poorer people during a depression.

The other day, Senator Castonguay asked me if I had ever been part of a government that had to budget not according to need but to means.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I can tell Senator Castonguay that the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament has done some research for me, and it shows that during the three years that Senator Castonguay was a minister in the Quebec Government, the growth in the deficit and the public debt was twice as much as that of Canada. During the years you were in government, deficit and debt in the province of Quebec grew twice as fast as deficit and debt in Canada.

After six years of economic boom, you are financially hard-pressed and not in situation where you can care for the poor, the very people who need protection during a recession. You just removed $4 billions from the unemployment insurance fund. In some parts of the province of New Brunswick, people who must rely on unemployment insurance have seen their benefits shrink by half. Today, you are saying that you have no choice, that you must introduce a tax, the GST.

Last week, the Governement of New Brunswick announced an increase in the cost of production of electricity, and also that this increase would have to be passed onto consumers in 1991. There will be three different increases totalling more than 12 per cent. If you add to that the 7 per cent GST, the cost of heating in New Brunswick will go up 20 per cent in 1991.

That is why we introduced an amendment dealing with home heating. I don't know what the situation is elsewhere, but in my province it is the poorest who have to pay the most for their heating. True, rich people have bigger houses, but they are better insulated. Very often, poor people live in the coldest houses, and they pay twice as much to heat them. This is a direct attack on the poorest Canadians.

Once more, I ask you, honourable senators, to reconsider your position and to recognize that if the financial situation of the country is such that this legislation cannot be dropped, at least you should show some compassion and you should have the courage to accept amendments which will not cost very much, but will be very helpful to the very poor. Someone else could go on reading petitions.

[English]

Hon D. G. Steuart: Thank you, honourable senators. I enjoyed the petitions that you read, Senator Thériault.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Steuart: I would like to read some petitions from Saskatchewan regarding the proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners of this document humbly pray the honourable Senate to prevail on the government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Where did the name "Saskatchewan" come from?

Senator Steuart: Saskatchewan is an Indian name meaning "meeting place by the river."

Senator Marchand: Who met by the river?

Senator Steuart: The Indians. Then we chased them up north and took over the land. The first name on the petition is Robert Hey from Strasbourg, Saskatchewan. This is a German settlement that has many hardworking people. I presume Robert Hey is speaking for many others on this petition from Strasbourg.

Senator Bonnell: Were there many German settlers in Saskatchewan?

Senator Steuart: The ethnic German population is the second largest ethnic population in Saskatchewan. They are a large and important part of our population. The next name I have is Lynette Boos, Box 148, Bethune. I am not sure if that town was named after the great Dr. Bethune, who was such a hero to the Chinese people, but I think it was.

Senator Bonnell: Are there many Chinese in that area?

Senator Steuart: One. I think he had a café and then he left.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a name from Ottawa Street, Regina, which is in an area that is comprised of low income, hardworking families who are going to be badly hurt by the GST because most of them have an income just above the amount required to get any money back. So they will be hurt, as they usually are, worse than anyone else in society. The next name on the petition is Alice Hisson, Box 44, Palmer, Saskatchewan.

Senator Bonnell: Where is that?

Senator Steuart: I wish you had not asked, because I do not know. I have been in almost every small town in Saskatchewan, but I missed Palmer. I must have blinked my eyes as I was going down the road.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1540)

These names are from another area of Regina where the working people live. This is another indication of how strongly they feel about this, that they would go to the trouble, honourable senators, to sign a petition and send it to Ottawa. They are petitioning the government not to proceed with the goods and services tax. But, as Senator Thériault said so ably, unfortunately the government is not paying attention. I suppose it has no intention of stopping this tax.

The only answer to that, of course, is to defeat the government and bring in Jean Chrétien, who will take the tax off and replace it with a fairer, more equitable tax. That was just an aside.

(Names of signatories read)

This petition shows that not all of the well-off people are in favour of this tax. Most of them are against it.

(Names of signatories read)

That was at one time a prosperous farming community, but now it is just another farming community, unfortunately. It is not very prosperous.

Senator Bonnell: The same holds true for all of Canada now.

Senator Steuart: That is right, from coast to coast. Just think, free trade saved us, but I don't know from what. The government would not stop and listen to us then, either.

Senator Bonnell: It will stop and listen to us this time.

Senator Steuart: I would hope so.

(Names of signatories read)

Turning to the next page of the petition, it again states that the undersigned humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Doody: Do you think you will finish reading that page by January?

Senator Steuart: This page? With any luck, yes. You may have to stop me at 5:45 this afternoon, although if you would like me to carry on for two or three days, to enable me to get all of these petitions read, I will do so. If we could get a house order to that effect, that would be true democracy. Honourable senators, I shall continue.

[Senator Steuart.]

(Names of signatories read)

● (1550)

Honourable senators, I have another petition on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax. The petition reads:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed Goods and Services Tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a document here from Senator Simard that I might read. Will you send us an English copy?

Senator Simard: No, but I have something to add and I will send it over right now. It is from a French newspaper.

Senator Steuart: I hope you send us the English version. I will now continue reading the petitions.

(Names of signatories read)

● (1600)

Riceton is a very small town. It does matter whether people are from small towns or large cities, they are against the GST.

I would now like to read another petition on the subject of the proposed goods and services tax. These undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read]

The next name on the petition is from Kamsack, Saskatchewan. Many Russian people settled in Kamsack in the early part of the century. Many of them were Doukhobors. I believe some Doukhobors went to B.C.

Senator Simard: Are you reading petitions or making a presentation.

Senator Steuart: I am attempting to explain the background of some of these people so that you will understand how widespread the fear and anger is about the GST. We want you to soften your heart and vote with us. Am I making any headway?

Senator Simard: This morning's poll indicates that Mr. Chrétien has lost 33 points in Ontario.

Senator Steuart: Let us know when he is as low as you are and we will change our tactics.

Senator Simard: Mr. Chrétien has not made one single decision in three months, and he has lost 33 points in Ontario.

Senator Steuart: He made a decision that when he is Prime Minister he will eliminate this tax. Did you not see that decision? You have your head in the sand. You are not sure what is going on. Mr. Chrétien will become Prime Minister when Mr. Mulroney gets the nerve to call an election.

Senator Simard: That is his last-stated position.

Senator Steuart: That was only a week ago. He will be ready to take another position next week. I would hate to be in

Mr. Mulroney's position. Some of his positions have been quite peculiar.

I am glad you are beginning to see the light. Unfortunately for the Tories, the light at the end of the tunnel is a freight train.

I have never heard of half these places. I must drive around one of these days. Stan, you are not much of a writer; I will tell you that. Stan Obsowich—I must telephone him when I get to Regina.

(Names of signatories read)

That is interesting? The Cramers—I think they became big Tories. I do not know if they are any relation; I hope they are. It will show a softening of their attitude toward the ordinary people. E. Austin, Sanderson Crescent, Regina, may be related to Senator Jack Austin; I do not know.

(Names of signatories read)

Is the honourable senator ready to read some petitions?

Hon. Joan Neiman: I am.

Senator Steuart: You are just dying to read some petitions? Perhaps I should yield to the senator from South Dakota or South Regina. Do honourable senators wish me to continue reading?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Simard: Did you say "South Dakota or South Regina?"

Senator Neiman: Thank you, Senator Steuart. Honourable senators, I want to start off Presentation of Petitions by presenting a number of petitions—289 in all—from the Ottawa-Kanata-Nepean area. This one is a very particular and rather elegant kind of petition. I hope that these people, whose names I will read to you—and even those that I do not read, because I do not think I have the time to read them all—will understand that we tried our best, but given the events of last week, we were not successful. However, I should read their petition, which says:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable House will therefor provide a remedy.

HUMBLY SHEWETH

> WHEREAS the Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers, and now proposes to include them in GST;
> WHEREAS uninhibited dissemination of the printed word as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by GST application.
> WHEREFORE the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate of Canada to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in tax free status for the printed word by proposing amendment to Bill C-62 to include retention of the zero rate AND as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

As I say, it is a pity that we have not been able to accommodate them, but, as you know, we on this side, and some of our friends among the independent senators, did their best to support this petition. These names, as I say, are all from the Ottawa area, and I shall give honourable senators just a sampling of the 289. Where indicated or where not indicated, they will be from the city of Ottawa proper.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: That is a mixed bag.

Senator Neiman: Indeed, it is.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Simard: How many millions have we spent on this nonsense?

Senator Neiman: Oh, we could spend a great deal longer on it, senator, than we are. I am just giving you a sample of the names we have here.

Senator Simard: May I remind you and your colleagues that according to the latest estimate we are now approaching $3 million in additional expenditure because of this filibuster.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Latest estimate?

Senator Simard: The figures are not all in yet, so please be brief and save taxpayers some money.

Senator Frith: What were the earlier estimates? The figures are not all in yet.

Senator Neiman: It is very difficult to be brief with the volume of petitions we have here.

Senator Simard: As long as you realize the impact on the taxpayers.

Senator Neiman: Senator Simard, I am a little concerned about your estimate of estimates. I believe that previously they have been somewhat wrong.

Senator Frith: Did any of the petitioners ask us to be brief?

Senator Simard: The figures are not all in yet, according to the staff.

Senator Neiman: I really believe that each one of these petitioners would like me to read his or her name into the record, but I will spare you that.

Some Hon. Senators: Continue; read on, read on.

Senator Simard: I think you have not realized—maybe you have—what you just said. It is not entered in the record. The names are not entered in the record.

Senator Neiman: But we want them to know each name.

Senator Simard: They are mentioned here, but unless you grab them like this, they will never be recorded in the record.

Senator Frith: What they want is for you to listen. You are listening, and that is worth it.

Senator Neiman: Yes.

• (1620)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would Senator Neiman allow me a question?

Senator Neiman: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: Would Senator Simard not save the taxpayers some money by not repeating his objection over and over again—an objection that has to be printed, whereas the names do not have to be printed.

Senator Neiman: That is an excellent observation, Senator Gigantès. He would save time, too, so that I could read a few more names instead.

(Names of signatories read)

I should remind honourable senators that each one of these petitions is a petition to ask us to change those portions of the GST that would place a tax on reading material for the first time in our history. Unfortunately, you did not listen. For that reason I must subject you to a few more names, so that you will understand the depth and breadth of your omissions and commissions.

Senator Corbin: Madawaska, Ontario or Madawaska, New Brunswick?

Senator Neiman: This is Madawaska, Ontario, which, as I recall, is in the same area of Peterborough and Lakefield.

Senator Corbin: Madawaska is up the valley. There is a Madawaska River that feeds into the Ottawa River. So it is north of the area you mentioned. A number of members of the House of Commons have cottages in that area. That is probably where they are this week.

I have another 26 signatures here. The list is quite endless. These are names, for the most part, from the Toronto area.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have 81 petitions from the Hamilton area and all of the little villages around there.

(Names of signatories read)

As I say, honourable senators, I have 81 petitions from this general area, all signed by people asking us to defeat the GST, or to do what we can to stop it.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL REVENUE

JUSTIFICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURES—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have received a communication from an employee of the Department of National Revenue on the west coast. It was sent to me here in Ottawa. I have been asked to raise this question in the Senate. It reads thus:

On Nov. 5, 6 & 7, 1990, 75 employees of the Vancouver District Office of Revenue Canada-Taxation will be going to the Delta Mountain Inn, Whistler, B.C. for a seminar.

We have on our premises at 1166 W. Pender St., 4 training rooms on the 16th floor that would be more than adequate. The cost of this outing is unknown to me but 75 people × 2 nights accommodation + 3 meals a day + 2 coffee breaks a day + round trip on a bus & conference room for 3 days is not small potatoes.

As a taxpayer I am outraged at this waste of taxpayers' money, yours & mine.

The waste that takes place in this office alone is unbelievable. For instance such as new desks exactly the same as the old ones except for oak tops instead of mahogany. And they're exactly the same desks. Elaborate work stations that sit empty. To make for more wasteful spending, every employee is to receive 4 hours paid leisure time to pursue an activity, be it sailing, golf, picnic or whatever. 800 employees × 4 hours × $20.00 an hour (average) ₨ $64,000.00 wasted dollars. 3200 wasted hours. (You wonder why you can't get through on the phone?)

Who the hell is making these decisions? How much salary is he making?

Someone has to account for these decisions. It must stop! The public must be told what is going on.

"IT MUST STOP"

Is this happening in every federal government Office?

Honourable senators, I do not expect the Leader of the Government to have a reply to this, but it is a situation that warrants someone looking into as to whether or not there has been a waste of taxpayers' dollars at that office. I am not making a political accusation, but could the Leader of the Government pass this information along to his cabinet colleague to see whether the facts can be ascertained?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators, I shall be glad to do so. If Mr. Jelinek wishes to comment, I will be pleased to bring his comments to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Frith: In their usual colourful form?

Senator Murray: Having said that, honourable senators, I think I should point out that the present government has kept the increase in operating expenses of the government to an average of about 3.6 per cent per year over the past few years, which is lower than the rate of inflation. However, there is always room for improvement. I appreciate the constructive spirit in which this employee has got in touch with Senator Perrault.

POSSIBLE DEPLOYMENT OF GROUND FORCES—OPPORTUNITY FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I read in the press that the Minister of External Affairs, the Honourable Joseph Clark, speaking with Secretary Baker from the United States, discussed interviews he has had with other foreign leaders. I wonder whether we can be brought up to date on the situation with regard to Canada. Can the minister tell us what Mr. Clark found out respecting the situation in the Middle East? Can he assure us that ground troops will not be sent to the Middle East until Parliament has had an opportunity to discuss and debate the matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I understand that Secretary Baker and Mr. Clark were meeting today in Bermuda. I have not had an opportunity to speak to Mr. Clark or to obtain a report on this matter. I shall endeavour to do so at the earliest possible opportunity and will present the report here.

Senator Bonnell: Can the government leader assure the house that if Mr. Baker asks Mr. Clark, or if President Bush asks Prime Minister Mulroney, to send ground troops to Saudi Arabia, Iraq or Kuwait, that it will not happen without an opportunity for debate on the matter in both houses of Parliament?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should remind the honourable senator that the dispatch of ships and CF-18s to that area was in support of United Nations Security Council resolutions. It has been the subject of an order in council, and of a debate and a motion which has passed the House of Commons.

As far as any dispatch of ground troops is concerned, that is quite a hypothetical question. Certainly the government has undertaken that if hostilities break out there would be another resolution brought to Parliament.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It is all right to talk about hypothetical questions and to say that a resolution was passed in the other place, but I am talking about Parliament. Will there be an opportunity to discuss this matter in Parliament? Will a debate take place in both houses?

Senator Murray: To what matter are you referring?

Senator Bonnell: I am referring to the matter of sending ground troops to Saudi Arabia, Kuwait or Iraq—to the Gulf. I am talking about their being deployed or sent into battle. Before Canada should declare war, or take part in a war, can we not have the assurance of the government leader that there will be an opportunity for a full debate before Parliament—not the House of Commons, but Parliament?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has now raised not one but three hypothetical questions.

Senator Bonnell: Well, answer the three of them.

Senator Murray: No minister can answer hypothetical questions.

Senator Perrault: They give hypothetical answers!

• (1650)

Senator Murray: The first question concerned the dispatch of ground troops, which, if it came to that, I believe would be authorized under the terms of the present resolution of the Order in Council and the resolution which passed the House of Commons. The second and third questions concerned a possible declaration of war. I can assure the honourable senators that Parliament would have to be consulted on that.

RECOGNITION OF SENATORS BY CHAIR

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable Senators, I rise on a point of order. I notice that the Chair is now recognizing people who stand. The standard practice in this house is for members to rise and not wait for the Chair to recognize them, because members do not address the Chair, they address each other across the chamber. I think this practice is, on the part of the Chair—l'on dit "inconvenant", for lack of a better word in English—and we on this side are in a position to accommodate our colleagues. I do not think we need an arbitrator to tell us who will be next to ask questions or, for that matter, to make a speech.

I have the greatest respect for the present occupant of the Chair. However, my friend is now acting as a Speaker and I do not think that the Speaker should take upon himself to decide which of us will put a question. Our system has worked very well in the past and I think it will work equally well in the future.

In other words, we can accommodate each other and police ourselves. I notice that this trend of recognizing people who wish to put questions has been developing during the last week or ten days. I, for one, object to this practice. I hope we will return to our standard practice of rising whenever we wish, of yielding to our colleagues who may be rising at the same time, and work it out on a friendly basis without expecting or asking the Chair to intervene. That is my point of order.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I suggest to Senator Corbin—

Senator Corbin: I did not ask the Chair for a ruling. Honourable colleagues, I cannot see at this point that the Chair must intervene on my point of order. I have not asked the Chair to intervene.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, if my colleague wishes to answer the question, I would be most pleased to yield my position to him.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: On the point of order raised by Senator Corbin, I would point out that the Chair is the presiding officer. I believe the normal practice is that when two or more senators have risen, the Chair recognizes the senator to be heard. I trust that has not caused anyone to lose his right to ask a question. Perhaps the Honourable Senator Corbin is ashamed to have those names called out. That I can understand.

Senator Corbin: May I say, in reply, that Rule 26 is quite clear. It says:

> When two or more senators rise to speak . . .

Presumably there would be a difference of opinion between the two senators as to who rose first. However, the rule says "When two or more senators rise to speak." It does not say "to put a question." The rule continues.

> . . . the Speaker shall call upon the senator who in the Speaker's opinion first rose; but a motion may be made that any senator who has risen "be now heard" or "do now speak".

The convention in the Senate has always been that the rule be put aside, until very recently. A convention has been developed whereby we police ourselves. Are we now to have the Chair police us? I do not think that is acceptable at all.

Senator Perrault: I will yield my position to anyone who wishes to ask a question, but I do have a supplementary with respect to the Iraqi situation.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Honourable senators, I believe that when Senator Phillips responded to the point of order, he may have misunderstood. The words Senator Phillips used were, that the Speaker should recognize senators to be heard. I believe that the Speaker's recognizing has a different interpretation from that of the actual written word of the rule. The Speaker cannot decide who will speak, which is what "recognizing a senator" means. Thank you.

CANADIAN HOSTAGES IN IRAQ—PROPOSAL TO SEND PARLIAMENTARY NEGOTIATORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond Perrault: I have a question with respect to the Middle-East situation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, war referring to the visit of the three M.P.'s. whether or not they have yet departed, I do not know. There was some delay this morning, and perhaps the Leader of the Government has some further information. Mr. Clark is reported to have said:

> Such a trip would provide propaganda fodder for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein.

Is there a suggestion that Edward Heath, Willy Brandt, and the former Japanese Prime Minister, Yasuhiro Nakasone, were merely involved in providing propaganda fodder for Iraqi President Saddam Hussein?

The second question I wish to ask is this: Kuwait has never been known as being a model of democracy; indeed, allegations have been made that the Opposition have either been done away with or put in jail.

As part of our negotiations with other nations in an attempt to bring to heel a person such as Saddam Hussein, who is reported to have violated human rights on a very large scale, have there been any discussions about post-war Kuwait, and whether or not it is to be a democratic nation; whether the certain members of the Official Opposition of the government of that country, if indeed they are in jail, will be released; and whether we will see some attempt by the intervening nations—including Canada—to make certain that the human rights of Kuwaitis will be protected in a post-crisis Kuwait?

In other words, Canada, in company with most other countries in the world, condemns the Iraqi invasion and purported annexation of Kuwait, and demands the unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. As to the particular form of government that Kuwait had, or may have, that is another question altogether.

With regard to the first part of the question asked by the honourable senator, I would appreciate it if he would put on the Table or read the quotation which he attributes to Mr. Clark.

• (1700)

I am familiar with those words. I do not believe they were used to describe the unofficial visit to Iraq by Messrs. Axworthy, Robinson and Corbett.

Senator Perrault: The text is from the Toronto Star on November 13. The quote is:

> External Affairs Minister Joe Clark says such a trip would provide propaganda fodder for Iraqi president Saddam Hussein. And it could undermine the tough no-negotiations stance of the American-led coalition in the Persian Gulf.

Senator Murray: If my friend will read the entire article, the reference is to an official delegation from Canada. Canada has declined to send such a delegation, as have most of the other countries that my friend has mentioned. When Mr. Willy Brandt of Germany, Mr. Edward Heath of England, and former Japanese Prime Minister Nakasone went to the Gulf area, they were travelling on a personal and unofficial basis and not as official representatives of their countries.

Senator Perrault: I hope the Leader of the Government is not suggesting that Mr. Heath's journey to Iraq had the full and enthusiastic endorsation of Mrs. Thatcher. It did not, of course.

Senator Murray: It did not. That is what I am saying.

Senator Perrault: Our mission overseas is in that same category; it isto be unofficial.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Clark is quoted as saying that the trip would provide propaganda fodder. You are saying it is in relation to an official visit sponsored by the Government of Canada.

It would be helpful if the Leader of the Government would table the full text of the External Affairs Minister's statement on that subject. If, in fact, Mr. Clark did mention the word "official" in his release, then that would serve to clear up the point.

BREACHES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW—IMPACT ON KUWAITIS—UNITED NATIONS' SANCTIONS—IMPLICATIONS FOR CANADA—EFFECT OF "WATER WEAPON"—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I should like to ask a supplemental question on the same topic, unless the leader wishes to respond to Senator Perrault.

Reports from Amnesty International in the press suggest that the Iraqi government has committed serious and obscene breaches of international law on the population in Kuwait. Has the Government of Canada made representations to the Ambassador of Iraq here or through the Canadian Ambassador in Iraq with respect to those obscene breaches of international law and the impact they are having on the lives of Kuwaitis remaining in Kuwait?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would have to make inquiries of the Department of External Affairs, and I shall do so.

Senator Grafstein: Statements have been made by the government that it is appropriate that the world community await the sanctions and the impact that those sanctions would have on Iraq in order to convince the Iraqi government that they should withdraw from Kuwait. Under some appropriate theories of international law, sanctions and the boarding of vessels and blockade are in themselves acts of war. The question I have for the Leader of the Government is this: Has Canada been involved in acts of war through its implementation of the United Nations' sanctions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is no.

Senator Grafstein: Again dealing with sanctions, the Government of Canada, together with other Western Nations, as well as Arab nations who have been involved in the coalition against Iraq, have suggested that time should be afforded in order for the sanctions to work. An innovative suggestion was made last week by strategists in the United States to the effect that a major sanction, called the water weapon, had not been adopted—a sanction that would cause the Iraqi population to respond more quickly.

The suggestion has been made that the source of the Euphrates, which is in Turkey, could be quickly blocked off. The lack of water would cause tremendous havoc in Iraq. Has the Government of Canada given any thought to this? If not, could the Leader of the Government respond at an appropriate time?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall inquire as to whether the Minister of External Affairs has any comment to make on that suggestion.

THE ENGLISH ALPHABET

CANADIAN PRONUNCIATION OF TWENTY-SIXTH LETTER

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a simple question. Could he identify the twenty-sixth letter of the alphabet?

Hon. Lowell Murray: "Zed."

Senator Davey: I am delighted with that answer, because one week ago tonight on Baton Broadcasting I watched the Prime Minister of Canada respond to questions over the telephone. To my absolute astonishment and dismay the Prime Minister made reference to going from "A TO Zee." I know that the government opposite is in love with everything American. I understand that is part of their policy. However, are we now preparing to change the alphabet? Is "Zed" becoming "Zee?" If not, would you have a word with the Prime Minister?

FISHERIES

LABOUR STANDARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a more serious question to ask the Government Leader. It relates to the use made of the primary commodity of the Maritimes: fish.

I have here an article published in L'Acadie Nouvelle on November 6 about a problem affecting a local business, the Fishermen's Co-operative Association of Lamèque Island, in New Brunswick. It quotes the president of the association, Mr. Rhéal Chiasson, whom I met at lunchtime to discuss this issue.

Mr. Chiasson told us that, even though the problem is not quite as acute now, 17,000 people did not report for work at his plant during the 1989 fishing season for one reason or another. This year there were nearly 9,000. He was referring among other things to the problem created by the Unemployment Insurance Act that we just improved, to the great displeasure of the senators opposite. He said that 800,000 pounds of fish could have been processed at his plant during last year's fall fishing season. However, the production had to be limited to 100,000 pounds because people refused to work for only a week or two days a week, knowing that they would eventually be penalized by the law. We all know that unemployment insurance stamps are based on weekly earnings periods.

Mr. Chiasson told us that the government should perhaps try to solve this problem, for instance by modifying the Act so as to allow the workers to accumulate the hours worked in the plant without being penalized when they work only one or two days a week.

Could your government look at the suggestions made by the members of the Lamèque Co-operative. I think they are faced with a serious problem. We deplored it while reviewing the Unemployment Insurance Act with a view to improving this Act so that plant owners do not have to suffer because people refuse to show up when asked to work only two days a week.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Honourable senators, that question is complicated, but I have the answer.

Senator Simard: It is the Unemployment Insurance Act—

Senator Murray: I know. I am pleased to refer that question to my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. If necessary, I could provide an answer later.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, the people from the Lamèque Co-operative have referred that problem to Minister Valcourt. I invite you to examine this case. I know that, once again, the government will want to respond as soon as possible and give the Unemployment Insurance Act the flexibility that we, on this side, all wish. In other words, I would like to provide you with another public evidence that the sympathy, the understanding of the fisheries problems is not coming only from the Liberal side of this House.

Senator Thériault: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since he finds the question somewhat complicated, simply to review the submissions that have been presented to us in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island while we were travelling with the committee studying Bill C-21. He will find the answer in there.

Senator Simard: I would like to thank my colleague for this suggestion. Why did you not mention this during the committee study?

[English]

Senator Frith: He is filibustering our Question Period.

CITIZENS' FORUM

COMPOSITION OF COMMISSION—NORTHERN REPRESENTATION—NATURE AND SCOPE OF COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the Citizens' Forum. Before I ask my questions, I would like to comment that I asked some questions last week on the forum and was told by the minister that I hated Keith Spicer for some reason. I explained that I had never met him and never talked to him and really do not have much time to hate him. As I said then—and as I say now—I do not hate many people I do know, let alone the ones that I do not know. The same position was taken with Senator Olson when he asked his questions last week. He too was told that he hated Keith Spicer so much. He also explained that he had never met him or spoken to him.

That brought back for me some memories of Meech Lake. When I first started asking questions in this chamber about Meech Lake, I was continuously told by the minister, and we were also told by the Prime Minister, that if we were against Meech Lake we were anti-Quebec. I did not like that tactic then and I do not like it now.

I would like to make it clear that I am not talking about Keith Spicer; I am talking about the commission, or forum, and I am speaking of the makeup of the forum and the task that it will be asked to perform.

I would say to the government leader that I do not appreciate being confronted with yet another forum where if one is opposed to something one is presumed to hate the person with whom one is dealing. I have no qualms about Mr. Keith Spicer. I just want to make it known that I do not like the forum that has been set up.

Mr. Spicer made his first little trip into the north, which was the first part of his mandate. After listening to the concerns of northern Canadians, he failed a key test on Saturday. The head of the Citizens' Forum on Canada's future was told bluntly that it is not good enough simply to consult with northerners; that they want to be part of the process of shaping the direction of the country. However, Mr. Spicer said that he would not expand his 11member advisory board to add two northern representatives, although he is personally sympathetic and wishes Brian Mulroney had appointed a northerner to the forum.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: The Prime Minister has said that if Mr. Spicer wants someone from the north on the forum, he can appoint someone. My first question to the Leader of the Government is: Why is there not someone from the north already on the forum? Why can these two people not get together and appoint someone from the north to that Citizens' Forum?

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, when this forum was first announced, we heard stories that it would be just an advisory group or a forum to go around the country and allow people to speak for themselves. That was bad enough. We are now informed that this forum is really the first of a series, with at least one more forum coming along that is to reshape Canada.

I am reading from the Citizen of November 10—

Senator Frith: Maybe that will be the election.

Senator Lucier: Unfortunately, it does not seem to be quite that far down the road.

Senator Frith: The best Citizens' Forum is an election, right now.

Senator Lucier: I am quoting here from an article in the Citizen written by Paul Gessell. The headline is "PM preparing Meech Lake II: Overhaul of Confederation in works, says top official":

> Meech Lake, The Sequel is quietly being scripted in the Prime Minister's Office and the production promises to be much more complex and fascinating than the original.
> The result could be a radical reshaping of the country.

It then states, farther down in the article:

> The official, one of Mulroney's main constitutional advisers, rarely grants interviews and asked to remain anonymous.
> "Canada, in the year 2000, will have to have some important changes in the way in which federal and provincial governments operate and exercise their powers," he said. "We're not talking about changes in the margin."

What I would like to ask the Leader of the Government is this: Is there another agenda that we have not been told about? Is there in fact, another forum being discussed, a forum of academics or constitutional experts, or some other group that is being put together in the background? I think, as Allan Fotheringham said, the Citizens' Forum will provide a 30-second clip for the real action that will come when the next group is put together. If this process is becoming extensive, it seems to me that it makes a lot more sense to have representatives of northern Canada involved in the regional process.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in a number of public statements that I have made, perhaps including statements in this chamber, I have not excluded the possibility that at some point the government may wish to have a study done on the specific question of the amending process; nor have I precluded the possibility, as I said in an exchange I had in this place a week or so ago with Senator Marshall, of eventually appointing a royal commission on the whole range of aboriginal concerns.

Senator Lucier: I have a short follow-up question. I know that I will not get a positive answer to this question, but I will ask it again, and again, and again. We seem to be moving in the direction of some serious constitutional reform. I am not disagreeing with that happening, nor am I quarrelling with that or whether or not we need it; but that seems to be the direction we are taking. I again heard the Prime Minister concerning this last night. I do not think he is denying that that is where the thrust will be; but if that is what we are to do, is it not more important that we have some representation from other parts of the country?

In Inuvik, the first place Mr. Spicer visited, the people told him, "Look, we are getting tired of being studied. We do not want you coming up here asking us how we feel. We want to be part of a process where we are asking the questions."

Senator Bonnell: He read them some poetry!

Senator Lucier: Well, it was great that he read them some poetry. But I do not want to get into a debate about Mr. Spicer himself; I am talking about the process.

Can we not make you understand that as long as we are not part of the process it will not work? It did not work with Meech Lake, and it will not work this time. You should not have to fail every time around.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I explained on a number of previous occasions in this place that the Citizens' Forum is not concerning itself with constitutional reforms, nor do we expect that they will bring back a series of recommendations with regard to constitutional reform. There will be no constitutional reform in this country unless we can succeed in building or rebuilding a consensus on some of the more fundamental questions of our national existence. It is for the purpose of promoting and encouraging a dialogue among Canadians on those fundamental questions, a number of which I listed in this place on several occasions last week, that the Citizens' Forum has been appointed.

I regret that the honourable senator does not find my answers to his questions satisfactory, but he cannot dispute that I have addressed all these matters on several occasions in the past week or two. I have done so to the best of my knowledge and ability.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, the minister is correct. I do not question the fact that he has attempted to answer my questions, and he is also right that I am not satisfied with the answers. He has said again that the government is searching for a consensus, that if we do not arrive at a consensus of where we want to go, we cannot have serious constitutional reform. That brings me back to what I was saying before: How can you achieve a consensus when you leave out one-third of Canada? That is my point.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should read the reply that I gave to his very first question today—which I have given on numerous occasions in the past week or so—namely, that the members of the forum are not there to act as representatives of any particular group or point of view. The purpose of the forum is to give Canadians of all backgrounds, regions and walks of life an opportunity to participate directly and to represent themselves.

CRITERIA FOR SELECTION OF COMMISSIONERS—REPRESENTATION FROM NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a supplementary question. Senator Murray has just told us that the members of the forum have not been selected as representative of different regions or sections of society. In other words, their function is not to represent views and interests.

[Senator Lucier.]

May I then ask the honourable senator: On the basis of what criteria was Mr. Spicer selected? Also, on the basis of what criteria were other members of this body selected? I assume that there were criteria. For example, why was Mr. Cashin chosen from Newfoundland over other Newfoundlanders? What about the situation in Nova Scotia, for example? Why did we fail the criteria? I assume that this is an important body. It would be interesting to know on what criteria its members were selected.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government had a—

Senator Bonnell: Good Tories!

Senator Murray: —long list of . . . Pardon me?

Senator Bonnell: I said "Good Tories".

Senator Murray: If there are many Tories on that commission, I should like to have them identified.

Senator Cools: Not Spicer!

Senator Murray: I have managed campaigns for the Tory Party in the past and I have not seen many—indeed, I do not think I have seen any of those people—

Senator Stewart: You should explain the selection process to Nova Scotians!

Senator Murray:—in the circles in which I travel politically.

Senator Gigantès: Maybe they are fastidious Tories!

Senator Murray: The government selected 12 people from a much longer list. We selected them on the basis of their ability as individuals and their capacity to contribute to this process.

Senator Stewart: Contribute how? You said it was on the basis of their capacity and ability to contribute. I assume that this would apply to hundreds of thousands of people across the land. What are the criteria of "ability"; and what are the criteria of "competence to contribute"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what I believe all these people have in common is a devotion to Canada and an open mind as to the differing opinions and perspectives that will be presented in the course of their hearings.

In the case of Mr. Cashin, who was mentioned, it so happens that he is a former member of the other House. It so happens that he is also a union leader. He was a member of the Pépin-Robarts Commission and must be presumed to have particular qualifications.

If I had their biographies in front of me I could suggest very unique qualifications in the case of each of the members of the Citizens' Forum.

Senator Stewart: Could we now concentrate on Nova Scotia? Would the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why the appointee from Nova Scotia was selected?

Senator Murray: Who is that?

Senator Stewart: That is the point! It was no one! No one in all of Nova Scotia met the criteria! We are humiliated.

Senator Murray: I am sorry to hear that.

Senator Barootes: If you were not a senator, we would have sent you!

• (1730)

TRANSCRIPTION OF PROCEEDINGS—AVAILABILITY TO SENATE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Incidentally, we all wish Mr. Spicer well, along with his colleagues. As well, I totally agree with my friend from Nova Scotia that there should be representation from that great province, as well as from northern Canada. Most of the media reports from the north relating to Mr. Spicer's visit have indicated his deep love for poetry, but surely, there must have been more going on there on the weekend than poetry readings. I am positive of that.

An article in today's Globe and Mail is entitled, "Spicer Seeks Unity in Poetry". Mr. Spicer said that he was searching for poetry in the Canadian soul. I hope he is looking for other things as well. He said that the committee was going to bring on the people and the poets first. Would there be merit, then, in the submission by the Senate of a rhyming brief to the Spicer commission? It might qualify as poetry as well as representing the Senate's contribution.

Senator Frith: Let's not jump on poetry now.

Senator Perrault: I am not attacking poetry, and the house leader of our party rightly points out the value of the arts.

Seriously, however, my question is this: Is a transcript of these meetings with the people of Canada being prepared? It would be of great use to the members of the Senate to have access to the transcripts of the meetings from various parts of the country. The story in the Globe and Mail today emphasized Mr. Spicer's alleged interest in determining whether there is poetry in the Canadian soul. That made a good story, but surely some evidence was presented at that meeting on the weekend regarding the attitude of the people of the north toward the future of Canada as a nation. There is not a word in this story about any substantive suggestions made by the great people of our north. I wonder if we could have the assurance that, if there is a transcript, it will be regularly sent to honourable senators so we may track the progress of this committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Perrault: Apparently, blank verse or not, as long as it is verse it will have an inside edge—a priority—with the commission. So let us strive for something that rhymes, and the Senate will be heard.

FINANCE

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND U.S. INTEREST RATES—REDUCTION IN CANADIAN INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to international interest rates. The Canadian interest rates still appear to be at historic levels—

Senator Doody: Could we have order, honourable senators? It is very difficult to hear because so many meetings are going on around the chamber.

Senator Grafstein: Canadian interest rates versus those of the United States appear to be at historic levels of difference. Could the Leader of the Government indicate to us whether or not he anticipates a reduction in interest rates in the short term?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator has raised two matters, one of which is the spread between Canadian and American interest rates, which he alleges is at an historic high. I am not sure if that is true. There has been some narrowing in the spread recently. The second part of the question is whether I expect a decrease in Canadian interest rates in the short term. I would not be so rash as to make a prediction on the short term. I simply observe, as I have done in reply to Senator Olson on several occasions, that the trend has definitely been downward.

SOFTENING OF WAGE SETTLEMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, it appears that the motivation of the Bank of Canada influencing its policy with respect to high interest rates is inflation. Can the Leader of the Government give us any indication, based on recent statistics, as to whether or not there has been a softening of wage settlements, which would lead Canadians to believe that interest rates will be, in the short term, subject to a reduction?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The government shares the concern of the Bank of Canada about inflation. There, too, the trend line has been downward. I would have to ask for some advice from our economic and financial advisers with respect to recent wage settlements throughout the country, in both the public and private sectors, before I could reply intelligently to the honourable senator's question.

Senator Olson: Could you do that?

Senator Grafstein: After consulting with government economists, could you provide the Senate with an indication of what reduction in interest rates would be necessary in order to be equal to the revenues accruing to the government by the MST?

PERSIAN GULF

DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—STATEMENT OF THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOE CLARK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question. This afternoon I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, say on television that Canada would not deploy into a battle mode unless the United Nations Security Council passed a resolution to that effect. Is it now the position of the Canadian government that it would support a motion to the effect that Iraq should be attacked and that Canada should participate in that aggression?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): My honourable friend should be more careful with his words and thoughts. The aggressor is Iraq. I have not seen or heard the statement that my friend attributes to Mr. Clark. I would have to obtain advice from Mr. Clark or his department on the matter, and I will undertake to do so.

Senator Corbin: I may have sown confusion in the honourable leader's mind, for which I apologize. Of course Iraq is the aggressor. Canada is now in the Gulf with its ships and planes to enforce an embargo, which is the consequence of a decision of the United Nations. Today Mr. Clark said that that would remain Canada's position until—if and when—the United Nations authorized the next step, which would be taking military action against the aggressor; in other words, going into a battle mode with Iraq. I want to know—and I apologize if I misinterpreted Mr. Clark's comments, but they were loud and clear to me—if the present situation will remain until the U.N. changes its decisions or resolutions. Arising out of that statement of Mr. Clark, will Canada go along with other nations, which think they have waited patiently, and liberate Kuwait from its aggressor? Is that the Canadian position and will that be put forward at any meeting of the Security Council?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that question, like previous ones put by Senator Bonnell, is hypothetical. However, I shall obtain further information on the statement Senator Corbin attributes to Mr. Clark, and I will bring in a report at an early date.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

RECONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have another question. It follows on many questions already put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and to Senator Doody on previous occasions.

I should like to know whether the federal government at this stage, after many months of study, planning, and deliberating, has arrived at a decision regarding the financing of the reconstruction of some of the worst segments of the Trans-Canada Highway, which are in New Brunswick. The Prime Minister of Canada has admitted that much. Last year or the previous year, I forget exactly when, he did say that New Brunswick had some of the worst sections of the Trans-Canada Highway. He stated that it would have to be rebuilt one way or another.

The answers I have always received in reply to my questions were to the effect that studies were being undertaken and that the government should await the results of those studies before deciding whether it would finance the rebuilding of the Trans-Canada Highway. I ask the Government Leader this: Is there any news on that front?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I did not hear the last part of the honourable senator's question, but I think I have the general drift of it. I have to tell him that no decision has been made by the government on this matter.

Senator Corbin: If Senator Simard had not been talking to the Government Leader—and he interrupts everybody around this place—the leader probably would have heard my question. Can the Government Leader not do something with him? He is not my responsibility—he is the responsibility of the Leader of the Government. Can you not gag him when it is not his turn to speak?

REMEMBRANCE DAY

ABSENCE OF GOVERNOR GENERAL FROM SERVICES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure he is aware that the Royal Canadian Legion expressed its deep regret, to put it mildly, even its anger, according to an article in the Globe and Mail of November 10, 1990, at the planned absence of the Governor General, Ray Hnatyshyn, from the Ottawa Remembrance Day services. My question is this: Will this be the pattern for Remembrance Day services from now on?

Senator Barootes: Come on! What a silly question!

Senator Corbin: Why does Senator Barootes not see his doctor if he has a problem?

Will that be the pattern from now on, that gradually the government will erode—because this is an erosion—the significance of commemoration services on November 11? Will it be that because some event is taking place somewhere else, the top personalities in this country will be allowed to absent themselves from the laying of wreaths at the National War Memorial on Wellington Street here in Ottawa? Will it be that, little by little, the very significance of Remembrance Day will disappear? Will Canada forget the sacrifices of her sons and daughters who fought in World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict and in peacekeeping missions of the United Nations? Is that the trend the government wishes to set?

Surely someone else could have been sent to Japan for the inauguration of the Emperor. In fact, Senator Murray could have been sent, or the person who occupies the position of the Speaker of the Senate could have been sent. He is a great world traveller sometimes. Why on this occasion was the Governor General of Canada allowed to leave the country for that sacred occasion?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I should point out that the coronation of the Emperor of Japan was attended by the heads of state or the heads of government of a large number of countries. Second, with regard to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, the Honourable Senator Corbin neglects to point out that on Remembrance Day the Governor General, together with Prince Charles, the Prince of Wales and the Governors General of a number of commonwealth countries, laid wreaths at the graves of commonwealth soldiers who died in the Second World War. I think it was entirely appropriate for the Governor General to have done that.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to questions.

PERSIAN GULF

PRESENCE OF CANADIANS IN KUWAIT AND IRAQ—PROTECTION AND REPATRIATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 29, 1990, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Persian Gulf—Presence of Canadians Kuwait and Iraq—Protection and Repatriation—Government Policy.

(The answer follows:)

Number of Canadians Present in Iraq and Kuwait

(Consular Breakdown)

Kuwait

22 Canadians: 13 uninational Canadians
9 dual national Canadians

Iraq

52 Canadians: 22 uninational Canadians
35 dual national Canadians
5 humanitarian cases

In the first several weeks after the invasion, the total number of Canadians (uninational and dual national) was 600 in Kuwait and 200 in Iraq. With respect to persons who are there against their will, we naturally want to have them freed.

Representations have been made to Iraq authorities to allow Canadian nationals to leave both Kuwait and Iraq if they so wish. In these representations we have drawn Iraq's attention to a small number of particularly pressing humanitarian cases of elderly or sick Canadians.

The Canadian Government is also looking to see if there is some way in which we can offer help to those Canadians whose families are unable to leave Iraq or Kuwait.

Honourable senators must not forget that Iraq has an obligation to allow all Canadians wishing to leave Iraq to do so. The Security Council has stressed this obligation in its resolution.

Their refusal to allow diplomats who were based in Kuwait to leave Iraq affects both those who travelled to Baghdad before August 24 and those who made the trip on October 19.

The Iraqi Ministry of Foreign Affairs has also refused to recognize these individuals as members of the diplomatic staff of our Embassy in Baghdad and have treated them like other Canadian citizens in Iraq: They are free to move about Baghdad at will but do not, at present, have permission to leave.

As for sending a delegation of representatives to Iraq, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been categoric in presenting the official government response.

Both privately and publicly he has stated "that there will not be an official mission on the part of Canada to seek the release of these persons because we think that would be used for propaganda purposes by the Saddam Hussein regime."

PERSIAN GULF

CANADIAN RESIDENTS VOLUNTEER FOR IRAQ ARMY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 29, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding Persian Gulf—Canadian Residents Volunteer for Iraq Army—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The reports to which the Honourable Senator referred date back to the month of August.

Canadian nationals who join the Armed Forces of a foreign state at war with any friendly state may run the risk of breaking the law.

We do not interpret the law. That is for the Courts and the Law Enforcement Agencies. If anyone wants to know whether or how the Act would apply in a specific case or whether he/she would be breaking the law, he/she should seek legal advice.

As for the Iraqi Embassy's suggested involvement in recruiting for their war effort: we have made strong representations to the Embassy of Iraq indicating that any such recruitment activity is incompatible with the Embassy's role.

Meaning of property and casualty insurer

(2) In this section, a property and casualty insurer means an insurer licensed under the laws of Canada or a province to carry on a property and casualty insurance business.""

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kolber, for the Honourable Senator MacEachen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Buckwold:

That Bill C-62 be not now read the third time—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Explain!

Senator Kolber: Honourable senators, first a few introductory comments. Above all else, the government has heralded the proposed GST as a fair tax, a tax that will significantly benefit the Canadian economy. Over 75 per cent of Canadians, however, oppose this legislation.

The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation told the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee that:

> Under the proposed tax ordinary Canadians will be taxed literally from the cradle to the grave. Both diapers and coffins will be subject to more tax, which does not consider the consumer's ability to pay.

Private citizens, small- and medium-sized business, labour organizations and consumer groups have led a crusade against the GST, and as Canadians learn more about this tax, they are becoming even more resolute in their opposition. The government categorically rejects the description of the GST as a "bureaucratic nightmare". Finance Minister Wilson tells us that the new system will be far simpler and far less bureaucratic. Testimony provided to the committee, however, expresses reactions to the GST encompassing confusion, frustration, and, in some cases, complete bewilderment. Much of the confusion has resulted because of the government's inability to provide clear direction.

One of the main findings in the study of the tax conducted by Informetrica substantiates this claim:

> . . . we are bothered by the lack of planning within the federal government, how they are handling these machinations in the use of the GST and their own efforts in general. We are bothered by the misapplication of concepts there.

Many people who appeared before the committee were amazed at how little information had reached the people who are supposed to comply with the tax, and, indeed, implement it. However, even in situations where information had been available, it has been of limited value. For instance, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture came to the unfortunate conclusion that people from Revenue Canada and the Department of Finance were of little assistance. According to a spokesperson for the federation, these government officials "do not understand the industry particularly well and they are not able to answer the questions to which people need answers in order to be able to comply with the tax."

Through a series of amendments, Liberal senators have tried to lessen the negative impact of the GST on Canadians. We have focused on specific flaws and suggested alternatives. In short, we have attempted to introduce an element of fairness into the structure of this tax. The amendment on which I have the honour to speak tonight will ensure fairness for business and provide savings for consumers. We have drawn on the suggestions of witnesses who told the committee that, while they support the concept of fundamental tax reform, they recognize serious flaws in the proposed GST.

● (2010)

This amendment involves a series of measures to provide for fairer transitional relief to industries and businesses struggling to adapt to the proposed tax.

The first part of this amendment, honourable senators, deals with a discriminatory aspect of the proposed GST—namely, the general inventory rebate. The government has repeatedly assured business and consumers that considerable savings will result from the GST. However, if the government insists that business pass on savings to consumers, it must ensure that there are savings to business. Under the proposed legislation, a general inventory rebate of 8.1 per cent is to apply to a business regardless of the level or sector in which it operates. How did the government determine this rate? If a business has already paid the full 13.5 per cent federal sales tax on its inventory, a rebate of 8.1 per cent represents only partial compensation. I cannot think of very many small and medium-sized businesses that can afford to absorb that type of loss. Obviously these businesses will be forced to pass on their losses to consumers.

As a result of the GST, the government has predicted a one-time increase of 1.25 per cent in the Consumer Price Index for 1991. This projection is based on the assumption that manufacturers and businesses will remove all existing tax from prices. Honourable senators, if this amendment does not pass, I do not see how businesses will be able to remove all existing tax from their prices. The tax will have been paid and businesses will have to recover it. The consumers will pay.

If we look to other areas of the world where value-added taxes have been introduced, we discover interesting results. Unfortunately for Canadians, the government has not taken heed. According to a study by the International Monetary Fund, experience shows that price reductions rarely reflect the full tax reduction, and some allowance should be made for this.

The automobile industry was so severely discriminated against under the proposed FST rebate system that the government was obliged to set a special inventory rebate of 11.1 per cent for car dealers. As a word of explanation, car dealers would have already paid more than 8.1 per cent on their inventory. Why has the government not extended the same allowance to other businesses which can demonstrate that the tax value of their inventory exceeds 8.1 per cent? For a tax which is supposed to be based on fairness, this is an obvious inequity.

This amendment would grant businesses an FST inventory rebate equal to the amount of tax actually paid on that inventory prior to the introduction of the GST. Surely honourable senators will agree that this is a reasonable and equitable proposal. I am sure that other honourable senators will want to discuss this key component of our amendment.

Let me turn now to the second part of our amendment and its impact on a very human aspect of all our lives, namely, housing. Who has not heard touching stories about the serious erosion of every young Canadian family's dream of one day owning a home? I am sure senators from the Toronto area can particularly relate to this point. In that area, buying a first home has been almost impossible, due, of course, in large measure, to high interest rates. The GST will make the dream of owning a home even more difficult, not only because the GST is inflationary and interest rates will be jacked up once again. No, senators, there is more. This brings me to the substance of the second part of our amendment. As Bill C-62 is currently drafted, new homebuyers of homes started this year must take possession of the house before April, 1991 for an FST rebate of 5.6 per cent to be made available. After that date, the GST kicks in, whether or not the supplies used in building the house were subject to the FST. Is there one intelligent person who does not recognize that the housing industry is currently in its worst slump since 1982? Some would even say that the situation is worse now than it was back then. For those who do not fully appreciate the importance of residential construction on the Canadian economy, allow me to give you a few facts.

In 1989 an estimated $43 billion was spent on housing, roughly split evenly between the renovation sector and the new housing sector. Therefore, over $20 billion was spent on new units alone in that single year. That activity generated more than 400,000 person-years of employment for construction workers in Canada. Further, for every construction job created by home-building and renovation, more than two spin-off jobs were created in other industries across the country. We are talking here about 1.2 million person-years of employment, and that is a lot of jobs.

In 1987, residential construction directly or indirectly produced $4.4 billion in combined sales income and corporate tax revenues for the federal government. This is indeed a major industry for Canada. As I said, it is currently a very depressed sector of our economy. One can hardly give homes away, it is so bad.

The nature of the second part of our amendment recognizes this fact of life by extending by a full year, to April 1992, the limit for homebuyers to take possession of a new residence. This will allow the FST rebate to be claimed at a decreasing rate according to the construction stage of the new residential unit on January 1, 1991. Otherwise, Bill C-62 will strike another blow to the housing industry which will be left with a large inventory of unsold houses after April, 1991. These will be new units which contain a certain amount of FST paid on them. As I have said, after April, 1991 the GST would kick in on top of that and make housing affordability even more difficult because new houses will have built into their price a system of double taxation.

I know that honourable senators on both sides of the house will give full consideration to this amendment in order that young families do not lose hope of ever being able to own their own home.

Finally, honourable senators, let me turn to the third and last portion of our amendment. Once again, it is a matter of fairness and equity. However, this time it is the property and casualty industry that will be penalized. Let me explain briefly. Over the years, the insurance industry has contracted liabilities in the property and casualty sectors. It has built up a special inventory of claims that are outstanding and will only be settled next year, or perhaps in the years thereafter. For regulatory purposes, the industry is required to put away a certain amount of money to address those liabilities. At the present time, insurance representatives estimate that there is a $12 billion liability from past casualty and property policies. The premium for these policies was set at a time when the GST had not even been considered; so there was no way the industry could factor in added costs. I am talking here not about the premium per se, which is GST exempt, but, rather, I am referring to the increased costs associated with paying claims such as payments to body shops for auto repairs, homebuilders for new houses and to lawyers and accountants. These expenses will be taxable under the GST even if they are made to settle contracts of insurance that have been made over the previous five to ten years. The GST as it applies to the settlement of past claims will be a retroactive tax for which the industry could never have planned.

• (2020)

Honourable senators, I am not talking about future policies. The property and casualty insurance industry has clearly stated that as of January 1, or whenever the GST takes effect, it will adjust its pricing structure accordingly. In other words, premiums will go up to reflect the inflationary impact of the GST.

According to testimony given before Senator Buckwold's Banking, Trade and Commerce committee, Bill C-62, unless amended, will penalize heavily a key sector of the economy, and the Canadian consumer will ultimately bear the brunt of those financial losses.

What exactly are those losses estimated to be? According to the Insurance Bureau of Canada, Bill C-62 will cost the industry over $350 million. Let me tell you how this figure is arrived at. The $12 billion I mentioned earlier are reserves that are currently required to be established for solvency reasons. There is a net effect when the government drops the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and adds the 7 per cent GST. There is no tax today on professional liability insurance for lawyers, doctors and other professionals, but under the GST the total 7 per cent will be applied, as it will to any other service. However, something like fixing a roof is mixed, for it involves labour and goods. The overall net effect on the insurance industry of the GST is roughly 3 per cent across the board; that is, 3 per cent of $12 billion, or $360 million, has to be set aside and eventually paid to cover outstanding claims.

Honourable senators, this is simply retroactive taxation and is the most unfair and inequitable measure the industry has ever experienced. Unless our amendment is accepted, the impact of having the GST applied to claims arising out of past policy will translate into a significant reduction in the ability of the insurance companies, especially small- and medium-sized ones, to write new business and serve policy holders. It will reduce the ultimate capital and the solvency ability of companies to meet their claims.

Our amendment would ensure fairness and equity for the industry and, in the end, for the consumer. It seeks to provide transitional relief for a limited period of time for a unique situation in a particularly hard-hit sector.

Honourable senators, our three-part amendment restores common sense and fairness in the application of the GST, should it become law. It is worthy of our consideration and support. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, on behalf of senators on this side of the house I wish to thank Senator Kolber for his well-thought-out approach to the problem. I have a question to ask of the senator.

I wish to know from Senator Kolber if his intervention should result in one vote, two votes or three votes. It seems to me that in his triple-barreled approach, under the guise of one amendment, he attacks three problems. I do not think it is a foregone conclusion that one could be in favour of the package or against the package. It seems to me that Senator Kolber would wish to leave the option to senators to be in favour of one, and maybe against the other, or in favour of two and against one. Senator, can you tell us what in your view—

Senator Graham: Which one do you support?

Senator Cogger: I will come to you in a moment, senator.

I really wish to know if we are dealing with amendment number 5 or amendments numbered 5, 6 and 7.

Senator Kolber: Senator Cogger, I thank you for your question. It reminds me of when you were inducted into the Senate and I rushed over to congratulate you. Everybody wondered why I was doing that, and I said that until you were summoned to the Senate I was the shortest senator.

To answer your question, Senator Cogger, I think that you are either intimating or insinuating that you are in favour of one of the amendments. If indeed you are, then you can always make an amendment to my amendment. We would certainly welcome that approach in this matter.

Senator Cogger: Senator Kolber, I believe that you have not answered my question. I wish to reflect on your intervention. I assure you that I will devote at least as much time thinking about it as you have spent preparing it. I cannot at this point in time tell you whether I will be for or against point number one, two or three.

My question remains. What are you offering tonight? Is it a take-it-or-leave-it package, or can it be separated, in which case it would call for several votes? That is my only question.

Senator Kolber: Senator Cogger, being the veteran parliamentarian that you are, you surely have heard of omnibus bills. This is an omnibus amendment. You guys on the other side once rang the bells for 21 days on an omnibus bill.

Be that as it may, my suggestion to you is that if you are against all three amendments then say so. If you are against only two, then say that and offer a sub-amendment by which you will carry only one and vote in favour of it. We will certainly be happy to have that. I do not see what your problem is.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Cogger: I do not have a problem. I think you just answered my question. You are telling us that what you are offering us is a take-it-or-leave-it package and therefore what we are looking at is amendment number 5. It seems to me that if you wish us to contemplate amendments numbered 5, 6 and 7, then I think I could talk to my colleagues on this side and perhaps convince them that this is the way it should be. However, you are telling us that we are looking at the fifth amendment, which is a triple-barreled approach, and that it is a take-it-or-leave-it approach.

Senator Kolber: Honourable senators, first, you must understand that we are allowed only eight amendments. The bill is so flawed that we are trying to get in as many as possible.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, if the government will not withdraw this terrible bill, then at least it should make some amendments to make it a little more sensible and a little more just. In this case it is not only the consumers of this great country who are going to suffer, it is also the business people of the country.

I find it somewhat ironic that the Conservative government has found it possible to alienate the people on both sides of the issue, the business sector and the public sector. I have always said that it takes a particular talent to antagonize both sides of a debate. Of course, I have always thought that as far as the Tory government is concerned it has that particular talent.

So many components of certain sectors of the business community have supported or promoted Mr. Mulroney and Michael Wilson and their various initiatives that they are now paying the price for their mistakes. Hopefully, they will not repeat those errors. Judging by the polls, investing in the Tories would now be so risky that I doubt even a seasoned Las Vegas gambler would care to try it.

• (2030)

Many components of the business sector are now asking the members of this honourable institution to do something about their problems. They want relief. Although the tax should be scrapped in its entirety, if the Tories are going to bulldoze the GST through, the least they could do is seriously consider the impact on the business community, listen to their suggestions for improvement, and adopt some key amendments.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce heard from many organizations and associations, and a large number raised serious issues concerning the immediate consequences of the implementation of the GST. Some of those consequences are serious enough to warrant our attention. The three key issues which deserve attention and amendment, and which we are dealing with tonight, are, not necessarily in this order, relief for property and casualty insurers, inventory rebate and adjustment, and double taxation of home builders.

When one reads their submission and their arguments it is difficult to understand why the government has been so insensitive and refuses to make the necessary amendments to make this tax more equitable. It is so obviously inequitable. Major problems have been exposed and are predicted to occur. Surely it is the government's duty to listen, pay attention, and do something about it.

Honourable senators, the proposed amendment moved by Senator Kolber deals with the problems the witnesses identified as affecting them. One portion of the amendment would provide transitional relief for property and casualty insurers by providing them with input tax credits for a specified number of years at rates to be prescribed by regulation.

The problem which this amendment will solve is the following. The fact is that property and casualty insurers have undertaken liabilities which will be subject to the GST but for which no rebate provision has been made. According to the industry, the existing provisions of the GST would amount to a tax on the industry's capital of about $360 million.

One of the many witnesses before the Senate committee was a delegation from the Insurance Bureau of Canada, better known as the IBC. As they pointed out, their industry is a significant one. Directly and indirectly the insurance business employs some 300,000 Canadians from the Pacific to the Atlantic. The industry invests billions of dollars every year in the economy through such things as salaries, purchase of supplies, and payment of taxes. Even though the industry is on record as supporting the GST, that is not really surprising because property and casualty industry premiums are exempt from the tax. However, the industry does have a concern about the transition and implementation problems that are bound to arise. As they point out, and I quote, "this is not an esoteric accounting issue" as far as they are concerned.

Although it may sound strange, the industry argues that it is not a financial service and therefore should not be exempt. The reason is that it actually suffers from the tax exempt status it receives. Exempting the service will have the effect of taxing capital and reserves to an amount of about $360 million. Taking this much money out of reserves and capital would put serious limits on the ability of these companies to grow and expand. On the other hand, making general insurance subject to the GST would allow insurance companies to claim an input tax credit while exempt status does not grant this privilege.

[Senator Stanbury.]

The industry has said that it would like some relief in two areas. First, it would like relief from the tax in cases where reserves are inadequate to meet certain potential situations. Situations may develop where a claim is incurred prior to January 1, 1991, and some GST will be levied. Such cases will be subject to the tax but the industry will have had no opportunity to provide for such events by charging higher premiums in the past.

Second, and most important, is the transitional problem. The matter is simple and straightforward. Premiums which are currently being received will be used to fund future claims. The future claims will be subject to the GST. However, for obvious reasons, these premiums have not been adjusted for the GST. Although expenses will rise in the future, revenues will not.

Members of the Insurance Bureau of Canada have underwritten risks prior to 1991 without any knowledge of the GST consequences of doing so. This means that policies have been written with certain expected cost and return structures in place which are implicit in the pricing of these insurance policies. Where those claims are settled after 1990, reserves will have to be increased to deal with the cost of settling the claims that attract the GST; for example, the GST levied on legal fees, body shop margins and other general expenses associated with settling claims.

The financial consequences of the GST on the claims reserves of insurance companies will be, according to the IBC, very onerous. By making insurance premiums subject to the GST these companies would be able to obtain an input tax credit on any GST claims. The reduction in reserves is estimated to take about five years to become fully effective, and 60 percent of the reduction is expected to take place in 1991-92. However, as the standing committee report notes, the really dramatic impact of the GST can be fathomed much better when one looks at the situation of some individual firms. Consider, for example, the impact of the GST on the Laurentian Pacific Insurance Company. Their total profits in 1988 and 1989 were only $1.095 million. The impact of the GST in 1991 and 1992 is expected to total $1.571 million, in other words, $500,000 more than the company's profit in 1988 and 1989.

The total penalty in the case of Royal Insurance Canada, which is a larger company, is expected to be $25 million, which is equal to 3.6 percent of shareholders' equity.

Michael Wilson and the Department of Finance have said that the application of the tax would be fair and equitable. They said that they would smooth transitional problems. This hardly appears to be the case.

I am afraid that I have to agree with the IBC when it says that the GST, by not providing some form of transitional relief to address the above-noted problems, will no longer be a tax on consumption but rather will emerge as a retroactive tax on the surpluses of companies and will decrease a company's ability to write business and grow. This presumably was not the intended effect of the tax.

As a result of these problems the federal treasury will acquire a windfall gain of taxes. In the process, the GST will be terribly unfair to the insurance industry. The IBC's conservative estimate of the cost to their industry from a lack of transitional relief will be the $360 million mentioned before over a period of several years. I submit that $360 million is a large enough amount of money to warrant the transitional relief which our amendment seeks.

The insurance industry is one of the distinguishing features of a free, prosperous and developed society. The fact is we all need it. The property and casualty insurance industry has been going through some very rough times in recent years. Increased awards in court cases and rising costs have led to what many have referred to in both the United States and Canada as an insurance crisis. The high costs which were transferred to consumers more or less forced the Liberal Government of Ontario to develop a no-fault insurance plan for Ontario motorists just to keep a lid on the out-of-control rise in costs.

The policy of the federal government should be to help the insurance community to serve Canadians better by keeping insurance within everyone's reach. Instead, the government is making life more difficult for the industry, and this will ultimately have an effect on the affordability of insurance in the future. Once again the policies of this government are expected to backfire, and when they do, do not say that we did not tell you.

Another section of our amendment deals with the problems surrounding the inventory rebate. Numerous witnesses have appeared before the committee and exposed the fact that the proposed GST inventory rebate system is inadequate and that they will be penalized. One promise of the government was that in some sectors the cost of goods will actually drop and that these benefits would be passed on to consumers. If that is to be the case, then the government must ensure that savings are passed on to consumers. It appears from much of the evidence before the committee that the inadequacy of the inventory rebate system will ensure that there are no savings to be passed on.

Many of the goods that will be sold in 1991 will have been acquired by the sellers in 1990 or before. The goods in the inventories of sellers after January 1 that were acquired earlier would already have had the federal sales tax applied to them. In order to avoid this double taxation, the government is offering a transitional provision in the form of a rebate of the FST on existing inventory at the end of the year. The inventory rebate rates are determined by regulation and are not included in the bill. The general inventory rebate is supposed to be 8.1 per cent. This is to apply to businesses regardless of the trade level in which they operate. While it may be adequate for some retailers, it will be inadequate for importers who pay the full 13.5 per cent amount on their inventory.

The government has made a special provision for automobile dealers, who would clearly be disadvantaged by the 8.1 per cent rebate. What Senator Kolber's proposed amendment would do is give businesses an FST inventory rebate equal to the amount of tax paid on that inventory, subject to the provision that the minister can verify this amount. Should the amount not be readily verifiable, the FST rebate would be determined according to the prescribable rates, as is now the case in the bill. The problem heard by the committee was that the inventory rebate system is arbitrary in its application. There appear to be inequities in the effect of these rules. Many of the witnesses testified before the committee that they would be penalized by the rebate rates. While the government seems to believe that only automobile dealers can easily calculate and identify the amount of tax in their inventories, many other associations believe that their members can do so just as well.

The broadly-based rebate rules will clearly penalize some while over-compensating others. The Canadian Cosmetic, Toiletry and Fragrance Association appeared before the committee during its hearings and addressed the issue of inventory rebates. According to this association, the shortfall on the rebate will be 4.4 per cent. On a modest inventory value of $100,000, this means $4,400. The government has said that one of the objectives of the tax reform is to make it neutral. That means that business decisions should not be a factor in the tax component because it would make no difference. However, here is a clear demonstration of where the system will disrupt trading patterns, because it will not be neutral. Retailers will attempt to seek relief by a number of alternative measures. The association has predicted that retailers will attempt to seek relief in one of the following ways: First, by requesting compensation for a shortfall of tax recovery from their suppliers; second, return all inventory on hand December 31, 1990 to their suppliers; third, hold inventory on a consignment basis; or, four, reduce purchases during the peak cosmetic sales period of Christmas 1990 in order to avoid having too much left over stock afterwards.

These alternatives will cause severe disruption in the cosmetic industry. According to the association, the disruption of normal trading patterns will have a disastrous effect on the cosmetic industry in Canada. It seems that Tories like disasters. Almost everything they do turns into a disaster. Whether it is national unity, free trade or tax, the end result always appears to be the same.

Now, honourable senators, I want to deal with a situation where the government has truly achieved the absurd. That is in the double taxation of the home building sector. As it currently stands, the provisions of Bill C-62 would apply the GST to the sale of new and substantially renovated houses. However, purchases of new homes will be eligible for a rebate under most circumstances. Those purchasing a unit valued at $350,000 or less will enjoy a rebate of 36 per cent of the GST paid, reducing the effective GST rate to 4.5 per cent. Purchasers of homes valued above $450,000 will receive no rebate, and for homes valued between $350,000 and $450,000 the rebate declines from $8,750 to zero as the price of the house increases.

Senator Buckwold: That is based on land as well.

Senator Stanbury: As Senator Buckwold has just mentioned, that is based on land as well as buildings.

These rebates are also supposed to be available to the purchasers of condominiums. Avoidance of double taxation of both the FST and the GST is supposed to be achieved through an FST inventory rebate. For new homes, the FST rebate is supposed to be limited to homes sold before April 1, 1991. Such a provision is not a problem in an upward moving market. However, the market trend right now is strictly downward, and there is a problem of double taxation.

For months people have complained that this tax is another example of the government taxing the citizen to death. This situation offers a perfect example. Is it not enough to tax an item once? Is it absolutely necessary to tax something twice? If the government is willing to tolerate double taxation, can triple or quadruple taxation be far behind? One of the many groups that addressed this issue was the Urban Development Institute. The institute represents more than 600 commercial and residential property developers and related companies across Canada. The institute has raised the example of houses that are completed after March 1991 or unoccupied on April 1, 1991. In such cases no rebate will be paid. This situation will result in the eventual purchaser paying both the federal sales tax and the GST—in other words, double taxation.

In the downward-turning market, the spectre of double taxation only means that a miserably slow-moving housing market will become even slower. Developers who need the cash flow to begin their next projects will end up holding properties which they cannot even sell at drastically reduced prices. A good example of how distressing this spectre is on the horizon was brought to my attention in a letter from Mason Homes Limited. Other honourable senators may have received the same letter. This is a developer in the Toronto area who sold about 400 homes in 1988-89. Some of them were completed in 1990. However, some of the newly constructed homes were not presold. The market is in such terrible shape that the developer has not sold a single unconstructed home in 1990. Currently the developer is carrying 16 homes upon which the FST has already been paid. The looming GST will only increase it.

● (2050)

As the manager of the firm told me on the telephone—it is unthinkable that the government would permit double taxation of this kind. The existing inventory should be exempt, regardless of when it will sell. He believes that this provision is contrary to the provisions of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and he will be pursuing that avenue of approach.

Honourable Senators, the Toronto Home Builders' Association pointed out in its brief to the committee that national housing starts have hit their lowest level since March, 1986. In Toronto, starts were down 59 per cent from May, and 71 per cent from last June. Unfortunately, it appears that the situation will get worse before it gets better.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Rather than dealing the industry a potential knock-out blow, the government should be devising ways of helping to kick-start the industry. The proposed amendment would be a good place to start.

During a recession, many homeowners decide to save money by renovating their existing homes; and many builders decide to renovate rather than build anew. They will not escape the GST either. A Canadian Press article in the Lethbridge Herald about two weeks ago describes the problem. The headline is "Home renovation labor GST target". The article reads as follows:

> The kitchen's too dark, the bathroom's too small or the kids are sick of sharing a bedroom.
> All good reasons for home renovation.
> The timing for those considering such home-improvement projects—from simple repairs to expensive knocking out of walls and adding rooms or garages—may be greatly affected by the new goods and services tax due Jan. 1.
> We'll pay slightly higher taxes on building and decorating materials. But the real jolt will be on labor. For the first time, those who are not do-it-yourselfers will pay seven per cent federal tax on any hired labor.
> Even those who want to tackle the project themselves and escape the GST on labor will pay the new tax on rentals of equipment such as floor sanders or concrete mixers.
> "It'll be a net increase, there's no doubt about that," says David Lawson of the Canadian Home Builders' Association.
> The tax breakdown is complicated. The current federal sales tax—known as the manufacturers' tax—on structural building materials such as lumber and bricks is nine per cent. It's 13.5 per cent on interior items such as paint, wallpaper and light fixtures.
> Those rates are paid by the manufacturer at the wholesale level and passed to the consumer hidden in the retail price.
> When GST is applied instead, however, the buyer pays seven per cent on that retail price—which varies but can be significantly higher than wholesale. That's why the net tax hit on the wallet will usually be greater.
> A few examples: sales tax (not including provincial sales tax) paid on sand and gravel will rise by 5.8 per cent; 2.3 per cent on lumber; 2.5 percent on plywood and 4.1 per cent on nails and bolts. That's according to the independent Ottawa-based Consumer Information Office, based on Statistics Canada data.
> Tax on plumbing equipment will go up by 1.6 per cent and by 2.6 per cent on cement. . . .
> The big new cost of renovations or repairs, tax-wise, is labor.
> Lawson offers this example: a contractor sends a worker to install an electrical fixture. The worker charges the contractor $25 an hour.

"But we (the contractor) will bill him to you at $40," Lawson explains.

"You will pay the tax (seven per cent) on his rate at $40. You'll also pay the tax on the materials. If we bought the fixture at $50 and we knock it up to $80, you'll pay the tax on the $80.

"You will pay seven per cent on the total end cost—the service and the goods.

Some Canadians are renovating now to avoid the GST. But most intended to get the work done anyway and have speeded it up to avoid paying the tax, Lawson says.

If the work can be done for $2,000 to $3,000, potential pre-GST savings are marginal, he noted.

"But if it's going to be $10,000 or more, then $700 plus begins to become a significant amount."

Considering that the average homeowner spent about $2,600 on repairs and renovations in 1988, it's clearly on a lot of minds. National spending for the year was $ll.1 billion, says Statistics Canada.

And Frank Clayton, a housing economist in Toronto, expects that will soon boom to $20.8 billion as aging babyboomers decide to gussy up their homes.

The federal government may not ever see a good portion of the GST on renovation labor costs, he predicts.

"The tax will encourage more black-market work," he says. "A lot of renovation work is already done under the table for income-tax purposes.

"They won't be able to avoid the tax on materials—you have to buy them from somebody. But the labour aspect of renovations will become a larger part of the hidden economy."

What a sad story. We are driving our people to dishonesty.

Honourable Senators, in conclusion, the property and casualty insurers of Canada deserve and need transitional relief during the implementation period of the GST. The government owes it to them. Failure to give it will amount to a theft of capital through the guise of tax.

Further, businesses should be able to obtain an FST inventory rebate equal to the amount of the tax paid on that inventory. If they pay one tax and then the government changes the rules, businesses should be able to get the right amount of compensation. It is only common sense and fair play—but we are beginning to not expect that from the Tory government.

During World War II Winston Churchill remarked, with regard to the pilots during the Battle of Britain, that never before in the history of mankind had so many owed so much to so few. Honourable Senators, as the Liberals here try to amend this tax and desperately try to make the government realize the folly and undemocratic nature of what it is doing, I have no hesitation in saying, somewhat immodestly, that at no time during the past six years of Tory rule have so many been so grateful to so few for attempting to insist on some fairness in our tax system.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Stanbury: Public opinion polls show that we have the support of the overwhelming majority of the people, not just emotionally but because the GST is bad. The amendments which I have just discussed are wholeheartedly supported by business. One day the Tories will take their own inventory and find that, because they have been so ridiculously intransigent, they have no allies left at all and there certainly will be no credit—either tax or otherwise—for having imposed the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable Senators, I rise to take part in the debate on the amendment proposed by Senator Kolber and to make a few observations on the anomalies contained in Bill 62. I also want to add that I have never, in the thirteen and a half years I have been in this chamber, received so much mail directed against a single piece of legislation, such as the bill that is before us today.

• (2100)

Honourable senators, in 1991, if all goes as planned by the federal government, Canadians will be faced with a new tax whenever they purchase a wide range of goods and services. This new sales tax will, for most Canadians, be applied in addition to the existing retail sales taxes with which they are now familiar.

Undoubtedly, the single largest expenditure made by families relates to housing. This is true whether they own or rent. The tax treatment of this sector is thus very important to personal finances. My intervention will examine the effect of the goods and services tax on housing markets by considering the way it affects new construction, on the rental market and the resale market.

Initially, the GST was to have been set at 9 per cent, imposing, therefore, a 9 per cent tax rate on the retail price of a new house purchased from a developer or of a substantially renovated house. This includes the land on which the house is built as well as the value added in the construction of the house. Thus, the GST had the potential to increase substantially the price of new houses.

To offset this impact, the government planned to rebate up to one-half of the GST otherwise owing, subject to restrictions on the price of the house. The intent was to impose a 4.5 per cent GST rate on the vast majority of new homes, those priced at $350,000 or less. More expensive new homes also faced higher effective GST rates.

The GST is now to be set at 7 per cent. The government still intends that the vast majority of new houses will have an effective tax rate of 4.5 per cent. Thus, for all new homes purchased at a price of $350,000 or less, a rebate of 2.5 per cent will be offered. Homes priced between $350,000 and $450,000 will be subject to an effective GST rate which rises gradually from 4.5 per cent to 7 per cent. New homes costing more than $450,000 will be subject to the full 7 per cent rate.

Newly constructed homes must compete with the existing stock of homes, which will not be subject to a tax upon resale except in certain circumstances. Buyers see the two as being relatively close substitutes. In the minds of consumers, the total prices they are willing to pay for these two types of housing are linked. The fact that one component faces a tax while the other does not is irrelevant to them. Thus, the relative price of new and old housing should remain relatively stable with the imposition of a tax on new housing.

Consider a housing market with a taxed and an untaxed sector. Applying the GST to one sector will drive up the price, reducing the quantity demanded and increasing the price spread between the two sectors. Since the two types of houses are substitutes, this increase in relative price will cause some housing demand to shift from the taxed sector to the untaxed sector. However, an increased demand for untaxed housing cannot bring forth any increase in supply, since all new housing is, by definition, taxed. Therefore, prices must rise. The GST will cause new house construction to decline and raise prices in both sectors.

In the future, the stock of untaxed housing will decline as older homes are destroyed or renovated. Population and income growth, along with demographic change, will increase the demand for housing. Yet any net addition to the housing stock must come from the taxed sector. This, then, is the marginal supply at which the price will be determined.

The introduction of the GST on new housing will then raise house prices and confer a profit on owners of existing housing; but the first-time buyer will nevertheless always be a loser, whether he buys a new home or an old home.

The GST will also affect rental accommodations in a negative way. When a building is constructed in 1991 or later, all aspects of the construction will be subject to the GST, as will the cost of the land. Long-term residential rents are to be exempt from the GST. No tax will be collected on these rents and the landlord cannot claim an input tax credit on any GST paid. The tenant will then pay a rent which effectively includes a GST component for all the value added into the rental accommodation, except for this last stage.

Newspaper reports indicate that rent review authorities would consider the GST paid as a legitimate expense in the determination of rents. Any subsequent sale of this building will then also be exempt from this tax.

Buildings constructed prior to 1991 were never subject to a GST, although they were subject to the federal sales tax in existence at the time of construction.

Commercial and short-term residential rentals are subject to the GST. In this case, landlords are eligible for a full input credit on GST paid. Subsequent sales of these buildings are subject to the tax.

Again, the obvious question to consider is the impact of this new tax on the price of rental accommodation. Rentals in new buildings will be subject to the tax, although this tax component will be hidden from the consumer and will effectively be less than 7 per cent. Such a tax does not apply to residential rents in older buildings. From the point of view of the consumer, the relative demand for the two types of rental accommodation will not change and, therefore, the equilibrium price should stay about the same.

The introduction of a new and larger tax on new construction should raise rents across the board. To see how this would work, consider the case where the market is at equilibrium. A stock of older rental accommodation exists and faces some level of demand. This sets a market price. The alternative market consists of new rental accommodation. In this sector, there is also some market price established according to supply and demand. If a tax is introduced into the new sector, the price there will rise and the quantity demanded will fall. However, it should be remembered that older accommodation is a substitute for newer accommodation and, as the tax drives up the price of new apartments relative to old apartments, the demand will shift from one market to the other. However, the increased demand for older apartments cannot bring about an increased supply, so the consequences will be fully reflected in price hikes.

Rent controls complicate this picture, but they do not alter the fact that excess demand will exist in this sector. If it cannot be eliminated via price increases, other adjustments will take place. In any event, it is clear that developments in the taxed sector will also affect the non-taxed sector. Prices will rise in both segments of the market, and the amount of new construction should decline.

The GST will increase costs of operation, even in older buildings. Any materials used for maintenance and repairs will now be subject to a 7 per cent tax. So will purchases of utilities other than water. These additional costs to landlords will definitely be passed on to consumers.

The committee heard much evidence on the impact of the GST on the housing sector, particularly during our hearings in Toronto and Vancouver. The committee learned that in high-cost land markets the effective federal sales tax embedded in a new home is only 2.5 per cent, and the consequent increase in prices due to the GST will be at least 2 per cent, and as high as 3 per cent in the Toronto area. This is significantly higher than the government's estimate.

These high land costs also imply that the GST rebate system could be inadequate in those regions, unintentionally denying a full rebate to some households in this part of the country, to whom the government intended to deliver a rebate.

Witnesses before the committee also spoke of the effect of the GST on soft costs associated with housing. A 7 per cent tax on real estate and legal fees would raise the cost of purchasing a home by as much as one-half of 1 per cent.

● (2110)

According to those witnesses, rental accommodation would also suffer, even though long-term residential rates are exempt from the tax. In Ontario, tenants in new buildings could see rents increasing by $50 per month. New rental accommodation is not granted a GST rebate similar to that offered to new owner-occupied accommodation. In Vancouver, the effect is expected to be between $27 and $56 per month. The Canadian

Real Estate Association gave an estimate of between $41 and $61 per month in increased rents.

The committee also learned that the transitional provisions for the housing sector are not as straightforward and, apparently, not as fair as they are for other sectors of the economy. In many cases, the inventory of homes being held by builders could be subject to double taxation. If possession is not transferred to owners until after April, 1991, no FST inventory rebate is given. Current market conditions make it difficult for builders to draw down these inventories.

Multiple unit buildings under construction at the start of the year will also receive unfavourable FST inventory rebates. The maximum rebate for an unfinished building as of January 1, 1991 is 75 per cent of estimated FST paid. Since not all FST would be recovered, the application of the new GST on such buildings would result in a degree of double taxation.

I received a letter from a company called Paradise Homes, which states:

Dear Sir,

I am writing to highlight a particularly unfair aspect of the GST transition provisions.

Under the GST transitional rules, all industries except the housing industry will get rebates for inventory on hand at December 31, 1990. With new housing, purchasers of new homes started prior to December 31, 1990 will be eligible for an FST rebate of two-thirds of 4.25% of the purchase price if the transaction is closed prior to February 15, 1991. After that date, however, no FST rebates are available.

Under the above scenario, double taxation has been built into the system, contrary to the intent of the transition provisions, in that inventory standing at December 31, 1990 will carry the full FST content, and be subject to the full GST if it remains unsold on March 31, 1990.

While I am concerned with this problem of double taxation per se, I am even more concerned that this situation can only prolong the current slump in an industry which must return to health if the country's economic outlook is expected to improve.

The higher than normal inventory levels were not planned (the Toronto-area housing market has been a pre-sale market for some time) but have been caused in large part by the phenomenon of "walk-aways", i.e., people who have failed to close deals which were made some time ago. The walk-away problem has been caused in large part by the current high interest rates.

There is a simple solution to this problem, and that would be to extend the deadlines for the FST rebate provisions or to allow builders the same rebates which are available to purchasers following the March 31, 1991 deadline.

I am not personally opposed to the Goods & Services Tax, however, I am offended by double taxation, and by the short-sightedness of the transition provisions.

I would strongly encourage you to take an objective look at this issue and would appreciate your support in attempting to obtain an amendment in this regard.

Yours sincerely,

Paradise Homes
Eddie Weisz

The FST inventory rebate is designed to ensure that, after December 31, 1990, no double taxation applies to supplies upon which the GST is charged. The general inventory rebate rules do not apply to new housing. In this case, a more complicated and less fair system is put into place.

In no case does Bill C-62 grant a full FST inventory rebate on housing, and in many cases it grants no rebate.

In the case of a single unit home, where construction started before 1991, the maximum FST rebate to be given would be two-thirds of the estimated FST embedded in the price of the home. This would be granted only if possession is transferred before February 15, 1991. If possession is transferred after that date but before April 1, 1991, the rebate is limited to one-third of the estimated FST. If possession is transferred after April 1, 1991, no rebate is granted.

If a house is started in 1990 and completed in 1991 it will have a lower FST content than a house completed in 1990. This is due to the fact that some inputs will be purchased after the FST is eliminated. However, there can be a long delay between completion and transfer of possession, something the bill does not take into account. Given the current state of the housing market, it will be common to see homes built in 1990 being sold late in 1991. The impact on housing prices will be dramatic.

For example, if a house completed in 1990 and sold in 1991 were sold before February 15, 1991, the tax on the house would be 4.5 per cent GST, after the new home rebate, plus 1.42 per cent remaining FST content for a total of 5.92 per cent.

If the house is completed in 1990 and sold after February 15, 1991 but before April 1, 1991, the tax on the house will be 4.5 per cent GST, after the new home rebate, plus 2.84 per cent remaining FST content for a total of 7.34 per cent.

If the house is completed in 1990 and sold after March 31, 1991, the tax on the house will be 4.5 per cent GST, after the new home rebate, plus 4.25 per cent FST for a total of 8.75 per cent.

This double taxation will make it very difficult for builders to sell the existing stock of housing, an inventory which is already carrying a high interest cost. The federal government's argument that the tax will have little impact on house prices also becomes less credible. Just as important, this double taxation penalizes a sector of the economy which has already been hard hit by the recession.

According to the Urban Development Institute, to which my colleague, Senator Stanbury, referred, there are currently thousands of unsold new homes in Canada. Moreover, many homes which appear to have been sold will never close as buyers walk away from the deal. Most important of all, the transition period that the government has chosen, January to March, is a period in which new home sales are at their lowest. Therefore, if homes are not sold by this December, there is little likelihood that they will be sold before April, 1991.

This amendment attempts to rectify this problem. Sub-amendment (b) allows builders until April, 1992 to sell their inventory and still qualify for a rebate of FST. Moreover, it only limits the percentage of the rebate in cases where warranted, that is, when substantive construction is still being done in 1991. If a house was built before 1991, it could and should receive a full FST rebate.

This problem is not unique to single-family dwellings. In the case of multiple-unit dwellings, no full FST is ever granted under the provisions of the bill, even if a building is completed at the end of 1990. It should be recalled that residential units constructed for the rental market receive no GST new home rebate. Thus, a new apartment complex would have a total effective tax content in 1991 of 8 per cent. That is to say, 7 per cent GST, plus 1 per cent remaining on the federal sales tax. Despite the tax exempt status of rents in such a new building, they would increase by more than the government is willing to admit.

This sub-amendment (c) allows for a 100 per cent federal sales tax rebate on all units which are more than 75 per cent complete as of the end of 1990. With these amendments, new housing would be treated the way other goods are treated with respect to the FST inventory rebate. All actual FST embedded in a new home would be rebated.

Proponents of the GST, those who are presumably supporters of the government, are begging honourable senators to rectify these anomalies in the legislation. Bill C-62 is a cruel piece of legislation. I do not mean to say that you, Mr. Minister, are cruel, but the effect of allowing double taxation to apply on housing is unfair and cruel. I ask you and the government supporters to accept this fair amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I was thinking that I should tell honourable senators opposite why they are being subjected to me tonight. It is because earlier today, while our whip was casting his eye about for a volunteer, he looked at me. Senators opposite know the government whip and probably call him "senator warmth" as we do. I told him that if I spoke I would take the fifth amendment. Thus, he told me to go ahead.

Honourable senators, I would like to deal first with the property and casualty insurance part of Senator Kolber's amendment. This amendment raises two key questions regarding the application of the GST. These are the treatment of financial services generally, and the particular circumstances where transitional provisions are warranted.

In both areas, the government's approach as reflected in Bill C-62 has been to treat these major areas in ways which are consistent with its fundamental concern that the tax be equitable within industry sectors, so that there is nothing in the design of the tax that adversely affects one company relative to another.

[Senator Bosa.]

With respect to the treatment of financial services, the overall design of the GST in the area of financial services was the subject of very extensive consultation with the financial services industry, including banks, financial institutions such as caisses populaires, trust companies, life insurance companies, property and casualty insurance companies, and brokers, dealers and underwriters in financial instruments.

Clearly, in theory, it would be desirable to tax all services, including financial services, in the context of a broadly-based tax like the GST. However, in the process of consultations with the financial services industry, it became apparent that in addition to posing formidable technical problems, taxing financial services would have been complex, potentially unfair to particular firms both within and between industry groups, as well as unfair to consumers. As well, taxing financial services is something which has never been done before in any jurisdiction with a value-added tax. This would certainly have been a risky—perhaps even imprudent—course of action for the government to take. As a result, it was decided that financial services generally—and I emphasize the word "generally"—ought to be exempt.

The treatment of financial services will be uniform throughout the financial services industry. That is to say, consumers will not be charged a tax on financial services. In the same way as they currently pay the 13.5 per cent FST and the 11 per cent telecommunications tax, providers of financial services will continue to pay sales tax on their purchases.

Clearly, establishing a level playing-field is extremely important given the pace of change and the evolving framework for competition in this industry, and that is what Bill C-62 provides.

The key transitional issue in the property and casualty insurance industry and, more generally, in the financial services industry, is whether there are any special features of this industry that would justify special treatment. In other words, is there a real need to do something?

This issue has been considered very carefully and has been the subject of extensive consultations with industry groups and the most important regulatory agencies. The major conclusion is that there is no compelling reason to provide special treatment for the property and casualty insurance industry.

Indeed, there are a number of reasons why special treatment would not be justified. Property and casualty insurers currently pay the 13.5 per cent FST and the 11 per cent telecommunications tax on many of their purchases and claims costs. Because these taxes will be removed, the increase in insurers' costs will be substantially less than 7 per cent. As a result, there is no reason to believe that the transition to the GST will pose a formidable hurdle for the property and casualty insurance industry.

The industry has the means of adjusting to the GST which will significantly reduce the transitional effect, for example, by rearranging to whom they pay claims. For example, as opposed to providing a new building when a claim is being made for a total loss, if in some way it is structured that the commercial enterprise builds the building, it can then pass through the GST costs. The industry also has flexibility in its pricing.

Honourable senators may recall that when representatives of that industry appeared before the committee on June 14, I asked a question dealing with the very issue of building in the price. In response, Mr. Brochu, one of the representatives of the Insurance Bureau of Canada, and, of course, a private insurer, said:

> As far as we're concerned, speaking for my own company, we launched into the process in the spring this year, looking ahead a little more in March and April . . .
> So I think companies have started to do so. There are some that started perhaps a little sooner or a little later, it's a question of degree of market forces.

Later on, I asked Mr. Lyndon, who, I believe, is the President of the Insurance Bureau of Canada, this question:

> Is it now the policy of your industry to do your pricing so that it reflects that kind of ongoing problem? To get away from whether it is or it is not, one has to say there is a—
> Mr. Lyndon: There appears to be a good chance.
> The Chairman: A fighting chance.
> Mr. Lyndon: A fighting chance. I like your phrase. We should be getting on and pricing accordingly.
> Senator Nurgitz: And are you?
> Mr. Lyndon: Yes.

The possible effects of the GST on the industry were discussed at length with the office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. As a result of these discussions, the government is convinced that the GST will in no way jeopardize the financial health of the property and casualty insurance industry.

Of course, the government realizes that the GST is a major change. As a result, the government will continue to consult broadly with a variety of industry sectors and, of course, on that basis, will continue to work closely with the industry to address any ongoing concerns.

Honourable senators, there is another important factor to consider, that is, the factor of a strong economy, and an increase in economic activity which can only result in increased demand for this type of product for both consumers and business. The increase in economic activity resulting from the GST will result in more jobs, as estimated by the government, and a higher standard of living for all Canadians.

I want to remind senators as well that the benefits of the GST to the property and casualty insurance industry are well recognized by the industry itself. Indeed, the President of the Insurance Bureau of Canada, Mr. Jack Lyndon, wrote to Senator MacEachen urging passage of the GST without delay.

● (2130)

To conclude with respect to this portion of the three part amendment, the government believes there is no reason to believe that the transition to the GST will impose a formidable hurdle to this part of the industry, which is the property and casualty sector. The industry has the means of adjusting, and in many instances it has. In addition, any method of transition that would be contemplated would be inherently arbitrary and overly complex for the industry to implement and the government to control. Accordingly, members on this side consider that part of the amendment should be defeated.

With respect to that part dealing with the inventory rebate, to find out the most effective and fairest way of removing the existing tax, the government consulted extensively with businesses throughout the summer and fall of 1989. The department responsible for the administration of the GST, Revenue Canada, conducted extensive consultations with the business communities on an inventory rebate program. In the course of those consultations, as has been explained to us, it became evident that it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, for most businesses to identify the actual federal sales tax content of their inventories. Consequently, a tax factor approach was adopted. This method greatly simplified the claiming and administration of rebates for both business and the government.

The basic design of the rebate program is a product of extensive consultation with the business community. Two key messages emerged from these consultations. The vast majority of businesses are rarely, if ever, in a position to determine actual tax paid at an earlier trade level, and it is imperative that the system be as simple as possible to streamline transition. Consequently, the government announced that the calculation of inventory rebates will be based on prescribed rebate factors in all cases. No one will be permitted to claim rebates for the actual tax paid. The number of rebate factors has been kept to a minimum, limited to a relatively small number of major categories of goods.

In order to claim their rebate, wholesalers and retailers will simply apply the relevant rebate factors to the laid-down cost of their inventories as determined for income tax purposes. The laid-down cost of inventory for retailers and wholesalers is much more than the bare manufacturer's selling price. It includes, for example, federal sales tax, freight costs and other intermediary markups after the tax point.

Because it relies on rebate factors based on average tax paid, the rebate program does contain an element of rough justice. In some cases the program will overcompensate for the tax paid, and in other cases it will to some degree be an undercompensation. Overall, the rebate factors have been set to rebate the total tax on inventories as of January 1, 1991. The inventory rebate program is projected to cost in the range of $2.3 billion. It is a generous program and the best available estimate of the total amount of federal sales tax that will be in inventories at the start-up of the GST.

Now, if I may, I will deal briefly with the question of the housing situation raised by Senator Kolber and other honourable senators. The FST rebate program for new homes was introduced to ensure that the sale of newly constructed homes are not subject to GST and the federal sales tax during the transition period. It is an effort to avoid a form of double-taxation. It will be important to recognize that purchasers of single homes will be eligible for a rebate of the full amount of federal sales tax embedded in the cost of the their homes calculated at 4.25 percent of the selling price.

The Government has been discussing the transition rules related to residential housing for almost two years. In the course of these examinations it has consulted with such organizations as The Canadian Home Builders Association on a national basis and its provincial and local counterparts across the country. It has exhaustively examined the statistical and economic data and has remained convinced that the rebate program as now structured is well-suited to the particular nature of the housing industry. In the government's view, the transitional period as set out in the bill will be more than adequate.

I would point out that the amendment proposed by Senator Kolber really follows along the lines of what is now contained within the GST proposal, except that it extends the time. It applies generally the same kind of formula. So I am suggesting that in this kind of transition period there will appear to be what some will consider perhaps an unfair advantage, but at some point one has to pick a date and live with it. I think the government has listened closely to the advice and concerns expressed by the industry. They have modified their proposal as indicated to us when they were shown a better way to achieve their objectives in the public interest. They will have to continue to further refine this operation when they draw on the practical experience of this kind of tax working. That is a normal course of events for any tax situation.

The structure of the GST as it now stands represents what I suggest to honourable senators is the fairest and most balanced approach that could be devised at this time. Therefore, I urge upon all of you that this amendment not be passed.

Senator Molgat: I was interested in listening to my colleague from the Province of Manitoba defend the present situation insofar as the tax is concerned, and say things, for example, like "There is a great deal of raw justice in what the Government is doing."

Senator Nurgitz: Rough justice.

Senator Molgat: Rough justice. I thought it was raw justice. The result is the same. He also said that "Obviously there are some serious problems here, but we have to accept the good with the bad."

The problem is that my honourable friend did not point out, as I think he should have, representing, as he does, a region like ours, that once again the raw justice, or rough justice, or accepting the good with the bad, has a particularly bad impact regionally, particularly on the region he and I represent.

Once again the GST is going to have a different kind of impact on our region than it does on central Canada. I think my honourable friend—who has long experience in Manitoba and knows what makes our economy tick—if he stopped to look at the whole thing, would have to agree, as I tried to point out the other day when were debating the amendment concerning hydro electric power and heating fuels, that it is a very different thing to be dealing in the winter with heat in Manitoba and heat in Victoria—or, indeed, heat in most of central Canada. It is not the same thing. If one looks at our economy, it is not the same thing.

Essentially western Canada, certainly our region, is not a manufacturing region. Even less so in Saskatchewan. Our regions are now basically distribution regions. They are made up of wholesalers who buy from eastern or outside manufacturers and then attempt to sell on our market. I am focusing now on the inventory question.

• (2140)

Senator Hastings: By all the western governments?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I would be interested in any figures that my honourable friend can give me that will indicate that my region will benefit in some way from the GST.

Senator Murray: Good, I will bring them in.

Senator Molgat: At the moment, I have to say that I do not see any benefits. I can see benefits going to central Canada—

Senator Murray: Oh, no.

Senator Molgat: —the central manufacturing base of this nation. That is my concern about the GST. The tax has been designed by bureaucrats in Ottawa who see Canada as one might see European economies—small, centralized, unitary states. The bureaucrats have applied the concept of the VAT system, if you will, which works well in Europe, to the Canadian economy, which is very different for a host of reasons: distance, climate, regional impact and other factors. The bureaucrats have convinced those across the way that this is the answer to Canada's problems. Frankly, as a representative of the province of Manitoba, I do not see it that way. I think that we will suffer unduly by comparison with other regions of this country.

Senator Murray: I think I can demonstrate to the contrary.

Senator Molgat: I see Senator Doody shaking his head. I think Newfoundland will suffer as badly as we will. I think that, once again, this tax is a creation of bureaucrats in central Canada who have somehow or other convinced the present government that this system will be better for Canada. From the standpoint of my region, I cannot see it.

The other day I read into the record a letter from a carpet wholesaler in Winnipeg. The name is McMann, a well-known company in our province. It was pointed out that on their inventory of carpets they will get a rebate of 8.1 per cent under the present system. However, they have paid 13.5 per cent in federal sales tax. They ask: "How can we compete against a manufacturer who owns his own retail or wholesale distribution system, because that manufacturer will not have paid the 13.5 per cent until such time as the goods are disposed of? We will be in a different economic position than he will."

Importers have said the same thing to the committee. Allow me to read a letter dated August 1,1990 from a group in Vancouver called New Look. They were writing to Senator Buckwold, and they had this to say:

Re: Submission to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce

GST STUDY BILL C-62

Referring to my summary on Federal Sales Tax Inventory Rebate, you will find proof of a shortfall of approximately 3.3% on our inventory. As we expect to have an inventory by December 31st 1990 of some 2.4 million dollars, this would mean a direct loss of approximately $80,000—funds that we have paid the government but would not receive back under the 8.1% rebate proposal, which would definitely create hardship and would be most unfair to us.

It is a complete fallacy to suggest, as some may do, that we pass this shortfall on to the public, our customers. The marketplace and strong competition would simply not allow this; so it will instead be a direct loss for us.

I am asking you, Senator Buckwold and your committee to ensure that fairness will prevail, thus avoiding financial damage to small businesses in the import trade. After all, trade is a two way street—without import we will have no export and vice versa.

So because of this economic structure of our region, because essentially we do not have the manufacturing base that Ontario and Quebec have, because we depend largely on wholesalers representing central Canadian manufacturers or importers representing outsiders, these individuals and other industries will not get back what they have paid out in taxes. I submit that this measure will have a bad regional impact as a result of this aspect, let alone the tax itself.

Therefore, there should be a change, an amendment to what is being proposed. Otherwise, once again, you will be creating something that will have a different impact on different regions in the country. Senator Nurgitz, as I said at the outset, is familiar with the business situation in Manitoba. I ask that, instead of pleading to us to support the measure, he come forward with a better recommendation. I think it is possible for members opposite to propose something that is better than what is offered by Bill C-62. I am sure that the honourable senator agrees there is unfairness, that in our province, particularly with regard to this one area, let alone others, it will have a larger impact than in other parts of the country. I ask honourable senators opposite: Is that fair?

Senator MacEachen: Brutal!

Senator Molgat: Is it reasonable?

Senator Buckwold: Terrible!

Senator Molgat: Should we not at this point be doing what I understood members opposite to say many times earlier in this debate: Talking about the bill and proposing changes. We are proposing some changes now. If honourable senators opposite do not like the specific changes we have proposed, we are prepared to look at others. Surely they cannot disagree that the GST will have an unfair regional impact. Heating is one of the worst items to be affected, but this amendment has merit as well. I ask that they come forward with a better proposal. I am sure that if they were to submit an amendment to our amendment, we would consider it. If the government is going to proceed with this tax—and I hope that it will not—let us in the final analysis not make it unfair regionally, as it presently exists.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not want to be argumentative.

Senator Petten: Far be it from you.

Senator Murray: Earlier my friend and I had a brief exchange on the question of regional output gains from sales tax reform. I appreciate what Senator Molgat has said about the impact of the GST, particularly on items such as fuel, and so forth, but my point in my earlier intervention was that his region would gain considerably in terms of increased production as a result of the tax. I have to tell the honourable senator that the Department of Finance projections indicate that those parts of Canada which depend most on the capital intensive resource industries will be the major beneficiaries of the tax, because the GST will remove the sales tax on capital imports and provide large investment incentives to the resource sector.

• (2150)

For example, the government estimates output gains for the north at 1.4 per cent. Indeed, the average long-run output gain for Canada as a whole is 1.4 per cent. As a result of the tax, my friend's region, the prairies, will enjoy the highest output gain of any region at 2.5 per cent.

There are also statistics—that I do not have in my head but which I will try to obtain and place on the record at a later date—which indicate that, in terms of the amount of money taken out of the economy by the GST in his region, by comparison with the manufacturers' sales tax, his region will be better off under the proposed GST.

Senator Molgat: I would thank the honourable gentleman for his comments, and I will be happy to have those figures when he submits them.

Will he not agree that according to the letter I read a couple of days ago—and I did not give the name of the company at that time—from McMann's of Winnipeg, or the letter I read just now from New Look who, I think are importers, those specific firms will suffer a substantial loss under the proposed system? Further, did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that this would not include the extra costs of heating and electricity?

Senator Murray: I said that I understood what my friend said about particular impacts on particular commodities in particular areas. My point was that his region, the prairie provinces, will benefit considerably from the GST in terms of increased production. Indeed, his region, which depends on capital-intense resource industries to a great extent, will benefit disproportionately.

I also undertook to provide some information at a later date which I think will indicate that in terms of the amounts taken out of the economy by the GST, his province and region will be in a better position than they are now under the manufacturers' sales tax.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: In light of all these benefits and alleged gains that the government leader indicates will accrue to western Canada, while he is doing his research, would he also indicate why the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia oppose this tax and why two of those provinces are taking the federal government to court over the tax? If these alleged benefits will come to pass, why would the governments of those provinces be so unalterably opposed to this tax?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator says that they are unalterably opposed, but honourable senators are aware that there is no provincial sales tax in the province of Alberta and, therefore, the opposition to the tax at the retail level is a strongly entrenched part of the political culture of that province. I understand that Albertans, however, are paying plenty through the manufacturers' sales tax. When the GST comes into effect, they will find that they will be paying less than they are now paying under the manufacturers' sales tax. Likewise, I think it should be pointed out that Saskatchewan, while my friend says it is unalterably opposed, is not far behind Quebec in entering negotiations with the federal government leading to a possible harmonization of its retail sales tax and the GST.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, we have heard the arguments before about all the great regional gains which will result from the GST, and we have heard them again tonight from the Leader of the Government. He has indicated that he has statistics. However, Senator Poitras knows that we have statistics from the Department of Finance which show the negative impact of the GST on the area we are talking about, as well as province-by-province. Although I do not have those figures on my desk I will, as the Leader of the Government has promised to do, get them. They will indicate a net loss between what these provinces pay under the present manufacturers' sales tax as against what they will pay after the passage of the proposed GST. I am sure Senator Poitras will recall these figures, because we quoted them about 50 times as we went across the country. The figures were used to illustrate a province which would gain but many other provinces will lose.

The Leader of the Government mentioned the increase in production. One of the great justifications of the GST is the extra billions of dollars that will be infused into the gross national product. We heard exactly the same arguments in defence of the Free Trade Agreement. We heard about tremendous gains in our productive capacity as a result of the overall revenue gain to the country and the employment gain. Honourable senators know exactly what has happened.

It is very easy to develop these statistics on the basis of a computer program that churns figures out and to not be realistic about them. I wish the government would stop telling us about the advantages of the GST as it will affect production. Keeping in mind the experience of free trade and the fact that we are moving into a serious recession, this is not, as Senator Murray says, a time when we can expect production to increase. The opposite is going to take place.

Before the government propaganda, as presented by the Leader of the Government, sinks in too deeply—even on the part of those who support the government—I think it is important to know that the statistics are not exactly as the Leader of the Government has said, and I will be glad to table other statistics as they were presented to our committee.

Senator Murray: Well, let's see yours.

Senator MacEachen: Question!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by Senator Kolber, for Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Buckwold:

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, pursuant to provisional rule P-3(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Accordingly, honourable senators, the division is deferred until 5:45 p.m. tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise to express a question as to whether it is necessary or appropriate to move adjournment of the debate on the main motion. I know it has been done every time we have deferred an amendment, and it was done last night by my colleague, Senator Frith, but it is my view that moving the adjournment of the debate on the main motion implies that one could debate it at this time despite the fact that there is an amendment which is before the house, and one cannot return to the main motion to debate it until the amendment has been disposed of. If I am wrong, then I think there are implications that we all ought to understand, but I just raise the point to allow honourable senators to think about it. If I am not right, then I would like to be told how we can debate a main motion when the amendment is before us. Deferring the amendment, as I said, does not dispose of it in any way. That is my point.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): It does not bother me, honourable senators, if the honourable gentleman has adjourned the debate during the past few deferrals. I thought that it might be appropriate to do it again.

Senator MacEachen: Go ahead. We will look at it over night.

Senator Doody: In any event, I move that all remaining orders stand. That is safe enough, is it not?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, may I table some documents requested by Senator Frith yesterday? Thank you.

Documents tabled.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

PENITENTIARY ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF STATUTORY VISITATION PRIVILEGES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—BILL TO AMEND FIRST READING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings presented Bill S-19, to amend the Penitentiary Act to reinstate the statutory visitation privileges of Members of Parliament.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators will recall that on October 31, 1989, I placed an inquiry before the Senate in which I drew to the attention of the Senate the erosion of a long-standing statutory right of parliamentarians for access to penitentiaries and inmates therein. Over the years this privilege has been eroded to the point where it was extinguished by the Commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada on January 1, 1987.

The inquiry was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which subsequently heard from the Commissioner of the Correctional Service of Canada and legal counsel. As a result of their examination, it was recorded in the minutes of the proceedings held on October 4, 1990 that it was agreed that the committee report to the Senate that it concurred in the advice of legal counsel to the committee that legislation be indtroduced to amend the Penitentiary Act by the insertion of a right of access of parliamentarians to federal penitentiaries. The committee noted that it was supportive of any action by a senator in this regard.

The bill that I have presented today, honourable senators, flows from that motion of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and I shall address this issue more fully on Friday next, November 16, 1990.

On motion of Senator Hastings, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday next, November 16, 1990.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a host of petitions from the great city of Peterborough. These petitions, as I have scanned the addresses, come from virtually every corner of Peterborough.

Honourable senators, these petitions are remonstrating the Senate and the government to prevail and stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax. It might be useful to honourable senators to retrace briefly the history of Peterborough, which is now represented by a distinguished member of the Conservative Party.

I originally thought, honourable senators, that the name "Peterborough" was derived from the English Town of Peterborough. However, upon research, I discovered that Peterborough was named after one Peter Robinson, of Irish descent, who, in 1826 established the first settlement there on the waterways to that luxurious part of southern Ontario. This area had been travelled previously by the Mississauga Indians and, apparently, was visited on one occasion in 1615 by Samuel de Champlain.

After the settlement was established by Peter Robinson, it quickly became the administrative hub of the Rice Lake region and led to the creation of the Colborne District in 1842. Peterborough was then incorporated as a town in 1850.

By the 1870s, Peterborough was Ontario's principal timber producer, and subsequently, upon the development of hydroelectricity along the Trent system and before the power plant was established at Niagara Falls, became an important attraction to manufacturers, including the Edison Company and the Quaker Oats Company.

As you know, it is the home of the Robertson Davies family and of Margaret Laurence; and the birthplach of the the well-known Canadian industrialist, Sir Joseph Flavell, and of George Cox. Honourable senators may recall that it was also a temporary residence for Lester Bowles Pearson who attended school there for a period of time.

It is interesting to note that Peterborough suffered some very severe financial setbacks in the 1850s. For 80 years after 1861, a Town Trust Commission was established to manage its finances. Peterborough then established a ward system.

Honourable senators, every part of this flourishing, important and vibrant centre is represented by the Conservative Party. Every street, every district, every area, every ward is represented in these petitions. I will read just a few of the streets: Deniston Avenue, Park Hill Road, Townsend Street, Hilliard Street, Water Street, James Street, Gilmour Street, Grayden Street, Champlain Crescent; and it goes on and on.

Honourable senators, I was curious to determine whether the origins of the word "petition" and the word "Peterborough" might have some historic connection.

In Commentaries on the Laws of England by the great Sir William Blackstone, Fourth Edition, Volume 1, Chapter 1, dealing with the absolute rights of individuals, there is an interesting and, I believe, helpful passage which might inform honourable senators about the origins of petitions. At page 113 it is noted that Czar Peter of Russia established a law whereby no subject could petition the Throne until he had first petitioned two different ministers of state. In the event that he obtained justice from neither, he could then present a third petition to the prince, upon pain of death if the subject was found to be in the wrong. The consequences were that very few, if any, dared to offer such third petitions. Grievances under the Czar rarely came to the notice of the Czar and, therefore, he had little opportunity to address them.

• (1410)

No restrictions were placed on petitions in England. England decided to take a much different course. Hence the difference between the organizations of the British society compared to the Czarist society. In England, Blackstone's suggests that the petitioning, which was open, promoted the spirit of peace; so there would be no check upon the liberty of the subject.

Honourable senators, we have, in the name "Peterborough", a relationship to Czar Peter and an understanding of why petitions are so essential to a free society.

Honourable senators, for your historic information I researched further and tried to divine the source of the word "Peter" itself. "Peter" is derived from the Greek word "Petros", and is translated into the French "Pierre." It was also the name given by Jesus to one of his disciples, who subsequently became the founder of the Church. The word "Peter" means "stone." I assume that, based on that word, the foundation of the Roman Catholic Church was established—a strong foundation indeed.

Honourable senators who are of the Catholic persuasion will recall that historically there was a tax called "Peter's Pence", which was a tax exacted from its parishioners by the Holy See in England, and was a matter of some great importance. Obviously, senators, the word "Peter", as it relates to Peterborough and to petitions, has an historic and important comparative analysis. It comes as no surprise to us that in block after block in Peterborough, street after street—Queen Street, Baker Avenue, Orchard Crescent, Oxford, Knox, Aylmer, Armour, and Edgewood Streets—over and over again we are petitioned by citizens from this extraordinary community to reject the goods and services tax.

Honourable senators, it is important to note that, in terms of its size, Peterborough is the home of two of Canada's greatest authors and journalists, Margaret Laurence and Robertson Davies. I doubt very much, honourable senators, if these individuals, who have been so involved in the literary and cultural life of our country, would be in favour of the GST.

Honourable senators, it is important to note that Peterborough has a very vigorous cultural life. The city has a symphony orchestra, an active theatre guild, professional companies, both public and private, art galleries and a winter carnival. It is home of the Peterborough Canoe. Peterborough is well known for its expertise in lacrosse and synchronized swimming. All senators will recall that the 1980 Ontario Summer Games were held there. In this broad, colourful and important community of Peterborough, dozens of petitions are repeatedly presented to us, and they all argue vehemently that the goods and services tax should be rejected.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I tried yesterday to present some petitions from Kamloops, but the competition was so—

Senator Frith: Fierce.

Senator Marchand: —keen among my colleagues to present petitions that I did not get a chance to do so. Today, I wish to present some petitions from the great city of Kamloops. This one, received in my office on November 1, reads:

> WHEREAS we believe the present Government of Canada has not put enough effort into controlling spending of our tax dollars in ways other than cutting jobs. We would like to see effective government budgeting in cutting departmental spending, the same way we Canadians are forced to budget, before a new tax system is installed.
> WHEREAS there has not been sufficient study of this tax system, there are many inefficiencies. We believe a new tax should have been thought out more thoroughly; and then made law; and then Canadians should have been given time to prepare for it. The way this has been instituted has been unpleasant for everyone, and has cost many businesses a great deal of money.
> Wherefore we support the liberal senators in their attempt to stop the G.S.T.

There are numerous signatures on this petition from Kamloops, which reads: "Wherefore the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to withdraw the bill on the GST."

(Names of signatories read)

• (1420)

I have another petition from some residents of Kamloops. There was an overflow of signatories, so they had to sign some of them on the front of the petition. The wording is the same as the last one, because it was also put together by Lynne Taves, the small business person in Kamloops who said that if the GST goes through she will lose her business. The last time I talked to her she was most concerned about what the GST would mean to her.

As honourable senators probably know, the profile of a lot of small businesses is such that a lot of family money is put into them. Many families have every last cent they own invested in a business. This particular person told me that she had all of her family investments in this particular business, and that she did not think she would make it, with the extra 7 per cent she would have to charge her customers.

I will read the names of those who signed the petition from this area.

(Names of signatories read)

The next name on my list is Barclay West, R.R.2, Zirnhelt Road, VOE 1ZO, Heffley Creek, B.C., which is a suburb of Kamloops and on the way to a great ski hill, Tod Mountain. If any of you are skiers, come out that way.

(Names of signatories read)

I have more names, all from Kamloops.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a number of other petitions that were sent to me from other parts of B.C. They are in the proper form and read:

> The undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail on the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1430)

These are only a few of the petitions that were sent to me. I shall now resume my seat and let someone else carry on.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to join with my colleague, Senator Marchand, in presenting petitions from the province of British Columbia. I have the honour to present a petition signed by 101 residents of the Vancouver area who ask that the Senate reject the goods and services tax, Bill C-62. I have a second petition signed by 80 residents of the regions of Vancouver and Kimberley, B.C., who make the same request.

I should like to address the phenomenon of this enormous wave of petitions with respect to the goods and services tax. I believe that these petitions are being presented to senators in all parts of this house. We have rarely seen in Canada such a public outcry about any measure before this chamber. It is almost a universal view in Canada that this bill is badly cast and will damage the Canadian political economy.

I have, as I am sure have many senators, boxes of petitions and letters in my office asking me to join with other senators in opposing this bill, and asking the government to withdraw it and present a more equitable tax measure to deal with current economic situations. These petitioners in British Columbia represent widespread opinion in my province. They represent the views of dozens, and indeed hundreds, of British Columbians to whom I have spoken personally and who have addressed me on the question of the goods and services tax.

It is quite amazing to be approached on the street by people who say, "Senator Austin, the goods and services tax is going to do grave damage to myself, my family and my community. Please oppose it." People have said to me, "I made the mistake of voting for the Conservative Party in 1984 and I have regretted it ever since. I will never do it again. In the meantime, will the Senate stand in the way of this government that cares nothing for the opinion of Canadians and cares nothing for the damage it will do to ourselves and to our country?"

A clerk, whom I do not know, who served me in a bank, recognized my name from the withdrawal slip and told me that it was the unanimous opinion of the employees of that branch that the GST was a bad piece of legislation. Indeed, their customers believed the same, because they had been discussing the GST with the bank clerks. As many senators know, the public asks bankers and bank staff for advice on economic matters and management of their money. The advice that those bank employees are getting and giving is that this is bad legislation.

Honourable senators, it is amazing that this government cares nothing about these petitions. Thousands of names have been submitted to this chamber, and to senators on the other side, who can do something about this dreadful legislation. However, these thousands of names mean nothing to senators opposite. There is no concern expressed by any senator opposite with respect to public opinion. There are ways that are used to justify this legislation, but public opinion is being dismissed.

It is taken as a sign of arrogance on the part of the government that it is unwilling to contemplate some of the amendments that honourable senators have submitted for the improvement of this legislation.

Honourable senators, dissatisfaction is growing in all parts of Canada. The petitions I am presenting, and those presented by my colleagues, demonstrate that; but there is far more evidence than these petitions.

• (1440)

What we are seeing is an insecurity on the part of Canadians about their present and their future, and also the future of their children. We are seeing enormous issues that are not being addressed by the government—economic issues, such as unemployment, which is rising everywhere in Canada. The October figure, according to Statistics Canada, has reached 8.8 per cent nationally and is higher in some of the provinces in the Atlantic region and in western Canada. In fact, StatsCan reports that no net jobs have been created in Canada thus far in 1990—no net jobs, and the labour force is continuing to grow.

Canadians are feeling anxious about the potential for war. These petitions are also an illustration of that anxiety. The government has done nothing, in my view, to assure Canadians that the sons and daughters of Canadian families will be secure in carrying out their UN role with the maximum safety that arms and military talent can provide.

More than any other source of anxiety, I believe, is the lack of credibility that is attributed to politicians and the political community by Canadians generally. I put that squarely at the door of the Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, and of this government. That brings me back to petitions, which indicate the dissatisfaction of Canadians and the very high dissatisfaction of British Columbians in particular.

Indeed, as I have mentioned in this chamber, the polls indicate that more than 85 per cent of British Columbians do not want this goods and services tax. The city of Vancouver, on Saturday, November 17, will hold a referendum on the goods and services tax. Early polls in respect of that referendum indicate that more than 85 per cent of the citizens of Vancouver will reject this tax.

Does that have no meaning to this government? Does it have nothing to say to this opinion? Is this a government which does not take into account the views of the public, or which does not understand that it must govern with the support of the public? Is this a government which does not understand—and I believe it is that kind of government—that it must have the support of a substantial number of Canadians for its legislative measures? If it has not been successful in obtaining that support, then it should go back to the drawing board and find out why.

It should be a "second look" government, and that is what our petitioners are asking it to be—a "second look" government and a compassionate government, a government prepared to redesign the tax so that it is not regressive and so that it falls more equitably on Canadians.

Today it is small wonder that most Canadians are focused on the security of their paycheque. Canadians are more concerned about their paycheque, about their economic security and that of their families, than about any other issue, and that is a reasonable thing for Canadians to be concerned about.

Incomes in Canada are sinking, job layoffs are growing, taxes are rising, fuel is becoming more expensive, and the social security safety net is being chopped by this government. Why wouldn't Canadians be anxious in circumstances like that?

I believe that these petitions will continue to grow. I believe that the wave of petitions will continue to mount.

We have a Minister of Finance who today is in Asia. The Minister of Finance is on a tour of the financial capitals of Asia. He has been in Japan, he has made a speech in Hong Kong, and God knows where else he has gone in Asia.

I wonder what he is saying to those very sophisticated financial people in Asia about the Canadian economy and about this government's program. I wonder what he is telling them which will indicate to them that Canadians are an optimistic community. Again I come to the petitions. People who are petitioning us by the thousands are obviously not Canadians who are optimistic about their economy. The symptom which these Canadians express is that of anxiety, about which I spoke when I began my remarks.

What is the Minister of Finance doing to allay that anxiety which is so evident across Canada and which is reflected in the financial capitals of the world? He is doing nothing, I suggest.

POINT OF ORDER

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, may I raise a small point of order? It is a very tiny one.

I am still trying to understand whether we are now dealing with petitions or whether the honourable senator is leading up to putting a motion. What is happening here?

Senator Frith: He is making comments.

Senator Kelly: It is fairly clear in the rules as to how petitions are to be handled. You stand up; you give a brief summary of what is in the petition; and then, according to the pattern we have followed recently, you read names and addresses. But this is going quite far beyond those rules, it seems to me.

Senator Austin: Senator Kelly, I am clearly presenting petitions, and that is no mystery to you, I know.

I am making comments in respect of this incredible wave of petitions which I and my colleagues are presenting here. I believe that comments are in order.

These are brief explanations—brief in terms of what could really be said about this legislation, believe me! I am making comments so that senators opposite, in particular, will understand what is the underlying angst which exists in the Canadian soul about this government and this legislation.

I am trying to get through to you, and the reason I am —

Senator Frith: For which the only therapy is probably an election.

Senator Austin: I believe it is in the interests of Canadians that this government listen to them.

Senator Frith: That would be a good start.

Senator Austin: I am still optimistic that this government will listen and that these petitions will make a difference to this government, if enough of them, Senator Frith, are presented in this chamber to convince honourable senators opposite that Canadians are overwhelmingly opposed to this particular legislation.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, let me make one more comment.

It seems to me—and I have said this before—that what we are leading ourselves into now is a debate on the bill itself. So why don't we proceed with the debate on the main motion?

Senator Frith: You said you were raising a tiny, tiny point of order.

Senator Austin: On Senator Kelly's point of order, I believe that I am addressing myself to the petitions and to the implied premises which are contained in these petitions: the views which Canadians have regarding the legislation that is before this chamber as Bill C-62, and the reason why we have received such an incredible number of petitions to be presented in this chamber. I do that by addressing the question of petitions.

I do not believe that I am called upon to read names and addresses. I will table these petitions, and they are available to Senator Kelly.

Senator Kelly: This is instead of reading the names and addresses.

Senator Austin: I am doing this because I believe there is something significant to say about the underlying causes and because I have been addressed by British Columbians personally and frequently. I wish to tell you what British Columbians are saying as I present these petitions on their behalf. I am sure my remarks will be interesting to Senator Kelly in view of his well-known knowledge of business and economics.

When Senator Kelly rose on his point of order, I thought he was going to defend the Minister of Finance and his tour of the financial capitals of Asia. I thought Senator Kelly was going to tell us what the Minister of Finance has been saying to the banks and the Ministry of Finance in Japan, and to the banks and business entrepreneurs in Hong Kong and Singapore.

If he wishes to rise and present us with the views of the Minister of Finance as he takes this important trip in Asia, I would be delighted to sit down and listen to Senator Kelly. However, if he is not going to do that, I shall have to hypothesize in explanation of these petitions.

What I believe the Minister of Finance is saying is that his policies will repair the balance sheets of the Government of Canada, that there will be an extraordinary cash flow, tax revenue, to the Government of Canada as a result of the goods and services tax; that it will collect, indeed, more money in its first year than is forecast, and substantially more money in later years than is forecast.

● (1450)

This is not a confession the Minister of Finance has made to my petitioners. I believe the Minister of Finance has told my petitioners that it is revenue neutral in the first year.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to make one final comment on the point of order I raised.

Senator MacEachen: Did I hear the word "Final"?

Senator Kelly: I recall, with some sadness, senators on the other side of the chamber waving the rule book and accusing this side of paying no attention whatever to what the book indicated.

The point of order I am raising is that the senator who has just been speaking is acting outside the rules of our rule book. As long as the record shows that that is what he is doing, he can continue as long as he wishes; but let us remember that we were all reminded of the rule book.

Senator Austin: Senator Kelly, I disagree with what you say I am doing. I am making brief comments in explanation of these petitions. You may have a different time clock than I have, but I believe my remarks have been brief, and I will remain within the terms of reference of brief remarks as I present these petitions. Indeed, I would argue with you that my presentation is more in order than the reading of names and addresses, which, however, I also say is in order, should honourable senators choose so to do.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jack Austin: I understand why Senator Kelly doesn't want me to address these questions of revenue neutral and the tax gouge which the GST represents. The Minister of Finance's technical papers, toward the back of them, does forecast that in the second year of the GST there will be a surplus of $5.5 billion. Beyond that, we are left to conjecture.

I would wager a Hong Kong dollar, or a hundred Japanese yen, that he is telling the financiers of Asia that there is an enormous tax surplus and that that tax surplus will be used to meet the deficit; and, in addition to doing that, he will be cutting the social security safety net even further.

[Senator Austin.]

Honourable senators opposite wonder why we are bringing the petitions, as if they think that Canadians do not know that the social security system is being minimized by the Government of Canada; as if they think Canadians have not caught on to the difference between the liberal rhetoric of the Conservative Mulroney government and its actual performance, which, to quote Jeffrey Simpson, "is at least as far right as the government of R. B. Bennett is." Canadians are now aware of the difference between the soft words, the use of "kinder," and "gentler," and "civility," and the performance of the Mulroney government. It is not a small and hidden tactic any more. It is out in the open. It will be noticed more and more by Canadians as this government's life spins to its end.

Honourable senators, there are a number of characteristics of today's economy which our petitioners are concerned about and which underlie this incredible wave of petitions that are being presented to us. Let me refer to some of those concerns in my brief remarks.

The first concern is that Canadian corporate profits are in serious decline. This is an item that should interest Senator Kelly, because he is a well-known leader of the Canadian business community. Let me present you with an example in British Columbia of the decline in corporate profits. This decline seriously concerns me and my petitioners because in British Columbia half of our GDP is directly or indirectly dependent on the forest industry.

What is happening in British Columbia? The ten largest forest firms lost a net of $18.1 million in the third-quarter of this year compared to net earnings of $183 million in the same quarter of 1989. For January to September inclusive, profits fell 67 per cent. That is what my petitioners are concerned about. That is what underlies the concern of British Columbians in Vancouver, Courteney, Alberni, Kimberley, Kamloops, North Vancouver, and other parts of British Columbia. They see the economy of the forest industry declining, their jobs threatened, and the additional burden of an inequitable and regressive tax being dumped on them by this government to clean up its balance sheets, and to appeal to the conservative bankers.

Senator Barootes: Your balance sheets, not ours.

Senator Austin: Your balance sheets. You have more than doubled the debt, Senator Barootes. As always, it is a pleasure to hear from you, Senator Barootes.

What are the reasons for this decline? There are reasons apart from the GST, and I admit to that. In part, there is a sharp decline in U.S. housing starts down to an eight year low.

Secondly, there is the over-valued Canadian dollar against the U.S. dollar. For that, this government has much to answer. The Canadian dollar has been maintained at too high a rate and has knocked Canada, as the Conference Board has said, into a "made-inCanada recession" and one which Canadians do not understand.

Why do we have to bring on a recession in Canada in order to make our economy more healthy? The onus is on the government to explain that, if indeed there is an explanation. They are silent, probably because there is no explanation.

In my province, the hated softwood lumber tax, 15 per cent, which was a gift of Senator Carney and her cabinet colleagues, is now a permanent part of the cost base of the forest industry in British Columbia and a serious drag on the economy of the province of British Columbia. Those are some of the reasons.

This government is now going to tax the efforts of our forest industry to increase efficiency and production, and to tax efforts to improve environmental management. Do you wonder why British Columbians petition the Senate about the goods and services tax?

In addition, honourable senators, in our economy we are seeing financial institutions experiencing substantial declines in asset values and losses on mortgage and business loans. This means, honourable senators, that our financial institutions are not in as strong a position to reinvest in our economy and to help pull our economy out of the recession in which we find ourselves. The result of the incapacity of our financial institutions to act decisively to increase investments is the result of government policy, of course, to prevent them from so doing, and to bring on a recession so that Canada will be leaner, cleaner, neater, and more competitive.

Those who pay the cost in our economy are those at the lower ends of the income scale. There are women who have lost more permanent jobs this year than any other labour category. Women are victims of the "made-in-Canada recession". Women are amongst my petitioners who are saying, "Relieve us of the GST." Young people coming into the economy are victims—young people with insufficient training for economic opportunity. They will have to pay the GST.

• (1500)

Yesterday, honourable senators opposite denied us the opportunity to at least make a fair recovery. They said "Trust the government. We will not fully index the tax. Therefore, the equities will slide; but trust us; somewhere in the future some government will be equitable." If equity is deserved, why not now, honourable senators? That is what my petitioners are asking—equity now.

Honourable senators, I will present these petitions. I know my colleagues have much to say about the GST and we have some distance to go in the amendment process. Perhaps being the optimist that I am, honourable senators opposite will recognize the value of some of the amendments that we may present on this side, or that independent senators, in their wisdom, may present. Perhaps honourable senators oppsite will realize that the first step toward saving their government—if indeed it is saveable at all—is to take a second look at the GST and respond to the view of most Canadians that this is an inequitable tax which will seriously erode their paycheques and damage their economic prospects.

Perhaps the government will listen, perhaps it will not, but at least we are here in Parliament asking the government so to do. Honourable senators, I thank you for listening to me.

Senator Frith: Well done!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 60 citizens of the region of Saint-Thomas, in Quebec, who urge the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

[English]

I am sorry to see that Senator Kelly is absent today, because he certainly would be pleased to know that I will not be making any preliminary remarks, but will be straightforward and will read the names and addresses of my petitioners.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: The full name is Saint-Thomas-de-Didyme.

(Names of signatories read)

This must be a community in Lac-Saint-Jean—Saguenay region, for I see the signatures of residents of Jonquière and Normandin which is also in the Lac-Saint-Jean area.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: You did say Saint-Thomas?

Senator Hébert: Yes, in the Lac-Saint-Jean or Saguenay region. The full name is Saint-Thomas-de-Didyme.

Senator Lefebvre: Not Saint-Thomas-d'Aquin?

Senator Hébert: No, this is another Saint-Thomas.

Senator Lefebvre: Not Thomas Lefebvre?

Senator Hébert: No, not Thomas Lefebvre, Saint-Thomas-de-Didyme.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Now, honourable senators, I have another petition signed by 442 residents of the Province of Quebec who urge the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

Senator Hébert: Another small town in the Lac Saint-Jean area.

(Names of signatories read)

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Did you say Lac Saint-Jean?

Senator Hébert: Honfleur is in the Lac Saint-Jean area, isn't it?

Senator Bolduc: No, Honfleur is in the county of Bellechasse.

Senator Hébert: Thank you, senator. I apologize for my mistake. I don't suppose you want me to read it through again? Next time, I will check my facts first. If Honfleur is in the county of Bellechasse, there is no connection with the Lac Saint-Jean area.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: The people of Honfleur are not very keen on the GST, anymore than the people we mentioned earlier, in the Lac Saint-Jean area.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: I won't guess which county!

(Name of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: I think that is where Sir Wilfrid Laurier was born, if I am not mistaken . . .

Senator Hébert: So the entire Beaumier family is against the GST!

Senator Hébert: I am not sure where this is, unless Senator Bolduc would like to help . . . Lac Brière? Sainte-Sophie? I'm lost!

And now, honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 791 residents of the Montreal area who ask the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill.

This is a different area. We start with Carmen Joseph, 7307 du Musée, in Montreal, a lovely street right next door to the Museum of Fine Arts on Sherbrooke Street.

Senator Bosa: Does it end with a "z" or an "s"?

[Senator Hébert.]

Senator Hébert: With an "s".

Senator Bosa: It could be someone from central Italy.

Senator Hébert: It could be someone of nobility, a count?

Senator Bosa: It could be.

We can assume this is a Vietnamese or Cambodian. These are new Canadians.

(Name of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Another new Canadian.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: That sounds like a Cambodian name.

Senator Hébert: If you look at the numbers and the streets, you realize some people went from door to door. I know, I did the same in the past, ringing doorbells to canvass for signatures. Quite a job! Sometimes you have to go up two or three flights of stairs. They did all of Marquette Street this way.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: You can imagine people climbing the stairs, ringing the doorbell, waiting, having the petition signed, going back down and on to the next address.

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Hébert: Hoping, of course, that the government will listen and that signing a petition will be worthwhile. They don't know the government!

Senator Marsden: I have something to read when you have finished.

Senator Hébert: I will never be finished! So, if you have something urgent, you may as well . . .

Senator Marsden: No urgency, but I will proceed for a while.

Senator Hébert: I will be back on the job whenever it is needed.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I too have a series of petitions from Canadian citizens who are anxious to urge the members of the Senate not to pass the goods and services tax, for a variety of reasons which they convey in their petition.

I wish to read the first series of petitions signed only by one person, because these people have clearly gone out of their way to ensure that their names appear.

The first is Mr. David E. Bronfman from 55 Prince Arthur Avenue in Toronto.

Senator Frith: It could be one of the Bronfmans. That is a pretty classy address.

Senator Marsden: Prince Arthur is a classy address. 55 Prince Arthur is a very well-known address in Toronto.

Senator Frith: It is a classy address.

Senator Marsden: It is not only classy; it is near some of the very best restaurants.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I also have a petition from Toronto with 26 names.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1600)

All of these addresses, from the federal constituency of Rosedale, are of people who, I believe, are going to suffer most from the imposition of this tax should it go ahead; so I am delighted to have their petition.

(Names of signatories read)

This petition continues with 49 names on the page.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition also from Toronto.

(Names of signatories read)

All of these petitioners would like the Senate to vote against the GST on the grounds that it is an unfair tax not based upon ability to pay. The same is urged by the 25 Canadians who signed this next petition.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1610)

We have received numerous petitions from this area in Etobicoke.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition with twenty-one names of people who are also protesting the tax.

(Names of signatories read)

All of these citizens are proposing that the Senate vote against the goods and services tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have three names from 379 Concord Avenue.

• (1620)

Senator Turner: That is where I was born.

Senator Marsden: 379 Concord Avenue?

Senator Turner: No, 277 Concord Avenue.

Senator Marsden: Senator Turner was born there, so it must be a very respectable neighbourhood.

(Names of signatories read)

I have the names of another 25 citizens protesting this tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have the names of an additional 25 citizens who are protesting the tax.

(Names of signatories read)

Finally, honourable senators, I have one last petition.

(Names of signatories read)

These citizens from Toronto and surrounding area are calling on the Senate to stop the imposition of the goods and services tax. I hope our friends opposite are listening and will do exactly that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Marsden. I would now like to move back west. Today I received a new bunch of petitions, mostly from the University of Lethbridge. The ink is barely dry. Once again they are protesting the application of the GST to books, newspapers, magazines and printed material. They are very distressed that the government saw fit to defeat the amendment last week, which would have applied a zero rate of tax to printed material. They are hoping that, in the final analysis, reason will prevail and that this material will remain tax-free, as it has since Confederation.

(Names of signatories)

I have the name of Saighton Meyer, 1204 21A Avenue South, Coaldale, Alberta, which is a small community that is 15 minutes away from Lethbridge by car.

(Names of signatories read)

I have the name of Valerie J. Jirnhell, General Delivery, Coalhurst, Alberta, which is another small town on the outskirts of Lethbridge. Honourable senators may wonder about the names Coaldale and Coalhurst. For many years coal mining was an important industry in the Lethbridge district.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1630)

In the same petition there is another 28 names again protesting the application of the GST to books, magazines, newspapers and other printed material.

(Names of signatories read)

Lethbridge is where Skate Canada took place, which was very successful. The Alberta skater, Kurt Browning, once again received the Gold Medal for a superb performance, filled with triple jumps.

(Names of signatories read)

I have another petition from the City of Lethbridge. These signatories are again protesting the application of the GST to books, magazines, newspapers and printed material. As I said earlier, a number of people who have signed these petitions have spoken to me personally and deeply regret the fact that the government saw fit to reject our amendment which was put forward a week ago. That amendment would have maintained the tax-free status on books and printed material, which has existed since Confederation. This is of particular concern to the students who attend the University of Lethbridge from the city and smaller communities in Alberta, British Columbia and southern Saskatchewan.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1640)

Picture Butte, as honourable senators will know, is one of the communities in southern Alberta most concerned with the sugar beet industry. It is a very fine farming community.

The next petition is also from Lethbridge, Alberta, again protesting the book tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I will stop there, honourable senators, because I know other senators wish to proceed with Question Period. I look forward to continuing to read from these petitions to indicate the depth of the protest in my part of the province of Alberta against the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

BELANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate—and I am sure the fact is well known, but it has escaped me—whether the federal government is represented before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission in Quebec.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): If my friend is asking whether a brief is being presented by the federal government, the answer is no.

Senator Gigantès: Is there anyone representing the federal government as a member of the commission?

Senator Murray: No. The law which was passed in Quebec relating to that commission provided, if I am not mistaken, that there could be representatives of federal political parties which elected members in the 1988 election. In that respect, the honourable senator will be aware that the Hon. André Ouellet is sitting on the commission as a representative of the Liberal Party of Canada and that Mr. Hogue, le député d'Outremont, is representing the Progressive Conservative Party, not the government.

Senator Gigantès: In yesterday's sitting of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission there were some striking briefs, one of which was presented by Le Mouvement Desjardins. The conclusions of some of those briefs were challenged by Mr. Ghislain Dufour of Conseil du Patronat and also by Mr. Ouellet.

Were they challenged at all by the representative of the Progressive Conservative Party?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I must confess that I have no idea.

Senator Gigantès: Would you please find out and let us know?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will obtain whatever reports we may have on the deliberations of that commission. However, as I have tried to emphasize, Mr. Hogue, the member for Outremont, is there representing not the Government of Canada but the Progressive Conservative Party. It is important that I make that distinction in respect of my own responsibilities as a minister. I am not responsible, nor is the government responsible, for Mr. Hogue's intervention or non-intervention at any particular time during the sittings of that commission.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Gigantès: Am I to understand the Honourable Leader of the Government to say that the federal Progressive Conservative Party will not speak out on behalf of federalism before that commission?

● (1650)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can assure the honourable senator that the federal Conservative Party certainly does speak out for federalism. My honourable friend need only consult the statements made in the past few weeks in Quebec, in Ontario, and in the last day or so in Alberta, by the Prime Minister of Canada himself, who is the National Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party.

Senator Gigantès: Will the Honourable Leader of the Government not concede that the majority of noise that is being made before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission seems to be separatist noise? Does he not think his party should contribute with some federalist counterpoints before that commission?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not sure that I would characterize the briefs that have been presented to the commission with the kind of generalization that my friend has just expressed. I must confess that my readings have been pretty well limited to newspaper accounts in the mornings, and reports that I receive from some observers that the Federal-Provincial Relations Office has following the commission. No, I would not agree with that generalization. I have the impression from the newspaper accounts that all of the presenters appearing before the commission are challenged by various members of the commission, including the Minister of Justice of Quebec, Mr. Rémillard, as to their positions and are required to defend them in quite considerable detail.

Senator Gigantès: I was wondering whether the representative of the federal Conservative Party would issue such challenges and not just leave them to others?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have not seen in the newspaper reports many references to Mr. Houge. That does not mean that he is not doing exactly what the honourable senator suggests. I have no way of saying at this moment. I must insist that it is not within my ministerial responsibility to report on behalf of a person who is a representative of the party, but not of the government.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

FARM SUBSIDIES CRISIS—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: May I switch subjects and pass to GATT?

We are told by the press that there is a very great crisis. The Assistant Deputy Trade Minister, Germain Denis, is saying that because of the impasse on cutting farm subsidies, negotiations have broken down in several other sectors, including trade, services, textiles, and market access. Apparently the United States and Canada have turned down the European community's proposals as being "inadequate". This is quoting Germain Denis.

Could the honourable minister tell us what "inadequate" means in what sense?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I am sorry, I was attempting to read through some briefing notes that I have on the matter and I missed the reference to "inadequate". The European offer was described as "inadequate"?

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Germain Denis said that the European offer is "inadequate".

Senator Murray: The offer provides for a 30 per cent cut in export subsidies, as I understand it, and is over a period of five years. The base year is 1986, which was, I think, a high point. Compared to the proposals that we and other countries have been making, we do believe it is inadequate. We have proposed that export subsidies be eliminated completely and that there be a 50 per cent cut in trade, distorting internal subsidies. Further to that, I seem to recall that we have suggested an approximate 20 per cent cut in tariffs. Therefore, the European proposal is inadequate in that regard. The proposal would not be very effective, in our judgment, and would not make a great deal of difference in solving the problems that the world faces because of protectionist policies and programs in the agricultural sector.

Senator Gigantès: Would the Honourable Leader of the Government care to give us some guidance on what might occur if these negotiations do indeed fail, as seems likely? Would the European community go its own way as the price war continues? Will the subsidies continue? What happens? What steps are we taking, in view of that contingency?

Senator Murray: I find it difficult to hypothesize with regard to the second part of the question.

As to the first part of the question, my friend will have seen in the London Economist recently a reference to the current standoff at the GATT and the position taken by certain European leaders as being similar in the danger it imposes to the Smoot-Hawley exercise back in the late 1930s. There is a widespread feeling that the failure of this round and the resurgence of and the continuance of protection will play havoc with the world economy.

Senator Gigantès: In answer to my earlier—I beg your pardon?

Senator Doody: There is another senator trying to ask a question.

Senator Gigantès: Generally I don't ask many questions. You musn't confuse heckling with questions. These are serious questions. Heckling is designed to banter with my friends and keep the atmosphere light during this debate.

Senator Muir: You should know a lot about heckling, sir.

Senator Gigantès: I enjoy all of it. I can take it as well as dish it out.

Senator Muir: It is very irresponsible as well.

Senator Gigantès: Irresponsible? I think I should raise a point of privilege over this. I would like you to illustrate, sir.

Senator Muir: You are always writing.

Senator Gigantès: I am always what?

Senator Muir: W-R-I-T-I-N-G.

Senator Gigantès: W-R-I-T—

Senator Muir: I-N-G.

Senator Gigantès: Is writing forbidden by the Constitution? I know Socrates objected to writing. He said it imprisoned thought.

Senator Muir: I apologize for being so silly as to even get involved with you. I apologize.

Senator Gigantès: Your apology is accepted and your silliness is recognized.

Senator Muir: I will not finish.

Senator Gigantès: Please do. I enjoy these exchanges. I collect them, in fact.

THE CONSTITUTION

BELANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION—FEDERAL NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: In answer to an earlier question, dealing with the constitutional situation and its current examination in Canada, the Honourable Leader of the Government said that he could not respond with regard to the views expressed by a member of his party since he, the Honourable Leader, is a member of the government and it is in that capacity that he should be responding.

Taking into account cabinet solidarity, on which he dared to comment in dealing with the remarks of his colleague, the Honourable Benoit Bouchard, who is quoted as saying that Quebec should negotiate one-on-one with the federal government, and should not have to depend on any agreement by other provinces, and to have a full acquisition of sovereignty, in case other provinces don't agree, is this cabinet policy?

• (1700)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would have to see the remarks that my friend attributes to Mr. Bouchard, and examine them in their full context. With regard to one-on-one constitutional negotiations with Ottawa, I have already stated the obvious: There is a very limited range of subject matters and amendments to the Constitution that can be effected bilaterally between the federal Parliament and a province.

I cannot say, because I have not seen Mr. Bouchard's remarks in their full context, exactly what he may have meant by the remarks about a declaration of sovereignty first and negotiations later. He may have been referring to the fact that in the public declarations that are being put forward by a number of people— including, I think, some who have appeared before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission—there is the idea that Quebec, faced with a refusal by the rest of the country to consider its constitutional position, might have to declare sovereignty first and then embark on negotiations. I have seen that idea floated at different times by different people, including some quite recently; it is not a new idea.

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE— CANADIAN DEFENCE POLICY—STATUS REPORT

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I address my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe which takes place this weekend in Paris. Perhaps I might give a little background before I get to my question.

At the NATO summit in July of this year, which took place in London, Prime Minister Mulroney and other NATO leaders issued a declaration that launched wide-ranging reviews of NATO strategy and military forces, and reaffirmed NATO's desires to develop closer ties with the six nations of the Warsaw Treaty Organization, sometimes called the Warsaw Pact. This alliance also proposed that the 16 member states of NATO and the 6 member states of the Warsaw Pact issue a joint declaration stating that they are no longer adversaries. This proposal was accepted.

At the November meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe which will take place this weekend, a very important step will be taken. Over 50 members will attend that conference and their discussions will lead to the signing of a treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe. This CSC agreement addresses, amongst other things, the NATO goals of eliminating the capability of surprise attack and large-scale sustainable offensive operations by the Warsaw Pact. It establishes a secure and stable balance of forces in Europe at considerably lower levels, and ceilings are being placed on all key offensive equipment held by the groups of states belonging to either NATO or the Warsaw Pact.

Honourable senators, these are monumental changes that are taking place in the relationship between the East and the West. My question to the Leader of the Government is: In light of these monumental changes that are taking place in East-West military and political relationships, is Canada preparing a green paper or a white paper on defence?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my friend asked me whether there was a green paper or a white paper in preparation. I would not like to be quite that specific because I do not know the answer to that specific question. I do know, however, that a review of our defence policy is under way, in light of the geopolitical changes that the honourable senator refers to.

[Senator Murray.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CREATION OF NEWS THROUGH POLLING—CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I am sure the Honourable Government Leader of the Senate will recall the evening of Sunday, October 28 and the Globe and Mail-CBC opinion poll in which 2,259 Canadians were interviewed. The poll created news—and I want to stress it did not report news.

I have a series of questions. My first question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: In his opinion, is that a legitimate function for the CBC, a public broadcaster or Government of Canada agency? Should a Government of Canada agency, the CBC in particular, be in the business of creating news?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have an opinion on this matter. It does not come under my ministerial responsibility, thank God. I will ask my colleague, Mr. Masse, who reports to Parliament on the CBC, whether there is any comment he wishes to make on the matter.

The honourable senator is well aware of the jealously-guarded autonomy of the CBC and the arm's length relationship that must exist between the government, the people and the journalists, especially at the CBC.

Senator Davey: The Leader of the Government in the Senate will not be surprised to know I do have an opinion on this matter. I think this is not a legitimate function of the corporation.

I have another question which perhaps you will want to refer to the minister. Is it the Globe and Mail or is it the CBC that has a conflict of interest in this matter? Perhaps I could go on from there and ask some rather specific questions.

I would like to know who represented the CBC in determining the questions. I would like to know who represented the CBC in the actual presentation of the poll. I would like to know who represented the CBC in analyzing the results of the poll.

In view of assurances we have had that the CBC is a cash-starved agency, perhaps the most important question of all for the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: How much money did the CBC spend and/or contribute for this poll?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in almost a lifetime of observing Parliament, I am not sure that I have ever seen questions so detailed about the operations of the CBC asked or, indeed, answered by the responsible minister. If I am wrong and if it is legitimate to have that kind of information tabled in Parliament, then I will be glad to do so. I will certainly see that my friend's questions are conveyed to the Minister of Communications.

Senator Davey: I certainly accept the honourable leader's answer. I think that information should be public information; something that is readily available and that you should be easily able to find. I am confident that you will.

VANIER CUP

UNIVERSITY FOOTBALL CHAMPIONSHIP—TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL COLLEGE BOWL—RADIO COVERAGE BY CBC—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: My further supplementary question is on a matter which the Leader of the Government in the Senate sometimes does not like me to discuss. It is also related to the CBC, but this time my specific reference is to football. This time, I want to talk about the Vanier Cup.

• (1710)

An Hon. Senator: What is that?

Senator Davey: I am glad you asked. The Vanier Cup is a football game that will take place in the SkyDome.

Senator Frith: We can always count on our favourite straight man!

Senator Grafstein: It is named after a former Governor General.

Senator Davey: It will take place in the SkyDome on Saturday, November 24, 1990. It is for the university football championship of the country. There are four teams left in the semi-finals, and they will be playing this weekend. They are St. Mary's, University of Western Ontario, Bishop's—

Senator Frith: Wait for one moment. Saskatchewan will be forthcoming!

Senator Davey: —and the University of Saskatchewan. This is the twenty-sixth annual college bowl, now called the Vanier Cup in honour of the distinguished former Governor General.

Does the Leader of the government know that that cash-starved agency, the CBC, has traditionally covered this broadcast on radio? It has always done so from the start until now; but this time the CBC will not be carrying the broadcast.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Davey: As I have said so often in other situations, in this country we have a few national institutions but we do not have enough. College football and the Vanier Cup have become an institution in this country. But it will not be broadcast on radio this year—at least not on the CBC. Some friends at Standard Broadcasting have picked it up and it will be broadcast on a number of radio stations across the country.

I am informed that it would have cost CBC radio $2,600. Perhaps the Leader of the government will be able to give us some information about the CBC/Globe and Mail poll. I accept his word that he will attempt to find that out; I trust that he will. Perhaps he will not succeed. But it is a sure thing that it will cost many times the $2,600 for the Vanier Cup. I question the priorities of the CBC, and I do so as one who believes profoundly in public broadcasting and used to believe profoundly in the CBC.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CREATION OF NEWS THROUGH POLLING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Senator Bélisle: Crown agency?

Senator Murray: —journalist or other employee of the CBC participated in what journalistic exercise.

Senator Perrault: Why not? Public money is involved.

Senator Murray: Well, just about everything at the CBC involves public money. However, that does not mean that there should not be some limitations on the extent to which Parliament extends its long arm into the operations of the CBC.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): These questions might very well relate to that.

Senator Murray: There are limits that we should accept as to the kind of information that we demand of the CBC, and especially on the journalistic side. It is very easy to cross the line from a legitimate enquiry into intimidation or perceived intimidation. We should be very careful.

If I am wrong—that is, if this is the kind of information that has been sought and produced in the past—it will be produced again and I will see to that. For the moment, I can only undertake to present the questions to the minister who reports to Parliament for the CBC, and he will have to decide what to do.

Senator Frith: Honourable Senators, perhaps as a corollary to what the Leader of the Government has said in answering Senator Davey's question we might get the government's position or a definition of just what that line is.

Senator Murray: I am concerned about the question that Senator Davey asked with regard to the poll. He wants to know what employee —

Senator Frith: Yes: I understand.

Senator Murray: —was involved in designing the questionnaire; analyzing the data; presenting the data, and so on. It should be sufficient for the honourable senator to know that the head of the news department of the CBC is Mr. or Ms. So-and-So and that that person takes responsibility for what is done in that department under the authority of the President and the Board of Directors of the CBC.

I have serious concerns about digging too deep into the internal operations and parading in some public way the names of particular employees who may have performed particular tasks on a project of this kind. But I may be wrong. If this is the kind of information that has been produced in the past and should be made available to Parliament, it will be made available. I will get some advice on that matter from my colleague, Mr. Masse.

Senator Davey: I just wish to make a comment on that. I respect the Government Leader a great deal and regard him, if he will forgive the expression, as an old pro when it comes to polling. You have read many polls in your lifetime; so have many of us here. It is how the polls are interpreted, really. It is what is made of the numbers. You know that and we all know that.

Senator Frith: And the questions asked.

Senator Davey: But it is extremely important to know who put it together. It is not a question that you could ask a private sector outfit. We are talking about an agency of the Government of Canada. Perhaps you do not agree with this, but I sense that perhaps you agree with me that the CBC should not be in the polling business. We would then not have to ask these types of questions. As long as the CBC is in the polling business, and, if you will forgive the expression, in bed with the Globe and Mail— a most wholy alliance, if I may say so— I think my questions are legitimate. I accept what you are saying and hope that you will find something out for us.

Senator Murray: I have seen criticism of that very poll. I have seen an analysis in one of the newspapers. I think I have seen a reply to the criticism from someone at the CBC. I am sure that the questionnaire and the data is available. It is only good journalistic practice to make the whole thing available. My friend can do his analysis or have an analysis done. What I have some problem with is insisting on knowing the identity of this or that employee of the CBC who was involved in the project. I do not have a strong opinion on whether or not the CBC should be engaged in polling. But I do not see why they should be prevented from doing so in terms of their journalistic role. I do not see why they should be prevented from doing what a private -

Senator Davey: The answer to that is that it is the CBC's responsibility to report news not create news.

Senator Murray: But other networks, stations and media do polling.

Senator Davey: But those are private polls by private stations with private people. This involves the Government of Canada!

Senator Murray: No. It is not the Government of Canada.

Senator Bonnell: It is the Parliament of Canada!

Senator Perrault: It is a Crown agency!

Senator Murray: It is a publicly owned broadcasting agency. I am not sure that they should be prevented from doing what their competition does.

Senator Barootes: The Liberals —

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Davey: I want to comment on Senator Barootes' reference to the Liberals.

Senator Barootes: No!

Senator Davey: Never, to my knowledge, did the Liberal Party engage in public opinion polling in any relationship with the CBC.

Senator Bosa: That is right. And not with the Globe and Mail, either.

Senator Davey: I would be grateful for your replies to my questions.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE RELATIONS

RENEGOTIATION OF CANADA-U.S. SOFTWOOD LUMBER AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the largest trade union in British Columbia is the International Woodworkers of America. Its members have expressed their grave concern with respect to the competitive position of the Canadian lumber industry vis-à-vis that of the United States. Honourable senators will recall that a few days ago I brought the attention of the Senate to the plight not only of British Columbia's forest industry, but to that of the industry across the country. I reiterate my appeal for the government to renegotiate the softwood lumber deal negotiated in the mid-1980s with the United States of America. An outright cancellation of the deal would be the better of the options.

Despite the fact that at no time was the U.S. lumber industry able to prove that Canadian lumber producers enjoyed an unfair competitive advantage in the United States market, this government caved in to U.S. pressure and accepted, in effect, a 15 per cent penalty against Canadian lumber companies. A few weeks ago Simon Reisman came to British Columbia and said that, on second thought, we should have hung tougher in the negotiations with the United States, but "we had to give up something." I regret that when it came to negotiating issues that could be "given up," this government gave up the lumber industry of British Columbia in the process. Mr. Reisman said that if he had to renegotiate it again, he might have done it differently. British Columbians agree with him on that score.

At the time this unfair and discriminatory action was imposed on our lumber producers by the Mulroney-Reagan axis, our producers warned that as soon as a recession occurred, the folly of the government would be revealed and the Canadian lumber producers would be the first to suffer from a slowdown in U.S. housing construction. Now it has happened. The dire prediction is coming true.

A few days ago the IWA asked for a renegotiation of that unfair and infamous agreement with the United States. The management side of the lumber producers are in agreement with the trade union position. The provincial government of British Columbia and the other political parties are supportive of undoing or cancelling the deal—at the very least renegotiating it. The question is: Is the federal government prepared to open talks in order to bring a measure of justice to one of Canada's most important industries? This is a priority item in western Canada, and I hope the government will indicate that it too is concerned.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

BACKLOG OF REFUGEES—POSSIBILITY OF AMNESTY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Two years ago some 100,000 refugees were waiting to be processed by immigration officials in Canada. At the present time only 20,000 of those refugees have been processed. Some of them have been driven to extremes, such as the case of a Polish refugee in Montreal who tried to commit suicide last week. In fact, Dr. Cécile Rousseau of Montreal's Douglas Hospital warns that there are many more refugees who have reached the end of their rope. I was wondering if the government, in light of this drastic situation, has considered granting amnesty to all refugees in Canada once and for all to clear the backlog.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, that option was considered and rejected some time ago. As to the operations of the refugee termination board, I will obtain an up-to-date report and bring it in as soon as possible.

Senator Bosa: Is the honourable gentleman aware that of the 28,000 cases waiting to be processed in the province of Quebec, only 4,800 have actually been processed, and only 124 claims have been rejected? This shows that a minimal number of refugees would be rejected by this process; therefore, an amnesty would not be out of kilter with what previous governments have done.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not contest but I cannot vouch for the statistics my friend just cited, and certainly not for the interpretation he places on them. However, I will ask my colleague Mrs. McDougall to comment on this in the course of providing the report to which I referred earlier.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I was delighted to hear the questions put by Senator Davey, and I hope he pursues the matter further. A former distinguished prime minister of this country, the Rt. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who was respected by everyone, wrote an innocuous letter to CBC, and the Conservative opposition of that day massacred him. Then when the Conservatives took power, another great respected gentleman, the Honourable George Nowlan, who was in charge of CBC, would not tell anyone anything about its activities. This has gone on and on, regardless of the government in power.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, while he is checking on this other information, to ascertain whether it is the intention of this government to continue to protect individuals or groups within the CBC. During Senator Davey's question, one of the Liberal senators mentioned that it uses public money, which is true. It is a Crown corporation. The public seems to know all about the activities of members of Parliament, both in this chamber and in the other place. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us if it is the government's intention to continue to shield everything with respect to the CBC. I am not referring to the poll Senator Davey spoke of earlier.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it is not a question of shielding or covering up what is happening at the CBC, but successive governments have properly taken the position that they should not interfere in the day-to-day management, programming and journalistic decisions taken by the network. The control of Parliament and the government consists in this: first, the CBC must come to Parliament for its money; and, second, we appoint the president, chief executive officer and board of directors of the corporation. If we believe they are mismanaging the corporation or not conducting the affairs of the corporation in a way that is appropriate and expected by the Canadian people, then we have the option of dismissing those directors and the president.

POWER OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a short supplementary question. With respect to the board of directors, could the leader tell us what power it really has? I have spoken with those who have been members of that board at various times, and they have said that they do not wield much power.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Their powers are defined in the present Broadcasting Act and in the proposed Broadcasting Act, which is still before the House of Commons and which we hope to deal with here before too long. At that time my friend can judge for himself what is proposed and perhaps take part in the debate.

THE HONOURABLE BENOIT BOUCHARD

STATEMENTS IN THE PRESS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate following the question by Senator Gigantès about statements made by the Hon. Benoit Bouchard.

About ten days ago, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he agreed that ministers of the Government of Canada—not of the Government of Quebec—should try not to exacerbate the situation, since Quebec is involved in a constitutional debate and there is also Mr. Spicer's Citizens Forum.

The Journal de Montréal of November 10 quoted Mr. Bouchard, under the following headline:

> "Either the structure changes or Quebec becomes sovereign".

Another headline in the same newspaper quoted the same minister who, as far as I know, is a minister of the Canadian government, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, with a department that is very important across this country.

The other headline is:

> He would still vote "yes"!

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate think it is really appropriate for a minister of the Canadian government to make such statements at this time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, my friend alluded to an article in a Montreal newspaper which I have not read. I did not read Mr. Bouchard's statement.

Before commenting, I would have to read exactly what he said and perhaps ask him a few questions about the interpretation put on this statement by the honourable senator.

For the time being, I do not intend to comment.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I accept the minister's reply, provided someone comments on these statements very shortly.

I realize the minister doesn't like these questions. I remember his reaction to my question last week and to the question put by my colleague, Senator Gigantès. It is a question people should not be afraid to ask. There are still people in this country who want a country. There are Quebecers who want a country. There are French Canadians who want a country and English Canadians who want a country.

When people who are not from Quebec hear such statements from ministers of the government—I hope that someone in the federal government will comment. I intend to wait impatiently, perhaps even patiently, until the Leader of the Government in the Senate gives me an answer.

PERSIAN GULF

STATUS OF ALLIANCE AGAINST IRAQ—MEETING BETWEEN MR. BAKER AND MR. CLARK—REQUEST FOR MAJOR POINTS OF DISCUSSION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Secretary of State Baker and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, met yesterday in Bermuda, we are told, in order that Mr. Clark could be briefed by Secretary Baker on his up-to-date views on the status of the alliance—Western and Arab—allied against Iraq. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform the Senate what major or salient points of discussion took place between Secretary Baker and Mr. Clark yesterday in Bermuda?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Secretary Baker had just completed a journey through some seven countries. He and Mr. Clark took the occasion to review Secretary Baker's previous meetings and to discuss matters of interest and concern not only in the Gulf region but in other areas of the world.

My honourable friend may be aware that Mr. Clark is proceeding from the Bermuda meeting to Czechoslovakia, the U.S.S.R., Turkey, Jordan and Israel. I do not expect to hear personally from him over the next little while. He will not be back until the end of the month, but if there are particular matters on which the honourable senator or other honourable senators seek information, I shall try to obtain it from his office or from the Department of External Affairs.

CANADIAN COMMITMENTS—PURSUANCE OF SANCTIONS—FREEZING OF IRAQI ASSETS IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jarahmiel S. Grafstein: Could the Leader of the Government, in his investigation, advise what, if any, differences arose with respect to the strategy, tactics or policies followed by the United States with respect to solving the Gulf crisis, and what, if any, commitments—military or otherwise—were offered to Secretary Baker on behalf of the Government of Canada? That would be pertinent information that might be of relevance to this chamber.

I have a supplementary question. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise whether or not, in pursuance of the sanctions against Iraq, any steps have been taken in Canada to freeze commercial assets of Iraq?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I will have to confirm the situation with regard to commercial assets of Iraq before making a definitive statement on that matter. No request was made of Canada during the Bermuda meeting that we increase or change our military capacity in the Gulf.

Mr. Clark has reiterated Canada's position to the effect that Saddam Hussein must understand that if all diplomatic efforts fail, then the world community is prepared to use force in order to enforce the United Nations' Security Council resolutions, and that Canada has a strong preference to have any necessary force authorized by the United Nations. That is Canada's position, reiterated by Mr. Clark in the course of the Bermuda meetings.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate that answer given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In my earlier question, I asked about commitments, military or otherwise. Did we make any commitments to take any further active steps pursuant to either the sanctions or general policies? My question was not only related to military support; it was also related to any additional steps.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the honourable senator's question and I shall make inquiries.

UNITED STATES MILITARY MANOEUVRES—INVOLVEMENT OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Yesterday the United States government announced that the U.S. marines stationed in the Gulf area were about to commence military manoeuvres within ten miles of the Iraq border. Is the Canadian government personnel involved—either in the air or at sea—in support of those manoeuvres?

WORLD WAR II

INTERNMENT OF ETHNIC CANADIANS—NATURE OF GOVERNMENT APOLOGY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate the following question: When the Prime Minister of Canada apologizes to Japanese-Canadians for their treatment during the Second World War, when he apologizes to Italian-Canadians and to Ukrainians, does he do so on his own behalf, on behalf of the Government of Canada, on behalf of the government as the executive power or on behalf of the Queen in right of Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations)): Honourable senators, he does so on behalf of the Canadian government, as its leader, but I am sure that he is supported by the vast majority of his fellow Canadians and Canadian parliamentarians.

POSSIBILITY OF APOLOGY TO ACADIANS

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I will not comment on the merits of the apologies that have been made.

However, many residents of my own province of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and other provinces wonder whether the government will someday apologize to the Acadian people, who were deported, deprived of their land and scattered to the four winds. Will the Canadian government apologize someday to Acadians?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, these tragic events took place in 1755, well before Confederation.

Senator Corbin: Exactly. The present government's authority or right to do what it does has evolved over time. It is a legacy of our past. The government that apologizes today is not the government that perpetrated those acts at the time. I don't see the problem.

Are you saying that the British government ought to apologize to Acadians for the fate they suffered, for the compensation they never received?

This is a serious question. And it is a question many Acadians are asking. You said that the vast majority of Canadians approve of what this government does. I have no comment. However, many Canadians, and especially Acadians, ask me why the government is doing this. We didn't ask for an apology. We didn't ask for compensation. We didn't get an apology and we didn't get compensation. And why this series of apologies now? There are people in this country who do not understand. Really. I think the government should give a better explanation or apologize once and for all to all groups that have suffered in this way. Perhaps we could start with the aboriginal peoples of this country.

INTERNMENT OF ITALIAN CANADIANS—NATURE OF COMPENSATION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he would kindly take us into his confidence and let us know this afternoon the nature of the retribution which the Canadian government is considering for Italian Canadians for the internment they suffered at the hands of the government during World War II.

Senator Haidasz: Compensation, then.

Senator Murray: I am not aware that the Prime Minister referred to compensation in the statement which he made in Toronto. In the event that I am wrong, I will take the question as notice if only to confirm my own impression that compensation was not mentioned in his statement.

Senator Haidasz: Surely the federal government must be considering some form of compensation to Italo-Canadians since they have already given compensation to Japanese Canadians.

APOLOGY TO OTHER ETHNIC CANADIANS—CONSIDERATION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government.

Is it also the intention of the federal government, of which he is a member, to give a form of apology to Canadians of Polish, Bulgarian, Turkish and other ethnic origins who also were jailed in Canadian gulags during World War I?

senators, during the Prime Minister's recent visit to western Canada, there was some discussion of Ukrainian Canadians and the hardships which they were forced to undergo during the First World War. I am not aware that there was any public discussion of the situation with regard to the other people whom my honourable friend has mentioned. I shall make inquiries.

Senator Haidasz: While the minister is making inquiries into that matter, would he also let us know as soon as possible whether the government will give a formal apology to Canadians of Chinese origin whose ancestors, for example, were levied with a head tax for bringing to Canada their wives.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries in that regard.

CITIZENS' FORUM

RESIGNATION OF M^me^ PAQUETTE-SEVIGNY—APPOINTMENT OF REPLACEMENT MEMBER

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

We learned today that the Spicer commission is now lacking one member with the resignation of Madame Thérèse Paquette-Sévigny. Could the Leader of the Government indicate to us whether Madame Paquette-Sévigny will be replaced by a woman and by a woman from the north, given the widespread view being expressed during the first part of Mr. Spicer's tour with the Citizens' Forum that this major region of our country is not already represented. Perhaps this would be an ideal opportunity to recitfy that situation.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can only state with certainty that Madame Paquette-Sévigny will be replaced. No decision has yet been reached as to who will replace her.

Senator Fairbairn: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be prepared to weigh in on behalf of a northern representative?

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is prepared, as always, to convey Senator Fairbairn's representations.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Murray would pay some attention to the recommendations of Senator Doyle, given his marvellous letter which appears in the Gazette of November 9.

Senator Murray: I certainly shall, honourable senators.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I propose moving an amendment which I am sure senators on both sides will find agreeable. I have meticulously gone over the details of this amendment to make sure that it does not violate any Conservative philosophy. I am sure that is important. I have also discussed with some of my colleagues the supporting speeches, which will not be long, to ensure that there is nothing offensive to anyone in this amendment. It covers a large range of goods that we would like to see either exempt or zero-rated. If senators opposite find anything offensive in it, I would be prepared to offer unanimous consent to withdraw those offensive parts in order that we can do what I think most Canadians want us to do, which is to pass this amendment that I am going to move.

Senator Molgat: You will accept a sub-amendment?

Senator Olson: Yes, I will. However, if the sub-amendment is there, I also want to make sure that it does not offend the philosophy of anyone on either side of the house, so that we may have the opportunity of doing this great service to the Canadian people.

The problem we had making amendments to the bill is that we had to go into 25 or 30 places. As I stated, this amendment is an extension of the exempt goods and services and also includes those that will be changed from a taxation status to a zero-rated status. The reasons are so that a rebate can be claimed on any tax that has been paid on those services.

Probably the main thrust of the amendment is that it is a speech in defence of free enterprise, and that is why I am sure honourable senators opposite will find it so agreeable. For example, we know that Teleglobe was sold to free enterprise. I could never understand the reason for that, but I guess it was to pick up a few dollars. That was one situation where there seemed to be no reason. Certainly, it had nothing like the losses that were suffered by deHavilland and Canadair. Teleglobe was guaranteed a profit and it was a monopoly. The government has privatized Air Canada, and the CN Hotels, which used to belong to a crown corporation; and the privatization of PetroCanada is now in the works. Therefore, I feel fairly confident that honourable senators will agree that the amendment is in the defence of free enterprise. As far as tax is concerned, it puts free enterprise on an equal basis with government enterprises which, in some cases, do essentially the same thing or provide the same service.

I have a few copies in English and in French, which I will distribute, and senators can follow as I read through it.

Honourable senators, I move:

> That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended to include within Exempt Supplies certain medical, educational and governmental services, and to include, within Zero-rated Supplies, passenger transportation services and funeral services

● (2010)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Olson, for the Honourable Senator Frith, and seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that Bill C-62 be not now read the third time—

Hon Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this amendment grants tax exempt status to a number of supplies which do not enjoy that status in the bill. Part (a) of the amendment extends tax exempt status to the services of dieticians, registered massage therapists, social workers, Christian Scientist and naturopathic physicians.

Part (B) extends tax exempt status to psychoanalytic services to children.

Parts (C) and (D) extend tax exempt status to private colleges in addition to public colleges.

Part (C) removes the requirement that courses be taken for credit in order to be tax exempt. Of course, we know that there are a great number of people who take courses, and not necessarily for the purpose of obtaining a degree.

Part (E) of the amendment extends tax exempt status to courses or programs offered by public sector bodies when aimed at persons aged 18 years and under. In the bill at the present time the cut-off age is 14 years of age.

Part (F) extends tax exempt status to services provided by the private sector to the aged, the infirm, the disabled, et cetera, when made on behalf of a public sector body. Eligible supplies include food, beverages and homemaker services.

Part (G) of the amendment extends tax exempt status to supplies made by or on behalf of a private sector company on behalf of a government or municipality when that supply would be tax exempt if it is supplied directly by the government. I can explain that in some greater detail. There are a number of good examples where, if the service had been supplied by a municipality directly, it would be tax exempt. However, if it were contracted out, then it would become a taxable service. That is why I am making this speech in defence of free enterprise contractors who enter into contracts. Unless we amend the bill, there will be a great deal of unfairness extended to these people.

The major concern in part (G) is to ensure that municipalities are not penalized if they contract out services in the private sector. This is especially relevant to a number of things. Those that come to mind readily are garbage collection and snow removal. Garbage collection is a fairly large item in some municipalities. I am not sure if Ottawa still contracts out much or all of its garbage collection. It certainly used to. If it does that, it becomes a taxable service. However, if the city did it directly without the private enterprise company involved then it would not be taxable. That is manifestly unfair.

The rest of the amendment deals with the other changes that were suggested by witnesses on the grounds that the bill does not provide for competitive equity among various services. This is the main thrust of the amendment we are dealing with tonight.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, I will not be long in giving a further detailed explanation of the amendment. However, perhaps I should spend a few minutes to say that Schedule V of Bill C-62 lists a variety of supplies which are to be exempt under the goods and service tax. That is to say, no GST is to be charged on sales while no input tax credits are allowed. These services will then bear some amount of GST embedded in the price, but the amount will generally be less than the 7 per cent borne by goods and services which are subject to the full tax.

Many groups appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to complain about the inconsistent way in which the bill grants exempt status to some supplies but not to others. I have given honourable senators some examples of that.

I am sure that the government will get around to bringing in amendments to correct these injustices, if it has not already done so. There is no doubt in my mind that the government will do that. I plead with honourable senators, why pass a bill that has all this in it when the committee's job was to go across the country and ask people about the problems in the bill? The people pointed them out to us, and an analysis of all that evidence has been done, and it is from that analysis that these amendments come. I hope that honourable senators opposite will see the justice and fairness that is involved in supporting this amendment now.

In addition, the most notable inconsistency occurs in the field of health care. Institutional health care is tax exempt, as are the services provided by a wide variety of health care professionals within the institutional framework. However, many of these same services are subject to a 7 per cent tax when provided outside the institutional setting. The GST is thus biased toward institutional health care, even though that represents in many cases a far more expensive and, in many instances, less effective method of providing health care. This amendment is designed to eliminate such a bias. I hope that the amendment has caught all of these inconsistencies and biases. I cannot guarantee that some more may not be found, but that is the main thrust of this amendment insofar as the health care field is concerned. It is to bring it into a consistent position and to let Canadians arrange for health care services in the best and most efficient way without having a bias on whether it will be taxed at 7 per cent more or less.

The bill already exempts a number of health services provided outside the institution. This amendment adds to the list the services of such professionals as dieticians, registered massage therapists, social workers, naturopathic physicians, and practitioners of Christian Science, as well as psychoanalytic therapists for children. I do not think anyone would disagree that this is a right and proper thing to do. I have heard no explanation as to why there is this inconsistency in the application of the tax.

Many of these services are covered under provincial health care programs and are generally accepted and respected such that they merit inclusion in the list of exempt health care services in the same way that nurses, occupational therapists and others merit inclusion. I do not believe that we need to spend a lot of time on this. Most provincial governments have looked over this type of health care service. Surely if they have included it in the list of services for which they are willing to pay, we should not tax it. That is all this amendment asks.

The bill also tax exempts personal and home care services for the infirm, aged, and disadvantaged when these services are provided by public sector bodies; in other words, if they are provided by the local hospital board or the local municipality, or in some cases provincial governments. In some cases there are no public sector bodies to provide these services and in other cases private sector bodies can do the job more efficiently.

This amendment gives equal treatment to such services when provided by a private organization. Surely that is reasonable. That is something we can do now to repair this bill before we pass it rather than have to scurry around to fix it afterwards. It is going to be a terrible injustice in some cases when you include all these services and then say we can not correct it now. We can. We have a chance to do it tomorrow afternoon at 5:45.

I suggest to you that this amendment gives equal treatment to such services when provided by a private organization if the service is provided—and I want to emphasize this—on behalf of a public sector body. In other words, it is the same service contracted out because it can be done better. Thus the amendment removes the bias in favour of public sector delivery of certain social services.

Moving to another part of the amendment, you will see that in the sports and recreational field a non-profit organization delivering sports and recreational programs primarily to children 14 years of age and under are now tax exempt. This status is granted because these services have an important social value. I do not think anyone questions that. Yet these services are as valuable, if not more so, when delivered to teenagers. However, under the bill these services are taxable if delivered to children over 14 years of age.

Virtually all non-profit organizations who appeared before the committee argued that the appropriate age limit should be 18 years of age. This amendment I am moving tonight accommodates that request. I am sure that no one is going to argue that it should not be done. I do not understand why it is cut off at age 14, knowing that such events as the Canada Games and Provincial Games, which are so popular and have a very high participation rate, do not discriminate on the basis of age. Yet under the bill they are going to have to if they are going to comply with the provisions of Bill-62. I am sure honourable senators opposite would want to take the first opportunity to correct that inconsistency, too.

Educational services, by and large, are tax exempt. In the case of colleges the bill restricts this exemption to public colleges. This amendment extends exempt status to private colleges. This sector is becoming increasing important, especially in the fields of technology and computer science. There is no good reason to discourage by way of the GST the private sector from providing important educational services, yet if this bill is not amended there is going to be a 7 per cent bias. Unfortunately, a lot of unnecessary bookkeeping and accounting will also be necessary for them to comply with the provisions of the bill.

Similarly, the bill grants tax exempt status to services such as garbage collection supplied by the public sector bodies. Privatization of government services is increasingly seen as a means of reducing government waste. At least that is the philosophy of some people. I think it has been demonstrated that the federal Conservative government subscribes to that philosophy; indeed, it is a strong supporter of many privatization initiatives. This amendment supports federal initiatives in that regard by ensuring that services provided on behalf of public service bodies have the same status as services provide by public sector bodies. I do not know that I need to say any more about that. It just seems to me that the justice and fairness of it is so obvious that all of us would be anxious to make this improvement in the bill.

As far as education is concerned, we know that tuition is tax exempt if it is for training in one of the official languages or if it relates to a course taken towards a degree or diploma. Many people wish to upgrade their skills by taking courses, yet they have no desire or need to receive a degree or a diploma for that upgrading effort. Such courses should be tax-exempt and this amendment does exactly that.

I am fairly well convinced now that most of my colleagues on this side are going to support this amendment, so my plea is to honourable senators opposite to look at the justice and fairness involved in making these changes.

Senator Grafstein: Silence implies consent.

Senator Olson: Yes. Members opposite are being particularly kind to me tonight. Several of them promised that if I did not speak too long they were not going to heckle me. I have a problem, though. I hardly know how to make a speech without a little heckling.

● (2030)

Senator Frith: Just one little heckle, fellas. Come on.

Senator Molgat: Get Senator Simard.

Senator Grafstein: You are overwhelmingly persuasive.

Senator Olson: I hope that is the reason.

Senator Frith: Where is Senator Simard when you need him?

Senator Murray: The bank rate will be announced tomorrow at noon.

Senator Olson: Then we can bring that up tomorrow. I do not want to be diverted from my mission for tonight, which is to try to persuade senators opposite to go along with my amendment. I shall be as conciliatory as I can be to correct these anomalies.

I am sure that honourable senators realize that I did not do all the research to come up with this amendment. A lot of people helped me to find these inconsistencies and injustices. We were all meticulously careful to make sure that the amendment would fit with what we perceive to be the philosophy of the Conservative government so that senators opposite would not have any difficulty at all in supporting it. That is my submission.

Senator Murray: Maybe you are going too far in that direction for some of us.

Senator Olson: I was worried that I might be going a little too far, but I thought that I would bend over backwards—

Senator Murray: Please don't.

Senator Olson: —to make sure that members opposite would not reject the amendment.

Senator Frith: It is always better to bend over backwards than to fall on your face by being too forward.

Senator Doody: Is that enough heckling, or do you want some more?

Senator Olson: I am sure that there is enough in this amendment that if they were to canvass their caucus tomorrow fairly early in the morning, they could persuade every member of their caucus that this amendment is fair, just and necessary, and I am sure that there would be enough support when the vote on the amendment is called tomorrow afternoon.

I would like to say a word or two about domestic transportation services. They are to be fully taxed under Bill C-62. Municipal transits will not be fully taxed. This amendment would grant free tax status to all passenger transportation by way of bus, train or taxi. As I mentioned to Senator Murray a few moments ago, domestic air travel is not included here and will still be taxed.

Senator Murray: What is the justification for that?

Senator Olson: I was concerned that you would probably make some argument about the amount of money that would be involved, and I did not want that to happen. I did not want you to find a good reason to reject the amendment.

Senator Murray: It is a serious anomaly.

Senator Olson: Perhaps, but it is one that you can fix up some time after the bill is passed, if ever.

Canadians are concerned about the cost of domestic transportation. The government has phased out most of VIA Rail because it was losing money and they could not charge enough through fares to retain it. Bus service has taken over in most of the areas where VIA Rail has been phased out. Of course, this adds to the already very large cost of, for example, providing and maintaining highways, and, as well, VIA Rail is still receiving huge subsidies for the services still in existence. The government should not be exacerbating the problem. It should remove the tax on these forms of transportation to encourage people to use them, not to mention environmental reasons.

There are three reasons for making such an amendment. First, public transportation should be treated equally, and the current provision of the bill grants preferential treatment to municipal systems over competitors such as taxis, and that is not fair. This part of the amendment is consistent with the other parts of it which try to treat services equally when provided by the public or the private sector. The second reason for the amendment is environmental in nature. Buses, trains and taxis are direct competitors with the personal automobile, but we have been told that they are much more environmentally friendly. The people of Canada are concerned about their environment. They do not want cars coming down to the metropolitan areas with only one person in each automobile.

Senator Cools: Like the Prime Minister's car.

Senator Olson: I suppose I could forgive the Prime Minister. He can have a car in front and in the back, but the masses should use buses, taxis and so on, whether or not they be municipally owned. Municipally owned transport systems will not pay the tax but anyone else providing a similar service will have to pay the tax. That is not good for the environment at any stage. By granting these services tax-free status, Canadians would be encouraged to reduce their use of the personal automobile, especially in areas where air pollution is a problem. It is for that reason that domestic air travel is not included in the amendment and why the amendment chooses to treat these services as tax free rather than only tax exempt supplies.

Domestic transportation is an important component of the tourism industry. This sector will be hit hard by the GST, and by granting tax-free status to these services some of the deleterious effects of the tax on that industry will be moderated. I am sure that all those senators who took part in the hearings were impressed by the numbers and the intensity of the pleas from the people involved in the tourism industry. They said, "Don't be quite so tough and difficult on our industry. This industry must compete on a global basis. The Canadian tourism industry competes particularly with the United States, Mexico, Europe and anywhere else from which we can attract tourists or to which Canadians will travel." Personally I was impressed with their pleas. Generally, the tourism industry will be hurt more than any other single sector of the economy by the GST. What is offered in the amendment is not a complete relief, but at least it goes part way by pulling the tax off bus, rail and other such services.

The final part of the amendment would grant tax-free status to funeral services. While the application of the GST to funerals might pose some problems with respect to prepaid funerals, this amendment is made on the grounds that it is simply inappropriate and insensitive to tax such services at the retail level.

Senator Cools: It is morbid.

Senator Olson: The death of a loved one is a traumatic experience in itself, and being faced with the GST liability at such a time represents an unnecessary burden. I am sure that Senator Poitras will agree with me. It seems to me that when the Funeral Services Association of Canada made its presentation in Halifax, Senator Poitras expressed a lot of sympathy for the difficulties they faced, and I am sure that he will be particularly supportive of the amendment for that reason.

• (2040)

Honourable senators, on page 53:29 of the committee's proceedings taken in Halifax it says the following:

> The government is saying that the goods and services for which there are no alternatives should not be taxed. They have accepted food, health care,—

They have only accepted some health care—> —education, shelter and child care as essential services, but the list is not complete without adding funeral services.

I want to make the argument that, if you are to accept the government's argument that they are not going to tax essential services for which there are no alternatives, then surely funerals fit into that category.

The other day, I tried to make the argument that, in Canada, domestic fuel is essential. I do not know of anyone living in Canada who does not have to provide fuel to heat his house. The government did not listen then but I hope it does now. It is obvious that you have to do something with the body of a person who dies. You either have to cremate the body or bury it. You have to pay for that service. People are not authorized to have any home remedy; they have to hire people who are licensed to do these things.

Hon. Anne C. Cools: Would the honourable senator take a question? I also listened to some of the witnesses Senator Olson heard but I still find myself mystified and bewildered as to whether a funeral is a good or a service.

Senator Olson: I would say it is partly both. There are some services that are required and some goods that are provided. Again reading from page 53:29, the funeral directors in Halifax told us the following:

> The government plans to tax items that are not included in the cost of the funeral service and are simply paid by the funeral director and are reimbursed by the family.

We know that happens in almost every case. They went on to state:

> These are items such as honorariums for the clergy, special music and opening and closing of the grave.

These fees are paid by the funeral director and subsequently charged to the family. In Halifax, they asked the question:

> How would you feel if you paid a clergyman or a soloist $50.00 for helping during a funeral service and then had to ask the family for $53.51?

If the family had paid that directly without having it go through the funeral director, there would have been no tax on paying the clergy or someone who provided music. They were asking for clarification at that time.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Would you permit a question?

Senator Olson: I do not want to go over my time allocation.

Senator Balfour: I do not want to enrage or provoke you.

Senator Olson: That is impossible tonight.

Senator Balfour: I have two questions. The first question is with respect to your amendment as a whole. Could you quantify the amount? I would assume that in the course of your research you have determined the revenue cost of the amendment and balanced that off against the revenue that would have been derived from the FST. Could you enlighten me on that?

Senator Olson: I can enlighten you specifically on the funeral service.

Senator Balfour: What about the whole amendment?

Senator Olson: I do not have the capability of the Department of Finance to go over all of the figures and estimate the cost of lost revenue because of this amendment. I make no apologies for that.

Senator Balfour: Do you have a ballpark figure?

Senator Olson: No, I do not even have a ballpark figure. I can tell you that it is fairly insignificant in comparison to the global figure of something over $20 billion dollars. It is not a significant figure. So far as funerals are concerned, the manufacturers' sales tax is now paid on caskets and that sort of thing. All you have to do is continue that.

Senator Balfour: On the wholesale price.

Senator Olson: Yes, on the wholesale price. You would not lose a great deal of money by holding back from imposing the GST. You could just continue the manufacturers' sales tax. You could also do other things.

Senator Balfour: I have a supplementary question on the funeral aspect alone. Senator Olson mentioned caskets. How about embalming equipment, vehicles and all the components that go into the operation of a full funeral service facility? Does he have a figure to balance against the sales tax that will be imposed on funeral services?

Senator Olson: No. I admit right from the top that I have not got a computer or an econometric model like the Department of Finance and other government bodies.

Senator Balfour: The Library of Parliament has a research facility which you could have used.

Senator Olson: I think Senator Balfour is missing the point of my argument. There may be a few dollars involved and I would be the first to admit it, but I do not think a great amount is involved and I do not think my friend does either.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that we are dealing with a situation which involves a severely traumatic experience—a funeral—and the government said at the beginning—I heard the Minister of Finance say it several times—"We are not going to tax goods and services which are essential and for which there are no alternatives."

They then went part way in terms of education and slapped the tax on in some areas and not in others. They also went part way in health care. All I am trying to do is to clean up what they did no quite finish doing.

Senator Balfour: Are you saying the tax should be hidden?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: My friend knows that we would like to take the government at its word, and the people would like to do that too. I am going to be careful because I do not want to annoy anyone here. You have said that you are not going to tax essential services. Well, honourable senators, nobody in Canada can avoid providing a funeral service for a dead body, whether the person was part of your family or not. In fact, the law in every province, because this is a provincial matter, sets out the procedures and, indeed, in many cases, the qualifications of people who can provide that service. You have no alternative. You cannot argue that it is not essential. I am sure you will agree with that, so let us not put GST on this service.

Senator Balfour: But it is taxed now.

Senator Olson: You can continue to collect tax at the manufacturing level. No one will try to take that authority away from the federal government. I want to be careful because there is another argument I could make here but I do not want to annoy anyone.

Senator Doody: Do not provoke anyone.

Senator Olson: I am not going to provoke anyone.

• (2050)

It seems to me that it is so fundamentally wrong, when the government's admonition was that there would be no tax on essential services, to find that funeral services will be taxed. It seems obvious to me, but there is more to it than that. There is another problem. In Canada today there is about $600 million in trust in pre-paid funerals. I did not realize it before, but the money for a pre-paid funeral is placed in a trust account in the name of the person for whom the arrangements have been made until the time of death. I know this is true in Nova Scotia and I think the other provinces have essentially the same provisions. The Nova Scotia Cemetery and Funeral Services Act, for example, makes it clear that a purchase has not occurred at the time of the deposit. The purchase occurs when the service is provided, some time later, months later or, in most cases, many years later.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Olson: Yet the government is going to require that the tax be paid when the pre-paid arrangements are made. I want to say this again so it is clear: In almost all provinces, although I have not checked every one, the legislation makes it clear that a purchase has not occurred at the time the arrangements are made.

There is something else. Provincial legislation provides that the person who buys that service has the right to get his money back any time he wants. So why in the name of common sense is the government charging a tax on that service when no purchase has been made and the money is recallable, if that is the right word, by the person purchasing the service? It is fundamentally wrong. Even if it is only a few dollars in lost revenue, in my view it is just wrong to do it.

Honourable senators, I see it is about 48 minutes since the sitting started, and I want to complete my plea to senators opposite to think about this carefully tonight. You have a copy of our amendment, and I can provide you with far more substantive arguments than I have already made, because some people went through all the representations made regarding the services I am trying to have exempted from the tax or zero rated. The list of people who think they are being very unjustly treated is long, and these are not people who just don't like to pay taxes. I know that the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, Senator Murray, and everyone else who speaks on behalf of the government, always say, "Nobody likes to pay taxes," as if that is the reason people object to the GST. What I am arguing is that you are charging different people a different rate of tax for the same goods or services. That is what is wrong.

As I said at the outset, I admit I probably have not found every injustice; nor, I am sure, did the researchers when they went looking for them. I am saying to you that if you pass this amendment to the bill, you will certainly be improving the justice of the tax in 25 or 30 cases.

I hope honourable senators opposite will accept this amendment in the spirit in which it is offered, which is to remove these injustices and at least to try to help Canadian people understand that this government is not completely immune to good suggestions for improvement. Our job on this side of the house is to criticize, and I know that sometimes we do that in an annoying way, although I try to avoid that most of the time. However, in this case, I plead with you. What we are trying to do is improve the bill for the Canadian people. They believe it needs improvement. To realize this, one only needs to read the evidence presented to one of their Houses of Parliament, namely, the Senate.

I hope that you set aside whatever other reason you might have for rejecting all amendments and show some concern and reason; show that you can see there are injustices that should be corrected at the first opportunity.

Honourable senators, I will not be any loger. I just wanted to show you that we can improve this tax legislation, and to plead with you to do so. If there is anything offensive in this amendment—and I do not think there is—we will be glad to make some adjustments so that we can proceed with the good parts of it. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I listened very carefully to the speech by the previous speaker who moved this sixth amendment, actually a hodge-podge of several different amendments.

I noticed that from the outset, our colleagues on the other side of this Chamber appealed to our conscience, our sense of responsibility and our compassion, to persuade us to support amendments for which they feel they have made a clear case.

I noticed that about a week ago, and I remember part of a speech by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), who gave a brillant exposé on the history of the Senate. This was between midnight and one o'clock in the morning, Thursday, November 8.

I remember part of this speech, a comment by Senator Meighen, who said, if I am not mistaken, that if the Senate became as partisan as the House of Commons, it would not play its true role and its abolition would be justified.

My question is this: is the Senate partisan at this time? My answer is an unqualified yes, and the evidence is there for all to see.

I say with no hesitation whatever that since I was appointed to this Chamber in April 1985, the Liberal majority in the Senate has gradually turned into the non-elected opposition of the government in power, although the latter has a strong majority of elected members in the House of Commons.

Should it therefore be abolished? That is a question that should be the subject of non-partisan debate and study, something that is urgently needed . . .

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You are not addressing the amendment.

Senator David: Just hear me out! I will get to it eventually.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Be patient, Senator Frith!

Senator David: . . . non-partisan debate that is becoming increasingly urgent, considering the heightened interest of the media in our Chamber which, until recently, was either totally ignored or the butt of unwarranted sarcasm.

I hope Senator Stewart's learned speech is quoted when this debate takes place. It deserves to be heard by a much larger audience and in circumstances more conducive to reflection.

We don't live in a monastery where time for prayer and meditation is scheduled in the middle of the night!

Bill C-62 and the amendments that are being tabled piecemeal are a typical example of guerilla warfare, based mainly on this element of partisanship which Senator Molson heartily deplored, and rightly so, in one of his speeches.

Senator Frith, I may remind you that Senator Stewart's speech addressed an amendment. He made a forty-five minute speech . . .

Senator Frith: Not on this amendment!

Senator David: . . . on another amendment.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator David: Well, if I did decide to do what one of your colleagues did, who set such a good example, would that be such a mortal sin?

Senator Frith: It's another pedantic reading!

Senator David: Does it surprise you, dears colleagues, that we systematically vote against your amendments?

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Senator Castonguay did not do it!

Senator David: Your astonishment is fake. You knew full well that the Buckwold report, which recommended that the bill be rejected, would inevitably lead to this.

Why? Because, when you had the majority, you set all the rules of the game that were to lead to this endless standoff.

You even contest the nomination of the eight senators who rightfully sit with us so that the government can hopefully fulfill its tax reform program. That is indeed crystal clear, as our colleague, senator Beaudoin, said earlier.

You even take a malicious pleasure in mentioning after each vote that such and such amendment would have passed if it were not for their addition.

In fact, you are proving beyond any doubt that, without the eight new senators, Bill C-62 would have been rejected.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator David: And you are showing how right the Prime Minister was—this time you will not applaude!—to make use of the unmodified provision of the 1867 Constitution.

Senator Thériault: 123 years later.

Senator David: You did not modify that provision in 1982, when you could have done so to prevent a constitutional crisis.

Senator Thériault: That had been refused by the Queen in 1876.

Senator David: This constitutional crisis was skilfully devised, with a protracted filibuster around Bills C-21 and C-28 and the opposition to Bill C-62.

For seven weeks now, since September 25, you have been fighting, often with histrionic enthousiasm alternating with utter platitudes.

Senator Thériault: You too!

Senator David: You do not have to listen to me. You can leave. That is your privilege!

Senator Thériault: The same is true of your platitudes. They are the same.

Senator David: The principles of democracy, freedom of expression, liberty and representation of the people.

Your fight against the bill illustrates, in my view anyway, a type of strategy that discredits the goals.

Because of your relentlessness and of your choice of methods, it has become, in my mind at least, an example of undemocratic practices and of blatant abuse of democracy contrary to the fundamental goals or the Senate.

• (2100)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator David: In that case, things started on September 24 last when the chairman of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce presented his report. I received my copy at noon for a meeting to be held at one o'clock the same day, that is an hour and a half later.

Senator Thériault: That was more time that we had to get here for a vote.

Senator David: Less than half an hour into that only meeting, the members of the committee were notified they had to take a stand on the report by seven o'clock.

You on the other side of the Senate often made references to closure motions introduced in the House of Commons. Well, the same thing happened on that Monday, September 24, when the Senate was given no more than five or six hours to consider a voluminous report. You never say a word about that though!

Indeed, the draft report that was provided to us contained about 318 pages, that is 90 more pages than the official committee report, which in the end had only 228 pages.

Why does this difference exist? Because the draft report gave four options to the committee members: first, to approve the bill with recommendations, second, to refer it to the other House with amendments, third, to demand that it be delayed for another year or finally, to reject it.

At about 6 o'clock, the Liberal majority in the committee proposed, without having examined any of the others options, the outright rejection of Bill C-62.

So, with the elimination of the three others options, the document was reduced by 90 pages.

I forgot to point out that the committee had in fact been convened for Wednesday, September 19th. That meeting was cancelled the day before. The reason that was given to us was the absence of a French version of the document.

I believe that for the purpose of the preliminary study and given its usual kindness, the French minority on the committee would have agreed to examine this English text.

During that week of meeting that was cancelled, the committee would have had the opportunity to examine most of the amendments that you are now bringing forward little by little.

But the major point to remember is the clearly stated will of the Liberal majority to reject this bill since September 24th.

Today, this same majority contends that there was no urgency. That is what Senator MacEachen said in his opening remarks. So, there was no urgency to appoint the additional eight senators.

I believe that this overview that I gave tonight of the facts and the action taken on September 24th demonstrate exactly the opposite.

Is it not somewhat strange, illogical and perverse that you should now, having first rejected this bill outright, choose to introduce amendments one after the other and not alltogether, a manner which I would consider much more democratic since we could prepare for the discussion of these amendments of which we have no previous knowledge.

• (2110)

This right I was denied in committee, Senator Frith, you would like me to use it now in the Senate to support some amendments which I would feel legitimate. I have had enough lessons from you on partisan strategy not to fall into this trap. In the name of democracy which gives the elected representatives the power to govern, I do not feel the least bit of remorse in voting against each of your amendments.

For today, the 14th of November 1990, is much too late. The date of January 1, 1991, for the implementation of this legislation has been known for quite some time. The government, financial institutions and corporations have spent huge amounts of money to put together the structures and instruments necessary to collect the GST. Already the uncertainty resulting from the Liberal Party's filibuster is responsible for a slowing down in the registration of businesses and any amendment likely to be accepted might only delay the implementation of this legislation and perhaps even make it unenforceable. Well, I shall not be party to the killing of this tax.

May I remind you that the most expensive and significant of all the hidden taxes which individuals and corporations must pay is the cost of servicing the national debt. It has been estimated that out of every tax dollar the Federal government collects between 30 and 35 cents go toward servicing the debt, meaning the interests on the deficit and the national debt. Our government has embarked upon a tax program toward sounder accounting procedures which is becoming more and more urgent.

It costs Canadian taxpayers between $38 billion and $40 billion a year in interest payments, which is twice the amount of the current MST which the GST is meant to replace, improve and hopefully make more fruitful.

For the last forty years, as you know full well, studies, commissions and committees have pinpointed the weaknesses of the federal sales tax and recommended major changes. So far no government has had the courage to proceed.

On the contrary, Liberal asministrations have launched a multiplicity of programs without being overly concened about the ensuing deficits, hence the monstrous debt inherited by this government as well as present and future generations of Canadians.

Today still these supporters of the providence state would practically opt for doing away with all taxes. I believe Senator Olson has jusy given us an example of that. Lets us eliminate taxes and what all else, but then how do we go about solving the deficit problem?

Given the indebtedness nof the government, it seems to be it has become imperative to take concrete steps to face up to this acute problen in a lucid and enlightened manner. The trench and attrition war you are forcing us to endure since September 24 makes no sense, it is ilogical and, above all, it does not yield salutary benefits. I would suggest that the time we have been wasting could have been put to much better use had we serenely and realistically tackled the huge problems which cast a pall over federal-provincial relations, not to mention the no less serious issues facing humanity.

The first four amendments introduced would have steered us along the same course. Tonight's adds even more:

exempt from the GST the basic cultural necessities like books, magazines and reading materials;

the basic necessities of day-to-day life like heating oil and electricity;

the basic necessities of the community's economy, the participation in various co-operative movements;

the basic necessities of personal security, the indexation of benefits paid to poorer Canadians as well as the indexation of the threshold of their distribution, the necessities of services, this hodgepodge of amendments which Senator Olson has just been advocating.

All these amendments might have been worth considering if we had reserves or enough money to honour at least our past commitments and still others you would like us to make.

Why should the Welfare State continue pursuing ideological policies if they are going to expand the debt load of our country on a daily basis?

Some senators opposite said that this present government had doubled the national debt. That's what you said yesterday or the day before to senator Olson. In the speech I gave on October 24, I quoted the book of Jack Biddel and showed that the information contained in the table appearing on page 7 refutes that statement.

Indeed, on March 31, 1990, the national debt totalled 351.4 billion, whereas on March 31, 1985, it was 191.4 billion, which represents an increase of 83 per cent or an annual average of 17 per cent.

In comparison, under the Liberal government, the national debt, from March 31, 1979 to March 31, 1985, has gone up from 55.8 billion to 191.4 billion, an increase of 243 per cent or an annual average increase of 40 per cent.

In other words, the present government has reduced its annual average debt by more than 50 per cent.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Nobody believes you.

Senator David: I think it is important to underline that fact because in spite of the huge numbers, it shows the definitely positive results of the fiscal and tax policies of our government and its Minister of Finance.

That is precisely what we want to further with this bill.

Now, Senator Frith, let me take a few minutes to discuss some of the amendments moved by Senator Olson. First, you ask to exempt from the GST services provided by people like dietitians, massage therapists and social workers. Let's take these three examples. From what I know, 85 per cent of their services are currently provided in hospitals within a public framework and as such, are now exempt from all taxes.

So, these represent a large number of health workers whose services are exempted for the most part in any case because they work in public organizations.

You ask that we exempt services rendered by practitioners of Christian Science. First of all, these practitioners are not recognized by a corporation, at least in the province where I live. If we were to give official recognition to all the health practitioners of all the religions of the world, we will all declare ourselves healers and be exempted from the GST.

You would exempt the services rendered by naturopathic physicians. That's what the amendment says. So, if they are physicians, their services are exempted from the GST. Now, do you mean doctors in naturopathy? There is a distinction to be made here, and I don't find any in your amendment. In any case, this is certainly not a publicly recognized corporation and by this very fact is not included in the health care services.

As for children's psychotherapists, if you mean psychotherapists with a medical degree, then their services are exempted from the GST. Again, if they are analysts in psychotherapy and members of the psychologist's corporation, and have been certified as clinical psychologists, their services are exempted too.

As far as the second part is concerned: "300 members in Canada of which at least 2/3 are medical practitioners or less than 300 members in Canada", et cetera, personally, I would be less generous than the bill itself. I believe that a proper psychoanalysis can be performed in a scientific and professionnal manner only by a doctor trained in psychoanalysis or generally, by a psychiatrist or a psychologist who graduated in psychoanalysis. As a registered member of the corporation, his or her services would then be also tax exempt.

Since people must often consult a doctor before dying, I will speak briefly on funeral services. Is death an essential service? I would rather say that it is an essential pain because whether we want it or not, we will all die. Should funeral services be exempt for that reason? It is a philosophical question on which I could speak at length. I feel that in our modern society substantial efforts have been made to reduce funeral expenses.

In the old days, people went for magnificient graves, large plots in cemetery, monuments to eternally remind us of the dead. Today, people are cremated, reduced to ashes and put in small urns which are sealed or not. As a result, the cost is considerably lower than it was, and the 7 per cent today is far less than it used to be.

Another possibility, Senator Olson — I don't know whether you are thinking about it for a future amendment — would be to tax everybody who leaves some money behind at the time of death. It used to be called succession duties. I remember a time when succession duties were fairly high. I wonder what a family that just lost a very dear member would do, given the choice between succession duties — advocated by a good number of the witnesses we heard during our long trip which now culminates in this long discussion — of 10, 15, 20 or 33 per cent, as we used to have, and the 7 p. 100 GST. Since you asked us tonight to reflect upon our own death, I think you can ponder this thought during the rest of night; would your family prefer the 7 per cent tax of succession duties on the fortune you are going to leave them.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I follow the honourable Senator's impeccable logic and see how it leads him to his inexorable conclusion that there is no time to make any changes because all of this bill is in aid of reducing the deficit.

Senator Olson: No, no; revenue neutral.

Senator Grafstein: I am only following his logic. I do not want to challenge that, because after much careful thought he has come to his own conclusion.

[Senator David.]

However, I am interested in one question, which is that, laying aside the psychological approach of directing all errors to other parties, which I think is very good psychological philosophy in freeing oneself from all responsibility—

Senator Frith: Also therapeutic for the guilty.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that as well, but I am curious, because the senator is a skilled and respected medical practitioner, whether or not, in the time available to him to study this bill, he saw, based on his own analysis, any substantive or material flaws he believes should be corrected.

Senator David: That is a very interesting question, and I think I tried to answer it in my speech. If we had been allowed to have our meeting on September 19 instead of September 24, if we had one week to study it, maybe I would have been susceptible to understanding some of the amendments you are now putting in front of us. However, at the present time you are doing a job you should have done eight weeks ago. This is much too late.

Senator Grafstein: I do not quarrel with that analysis again because once you start down a particular path that you take, it leads you to your ineluctable conclusion. But that is not my question. My question concerns the time that was made available to you in your capacity as senator, and without being concerned about the criticism of the process, or delays, or whatever. Since September 24 we have all had an opportunity to examine the bill closely. We have perhaps spent more time on this bill than on any other bill, at least since I have been here. Canadians deserve answers to their questions. Obviously they are exercised by this bill.

• (2130)

Senator Simard: Is it a difficult question?

Senator Grafstein: It is a precise question. The question is: Does Senator David, in his role as senator, with his careful, meticulous, logical mind, see any substantive material flaws in the bill that should be corrected, whether it be today or next year? I think it is important for Canadians to know, since they seem to be exercised by the bill, whether or not senators opposite see anything in it that should be corrected. That is my question. I understand the steel jacket in which the honourable senator's logic puts him: it makes him unable to agree to any changes. I do not quarrel with that. I just want to know, for the purposes of the record, whether or not the honourable senator feels that there are any substantive flaws in the bill.

[Translation]

Senator David: Honourable senators, I believe that under the present federal sales tax 22,000 arrangements were struck with the manufacturing sector. I hope this tax will be passed before mid-December, and then, if proven defective somewhere, it could be amended, as were amended all tax legislations the world over.

Senator Thériault: Would the honorable senator accept a question? If I follow his logic correctly, he says that since we are all going to die, there is no reason to exempt the cost of funerals. Don't you think this also applies to food? We must all eat, so why exempt food? Why two different approaches for two problems that apply to all of us?

Senator David: Honourable senators on the other side would have exemptions on everything. We all need food, clothing, housing. We need to heat our houses. We all get sick once in a while. Sometimes, it is a matter of seconds. The situation is often more painful for families than it is for those who die, I think.

If you have exemptions on just about everything, where will our revenues come from? If you can find a way to bring down the deficit, which is the worst burden for Canadians—but I do not hear you talking about that too often—then I would agree that we ought to be more and more generous, provided we have a balanced budget.

Senator Thériault: Senator David, how come you suggest that the tax is needed in order to reduce the deficit? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance never talked in those terms. They say the GST is going to replace an existing tax and will not be used to bring the deficit down.

Why do you try to fool people? I asked a simple question and you did not answer. The answer you gave befits the politician you are becoming more and more. Because you did not answer my first question, I am going to ask another one.

I can understand that Senator David would prefer a tax on funeral services instead of an inheritance tax. It reflects what most senators think because a tax on funeral services is much cheaper than a tax on inheritances, but that is not the opinion of most Canadians.

[English]

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I thank honourable senators for the opportunity to intervene in this debate. I was particularly intrigued by the persuasive powers of Senator Olson and by the interjection of the much respected Senator David. Senator David made reference to a speech made in this chamber last week on November 7 by Senator John Stewart who, in turn, had referred earlier to an article by Senator Arthur Meighen. He quoted from Senator Meighen's paper which resulted in a speech in 1937. I shall not quote all of Senator Meighen's speech, but I would like to add, through Senator Meighen's speech, to what Senator David said with respect to the role of the Senate. He said:

> The Senate was constituted by the people through the Fathers of Confederation, and ratified by the vote of the country, because in the belief not just of a few but of this whole Dominion it was in their interests that there should be a review of Commons legislation, with special protection of minority, sectional, and territorial rights. Of all these delegated duties the Senate is the trustee; most of them it shares with the Commons and has responsibility just as direct as has that House, and it should make it a duty hour by hour to live up to the full standards which were doubtless in the minds of the Fathers of Confederation and which today are as vital to Canada as they were at that time.

So said Arthur Meighen in 1937. Senator David suggested in his remarks that we were wasting time. I resent that. I do not believe that listening to the people and speaking for the people is a waste of time.

Senator Olson: That's right!

Senator Graham: I would like to refer Senator David to the latest Gallup poll with respect to the GST. Seventy-six per cent of Canadians oppose this regressive tax. In Senator David's province 66 per cent of the people are opposed. In my part of Canada, 92 per cent of the people I was sent here to represent oppose this tax and only 3 per cent are in favour of it.

At the very beginning of this exercise we decided that we would listen to the people. That is why the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee went from one end of the country to the other. People told us in overwhelming terms that they wanted this particular piece of legislation rejected. I have no doubt in my mind—perhaps Senator David has in his—that we have the legal and constitutional authority to reject this legislation.

● (2140)

Senator Frith: And duty.

Senator Graham: I agree with Senator Frith that we have a duty. Certainly, the Canadian people have spoken and I am now speaking on behalf of the Canadian people, in particular on behalf of the people of my region, and according to my conscience. It is always dangerous to attempt new discoveries and, yet, it is always a pleasant and very profitable exercise to do so.

Honourable senators, our country was built on the efforts of Canadians who understood that the greatest joy in life is that of accomplishment. I believe it has never been within the power of the Canadian psyche to be satisfied. We have made the sacrifices and we have built a country. As Winston Churchill once said:

> Canadians have not journeyed all this way across the centuries, across the oceans, across the mountains, across the prairie because they are made of sugar candy . . . the Canadian spirit is no wandering phantom.

This is no sugar country and no sugar candy patriots are we. Indeed, Canadian achievement in every field rests largely on the quality of the Canadian mind and spirit but in no domain has that inquisitive national mind and restless national spirit been more dramatically successful than in the field of health care. There are those in this chamber, including Senator David, who will bear testimony to that fact. History attests to the singular capacity of the Canadian psyche to excel in this area and we have an international reputation for excellence, innovation and quality of the services disseminated throughout this country from coast to coast.

It is such a great pity, therefore, that our present government, with regard to the provisions of the GST affecting health care, presents us with such an evident lack of inspiration. Indeed, this government is reminiscent of an Egyptian mummy: inanimate, wrapped up in narrow hidebound prejudice. I suppose one could reach that conclusion logically, honourable senators, although probably most of us would recognize that even the death-absorbed Egyptian pharaohs were wise enough not to try to tax their citizens for dying.

Senator Frith: Well said, sir.

Senator Graham: There are so many of you who want to speak to this particular piece of legislation—and I am sure you support it—that I am reminded of the old maxim of the Egyptian mummy: I feel pressed for time.

Allow me also to draw the attention of honourable senators to the provisions of Schedule V of Bill C-62 which affects health care. As Senator Olson mentioned, we all know that institutional health care is tax exempt and that the services provided by a wide range of health care professionals are also tax exempt. Outside the institutional setting, however, many of these same services are subject to the 7 per cent tax. This an important point because the GST is biased towards institutional health care, and the Canadian people deserve better than this.

As the Registered Nurses Association of Nova Scotia pointed out to me in a letter of July 27, 1990, the GST discourages greater use of community-based health care facilities. Senator Buchanan probably received the same letter.

Canada's registered nurses recognize that it is always a pleasant and profitable exercise to attempt new discoveries, and they are presently attempting, along with so many others, to breathe life into the antique mummy which serves as our present government. They want to see less reliance on costly illness-based hospital care in this country. The Canadian Nursing Association believes that health care is potentially a field of rich innovation, and indeed is so now. The CNA believes it is legitimate and a matter of ultimate common sense to seek to deinstitutionalize much of the health care process and, in so doing, the nurses of this country have looked to the wide strictures of the June 1990 report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Accessibility to Hospital Services—Is there a Crisis?

The report supported the view that it is urgent for a major shift to occur in our health care system in the next decade. The report illustrated the distressing conditions of acute care hospitals and pointed out that it was necessary to take urgent action to prevent a health care crisis. The report made a number of recommendations among which are: That the federal government must make it a fundamental priority to provide funding for projects which incorporate alternative approaches to health care; and that the federal government finance innovative pilot projects in the area of health promotion.

The Canada Health Act states that the primary objective of our health care programs is to protect the physical and mental well-being of Canadians and to provide access to health services without financial values.

More recently, the 1986 Health and Welfare Canada document entitled "Achieving Health for All" presented new strategies for coping with emerging challenges and quality of life and health issues. In particular, it noted a need to reorient the present health care system in such a fashion as to give more responsibility to community-based services. But the proposed rebate structure in Bill C-62 encourages Canadians to look to institutionally based hospital care for as many health care services as possible. The imporant point is that more appropriate care is generally available through community-based modes of delivery.

The rebate figure of public hospitals is thought to be in the order of 80 per cent. This is intended to ensure that they do not have to bear a greater tax burden than before GST reforms. Other health care facilities such as community clinics and nursing homes will be eligible for a 50 per cent rebate on GST paid on their purchases. Such tax treatment will almost certainly put more pressure on overburdened hospitals. Such tax treatment does not facilitate nor does it encourage the development of new mechanisms of community-based service delivery.

The Canadian Nursing Association therefore recommends a zero rating for all non-profit health care facilities and agencies whereby they would not collect tax from their clients and would be able to claim the tax credits on their inputs. Health care services provided by these facilities should be generally treated in the same fashion as prescription drugs and basic groceries. If it is not possible to accomplish this, then at the very least it is a matter of some urgency to treat health care agencies in the same fashion as public hospitals.

The very function of deinstitutionalization is to broaden and invigorate health services. The duty of adventurers in health care is to serve as preceptors of their times. I believe this is a government afraid of the creative spirit of life. It is a government of antique prejudice. Witness the opposition by the government to our amendments which were designed to remove a tax on reading material, which were designed to preserve the uniqueness of our co-op inheritance, and which were designed to alleviate the singular threat this tax poses to our social fabric.

It is not so much the inconsistency by which the bill grants exempt status to some services and not others, it is the complete lack of national vision, the incapability of seeing that dietitians, social workers, naturopathic physicians, psychoanalytic psychotherapists for children and many other exploratory, innovative groups are, in fact, restless, worthwhile agents of change in this country. However, one suffers attacks on the creative spirit in the Canada of 1990, as the Consulting Dieticians of Canada, a national organization representing dieticians across the country, has discovered.

Private sector dieticians offer an eclectic range of services in many settings throughout the country. They are involved in individual nutrition counselling for people unwilling or unable to wait up to three months to visit a hospital. If they cannot find a hospital dietician, as provided by provincial medical insurance plans, there are further problems. Some of these individuals have medical conditions which could deteriorate quickly with delays in modification of personal diets.

Dieticians also do group nutrition counselling when appropriate diet therapy is suited to a group atmosphere; for example, grocery store tours on how to read packaging labels for cholesterol reduction. One of the more interesting pilot projects engaged in by Canadian dieticians relates to corporate nutrition education in the workplace for improving the health of employees, on the assumption that good health relates to increased productivity and reduced time away from work.

Private-practice dieticians have become an integral part of the health care field in this country, but they are concerned that the proposed GST will affect their services by, in the first instance, GST exemptions not being based on a service but rather on the venue of the service. Taxing dietician services will provide less incentive for the public to use the most cost-effective and qualified service. The GST, then, will encourage more extensive burdens on traditional institutional care systems and additional cost to governments.

It is obvious that the GST causes an uneven playing field in respect to dietician services. By omitting dietetic services from the list of health care practitioners exempt from the GST, the government suggests that dieticians are not recognized as health care professionals. Further, public sector health care facilities are entitled to a rebate credit equal to 50 per cent of tax-paid inputs. It is only fair that dieticians providing services in the private sector should be entitled to operate under the same conditions. It is ironic that the principle of "competitive equity", as written in the goods and services tax overview, supports this concept of equal conditions.

Honourable senators, allow me to turn to the case of the Canadian Association of Psychoanalytic Psychotherapists for Children. CAPPs, as it is known, was founded in 1981 by graduates of the Toronto Child Psychotherapy Program, which is an intensive, post-graduate education program whose average length runs to six years and which includes structured clinical work that is rigorously supervised, with the psychoanalytic study of psychosocial development. I am sure that Senator David is interested in that point. At present, this is the only training program of its kind in all of Canada.

The members of CAPPs are committed to very high standards of practice. Psychoanalytic psychotherapists treat troubled children but they do not do so by focusing on particular symptoms. Rather, the membership of CAPPs help children in a far more creative way by encouraging them to understand their own perceptions, their fears and their conflicts so that they can develop a more positive self image and find better ways of dealing with their environment.

Psychiatrists and psychologists refer children to CAPPs because of the unique orientation of its membership. In England, by the way, child psychotherapists are part of a recognized government funded service system, but in Canada, they are not yet government-funded. For that reason, the members of CAPPs provide services in the private sector. The members are requesting an exemption from the GST for their services and believe they should be granted this exemption for the simple reason that the cost of untreated problems in children is enormous. I need not outline to honourable senators all of these problems; I need only enumerate a few, such as delinquency, drug and alcohol abuse, repeated child abuse, suicide, adolescent pregnancy, and so on. They remain fundamental, troubling problems of our time, and it strikes me, honourable senators, that families who treat their children at their own personal expense contribute greatly to decreasing the financial burdens on all Canadians, not only in the present but also in the future.

The GST, as it presently stands, discriminates against families who choose private services from CAPPs. Therefore, the GST will almost surely result in more extensive demands on already overburdened children's mental health services. When a child is in emotional trouble and needs help, an already troubled family should not suffer further stress and should not be further penalized by having to pay tax on psychotherapy services. Psychotherapy is not a luxury, honourable senators; it is an investment in the social future of our country. However, innovative agents of social change are being casually attacked under the provisions of the GST. It is really a tax on the creative spirit, honourable senators.

Whole categories of professionals in this country will suffer the brunt of this demeaning assault on social justice. Take the case of the Canadian Association of Social Workers, for example. In a most humiliating affront, the government has failed to include them as health practitioners under Schedule V, Part II, Paragraph 1 of the legislation. Other professionals have been so included as practitioners. Physiotherapists, chiropractors, optometrists and so on, are so classified, and it is beyond me—I believe it is beyond reason—to understand how social workers could be left off this list. We believe they must be added to this category. We must take into consideration the dynamic role which is played by social workers with regard to, for example, an aging population. This is a field which is unique and to which social workers contribute a great deal of their skills.

The list of potential contributions of social workers in our community is so great and so obvious to all honourable senators that it is really not necessary to go into it in any great detail. However, to add to the affront, members of the Canadian Association of Social Workers believed that they would be added to the list of practitioners and that their services would therefore be treated in the same manner as, for example, psychologists; yet the social workers of this country now find that they have been ignored and that they have not been defined as practitioners under the bill.

Bill C-62 also exempts from the tax personal and home-care services to the aged, the infirm and the disadvantaged citizens of this country when public sector bodies provide the service. However, in many cases, private sector bodies can do the job more efficiently. This is particularly true—and, moreover it is particularly urgent—when no public sector agencies are available to do so. Our amendment calls for equal treatment, a level playing field for both private and public sector bodies, and hence it would erase the unfair bias inherent in the present legislation with regard to the dispensation of certain social services by the public sector. In other words, our amendment attempts to liberate the creative spirit of Canadian people from this government of antique prejudice.

● (2200)

Let me cite from the brief of the Canadian Long-term Care Association, a federation which has worked together to promote consistently high quality standards of long-term care across Canada. The CLS represents a united voice for long-term care in this country. Its objectives are to represent the best interests of those Canadians seeking long-term care in dealing with the government and the general public insofar as matters relating to the provision of long-term care are concerned. CLS attempts to establish and promote programs of research and education with respect to this vital problem.

The CLS is presently asking that the GST legislation be amended to make the long-term sector zero rated. At minimum the members want the GST rebate applicable to non-profit long-term care facilities and that it be reviewed to ensure that they will not pay more federal sales tax than at present. Ultimately, the goal should be to shield both hospitals and non-profit nursing homes from increased costs due to the GST.

Another major point raised by the CLS concerns private-sector nursing homes. Due to the fact that nursing homes are in the tax exempt category, they will not charge tax on the goods and services provided to the elderly, neither will they be effectively able to claim input tax credits. The results are obvious: an increase in tax liability and increased costs must be anticipated. These will have to be covered by the beneficiaries of the care, or by the provincial governments which fund the care. People who need nursing home care do not choose particular facilities on the basis of whether they are not non-profit or private, they go where there is an available bed. Therefore, a resident in long-term care, and beneficiaries of care in private-sector homes cannot often afford increased costs any more than persons in non-profit facilities can afford to pay more. Therefore, the CLS has requested, and justifiably so, that private nursing homes funded by provincial governments be eligible for the same GST rebate as non-profit facilities.

Honourable senators, our amendment intends to eliminate the objectionable bias evident in the present provisions of the GST, particularly the bias which accrues to public sector transfer of social services. I find it somewhat ironic that the present government takes some evident satisfaction in its role as a catalyst of privatization in this country. Private bodies are consistently discriminated against under Schedule V of Bill C-62.

We know that educational services are tax exempt. I might add as an aside that the Canadian Association of University Teachers has launched a most convincing campaign to provide that basic public services by public sector institutions such as universities or colleges be made tax free rather than tax exempt. All this is an attempt to maintain neutrality in the impact of taxation on the funding of public services. So the tax exempt status is by no means accepted by public colleges and universities.

However, to continue with my earlier point, the proposed legislation restricts even this very controversial exemption to public colleges. The amendment foresees extending the exempt status to private colleges. If Canada is to become a forerunner and global leader in the fields of technology and computer science, we must recognize the deleterious effect of discouraging our innovative private educational sector from disseminating important educational services.

Honourable senators, you do not tax education, because education is not a luxury. You do not tax domestic transportation, because it is not a luxury commodity either. Public transport should be treated equitably; it is not under the proposed legislation because, as mentioned by Senator Olson, Bill C-62 gives preferential treatment to municipal transit systems, unfairly tilting the balance against, for example, taxis.

Kenneth MacLaren, Vice-President of Government Relations for the Canadian Trucking Association stated:

> It is becoming too easy for Ottawa to treat transportation as a luxury good, a kind of sin tax. This is a complete reversal of a policy where transporation was viewed as an investment and not only as a source of government revenue.

Our intended amendment grants tax free status to all passenger transport outside of domestic air travel. It reflects a principle of equity because services provided by the public and private sector should be treated equally. We go further with this amendment. We recognize the essential worth of encouraging travel by buses and trains for sound environmental reasons. Most thinking Canadians understand that all encouragement to a reduction in the use of personal automobiles, particularly in large, congested cities, is a simple exercise in common sense.

Honourable senators, Canada has always been a pleasant and profitable place to attempt new discoveries. I fear this government tries to tax its citizens for the simple desire to take a course towards a degree or a diploma. Our present government then taxes our more audacious citizens for their efforts. The Canadian spirit is no wandering phantom; yet the ramshackle, awkward, misshapen application of the GST sets us adrift. We wander, we are unsure and apprehensive; there is no national vision here, there is no consistency here. Indeed, this government of antique prejudice has even succumbed to a tax on non-profit organizations which deliver sports and recreation programs to our teenagers. The Canadian people are not sugar candy patriots yet they are taxed for innovation, they are taxed for creativity of spirit.

Our proposed amendment seeks to restore equity to public and private institutions, to make the Canadian people believe again that the greatest joy in life is that of accomplishment. It seeks to rescue a society in which achievement in every field is again exalted and not humiliated. It seeks to exhilarate in the quality of the Canadian mind and spirit. I urge all honourable senators to support this very worthwhile amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am taking part in this debate at 10.09 p.m. this evening with neither pleasure nor regret, but with some reluctance because I feel that nothing I could say can make my honorable friends opposite change their minds. Their resolve to reject any amendment proposed by someone from this side of the House is stronger than ever.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Never give up hope!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Hope, you say, senator Molgat. That is precisely what is driving me to speak tonight: the hope that there are a few reasonable people across the floor. I know senator David does not like to hear this. It hits him in the heart and makes him shudder deep down in his soul, but I will say it anyway. There may still be hope. I looked up the definition of "essential" in a number of dictionaries. I suggest that in this case the word is improperly used. It would be better to refer to a necessary service. The Oxford English dictionary provides various meanings for "essential", but the most appropriate seems to be "absolutely necessary", "indispensable", "requisite". I suggest that in this debate, "essential" means absolutely necessary, indispensable, requisite.

Le Petit Robert refers to the current use of the word "essentiel". It means "qui est absolument nécessaire (opposé à inutile), indispensable, nécessaire, vital, même obligatoire". The most recent edition of the Grand Larousse, in five volumes, defined "essentiel" as "ce qui est de grande importance, principal, capital", and as a noun "ce qui est indispensable". The Canadian Houghton Dictionary of the English Language defines "essential" as "a fundamental necessary or indispensable, hard item or principle, basic or indispensable". The same applies to the other definitions found in other dictionaries. They refer to "essential services" when they really mean "necessary services", such as those provided by a mortician, because the legislation and regulations in various provinces require a whole process for the disposal of a dead body. There are health provisions and also legal considerations.

Senator Simard: Do not be too macabre!

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, I take this matter very seriously and I do not wish to be macabre. Before you interrupted me, I was saying that the bill is made in such a way that the services associated with the disposal of dead bodies, if you prefer, Senator Simard—

Senator Simard: It is gruesome!

Senator Corbin: What do you want me to say?

Senator Simard: Look it up in the dictionaries!

Senator Corbin: Let us call a spade a spade. Senator David might have other elegant expressions to suggest, but let me get back to this serious question.

There are legislative provisions which simply cannot be ignored, particularly those having to do with hygienic considerations. And there are cultural and religious considerations which vary from one ethnic group to another, from one religious practice to another. Such deeply-rooted practices and traditions with respect to the way things are done cannot be changed overnight.

Cremation of the remains, for example—perhaps Senator Simard prefers the expression mortal remains—is a relatively recent phenomenon in Canada and it is gaining ever wider acceptance. Even when religions considerations did not enter the picture, there were all kinds of reservations for all kinds of personal reasons not to use this method of turning one's remains into ashes, as it were. But habits do change, as do behavioural standards, but not easily. I think the traditional way of doing things will appeal to the public for generations to come until Canada's population increases to numbers such as they have in Japan or India where, for various reasons and in keeping with various traditions, they do things differently.

In any event, these are considerations we cannot ignore when debating an issue such as this one. If the amendment we are proposing this evening is rejected, as of January 1 next the Canadian taxpayer will have to add the 7 per cent tax on funeral services.

• (2210)

Why a tax on these services? It seems that some officials in the Department of Finance came to the conclusion that such services could not be considered as essential or necessary, if you want, as are health care services and food, for example. No, services related to a person's death are not essential, as they see it. This bureaucratic parody is one more evidence that the Tory government is insensitive and uncaring.

As for me, I find it impossible to view as unnecessary the direct and indirect services supplied by professionals.

It is not very difficult to prove that these services are necessary per se. But it becomes impossible to prove it to the Tory government.

Ms. Julie Tubman, First Vice-President of the Ontario Funeral Service Association Incorporated, expressed that notion very well last August 29 in her testimony before the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I will quote from Issue No. 70 at pages 99 and 100. She said, and I quote:

> One of the major reasons we object to the GST is because of the lasting impact and resentment it will create for bereaved families. We say that as trained professionals who understand the grieving process. We have taken the liberty of attaching my resumé and Mr. Carrothers' resumé to this presentation, which is typical of the majority of funeral directors throughout Canada—being active in the community, bereavement groups and other organizations. We speak with authority and experience. We believe that the Canadian government is not taking our concerns as seriously as it should, not only with respect to prepaid funerals, but also with respect to bereaved families and their pain and loss.
> We believe our message is important and to ignore our advice will have long-term consequences. Funeral directors in this province and across Canada know that this tax is wrong. Imposing this tax on death only proves that at a time of pain and loss the Government of Canada is uncaring and insensitive. Since the House of Commons has not listened to us, we hope you will—

She was talking to senators.

> First, as we all know, death comes to us all and we must care for our dead. As we have argued, funerals are a necessity and, like other necessities such as health care, should not be subject to this tax. I can guarantee you that we are all going out of this world the same way. That is why we feel it is a necessity. Governments have long recognized the necessity of caring for our dead. Even the former Prime Minister of England, Mr. Gladstone, said:
> > Show me the manner in which a nation cares for its dead, and I will measure with mathematical exactness the tender mercies of its people, their respect for the laws of the land and their loyalty to high ideals.
> Further, funeral rights in our society—and every other culture in the world—are designed to meet our needs as a result of thousands of years of people coping with death. Culture has designed funeral services; funeral services have not designed the culture.
> As we indicated to you in our written submission, over 90 per cent of Ontario families chose a traditional type of funeral service because that best met their own psychological and/or cultural needs. Based on our knowledge of bereavement in our society, I can say there is no room for government intrusion at the time when we bury our dead and care for our needs, specifically in the form of a tax.

I think the translator wanted to say:

> We are most sorry, specically if that intrusion comes in the form of a tax.

Mrs. Tubman goes on:

> We have called the GST a poorly planned, poorly implemented and ill-conceived tax.
> Mr. Chairman, the people of Ontario and Canada will not forgive or forget the government's intrusion in taxing this painful part of their lives, nor the Senate's disregard of these concerns if your committee does not accept our argument. I want to say to the members of the Senate, with all the strength I can command, there must be no tax on death.

Nobody can deny obviously that there is no tax currently on funeral service. For instance, funeral homes must pay the 13.5 per cent MST tax on the wholesale price of caskets, vehicles, equipment and so on. But there is a fundamental difference that no one brough up earlier tonight in the course of this debate. And that is that the casket is used only once whereas the rolling or fixed equipment last a long time.

However, this situation will change after January 1. Some people say that removing of the 13.5 per cent MST tax could lower the costs. According to an article published in the Whiq Standard of June 5 last, implementation of the GST will increase the costs, and I quote:

> A $4,000 funeral package with casket and funeral home services will increase about $150 . . .
> That estimate is based on the elimination of the 13.5 percent manufacturers tax applied to the wholesale cost of a casket and the seven percent tax applied to the total funeral bill. The seven percent tax applied to $4,000 is $280.
> There will also be an increase in administration costs at the funeral home that could push prices up . . .

[Translation]

This opinion seems to be shared by Mr. R. G. Schaffner, President of the Funeral Services Association of Canada.

Here is his answer to a question to that effect during the hearings of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, held in Halifax on July 12, which appears on page 34 of issue no. 53. Mr. Schaffner stated, in answer to a question asked by senator Robertson as follows:

> Senator Robertson: It seems to me that you would be in a better position when the 13.5 per cent rate disappears in that you will be paying only 7 per cent.
> Mr. Schaffner: No. We have had chartered accountancy firms calculating this. Using a $3,200 funeral as an example, we would add 7 per cent. The net increase, taking all of the tax credits and balancing things off, is $126. That would be the net increase of the funeral service to the public, and that is only if the suppliers of the caskets, and so forth, pass on that 13.5 per cent saving. If everything is done properly, then the net increase will be $126.00.

Some will say this is not an astronomical figure, so why such a fuss. Funeral Service Association of Canada Director Paul Carruthers also answered that question very well when he appeared before the committee on July 12 last, in Halifax. Again I refer you to issue No. 53 but to page 35 this time. And I quote:

> Mr. Carruthers: To a great extent, the people we deal with on a day-to-day basis are elderly and usually have lost a spouse. They are usually on marginal incomes. They usually have a fixed monthly pension income.
> For those of us who are better off, an extra $122 is not that much more money, but it could be an unduly heavy expense for the elderly.
> That is why municipalities are often obliged to assist the families of the deceased, an ultimate insult to their memory. More and more Canadians will be obliged to go on welfare to have a decent funeral, which smacks of social injustice.

The Funeral Services Association of Canada and the Ontario Funeral Services Association have legitimate concerns. We should seriously consider those concerns and vote in favour of this amendment. I think it is important that Canadians should regain confidence in the democratic process. The spokespersons for the Funeral Services Association believe that their democratic rights were denied, when they appeared before the Commons Standing Committees on Finance and Economic Affairs, and on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations. I will quote what was said by Mr. R. J. Schaffner, President of the Funeral Services Association of Canada, issue 53, page 28:

> We appeared—

He was referring to himself and Mr. Carruthers:

> We appeared in Ottawa both before the Standing Committee on Finance and Economic Affairs and the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations regarding the goods and services tax.

● (2230)

> The members of these committees simply defended this tax proposal, and did not seem aware of the concerns we mentioned about funeral services. We therefore want to explain our situation to the Senate, in the hope that it will be able to convince the government of the need to modify Bill C-62 before it is definitely approved.

Which proves us, honourable senators, that Canadians believe in the Senate. They believe in the need for a second house of Parliament in this country.

Not only did they appear three times before committees of the House of Commons, they insisted in addressing themselves to us. They appeared twice before committees of the Senate. They sent us letters. They sent us economic analyses of the problem they exposed to us. They really believe that the Senate is capable of convincing the government of the need to change its course of action.

We have a certain credibility in this country, no matter what some people may think.

Honourable senators, need we say more? Probably not. I would simply add that the Funeral Service Association of Canada did not obtain satisfaction from the House of Commons nor from the government. As in the case of co-operatives in the Atlantic provinces, they were forced through an endless thread of red tape without obtaining any satisfactory answer.

Is it surprising then that, on November 8 1990, the Canadian Federation of Independant Business told us that its members believe that the government did not give them accurate and useful information as to how the GST will affect their entreprises?

Of the 10,539 members interviewed in person, only 16.3 per cent were satisfied with the way the government was answering their information requests. Some 74.4 per cent said that they were entirely unsatisfied; 7.4 per cent were undecided. That is to say that they are partially satisfied and partially unsatisfied. A little less than 2 per cent had no comment.

The memorandum contains the following comment which, I believe, is worth quoting:

> These findings show without any doubt that the federal government did not give appropriate information on the impact of the GST to the small business owners. Moreover, the government has yet to make available detailed information on the complexities associated with the combined application of the GST and the provincial sales taxes. Technical documents on the problems associated with cash registers, dual taxation, cash rebates, discount coupons, audit requirements, penalties as well as dates of filing and statement are still sadly lacking.

These are not old news that I give to you, honourable senators. This press release is dated November 8th, 1990. It goes on:

> Instead of effectively informing consumers and businesses, the GST Information Office did some publicity that hurt small and medium businesses, because it encouraged Canadians to stop buying shoes and going to restaurants to avoid paying the GST. That is a senseless waste of our government's meager resources. The Federation tries to make up for the shortage of information by providing two information bulletins, the first one being attached. The second one will be sent to you shortly, as soon as it is available.
> Clearly, the scheduled implementation date of the GST, January 1st 1991, raises enormous problems, especially since Revenue Canada already know that registrations would not be completed by that time. The government's inability to provide the necessary technical documents to small and medium businesses only worsened this situation.

Honourable senators, there are still two other similar paragraphs. What else can we say? If the government will not agree to our amendments, if it feels strongly about its bill, the least that it can do, given the difficulty in which businesses and merchants find themselves in this country, is to delay its implementation.

If the government really wants to win, to ram its bill through with its increased majority in this House, the least that it could do and the best evidence of common sense that it could demonstrate is to delay its implementation, because our country is not ready for this tax.

Thank you, honourable senators.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Olson, for Senator Frith, seconded by Senator Molgat that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended to include within Exempt Supplies certain medical, educational and governmental services, and to include, within Zero-rated Supplies, passenger transportation services and funeral services

(a) in respect of Exempt Supplies in Schedule V—

Senator Olson: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "Yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion say please say "Nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, pursuant to provision Rule P-3.(a), I request that the division be deferred to 5:45 o'clock p.m. on the next sitting day.

• (2240)

I should like to explain my authority for so doing. It is in the form of a letter dated November 14, 1990 from the Opposition Whip, Senator Petten, to the Government Whip, Senator Phillips. The letter reads as follows:

Dear Senator Phillips:

Further to our conversation of Tuesday, November 13th, 1990, re Provisional Rule No. P3(a) which says, in part— "the taking of the division may, at the request of either party whip be deferred until 5:45 P.M. on the next sitting day."

I understand and agree the request referred to in the Rule may be made by a senator designated by either whip.

Then, in handwriting there is endorsed thereon the words, "I agree, O.H. Phillips, Gov't. Whip".

Honourable senators, I would ask that this letter be tabled, because we still have a couple of amendments to deal with and Senator Phillips or Senator Petten may want to designate someone.

As the designated requester for this evening, I so request, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is so ordered.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that all remaining orders stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 15, 1990

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as a change of pace, Senator Doody and I, along with Senator Murray and others, suggest that we might begin today with Question Period and, when time runs out on that, revert to petitions. I know that this will be disappointing to many senators who have come here to be on time for petitions, but at least it will be a change.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: But you do promise that we will come to presentation of petitions.

Senator Frith: Senator Phillips insists upon a promise to present petitions, and I will accommodate him.

With the agreement of honourable senators, then, perhaps we could now move to Question Period. I suggest that His Honour read through the Order of Business—that is, Reading of Petitions, Reports of Committees, Notices of Inquiries and Notices of Motions—so as to get to Question Period on the understanding that, if we run out of questions by six o'clock, we will revert to Presentation of Petitions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

MAJOR SALE BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have been wanting to ask the Leader of the Government for several days another question about the rumour that there has been a significant sale of grain—probably wheat, but at least of grain—by the Canadian Wheat Board. Several days ago I asked this question of the Leader of the Government, who undertook to provide an answer; but my problem is this: I am not sure that his colleagues are ready to give him the information he needs in order to answer the question.

The latest issue of the Western Producer states:

> After weeks of rumors and speculation, there was good news for prairie farmers last week.

But we never got that news; so this is still rumour. The article goes on to state:

> There was no specific confirmation of a sale from the Canadian Wheat Board, the federal government or the Soviets.

The suspicion or the rumour is that this sale has been made to the Soviet Union.

I hope that Senator Kelly will agree that I have to have some preamble to my question. I have to lay the background as to why it is important that this question be answered. The article goes on to state that the Wheat Board booked an additional 1.5 million tonnes of lake freight beyond the 250,000 tonnes already reserved.

Honourable senators, there must be some reason for that. The article states that the speculation about volumes ranges from 1.5 million to 4 million tonnes.

The reason why I have to try to ask this question again, and insist as much as I can on an answer, is that there are producers out there who have not had a reasonable opportunity to deliver any kind of grain. A few of them might have delivered a few bushels, but there has been no announcement of any significant sale on the part of the Canadian Wheat Board to anyone. There are only these rumours going around. The problem is that they do not know what has been sold. Is it number one bread wheat? Is it feed wheat? Is the grain of a certain class or quality? One of the rumours is that it is livestock feed that has been purchased by the Soviet Union. Those farmers who have that sort of grain for sale will know that they will have an opportunity to sell it reasonably soon. Those who have other grains, such as high-class bread milling wheat, will also know.

I believe it is only fair that the government should loosen up a bit. It now uses the argument that the Wheat Board does not release this information because it has some effect on world prices, or that it gives some information to our competitors. There may be some validity to that. I have heard that on and off for the last 20 years. I believe that even when we were in office we may have held back information for a short while. However, as soon as we possibly could, we let the producers know what was sold, the volume that was sold and the classes of grain that were sold, so that they had some idea of what it was that they might have a chance to sell.

I hope the Leader of the Government can give us a full and complete answer today, because I raised this matter approximately a week ago.

ago on this matter. I am sorry that I cannot help the honourable senator today. However, I shall endeavour to obtain some reply and bring it here first thing next week. In the meantime, if I get any information that will be of interest to the honourable senator, I shall convey such information to him personally.

Senator Olson: I wonder if the Honourable Minister would undertake to use all of his powers of persuasion and make some intense representation on behalf of these farmers to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, the Hon. Mr. Charles Mayer. There are a great many farmers who are asking me, "Can you not get this information so that at least we know when we will get some relief from the cash shortage that we have suffered all these months?" I do not want to repeat myself, but I would appreciate the Leader of the Government indicating that he will enthusiastically undertake to make such representation so that we might get an answer; otherwise, he will just be stonewalled.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall enthusiastically convey the remark of Senator Olson to my colleague.

DELIVERY OF INITIAL QUOTAS

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Perhaps while the honourable senator is finding out that information, he could also find out what percentage of farmers in western Canada were able to deliver their initial quota. As the minister knows, the initial quota is usually a few bushels per seeded acre. This year, with the low initial price, it would probably only mean an average of anywhere from $2,500 to $3,500.

My understanding is that not too many farmers have been able to deliver that quota, which means they have not received any income at all since the beginning of this crop year. Perhaps the Leader of the Government could also pursue that matter.

ADVANCED GRAIN PAYMENTS—NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS

Hon. E. W. Barootes: In respect of the shortage of cash flow for farmers who have been able to deliver only small quantities under their quota, how many of these farmers have applied for the Advanced Grain Payment, interest free, which is available to them for almost the totality of their stored grain?

Senator Olson: That is a reinstatement of a Liberal policy.

● (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, again I shall have to make enquiries of my colleague, the Hon. Mr. Mayer, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

On the subject of grain, honourable senators, I may say that I have just received answers that we had intended to table as delayed answers today to questions raised by Senator Olson on November 6 and 8 on these general matters. Perusal of these answers from the government would indicate that they are pretty much what the honourable senator expected he might receive. In any case, I shall read them.

Honourable senators, the first answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990, by the Honourable H. A. Olson, regarding Agriculture—Major Sale by Canadian Wheat Board—Government Position. It reads as follows:

> The Canadian Wheat Board regularly sells to over sixty countries around the world. As a result of the Canadian Wheat Board's ongoing sales efforts, there will be very good grain movement from now through to late winter.
> The Canadian Wheat Board has taken up all of its options, as far as shipping capacity on the Great Lakes, to the end of the shipping season. The Canadian Wheat Board has asked the railways to make all of their cars available over the next few months.
> Therefore, there is going to be very good movement of Western Canadian grain well into 1991 which should put the Canadian grain industry in a good position this crop year, to exceed exports that were achieved in the last crop year.

Honourable senators, a question on the same subject was asked by Senator Olson on November 8 and was alluded to by him again today in his request to identify the customer price, amount and kind of grain covered by recent Canadian Wheat Board sales. As I say, a quick perusal by me of the reply indicates that it is the reply that Honourable Senator Olson expected, but I shall read it anyway:

> As indicated in the response to the honourable senator's question of November 6, 1990 on this issue, the Canadian Wheat Board regularly sells to numerous countries. As a result of the Canadian Wheat Board's ongoing sales efforts, there will be a very good grain movement in the coming months.
> As the honourable senator indicates in his question, details of sales are not released by the Canadian Wheat Board nor indeed by the government. Such information is not released because to do so could compromise the competitive position of the Canadian Wheat Board relative to exporters attempting to sell grain from other countries to the same markets. The international grain market is extremely difficult at the present time and I am sure that the honourable senator would not want the government to reveal any information which could undermine the marketing efforts of the Canadian Wheat Board.
> As indicated in the response to an earlier question on this matter, the movement of western Canadian grain which is now expected, will put the Canadian grain industry in a good position this crop year to exceed the level of exports achieved in the last crop year.

And finally, there is an answer to the question raised by Senator Olson concerning whether the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds has authorized the cash advances. The reply is as follows:

> Cash advances are available under both the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act (PGAPA) and the Advance Payments for Crops Act (APCA). Under these programs producers can receive advances against stored grain up to a maximum of $250,000. In addition, on October 13, 1990, the Minister of Agriculture announced the Cash Flow Enhancement Program. Under this program the federal government will pay the interest on the first $50,000 advanced under PGAPA and APCA.

Senator Olson: I want to thank the minister for those replies, particularly the one that had the positive content, that being the one respecting reinstatement of a cash advance program. It only goes to show that if the minister tries, he can receive good answers to our questions.

As to the other reply, where he said that he expected that kind of answer from the Wheat Board, I want to plead with him to look for a different answer. He is only partly right. I did not expect to be stonewalled by the Wheat Board quite that badly. They did not even tell us whether it was wheat or barley that they sold, or what grade it was. That is not information that they have withheld for very long. They did not do it years ago. They used to tell us whether they sold 1.5 million or 2 million tonnes and whether it was wheat, barley, oats, or whatever. So that is a new spin on the story.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: What is the question?

Senator Olson: The question is very simple.

Senator Simard: What is it?

Senator Olson: Can the minister try to find out whether it is wheat or barley? If it is wheat, can he find out whether it is animal feed grades or human grades that are being sold so that the producers can have some idea as to whether they will have a chance to sell what they have on hand between now—

Senator Simard: Where is the question mark in that?

Senator Olson: —and some reasonable time later?

I am not putting questions to Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: That was not a question.

Senator Olson: I am asking the minister—after he has given this reply—not to just leave it at that. Please try to find out so that the farmers can have some idea—

Senator Frith: Exercise your world-famous patience!

Senator Olson: —of when their cash flow from the sale of the 1990 crop will begin.

[Senator Murray.]

PERSIAN GULF

DEFENCE EXPENDITURES—PROPOSED SPENDING CUTS IN SOCIAL PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I noticed that this week in Alberta the Prime Minister said that he will cut many of our present programs to pay for Canadian troops in Saudi Arabia. I also noted in the Gazette that the Gulf war is estimated to cost Canada $50 million a month.

If we will have to cut programs to the amount of $50 million a month, will it be the programs for the poor, the unemployed, those on welfare, the aged, or the crippled that will be affected so that we can have our troops sitting in the Gulf waiting for someone to start a war? I should like to know what programs the Prime Minister plans to cut.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sorry to disappoint my honourable friend, but I think we can be fairly certain that the economies that will have to be affected in various programs will not be such as he has indicated, bearing upon those who are suffering hardship and who depend upon the government for assistance.

As to the planned expenditures of the government both in terms of added expenditures on defence and economies that are to be affected in various places in the administration, my friend will have to exercise some patience for a few days yet until the Supplementary Estimates are tabled by the President of the Treasury Board in the other place. That should happen before the end of this month.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, may I ask a supplementary question? Would the Leader of the Government tell us what he thinks the fate of the proposed child care initiative will be? After all, that is an expenditure that has not as yet occurred. If one reads the press this morning, it looks like it might be a sacrifice to the potential war in the Gulf.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator takes these press reports a good deal more seriously than I do.

● (1420)

I can only tell her that there has been no change in the government's position with regard to a national child care program. Our position is that that program will be up and running during the present mandate of the government.

COST OF CANADIAN TROOP DEPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, in the past, personal income taxes were raised more than corporate taxes. Every time the federal government needs more money, it introduces a GST, which will make the poor poorer and the rich richer, claws back the senior citizens' pension or family allowance, or cuts regional payments to the provinces, which are used for such things as education and health care. Where is the government going to get the $50 million a month to keep the troops in the Gulf? Can the government leader give us any idea what the government plans to cut next? Will the same groups continue to suffer—the poor, the unemployed, the crippled and single-parent families?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would like to make a personal comment as one who is affected by the so-called clawback provisions. I am not offended by the idea that my family allowance benefits will be cut back, especially when targeted assistance in the form of improved child tax credits, and so forth, for lower-income families have been considerably improved during the mandate of the present government. Again, the honourable senator will have to wait a few days until the Supplementary Estimates are tabled in the other place by the Honourable Mr. Loiselle. The honourable senator must realize how absurd it is for him to mount his charger and accuse the government of making cutbacks in this or that sensitive area until he has seen the Supplementary Estimates.

Hon. Leo E. Kolber: I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a supplementary question. I am not as concerned as my colleague about where the cuts come from, but the Prime Minister has said that the government is going to take the money out of existing expenditures. Would it be reasonable to conclude that it takes the impetus of a war in the Middle East to get the government to do the right thing—that is, to attack the deficit? I had assumed that the government was going to take as much as it could out of existing expenditures to alleviate the deficit. Why does it take this kind of drastic global happening to get the government to do what is apparently the right thing?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the budgetary pressures we are facing arise not only from the increased demands on the Department of National Defence by reason of both the Gulf crisis and the dispatch of the army to Oka during the summer, but also, as the honourable senator will appreciate, because of the higher than forecast interest rates and the effects—

Senator Olson: Who caused that?

Senator Murray: —they are having on the cost of servicing the debt.

As far as attacking expenditures is concerned, I should have thought the honourable senator would give credit where credit is due. As I pointed out the other day, in recent years we have kept the increase in the operating expenses of this government at an average annual rate of 3.6 per cent, which is well below the rate of inflation. Further, we have taken what was a substantial deficit on the operating account and turned it into a $13 billion or $14 billion surplus in the past few years.

Senator Olson: That is cooking the books!

Senator Murray: The bottom line is that the management of national finances has been truly impressive. However, we are still suffering because of the large interest payments on the national debt. But for those payments, we would be showing a surplus.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to give some suggestions to the Leader of the Government to take back to the Minister of Finance. Perhaps the $74 million that is going to be paid to the patent office in Hull to install computers could be cut out until the Gulf situation is over. I do not think that computers are so important that $74 million of taxpayers' money at this time of restraint needs to be spent.

Honourable senators, an article in the Globe and Mail of November 9, 1990, states that corporate income tax payments show a small increase, but personal income tax hauls are up 24 per cent. The article states further:

> Federal government revenue is growing at a rate far faster than inflation because of a large increase in personal income tax payments.
> Finance Department figures released yesterday show that individual taxpayers paid 24.1 per cent more during the six months from April to September than for the corresponding period in 1989.

As I said earlier, it seems that the working poor are being taxed 24 per cent more and corporate taxes have gone up only 3.6 per cent.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with great respect, the explanation for the increase in personal income tax collections is that more Canadians are working and are earning more.

Senator Bonnell: I understand, honourable senators, that the unemployment rate is higher now than it has been for six years. Perhaps the government leader could tell the minister that millions of dollars could be saved if the phoney advertising on the GST was stopped. If that advertising were stopped, more millions could be saved to help pay for the Gulf war. Also, part of the $22 million that the Canadian army spent in Oka could have been saved. Perhaps some of that amount should be charged back to the province of Quebec.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am glad to have these suggestions from the honourable senator. He suggests that we eliminate what he calls the proposed $74 million expenditure on a patent office in Hull.

Senator Bonnell: For now, not forever.

Senator Murray: No, he wants it cut out.

Senator Bonnell: I said we should hold it back until the Gulf situation is over. We could save that money and use it in the Gulf rather than build new things now at a time of restraint.

Senator Murray: I am not familiar with the detail of the project that the honourable senator mentions, but I have to remind him that frequently it is quite a false economy to postpone a capital project of this kind. You end up spending much more later than you would have spent had you carried through with your original schedule.

I am always interested to have these suggestions. I am sure Senator Lefebvre, who is looking distinctly uncomfortable at the moment with my honourable friend's suggestion, might have some idea as to where we might cut costs in Prince Edward Island.

In any case, I note also the honourable senator's suggestion that we should cut out advertising on the GST. I was able to persuade Senator Denis not too long ago of the necessity for this advertising. The fact of the matter is that all the polls—and my friends opposite are very interested in polling—indicate that the overwhelming majority of Canadians want more information on the GST.

Senator Bonnell: True information, not false information.

Senator Murray: This is the purpose of our advertising and public communications program.

So far as Oka is concerned, quite frankly, it would have been irresponsible and, I think, an infringement of the law for us not to have responded to the request made by the Government of Quebec last summer with regard to Oka.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

COST OF ADVERTISING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Azellus Denis: Having heard my name mentioned by the minister, I wish to tell him that the cost of the publicity for the GST is up to $34.3 million. The bill is so complicated that no one understands it. I have been told that 75 per cent of the population of the country does not understand how the GST will work.

Seeing that millions of dollars has been spent on advertising, does the government leader not think that spending all that money has only resulted in people being more mixed up? Does he not think it would be a better thing to try to stop the advertising so that people might understand the bill better?

Senator Olson: That is the point!

Senator Murray: I take the point raised by the honourable senator and I will look into it.

PERSIAN GULF

COST OF CANADIAN TROOP DEPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, returning to the question originally put by Senator Bonnell, as one of the leading "Peaceniks" here—and I say that with pride—I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate might convey to the Prime Minister this message: Some honourable senators in this chamber, and a great many people in the country, believe that, regardless of who is the best deficit cutter, or who is the best services cutter, if our young people are to be sent to the Gulf area—an area of great peril—they deserve the best facilities and the best of equipment. I am sure that many in the Senate agree with that attitude, as do the majority of the Canadian people.

[Senator Murray.]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

AGRICULTURE SUPPORT PROGRAMS—POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF CROW RATE—ALTERNATIVES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate a number of questions arising out of the tabling last month at the GATT negotiations of an estimate of agricultural support program values amounting to a total of $8.8 billion. That total was arrived at by using the aggregate measure of support model.

One of the items identified as a support program in the grain sector—which, interestingly enough, is the agricultural sector that this document shows as receiving the most in support—is identified as the Western Grain Transportation Act, or the Crow rate.

This becomes relevant in that, in the most recent submission at the GATT, having identified the Crow rate as a support to agriculture, the Government of Canada's offer is to reduce this support by 50 per cent over ten years. This has prompted the Alberta government, in a document I received earlier this month, although it is dated last month, to raise a concern. I quote from that news release, which is dated October 25:

> As it is currently paid, however, the status of the Crow Benefit as an internal support could be challenged within the GATT, and the Benefit defined instead as a trade distorting export subsidy. In that case, Western Canadian farmers could face 100 per cent elimination of the Crow.

The other way the Crow benefit could be diminished is pursuant to the Canadian offer on the table, which, as I have said, is to reduce all support programs by 50 per cent over ten years.

My question is: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us on the government's position with respect to the Crow and with respect to alternatives that would eliminate the potential problem identified by the Government of Alberta? That problem is that Canada may lose the entire benefit of the Crow, having identified it as a support measure which may now be attacked as a trade distorting export subsidy. Are there any forthcoming announcements in this regard? Is there anything under consideration that would avoid this problem? Specifically, what I have in mind is one of the proposals put forward by the Government of Alberta, which is that there be a Crow benefit buyout, which involves a capital payment based on land ownership. That would mean the end of the Crow benefit, but it would also eliminate its potential attack as a trade distorting export subsidy. This would also take it out of the realm of supports, which would lessen the problem for the Alberta government, for instance, and those of other prairie provinces because of the diminution of money paid in aid of grain transportation.

senators, I have a brief note from the Minister of International Trade on this matter. I must say, however, that it does not cover the specific questions raised by my honourable friend. I shall have to make inquiries and see what information I can bring forward early next week.

AGGREGATE FIGURE—RELEVANCE OT AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES IN CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dan Hays: I would appreciate that. This is a very controversial matter and will not be an easy issue with which to deal, due to the strong feelings associated with it. I do not envy any government having to make a decision in this regard. But, because of the current GATT negotiations and potential risks that they present, it seems to be a more urgent matter now than it ever has been.

I should also like to raise a question on the figure of $8.8 billion. In a general way, this has prompted an interesting exchange between the Minister of International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture as to the quantum, the $8.8 billion. I point out that, to its credit, the government, when it tabled this information, denounced the system by which the totals were arrived at. As someone who is interested in agricultural issues, I take heart in that.

The aggregate measure of support model uses what some might call "mythical" figures or, at any rate, assumed figures to represent what the price of a commodity would be in world markets. I think it is fair to make the point that this $8.8 billion is not a real number in the sense of relating to any actual cost. Rather, it is at best a measurement that might give us some idea of how much, proportionally, Canada, compared to other countries, supports its agricultural sector.

The point I wanted to raise is this: The $8.8 billion is not an actual number, being based only on assumptions, many of which people are not generally familiar with. But that figure attracts a lot of adverse attention from the public towards the agricultural sector. My question is: Is the government doing anything, or is it prepared to do anything, to try to come up with additional information that would put that $8.8 billion figure in perspective? In that way, people will realize that it is not a payment out of general revenues but, rather, an aggregate number which includes consumer support and many other things. It also relates to arbitrary international numbers, which have nothing to do with the actual price of agricultural commodities in Canada.

If we were to look at the budget, I think we would see that we pay out something between $2 billion and $3 billion. How does that relate to the $8.8 billion?

Honourable senators, this is a piece of disinformation, if you will, although it has been put forward for the good reason that we are involved in the GATT negotiations. It seems to me that it would be helpful if more information were obtained in order to put the number in perspective. Editorial writers and people in general would then have some idea of the real amount of support going to the agricultural sector. I suggest that the government should be making efforts to put this number in perspective so that we do not leave the wrong impression with Canadian taxpayers.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I appreciate the valid points raised by Senator Hays. However, I do not think it is fair to say that this is disinformation in the context of the GATT negotiations. On the contrary, in the context of those negotiations, the calculations we have done and tabled in Geneva can be quite helpful.

• (1440)

For example, participants in the negotiations will get credit for reductions made since the GATT negotiations began. Therefore, we have included in the figure programs that have already been eliminated since the negotiations began. I believe the best course for me to follow, however, would be to read a brief note that reinforces the point which the honourable senator has made, that in using this $8.8 billion figure they are certainly not speaking of subsidies from the federal government treasury.

> In the base line data tabled by Canada in Geneva, total support to Canadian agriculture was estimated to be $8.8 billion. This figure was calculated following the guidelines in the chairman's report. It includes not only expenditures by government, both federal and provincial, but also the estimated effect of support provided by other measures, including internal support, border protection, and export competition measures. Canada submitted this data in accordance with the chairman's report and without prejudice to our negotiating position.

The statement from the Minister of International Trade then goes on to make the point that I referred to earlier, that the chairman's report called for measures to be included from the start of the negotiations.

> Participants will receive credit in the negotiations for programs eliminated or changed since the start of negotiations.

This is why Canada's base line data includes programs no longer in use.

COMPARATIVE AGGREGATE MEASURES OF SUPPORT

Hon. Dan Hays: That is an answer which gives rise to another question I wanted to raise. I accept the comment, and understand the Special Canadian Grains Program is included in the period from which that number was derived, which was a billion-dollar-plus payment in each of two years. The payment has not been paid for at least two years.

The thrust of my question, however, is that the people do not understand that. It would be helpful for people in the agricultural sector to see that the government is making sure that people are well-informed. We, in agriculture, represent less than 3 per cent of the population, and increasingly we are aware of the fact that we are in the hands of the other 97 per cent. To the extent that people do not have good information about the support we are receiving, we are at risk and are put in a disadvantageous position in which we feel very uncomfortable.

The question I would like to raise now concerns the aggregate measure of the support figure and the obligation of other GATT participants to generate a similar figure.

Canada was first to table the figure. The United States was late, however. It tabled the figure between $60 and $70 billion U.S. as its aggregate measure of support. The Europeans did the same, even later still. The problem was that Canada, the United States, and Europe, used slightly different means of calculating this figure. In other words, they did not use a common standard in each of the three cases. If we convert $65 billion U.S. into Canadian dollars, it starts to approach, per capita, what was the Canadian aggregate measure of support.

My understanding is that the methods of calculation were different in each of the three cases. It seems to me that it would be useful if Canada could draw attention to that fact and try to produce, if possible, a figure that gave a true comparison between those three regions. It is absolutely essential that behind our GATT position is a well-informed public. To the extent that we are (a) not aware of the exact amount of our own aggregate measure of support, and (b) do not have a valid comparison with other regions, such as Europe or the United States, we are at a disadvantage.

My question is: Is the government prepared to attempt to do anything to produce a comparable figure among these three tablers of reports to the GATT so that we may have better information than we now receive on the extent to which agriculture is supported?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I trust we are, and I will attempt to confirm that in consultation with the appropriate departments in the next little while. We always run into this problem in regard to international comparisons, whether it is the proportion of gross domestic product that is devoted to official development assistance, or national defence, or research and development, or whatever. Senator Olson and I had an exchange on this a few days ago.

I would hope that the secretariat of the GATT would have some way of ensuring that the statistics provided by the various countries are indeed comparable. Whether they do or not, I agree with the honourable senator that we should ensure that they are.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Murray could be more specific and ascertain from the Minister of International Trade, when he was bandying about this $8.8 billion figure, if he found out, after he put the cost of the so called Crow benefit on the table, whether or not that is a direct subsidy to agriculture. Ask him whether the United States Army engineers' cost of maintaining the Missouri and Mississippi river system also went into the United States' figure, because a very high percentage of their grain goes down that river. The Department of National Defence pays for all the maintenance of that transportation system, whereas it seems to us that the Minister of International Trade has put in $720 million as an agriculture subsidy with respect to making payments to the railways in Canada.

In other words, what is fair is fair. The other countries, even though it is paid through the Department of National Defence, do put their subsidies on the table.

Senator Murray: Senator Olson raised that very question in the course of our exchange a week or so ago. I will endeavour to obtain the information he is seeking.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

PROPOSED EXTENSION OF AGREEMENT TO INCLUDE MEXICO—RELOCATION OF CANADIAN BUSINESSES—EXPLOITATION OF LABOUR—LOSS OF CANADIAN JOBS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question about our Free Trade Agreement with the United States. There have been a number of reports that we intend to table when the Americans sit down with the Mexicans and talk about an extension of the Free Trade Agreement. Yet I have in mind the statistics that ARE available to us, which indicate that since the inception of this trade deal, 160,000—they are not Liberal figures, but are figures of Statistics Canada—industrial jobs have been lost since the inception of the deal, many of them attributable to the trade deal. I recall one company, for example, that decided it would manufacture its automotive parts in Mexico to avail itself of the low-cost Mexican labour.

I have before me photostatic evidence of what is happening, which I wish to place on the record of the Senate. I have before me a letter sent by a company in Toronto, Ontario, called "Bottom Line Technologies Incorporated." It says:

> Dear Mr.
> We are introducing a service on behalf of a U.S. Corporation, PINSA Group, who co-ordinates, develops and sets up manufacturing programs in Mexico.

• (1450)

This is a Canadian company enticing Canadians to close down Canadian factories and move them to Mexico.

> PINSA Group—

I quote from the letter, which I will table.

> . . . provides access to potentially highly productive, highly profitable Mexican labour force in several ways—ranging from sub-contracting full scale subsidiary operations for clients in the U.S. and now Canada. They have been working with these programs for many years and have been very successful and are now expanding their service to the Canadian market place.
> Enclosed is a brochure illustrating the services offered through PINSA Group.
> To get a better understanding of your needs, we are requesting you complete the attached questionnaire, and return it in the enclosed self-addressed, stamped envelope.

If you have any questions regarding this matter, please contact me.

Thanking you in advance.

So, what does the brochure say? On page 2 of the brochure, it says:

MEXICO—No Stranger to Industry.

More than 1,000 firms now operate in Mexico where they have reduced their production costs as much as 50% saving up to $20,000 —or more—per direct labour employee per year!

In other words, honourable senators, this is a company soliciting business out of Toronto, saying "Come on down, you Canadian companies in Quebec and Ontario; come on down to Mexico and, we can cut a deal for $20,000 less per employee per year."

Senator Simard: Not so loud, not so loud.

Senator Perrault: Listen, this is something to raise an alarm about.

Senator Simard: You do not have to cry.

Senator Perrault: I hope you are not defending this desertion of Canadian jobs by certain companies.

Senator Haidasz: Sock it to them, senator!

Senator Simard: Just get your facts right.

Senator Haidasz: Sock it to them, senator!

Senator Perrault: Do you think they have medicare or hospital insurance down there in Mexico? The Mexicans are barely surviving, yet this company, operating in Canada, is saying: "Come on down to Mexico and you can really slash these employees' wages." Honourable senators on the opposite side should be up in arms about this type of thing. They should tell the companies involved that we will not enter into any deal that will measurably affect workers, whether they be Canadian workers or Mexican workers, wherever they are exploited, wherever it be, in Mexico or in Canada.

Senator Simard: What is the question?

Senator Perrault: It then goes on to say

Members of America's Fortune 500 and leading Japanese firms predominate in this population.

Oh, I bet they do.

But profit-conscious smaller companies have also found that under the maquiladora (twin plant) program—

You know, that is the deal whereby they got a manufacturing zone in Mexico and they can—

Senator Simard: What is the question?

Senator Perrault: Do not defend this kind of thing, senator.

Senator Simard: I am not defending anything.

Senator Perrault: Your talents are better used in other directions.

Senator Simard: Let us stick by the rules of this house. What is your question?

Senator Perrault: Here we are in a situation of being enticed into an agreement with a nation where obviously the working people are being exploited.

Members of America's Fortune 500 and leading Japanese firms predominate in this population. But profit-conscious smaller companies have also found that under the maquiladora (twin plant) program, Mexico's low labour cost—

Senator Simard: Disgusting!

Senator Perrault: Listen to this: Mexico's low labour cost, $400,000. In the course of asking this question, I will put some other facts and statistics on the record.

Mexico's low labour cost and quality of workmanship have given them a strong competitive edge and important gains in their market share worldwide.

Of course, they do not have any hospital insurance, and they do not have any workmen's compensation; they just work in those plants at levels which would be totally unacceptable in Canada. I do not care how we vote in this country, we cannot condone exploitation of working people, whether it is the labour force in our own country or in another country.

Here is another advertisement from the Wall Street Journal, of Thursday, April 6, 1989. What is the headline? "Learn how you can cut manufacturing costs up to 50 per cent in Mexico!" These are the cheery headlines in this advertisement, honourable senators.

Over 1,000 U.S. Manufacturers Now Have Off shore Operations in Neighbouring Mexico."

Real friendly.

"They assemble/manufacture a wide variety of products under the "maquila" program; many are heavily involved in sophisticated computer instrumentation, electro-mechanical production operations and so on.

Then the following is featured in larger headlines.

They Save Up To $25,000 Per Assembler Per Year! These profit, production-wise firms have proved that eager, highly motivated Mexican workers—listen to that prose—

. . . do cut their manufacturing costs 50%—and more! And they do it with quality of workmanship and productivity that equals or exceeds their U.S. operations!

Isn't that great news?

Senator Cochrane: Let us get to the question.

Senator Perrault: Another cry of "Let us get to the question." I would have thought that this information would be of interest and concern to many senators, whether or not they sit on this side or that side of the chamber. The advertisement then goes on:

Learn About Three Simple Ways To Start-up And Manufacture In Mexico. You'll be given the pros and cons of three ways to "enter" Mexico.

This is the inside information; this is the kind of information that encouraged that Canadian parts company to leave

Ontario overnight, like the Baltimore Colts departing from Baltimore and heading for Indianapolis.

Senator Marsden: Or adding new senators.

Senator Perrault: Yes, or adding new senators. First of all, according to this advertisement, you subcontract with American manufacturers now operating in Mexico.

> Use the "shelter plan" concept to eliminate international red tape.

I suppose that is a network of contacts that you can make that will ease your way in getting out of Canada and go to Mexico. Thirdly,—

> Select a turnkey option that puts you in a ready-to-operate plant.

Honourable senators, my question relates to the kind of support that we may or may not be giving to this type of operation. Are we involved in a going-out-of-business sale in Canada?

Senator Petten: Free trade; you got it.

Senator Perrault: Are we going to hear the words, "Will the last company that leaves please turn off the lights?" Honourable senators, I am terribly concerned about this. By supporting the formation of a regional economic bloc, we could be weakening the multilateral trading systems such as GATT. We give to the big partner, the United States, more power to impose unilaterally, and in violation of GATT principles, its vision and interests on other nations. Small- and medium-size nations always do better as part of a system that has many players. Rules protect against the abuse of power by the dominant nations. The cost to a dominant nation of breaking the rules are great because other powerful actors may act in the same way against it.

However, in a bilateral or trilateral setting, especially where one player is overwhelmingly dominant, that player can break the rules with relatively little cost to itself. Any short-term preferences granted to the smaller partners are outweighed by the negative consequences of weakening the integrity of the multilateral system. This is a view held by many of us on this side of the house. Canada and Mexico, acting with other nations, have more leverage under GATT rules to influence U.S. policies. Under FTA they basically have to accept the actions of the United States of America.

With respect to the wage levels paid down there in Mexico, let me tell you that there are over 400,000 Mexican workers today making less than $2 a day—two dollars a day. Our good trade union senator here, Charles Turner, is nodding in assent. Are we to condone the exploitation of people wherever they live?

Senator Haidasz: No.

Senator Perrault: I do not believe we should be condoning such a thing, honourable senators. I think we should be up in arms about it. This is not a political issue. We are just saying that if we have any contribution to make to trilateral discussions with the Americans, it will be to make sure that human rights are to be protected, and that people and companies will not be allowed to exploit low-cost labour, whether it is in Canada, the United States or in any other country.

• (1500)

I want to ask the Leader of the Government a question.

Senator Simard: Finally, we will hear the question!

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, why is it that anything relating to human rights is greeted with your impatience and you have no time for it?

Senator Simard: We have all kinds of time.

Senator Perrault: What kind of philosophy does that suggest?

Senator Denis: He has none!

Senator Perrault: Do you have any philosophy at all?

Senator Simard: We know what that is!

Senator Perrault: Have you no time for the working people of this country who are suffering a great deal under this recession?

Senator Denis: Never!

Senator Simard: You taxed everything that moved and everything that did not move!

Senator Perrault: I am not getting back to those old disputes. I am making an appeal to the Senate—

Senator Simard: You do not want to—

Senator Perrault: —whether we are members of the Conservative, Liberal or Reform Parties—to be aware of what is going on in the Mexican market at the present time, that so-called productivity zone where it is claimed that labour is being exploited.

Can the Leader of the Government give us today an update regarding the situation? Can he tell us whether or not we are planning to meet with the Mexicans and what kind of Canadian agenda will be brought to those free trade meetings?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Senator Perrault confirms that the policy of the Liberal Party under its new leader, Mr. Chrétien, is the same policy that the party held under Mr. Turner—namely, that they will tear up the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and, presumably, any agreement that we reach in trilateral discussions with the United States and Mexico. It is good to have that on the record.

Senator Simard: Yes!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator rails against exploitation of workers and human rights offences in various parts of the world. I deplore them as much as he does, but the argument he makes is an argument against trade, aid and investment links with much of the Third World. He should reflect on that.

There are some home truths that have to be brought to the attention of the honourable senator. The first is that Canada, more so than any industrialized country, depends for its income on external trade.

Secondly, I have to remind him of the truism that trade is a two-way street. Thirdly, I have to remind him that we win—that is, Canada—from more open and freer trade in goods and services and investment. What that indicates in terms of national policy is that we must continue to increase our productivity, to adapt our industry, to adjust our work force and to modernize our economy for the 1990s. The honourable senator sets his face totally against that. His position is as reactionary as it is unproductive and ultimately detrimental to the living standards of Canadians.

Senator Perrault: I regret that the Leader of the Government in this place, who has some rank and standing and is a member of cabinet, has to offer us such a politicized response today. It is a response which I note that he read from a document that was, I suspect, prepared for him by some tawdry government servant who does not know what the facts are all about.

Senator Doyle: A tawdry servant?

Senator Perrault: I notice the senators over there mocking what I have said, but it is of real concern. Ask some of the industrial workers who have lost their jobs recently, many more of whom have lost their jobs today, whether or not they are in sympathy with the bland nonsense just uttered by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Simard: Your premise is wrong!

Senator Perrault: The fact of the matter is that tens of thousands of workers in North America, including Canadian workers, have lost their jobs or seen employment opportunities vanish as their companies move to take advantage of the poverty of Mexican workers and the absence of any effective regulations on company operations.

Over 400,000 Mexican workers are now employed at wages under $1 an hour producing goods destined almost entirely for the U.S. market, in addition to the others that I mentioned working for less than $2 a day.

We are concerned about this situation—that is, some of us-but obviously the members on the government side, who are oblivious to the enormous impact of massive unemployment which they are helping to create in this country, are not. It is a similar situation to that of Nero fiddling while Rome was burning; to the attitude of Marie Antoinette and her "Let them eat cake". There seems to be a total lack of understanding the problems of the workers and of what is going through the minds of those workers whose jobs are being lost today and are being threatened.

Senator Simard: What is the question?

Senator Perrault: You keep quiet. The question is: Why are you so noisy?

Senator Simard: That is the question?

Senator Perrault: That is the main question. Why can't you sit still and listen to an intervention?

Senator Simard: I have a question to ask, too!

Senator Perrault: Some of us are concerned that an extended free trade agreement will only encourage greater capital outflows and bring about an increase in imports from Mexico, further harming the industrial base of this country. That is another one of our concerns.

Originally conceived in the mid-1960s as a bilateral effort to bring prosperity to both sides of the Mexican-U.S. border, the program has been perverted into a system that employs some 300,000 Mexican assembly workers at substandard wages. That is our concern. We do not need the Leader of the Government standing up in this place saying, "Well, the Liberals did this and that." You are the government.

An Hon. Senator: We did very well!

Senator Perrault: Tell us what you will do to protect the integrity of the jobs of Canadians, whether they live in the Atlantic provinces, the north, western or central Canada?

Senator Simard: Just vote for the GST and we will do the job! You can start with that.

Senator Perrault: Why are all the plants closing down, with some moving to the United States and some going to Mexico? What will we do about it?

Senator Simard: Just vote for the GST! That would be a good start.

Senator Perrault: Shall we wait for the universe to unfold and somehow pray for a miraculous solution?

Senator Murray, you have yet to tell us. I ask you this question: Will you stand up now and tell us the number of American and Mexican companies that have relocated and established in Canada since the free trade deal was signed? So far it is alleged to be one-way traffic in industries which are leaving Canada and going to the United States.

I remember when the Gillette Safety Razor Company was the first one to move. They moved the day after the election. Senator Simard, do you still shave with Gillette products after that? They moved their factory to New York State. They said they hestitated to announce that they were going to pull out of Canada until the election results were known. That has been happening every month since that event. Are you concerned about it? Is it unfair of me to raise this on behalf of the workers of this country?

Senator Simard: We should not be eating oranges from California, then.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Government said that we have to think about the Third World countries. Yet his kind of economic policies will ensure that we may well become citizens of a Third World country ourselves someday, unless we arrest the trends that are under way.

Senator Simard: Is that your question?

Senator Haidasz: Tory times are bad times!

Senator Murray: It is much to be deplored that an honourable senator in the Liberal Party—

Senator Perrault: There is the old political railing again!

Senator Murray: —the party of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, would espouse a policy of narrow protectionism in an age of globalization.

● (1510)

I cannot think of anything more counterproductive or detrimental to the living standards of Canadians.

The fact of the matter is that in a dynamic country such as ours, companies do go out of business.

Senator Perrault: They sure do!

Senator Murray: In the last few years, however, you will find that new companies have sprung up by the thousands as some companies have gone out of business.

Senator Perrault: Give us a list!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator keeps asking for a list. I can give him some examples, although I hesitate to impose upon the time of the Senate in the same way he has.

Senator Perrault: Go ahead!

Senator Murray: Let me give him a few examples of Canadian companies that are expanding, or of American companies that are relocating here because of the Free Trade Agreement with the United States which, as I remind the honourable senator, is being phased in over a ten-year period and is only in its second year at the present time. I will give the honourable senators some examples.

DND Galvanizing has chosen Windsor, Ontario as the location for a $240 million steel-rolling mill, partly owned by Dofasco Inc.

Senator Perrault: How much government money is in it?

Senator Murray: Pratt and Whitney Canada expects to win a $100 million contract to build auxiliary power units for the B-777 airliner, which is very much in demand. Mississauga-based AGRA Industries Limited, a diversified engineering manufacturing and high tech company has acquired Northern Engineering of Houston to increase its penetration of the U.S. market. There you go! They are Canadian-based multinationals.

Senator Simard: There is Irving in New Brunswick too!

Senator Murray: My honourable friend Senator Simard mentions the continuing growth of the Irving Industries, which is based in New Brunswick, into New England. Dexx Energy Corporation is bidding for Shogun Oil, which has Texas and Utah petroleum assets. A U.S. high tech company, Nu-Metrics, has chosen London, Ontario as the Canadian base for the sale and distribution of electronic vehicle measuring equipment. J.J. Farmer Clothing of Mount Royal is entering the U.S. market through an American partner.

What does this mean in terms of increased export sales, increased jobs and increased incomes for Canadians precisely because of the Free Trade Agreement? Comco, an Edmonton-based pipe distributor, seeks better access to the U.S. market through the purchase of a Los Angeles-based distributor. Procycle, of Saint Georges-de-Beauce, the largest bicycle maker in Canada, has signed sales agreements designed to double sales to $100 million by 1995, many of these within the U.S. market, again encouraged by the Free Trade Agreement between Canada and the United States.

CCL Industries, a Toronto-based detergent company, has acquired Korex of Detroit to make inroads into the U.S. dish and laundry detergent sector. Marconi and CAE Industries, both of Montreal, have been awarded contracts by the U.S. military: the former have a $59.8 million contract for 1,600 radios by the U.S. Army; and the latter, similator/logistic equipment for the U.S. Air Force valued at $19.2 million. Cinram Ltd. of Scarborough, Canada's largest manufacturer of compact discs, acquired PRC Tape of Richmond, Indiana, to gain better access to the U.S. market. Bombardier of Montreal has received an order for 10 raid coaches from Metro North Commuter Railroad Company of New York worth $11.4 million.

These are just a few examples of dynamic Canadian companies expanding, making acquisitions in the United States, and penetrating the United States market with the resultant increases in incomes, jobs and prosperity for Canadians. This is what I mean when I say we have to have those markets. We win from having more open markets. It is absolutely necessary that we adjust our workforce, adapt our industry and modernize our economy for the 1990s. I would hope, through whatever modest persuasive powers I may have, to bring the honourable senator not only into the 1990s but into the 20th and 21st centuries.

Senator Perrault: I have been a long-time supporter of freer trade with the United States and other countries. I am talking about the nature of the deal we signed with the United States. That is what I am talking about.

Senator Murray: You are going to tear it up!

Senator Perrault: I am not going to tear it up.

Senator Murray: What are you going to do with it?

Senator Perrault: It should be substantially modified, and we should not wait until the next election to do it. Second, I want to thank the Leader of the Government for bringing that list of companies to the attention of the Senate.

Senator Murray: I have a list that I put on the record a few months ago.

Senator Perrault: In the coming six days I will put forward my list. We can compare them with your list. As well, I will ask the Leader of the Government to tell me the number of employees affected, the amount of government loans or grants involved in the establishment of these companies on the Canadian side, and the economic benefits that have accrued or are expected to accrue.

Senator Simard, who has been very vocal this afternoon—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: If you would sit down, I could ask a couple of questions myself! Are you going to monopolize this house all afternoon, Senator Perrault? Is this part of your filibustering?

Senator Perrault: Senator, are you trying to break the sound barrier? Let us get down to facts.

Senator Frith: He is helping our filibuster.

Senator Perrault: I know how grief-stricken the senator must have been when, the day after the election, the Square D Company pulled out of Edmundston, New Brunswick and went back to the United States.

Senator Simard: Will you take your seat!

Senator Perrault: What did you do to fight that move? Why didn't you stand up and fight for the workers?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: Did that happen because of free trade? No, but you do not have the guts to admit that.

Senator Perrault: Why were you such a tame tabby when it came to Square D? What did you do about Square D?

Senator Simard: I know about that company. I helped to bring it to New Brunswick 17 years ago, along with the Liberal government. It provided 300 jobs.

Senator Perrault: And they took it as soon as you turned your back. Free trade chased Square D right out of your own riding and you did not even see it!

Senator Simard: You did not even know Square D existed 17 years ago.

Senator Perrault: Stand up and fight for your workers! Don't be a tame tabby!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is my responsibility to maintain order and decorum in the house. I would urge senators to speak one after the other instead of at the same time.

Senator Simard: The Liberals have had five questioners, and, in the name of democracy, I should be allowed to ask a couple of questions too. After all, senators opposite made up their minds to speak until 5.45.

[Translation]

After all your shenanigans, I hope there is still some democracy left in this House.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Speak quietly.

Senator Simard: It would be hard to break your sound barrier, senator.

An Hon. Senator: Behave yourself!

An Hon. Senator: Question!

[Translation]

Senator Simard: I have a few questions.

[English]

Senator Frith: Pardon?

Senator Simard: I have a couple of questions, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: They can hear you in Toronto!

[Translation]

Senator Simard: My first question is the following, and it complements another question asked by Senator Bonnell.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: We should get our information from the government, not from him.

Senator Simard: Are you all right now?

Senator Haidasz: I do not think that is in order.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: This is a supplementary to Senator Bonnell's question. Earlier, Senator Bonnell suggested that there might be cutbacks in order to pay the cost of higher interest rates and government spending on the crisis in the gulf and in Oka.

Senator Murray, could you give us the assurance that the base at Summerside will not be hit by these cuts, even if Senator Bonnell voted against the GST, continues his filibustering and predicts that the GST will not be approved before the end of December? Can you give us a guarantee, considering the interest, enthusiasm and repeated requests of people from Summerside and from Prince Edward Island in general, that the government will go ahead with this project, and I am referring to the GST centre?

Can you give us the assurance, Senator Murray, that the base in Summerside and the $30 million that go along with it will not be cut?

That is my first question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as always, we intend to keep our word. We will keep our commitment to the people of Summerside and to Prince Edward Island.

Senator Simard: Thank you. My second question concerns the election in Beauséjour.

There are people associated with the Liberal Party in his riding who would have the people of Beauséjour believe that the Mitel plant built about ten years ago, which cost the Province of New Brunswick five or six million dollars worth of services, including water and sewer mains by the way, perhaps some of our colleagues don't know, but this Mitel plant never materialized and never produced a single dollar's worth of Canadian products. It's a white elephant.

However, during the election campaign in Beauséjour, people associated with the Liberal Party are making plans in order to convince the people of Beauséjour that if the Liberal leader, Mr. Chrétien, is elected, the plant might be converted and then produce goods and create jobs.

Has an application of any nature been filed with the federal government to obtain grants that would encourage a company to locate there?

Does the federal government at this time have in its possession an application for grants or subsidies or assistance of any kind that would encourage taking over the plant from Mitel, or is this another Liberal balloon launched at the last minute?

Senator Murray: I am not in a position to say yes or no. For the time being, I can only take the question as notice and make enquiries among my colleagues. However, I think it is always regrettable to see a candidate use scare tactics.

Senator Simard: My third question, and as you may have noticed, Senator Corbin, and your other colleagues as well, my questions are short and my preambles are brief. This time, however, I will make an exception, because my third question will include a long preamble. However, I believe the article I intend to read into the record of this Chamber is relevant. It is relevant, because the reason why we have to put up with the opposition's strategy is because the opposition has decided to delay debate on the GST as long as possible. Last week, they used petitions, and today, they are using Question Period . . .

● (1520)

[English]

Senator Frith: The man just discovered that we want to delay the GST. He is a slow learner.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: For an hour and a half, we had to sit and listen to four Liberal senators asking questions. If that is not an abusive use of question period, I do not know what is.

However, if I want to be consistent, I should refrain from playing the same game as the people on the other side, but there comes a time when fire must be fought with fire. Even more so when we have the opportunity to raise the tone of the debate and deal more closely with the bill about which the people on the other side have been making antics and filibustering for a month.

Before putting my question to senator Murray, I would like to quote an article signed by Hyman Solomon whcih was published in the Financial Post on November 14, 1990.

I think it is appropriate at this time. I would request leave from my colleagues opposite to . . .

Senator Poitras: You have it.

Senator Simard: Thank you, senator Poitras. I am reassured. I hope to read through the text without being interrupted.

Some Hon. Senators: Go ahead.

Senator Simard: Well, here is what Mr. Hyman Solomon was saying in the Financial Post.

[English]

"Within the next month . . .

[Translation]

Senator Haidasz: In French, please.

Senator Hébert: Translate it for me, then.

[English]

Senator Simard: I will tell you one thing. If I had written a book, I would not use this place to have it translated; but I do not intend to publish a book.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: I have a point of order. The Leader of the Government apologized for making the same suggestion. My book was translated a year ago by me and submitted to publishers in Quebec. They turned it down.

Senator Barootes: They are very wise people.

Senator Gigantès: I do not have to use the translation service of the Senate to have my text translated. Only an illiterate would think that one can pick up a translation done at high speed by the excellent translators here and offer that to a publisher. A professional writer would not do that.

You, sir, have not read the Hansard in which your leader apologized for making the same suggestion. It was a false suggestion then, it is a false suggestion now and it is only indicative of the kind of person you are.

Senator Simard: It is true that Senator Murray has apologized and that is his right. However, I do not have to apologize. I am not going to apologize.

Senator Gigantès: Come and say that outside and I will take you to court. Then we will fight it out in court and I will give evidence.

Senator Simard: I will meet you any time.

Senator Gigantès: Come and say that outside in front of the press, and I will drag you in front of tribunals. If you are going to accuse me of something dishonest, do it where you can be punished. You judge others by your own standards. You, sir, may be capable of doing such a thing; I am not. Come and say that outside the chamber and face the consequences. You, sir, are lying.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable colleagues, I will not apologize. Here is why, if it will allow you to breathe easier, senator.

Senator Gigantès: Say it outside this House. Then I will drag you before the courts.

Senator Simard: I will tell you why and I am going to repeat it outside as well.

Senator Simard: I will tell you why I won't apologize. I will tell you why, if you will let me finish. You just told us that your book was translated a year ago.

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator Simard: Last week or the week before, at the beginning of November or around the end of October, you answered one of my questions which is probably in Hansard. My question was whether your book had been published in English or in French, and I asked you another question, and you answered. I think we can find the question in Hansard, and you said this: It was published in English. That is basically what you said. It was published in English. It has been the bookstores since April, and you told us that the French version was being prepared. Now you just told me from your seat five minutes ago that the translation was ready a year ago. As soon as you have make up your mind and confirm that either today's version or the one we got two weeks ago is the correct one, I will make up my mind whether I will meet you outside.

[English]

Tell the truth. Did you tell the truth three weeks ago?

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: First of all, The Road Ahead was published in English a year ago.

Second, a substantial part is now going to be produced on the basis of what I wrote in French last year, not at government expense and that will be quite clear, because like in all my other books, there will be several new chapters, at the beginning and the end. This is a new book. It is not the same book. Perhaps, substantial parts of what you heard will be published, but they will be published at my publisher's expense. There will not be a single word of Senate translation used in the book, and only someone who does not know French would even consider using the text in Hansard. I suggest you read it. They don't have time to do a good translation of 70,000 words in 24 hours.

Senator Simard: If I understand correctly, what you said two weeks ago is not exactly the same as what you said just now. You told us five minutes ago, in your initial comments when you challenged me to meet you outside, that the translation had been done a year ago. Now you just changed your story. I intend to compare both versions in Hansard, and then I will decide.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

STANCE OF LIBERAL PARTY—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: And now I would like to ask my third question. I was about to read an article by Hyman Solomon, and I will have a question as soon as I finish reading the article.

● (1530)

[English]

> Within the next month, Canada's non-elected Liberal senators will probably be forced to end their charade as the last bastion of popular democracy and allow passage of the despised goods and services tax. They will claim that, unlike the deaf, discredited Mulroney government, they listened to Canadians and did all they could to oppose a tax most consumers would prefer not to pay. They will take full credit for a moral victory, if not a legislative one.
> How heroic! Direct democracy brought to us by appointed Liberal senators who only recently turned in their rubber stamps for opposition, public-opinion politics. What a favour they have done Canada! And what a legacy they have left for the next elected government, particularly a Liberal or New Democratic majority or minority administration which inherits a Tory-dominated Senate.
> Senate Liberal Leader Allan MacEachen, recently converted populist, says it is now legitimate in the Canadian parliamentary system for appointed senators to thwart the will of elected governments provided they represent the clear voice of the people. Looking back, he thinks the former Liberal-dominated Senate was too easy on the Trudeau administration and earlier Liberal governments in which he was a key player.
> The mind boggles. But if the appointed Senate is to become the new champion of populism, what incentive is there for future elected governments to do tough, unpopular things? And without really thinking about the consequences, do we really want to undermine our British parliamentary system of government for a more open U.S. design, which responds to popular and interest group pressure on every issue?
> On paper, the U.S. system has great appeal. Unlike Canadian MPs, individual members of Congress are not bound by strict party discipline. They can therefore interject directly on behalf of their constituency and special interests, whether these are in line with party policy or not.
> In return, they are held personally accountable by voters and cannot take refuge behind party policy for voting the wrong way.
> The GST would never have had a chance in Washington. But then, neither do most tough tax measures or spending cuts aimed at bringing the spiraling U.S. budget deficit under control. The Mulroney government is not immune from strong popular or political opposition to painful policy. But compared to recent U.S. governments, it is politically fearless.
> The difference in political courage is not an issue of tough guys vs whimps. It happens because parliamentary democracy allows majority governments to practise a form of temporary dictatorship between elections, and the U.S. system does not. As a result, Canadian governments have more leeway to make policy and legislative decisions which are not only popular or politically expedient, but unpopular and necessary.
> Richard Lipsey, one of Canada's outstanding economists who is now directing a major economic policy program at Simon Fraser University, recently told a graduating class at Queen's University that Canada's system of government is in danger of being neutered. Senate obstructionism has already forced one election.

Honourable colleagues, that is his opinion. I happen to disagree as far as that part of the statement is concerned. In fact, we had an election and we know what happened then. To continue with the article written by Mr. Solomon:

> It has now seriously frustrated the tough, unpopular or "statesmanlike" core of Mulroney's legislative program in defence of voter populism.
> "If the new practice becomes the norm, the government will have to face a major political battle every time it tries to do something unpopular—just as the U.S. administration now does," Lipsey warned.

Senator Marchand: Where is the question? Are we still in Question Period. What are we doing?

Senator Simard: Yes, senator, we are still in Question Period. That should be obvious—

Senator Marchand: Where is the question, then?

Senator Simard: —to those who take one and one-half hours to ask four questions. At any rate, I will soon complete this preamble.

Senator Marchand: I want to hear your question. Pass that over to me and I will read it. Where is your question?

Senator Simard: Let me finish. I will read three more paragraphs and I will then ask my question.

> Many Canadians will welcome democratising the system, claiming they aren't heard now, and have few means of influencing legislation except at election time. Reform Party Leader Preston Manning—

I wish Senator Waters was here today. In any event, I will continue:

> Reform Party Leader Preston Manning has built much of his growing popularity on the theme of direct democracy. What he seldom explains is how governments take their lead from voters and still do unpopular things.
> Canada in coming years will be fighting for both its trading life and standard of living by trying to remain internationally competitive in a world where borders and barriers are falling, and only the most efficient can stay whole. In such insecure times, many Canadians are circling the wagons, looking inward, and seeking protection. It is not the way to survive in a globalized world.
> Meanwhile, senators—

Honourable senators, he left out the word "Liberal", and I will insert it.

> Meanwhile, Liberal senators pander to voter insecurity in the name of democratic populism. Is that supposed to pass for sober second thought?

My question to you, Senator Murray, is this:

Some Hon. Senators: Ah!

Senator Stanbury: Here comes the question!

Senator Simard: Do you agree with Mr. Jean Chrétien as he was reported yesterday in La Presse?

[Translation]

I will read to you in English what Mr. Chrétien said:

> The unpopularity of the Tories hurts even the Liberals.

In fact, according to Mr. Jean Chrétien:

The Tories' discredit is so serious, he noted, that it even hurts the Liberals and the New Democrats in the polls.

Do you agree with the Liberal leader's opinion?

Rather, do you agree with another opinion shared by many Canadians who believe that real leadership requires setting a course of action defending it, instead of this direct democracy policy which says: "Dites-moi où vont les gens pour que je les suive."

Do you not believe, Senator Murray, that the second opinion is more valid and that it explains the spectacular, eloquent, unprecedented drop of the Liberal leader's—not the Conservative Party's—popularity in the last three months?

If Mr. Chrétien's opinion were valid, it would be really difficult to understand. I would like to have an explanation on this, Senator Murray.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senator, if you look at the history of polls in this country in the last 25 years, you will note an obvious pattern, that is after every election of a new national leader of a political party, his or her popularity increases steadily for a year or two. That was the case with Mr. Stanfield, Mr. Clark, Mr. Trudeau, and even Mr. Turner in 1984. Totally unprecedented is the fact that after his election as national leader of the Liberal Party of Canada, the honourable Jean Chrétien's popularity seems to have dropped very quickly.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): I have a supplementary for you. First I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether Senator Simard still belongs to his caucus. I have the impression he joined one of the parties now campaigning in my former riding of Beauséjour since he alone in this chamber raises questions on that issue, so I am wondering whether he is still a member of the party to which he is supposed to belong—or at least the party that repatriated him after an absence of a few months or a year or two.

I have a supplementary question. The Mitel case interests me because I was very proud when company management not only unveiled their project and held their sod-turning ceremony, but also when they invested something like $10 million when that was considered to be a rather worthwhile and daring deed. I was also very proud that New Brunswick had been chosen as the site for an industry which, traditionally and historically, had been reserved for major urban centres in Canada. I have in mind the City of Ottawa and other major cities that seem to think that they alone can accommodate this kind of project, when in fact Mitel had built plants in Ogensburg in New York State as well as in Britain. I do not quite recall the name of the locality but it was not a very big city. All this to say that at the time this was considered a success and an advantage. I know that the government of which Mr. Simard and half a dozen of our colleagues opposite were members back then was not particularly pleased that it could not take most of the credit for that, but apparently there were better days ahead. This is why I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could obtain a very interesting document—

● (1540)

[English]

With respect to the document concerning which I am asking the Leader of the Government, Senator Murray has plenty of assistance. He can have the help of Senator Hatfield, Senator Deware, Senator Simard and Senator Brenda Robertson. In other words, he has enough former ministers of the provincial government of New Brunswick to pass Orders in Council and even special warrants, if they need them.

I am confident that with that team they can find the document I am interested in. It has some relation to the present byelection. In the previous federal election of 1988, Senator Simard's former colleague, the former minister Omer Legère, went around Beauséjour. That plant has been closed, frankly, for a number of years.

Senator Simard: It never opened.

Senator LeBlanc: M. Legère discovered it would be good politics to go around with a clipboard and take the names of people who wanted jobs at Mitel when, upon becoming a member of Parliament for Beauséjour, he would oversee the reopening of Mitel. I would have thought that with that sort of commitment to the people of Beauséjour, the last thing that Senator Simard would want to do is recall to the people of that riding the actions of his colleague, Omer Legère, the official Progressive Conservative candidate, in 1988.

I wonder if Senator Murray can find that clipboard and that list for us?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, whatever else it is, it is not within my ministerial responsibility.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator LeBlanc has included me in the group that could be of assistance to Senator Murray. I would like to offer supplemental information.

Senator Stanbury: No one has asked you a question.

[Translation]

Senator LeBlanc just told us that he attended the official opening of Mitel. I insist on the word "official", because there never were work openings. Mitel did not do much, as far as I know. Did it produce even a dollar's worth of Canadian products? I think you know the answer is no.

That being said, Senator LeBlanc believes that, because they took part in a certain by-election, the Liberal candidates who were defeated have the same privileges in the Party as the members of Parliament and the senators. That is not true. I do not know if it is the case in your Party, but I think it would be dangerous and not too appropriate either to base a question to senator Murray on what your friend Omer Légère may have done. By the way, Mr. Légère did great things. He was a dedicated Minister, three times around and he made his mark.

You preferred, senator LeBlanc, to refer to an election held in 1988, while my question dealt with the 1990 election. I have never been to Beauséjour yet, and will probably not go before the election because our Party has decided not to take part in the campaign. I will abide by the decision made by our Party and our Leader. But you were there, senator LeBlanc, and according to my sources, you travelled to Beauséjour regularly during the past two weeks. Can you confirm whether or not . . .

[English]

Senator Frith: Let us continue with questions.

Senator Simard: We are talking of job creation, Senator Frith. If you do not care about job creation, that is your problem, but Senator LeBlanc and I do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The Senate decided at the outset that we would deal with Question Period. I think we have been giving each other a great deal of liberty, but the idea, I believe, in Question Period is to ask ministers questions and to have those questions answered. We have only one minister in the Senate, and we have been allowing Senator Simard to—

Senator Simard: You have not been allowing anything, Senator Frith. I am using my rights as a senator, in case you do not know. I do not need your permission to ask questions. You are not thea Speaker yet, you know.

Senator Frith: I was saying that yourstanding to answer questions on his behalf would appear to usurp the function of the Leader of the Government. The last question was one asked by Senator LeBlanc of New Brunswick, which Senator Murray answered very briefly. The next thing we know, Senator Simard is on his feet without any indication being given to us of his being designated deputy leader or assistant question-answerer, or whatever it is.

● (1550)

Then the next thing we know, we are into a lengthy diatribe. Senator Simard, noted as he is for his fairness of mind, perhaps would agree to wind up his remarks and allow some other senators an opportunity to ask questions.

Senator Simard: I agree. Since Senator LeBlanc has been visiting that riding regularly in the last two or three weeks, perhaps he could explain or confirm the rumour that Liberal organizers in and around Mr. Chretien are promoting the reopening of Mitel.

Senator Murray: That is where the clipboard is.

Senator LeBlanc: I would not deprive myself of continuing this entertaining exchange, except that I take the admonition of my deputy leader. However, I know Senator Simard would want to afford me a chance to correct the record if what I said was misleading. If I said that I had attended the official opening, that was misleading because, to my knowledge, there was never, in fact, an official opening of that plant. There was a "première pelletée de terre," or in English, the launching of the project. The plant was then built and, to everyone's sorrow, the company ran into a period of difficulty, and eventually, if my memory is correct, the establishment was sold to the government of New Brunswick.

I do not know if that is still the status quo. I do not know the latest details. It is true that I have been to Beauséjour a few times, and I have read carefully the newspapers and whatever press reports I have been able to find. I have seen no mention of anyone discussing Mitel.

However, I suspect that such a discussion might have take place at a time when two or three of the candidates had a meeting at the Buctouche Chamber of Commerce, a sort of joint evening session. I am told that that was one of the questions asked of all the candidates, but I have not heard or read what comments were made about this matter.

Whatever credit there is to be gleaned from this situation, I hope, for the sake of the people of that area, that some day that plant will reopen, because it is an excellent building with great potential. To everyone's great sadness, it never did formally open.

NATIVE AFFAIRS

OKA CRISIS—ROYAL COMMISSION OF INQUIRY—ABORIGINAL ISSUES—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Len Marchand: No wonder we Indians lost all of our land. I was too patient and they out-waited me.

About a week and a half ago I raised a couple of serious questions that I now want to follow up with the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Does the Government of Canada intend to carry out an investigation into this past summer's events at Oka, Kanesatake and Kahnawake? I also asked the Leader of the Government if he could inquire about the work of the Aboriginal Affairs committee in the other place and find out what are its goals. At that time I also raised the question of a royal commission on Aboriginal issues, and put on the record the views that I held on such a commission and the fact that I think it is urgent that such a commission go forward.

I wonder if the government leader has had an opportunity to consider those questions and whether he could enlighten the Senate and me today on this matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am still awaiting a reply from my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the questions put by my friend on November 6 concerning the Oka crisis.

With regard to a royal commission on Aboriginal affairs, as I indicated earlier, we do not at all preclude that possibility. For the moment, however, we think it is very important that Aboriginals and others participate in the consensus-building dialogue that we are attempting to promote through the Citizens' Forum. As the honourable senator is aware, and as I mentioned last week, the relationship between the Aboriginal peoples and non-Aboriginal citizens is near the top—if not at the top—of the terms of reference of the Citizens' Forum. That forum has also been asked to ensure that there is a dialogue among Canadians concerning institutions that would maintain and strengthen the identity and heritage of Canada's Aboriginal citizens and their links to the rest of Canadian society in the context of modern society.

As I pointed out earlier, and as Mr. Spicer has said, there are great depths of ignorance in this country concerning the aspirations of our Aboriginal peoples and native affairs generally. We need to overcome that and we also need to build or re-build a consensus on some of these issues. That is one of the important tasks before the Citizens' Forum and we want to give them the opportunity to get on with it before proceeding with a parallel inquiry such as a royal commission or another study of Aboriginal matters.

Meanwhile, as the honourable senator knows, and as I told him last week, we are proceeding along quite a broad front with regard to accelerating land claims negotiations, improving conditions on Indian reserves, changing the Indian Act, and enhancing self-government opportunities generally.

Hon. Charles Watt: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in relation to the same subject matter, but more in the area of public inquiry requirements relating to when the incident actually took place at Oka. I am not talking about the setting up of the commission; I am talking about a public inquiry in regard to the actual problem that took place in the two areas to which Senator Marchand has referred.

Senator Murray: At Oka?

Senator Watt: Well, in Oka and Kahnawake. The reason behind that, honourable senators, is that the word "natives" was used pretty heavily over the whole summer period. People could not distinguish between the Indians, the Inuit and the other groups; so they were all lumped together.

Due to that fact, many of my people, who are trying to advance themselves in the field of education, were harassed all summer long—not by the warriors, not by the Mohawks, but by the people living around the Dorval and Lachine areas, because these are the areas where the largest concentration of our people go to school. We had to transport some people back up to the Arctic because their parents had started worrying, and so on. We had no choice. At one point we had to gather them into one hotel for their own protection.

In addition to that, we also had a number of problems related to the bases. People came down from the Arctic to go to the hospitals, and while in these waiting houses, awaiting the basic services to look after them, they were also harassed. When I say "harassed", I mean they had their legs broken, their bones broken, their ribs broken and generally got beaten up by whoever those people were.

I think we owe it to Canadians in general to set up a public inquiry into this incident to finally determine what exactly instigated this incident at Oka. We know that it was related to the land. They then move on to some other so-called inherent rights, and things of that nature. In other words, I am saying that it was blown out of proportion to a certain extent. The violence then took over.

• (1600)

Both sides are to be blamed, but I cannot begin to start pointing my finger at whether it is the police, the Oka, or the warriors who should be blamed. I just do not know. I do not think the public is fully aware today of exactly what took place in terms of who should be blamed for this. If we just let this one skip by, I am afraid that the way it will be recorded in the history books will be misleading.

In order to correct this matter, a public inquiry is important. It has nothing to do with land claims, so do not focus on the land claim aspect of it. Look at it simply as a question of justice. Was justice served this summer? I do not know. I cannot say yes or no to that question because I do not know the answer.

I am not asking the Leader of the Government to answer me today, but I am asking him to look into it to see what can be done.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the question put by my honourable friend is similar to that asked some days ago by Senator Marchand, in respect of which I am awaiting a reply from Mr. Siddon. Meanwhile, I should point out that we do have in this Senate a Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs chaired by Senator Marchand. There is nothing to prevent that committee from taking up this question.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am happy to hear that from Senator Murray. I take that as an endorsement from him. We will certainly get started on this question. I try to be sensible in the way that we proceed in this place. I am sensitive of the dollars that we spend in this place because it is all public dollars. I felt that if the standing committee in the Commons was doing the job, then why should we duplicate it? That was why I asked that question.

Senator Barootes: Tell Senator Buckwold that, will you?

Senator Marchand: I am glad to have that reply from you, Senator Murray, because Senator Watt mentioned a lot of reasons why it is absolutely urgent and important that we have a proper public record of what went on at Oka. We have to put all the facts on the table.

Some ugly things occurred in relation to our people. There were undertones of racism, conflicts between the Mohawk and the French, conflicts between the Mohawk and the police, and a lot of other things that went on—such as, for example, accusations by the International Human Rights people, and so on. We would be doing all the people of Canada a great disservice if a complete public record were not made of what occurred at Oka this past summer.

As Senator Watt put it, we have to know the facts. We do not know all the facts concerning what occurred there. It is most important that we do know those facts.

ENERGY

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—PROPOSED SALE OF INTEREST BY GULF CANADA RESOURCES LTD.—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government dealing with Hibernia and Gulf Canada Resources Limited.

On November 2, 1990, this house passed Bill C-44, the act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto. The bill received Royal Assent on November 6, 1990.

On Novmeber 9, 1990, the Financial Post published a story based on information that came out on the previous day, November 8—two days after Bill C-44 received Royal Assent in the Senate. The article is datelined Ottawa and is written by Peter Morton. I should like to read a few brief quotes as a preamble to the question, so that I can get to the gist of it. The article states:

> Gulf Canada Resources Ltd. has put up to half of its 25% interest in the $5.2-billion Hibernia project on the auction block as a part of a strategy to dump expensive Canadian frontier energy projects. But Energy minister Jake Epp said yesterday it's too soon to demand that the potential buyer be Canadian. Epp has already come under criticism for handing over $2.7 billion in cash and loan guarantees when all the oil from Hibernia will head to U.S. markets.

I do not have to explain to the minister the arrangements of the consortium in any great detail. Canadian interests, Petro-Canada and Gulf Canada Resources own 50 per cent; the other 50 per cent is owned by Mobil Oil Canada Limited and Chevron Canada Resources Limited. They respectively have 28.12 per cent and 21.88 per cent interest in the project. At present Petro-Canada, Mobil Oil and Chevron have refused to buy Gulf's stake in the project.

Apparently Gulf has entire liberty to dispose of its interest in the project for the simple reason that the field was discovered in 1979. Regulations stating that a 50 per cent minimum interest must remain under Canadian ownership apply only since 1982; so Gulf can dispense with that regulation.

Surely there is an obvious connection here between the passage of Bill C-44 on November 6 and the decision by Gulf Oil to put up 12.5 per cent of its interest on the block. The concern that we have as Canadians is that it is in Canada's interest that it retain 50 per cent of the control of that Hibernia Project. As the article states, the Energy Minister stated that "it's too soon to demand that the potential buyer be Canadian."

If it is too soon, at what point in time will the Canadian government step in to ensure that 50 per cent does in fact remain under Canadian control?

• (1610)

At what point? After the sale of Gulf's assets to a foreign-owned company? Before or the day after? When? That is what a lot of people would like to know at this stage.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall have to make inquiries. I have not seen the statement attributed to my colleague Mr. Epp, to which the honourable senator refers, and I can only undertake to bring in a report on the matter as soon as possible.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW BRUNSWICK SECTION—CONCLUSION OF GOVERNMENT STUDY—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: I know my colleagues have questions, but I would like to move to another matter. The other day I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there was any news with respect to the reconstruction of the Trans-Canada Highway in New Brunswick and whether or not the federal government would participate in that regard. The honourable leader responded that he had not heard the last part of my question because Senator Simard was talking to him, but that he had the general purport of my question. He said that no decision had been taken by his government in this respect.

Perhaps I had not made myself clear. My question was to find out if the study had been completed. If the study, which has been going on, as I understand it, for 18 months, has not been concluded, when will it be concluded? If it is, in fact, terminated, will the honourable leader agree to lay a copy of that study on the Table so we may have a look at it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The study in question was a national study, as I recall.

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Murray: I shall make inquiries, honourable senators.

Senator Corbin: Thank you.

PERSIAN GULF

CANADIAN HOSTAGES—ROLE OF CBC RADIO INTERNATIONAL—FINANCIAL CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the Gulf crisis that has arisen as a result of the unprovoked aggression of Iraq against Kuwait. I listened with interest to the Prime Minister's commitment in the media the other day to provide whatever resources are necessary in order to fully support Canadian armed personnel in the Gulf. Could the Prime Minister's commitment include an increase in the budget and resources available to CBC Radio International?

The Leader of the Government may not be aware that CBC Radio International's budget was slashed at the same time that the budget to the CBC was reduced in the past few years. Its resources are now sparse. At the same time, at an interesting point in our history, CBC Radio International is performing a magnificent duty. It provides an electronic lifeline to the Canadian hostages being held in Kuwait and Iraq. It is my understanding that Canadian families—both francophone and anglophone—have used CBC Radio International to send messages to their families and loved ones who are being held hostage there. It forms an important communication link to those people.

I query the government as to whether or not the broad and generous commitment by the Prime Minister to make whatever resources are available could include funds for CBC Radio International so that it could fulfil two functions: First, to maintain that electronic lifeline to Canadian hostages held both in Kuwait and Iraq; and, second, to provide a valuable communications link to dissidents in Iraq and the resistance in Kuwait, so that those forces understand that we in Canada are prepared to assist them with every appropriate measure.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, at a time of considerable budgetary pressures, I can give no undertaking that the resources available to Radio Canada International would be increased. Indeed, I cannot give an undertaking that they will escape the knife when CBC and the government generally review their expenditure programs.

Second, while I cannot comment on the role my friend attributes to Radio Canada International in supporting dissidents in Kuwait or Iraq, insofar as the families of Canadians still in Iraq and Kuwait are concerned, we do have a consular officer who is dedicated to maintaining a fulltime liaison between Canadians in Iraq and Kuwait and their families here. He calls those people in Canada almost every day and returns their calls immediately to save them the cost of long-distance tolls. So we are in continuing contact with those people on a personal basis.

Senator Grafstein: In no way, shape or form am I diminishing the role of the consular forces in Kuwait, who served heroically until they withdrew and who certainly continue to provide magnificent service protecting Canadian interests and Canadian families in Iraq itself.

My point to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is that the Prime Minister made a sweeping and generous statement when he advised that economic restraints on the government would in no way, shape or form diminish the resources that would be made available to any of those objects that required support pursuant to events in the Gulf. I therefore assumed that this area, which needs minimal budgetary increases to perform a magnificent job, could be one of the objects of that generous gesture the Prime Minister made the other day. I think it is an important policy that democracies try to support the free-flow of information, particularly in Iraq where the media is controlled and its public does not have access to the wonderful discourse from the public media that we are subject to daily. I would ask the Leader of the Government to take that matter up with the government and examine this suggestion to see if it has any merit. I believe it does.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I take the honourable senator's question as representation.

AGRICULTURE

MEAT INSPECTION AT CANADA-U.S. BORDER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that arises from a speech given by the Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister on October 13 to the Federation of Canadian Farm Writers. This has to do with meat inspection at the Canada-U.S. border. It is one of the "good news" items Mr. Mazankowski delivered. He said:

> While we haven't resolved the issue completely, the progress that we're making with respect to the U.S. border inspection on meat is encouraging. Here you have a classic situation where administration is fully committed and wants to harmonize the meat inspection systems of Canada and the United States, based on equivalency. There's no question about their commitment. They've got to go through the regulatory process that has been made somewhat complex, I suppose, by U.S. elections and by people that are concerned about the impact of such a move.

This is a story I have been following for some time and about which I have been meaning to ask, Senator Murray. It did not seem to go away. Perhaps this is an appropriate time for it, in light of the Deputy Prime Minister's recent statement.

By way of background, this story first came to my attention while reading the Montana Farmer-Stockman in the spring of this year. It is a brief quote:

> Bill Lehman, Sweetgrass, a 26-year veteran of federal meat inspection, calls the USDA policies toward reinspection of meat imported from Canada "intolerable and potentially dangerous".

● (1620)

> Lehman recently "blew the whistle" and released documentation of cases where the USDA-Food Safety Inspection Service knowingly allowed unwholesome and contaminated meat to enter meat distribution channels in the U.S.

To bring it up to date, another story from the agriculture clipping service came to my attention. This story was in the St. John's Evening Telegram, and I should like to quote from it:

> Canadian and U.S. agriculture officials have criticized the inspector . . .

This is referring to Dr. Lehman,

> . . . as an overzealous nitpicker who goes out of his way to find reasons to reject Canadian products.
> But a review of the federal meat inspectors' procedures by the state of Montana found that he is doing "a fair and competent job of . . . inspecting meat products coming in from Canada."

Elsewhere in the story it says:

> Listening to some U.S. senators in recent weeks, you could get the impression that Canadians are willing to put up with putrid meat on their plates.
> An attack on Canadian meat inspection standards that began last spring has escalated in recent weeks as senators from midwestern states raised fears that a trade deal earlier this year could allow tainted Canadian meat to flood into American supermarkets.
> "The level of public concern over this proposal has risen to a boil," said Senator Max Baucus, a Democrat from Montana.
> The senators are ringing alarm bells about the quality of Canadian meat in an attempt to force the U.S. Department of Agriculture Officials to abandon an open border with Canada for meat imports.

This is part and parcel of the harmonization that is to occur under the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. It has been made an unresolved issue and is typical of ways of circumventing agreements such as that agreement, or any trade agreement, and imposing barriers to the movement of a product.

The implication is that either the Canadian meat inspection system is bad and we are eating bad products, or Dr. Lehman is single-handedly raising a non-tariff barrier to trade.

My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Could he bring us up-to-date on the most recent statement that I have, which was about a month ago, from the Minister of Agriculture?

THE HONOURABLE JACQUES FLYNN, P.C.

PRESENCE ON PARLIAMENT HILL—CAPACITY AND PAYMENT—FURTHER INFORMATION REQUESTED

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on a question I put to Senator Doody on November 7, 1990 respecting our former colleague, Senator Jacques Flynn. He has told some of us that he is here to watch the Liberal senators for the duration of the GST debate.

I had asked Senator Doody if Senator Flynn was here on a retainer basis. To our knowledge, he has spent quite a lot of time here, and he is here again this week. Is he being paid out of Senator Murray's personal research fund? Do the funds come out of Privy Council? Is he here on a voluntary basis and receiving no pay? Is he being paid by the Prime Minister's Office? If he is being paid, who is paying him?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my former chief, Senator Flynn, is here partly because of his interest in what is happening in Parliament and, in particular, the Senate; and partly, I take it, on personal business.

I have taken the occasion to consult him on a professional basis. To the extent that I have done so, or may do so in the future, it would certainly be my intention to ask him to submit an account for those services. However, I have not discussed any contract with him, nor has any payment been made to him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): When you say "I" do you mean as Leader of the Government, which would mean he would be paid out of Senate funds?

Senator Murray: Very definitely.

PERSIAN GULF

CANADIAN CONTINGENT—ADDITIONAL GROUND FORCES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the cabinet has decided to send ground forces to the Persian Gulf area to strengthen the Canadian contingent and help the keeping of security, where segments of the Canadian navy and air force are already present?

PROTECTION AGAINST NERVE GAS—TESTING OF ANTIDOTE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: My supplementary question is this: Can the Leader of the Government assure us that the Canadian armed forces present in the Persian Gulf are adequately equipped to protect themselves against any nerve gas attack by Iraq?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the best information that I have from competent military officers in charge of Canadians who are there is that they are more than adequately equipped for all eventualities.

Senator Haidasz: The Leader of the Government in the Senate is no doubt aware that the Department of National Defence has been conducting controversial tests of a nerve gas antidote. A worker in that department resigned because he considered those tests to be unethical. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is a member of the cabinet, tell us whether the federal government has instructed the Department of National Defence to either stop this unethical testing or change its policy somewhat in order to make it appear ethical?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is using some strong adjectives in his question. Without accepting the validity of his description, I shall inquire of the appropriate department whether there is something that I can report on that matter to the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: Will the Leader of the Government, during his inquiries, obtain the consent form which the human guinea pigs have apparently signed and have been paid over $1,000 in order to be the victims of this nerve gas antidote? Can he tell us if a new consent form for such tests to human guinea pigs will contain the statement that this nerve gas antidote can possibly cause cancer in a human being?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, without accepting for a moment the rhetoric that the honourable senator has injected into his question, if it was a question, I will draw his intervention to the attention of the appropriate colleagues and bring in any appropriate report.

● (1630)

Senator Haidasz: I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for his cooperation.

[Senator Murray.]

THE ECONOMY

AGRICULTURAL MARKETING BOARDS—COST OF INEFFICIENCY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a final question today for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday, we heard that agricultural marketing boards had cost Canadian consumers millions of dollars, which all went to support an inefficient system. This is not my opinion but the opinion of the Consumers' Association of Canada. The association says that the marketing boards system should be completely revamped.

My question is this: does the government agree with this opinion and does it intend to launch another study on the so-called problems raised by the association? Every year, for longer than I can remember, they have been saying that marketing boards should be abolished.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, in a word, the answer is no. At the talks in Geneva, we are trying to have article 11 of this treaty clarified or reinforced. We have made a clear commitment to maintain our supply management system in the agricultural sector.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to questions. I believe that the Leader of the Government previously read into the record answers to two questions asked by Senator Olson on November 6 and November 8.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENDED MATERNITY BENEFITS—DATE OF AVAILABILITY TO WORKING WOMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Haidasz on October 23, 1990 regarding Unemployment Insurance—extended maternity benefits—date of availability to working women—government position.

(The answer follows:)

> Senator Haidasz has asked how the parent(s) of a child born before November 18, 1990, might be able to receive the new parental benefits provided for in Bill C-21 and due to come into effect on that date.
> In many cases, eligibility is simply impossible for persons whose child was born while Liberal Senators delayed passage of Bill C-21. Tens of thousands of new parents across Canada will, therefore, not benefit from provisions the House of Commons approved in November, 1989.
> As the Minister of Employment and Immigration stated in reply to a question concerning retroactivity raised in the House of Commons on November 1, 1990, the Government is not in a position too make these benefits available retroactively.

In some cases, however, a parent whose child is born before November 18, 1990 may be entitled to receive the new parental benefits. Such eligibility is not an example of retroactivity; rather, it results from the transitional provisions of Bill C-21 as they have been stated since the Bill was tabled in the House of Commons in June, 1989.

It should be noted, too, that—eligibility notwithstanding—one's ability to leave work to receive parental benefits will depend on the terms of one's contract or collective agreement and/or the Labour Code provisions governing the workplace. In the example to follow, such ability is assumed.

Let us take, then, the case of a young couple, Stanley and Natalie: there are three typical situations in which they could qualify for parental benefits if the child is born before November 18, 1990.

(1) The child is born before November 18, 1990, but he claim is filed only on or after November 18, 1990.

In this case the mother would be entitled to the 10 week parental benefits, but might lose some weeks of maternity benefits, which are only payable during a "window" open from 8 weeks before the anticipated week of birth or actual birth, until the later of 17 weeks after the anticipated week of birth or actual birth.*

eg: If Natalie gives birth on November 1, 1990, and claims only on November 18, 1990 she would be entitled to 13 weeks of maternity benefits and 10 weeks of parental benefits.

* The maternity benefits window can be extended for "baby" hospitalization.

(2) The child is born before November 18, 1990 and the claim is filed before November 18, 1990.

In this case the mother can receive the 15 weeks of maternity, benefits already available, return to work for at least 20 insurable weeks, and then file a new claim for the 10 weeks of parental benefits, as long as this claim falls within the 52 week period following the arrival of the child at home.

eg: Natalie gives birth on March 20, 1990. she is on maternity leave for 15 weeks and goes back to work on July 2, 1990. Natalie takes more leave (or is laid off) 22 weeks later on November 20, 1990. If she files a new UI claim, now under the new rules, she would be entitled to receive 10 weeks of parental benefits.

If the mother files a claim for maternity benefits before November 18, 1990 and then decides that it is better to claim on or after that date, she can cancel her claim if no cheque has been issued. In accord with a Federal Court decision on this subject, even if a person has not received the first cheque, if the cheque has been produced by the Department it will be considered as having been issued.

eg: Natalie gives birth on November 1, 1990. She claims on November 2, 1990 but, then deciding that she should wait until November 18, 1990, she quickly cancels her claim. If no cheque has been issued, Natalie can claim on November 18 and will then qualify for 13 weeks of maternity benefits and 10 weeks of parental benefits.

(3) The child is born before November 18, 1990 and the father claims parental benefits.

Even if the mother does not receive parental benefits (she does not qualify or she does not want to claim), the father, if he meets the usual qualifying conditions, can receive 10 weeks of parental benefits as long as he makes his claim on or after November 18, 1990.

eg: Natalie gives birth on March 20, 1990, completes her maternity claim and returns to work. Her husband Stanley claims his parental benefits on November 18, 1990. If Stanley has 20 weeks of insurable work, he would qualify for the parental benefits.

eg: Natalie gives birth on March 29, 1990. She has been self-employed all year, and for that reason does not qualify for unemployment insurance benefits. Her husband Stanley, however, has been working as an employee in a firm and qualifies for unemployment insurance. Stanley therefore applies for parental benefits on November 18, 1990 and receives the full 10 weeks.

It is also possible for parents to share the 10 weeks between them, and in view of the complex nature of the Unemployment Insurance Act and Regulations, any person seeking to draw parental benefits would be best advised to contact a local Canada Employment Centre for official advice concerning his or her eligibility.

To conclude, honourable senators, I remind you again that even though these cases may cover many Canadian families, they do not represent the situation that many other Canadian families find themselves in. There are thousands of Canadians who cannot qualify for parental benefits because of the delay in passing Bill C-21, and we should be mindful of this fact.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

JOINT CANADA-EEC DECLARATION OF SHARED PRINCIPLES—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PROPOSED DRAFT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 24, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein, regarding Joint Canada—EEC declaration of Shared Principles—Request for Tabling of Proposed Draft.

(The answer follows:)

The idea for a TransAtlantic Declaration originated with German Foreign Minister Genscher during his visits to Ottawa and Washington in April, 1990. The Italian EC Presidency has been working on this idea which has now evolved into proposals for two declarations on relations between Canada and the EC and the United States and the EC.

This approach would reflect the specific nature of the history of relations between Canada and the EC, which include the framework agreement of 1976 and the agreement on political consultation of 1988, and those between the USA and the EC.

The aim of the declaration is to re-affirm the principles that serve as a basis for relations between Canada and the EC, and would associate us in dealing with common challenges in the future.

The key consideration for us is that the TransAtlantic co-operation developed successfully over the past forty-five years will continue in light of the changes that have occurred over the past year, in Europe in particular, and those likely to come out of the European integration process now under way.

As for the tabling of the proposed draft, it is a matter of standard practice not to publish a document until the text is agreed upon.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Petitions:

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise at this time to perform an ancient duty of members of the British Parliament and the Canadian Parliament since 1867, which is, to present a petition signed by Canadian citizens who oppose the GST legislation. The petition I have in my hand consists of 18 pages with the signatures and addresses of Canadian citizens who say that they humbly pray and call upon the Senate to prevail upon the Government of Canada to stop the introduction of the proposed goods and services tax.

These concerned Canadian citizens would like us to petition the government for redress. That is the point of the amendments that we on this side, the Liberal senators, have been presenting in this chamber for the past few days in order to bring relief to Canadian citizens who are already overtaxed, particularly those citizens living in Ontario.

Honourable senators, I repeat that the Canadian taxpayer is overtaxed. He cannot sustain paying more taxes. The Canadian worker and taxpayer in Ontario, and indeed across Canada, has to work seven months in order to pay his taxes. That, honourable senators, is immoral.

I see that one of our colleagues, Senator Barootes, an eminent physician and prominent urologist from the city of Regina, Saskatchewan, is sitting in the chamber this afternoon. I hope he is listening to what I have to say. As a former member of the executive of the Canadian Medical Association, I know that Senator Barootes has at heart the welfare of the practising physician in Canada. He will recall that the Canadian Medical Association, of which he was a member, came to Ottawa to present a brief before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, requesting the removal of the discrimination in the GST legislation, Bill C-62, which is going to cost practising physicians in Canada, according to their brief, anywhere from $3,000 to $20,000 per year.

The Canadian Medical Association also estimates that Bill C-62 in its current form will cost Canadian physicians in excess of $100 million per year.

During debate on this amendment, we on this side would like to hear Senator Barootes and Senator Keon, in particular, state their views. If they are gagged by their Leader or by the Prime Minister, at least I hope they will have the decency either to vote with us on this amendment or to abstain from voting.

Last evening Senator Olson made a good speech on the amendment under discussion, which also seeks relief from the GST discriminatory legislation for people like dietiticians, who are important allied health care workers, providing advice to doctors' patients in order either to treat their condition or to prevent further illness. It also involves certain physiotherapists, massage therapists, social workers, psychotherapists and psychoanalysts.

● (1640)

Returning to this petition, the petitioner is Patty Piggott from Lakefield. Lakefield, as the honourable senators may know, is in central Ontario in an area between Peterborough and the Madawaska Valley, where the first permanent immigrants from Poland to Canada settled. They began settling in 1859, 8 years before Confederation. They worked mostly in the fields and in the lumber industry.

Many of these settlers, if not all, came from a northern province of Poland called Kashube. That is why these Canadian citizens of Polish origin are very often referred to as "Kashubs". Many of their descendants live and work in Ontario, especially in Ottawa where many of them work for the various government departments.

Senator Frith: Who is it who are called "Kashubs"?

Senator Haidasz: The first Polish permanent settlers who settled in the Madawaska Valley.

Senator Frith: Why are they called that?

Senator Haidasz: They are called "Kashubs" because they came from a northern province of Poland which borders on the Baltic Sea, called Kashube, a Kashubian territory of Poland.

During the occupation of Poland from 1772 until 1918, many of these Kashubs were under the occupation of the Prussians and many of them spoke German. These Kashubs have a dialect of their own which they have preserved to this very day. All the church services in the Madawaska Valley that are frequented by the Kashubs are conducted in the Kashube dialect. I attended one of these services many years ago. Although I am considered to be fluent in Polish, I could not understand everything that was spoken in the Kashube dialect. Should you wish to know more about the Kashubs, Professor Isabella Jost, a former public servant in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is a geographer, demographer and cartographer, wrote her doctoral thesis about this settlement of the Kashubs in the Madawaska Valley. Professor Jost's work is published and available for all those who are interested in these people from Poland who settled in the Madawaska Valley.

The second name on this petition is Maria Tryba. I presume she is one of the Kashubs. That is a Polish name. Don't confuse it with "ryba", which means "fish".

(Names of signatories read)

One of the signatories is from Warsaw, Ontario. I presume one of the Kashubs who bought some land in that area named it after Warsaw, the capital city of Poland.

(Names of signatories read)

Another signatory has an Irish name. There are many Irish people living in that area. One of the most prominent Irish Canadians from that area was a member of the House of Commons, Arthur Maloney, whose father, Dr. Maloney, tended to many Kashubs in the Madawaska Valley.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1650)

I have here the name Roseanne Richard. Apparently she was spending some time in the Peterborough area because her address is not Peterborough but 20 Cummings Street, Toronto, Ontario. May I say that many people in Toronto have summer cottages or homes in that area. It is a very good fishing area. In fact, my nephew has a summer and a hunting cottage in that area.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is the name Kathie Malone.

Senator Perrault: A good Irish name. Quite a few Irish names.

Senator Haidasz: Beautiful, beautiful names.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is the name Van Leeuwen. That is a beautiful Dutch name.

(Names of signatories read)

That is another page for Hansard. Thank you. Here are the names on the third page:

(Names of signatories read)

Here is another page, for Hansard, too, eventually.

(Names of signatories read)

Here is the name George Brown. That is a familiar name, at least to Liberals—the great Liberal leader of Ontario and, I think, the founder of the Globe and Mail empire.

Senator Perrault: Did he return to sign the petition?

Senator Gigantès: The Globe.

Senator Haidasz: The Globe. Thank you, senator. He could have been the Prime Minister of Canada had it not been for some arguments.

Senator Gigantès: Thank God we Liberals are Macdonald Liberals and the Tories are Brown Tories.

Senator Perrault: Black Tories.

Senator Haidasz: Oh, is that what happened.

(Names of signatories read)

We have a petitioner from Lindsay, Ontario.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear, for Lindsay!

Senator Haidasz: Of course, Lindsay was the residence of Leslie Frost, one of the most prominent and popular premiers of Ontario. Even though he was of Conservative persuasion, he was liked by many Liberals.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1700)

Lisa Coyne is the next name. I wonder if that is a descendant or the wife of Mr. Coyne, the former Bank of Canada Chairman. She gives her address as R.R.7, Peterborough, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

Next is Bill Templeton from Peterborough. Perhaps we can hear from Senator Frith. He knows the Templetons. He knows Charles Templeton. Does he know whether any of his children or relatives live in Peterborough?

Senator Frith: I do not know.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you. Next is Ann Coomes from Peterborough, Ontario.

An Hon. Senator: Anne Cools?

Senator Haidasz: No, Coomes.

(Names of signatories read)

Next is Kathleen Kelly. Do you hear that?

Senator Stanbury: How is it spelled?

Senator Haidasz: K-e-l-l-y, 400 Downie Street, Peterborough.

An Hon. Senator: There is hope for the Kellys yet!

Senator Haidasz: Next is Eva Thernbert.

(Names of signatories read)

The following petition begins with the name of George Tinkin, R.R. 2, Bracebridge, Ontario. That is a beautiful area in the Muskoka Lakes. Next is D. Niekolic, 50 Meadow Heights Drive, Bracebridge, Ontario. Dr. Drynan, Box 2460, Bracebridge, Ontario, is one of the doctors who has been discriminated by the GST with the way that this legislation treats doctors. It is unfair.

I hope that at least the doctors on the other side will vote with us on this amendment in order—

Senator Simard: Do not hold your breath!

Senator Haidasz: —to eliminate the discrimination that is proposed in Bill C-62. I hope that Dr. David is one of them.

Senator David: Is that a forthcoming amendment?

Senator Haidasz: Next is Mike Marin, Box 402, Bracebridge, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

Next is Pat McMullen, Port Carling, Ontario. I am sure that Senator Kelly knows a lot about Port Carling, the playground of many people from Toronto. Next is Mike Davies from Bracebridge, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

The next page begins with the signature of M. D. Ward from R.R. 1, Peterborough, Ontario.

(Names of signatories read)

I will yield to any other honourable colleague who wishes to continue reading petitions.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, first, I know that I speak on behalf of all honourable senators in thanking Senator Haidasz for the fascinating and interesting information—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: You do not speak for all honourable senators!

Senator Perrault: —that he has brought to us this afternoon.

Senator Simard: Speak for yourself!

Senator Perrault: It is heartening to know how vigorous democracy is in this country, despite the efforts of certain members on the government side.

● (1710)

Honourable senators, I rise today to present a petition that originated from one of our leading schools in the province of British Columbia. It is known as the Sands School, located at 8134-111B Street, Delta, British Columbia. It is good to see young people who are not disenchanted with the political process, but who are becoming involved in it. They have studied the GST bill. They are concerned about how the bill will affect their future, and they have asked me to read their statement and their names to the Senate. This is how it reads:

> We, the students of Sands Jr. Secondary would like to express to the Senate our views and feelings of said GST. We would like to state that through our views Mr. Mulroney has committed an unconstitutional act. We feel that by placing the GST on the back of the working class it not only limits us, it prevents us from attaining a financially stable adulthood.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, may I please raise a point of order.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: This is an explanation about the reason for the petition.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): This is some sort of routine. This is what is called your procedural "shtick". There is something more to this, because every time he gets up, he makes a comment; he sits down, and then does it again.

Senator Simard: You would know about routine, Senator Frith.

Senator Kelly: May I give a brief explanation of the reason I am doing this. When I first came to this chamber, I admired Senator Frith—as I still do—because he would always stand up and eloquently interpret the rules. I thought that if some day I could do that in that fashion, I would be forever proud. I know that I am nowhere near that, but this is part of my practice.

Senator Frith: You do this every time. There is something more to this. This is a plot.

Senator Kelly: I would draw the attention of honourable senators to page 57 of our red book.

Senator Perrault: I have it memorized and so do you.

Senator Kelly: It has to do with Presentation of Petitions. It begins:

> A Senator presenting a public petition makes a brief statement . . .

But it clearly says:

> . . . the petition itself is not read.

You make a brief summary of what the petition says, but you do not read it.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Precisely. Am I to tell these students at the Sands School in Delta, British Columbia that when I attempted to bring their views to the attention of the Senate, I was muzzled by the Conservative majority? Do you want that message to go out to the schools? Do you want the students to be told that their views could not be brought to the Senate because of your attitude? Surely, senator, you cannot possibly support that. It is a short explanation:

> We think he is abusing his powers as Prime Minister, when he can legally write off a $31 million debt from Zimbabwe and yet claim we don't have enough money to keep the country functioning. "Charity begins at home". To force the passing of the GST he has added new members to the Senate, just like a crooked dealer would stack a deck. This makes it seem like it is no longer a democracy but a dictatorship. Our ancestors did not fight against dictators in "Two World Wars" only to be betrayed and to have their children's future sabotaged by their own Prime Minister.

Those are the names from the school. Senator Turner has received petitions from his area, and I shall now yield to him. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Di Nino: Do you agree with the opinion expressed in the letter that you read a moment ago regarding the generous offer of our government towards the country of Zimbabwe?

Senator Perrault: Our foreign aid program is a good one. Generally, it is beyond serious criticism. I do believe that, like all of our spending commitments at the present time, we should review each one of them to ensure that the Canadian interest is being protected in the process.

There was an article in the Ottawa Citizen a few weeks ago which said that we are giving $125 million a year to a country overseas where the dictator has imprisoned or murdered all of the opposition and has five villas in Europe. The Ottawa Citizen quite properly asked the question: Is this type of foreign aid being misdirected? Like any other program, we should review our spending patterns to ensure that the essential Canadian interest is being protected.

Senator Di Nino: Thank you, honourable senator. The specific question I referred to is the forgiveness of the $31 million debt of Zimbabwe. Is that particular act by our government one that you approve of, or do you agree with the opinion expressed in the letter that it may be inappropriate?

Senator Perrault: I have not received the facts of the loan, nor what motivated it. The Department of External Affairs has not provided me with an explanation, unless the honourable senator has a copy of it. The students apparently have studied this and this is their view. Do honourable senators want me to change their view and to editorialize?

I am bringing this to the attention of the Senate as an expression of the students of one of the schools in British Columbia. They do not necessarily represent my views. I am in favour of foreign aid programs tied to the Canadian interest.

Senator Di Nino: I am grateful to the honourable senator for bringing forth the views of citizens across this country. However, he has not answered my question. Does he agree with the position taken by that group of young men and women and what I read to be a criticism of our government with an act that I feel is very generous and appropriate?

Senator Perrault: There may be perfectly legitimate grounds to forgive that debt. I have absolutely no documentation on the subject. If the honourable senator would provide me with the background of the loan, I would be glad to make a statement in the Senate at the appropriate time.

Throughout my time in Ottawa I have been supportive of Canada's foreign aid effort. Indeed, if anything, we have spent too small a percentage on certain programs.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from the people of London, Ontario and the County of Middlesex. This area is part of the Golden Horseshoe of southern Ontario. These residents are the heart and soul of the fruit-growing, farming and industrial areas of southwestern Ontario.

These residents request that the Senate reject Bill C-62 because it will tax magazines, books and newspapers, which has not been done since Confederation.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): For the box score today, honourable senators, 52 minus 8 would be 44, and the motion would then have carried.

Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I would like to offer congratulations to one of our colleagues whose voice of brass and leather lungs stay undiminished after 72 years on the planet. I refer to Senator Barootes.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I say a few words on the proceedings for the rest of the week. There are eight amendments which under our provisional orders are the prerogative of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to move. We have had moved, and have voted on, six of them. We are told that amendment number 7 will not be moved until Monday.

● (1750)

Since the provisional rules allow for a recess on Thursday night, and since Friday would be a completely non-productive day, we have, in discussion, agreed that it would be best if we suspended the sitting today and returned at 2 o'clock on Monday, November 19.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the Senate suspended until 2 o'clock in the afternoon on Monday next, November 19.

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I have the pleasure, on behalf of Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator Adams, to move:

That Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make special provision for the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec and Labrador by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:

"YUKON, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES, NORTHERN QUEBEC AND LABRADOR

1. In this Part,

"Labrador" means that part of Labrador within the Province of Newfoundland;

"Northern Quebec" means the part of Quebec that is north of the 55th parallel of north latitude.

2. A supply of any goods, service or property made in the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador.

3. A supply of any goods, service or property made to a resident of the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador for use or consumption primarily in the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador.

4. A supply of service of transportation that commences or terminates in the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador."

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Watt, for the Honourable Senator MacEachen P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Adams, that Bill C-62 be not now read the third time—

An Hon. Senator: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Explain!

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, before I speak on the motion, I should like first to show my appreciation to, as well as introduce, a large delegation here in our galleries of people from the Great North, from the Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and Labrador. We all know how expensive it is to travel from the north down to central Canada.

Excuse me, once more, honourable senators, for I wish to speak a few words in Inuktitut for the benefit of the people who are gathered here today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Watt spoke in Inuktitut]

I would like to translate that, honourable senators. I appreciate the appearance here today of people from the different parts of the north, including the Northwest Territories, Labrador and northern Quebec. I appreciate the fact that they have come to Ottawa. As I said before, we all know that it costs a great deal of money to come down to central Canada from the north. Nevertheless, these people feel that their livelihood will be tremendously affected by the proposed legislation, Bill C-62.

Why are they here? They are here because they want the government, which is responsible for the promotion of this legislation, to understand that it will not advance either the people of the north, whether Aboriginal or otherwise, or the north itself.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Watt spoke in Inuktitut]

Honourable senators, every now and again during my presentation I will say a few words in Inuktitut. I wish the Senate to know that northerners are fed up with the high cost of living. They have had it with the lack of economic opportunity in their regions. They are tired of an unemployment rate that is often five, six and even seven times higher than the national average. Most of all, they do not want to hear about a tax scheme that will force them to pay more than a resident of southern Canada has to pay for the same goods and services.

If honourable senators do not believe me, they should glance up at our visitors' galleries to see those Inuit and other northerners who have travelled thousands of miles just to be here today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Watt: Earlier, honourable senators could have seen the first protest in the Parliament Buildings ever to be organized by Inuit. Honourable senators have probably never seen such a large number of Inuit in Ottawa. They have come to express their point of view on how this legislation will affect them. For the rest of the day and tomorrow parliamentarians from all parts of Canada will hear a good deal about our concerns.

● (1410)

What does all this mean? It means that northerners are no longer willing to accept situations that deny them the hope of economic prosperity for their homeland. Northerners are Canadians in the fullest sense of the word, and Canadians from every region of the country have the right to look forward to real economic growth, reasonable employment prospects, and the opportunity to build viable and productive businesses. However, there appear to be unwritten rules that say that things are somewhat different for the people of the north. We are often left with the impression that northerners do not have the right to hope for the same kind of economic prosperity as other Canadians. Instead, there is an attitude which suggests that shockingly high unemployment and lack of business opportunities are both normal and acceptable for the north. By the presence of their representatives in Ottawa today, northerners are putting Canada on notice that such an attitude towards the north will no longer be tolerated.

By our very nature, northerners are tough and adaptable people. However, an economic and tax structure which continually suppresses prospects for a productive future is beginning to take its toll on our resourcefulness. It is for this reason that the proposed goods and services tax is striking a raw nerve for many residents in Canada's northern region.

As I indicated on previous occasions, there can be no doubt that the GST will place an unfair burden on the north. This was made clear by the findings of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which reported the following:

> . . . residents of remote regions will pay more consumption tax than residents of central Canada for the same goods and services.

The report goes on to explain how the GST system will provide greater benefits to families living in the south than to those living in the north. It says as an example, that an income of $24,000 in Iqaluit does not provide the same standard of living as a similar income in Ottawa. The report concluded:

> . . . a family in central Canada with this income is entitled to full GST credits, but a family in the north with the same standard of living would not receive full benefits because its nominal income has to be higher to offset the higher cost of living.

This is truly incredible. It means that the southern family who enjoys the advantage of a lower cost of living will pay less tax than the northern family and will receive greater benefit under the GST.

Unfortunately the opposite is also true. Inuit and other northern families, who must endure an extremely high cost of living will have to pay more in taxes and will receive fewer benefits under the GST compared with southern Canadians.

It is easy to demonstrate how the GST will be unfair for the people of the north. A consumer requiring a service that costs $100 in a southern centre will pay the GST of $7. I would like Senator Murray to listen to this very carefully. In the north, the lack of competition and high markups, along with the high cost of transportation, equipment and labour, means that the same service may cost as much as $200. In other words, a northern consumer will pay GST of $14 on a service that will generate a GST of $7 in Southern Canada. Where is the justice? Where is the fairness? Under this example, the GST will push up the cost of living by $7 in the south and $14 in the north. What can be said about such a situation? Ideally we would expect measures to help reduce the high cost of living in the north. At the very least we would expect a tax that would not force northerners to pay more tax than southerners. Instead, the GST will actually make northerners pay more tax than the rest of Canada for the same goods and services.

What are we to think about such a situation? Does it mean that the northern economy is being written off as hopeless? Does it mean that the high cost of living in the north will be forever spiralling upward out of control? Does it mean that we have no hope for economic prosperity, reasonable employment prospects, or the chance to build productive businesses in our homeland?

These are important questions about our future. Without hope, people have no motive to help themselves, to improve their economic situation, to create their own job opportunities, and to establish viable northern businesses.

This is what angers us about the GST. The fact is that it prevents us from having any hope for our future. Inuit and other northerners are working hard to make some headway in developing our economy and reducing unemployment. However, measures like the GST give us the impression that we are fighting a hopeless battle. It seems that northern economic development often means being forced to take two steps backwards for every step forward.

Examples of our desire to help ourselves can be found in the actions and plans of many northern institutions. I am, of course, most familiar with the efforts of the Inuit-owned Makivik Corporation of Nunavik in Northern Quebec. In recent years Makivik has pursued a number of objectives for the development of the Nunavik economy. They were described in Makivik's 1988 statement to its membership, which reads in part:

> Nunavik's tourism potential has been emphasized in a number of economic development strategies. A well-developed tourism industry can benefit large businesses, such as hotels and the regional airline. A tourism industry may also benefit the individual entrepreneur who sells handicrafts, offers guided tours, operates a restaurant or local taxi service.

● (1420)

It goes on to state:

> Nunavik's economic development will require our region to produce and export its own products. In this regard, commercialization of our wildlife resources may offer significant prospects for success. I made repeated attempts over the past year to open discussions with Quebec on how we may begin to commercialize certain animal species.

These statements reflect a degree of optimism. They reflect the fact that the Inuit of Nunavik are ready to help themselves to take action to build their economy and their future.

Regrettably, this optimism did not carry through to Makivik's 1989 report to its membership. In fact, the tone of the message had changed considerably. It stated:

> Economic development remains an important priority. Unfortunately, it seems that government decisions will be responsible for taking money out of our northern economy as fast as we can earn it. I am referring to the proposed goods and services tax and the government's recent decision to cut subsidies to Canada Post which offset the high cost of transporting essential goods to the north.

It is obvious that the mere prospect of the GST is already robbing the north of the optimism required to get on with the job of developing our economies.

It is indeed ironic that a few short years ago Makivik was attempting to pursue the exact opposite of what is being proposed with the GST. At that time Makivik opened discussions with Quebec on the need to stimulate the economy of the province's northern region through selected tax breaks. Makivik's 1988 Annual Report stated:

> We are suggesting that a variety of personal and business taxes should be reduced or eliminated for a ten to twenty year period. The Quebec government must recognize that Nunavik's economy must first be allowed to grow before it can be expected to contribute any significant tax revenue.

It is easy to see why Makivik and other northern institutions are discouraged with the GST. Rather than receiving the tax breaks needed to develop our economies, we are faced with a situation where northerners will pay more tax than southerners for the same goods and services.

Honourable senators, I wish now to give a brief description of the proposed amendment to the bill that is presently before us. In its most general terms, the amendment would zero-rate goods and services relating to Canada's northern regions. In other words, no GST would be charged on those goods and services. The amendment would apply to all of Canada's northern regions, including Labrador and northern Quebec as well as the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

The specific effect of the amendment would be that no GST would be paid on goods and services produced in Canada's northern regions or on goods and services to be used in Canada's northern regions. Moreover, there would be no GST on transportation services to and from Canada's northern regions.

It is important to provide an insight into why these goods and services are to be zero-rated rather than tax-exempt. As I have stated before, one of the main reasons the GST will have such a devastating impact on the north is because it will severely hinder our efforts to develop our economy. By zero-rating goods and services for the north, we are ensuring that businesses will be entitled to a refund of the GST they may have paid for goods and services destined for the north. That refund would clearly stimulate economic growth and would ensure that the GST is not hidden in the price of northern services and goods.

By comparison, tax-exempt status would simply mean that companies doing business relating to northern goods and services would not be able to pass the GST on to the final consumer. But those businesses would still have to pay GST on goods and services they are using. If those busininesses are not entitled to a refund and cannot pass the GST on to the final consumer, they will recover the GST they have paid by raising the price of the goods and services supplied to the consumer.

The bottom line is that tax-exempt status for the north would simply mean that GST costs would be hidden in the goods and services being purchased. Zero-rating means that the north would truly benefit from not having to pay GST.

Honourable senators, I come back to the same point over and over again. The high cost of living in the north is very real, and the GST will only make a bad situation worse.

A Canadian Press report, which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on March 31 of this year, may help to give an understanding of the high cost of living in the north. The story was filed from Clyde River, a small Inuit settlement in the Northwest Territories. The article states:

> Amid the usual Friday night chatter at the Hudson's Bay store, there's a commotion at the refrigerator case.
> Two women are comparing cartons of eggs. The price on one is $4.90; on a fresher dozen it's $4.99.
> In January a carton of eggs cost $3.85. (The comparable price in Montreal is $1.68, in Edmonton $1.58.)
> "I just close my eyes when I go in there." says one resident of this tiny Baffin Island outpost, 425 kilometres north of the Arctic Circle. "I can't stand to look at the prices."

The Canadian Press report goes on to describe the situation of another resident of Clyde River. I again quote from the article which states:

> "Killiktee is only five feet tall, and she speaks quietly. But her soft, dark features harden as she talks about the cost of living in Clyde River and points to the entries in her chequebook.
> As a classroom assistant she takes home a relatively hefty salary of $1,500 a month. But nearly half of that goes to groceries for her family of four. The rest has to cover rent of $398, electricity, babysitting and clothing for the children.
> Killiktee's husband hunts for "country food" such as seal and caribou, which many Inuit prefer over imported beef or pork. But country food is no steal either. Gasoline for the snowmobile costs 62 cents a litre; a can of motor oil is $5.98. Then there's ammunition and other supplies for each trip.

● (1430)

> Among the Inuit, there's another expense: lending a hand to needy relatives. Killiktee recently paid a $38 power bill for her grandparents. Some of her neighbours pick up groceries regularly for their parents and in-laws. It's estimated that most government workers in the region share their paycheques with an average of 15 people.
> All Killiktee knows is that it's getting tougher and tougher to cover all the necessities.
> She hoists a two-kilogram bag of flour into her shopping cart after noting the price, $11.17.
> 'That's up $3 in the last year. We make bannock out of it, so it's a necessity for Inuit people,' she says, referring to the traditional biscuit-like bread of the North.
> The same bag of flour would cost $1.98 in Montreal or $2.99 in Edmonton.

This press report demonstrates that it is easy to document and examine the fact that prices are much higher in the north.

Senator Frith: What was the northern price again?

Senator Watt: The same bag of flour that costs $1.98 in Montreal or $2.99 in Edmonton costs $11.17 in the north.

Senator Cools: That's not possible!

Senator Fairbairn: It is even worse in Pelly Bay where the price is $12.06.

Senator Watt: That is just one example. There are a great many more items that cost five, six, or ten times the southern price. That is the reality. This is the message we are trying to get across to senators on the other side so that they will understand what we are faced with on a daily basis in the north.

Just to give you an illustration, in order to offset the high cost of living, often a single income will have to be shared by a number of people, at times not only by one household but by two or three households, due to the lack of economic opportunities. At the same time, those people have to spend a great deal of money in order to equip themselves to transport their food. I am talking about buying Skidoos. At one time we had dog teams. Dog teams were quite costly, too, but the dog teams were wiped out by the R.C.M.P. on the instruction of the Government of Canada because they were felt to be dangerous when they were loose. The dogs do not have the same capability to become a workhorse for the people. They have to be let loose in order to be in reasonable condition to do the work required of them. Dogs have now been replaced by Skidoos. In the north, one Skidoo can cost as much as $10,000. Canoes are also expensive. Only a few years ago, freighter canoes cost between $2,000 and $3,000. Today they cost between $4,000 and $6,000. Also, depending on the horsepower that is needed, because of the load you have to carry and the distance you have to go, you may have to spend another $6,000 or $7,000 for a motor to drive the canoe.

We are appealing to senators on the other side, and we give a clear message. What you are doing to us is very unfair, and you are not doing Canada a favour. When you do not do a favour to the north, you also do not do a favour to Canada. That is very wrong, and I hope it is the result of a misconception or misunderstanding. I believe this legislation was not thoroughly examined. Honourable senators opposite should feel guilty to let this bill go through without an amendment. Why is that, honourable senators? It is because you are, in a sense, turning a blind eye to Canada, which you are supposed to represent. People who live in the north need fair treatment. We are not asking for anything extraordinary; we are asking you to look deep within yourselves to see what you are doing to the people of the north.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, let me go on. This press report demonstrates that it is easy to document and examine the fact that prices are much higher in the north. How much higher? A recent research paper published by the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee indicated that, in relation to southern Canada, prices are 98 per cent higher in the Grise Fiord, 86 per cent higher in Sachs Harbour and 63 per cent higher Iqaluit. When we see those differences and we look at the geography of Canada, we wonder if this bill has been carefully examined. What are we doing to ourselves as a people? What are we doing to the country? Were these problems just examined from the perspective of central Canada by the politicians and law-makers, who now say that everything is the same and that this legislation is to be applied equally across the country?

Honourable senators, whether it is this government or the next, I think it is time that we took a good look at the geography of this country and at what we are doing to it. The people of the north have been watching from a distance and they know there is a great deal of mismanagement when it comes to making attempts to generate revenues for the north. That is not so difficult to understand. You do not have to be a genius to understand that what you are doing to the north does not make business sense because you are trying to take money from people who do not have anything to give. There are approximately 75,000 people living across the north, and, by putting them in a position where they do not have any more money in their pockets, you will not be doing a favour for Canada. As a matter of fact, if you leave them alone and give them a tax exemption, I am sure you would be doing both yourselves and the country a favour. In other words, you would be doing Canada a favour. That is the message we are giving you, and that is one of the reasons why the people from the north have said, "Enough is enough." They want to do what they can to show Canadians in general what is wrong, and especially the Senate, because this legislation is in the hands of the Senate. You should vote your own conscience, honourable senators—and particularly Senator Murray, because he is the government leader and also a minister of the government. This is a message for him. It is unfortunate that the Prime Minister is not in the country today while the northern people are making this presentation to Canada.

• (1440)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senator, will you permit a question.

Senator Watt: Yes.

Senator Stewart: You have made a special appeal to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if that is realistic, given the fact that he is a member of the cabinet which dreamed up this bill. Would it not be more realistic to make your appeal to the six independent senators whose votes could well be decisive on your amendment. Is it not on those independent senators you ought to rely for the success of the amendment you have put forward this afternoon?

Senator Watt: Honourable senator, I appreciate your question. I believe that it would be expedient for me to appeal to the independent senators. Unfortunately, at this point the independent senators do not have the opportunity to hear the points I am making. The Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Senator Barootes: Are any of the independent senators here at the present time?

Senator Hastings: He said it was unfortunate they were not here.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I think it is important to appeal to the Leader of the Government in the Senate because I know Senator Murray is a man of principle who will vote according to his principles. If he believes that the messages that are being related to him make sense, and he understands them correctly, as I am sure he does, he can encourage his fellow members to vote for this amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Watt: I will keep on trying, senator, even if I have to stand here all day and all night; but I do not wish to keep senators here around the clock. That is not what I am here for.

At times I do not understand the way we conduct our business. As Inuits from the north, we have a way of approaching our people and it does not matter who that person is, if we are appealing to him we will appeal in a sensitive way and not alienate that person. I am making that attempt here. I will not make an attempt to alienate senators opposite, because that is not what I am here for.

At times people wonder what I am. Am I a Liberal or Conservative? I am certainly not NDP. At times I have been pointed out as having much of the concservative in me. That is true. Normally I am more Conservative than a Conservative. Why then am I a Liberal? It is because I do not have a rigid view. In mordern society we have to be flexible in order to accommodate the changes that are taking place in the country. That is more important than anything else.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Watt: As I have travelled across the country, I have also heard a number of times the view expressed that liberalism is finished. I have also heard that conservatism is finished. I have often heard it said that a new forum is required in this country. But that is not the reality today. Let us wait for a few years, because we all know that the country is changing, hopefully for the better. However, if we keep getting the type of legislation that is before us today in the goods and services tax, I am afraid that before our children, and their children, have an opportunity to enjoy this country, the country as we know it may no longer exist.

Perhaps, because we have had it so good in this country, we are doing everything we can to destroy it. Many countries in the western world are modernizing and developing their economies and political structures in order to provide a better tomorrow. In Canada, whether it is the French, the English, the Aboriginal peoples, or other races, it seems that we are all doing whatever we can to destroy the country. Let us not do that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I would like to return to the central question in relation to the goods and services tax. The price of food also reveals something about the high cost of living in the north. The 1991 NWT data book informs us that food prices in the Baffin and Kitikmeot regions are more than twice as high as in Edmonton. In Leewatin they are approximately 1.9 times higher than in Edmonton. Figures for northern Quebec show that fresh products cost 64 per cent more than in southern areas, while heating oil is 78 per cent more. It makes one wonder how the people are able to be still alive; but I can understand that, and I can relate to it. We have lived through many more hardships in the past. There is no such thing as luxury. Yet, in the south, when one talks of skidoos, canoes and boats, one talks of things that are a luxury. Those items are tools to us in the north; they are not a luxury, they are survival. In the north, we do not have the time to enjoy ourselves as do people in the south. We only have time to keep ourselves alive.

Let us not forget that air transportation is often the only means of travelling and of shipping freight to and from the north. As a result, transportation costs are unbelievably high, especially when compared to the south where people have the choice of using roads, water, or rail transportation.

I will give honourable senators some examples of the high cost of travelling in the north. The figures I am using are based on a survey of airline prices on November 13, 1990. It costs $50 to travel 100 kilometres by air between Kuujjuaq and Salluit. If you are not familiar with those names, then I suggest you look at a map to know what I am talking about. I do not have a map with me so I cannot point to it.

● (1450)

It costs $36.36 to travel 100 kilometres by air between Kuujjuaq and Montreal. It costs $25 to travel 100 kilometres by air between Yellowknife and Edmonton. By comparison, in the south it costs only $16 to travel 100 kilometres by air between Toronto and Edmonton or between Montreal and Vancouver. Between Yellowknife and Edmonton it costs $25.

Those figures clearly demonstrate the high cost of living that we must endure in northern Canada.

And now I will draw your attention to some findings of a recent Makivik study on the potential impact of the GST on northern Quebec. It concludes that the GST is particularly unfair to Inuit families and businesses. The study bases its conclusion on the fact that Inuit families spend 93 per cent of their income on goods and services because of the high cost of living. Inuit have very little left over for savings, meaning that almost all of the money that comes in then goes out on expenses and is thus subject to the GST. Inuit must spend a large proportion of their income to make ends meet despite the fact that housing rents are subsidized. In other words, tax exempt status for rent provides little benefit to Inuit.

The study also highlights the fact that the GST is designed to foster capital investment. However, capital investment does little to benefit northern Quebec's economy. The study indicates that 83 cents of every dollar invested in northern Quebec is actually spent in the south. It is amazing.

Finally, the study concludes that the GST will do very little to foster economic development in northern Quebec. The GST means that services will be taxed for the first time, yet the service industry accounts for 80 per cent of northern Quebec's domestic product. From this point of view it is clear that the GST will only discourage economic development in many northern regions. This leads to a rather interesting question about the effectiveness of government programs and grants to support economic development in the north.

Over a year ago the government announced a $600 million program as part of the Canadian aboriginal economic development strategy. A small portion of that money was supposed to be used to foster economic growth in the north. Based on what we now know, it appears the GST will counteract any positive effects flowing from those development funds. It seems that what the government gives with one hand, it takes away with the other. That is not unusual for us because we have lived through that from the time we began having relations with southern Canada. It is not new to us, but nevertheless the message still has to get to you and you have to understand it.

[Senator Watt.]

Let us be fair, let us be just, in order for people to live in harmony in this country.

I would also like to relate a fact I learned while sponsoring hunting and fishing trips and enterprises of that nature in the north. I was most surprised to learn this summer that a good number of Canadians do not know that Inuit are taxpayers, just like everyone who sits in this room. Apparently, they all think that the Inuit do not pay tax, but that we only absorb from the system. That is not the case. Unlike the Indians, Inuit are full-fledged taxpayers just like everyone else in Canada. They are proud to be Canadian and that is one reason why they are proud to be taxpayers; but it has to be fair.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Watt: Ultimately the GST may mean that the government will have to spend a great deal more in development funds just to stay ahead of the damage the GST will be causing to the northern economy. None of this strikes me as a very efficient way of promoting economic development in our homeland. Regardless of how you examine the issue, there can be no escaping the fact that the GST will drain what little investment money exists to foster economic growth in the north. As I said before, this will rob northerners of their hope of becoming self-reliant. It is for this reason that I call on all senators to support the amendment now before us. I hope you will decide this matter with both your hearts and your minds.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Watt: Honourable senators, I want to elaborate further on my attempt to reach out to the people on the other side. I guess all of us at times admire and support our leaders, and protect our leaders. Also at times in our lives we have to come to realize that we have the right to make decisions for ourselves despite our leaders—especially if to do so is a benefit to your leader and for the survival of your leader. I think you, honourable senators, are at that stage today, especially regarding this northern issue, because I am going to keep coming back to haunt you, time and time again. I will do what I can to utilize the media to my full ability to get this message across: for once in our lifetime let us deal with the north in such a way as to move it towards a position of balance as between the north and the south.

At times I have heard of a north-south dialogue. I have never made sense out of that. What do people mean by "north-south dialogue"? You really have a problem there. There has been no north-south dialogue in Canada, because the people in the south do not understand what the north is all about and what it needs, or what the north can do for them and what the north can do for the country in return.

We need a formalized forum. This is one of the reasons why I have worked so hard, along with colleagues like John Amagoalik and some other leaders from the north, to make our point that we have to be participants, not just observers, at the first ministers' conferences. At times we have succeeded in making our point. Senator Hatfield was one of the instruments of such success and I have always been grateful for the fact that he recognized, when he was a premier, that what the aboriginal people were bringing to the table was an important issue needing to be dealt with. Perhaps if we had dealt only with Inuit issues at that time we could have made some progress. However, when we are dealing with different people from different cultural backgrounds it is not always easy to find common ground in terms of trying to move ahead in this great country.

• (1500)

I am leaving it with you, honourable senators. When the time comes to vote for this amendment tomorrow, stay away from the fact that you have been told what to do. Vote with your consciences and your understanding. I say that because I know what I am talking about. I mean it when I say that this bill is not good for the country. By voting in favour of it, you are not doing your country any favours. In fact, you are helping it take a step backward.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Watt spoke in Inuktitut]

Honourable senators, I was just saying to our visitors that the matter is now in your control. You must decide. I hope when it comes time to vote that you will vote not just to pass the bill but to pass it at least taking care of an injustice which is being dealt to this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words on the amendment moved by my colleague, Senator Watt.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Adams spoke in Inuktitut]

Senator Watt and I are the only two in this place who come from the north. We know practically all of those who are in the visitors' galleries today. They are not only Inuit, but are people originally from the south who now live in the north and who protest against the GST.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Adams spoke in Inuktitut]

I have just said that on September 25 we started the study of Bill C-62 in the Senate. I hope that we will stay on it for a long time yet, at least until the amendment of Senator Watt is accepted.

It costs a great deal of money to live up in the territories. I know that in my community the cost of living is twice as high as it is in the south. Earlier, Senator Watt talked about some of the costs that northerners have to bear. In particular, he spoke about the cost of food when it has to be brought up from the south. At one time, we used to buy all of our goods from the Hudson's Bay stores. Now there are other stores besides the Bay; there are co-ops. At one time I checked out of a store with a 75-pound bag of potatoes that came from Winnipeg. There it could be bought for $14; however, by the time it got to Rankin Inlet the cost was up to $55. That shows honourable senators the difference in the costs of transportation as between places in the north and places in the south.

This bill will not only affect the cost of food for the people of the north. Some salaries in the north are higher because certain people receive a cost-of-living allowance to compensate them for living in the north. According to Bill C-62, if you earn more than $30,000 per year, then the government will charge a 7 per cent goods and services tax on everything you buy. A great many people who work in some of the communities are not making less than $40,000 per year, especially federal civil servants and some school teachers. I have been wondering just how many of those people will stay to work in the north next year, after this bill is passed. The cost of everything will increase. The people up there have to feed themselves and buy food just like the people in the south.

As Senator Watt mentioned a few moments ago, some people, but not all, can live off the land. They can sometimes hunt a few caribou for meat, but not many of the teachers would do that. So it will be very difficult for those of us who come from the north to see this bill passed without the amendment of Senator Watt.

I hope honourable senators understand the significance of what Senator Watt was saying to Senator Murray when he expressed the hope that the government today believes and understands how different it is for those of us who live in the north as compared to those who live in the south. As Senator Watt said, we are all Canadians, but some of us who live in the north know no other way.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Adams spoke in Inuktitut]

I say once again that this amendment, along with all the people you see in the gallery,involves an attempt to make sure that we do not pass the GST. I hope that by the time we vote on the amendment Senator Murray will have told his colleagues to vote in favour of it.

• (1510)

That about ends my remarks. I believe that Senator Lucier intends to say a few words on the amendment. Before I sit down, may I introduce to the spectators in the gallery the honourable senator who worked so hard this past summer and who, unfortunately, did not get a chance to go to all our northern communities, the Honourable Senator Buckwold, Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

[Editor's Note: The Honourable Senator Adams spoke in Inuktitut]

I want to thank my colleagues in this chamber, and I hope that I will see them sometime soon in our northern community.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I would like to begin my remarks today by thanking all the northerners who have put forth the time, effort and expense to come here to show that they are dead serious in their opposition to the GST. They know how this GST will affect northerners. They do not need to be told by someone like Tom d'Aquino of the Business Council on National Issues and other such people that the reason people do not like the GST is because they do not understand it. These people are here because they do understand it.

Senator Frith: That is the problem!

Senator Lucier: That is correct: they understand it. These people are here because they know that when they heat their homes beginning January 1, 1991, they will pay a disproportionate amount of GST on their fuel. They will pay more than other Canadians for the same amount of fuel to heat their homes. It is bad enough that they must use a lot more fuel to heat their homes, but with the GST they will pay more tax on a litre of fuel on and a kilowatt of electricity than people in southern Canada. If this legislation was drawn up to accommodate anybody, it has to be the people of southern Canada; it sure as hell was not drawn up to accommodate northerners.

The fact that it costs $.42 for a litre of oil in Toronto and $.57 for the same litre of oil in Coppermine seems to have somehow escaped the drafters of this tax bill. They have forgotten that in drafting tax legislation it is necessary to insert a small amount of fairness. Somehow that went right by the drafters.

I think that the people of Labrador and the territories, as well as we in the Senate, are very fortunate to have Senator Adams and Senator Watt here to represent the north. In the Senate they help us keep our feet on the ground on a fairly regular basis. In caucus and at meetings, if someone goes off half-cocked about this country, usually Senator Adams or Senator Watt brings us back down by pointing out that there are parts of Canada beyond the area encompassing Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa. The people of this government and the draughtsmen of this tax somehow think that once you have drawn a line from Montreal to Toronto to Ottawa you have established the boundaries of Canada. What else is there? Well, there is a great deal more.

It is unfortunate that Senator Murray, along with many of his senators, could not take the time to be in the chamber now.

Senator Austin: Count them; there are only six.

Senator Lucier: Perhaps we should call for a quorum. Their absence is typical of the government's feelings about the north and consistent with what we have been getting from them for some time.

Senator Murray and the government he represents have been talking about ice breakers and submarines. They have said that they will spend $12 billion on nuclear submarines that they will stuff under the ice in the Northwest Territories to establish sovereignty in the north. If Senator Murray were here, I would tell him how to establish sovereignty in the north: he would only need to look up into the gallery to see how to establish sovereignty in the north.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: As I have said before, we do need ice breakers, and I am not quarelling with whether or not they should be in the north. Certainly they should be there, but to break ice, not to wave the flag. We do not need submarines under the ice, at least for any reason of which I can think and certainly not to show sovereignty. If you want sovereignty in the north, then you must encourage the people in the north to stay there by making it feasible for them to live there. You do not try to treat them as badly as you can.

No one can say that northerners have asked for any more than anyone else. They always ask for fair treatment, which is what they want in all things, and particularly in taxes. This tax is unfair. I know that that statement is not impressive to senators on the other side.

Senator Frith: The few that are here.

Senator Lucier: Yes, the six that are here.

Senator Austin: It is now seven.

• (1520)

Senator Lucier: Yes, we just got an import. They must have talked to the Queen and brought another one in.

Honourable senators, I do not know how it will happen but, sooner or later, this government will find out that, as they did with Meech Lake and as they do every time they try to ignore the north, this tax will not work. We were told that, with the passage of Meech Lake, it would be enshrined into the Constitution that northerners would be second-class citizens. When we brought that to the attention of this government they said, "Well, gee, you might have a point. Maybe that is true. However, why don't we just pass this with a unanimity clause that says we can never change it and once it has passed then we will change it? Right now it is a seamless web but if you pass it we will talk to you about it later. We don't want to talk now."

Senator Frith: "Sign now and we will talk later."

Senator Lucier: Yes, and "The cheque's in the mail."

Senator Buckwold: "We will respect you in the morning."

Senator Lucier: Now we have Bill C-62, a bill that unfairly taxes northerners and will be devastating to the tourism industry in the north. I find it interesting, honourable senators, that you will be able to fly to Hawaii to lie on the beach and you will not have to pay tax on your air bill. However, if you want to go to Nanisivik or to one of the ridings in the Northwest Territories or in the Yukon, then you will have to pay tax on your air fare.

Honourable senators, how can we have a tax on air fares that are paid by people who live in the most remote areas where it is more difficult for them to live? Have you people opposite never looked at a map of the Northwest Territories? There are no roads. If you want to go somewhere, then you have to fly. If you want to bring in food you have to fly it in. If you want to bring in a skidoo you have to fly it in. How the hell can you charge a tax on flying? It does not make sense.

The few senators opposite who are here today are having a very bad day. They are having a very uncomfortable day because they know they are dead wrong on this one.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: They know that behind most of the amendments we have moved are very solid, valid reasons. Whoever heard of taxing books and reading material? Whoever heard of taxing cooperatives? The amendments we put forth were reasonable, but senators opposite have been saying that, although they know they are reasonable, they will ignore that and do something else.

However, senators opposite would be dead wrong to vote against this northern amendment. It is not fair. They will have to swallow their pride and say what Senator Chaput-Rolland said the other day, which was: "I know that this tax on reading materials is wrong. I know it is not proper, but my allegiance to the Prime Minister does not let me vote against it."

Honourable senators, I always thought that once you were appointed to a place like this your allegiance would be somewhat to the people you represent and to your conscience, if you have one. I can honestly say that, since I was appointed to this chamber in 1975, I have never voted in favour of something that I thought was bad for the north; and I never will.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: When John Turner supported Meech Lake, I went to him and told him that it was wrong; that he should not do it; and that I would never support it. I fought Meech Lake every step of the way although my party and my leader supported it. I would not support it because it was not good for my people.

Honourable senators, who wants the GST? It is not the fishermen of either eastern or western Canada. It is not the coal miners in Cape Breton. It is not the forestry workers; they do not need it. It certainly is not the farmers. It is not the welders. It is not anyone who works for a living. It has to be a particular group that wants this tax because 15 per cent of the people of Canada support it. Who are they? They are obviously the rich people. It is a transfer of taxes from the people up there to the people down here. I know that Senator Eyton, Senator Molson and Senator Castonguay will support this bill. Why the hell should they not? They are multimillionnaires. They will pay less tax and we will pay more, so why should they not support it? What I cannot understand is why the other senators opposite are voting for it. The people they represent do not want it. You are absolutely wrong in taking this step.

Honourable senators, today we are talking about a 7 per cent tax but everyone knows it will not be 7 per cent for very long. It will soon be a lot more than 7 per cent. However, I would point out that it will be more than 7 per cent in many cases. I will use the example which I gave last week in the Senate. If you go to a laundromat—and the rich do not use laundromats—you will see that there are no 7-cent slots in the machines. If the cost of doing laundry now is $1, after January 1 it will be a $1.25. That means a 25-per-cent tax to the people who can least afford it.

Honourable senators, I have some figures on travel here. I sometimes wonder why I keep repeating these figures because I get discouraged every time I do. These figures relate to airline fares from Whitehorse to Vancouver. I use Whitehorse because I am familiar with it. That flight will cost an extra $40, which is really quite bad enough. However, people who want to fly from Vancouver to Ottawa will have to pay approximately $100 extra, after the GST.

• (1530)

We should take a look again at the structure of the country. We have central Canada, where most of the business is done, and the outlying areas from which you have to come to the centre to do business. If you live in Toronto and you want to go to Ottawa or Montreal to do business, it is a piece of cake and you will be charged $6 or $7 in tax. However, if you live in Vancouver and you have to come to Toronto or to this area to do business, it will cost $100 more. Why? Why will people have to pay more to come here to do business in this part of the country?

If you extrapolate that situation to the northern parts of the country, it just gets worse.

Senator Bosa: Is that in addition to the regular air fare?

Senator Lucier: Absolutely, yes. It is $100 in tax in addition to the regular fare. The Consumers' Association of Canada put out some figures for a comparison, and I just mention this to show you how these government departments operate. The consumers' office wanted to give out some figures so that people could do some comparisons with the GST. What figures did they use? Halifax to Moncton, and Montreal to Toronto. Great comparisons! They do not know that there is anything beyond those borders.

Honourable senators, I should like to mention something I spoke of last week, and that is heating a home. A 1,000 square foot home in Toronto, with the price of fuel in Toronto, will cost approximately $400 to heat. The GST on that amount will be $28. The same person in Dawson City heating the same size home will have a $2,700 fuel bill, and the GST will be $193. There is quite a difference between $28 and $193. Honourable senator, who would be stupid enough to draw up a bill like that? Furthermore, once it was drawn up, who would be stupid enough to pass it and to say, "Why don't you pass it and, perhaps later, after it has been passed and has been in place for a year or so, we may even change it?" That is what the government is saying, but it does not make any sense. They say, "It is a bad bill but let us pass it and perhaps later we will take a look. We may even change it." Well, if it is wrong, change it now! If that means you cannot get it passed by January 1, then you may have to let your 15 per cent supporters hold their breath for a year. Take a year off! After all, we are into a recession. Fix the thing and then pass it. Do yourselves a favour. Do all of us a favour!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I should like to end my intervention today by saying how much it means to me to have with us so many people from the North who have taken the time and made the effort to come here today to support us in trying to deal with this amendment.

We honestly do not know why there is such insistence that this bill become law by January 1. It may create some discomfort for some people if it does not, but would that be so awful? When you have to many people who oppose something, how can you be worried about the few you will upset if you do not get it passed right away? We do not know why there is this insistence that this bill be passed as is, that it just cannot be touched, that it is cast in stone.

I can tell honourable senators that there will be many people in northern Canada who will suffer from this law. When I speak of northern Canada, I am not just speaking of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon and Labrador; I am also speaking of the northern parts of many of the provinces, and the people there will feel the pinch of this stupid law as much as will the people further north.

Let me mention another little part of this tax, the tax credit. The people who were drafting the bill sat down and said, "If you earn $24,000 a year in Toronto, you can live this sort of a lifestyle, and that is the guideline we will use. We will base our tax credit on $24,000 per year. The cost of heating a house is $400 per month, the cost of a 75-pound bag of potatoes is $11, the cost of steak is $4 per pound, a pair of shoes costs $50, a parka costs $100 and a Skidoo costs $2,000. So that will be the base for the tax credit."

However, if you go to the Northwest Territories, the Skidoo is no longer $2,000; it is $4,000. The bag of potatoes is no longer $11; it is $50. The fuel bill is no longer $400; it is $2,700. So now they say, "Well, we will perhaps have to change the tax credit because we cannot use the same base in Yellowknife. We may have to change that after it has been in place for a couple of years. Let us just pass it anyway, and perhaps later we will be able to change that."

Honourable senators, I do not usually do this, but I should like to address the people in the gallery at this point. I hope that, if nothing else, we will be able to show you today how absolutely ridiculous and stupid this piece of legislation is as it stands. The only thing more stupid would be passing this legislation as it is instead of delaying it for at least a year so that we can make some of the changes to it that have to be made.

Senator Frith: That's the spirit! They will accept that. A reasonable man like Senator Doody will nod to that suggestion.

Senator Doody: Absolutely!

Senator Lucier: As I have said before, I have been living in the North since 1949, and one thing I have found is that Northerners are fair. They are also not crybabies. They know it costs more to live up there. They know it is tougher, and that is why they are there. They do not mind that. They are not asking for any extra favours. They are not asking you for something that no one else has. What they are saying is, "Be fair with us." If you do not do that, honourable senators, I think you should hang your heads in shame.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Senator Lucier.]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am delighted as well to welcome those who have travelled so far from northern Quebec, from Labrador and from the eastern Arctic to be present today to see and to hear what the Senate of Canada has to say about an issue which is fundamental to the future well-being of the Northerners whom senators represent. I should like to tell my honourable colleagues exactly where some of our northern friends have journeyed from, and I apologize in advance if I mispronounce some of the names of the communities. They have come from Umiujaq, Kangiqaualujjuaq, Tapangayuk, Akulivik, Povungnituk, Kuujjuarapik, Inukjuak, Chisasibi, Ivujivik, Aupaluk, Kangirsuk, Quartaq, Salluit, Tasiujaq, Kangiqsujuaq and Kuujjuaq.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Well done!

• (1540)

Senator Fairbairn: They have also come from Nain, Labrador; from the eastern Arctic—Pond Inlet, Pangnirtung, Clyde River, Lake Harbour, Resolute Bay, Broughton Island, and perhaps some other communities I have not been advised of. All of us welcome them here today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Watt, Senator Adams and Senator Lucier from the Yukon have spoken eloquently today, as they do continuously, on behalf of the people whom they serve across the largest, the harshest, and perhaps the most stunningly beautiful and mysterious region of our country. Our northern colleagues speak to us patiently and rationally, but also with frustration and anger, because, all too often, we hear them but do not listen. We treat them with courtesy and with respect, but we do not truly try to understand their message. They come from a part of our country which all too often we take for granted, or regard somewhat like a foreign land over which we, by virtue of our proximity, our wealth and sheer numbers, preside as colonial masters.

Those are harsh words, honourable senators, but constantly through our actions collectively as governments or singly as individuals indifferent to the reality of life in our north, in the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and Labrador and, as Senator Lucier said, also the northern parts of Ontario and all the western provinces, we seem compelled to try to impose our values and our methodology and our judgments on our northern people and their lifestyles. Yet it is a life in a land that is completely different from ours in southern Canada in every possible way. It demands different processes and different solutions. That is why, honourable senators, our northern friends are here today from the vast eastern reaches of our north. They have come to remind us of their unique situation to seek out our understanding and our help.

Our parliamentary committees in both the Senate and the House of Commons made stops in the north to hold hearings on the GST. The Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce went to Whitehorse and Yellowknife and heard important witnesses. The committee did not travel to the east of the north. In its report to the Senate, the committee noted the high cost of living in the north. It noted that the GST tax credits as they will apply to low income families will fall far short of the mark in the north, as $24,000 in Yellowknife, Iqaluit and Whitehorse is a much lower standard of living than it is in Edmonton or in Ottawa. For example, in Yellowknife the cost of living, including shelter, is some 40 per cent higher than in the south. That percentage rises astronomically in other more remote communities. The same is true in the Yukon. Transportation costs take on a whole new meaning in a land of no roads. The northern deduction, which was set in 1986 at $5,400 based on 1982 living costs, has not been increased since.

These considerations were an important part of the conclusion of the majority of committee members to recommend to the Senate that the goods and services tax bill, Bill C-62, be dropped. The report was rejected in this house. Today, we are offered another opportunity, a second chance, for this chamber to respond to the very real and detrimental effect that this tax will have on northerners.

Our amendment would have three important results in the event that the GST were to become law. It would ensure that any sales in the north would be free of the GST, including transportation within the area. This would apply in the Yukon, in the Northwest Territories, in Labrador and the area of northern Quebec above the 55th parallel. Under our proposal residents of the north would pay no GST if they chose to bypass the usual retail network with its substantially higher markup in comparison to southern Canada. Finally, the amendment would ensure that transportation to and from the north would be tax free, GST free, including freight charges required to ship goods which a northerner migh have purchased in the south.

The rationale behind those proposals is quite simple. The rules for the GST, concocted here in Ottawa within the Department of Finance, cannot be applicable to the northern situation if any sense of fairness is to prevail for the citizens of those territories.

During a very long debate we have heard a great deal about the inequity of the GST because of the distances east to west in Canada. When we turn to the north the inequity is substantially magnified and I believe totally unacceptable. It is not only a question of distance, although that is obvious, but is a question of climate, which is unlike anything we endure. In terms of severity and length, their frigid winter has major implications for heating and construction in the northern territories. It is also a question of transportation in a land of few roads. What traffic there is, is by air, by sea, by solitary skidoo or by dog sled. It is a question of a small population spread throughout tiny communities themselves vast distances apart with limited regular linkages to the larger centres or to each other. It is a question of an economy which bears no resemblance to those in our southern provinces and, therefore, does not respond to the premises on which the goods and services tax is based.

Honourable senators, we can have no real confidence that the unique, high-cost realities of northern living were adequately considered by the government when the GST was being drafted. The early public documents on this tax did not appear to assess its impact on northerners. Over a year ago Jack Anawak, the Member of Parliament for Nunatsiaq, raised this question with Minister of Finance, Michael Wilson, who said a great deal of work had been done on the impact of the GST in the north and that it would be about the same as the national average. It would improve the economic fortunes of the north by some 1.5 per cent. That, of course, flies in the face of the information provided by northern governments, by individuals, or by business people who appeared before the committee.

Mr. Anawak asked for those studies on which Mr. Wilson's assurances were based and was told that it would take a little while to put them all together. Honourable senators, that was October of 1989, last year, and on checking last week I learned that no information has yet been produced by the Minister of Finance—more than one year later—in response to Jack Anawak's request.

Our committee did, however, hear from Michael Ballantyne, the Minister of Finance of the Northwest Territories, who took the trouble to provide the Senate committee with a very detailed brief as well as to meet with them to discuss it while they were in Yellowknife. Mr. Ballantyne is a very senior member of the Territorial Government who always takes time to try to help southern parliamentarians understand the concerns of his area, now as the Minister of Finance and previously when he was Minister of Justice. I would consider him a pretty reputable source and would like to take a few minutes to share with honourable senators some of the information he provided to us.

Mr. Ballantyne noted that most national taxation policies affect regions differently, but in the case of the GST the difference in the effect on the Northwest Territories would be particularly unfavourable. He said the GST will have limited benefits for northern industries and will increase the already disproportionately high tax burden that the current tax system imposes on northern residents.

Honourable senators, one of the key goals of territorial governments and the mayors of each community in the north, mayors who have visited us today, is to achieve economic self-sufficiency and self-reliance for their citizens. It is a tough task. That achievement would not only provide a solid basis for development of the political future of the north, but all Canadians would benefit through the reduction of dependence of that region on transfer payments from Ottawa.

The proposed imposition of the GST would indicate that the federal government has failed again to approach the north with any real sensitivity, particularly having regard to the dual economy which exists there. The so-called modern economy of the north is market driven in the larger centres where resource industries, public administration, tourism and service industries prevail. There is virtually no manufacturing sector in the north and the goods produced are primary commodities such as minerals, oil and gas, and construction. Almost 82 per cent of total employment in the Northwest Territories is in the service sector, which is a significantly higher ratio than that in southern Canada.

The federal government has indicated that Canadian industries will benefit significantly from the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax in favour of the GST. However, Mr. Ballantyne told us that the north will not share equally in any such benefit. Although some long-term gains may result to some resource industries because of a drop in input costs, it is unlikely, he said, that the magnitude of the savings will be significant enough to increase either jobs or production. He noted that any fall in input costs will result in increased profits which will likely be exported to southern Canada or the United States since major industries in the north are not owned by northerners.

He also explained that a significant proportion—some 20 per cent—of employment income in the primary sector of the Northwest Territories is earned by non-residents; "fly in-fly out" workers who are brought in by their companies from the south to work on major projects. They continue to maintain permanent residence in southern Canada, they pay no territorial income tax while they are employed there, and then they leave when the job is done.

The other part of the dual economy in the north is traditional. Honourable senators will know that certainly in northern Quebec and the Northwest Territories the majority of citizens are aboriginal Canadians. Indeed, they provide the majority of members in the Northwest Territories Government and in its legislature. We must understand that for many hundreds of years aboriginal people in our Canadian northland have lived a subsistence type of lifestyle depending on fish and wildlife for their food, their clothing, their tools and their shelter. Although there have been many changes to this lifestyle, even today the primary foods for northern Dene, Métis and Inuit families still centre on fish from the lakes and the rivers and the oceans of the north and meat from caribou, moose, seal, muskox and waterfowl, which, I should tell honourable senators, I had the privilege, and, I should say, the pleasure of sampling several months ago when our national Liberal caucus held a summer meeting in Iqaluit.

Hunting, fishing and trapping, however, do not generate a substantial output in dollar terms, but they are significant in supporting this traditional lifestyle. Income from transfer payments and other sources of cash is spent almost entirely on the basic necessities required for subsistence. Therefore, honourable senators, this traditional economy is incredibly fragile and it is sensitive to price changes.

These northerners will receive no benefits as producers from the GST, but nonetheless they will pay the full burden as consumers along with their fellow northerners who participate in the market economy. So with the GST we have higher operating costs for businesses, higher labour costs to attract people to an area of high living costs, and shelter costs that are some 44 per cent higher in northern Canada.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Tourism is the most important private service industry in the north today and it has been moving ahead rapidly in recent years in spite of the shortness of the tourist season. It is expensive to tour the north for the very reasons which make the effort and desire to go there so appealing, its remoteness and its isolation. That, honourable senators, brings me to the crux of many of the pressures in the north and that has to be transportation.

There is no question of a level playing field in northern Canada because of transportation costs. Transportation adds to the price of everything. Mr. Ballantyne noted that consumers, particularly those in remote regions, would experience a disproportionate increase in their cost of living if the GST were to pass, for two main reasons. First, the tax will apply to transportation costs. Second, the northern transportation costs themselves will be added to the already higher margins that are applied by retailers in northern stores.

• (1600)

A study by the Northwest Territories Department of Transportation has shown that the combined effect of these two factors creates a significant advantage for consumers to buy goods, in the south, particularly high-value durable goods, and to arrange for separate transportation to northern points. Furthermore, many northerners already order their basic foodstuffs directly from southern Canadian wholesalers because it is a lot cheaper.

Over the past few days I have been making some retail price comparisons, as have other senators, which illustrate this point quite dramatically. I should like to give honourable senators a few examples. The cost of a dozen eggs at the IGA in Ottawa is $1.09, while it is $3.99 in Spence Bay; $4.05 in Pond Inlet; $4.80 in Pelly Bay; and $4.00 in Grise Fiord. One litre of milk here in Ottawa costs $1.39, while it costs $5.45 in Spence Bay; $4.00 in Pond Inlet; and $4.59 in Pelly Bay. Five pounds of potatoes costs $1.49 in Ottawa. The cost for five pounds of potatoes in Spence Bay is $10.49, while it is $9.90 in Pond Inlet. A one-pound container of margarine costs $1.75 in Ottawa; $3.99 in Pond Inlet; $3.64 in Pelly Bay; and $2.75 in Grise Fiord. Five kilograms of flour cost $4.89 in Ottawa; $10.95 in Pond Inlet; $11.25 in Grise Fiord; and $12.06 in Pelly Bay. Five kilograms of sugar cost $0.89 in Ottawa; $4.99 in Spence Bay; $4.85 in Pond Inlet; and $6.50 in Grise Fiord. A 25 pound turkey in Ottawa is $44, while last year at the Bay in Iqualuit the price was $79.

Those figures, honourable senators, indicate clearly the dramatically different prices that northerners already pay for basic materials which they use in their daily lives. With the GST what these families will be facing looks to me suspiciously like the kind of food tax which the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, says does not exist in his proposals. Granted, northern retail businesses will be able to submit input tax credits for the tax they will pay on the freight charges of their grocery shipments. However, individuals and families who choose to save by ordering their supplies directly from the south will not be able to submit similar credits for the freight charges of their grocery orders. Mr. Wilson has said categorically that there is no tax on transportation as part of the cost of food. Again, he is not dealing realistically or sensitively with the special conditions of the north. He is dealing with business and not individuals.

Recently, the major airlines flying into the north have confirmed that as far as they understand the terms of the GST all air cargo, including groceries, is subject, without exception, to the GST. A retail outlet would have these cargo charges removed prior to selling zero-rated groceries to the consumer. However, a private individual shipping groceries to his or herself from the south would pay the GST on cargo charges.

On top of this, honourable senators, the GST comes at a time when Canada Post has just increased postal rates under the Northern Air Staging Network as a result of a decision in Ottawa to phase-out the subsidy for these services, services which are heavily used in remote areas of the north.

We are looking at part of our country where southern calculations do not fit. More importantly, our north is now looking at us to see if we understand that—or, indeed, to see if we even care. Our track record is not impressive in terms of our exports to the north. It is true that like a good parent we send money, and so we must and we always have, to provinces which need assistance. But over the years we have sent other things as well. We have sent a justice system to people who can neither understand our language nor our codified concept of justice. For a long time we have sent a southern education system to the mystification of aboriginal youngsters. That has changed. However, we still do not reflect sufficiently on facts such as the distance which keeps teachers from ever seeing each other over periods of years, something which requires incentives and real commitment for them to stay in the north. Neither do we reflect on the need for many young northerners to leave their homes in order even to receive an education at all.

Through the magic of electronic communications, we have sent a glimpse of a materialistic society for which there is no base in the north outside the major centres. On the one hand, we have assisted aboriginal northerners to develop their own system of television, radio and newspapers, something which is absolutely vital to communications in remote areas, while on the other hand we have cut back that funding. We have urged aboriginal northerners to become involved in our constitutional affairs, and then we have cut back the funds we offered to enable them to do that.

With the Meech Lake Accord we sent a powerful message to the northern territories about our view of their future. At no time were leaders of the north involved in Meech Lake discussions among first ministers because those territories obviously are not provinces. At a time that we were told was a moment of great national purpose, issues vital to the future of northern development were decided with no input from northerners. Northerners learned the day after the Meech Lake Agreement was reached, across the river in the Gatineau Hills, that their future provincial status would be subject to the unanimous agreement of all provincial premiers and the Prime Minister with no agreement required from them on terms and conditions. They learned that questions involving the possible extension of provincial boundaries into the territories was to be the unanimous preserve of first ministers. They also learned that the constitutional process for aboriginal Canadians was no longer on the table, simply because agreement had not been reached during the first round of conferences which had been established after 1982 for the first time in our history.

• (1610)

Northern leaders were shocked and angry. They tried to communicate with their only representative at the first ministers' conference, the Prime Minister, but he did not respond. Their leaders, Mr. Tony Penikett of the Yukon and Mr. Nick Sibbeston of the Northwest Territories, came to Ottawa to try to gain entrance to the post-Meech meeting held across the street in the Langevin Building, at least to have the chance to explain their views to the premiers and to the Prime Minister before they placed their final signatures on the deal. Their phone calls were not returned. It was only when the Senate sent a task force on the Meech Lake Accord to the north that these leaders and their citizens had any opportunity to be directly and fully heard.

However, it was far too late. I shall never forget the bitterness felt by these people which was caused by this rejection of their participation in a process that was to dominate the politics of our country for three long and difficult years.

The sadness is that those northern and aboriginal interests had nothing to do with the aspirations of Quebec, but everything to do with the aspirations of the north. Those issues sat there for three years as an open reminder of the unfairness and discourtesy to the north, and they ultimately became part of the reason why the accord collapsed last June.

There are other moments in the history of Canada's relationship with its north that some of us may have forgotten, and I believe that one is being discussed today over in the House of Commons. The issue, which dominated the CBC program The Journal last Friday, is the transplanting of northern Quebec Inuit families in desolate Arctic sites back in 1953, families who were told they would be better off up at Resolute Bay and Grise Fiord on Ellesmere Island. They were told that there would be more game, more jobs. What they were not told is that they would also be there as physical evidence of Canadian sovereignty over a territory of strategic importance in the cold war. These Inuit families were dropped and virtually abandoned in an alien area where there was no shelter and none of the food that they had hunted or eaten in northern Quebec. They had been promised help if they wished to come back to their homes but that help did not come until recent years, by which time they had become strangers in their own families. One of them is the eloquent leader of the Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, John Amagoalik, who as a little boy of five was dropped with his family on the shore of Resolute Bay. He remembers well the deprivation that led his family to search for food in the garbage dump at Resolute.

In a report last June the House of Commons Aboriginal Affairs Committee, which had been studying the relocation saga, urged the Government of Canada to apologize officially for the wrongs done over the years to the Inuit in these two communities, to recognize their contribution to the protection of Canadian sovereignty in the north and to consider some kind of compensation for the affected families. I believe the government today is presenting a response to the unanimous report of that committee, but as of this moment I do not know what the response will be.

Honourable senators, all these bits of history, past and current, should be in our minds as we look at this amendment and contemplate our vote tomorrow. The GST should not become a new piece of history levied on northerners without fundamental changes to compensate for conditions which, clearly, could not have been carefully considered in the drafting of this bill. One of the key difficulties for northerners is that their economic options are limited, unlike those available to us in the south. They simply do not have the choices. There is one option that they do not wish to exercise, and that is to abandon their land and their heritage, past and future. They have followed our democratic process in appearing before our committees and in sending in their briefs. Today they have gone one step further and have sent their leaders down from the north to bring their concerns directly to us. They see the Senate as a final step in the democratic process where they must try, in their view, to make a difference. I earnestly urge all honourable senators to think very seriously in the hours ahead so that tomorrow's vote may stand as an important moment in history when Parliament and government has done the right thing for northerners, who are as important to our country as any other citizens.

Hon. Peter Stollery: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words about the amendments. I am sure that my friends across the aisle must be wondering how they got themselves into this mess, because I doubt that they felt, when they found themselves supporting the idea, that they would be penalizing northern Canadians, penalizing people who live in some of the most difficult conditions in Canada. I do not think my friends opposite thought they would be doing that when they embarked on the course of introducing this tax.

● (1620)

Senator Hébert: They know now.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, the part of Canada we are talking about is so unusual and so desolate that last Easter Senator Hébert took his grandson with him to Igloolik.

Senator Frith: Two innocents.

Senator Simard: Order, Senator Frith, please.

Senator Stollery: A local gentleman built him an igloo and he spent the weekend in this igloo with his grandson so that his grandson would have the experience of living in the north. In fact, Senator Hébert has written a small book telling about his three or four days in Igloolik. He told me he was ready to give up after two extremely cold nights.

Senator Hébert: After one!

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Stollery: I had not thought about the fact that unless it gets to the freezing point inside the igloo, the igloo will melt. Senator Hébert has made me realize that it would be a very cold and interesting experience.

Senator Simard: Is he going to read his book in the Senate?

Senator Frith: Do you want us to start that again? We will get Senator Gigantès back.

Senator Stollery: I think some people in the gallery understand very well the kind of experience Senator Hébert had last Easter. It seems to me that is the point we are trying to bring to your attention. Some of these people have travelled far to come here to watch the Senate, their last hope, try to persuade the government to change its mind.

Honourable senators, I have travelled quite a bit in the Arctic from Greenland to the Bering Strait. When describing a small community such as Inuvik, Sachs Harbour, Coppermine, Iqaluit, Hall Beach, Pond Inlet, the Belcher Islands and George River, I would like to emphasize to you, Senator Simard, the tininess of these communities which exist on the edge of an isolation that no southern Canadian like yourself can possibly understand or imagine.

When we go to the Arctic, we go to places like Iqaluit and Yellowknife which are administrative centres. They did not exist before administration arrived in the Arctic. The real Arctic consists of these tiny communities of often a few hundred or even fifty people—none of them having a population larger than 2,000. The people are cut off from the world, not only in the winter time but often in the summer. I remember one day in The Backway inlet talking to some people who, in July, were impatiently waiting for the cold weather so they could travel. They lived in what was a house, but inside that building they had built a traditional house. They were waiting for the ice because they could not move in the summer time. The nearest community to them where they had family was 300 miles away. They were bored waiting for the freeze-up, because once the freeze-up occurs they can travel. If there is a characteristic in the Inuit that I have noticed in my travels around the Arctic it is this instinct that they seem to have had from time immemorial to travel around the countryside. They do not stay in these often unattractive little communities which were established in the 1950s. They do not like them. If they do not have an expensive boat, on which there will now be a tax, they cannot travel. If they have at least a skidoo, then, once freeze-up takes place, they can move around and visit their relatives. They travel enormous distances.

The reason the community at Grise Fiord on Ellesmere Island was established in 1950 was to protect our sovereignty. The government of the day knew that we could not afford to police Ellesmere Island and that if they established Inuit communities around these tremendously remote areas they would move around and, in fact, provide the sovereignty that Canada does not provide and which this government provides less and less. We actually risk losing our own territory because of the way this government has cut back.

Senator Frith: The government is cutting its nose off to spite its face. That is what it is doing.

Senator Simard: Order!

Senator Stollery: What is most infuriating is that most people do not seem to understand that there are only a few thousand people living in the eastern Arctic as far as, I suppose, Banks Island. If you arrive at a place that has an airport you may see the arrival of a First Air or a Canadian jet from Montreal which would be operating on a government subsidy, because the government knows that the airlines could not possibly make this a viable commercial activity. You may go to Dorval and buy a ticket for Resolute Bay or Iqaluit, but all you would see when you arrive at your destination would be a lot of 50-gallon oil drums, a few Quonset huts and a row of cottages often along the sea where the people live. Often the population would be 300 or 500.

Senator Adams: It would already be dark.

Senator Stollery: Yes. What our friends opposite have not thought of is what it is like to live in this isolated world which depends more than anything else on transportation. It is not transportation as we think of it here today in terms of someone going from Toronto to Montreal. It is in the nature of the people. We are talking of hunters and gatherers who, only 20 or 30 years ago, had to earn their income in this way. Even today, it forms an important part of their income. I am talking about people who have lived this way since the last Ice Age and to whom travel across this barren countryside, to visit families in these tiny communities, is their life. That is what they do from the time it freezes up until the water opens.

● (1630)

Honourable senators, if any of you cared to go to some of these places, you would find that one of the characteristics—even in the summer time, never mind the winter—is the way you find a canvas tent with a man and his wife and children in the most isolated place, even in July. Why? This summer, I was actually on the Melville Peninsula, which is an extremely isolated place, and after some considerable time we went down a river, and what did we find? We found habitations. We found tent sites. They are all over the place because people use this river to go from one small community to another. It is like a highway all winter. Possibly one a week, or once every couple of weeks, they all go along using Skidoos. They also need extra heavy-duty clothing. The work pants have to be specially lined. They do not sell those work clothes in southern Canada. If you go into the Hudson's Bay store in Iqaluit, they will tell you they are often sold out because crews from the south buy them out. They buy out everything because you cannot buy clothes like that in southern Canada. They have to be specially made to withstand temperatures of minus 50 with a wind of 60 or 70 miles per hour. A man and his family can be outside for two weeks in that kind of weather, so everything is heavy duty.

You do not buy an ordinary boat when you are buying your fishing equipment. We all know that fishing is an important part of the lifestyle of the people of the north. They have to buy professional, heavy-duty fishing equipment. I do not know much about fishing equipment, but when you go into any cooperative in the Arctic, it is always filled with industrial-strength, if that is the phrase, fishing equipment, with heavy nets, buoys and so on.

How about the shotgun shells and the cartridges and the rifles and the shotguns? All of those are very heavy-duty stuff. You have just been told by Senator Fairbairn something of the cost of food. I can tell you what it costs to ship a Skidoo to the Arctic. It costs about $1,250 in freight, and I do not think that the reduction on the manufacturers' sales tax is going to add up to $1,250, but that is what the average Inuit family will have to pay just in transportation when they buy a Skidoo in Pond Inlet, in Rae Point, or in Eskimo Point, or in any of the other 20 or 50 small, isolated communities on the edge of this country, maintaining, in many cases, the sovereignty of this country because we do not do it ourselves.

Now what is being proposed? It is being proposed to add a tax that nobody else in Canada will have to pay because nobody else in Canada has to buy these kinds of items. They do not even sell them in southern Canada. Even in places like northern Ontario they do not sell this kind of stuff.

I know many honourable senators have visited the Arctic in the winter time, and you will know that you go over here to a place in Ottawa where they outfit you specially. I am sure you have been there, Senator Lucier. They outfit you specially with these double-inserted boots and double pants and huge parkas, all of which are tremendously expensive, so expensive that the departments in connection with which you happen to be going do not buy the stuff. After each trip it is brought back and then someone else uses it because it is just too expensive. No one else in any other part of Canada requires this equipment. Well, we are going to put a tax on all of that stuff. I do not think that my friends opposite had considered that when they thought of this bill and the impact it would have on these people.

I know that Senator Hébert has been to the Arctic before, as have others. We go there sometimes, but often only to the administrative centres, formerly Frobisher Bay and Yellowknife, which are not typical. Most of the people there come from the south. They are teachers, administrators or with the health department and so on. If these were the old imperial days, it would be the colonial office. They do not come from Baffin Island or from the central Arctic. The only place I might exclude is the Yukon, which has a substantial population.

Senator Lucier: We have roads as well!

Senator Stollery: And you have roads. When you go to this part of the world, I think that you are overwhelmed by the fact that you cannot go anywhere. There is the settlement and the airstrip, or if it does not have an airstrip, you just arrive by boat or by seaplane, which means you can only arrive at certain times of the year. Then there is a little road a quarter of a mile long, and then just thousands of miles of nothing. It is the same distance from here to Hall Beach as it is from here to Calgary, only to Hall Beach it is straight north. The isolation is unequalled anywhere in the world. In the Sahara Desert it is not as isolated as it is in northern Canada. They can build roads in the Sahara Desert. There are tracks everywhere through the desert, but you cannot go driving across the tundra in Canada. It just cannot be done. It is just total isolation, and now there will be a tax on that isolation, and I do not think that, for example, Senator Poitras agrees with that.

Senator Poitras: Have you ever been there?

Senator Stollery: Yes, I have been there, many times.

[Translation]

I know it very well and I have for quite some time. Do you know it, Senator? Yes, of course you do. So you will agree it is very bad to raise taxes at the expense of people who live in such a difficult and harsh environment. I don't think you really thought about that when you decided to vote against the amendment. In fact, perhaps now you will vote in favour of the amendment, don't you think so, Senator Hébert?

Senator Hébert: Yes. He is hesitating.

Senator Stollery: And he is still hesitating.

I just wanted to emphasize for honourable senators opposite the problems of transportation, because it is the transportation of all of these things, more than anything, that is such an imposition on the people in the north. If you were going to tax something and if it were to be sold at the same price, or even some price comparable to that at which you could buy the item in southern Canada, that might be different. It costs $2.50 a pound to ship items north, and for a 500-pound Skidoo it costs an additional $1,250 for freight. I know senators are aware of that.

● (1640)

Food is not taxed, but it is an interesting and easy item to compare. In Ottawa, a 50-pound bag of potatoes costs $5. In Hall Beach, a five-pound bag of potatoes costs $11. I cannot believe that, having thought this through, the government would consider implementing the tax on those people and not supporting the amendment. We are here to try to persuade senators opposite to support our amendment, because it is a reasonable amendment. We are not talking about it costing a large amount of money, because it is a small number of people who will be affected. It is a vast area populated by a small number of people. More than anything, that area depends on transportation.

Very briefly, I wish to remind honourable senators of the cost of fuel, Skidoos, heavy clothes, basic commodities and ammunition. Everything is heavy. A box of 30.30 shells or shotgun shells is very heavy. How many boxes of shotgun shells would a hunter use if he is hunting for a couple of weeks? He would use many of them, and they are heavy. Every box costs $2.50 a pound in transportation on top of the cost of the shells. I do not know what a box of shotgun shells weighs, but I am sure it is quite a bit. As I say, cartridges, fishing equipment and boots, everything is heavy duty.

[Senator Stollery.]

In 1958 John Diefenbaker told us all about the northern dream. I remember that election. Never mind the election, I remember those days. I was not in politics, but I remember John Diefenbaker inspiring Canadians with his description of northern Canada.

Senator Simard: Did you vote for him?

Senator Stollery: Senator Simard, on February 11, 1957, which is a long time ago but is important in the theology of the Conservative Party, John Diefenbaker said:

> In so far as northern Canada is concerned, there can be no question whatever that in the territories there has not been a policy of vision in keeping with the tremendous potentialities of that area . . . I can see this north land of ours with developments envisaged by D'Arcy McGee in his magnificent speech at the time of Confederation as he saw that a great Canada. I can see cities in northern Canada north of the arctic circle . . . if only the government would catch the vision of the possibilities.

That is what that great Conservative John Diefenbaker had to say about northern Canada.

Senator Watt: Senator, may I ask you a question while you are on the topic of the vision of John Diefenbaker.

In your earlier remarks, you mentioned that the Inuit from northern Quebec, Port Harrison, now called Inukjuak were transplanted to the High Arctic to secure Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic. Have you had the opportunity to read the report that recently came out? There were some very interesting points which should be made here in the house.

Senator Stollery: I have not, but I am sure you will enlighten me.

Senator Watt: The report came out from the House of Commons today and it states:

> We do not see grounds for an apology by the Government for the manner in which the relocation project was conceived, planned and carried out. In our view, to apologize for a wrongdoing it did not commit would constitute deception on the part of the Government. It would also imply that the project had not been reasonably successful whereas this is not the case.

In other words, the government is basically stating that the Inuit were not sent to the Arctic to secure the sovereignty of this government in the north. There is no apology. There is no recognition. There is no compensation. There is no acknowledgement whatsoever. It is a total denial.

One of the reasons I am pointing this out is that the government attempted to hijack or use the Makivik Corporation, of which I am president. I watched the news on Friday where it stated that the consultant who was chosen jointly by the Government of Canada and the Makivik Corporation came out with an interpretation that there was no justification to this case. I wish to point out to you, senator, that the consultant was one of the persons who had worked for the Makivik Corporation in the past and was dismissed and then hired by the Government of Canada, but never was it jointly agreed that that consultant should come out with the interpretation of the outcome.

Senator Stollery: That is very important. In the past, we all know that the Inuit and native people of Canada have been treated badly. If anything, it only proves that if the Inuit and other aboriginal peoples do not hang together—as the old line states—they will hang separately. That is what happened in the past and that is what will happen today. That is what will happen with the bill, if my friends on the other side should choose not to support the amendment. Without the amendment, this bill discriminates against a part of Canada and a people of Canada who have the least strength to defend themselves. There is not a large number of people in that region, and it seems to me it is the duty of those of us in southern Canada to stand up for the rights of people who live in this huge, empty area of our country. This is the Senate. We are here to stand up for their rights. This is where the regions are supposed to be represented.

• (1650)

Obviously, if we were talking of the House of Commons, representation is by population, the Inuit and the other people who live in the Northwest Territories, north of 60, and in northern Quebec, would not have a chance because they do not have enough people living there. That is why the Senate exists. We are here to represent their rights and their rights are being trampled upon by the government through this bill. It is possible that the government is doing this innocently, I do not know. The government probably did not think about it. That is why I hope Conservative members of the Senate will support the amendment.

I am not being harshly critical of the government. I am trying to persuade my colleagues on the other side to support an amendment protecting the inhabitants of the north, an amendment which would certainly have been supported by John Diefenbaker and by a large number of Canadians, because Mr. Diefenbaker won a pretty big election. This is the kind of thing he talked about when he won that election. It is not something I throw out lightly. This was the basis for a tremendous election campaign, because Canadians agreed with John Diefenbaker when he said:

> One Canada, one Canada, where Canadians will have preserved to them the control of their own economic and political destiny. Sir John A. Macdonald gave his life to this party. He opened the West. He saw Canada from east to west. I see a new Canada—a Canada of the North!

I think my friends opposite will support the amendment. I hope they do. It will not cost very much money, and it gives justice to a part of Canada that deserves justice. I know my friends opposite are not unjust. They do not go around being unjust to people. I know that if they think at all independently and consider why they are here in the Senate, the chamber which is supposed to represent the regions of Canada, they will realize that there is nothing more fundamental than that the Senate represent the regions and that we are dealing with an item which is important to the largest region of the country.

North of 60, or whatever boundary you want to use, is a large territory with a small number of people who are unable to represent themselves through electoral politics because they can never elect enough people to give them that kind of representation. Never. That is why the Fathers of Confederation, back in 1867, established the second chamber as it is in all large federal states. If you have representation by population, that means the rights of the people in the large, underpopulated areas of the country are extinguished, and they will never join a federation if their rights are going to be extinguished by representation by population. Is that not the basis of the Canadian problem?

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator Stollery a question. He has referred to John Diefenbaker and that very important northern vision which captured the imagination of Canadians. You might recall that one of John Diefenbaker's most aggressive disciples was the Honourable Eric Nielsen who served in the other place for 25 years as the Honourable Member for Yukon.

I wonder whether Senator Stollery would give us his view of whether such legislation as the GST could be before us today, affecting the north as it does, if Eric Nielsen were still in the government caucus? Do you feel Eric Nielsen is not in the government caucus because he disagreed with the policy of the Minister of Finance to bring this legislation in and to affect the north in this way?

Senator Stollery: I think it is very clear that Eric Nielsen, the Chairman of the Canadian Transportation Commission—and responsible, as he must have been, for the fact that even with the policy on deregulation of airlines there are still subsidies for transportation to the high north—would have supported the idea of this amendment, particularly when we know that the reat of this tax will go up. The proposed rate of the GST is 7 per cent, and it will be 15 per cent in no time. I am sure Eric Nielsen would have opposed it.

I want to thank honourable senators for their patience with me but I did want to take a moment to bring to your attention the need to represent the under-represented areas. This is not something inimicable to conservatism. The Conservative Party and John Diefenbaker were famous for their belief—

Senator Simard: Leave John out of it.

Senator Stollery: —belief in the regions of Canada. It seems to me that this amendment is straightforward, it does not cost very much, and I hope enough Conservative senators can support the amendment so that it passes, can then be passed by the House of Commons, and then take its course.

Senator Cogger: I understand Senator Stewart has a motion and I will yield.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am most grateful to Senator Cogger. I would like leave to revert to Notices of Motions for one purpose, namely to move a motion concerning the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BILL TO AMEND—DEBATE ON THIRD READING CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, given the lateness of the hour I thought it would be my duty this afternoon to empty out the gallery. However, I see that Senator Stollery has done that for me. I thank him for that.

While we had an exceptionally large number of visitors this afternoon, and presumably what transpired and what will transpire will be reported back to them, I, too, on behalf of senators on this side of the house wish to extend to them a belated welcome for a number of reasons. Indeed, we should be honoured that they pay a great deal of interest in the workings of the Senate. As well, on behalf of senators on the other side of the house, I must admit that it is refreshing and pleasant to realize what a difference an audience makes. The attendance on the other side, as well as the quality of the debate from senators opposite, has improved substantially as a result. I think we owe that to the presence in the gallery of a large number of visitors. For that, I am very grateful.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: Indeed, it was a pleasure to be exempt this afternoon from the tedium of the reading of interminable petitions. My God, we have not heard a kazoo or a bell—hardly anything—and I congratulate honourable senators opposite. Your behaviour was exemplary.

[Senator Stewart.]

I am indeed impressed by the heavy task that is given to me to answer such a formidable array of speakers, starting with Senator Watt, who was followed by Senators Adams, Fairbairn, Stollery and Lucier.

I am reminded of when I was in law school where I had a wise and old teacher who used to say to us, "Don't worry too much if you show up in court and you find a whole bunch of lawyers. The worse the case of your opponent is, the more bodies he will produce and the longer he will try to speak. If they cannot convince the court, at least they will try to wear it out."

Senator Hébert: That is why you need eight more senators.

Senator Cogger: I never interrupt anyone. I do not know why the senator opposite is interrupting me.

Senator Frith: Will the real Michel Cogger stand up, or is he standing up?

Senator Cogger: The other thing I wanted to say to our distinguished guests this afternoon, something which I also want to pass on to senators across the way, is that while it is not easy indeed, as I said, to face a formidable array of speakers, I also think that the entire quality of the exercise is coloured by the way the opposition has chosen to produce its amendments.

Senator Steuart: You mean one after the other?

Senator Cogger: Let me explain it to you, Senator Steuart. It seems to me that if the opposition were really interested in a solid and in-depth debate, something of substance, then it would do us the courtesy, the favour, call it what you like, of telling us what it is going to be instead of springing it upon us at the very last minute. For instance, it seems to me, Senator Steuart, that my colleagues on this side of the house and I only heard what the amendment would be at around 1.30 p.m. or 2 p.m. this afternoon while everybody in the gallery surely knew long before I did. If not, why else would they have bothered to fly in from the north? When was that press communiqué on the letterhead of Senator MacEachen circulated? That did not take place at 1.30 this afternoon. It seems to me that if the opposition were really concerned—and I have never been convinced of this—about a real, serious and genuine debate on the GST then it would not play these little surprises, producing amendments out of a hat.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Cogger: We all know that Senator Buckwold produced 25 amendments. He turned them over to the leadership and said, "You guys go at it." I do not know who puts their hand into the hat every morning and says, "Today, it will be funeral costs. This afternoon, it will be the north." It seems to me that this is hardly a relevant and serious way to go about debating legislation.

I wish our distinguished guests were still here since these are important points to make. First, I would have said to them, "You have seen the opposition on its best behaviour this afternoon. Unfortunately, I have to point out to you that it is not always that way." Second, I would have said to them, "I would never accuse those gentlemen of saying anything less than the truth. However, be careful, because sometimes they have been known to speak with forked tongue."

Senator Buckwold: Would the honourable senator consider a question?

Senator Cogger: Senator Buckwold, I shall gladly answer your questions after I finish my remarks.

With respect to the amendment proposed by Senator Watt on behalf of Senator MacEachen, which I guess for all intents and purposes can be referred to as the zero-taxing-of-transportation amendment—and never mind all the stuff we heard this afternoon about the cost of cartridges and so on—what we are dealing with is an amendment the purpose of which would be to zero-tax transportation to the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, Labrador and northern Quebec.

On that very subject, there are two points I wish to make. First, Senator Watt, and all the speakers who spoke after him on the same point, wished to convey the impression, which is wrong, that under the system that we live by today there is absolutely no tax affecting transportation to the north. For that matter, they would have us believe that there is no tax affecting transportation anywhere in the country. Indeed, we all know that this is not the case and that while currently transportation costs are not directly subject to tax, they are, however, indirectly taxed in two ways. First, any freight costs incurred prior to the point at which they are taxed under the current system are effectively taxed in their entirety since these costs are reflected in the selling price to which the tax applies. Federally, this means that freight costs incurred on inbound movements of raw materials and semi-processed goods for production of taxable manufactured goods form part of the tax base. Provincially, all freight costs incurred prior to the retail level are fully taxed. There go your skidoos, cartridges, ammunition, hunting rifles, fishing gear, heavy-duty boots and the specially-lined pants worn to work in the mines.

● (1510)

Senator Buckwold: You will have to do better than that.

Senator Cogger: However, freight is also indirectly taxed under existing sales tax systems on a wide range of purchases by freight carriers which serve to increase their operating costs. In turn these costs are reflected in higher freight prices to their customers. Among those items purchased by carriers that are currently taxed by both levels of government are things like motor fuels, telecommunication services, office furniture and supplies, maintenance supplies, construction materials used to build terminal facilities, loading equipment and so on and so forth. Therefore, it is not quite accurate or correct to paint the simplistic picture that with the GST a $2,000 skidoo will increase by 7 per cent, as if there were no tax at all incorporated in either the price of the skidoo or the cost of transportation once the skidoo reaches Yellowknife.

Now that it is established that there currently exists a form of indirect taxation on transportation and the items themselves, let us look at the effect of the proposed changes as a result of the coming into force of the GST, how it will affect the economy of the north as well as the pocket books of those people who have bothered to come down and watch the proceedings of the Senate this afternoon. Let me refer to some figures which, unfortunately, are only for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, although I am assured by officials of the Department of Finance that they are proportionately applicable as far as both Labrador and northern Quebec are concerned. In aggregate, residents of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories pay about $70 million per year in sales tax under the existing system. That amounts to approximately $850 per person. Under the GST it is forecast that there will be a net reduction of approximately $10 million in the overall tax burden for residents of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, resulting in a net saving per person of $125 and a net saving per family of $275.

Senator Lucier: That is if everything is passed on.

Senator Cogger: Currently industries in the territories pay a substantial amount of sales tax on virtually all their purchases. These purchases are either taxed directly, as in the case of motor vehicle fuels and telecommunications services, or indirectly as a result of the manufacturers' sales tax that is paid at previous stages of construction or production. In addition, purchasers of capital goods such as machinery equipment and buildings, must pay a substantial amount of sales tax under the current system. On average the current MST accounts for about 4 per cent of the total price of capital goods. Even though the existing system provides for a number of exemptions from sales tax in the resource sector, the tax accounts for almost 3 per cent of the price of capital goods produced by this sector. Overall, sales tax reform—that is, the bringing into force of the GST—is expected to increase real input in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories by about $40 million in today's dollars. As I have said, I have been assured by the Department of Finance officials that similar increases and rebates, where they apply, are forecast for Labrador and Northern Quebec.

In addition to the structural elements of the GST which will be of benefit to the north, I would also like to outline briefly some other benefits and programs which the government has specifically targeted for northern communities. The Northern Benefits Program, which is administered through the Income Tax Act, provides for an annual deduction of income of up to $5,400 in recognition of the higher living costs associated with living in northern and isolated areas. It also provides for two employer-provided trips per year—in other words, the GST will be paid by the employer—which are not treated as taxable benefits for income tax purposes. The existing Postal Rate Subsidy Program currently provides a subsidy of about $15 million per year to assist in the transportation costs of perishable goods to northern regions. In addition, the Government of Canada has a formula financing agreement with the governments of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories to allow them to subsidize the purchase of services on behalf of their residents. This program allots about $14,500 for each resident of the Northwest Territories and $7,600 for each resident of the Yukon.

I thought I would bring these figures on the subsidies to the attention of colleagues opposite because it gets depressing listening, as we have this afternoon, to their doom and gloom. They have had nothing good to say about the measures the Government of Canada has put in place to alleviate the difficulties northerners face, which we all know and recognize.

Senator Lucier: Are you going to give us the figures on the subsidies that the people of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces receive? If you are going to give them for the north, you might as well give them for the other regions.

Senator Cogger: I would be pleased to do that. As I indicated—

Senator Simard: This is public information, by the way. Why didn't you use the figures on Quebec, Ontario or wherever?

Senator Cogger: I would be pleased to provide the honourable senator with those numbers as they apply to northern Quebec and Labrador either tomorrow or on the following days.

Senator Lucier: I am talking about all of Quebec.

Senator Doyle: Oh, you are changing the subject.

Senator Cogger: I thought this amendment had to do with Northern Quebec.

Senator Lucier: Half of the figures you have given have nothing to do with the amendment, and I accept that, but if you are going to give those figures, why do you not give the figures of, for example, Quebec?

Senator Cogger: My figures apply to the entire north. I will give the honourable senator the numbers for northern Quebec, because it is mentioned in the amendment. It so happens, if you look at a map, that parts of Quebec are in the south. The numbers will be provided to the honourable senator in due course.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, for all the reasons I just mentioned, I think that we on this side of the Chamber realize what is behind the Liberal amendments we have been served up for almost three weeks, at a rate of two or three per week, without fair warning for the government side, which means we never know ahead of time what we will be discussing on a given day. That just shows how seriously the Official Opposition takes debate in this Chamber.

In any case, when given a chance, I believe we do make a serious effort to consider the amendments that are tabled, and to examine them to the best of our ability, even if they were tabled late in the day and practically as a dilatory measure. We do make an effort, nevertheless, to consider them and to respond as best we can. And this is just one more instance of an amendment that, to me, is redundant, useless, unnecessary, dilatory, belated and, consequently, an amendment that deserves to be defeated. Thank you.

● (1720)

Hon. Willie Adams: I have a question for Senator Cogger which relates to the comments he made about transportation costs in the north. I would remind him that shipping articles in the Arctic is quite different from shipping articles by truck from city to city in southern Canada. Any item, even building supplies, has to be crated before it is shipped to the north and that involves an additional cost.

The honourable senator mentioned subsidies. If a local person from the community is hired then there is no subsidy. If a schoolteacher, a tradesman such as an electrician or plumber are hired from the south, then they will get a northern allowance.

The people in the gallery today come from the communities of the north. The mayors of the municipalities are here today. They are concerned about everything being taxed and the increased cost of goods and services. Representatives of the municipality are concerned because they will have to pay 7 per cent more tax when they hire people to work in the community.

The honourable senator also mentioned that some people in the community are paid by the government. I live in Rankin Inlet and I work for the government. When I fly from Rankin Inlet to Winnipeg, that flight is subsidized, but the flight from Winnipeg to Ottawa is not subsidized. People living in Baffin or in Frobisher Bay who want to go to Montreal will benefit from the government subsidy, but if they want to go to Florida then they will have to pay full fare.

I think the GST will hurt people living in the north and that is why the people here today have come to the Senate. They are concerned about the fact that everything from snow removal equipment to the cost of electricity will go up.

Senator Cogger: As I understand the point Senator Adams was making it is that everything will be "higher." I would just like to say that "higher" is a relative term. Higher than what? Seven per cent is higher than nothing; but the point I was making is that it is a falsehood to try to convince people that there is currently no tax and, therefore, 7 per cent is higher. That is not the situation and senators opposite, including Senator Adams, know it.

As a matter of fact, when I look at this Mayday message that went from Senator Molgat, Senator Buckwold and other people to the Canadian Parliamentary Association, I see in paragraph 8 a reference to Bill C-62 where they say that the bill is a complex and far-reaching bill which seems to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, currently at 13.5 per cent, with a more broadly based value-added tax of 7 per cent. That is the case, and to say to these people that everything will go up by 7 per cent is just not correct. The 13.5 per cent that Senator Lucier mentioned is already in the cost of the skidoo and it is also hidden somewhere in the cost of transportation of the skidoo to Yellowknife. That is the point I was making.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I rise to support the motion of Senator Watt on behalf of Senator MacEachen that Bill C-62 be amended to make special provision for the Yukon, Northwest Territories, northern Quebec and Labrador.

In so doing, let me first deal with the extemporaneous remarks of Senator Cogger. I have a chard of sympathy for his discomfort in the absence of substantial notice of which amendment will be presented on the part of senators on this side. The reason is that it is the opinion of senators here, which I am sure he knows, that this bill is so defective that so many amendments could be presented that, of course, surprise is inevitable. Our choice is from amongst a panoply of options.

Senator Cogger: The people in the gallery know.

Senator Austin: Do you suppose, Senator Cogger, the people in the gallery today would have listened to you with anything but hostility? Your remarks are, at best, beside the point and, at worst, they are downright ignorant of the conditions of people in Canada's north.

Senator Lucier: Right on!

Senator Austin: I served in the Department of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources for five years; I served in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for four years; and I was Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development for nearly a year, so I claim some knowledge of conditions in the north and some knowledge of government policy over some period of time in the attempt to create, in the north, attractive and habitable living conditions and an incentive to Canadians and others to invest in the development of the north; to invest in the resource potential of the north; and to create, in the north, a viable economy and a modern and contemporary society. The numbers you give are, as I said, at best, beside the point.

Senator Lucier was right in asking you to be fair when you recite numbers transferring funds from the federal government to northern governments, and to compare those numbers with transfer payments made to other provinces. That is not an unfair request. You are not comparing like with like. What we are seeing in your remarks is immense fuel for the next election in the three ridings in the north. Senator Cogger, you will be famous in your wind-up remarks. The great paragraph in the latter part of your speech so dismisses northern Canadians that I would be surprised if you would not want to do as your Prime Minister has done and go up north and do a "mea culpa" to apologize for your views and for your behaviour with respect to northern residents.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is to put right only one aspect of the disadvantage which is suffered by northern residents. It is to put right the increasing burden which the GST will put on northern residents. I cannot begin to list the number of inequities in terms of the cost burden laid on northerners in other parts of our system.

• (1730)

What is sought here are three things: First, that all goods and services in the north, including transportation supplied in that area be free of the GST; secondly, that residents of the North purchasing goods and services anywhere in Canada be exempt from GST, provided these goods and services are used in the North; thirdly, that no GST is charged for travel within the North, or anywhere in Canada, by residents of the North and no GST is charged for transportation services for goods shipped from anywhere in Canada to the North. In other words, Northerners are carrying a heavy enough burden today by living in the North and are asking for a GST-free zone. That, honourable senators, is eminently justified.

Senator Stollery earlier in this debate spoke about the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker and his policy of giving an affirmative action program to the development of the North. That is the policy that this government should be extending. That is the policy that all governments, up until this time, have followed. Many of the transfer payments that Senator Cogger referred to are the policies of earlier Liberal governments.

What is happening in the North today is that there is an enormous inflation taking place in the cost of northern fuels, one of the largest items in the cost of living. This is not an item of luxury. This is not an item of option that people in the North can do without. The base price of fuel has risen enormously. On top of that, as Senator Cogger was not willing to tell us, the cost of transporting fuel from the south is a full GST cost, and it will be borne by the northern resident. That, honourable senators, ought not to be if this government has its sights set on the development of the area north of 60, northern Quebec and Labrador, as a frontier of Canada which ought to be developed in the interests of Northerners and, indeed, of all Canadians.

There is a substantial future for the Canadian economy in northern Canada, and the government of which I was a member, as Senator Lucier will recall, put the Yukon's economy back on its feet by assisting in the redevelopment of the Cyprus Anvil Mine. That was not a question on which people said, "Well then, they will have to develop a mine in Quebec and a mine in British Columbia and a mine on Prince Edward Island." Forty per cent of the GDP of the Yukon is based on the production of the Cyrpus Anvil Mine. What we did was to restore its economic viability by funding studies, by supporting pit slope stability, by better economic use of that resource, and by better mining techniques. The federal government put up a substantial part of that money, and today that is a viable, stand-on-its-own-feet operation in the Yukon.

Senator Lucier: And 40 per cent of our economy!

Senator Austin: As Senator Lucier says, and as I mentioned, it is 40 per cent of the GDP of the Yukon.

Honourable senators, the North is a special place. It cannot be equated with other parts of Canada. It is a part of our frontier, and it is the homeland of northern natives, Inuit and Indians. It is now also the homeland of a very considerable population of people from southern Canada. They are willing to stake their futures and the well-being of their families on their personal investment in the development of that part of Canada.

Honourable senators, that part of Canada, particularly the Northwest Territories, is a unique part of Canada in that the population is more substantially a native population than it is in southern communities. We have an opportunity, honourable senators, to further the social development of those communities and to further the cultural respect of those communities for one another.

That sort of respect and building of Canada does not seem to be understood by this government, honourable senators. This is a government that seems to be enamoured with divisiveness. They do not seem to understand the underlying social and political bonding that has to occur in a country if it is to be an optimistic, creative and constructive country.

Allow me to tell you of the remarks of two Conservatives just in the last few days. In The Gazette of November 18, there is a headline which reads "Stanfield fed up with West's attitude". While speaking at a McGill University Law Faculty Conference on Canada's future, Robert Stanfield, the former Leader of the Federal Conservative Party, said he is frustrated with western Canada. He said:

> Perhaps what we should do is go back to 1867, and Ontario and Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia should effect a deal together, and the others should apply to come in.

The article continues:

> ... Stanfield said he was dismayed by continual talk throughout the conference of an apparent hardening of opinion in the West against Quebec, a hard line witnessed in popular support for the idea of an elected Senate that would rob Quebec of its traditionally-strong representation.
> People out west just don't want to hear about Quebec and central Canada's solutions for the country, he said.

The article continues:

> "'We're fed up with the whole discussion,'" Stanfield said.

Honourable senators, how do you build national unity when an important Conservative leader is expressing himself as being fed up with the attitudes of Canadians in some parts of the country?

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I represent western Canada. Mr. Stanfield says he is fed up with our attitude in Western Canada, and by parity of reasoning, I am sure he is fed up with the attitude of northern Canadians as well.

Honourable senators, another sign of a party that does not understand its task, is shown in an article that reports that Progressive Conservative MP Pierrette Venne said that she and several other Quebec Tory backbenchers considered jumping ship to the sovereigntist Bloc Québecois, but they decided instead to fight for a five-region Canada.

Senator Murray: That is just what Mr. Chrétien said.

Senator Austin: No, he did not say anything of the sort.

Senator Murray: Yes, exactly.

Senator Austin: We can debate Mr. Chrétien when you get on your feet, Senator Murray. I know you are uncomfortable with the line of argument I am taking, but if you do not mind, I will continue with it. Even if you do mind, I will still continue with it.

Madame Venne was talking about a group of Conservative MPs in the other place who have become a caucus for the purpose of pushing this particular line. She wants the federal government to be stripped of many of its present powers. She would have five divisions: Ontario, with 9.4 million; Quebec and Labrador, with 6.6 million. That addition of Labrador is interesting. Where is Senator Marshall? The Atlantic region would have 2.3 million, including Newfoundland, but apparently not its present Labrador territory. Can you believe that, Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: I cannot believe that!

Senator Austin: Then the Prairies and Northwest Territories would have 4.5 million; and British Columbia and the Yukon would have 2.5 million. What would these regions be? They would be super-power regions with tremendous jurisdiction over things like cultural affairs, education, roads, police and municipalities. They would have exclusive control, honourable senators, of native affairs. I wonder if the native community will be asked for its opinion by the government, or is this policy, coming from the Quebec caucus, a "seamless web"?

Senator Lucier: Once they put it out, you cannot change it!

• (1740)

Senator Austin: I remember a struggle many years ago in which the then Minister of Energy, the Honourable René Lévesque, wanted jurisdiction of all native affairs in Quebec transferred to the province of Quebec along with all the money the Government of Canada was spending in the province of Quebec.

Senator Murray: Tell us about Mr. Chrétien's white paper.

Senator Frith: The last thing they want to hear about is the GST. Tell us about anything, but do not tell us about the GST.

Senator Austin: Let us go on with this Quebec caucus demand: Agriculture, Employment and Immigration, Health, Welfare, Social Services, Science and Technology, Fisheries and Oceans, Labour and Communication. Ottawa would keep exclusive jurisdiction over 12 areas.

Senator Steuart: The national debt!

Senator Austin: That is for sure. External Affairs, the environment, currency in the Bank of Canada, criminal justice, internal security, maritime rail and air transport.

Madam Venne's document states, and I quote: "A political vacuum exists in Canada." A political vacuum exists somewhere, but I do not think it is in Canada. I think it is in the Conservative caucus. I think the attitude of people in the party opposite towards building a national system in which all of us live in a common society and respect and support one another is an attitude gone. I do not want to go back to John A. Macdonald's time, but this government simply does not understand building consensus; it does not understand social bonding; it does not understand the networking that has to go on to pull disparate parts of the country together.

Honourable senators, there is a novel solution available to Canadians. I wish to quote from one more newspaper article. On Sunday, November 18, the Ottawa Sun, which is not a newspaper I usually quote, and obviously I am scraping with this one—

Senator Murray: You said it.

Senator Austin: It is a fascinating vignette. This article states that Alberta MP, Willie Littlechild, was served Friday with a court document claiming he has failed in his duty to represent his constituents' opposition to the controversial GST.

There, honourable senators, is an interesting solution that is available to Canadians. Canadians in each constituency in Canada can commence actions against their members of Parliament, and hopefully against Conservative senators, for failing properly to represent their interests with respect to this legislation.

Honourable senators, I hope Senator Cogger will listen, because he had such a fascinating and erroneous comment. One of the great additional costs of the GST in the north is the cost of transporting people and goods. It is the additional tax on transportation that is one of the most significant reasons for raising prices and lowering incomes in that area. The GST will directly add another 7 per cent to those prices. Northern residents will not benefit to the same extent as southern Canadians from the substitution of the GST for the existing federal sales tax on many goods. Although the FST applies at a higher rate than the GST, the FST is usually entered at the manufacturing or wholesale level, which typically does not include transportation to the point of sale.

The 7 per cent GST, on the other hand, applies to the final price of the good or service, including the cost of transporting that item. Thus, northern residents will not see the same price reductions available to Canadians living closer to the manufacturing source. Therefore, Senator Cogger, you missed the point entirely. Your briefing was bad. You did not spend enough time with someone, and they could have done better for you.

Territorial government officials at the meeting of the Senate Banking Committee in Yellowknife said that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 33 per cent higher than in Edmonton, and once housing is included this differential increases to 40 per cent. To illustrate what it means to apply the GST to prices that are on average 33 per cent higher, let me use an example given to the Senate Banking Committee by the Northwest Territories Chamber of Commerce. Prior to the GST, goods which are purchased for $1 in Edmonton would cost $1.33 in Yellowknife. Introduction of the GST adds 7 per cent to the purchase of goods in each location. The goods purchased in Edmonton would now cost $1.07, while the goods bought in Yellowknife would cost $1.42. Thus, while the increase in Edmonton is seven cents, the increase in Yellowknife amounts to nine cents. This differential is magnified by the remoteness of the community, as Senator Lucier stated earlier. The cost of living in outlying northern communities, such as Grise Fiord, can be over 100 per cent more expensive than in southern Canada. Similarly, the cost of living in other Yukon communities such as Old Crow can be up to 60 per cent greater than in Whitehorse, which is in itself a lot more expensive than sourthern locations.

Honourable senators, while it may be true that nominal incomes in the north do exceed those in the south, the higher costs do not suggest a better standard of living. Not only are the GST credits too low to compensate northerners for the significantly greater amount of GST that they would pay, but the income threshold at which the benefits would be taxed back is too low.

Honourable senators, there is much I could or would say. My colleagues have put on the record unanswered and also unanswerable arguments. Senator Fairbairn gave a simple illustration that makes the burden of northerners totally clear. Her research shows that today a 25-pound Grade A turkey in Ottawa costs $44. Last year at The Bay in Iqaluit, that turkey cost $79. Goodness knows what it will cost today, or even if they can afford to ship turkeys into Iqaluit.

Honourable senators, I support Senator Watt's motion. Senator Watt, Senator Adams, Senator Lucier and other senators on this side have argued very well. I believe that honourable senators opposite, sitting mainly silent as they do through this debate, are silent for the reason that they have nothing to say in reply. They are bound to a political commitment. They are bound to remain deaf and dumb on the subject of the GST. I do not know why, Senator Watt, you were appealing to Senator Murray's conscience. By definition, a leader of a government on that side in that party has no conscience. He has an interest and his interest does not coincide with your interest. His interest is to have this legislation passed. Your interest is to defend the people of the north from an even heavier burden, an even more inequitable burden. There will be 12 months of summertime in Fort Chimo before that party and that government comes to any serious understanding about the north.

Honourable senators, I said on November 14 that there would be a referendum on the GST in the city of Vancouver. It was held last Saturday, November 17. On November 14, I stated that some 85 per cent of the residents of Vancouver were likely to vote against the GST. The question put was a simple one: Do you favour the GST? It was put there by unanimous resolution of the city council of Vancouver. Honourable senators, 85 per cent of Vancouverites said they did not favour the GST. The same or better was true in three other British Columbia communities that held a referendum on the same topic.

• (1750)

In British Columbia there is virtually unanimous rejection of this tax. Can you imagine if there was a referendum on this tax in the north?

Senator Lucier: It would be 103 per cent.

Senator Austin: It should be 130 per cent against.

I urge all honourable senators to search their conscience and, more than that, their dreams for Canada and support this amendment.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I will say just a few words in support of this amendment.

First, I have been impressed by the almost total silence on the other side concerning this extremely unfair situation. We already have an unfair situation in the north regarding costs and living conditions especially as it affects the native people, the Inuit, Indian and Métis people up there. This GST will make that unfair situation far worse.

Senator Simard: Rhetoric, rhetoric. Words.

Senator Steuart: Did someone leave a window open?

Senator Simard: Give us some facts like my colleague did.

Senator Steuart: He calls those facts. He got a written speech from the department and he could not even read it. If anyone asked him a question, he would not know what it was based on. You can ask me about any facts I put on the record and I will gladly answer.

Senator Cogger: Tell us what the amendment is again?

Senator Steuart: You had a chance to speak, senator. You come from a part of Canada that has been treated very unfairly.

Senator Simard: You want me to speak?

Senator Steuart: Why not get up and speak on behalf of those people? You just sit in your seat and heckle people who are trying to speak in this debate.

Senator Simard: We were there; we met those people.

Senator Steuart: Just listen to this for a minute. Who spoke in favour of this amendment? Senator Charlie Watt, Senator Willie Adams, Senator Paul Lucier. I find it interesting that we also listened to Members of Parliament from the Northwest Territories and the Yukon and none of them were Conservatives. Never a Conservative senator from the Northwest Territories or the Yukon, put here by the Tories. Never. You did not have too many chances, thank God, but you had lots of opportunities to do it. What about members of the House of Commons? Not one. Why? Because of your attitude towards the north. You people should act like John Diefenbaker, or Mike Pearson, or any of the Prime Ministers over the last 50 years who gave their all for the north.

You had a chance to get up and make some contribution and say how unfair this tax is. You could have talked about the terrible inequity of this tax, what it is doing to northern Canada, how it will cripple any chance of development in northern Canada. Yet not a word. None of you. Nothing except a speech written by the Department of Finance that the senator could hardly read, and did not understand when he did read it, because he would not answer one question. He was covered for by the honourable senator from New Brunswick who seldom makes a speech, he just sits in his seat and heckles the very positive senators on this side who are making—

Senator Simard: What did the Liberal government do for the north? You never did anything for the north. You never resolved their problems. You created problems in the north.

Senator Steuart: How is it that the northerners could not get to the polls fast enough to throw all of you people out? Eric Nielsen should have run again. He would have been down the drain at the hands of the NDP. That is what the people of the Northwest Territories thought of you before the GST. I think you will have trouble getting anyone to run in the next election after the GST.

Senator Simard: You people created the mess in the north.

Senator Steuart: Northerners say that our national anthem talks about the true north strong and free, yet northerners often feel their portion of Canada is constantly overlooked or forgotten when policies are developed and legislation is devised. One has only to come from the south to an arctic community and visit one of the small local stores to see what they are talking about. They are not talking about luxury items, they are talking about necessities. The economic burden falls on people who face a host of problems which include low educational levels, marginal or seasonal employment, the harshest climate in North America, severe housing shortages, minimal access to training programs, and a high birth rate as well as inadequate social services and serious social disruption.

This has all happened in the last six or seven years. No wonder there are no Conservative members up there. On top of that extremely unfair situation, you are adding the GST.

Honourable senators over there say they have not had any notice. I will make you a deal right now.

Senator Cogger: Would the honourable senator settle a difference between Senator Kelly and me? He argues that I have not convinced you this afternoon. Is that correct? I thought I had you convinced.

Senator Steuart: The honourable senator is rich; he wants this tax. The poor people and middle income people hate the tax and you Tories over there love it because if we do not get this tax and we have to pay the national debt, you might have to pay more taxes. I like Senator Kelly but I am not impressed by the fact that he is against this amendment.

Here is the deal I was about to offer you. You people say that you did not get any notice. I have not talked to our leadership but I am sure they will agree. Stand up right now and let me move adjournment of this debate, set aside all the rules, for two weeks. You will have a chance to prepare everything you want, and we will come back in two weeks and finish the debate on this amendment. What could be fairer?

Senator Frith: Seconded by Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: No way.

Senator Steuart: He is speechless. I am so sure that we are being so fair that I did not even consult my leadership. We will do it right now. Do you agree?

Senator Doody: Question.

Senator Steuart: They are obviously not about to agree, so we better put the question.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Senator Watt moved on behalf of Senator MacEachen, seconded by Senator

Adams, that Bill C-62 be not now read a third time but that the Schedule of the Bill be amended, on page 342, to make special provision for the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec and Labrador by adding to Schedule VI, and numbering accordingly, a new heading and Part as follows:

"YUKON, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES, NORTHERN QUEBEC AND LABRADOR

1. In this Part,

"Labrador" means that part of Labrador within the Province of Newfoundland;

"Northern Quebec" means the part of Quebec that is north of the 55th parallel of north latitude.

2. A supply of any goods, service or property made in the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador.

3. A supply of any goods, service or property made to a resident of the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador for use or consumption primarily in the Yukon, Northwest Territories, Northern Quebec or Labrador.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS ON BILL C-62

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have petitions which, although not coming from Quebec, are nonetheless relevant because they are coming from Northern Canada, and particularly from Igloolik, a small community of fewer than 1,000 where, as my collegues pointed out, I had the pleasure of spending the Easter week this year. My stay there convinced me that there was no exaggeration in what we heard yesterday about how hard and how expensive life is in the north. It was not absolutely true.

I will take the liberty of reading to you the short letter accompanying the petition from Igloolik. It is adressed to the Honorable Senate of Canada.

[English]

> To Whom It May Concern;
> On behalf of Management and Staff, the Board of Directors, our 200 Co-op Members and their immediate families, we wish to go on record as being opposed to the GST Tax as proposed by the Federal government. We firmly believe that this tax will be another burden on the people of this northern region who because of their geographic location already have the highest cost of living in Canada.
> Co-operatively yours,
> Isaac W. Gullage-manager.
> Igloolik Co-operative Ltd.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I will read only a few names, because some are difficult to pronounce for someone who does not speak Inuktituk.

(Names of signatories read)

In any case, some names are written in Inuktitut, the Inuit language. I will skip those altogether.

(Names of signatories read)

These people are members of a co-operative in the north. They will be hit twice by this tax.

(Names of signatories read)

There are names that I cannot read to you. I am terribly sorry!

(Names of signatories read)

Follows a number of names written in Inuktitut. I will not even try to read them out loud.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1410)

I have another petition from the north. This one is from Resolute Bay.

(Names of signatories read)

I have a few others from Pond Inlet. Allow me to read you some names.

(Names of signatories read)

I am truly sorry . . . I hope the people from Pond Inlet will forgive me, but the writing is more difficult to read. There is even a petition completely written in Inuktitut. It comes from Repulse Bay.

(Names of signatories read)

There must be a distinct society in that area!

• (1420)

(Names of signatories read)

These are all people from Rankin Inlet.

(Names of signatories read)

That is it for Rankin Inlet. Now, here is a petition from Iqaluit, a larger administrative center, but still a pretty small place where the cost of living is extremely high.

(Names of signatories read)

It used to be called Frobisher Bay. It is now Iqaluit.

(Names of signatories read)

• (1430)

Senator Hébert: I will now do something unusual which I imagine senators opposite will appreciate. For the very first time, I received a petition supporting the GST. I never tabled one before because I never get any. However, this was unusual, and I said to myself that, after all, it was my duty to table it. It's the only one I've had so far, but table it I must!

(Names of signatories read)

Senator Tremblay: He must have a few enemies.

Senator Hébert: I suppose so. This is from a Mr. Gérard Godin.

(Names of signatories read)

He took the trouble to say: "I am in favour of the GST because, let's face it (there is a spelling mistake, but anyway), someday we will have to pay. Might as well pay now. This is an upstanding citizen who belongs to the 15 per cent that is still in favour of the GST. However, since this was the first one, in fact the only one I received so far, I thought I should table it, quite frankly, and that is what I have done.

Senator Tremblay: What names are on the petition?

Senator Hébert: Well there is just one name. It's not a very big petition, I can't make it any bigger. This is the only one I got and there is only one name on the petition. I'm not sure, but I get the impression he couldn't find anyone, not even in his own family. He is all alone.

Now, here is one that is more comforting, signed by 310 residents of Mistassini in the Lac Saint-Jean area. They call upon the Senate to reject the goods and services tax bill. So here we see the names of—

(Names of signatories read)

• (1440)

Senator Hébert: I always have time. I have a petition signed by 40 residents of Avenir, in Quebec, who oppose the proposed bill on the Goods and Services Tax.

(Names of signatories read)

I have tens of thousands of others but I will stop here.

• (1450)

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a great many petitions from citizens protesting the proposed imposition of the goods and services tax, which they think is unfair and should be replaced by real tax reform.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have another petition.

(Names of signatories read)

Honourable senators, I have yet another petition.

• (1500)

(Names of signatories read)

I have a number of other petitions to present.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the honourable senator yield?

Honourable senators, there is a bill on the Order Paper, Bill C-87, dealing with Veterans Affairs, that has been the subject of some discussion on both sides, and in particular between Senator Marshall and Senator Neiman. I believe that they have arranged, with the support of their caucuses, to interrupt the proceedings now so that the bill can be brought forward for second reading. We will hear short speeches and then the bill will probably receive second reading and be sent to the committee. I understand the Social Affairs committee is teed up to hear the Minister at 4 o'clock; certainly it is our custom to make sure that all bills receive attention from committees, and this committee might well report even later this afternoon; we might then complete all stages of that bill today, if everything goes in accordance with the agreement between Senator Marshall and Senator Neiman.

If Senator Marsden, the chairman of the committee, concurs, we can interrupt these proceedings now and have that done.

If, with unanimous consent, your Honour would call Order No. 5, we might proceed to second reading and debate along the lines I have just suggested.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that we proceed to Order No. 5? Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: And it is understood that we will return to where we are now after that bill has been dealt with.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that when second reading is completed, we will return to Presentation of Petitions?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

STATUTE LAW IN RELATION TO WAR VETERANS

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-87, to amend the statue law in relation to war veterans.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to present legislation that I am sure will be welcomed by veterans and their dependents. Bill C-87 is another example of Veterans Affairs Canada keeping in step with changing times.

Before I refer to any details of the bill, honourable senators, the Minister of Veterans Affairs Canada has asked me to thank the Senate on his behalf for all the attention it has given to matters affecting veterans.

The Minister and his officials are giving careful consideration to the views presented to the Senate Subcommittee on Veteran Affairs and will be extremely interested in reading the Senate report that is to be released shortly.

Honourable senators should know that the House of Commons debated second reading of Bill C-87 in committee of the Whole and gave the bill third reading on October 12. After Bill C-87 was sent to committee in the other place, representatives of Canada's major veterans' organizations—the Royal Canadian Legion, the National Council of Veteran Associations, and the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans in Canada, the three groups that represent the majority of veterans in Canada—gave the legislation detailed attention and suggested a number of improvements. Those suggestions are incorporated in the legislation before you.

You can readily see, honourable senators, that Bill C-87 has the approval of all parties in the House of Commons and is endorsed by organizations representing veterans.

Honourable senators, Bill C-87 amends a large number of Acts of Parliament. Most of the amendments are of a housekeeping nature, clarifying confusing language and generally clearing away the clutter that has built up over the years. Consequently, I will only highlight a few items.

The first item deals with administered accounts, which are handled by Veterans Affairs or other third parties when veterans cannot look after their own affairs and someone has to see that the monthly disability pension cheque or the War Veterans Allowance payment are deposited in the banks and bills are paid.

At one time the Department of Veterans Affairs handled 10,000 such accounts, but it was felt that it would be better for the veteran if a relative or a friend handled the funds; therefore, over time, the number of accounts actually administered by Veterans Affairs has been whittled down to about 1,000.

These accounts pay no interest. They were regarded in the way that bank chequing accounts used to be regarded: a service was performed and payment for the service came in the form of waived interest. That is not the case today. Interest is paid on virtually every bank account. Bill C-87 will allow the government to do the same.

It is estimated that the government will be paying about $3.5 to the holders of these accounts. Interest payments will be back-dated to the beginning of the year.

Honourable senators, I might indicate that in our subcommittee discussions with the various departments in P.E.I., we met the head of every agency within the department, and Senator Bonnell was the one who pointed out that there were many cases of veterans not being able to handle their own accounts and not getting interest and not having any administration being done on their accounts.

That is what I am referring to when I say that Bill C-87 is an example of the Department of Veterans Affairs keeping in step with the times. This was never done before, but it is being done now. Perhaps it should have been done a long time ago.

• (1510)

The second major amendment also affects administered accounts. It is not uncommon for a veteran owning such an account to die without leaving a will or an heir. Until now, unclaimed moneys went into general revenue; but the Royal Canadian Legion, for one, has argued that these veterans' funds should continue to help veterans. The case was made that, because of the special bond existing between those who served in wartime, veterans would rather see their estates assist their buddies rather than have them swallowed up into anonymous government pots.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs has heartily endorsed this approach, and that is why Bill C-87 provides that a special trust fund be established to use those unclaimed moneys for the benefit of needy veterans and their families.

It is not possible to estimate how much money will go into the fund each year. Obviously, it depends on the number of veterans who die without an heir, and on their individual wealth.

Honourable senators, I will comment on two other changes.

The first will assist widows or widowers of what are known as class 21 pensioners. Those pensioners receive a lump sum payment rather than monthly pension cheques, because their disability has been assessed at less than 5 per cent. Nonetheless, they are also entitled to a monthly attendance allowance payment should their health problems make it necessary to have attendant care in the home.

Until the introduction of this bill, attendance allowance was cut off within a month of the death of the class 21 pensioner. All other widows or widowers of disability pensions are able to retain this benefit for up to a year. Bill C-87 will give the same right to class 21 widows and widowers.

Honourable senators should know that this particular amendment continues the compassionate regard the government has for recently-bereaved widows or widowers.

Senator Frith: Don't push it now.

Senator Marshall: The government believes that a bereaved spouse has enough to worry about without having financial upheaval added to the strain. This is why the Department of Veterans Affairs uses every opportunity to give widows and widowers a year's grace before reducing or eliminating benefits. They have done that before with the disability pension. After the veteran died, benefits were cut off after a month. An amendment was then introduced to allow the widow or widower to receive the disability pension for a year in order to allow adjustment to new circumstances.

Just this summer the Minister of Veterans Affairs announced that the surviving spouses of veterans who had been receiving veterans independence program benefits would be able to retain groundskeeping and housekeeping assistance for up to a year after the death of a veteran.

The final item I call to your attention is the elimination of a means test for pensioner parents of handicapped children. Pensioner parents of children attending school have no such hurdle to cross, and the Minister of Veterans Affairs feels it is high time that handicapped children had the same treatment.

Honourable senators, as I said earlier, the rest of the legislation, while lengthy, is basically housekeeping. Any shortcomings were resolved by departmental officials and representatives of veterans' organizations after Bill C-87 was initially introduced into the House of Commons.

In the debate on October 12 there was some Opposition complaint about matters not included in the legislation. The Minister of Veterans Affairs pointed out that a special committee of representatives of veterans' organizations had already been formed to study such matters as the status of merchant seamen, and other matters having to do with veterans' benefits.

Honourable senators, I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and veterans throughout Canada will appreciate speedy attention in dealing with this legislation. I commend the bill, which provides a few more benefits to veterans and, in addition, will eliminate anomalies in order to clarify the text or to make the legislation easier to administer on behalf of veterans.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable Senators, I am very grateful to Senator Marshall for his skilful explanation of the important provisions of Bill C-87, because it relieves me of the necessity of explaining them again in detail.

It was very appropriate and timely that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Gerald Merrithew, introduced Bill C-87 in the other place just before our national day of remembrance, when we honour those Canadians who served, fought and died in two world wars and the Korean War. We honoured, too, those who survived, some apparently undamaged, some physically damaged for the rest of their lives, and others—such as those who were prisoners of war of the Japanese—who had apparently survived intact but whose experiences gradually incapacitated them physically, mentally and emotionally. Often the after-effects did not become apparent for years and it took successive governments even longer to recognize finally that such veterans had also been battle-scarred and that they too deserved the recognition, care and compensation that had earlier been awarded to other disabled veterans.

Unfortunately there are still many areas where our debt to our veterans has not been fully and adequately acknowledged, and our government seems to have moved frustratingly slowly in making amends. Bill C-87 is another small but important step in the right direction.

Bill C-87 may seem somewhat long and complicated but, as explained to us by Senator Marshall, who is Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, and who has worked tirelessly and unceasingly for many years on behalf of veterans, it contains just three significant changes regarding pension benefits and their administration. The remaining provisions are non-controversial housekeeping measures to provide policy consistency, improve wording and to streamline procedures. I do wish, as I am sure does Senator Marshall, that the bill contained several more long- requested corrective provisions of a more substantial nature. As veterans age, their needs, and those of their dependents increase. Therefore, the obligation of government should be enlarged accordingly. On the other hand, because the numbers of those requiring our care are decreasing each year, the difference in the expenditure of public money, which we should not, in any case, begrudge, is not significant.

The proposed amendments in Bill C-87 are ones with which we can all agree and are those which various veterans' associations have requested for several years. However, I should like to take a few minutes to review with you a few of those remaining problems which successive governments have failed to deal with adequately.

The effect of the clawback provisions on pensioners' benefits in Bill C-28, which was recently passed by Parliament is still to be assessed. Moreover, how will the GST, if it is passed, affect their incomes? We might obtain some answers to those questions when Bill C-87 is referred to committee.

I also understand that there remain restrictive provisions regarding the number of days of medical treatment allowed pensioners, and that creates real hardship for those with minimal incomes. I am sure that all Canadians would want pensioners to have unlimited medical assistance for as long as they need it.

Pensioners' widows are presently ineligible to receive any increase in pension awarded after her spouse's death. That is extremely unfair, because not only have those widows lost their husbands, but they have to make do on less money and with a shrinking dollar each year. That inequity must be changed quickly.

The many cases of hardship faced by Canadian veterans who chose to live in other countries after their war service, absolutely demand early and final resolution. In particular, many veterans after World War II chose, for personal reasons, to remain in Britain or to return to live there because they had no job to come back to here in Canada.

• (1520)

The War Veterans Allowance Act still stipulates that veterans or their widows must be resident in Canada when applying for an allowance; or, if the allowance is to be paid outside of Canada, the recipient must have a total of 12 months continuous residency in Canada. Senator Marshall, who has worked for years trying to rectify this situation, and to persuade government to change these unrealistic and harsh provisions, can tell us of horrifying cases of Canadian veterans and their families facing destitution overseas, who simply cannot afford to come back to Canada in order to apply for their justly-earned benefits, as they are required to do at present.

It is shameful to have our veterans and their families dependent on charity and the meagre handouts from benevolent organizations that are trying to help, when our government will not. Every veteran, and every veteran organization, should increase pressure on the government to change these inhumane conditions.

Finally, let me remind honourable senators of the merchant seamen who managed to survive their service on behalf of Canada and our allies in World War II. As Rear Admiral Leonard W. Murray, who was for a time one of my superiors at naval headquarters here in Ottawa, said when he was later serving as Commander-in-Chief, Canadian Northwest Atlantic:

> Make no mistake, the real victors of the Battle of the Atlantic were not the navies or air forces, but the allied merchant seamen.

The men of the Canadian Merchant Navy were all volunteers in the first and worst years of the war. In 1939, Canada had only 37 sea-going ships and 1,400 seamen, while at war's end the service had expanded to a total of 180 ships and 10,000 seamen, even with the enormous loss of ships and men that had occurred between those dates.

I have a list here of the names of 72 ships that were torpedoed and lost, many with all hands on board. There were countless others that were damaged, again with loss of life, but later repaired and put back into service.

As a Wren, I worked for the Director of Officer Personnel known as DOOP, which was responsible for all naval officers from enlistment through training and service to eventual death or discharge. With every signal we received of the loss of an officer there would be a companion report listing the naval seamen casualties and then another with details of the convoy listing the number of ships lost or disabled, including the merchant ships.

In 1942, the year I went to Ottawa, it was the worst year of the war in the North Atlantic. We were not given the names or the actual numbers of merchant seamen casualties, because the merchant service was under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport; but we knew that the figures were appalling. I have again read statistics which indicate that one out of every four merchant seamen, up to that time, became a casualty. As the tide turned in our favour in the Battle of the North Atlantic, the then Minister of Transport, the Honourable J.E. Michaud, said in April 1943:

> Merchant seamen virtually form the fourth arm of the fighting services, and despite their reticence to blazen abroad their heroic exploits we feel in fairness to them and to their next-of-kin the Canadian public should be told of their work.

I do not believe that enough attention was ever paid to the heroic exploits and sacrifices of our merchant seamen. Certainly those who survived were never accorded the same recognition and treatment as enlisted members of the armed forces after the war with respect to severance pay, disability, education and pension benefits, as well as medical services. There were also many other inequities, some of which have been corrected, or at least partially corrected, over the years, and others which remain.

The award of the Silver Cross was extended not too many years ago to mothers of the merchant seamen who died in service, but despite many requests having been made, the government has not yet commissioned the preparation of a book of remembrance to commemorate those men. At least the government of the U.S.S.R. erected a memorial in Murmansk in recognition of the contribution of merchant seamen who made that infamous run, many countless times, in order to help keep Russian citizens alive during those dreadful years.

The greatest obstacle to removing all vestiges of discrimination in the treatment of our pitifully few remaining merchant seamen and their families is the government's persistent refusal—and I stress that I mean every government since World War II—to recognize the merchant seamen by that magical designation of "veteran"—this despite the fact that the United States of America and Great Britain both changed their laws years ago to accord equal recognition and benefits to their merchant seamen as they have given to the veterans of their armed services. Moreover, our own veterans' associations have all finally agreed that the merchant seamen who served should be treated as "veterans," even though they did not come within the defintion of the word as set out years ago in various federal statutes respecting the armed services.

It was with some distress that I read a transcript of an interview on CBO radio on November 7 last with the Minister of Veterans Affairs in which the Honourable Mr. Merrithew indicated again that he was not yet ready to change the status of the merchant seamen because they had not served in the military and had not been subject to the Code of Military Discipline. Surely they were subject to an equally stringent code—that of dedication to service, hardship, and even death in order to ensure that the allies would eventually win the war.

Let me read an excerpt from an article by Lyndon Jones published in The Whig-Standard of November 6 entitled: "Veterans of merchant navy fight for rightful recognition." It states:

> It was the merchant navy who brought the food to the British people, the raw materials for their factories, the weapons for the armies being formed in their island fortress, the gasoline and oil to keep things moving.
> These men braved atrocious weather conditions and constant danger as they plowed through the oceans in Victory ships, Liberty ships, Park ships, tankers, canallers, tramps and liners, often unescorted. The men aboard these ships realized that, frequently unprotected, they were a sitting target for German U-boats, which could move in under cover of darkness, pick off their victims and then escape out to sea.
> When the torpedoes struck home, those who weren't killed in the explosion jumped into a cold and often storm-tossed, angry sea covered with slimy fuel oil. Some sailors drifted for days, cold, hungry and thirsty, in wet clothing. Those who were lucky were rescued by a passing ship, others simply vanished beneath the sea. Of those rescued, some 200 seamen spent up to four years as prisoners of war.

● (1530)

> It is no exaggeration to say that without these men and the cargoes they nursed through U-boat-infested seas, the war could not have been won. Convoy duty was a completely new experience for these seamen, who before the outbreak of war were used to sailing the spacious expanse of the seas at leisure. Now their captains had to learn to manoeuvre in crowded ranks, without lights, without wireless or navigational aids, with collision and disaster the price of a moment's carelessness.
> Many of those gallant seamen sailing aboard old ships had to contend with worn engines. The engineers had to nurse and spoonfeed the engines so as to avoid making smoke that would betray a convoy's presence. They couldn't pmp the bilges in order not to leave tell-tale traces of oil.
> The amazing thing about all of this is that despite appalling losses, the men of the merchant navy time and time again went back for more. Isn't it time, therefore, that this gallant breed of men are finally given the veteran status they so richly deserve?

I understand that the minister will be appearing before the committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology this afternoon to answer questions with respect to Bill C-87. I do hope you will put that question to him. Ask him why he thinks this matter should be deferred again by referring it back, for study and consensus, to various veterans' organizations when they have already indicated they support the change. Perhaps if we undertake to pass Bill C-87 this afternoon, he will, in turn, undertake to have another bill sent to us before our next Remembrance Day which will correct the inequities and inconsistencies I have mentioned, as well as others I have not taken the time to explain in detail, but, above all, the injustices that were imposed upon the merchant seamen. Let us remember with deeds, not words, those who fought and died for us and our country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I remind you that if Senator Marshall speaks now, it will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to commend Senator Neiman for providing details on our merchant seamen, who, although not coverned in the bill, are of the utmost importance and priority. I can tell her that the Senate subcommittee is highlighting—I do not want to give away the secrets of the subcommittee's report—the cause of merchant seamen, which comprises a good part of our report. Every organization representing merchant seamen or merchant mariners appeared before the committee, and we have been able to send out copies of the proceedings to some 500 organizations and merchant seamen. She can be assured that we will do everything possible to appeal to the minister to correct a wrong that is long overdue.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Marshall, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon, Tuesday, November the 20th, 1990, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we do not propose to continue with more petitions inside the chamber at this point, but as we have reverted to Notices of Motions, I know that Senator Grafstein wishes to give notice of a motion and I suggest he do so now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE SENATE

LEGITIMACY OF APPOINTMENTS MADE UNDER SECTION 26 OF THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867—EFFECT ON PARLIAMENT—REFERRAL OF QUESTIONS TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Graftstein: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, November 22, 1990, I will move:

> That the Senate demand that the Government settle the uncertainty of the legitimacy of the eight Senators appointed under Section 26 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the effect thereof on the composition and the constitutional validity of Parliament (this uncertainty having been brought about by conflicting court decisions of the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Supreme Court of New Brunswick) by referring these questions immediately to the Supreme Court of Canada.

QUESTION PERIOD

ENERGY

CANCELLATION OF SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he can throw any light on the surprise decision conveyed to Mr. Gillespie a few days ago that the Scotia Synfuels Project had been turned down. I had been asking questions about that project since last April or May, and I received three responses, each saying that the matter is under review. Suddenly I pick up the press and discover that the project has been turned down in a letter from an acting director in Halifax to Mr. Gillespie. It is mysterious and very disappointing. I wonder if the Leader of the Government can throw any light on the situation; whether it was a mistake at the bureaucratic level or whether it is still subject to recovery by consideration at a higher level.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the answer to the last part of the question would be in the negative. I can tell the honourable senator that the statement of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology, which is responsible for this matter, was that it had concerns about the economic viability of the project and that assistance for it was not considered to be a prudent use of taxpayers' dollars at this time. For that reason, the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit proposal was turned down.

• (1540)

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, Mr. Gillespie issued a press release following receipt of the letter, in which he said:

> The project, were it operating right now, would be profitable without any government incentives. The project proponents have requested incentives for downside price protection. The government would net more than $500 million in tax revenues alone from the project after all incentives are deducted. The project requires only a fraction of the assistance afforded Hibernia and creates over three times as many permanent jobs.

When I heard about the decision, although I did not speak to Mr. Gillespie personally, I asked if I could get a copy of the reasons for the decision. The letter states:

> The reason for this decision is that, based on a thorough analysis, the project will require significantly more assistance than the CBITC program can provide in order to succeed. The concerns that have been discussed with you regarding the lack of an equity partner, the difficulty of your proposal in meeting the program timing requirements regarding asset acquisition and the technical risks of constructing the plant are also major considerations.

I find it difficult to judge the reasons given by the department when I look at the public and private statements of Mr. Gillespie, who is a serious person. I believe there is a requirement for considerable clarification before this decision can be accepted easily, particularly in view of the fact that the request has been made under the provisions of the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit, which was designed specifically to provide employment in replacement for the jobs lost through the closure of the two heavy-water plants. This seems to be an ideal project to provide employment, which the sponsors say will be viable with a market which is environmentally sensitive and which is more timely than ever in light of world developments in the energy field.

I am asking for some clarification, because I believe the matter is going to be before the Leader of the Government in the Senate and others in the Senate for some time. We had better start understanding the facts.

Senator Murray: I appreciate that, honourable senators. I hope there will be an opportunity for my friend to question in detail the responsible minister and officials. That should be possible in one of the standing committees of this place. Meanwhile, I will do my best to reply on behalf of the government to any questions he wishes to put, either orally or in writing. For the moment, let me say that the statement of the minister of the department is that the project in question would not be economically viable without substantially more federal support than is possible through the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit program.

[Senator Murray.]

Further to that, they point out that the proponents have yet to identify private-sector investment for the project. They say that the Synfuel project is technically complex, requires further engineering feasibility work and its costs exceed $500 billion. They say that the government has done a full evaluation of the program, but it does not think that assistance under the CBITC would be a prudent use of taxpayers' funds at this time. They conclude that, while it is sometimes said that this really does not cost the government anything, what it would amount to is an additional $200 million tax liability on the books of Canada if the CBITC proposal had been accepted.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it might be a useful thought to have one of the standing committees immediately examine officials and Mr. Gillespie in order to clarify this situation. What is stated by the minister, which is the view taken by officials, is contested by Mr. Gillespie, who says in his statements that the government will collect from this project considerable tax revenue after the tax credits have been paid out.

There is one constructive step that could be taken now, and that is to arrange a meeting with the responsible minister or Mr. Gillespie. What surprised me when I read the letter from the official in Halifax was that this is a reply dated November, 1990 to a request made on June 2, 1988. That is a very long time. In that period, Mr. Gillespie has been seeking an opportunity to present the case directly to a minister, particularly Mr. Bouchard, and he has been unable to get a meeting. That seems unbelievable in view of the potential that this project has for that part of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton Island. I believe that such a meeting would help to clarify some of these difficulties.

If the government has legitimate concerns, through that discussion Mr. Gillespie might be able to ameliorate concerns or produce alternative proposals that would satisfy. However, there seems to have been absolutely no dialogue on this point. I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to find out whether such a meeting could be arranged.

Senator Murray: I shall do my best, honourable senators.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government on the same subject. The minister in question, Mr. Bouchard, hinted that he will not see Mr. Gillespie for further talks. As Senator MacEachen points out, he did not see him in the first place.

The suggestion made by Senator MacEachen of referring this to a committee to obtain further information is an excellent one. In the opinion of many—including Senator Buchanan and the Hon. Elmer MacKay—this is a very important matter that should not be allowed to pass with an abrupt letter from a functionary in Cape Breton. If this were not a decision made at the cabinet level—which presumably is where some of these megaprojects are dealt with—if it was handled by a minister who did not meet with the principals involved, it strikes me as passing strange that we should allow it to pass without a thorough investigation conducted by an appropriate committee.

• (1550)

Senator Murray: I appreciate the further point made by Senator MacDonald. However, no one should assume that this decision was made at a lower level. I think it fair to say that the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance were fully apprised of the application and were well aware of the implications. Of course, they were party to and take responsibility for the decision.

That being said, I repeat that I will do my best to see that Mr. Gillespie is able to meet with the appropriate minister. I do not think I have to do anything about seeing that a committee consider the matter. I think that a committee can do so on its own initiative.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

POSSIBLE DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I was rather astounded to receive a copy of today's broadcast news, which goes on the wire to stations across the country. If senators will allow me to read it, they will understand what my question will be. It states:

> It appears Ottawa may be having second thoughts about bringing in the GST as scheduled on January 1st.
> The federal minister for small business and tourism says because of delays in the Senate, the government may delay implementation of the tax a few months.
> Tom Hockin says businesses and the public need time to digest information about the tax.

Senator Simard: Do you believe everything you read in the newspapers?

Senator Frith: Not usually, if the statement was made by a Tory, but we thought we would try this time.

Senator Buckwold: I will go back to the beginning of the paragraph:

> Tom Hockin says businesses and the public need time to digest information about the tax. He says it would be wrong to pass it on Christmas Eve, and bring it in the next week.

The minister will understand my surprise at this statement. My question is: Is Mr. Hockin being quoted correctly? How does he reconcile this statement with the positive affirmations of Mr. Jelinek and Mr. Wilson that, come what may, this tax will be implemented on January 1, 1991; that the departments are ready for it, that the public is ready for it? We see now that the government, in the words of the minister, is considering a delay of a few months.

There are warehouses full of goods labelled with post-GST prices. Staffs have been trained. Computer programs have been completed. The country expects, as does the government, that Royal Assent will be given to this bill in good time following its passage at third reading by this chamber. The government expects that we will be able to launch this tax in a smooth fashion on January 1, 1991.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I do not think the country will accept, nor will senators on this side of the chamber, the "motherhood" response that all is well. I asked the government leader a question: Is this the policy of the government?

A responsible minister of the Crown, in complete disregard for other statements made by Mr. Jelinek and Mr. Wilson, has indicated that the government may delay implementation of this legislation for a few months. That could be six months, it could be a year. Obviously, Mr. Hockin is not going to be permitted to make a statement like that, which indicates a major change in policy, without a cabinet committee or some other authority giving him the direction or the right to make such a statement. Are we being softened up for a delay because the government admits that it is not ready?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Simard: You are just talking nonsense!

Senator Buckwold: No one is asking Senator Simard for his input. I am asking the minister a question.

Senator Simard: You are just talking nonsense!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the first question Senator Buckwold asked was whether Mr. Hockin had been correctly quoted. In response, I had to say that I did not know. I have not been able to ascertain whether he was quoted correctly or, indeed, whether he was quoted in context.

Senator Buckwold: Could the minister find that out?

Senator Murray: I certainly hope to do so, and before very long.

The statement was said to have been made in British Columbia. I do not know whether he was quoted correctly or whether he was quoted out of context, so I answered the first question in that way. I then went on to explain the policy and intention of the government. It is our policy and our intention to launch that tax on January 1, 1991. Everything that could be done has been done by the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue, through education programs and contacts with businesses large and small, to ensure that there is a smooth launching of this tax on January 1, 1991. Naturally, we count on the cooperation of honourable senators opposite in assisting us to have a vote in good time so that we may give Royal Assent to the bill and thereby ensure that there is no uncertainty about the January 1 launch.

Senator Buckwold: I often wish that we would be given correct answers without the accompanying rhetoric which always brings in the propaganda of the government.

Senator Simard: You just ask your questions and be satisfied with the answers you get. That is all. That is the way it works.

Senator Buckwold: It is interesting what we read in the newspapers of the day. The Gazette recently stated that a cabinet panel had planned to pass the GST, that a select cabinet committee has a mechanism with which to push the goods and services tax through the Senate. That is said at the same time Mr. Hockin made the statement that the government is ready to delay implementation of this tax.

Could we have some information on what this secret cabinet panel is, whether the government leader as a minister is part of that select group who makes these decisions—Mr. Wilson, Mr. Jelinek, Mr. Hockin, or the man who should be making them for the Senate, the Leader of the Government in the Senate? What is his role in this and so on? Could we also have from him an assurance that he will give us at the very earliest date—like tomorrow—an affirmation whether this is a correct statement made by Mr. Hockin? Could he also provide an explanation of what he means?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there should be no doubt about the policy and the intentions of the government. I have stated them twice this afternoon. With respect to the statement attributed to Mr. Jelinek, I am not aware of any special mechanism for ensuring anything in the Senate. This select committee must be a committee of one.

● (1600)

TIMETABLE FOR PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has stated twice today, and once or twice before today, that the government—particularly the Departments of Finance and National Revenue—is ready to administer the GST on January 1. I asked him a few days ago whether the regulations had been drafted and were ready, so that they could be sent out to the people who will be trying to comply with the provisions of Bill C-62, if and when it is passed. I believe he said he would obtain a copy of those regulations so that we could be assured that the officials of the Department of National Revenue are, in fact, ready with the regulations and are, in fact, ready to administer the tax provisions.

I will indicate, by way of background, that yesterday I was at an auction sale in Calgary at which were a number of auctioneers who, either themselves, their bookkeepers or accountants, had been to a seminar put on by the Department of National Revenue. Present at the seminar were senior officers from Alberta to explain how they would be able to comply with the goods and services tax when it came in. They assured me that they left the meeting feeling completely frustrated as to what they were expected to do and what the regulations will be as applied to the goods and services they provide. Those auction marts are a very important part of business transactions.

For example, at the one which I attended they were selling used, heavy equipment. I would like to know whether the minister can obtain for us a copy of the regulations that will apply in these cases? It was very clear that the senior officers of the Department of National Revenue, who came and were sponsoring that seminar, admitted they did not know what they were going to do in certain situations with respect to the process, service, and sale of goods that takes place when goods are consigned to an auction sale.

The question is: Are the rules ready? If they are not ready, is that one of the reasons why the government is doing what Senator Buckwold has just suggested, namely, that they are preparing for a delay because they simply are not ready?

I have two or three other questions that follow on that.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall jog the memory of the Department of Finance with regard to the first question.

With regard to the previous question asked by Senator Olson, I shall make inquiries on the specific matter he has just raised, that of auction sales.

The Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue, are ready. The great disservice that would be done by any uncertainty or delay is done to the businesses and to the consumers, especially businesses that have trained their staff, priced their products, and programmed their computers, and so forth, in anticipation of this tax being launched on January 1.

Senator Olson: I think the minister should be a little careful of whom he accuses of doing a disservice. Certainly one of the most unfair disservices that could be done is to announce that you are going to implement and enforce a new tax measure on a certain date, namely January 1 next, which is now less than six weeks away, and the government does not know what it is going to do.

That is exactly what happened in Calgary last week. There is absolutely no doubt about that, that there were senior officers of the Department of National Revenue in the province who admitted that they did not know what they were going to do.

I do not understand why Senator Kelly is looking in the rule book.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. William M. Kelly: On a small point of order, Senator Olson is debating. Is this a debate on Bill C-62? I thought this was Question Period. It may not be a debate, but it sounds like one.

Hon. H.A. Olson: I am trying to help the government, although I do not bleed so much for them as I do for those good, honest Canadian citizens who are trying to inform themselves so they can comply with this Bill C-62, innocuous as it may be. They are trying and they do not get any answers. That is what I am trying to do.

I think it should be perfectly clear to Senator Kelly that if we are going to play by the rules, we at least have to know what the rules are. That does not seem to be an unreasonable question.

I would hope that by carrying this information into the chamber during Question Period, so we can get a direct reply from the minister might be a useful exercise for Canadians who are trying to inform themselves. I am sure the honourable senator is not serious, on reflection, in suggesting that we are not trying to clear up this matter. There is no doubt that we are opposed to the tax in that it is wrongly structured. I will not argue that now. At least the rules need to be known.

Let me ask the minister to be more specific: Is the confidentiality, which has always been respected of people consigning goods to be sold through an auction sale, going to be respected, or will every purchaser have the opportunity of knowing who consigned a particular piece of machinery, in this case, or for that matter any other good, for an auction? Is the tax going to change all of that? Certainly, if some of the rules are that one can claim a rebate, one will have to know the history of the goods that are offered through an auction sale. That worries these auction marts very greatly, because up until now that confidentiality has never been violated by either a provincial or federal law. Perhaps the government leader could ask whether all that is now going to change?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, as I indicated a moment ago, I shall make inquiries concerning the specific matter raised by the honourable senator.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is really not a satisfactory answer. In fact, it is a long way from being satisfactory.

I am asking the government leader: Have the rules been made? For example, I have been through this a number of times: A bill is passed through Parliament; then you have to get the senior officers, or at least some officers, within a department—in my case it happened to be Agriculture—to write the instructions as to what the regulations will be. Those instructions are then sent over to the Department of Justice, or the people there who are skilled in drafting regulations, and the regulations are then prepared. That is what is approved by an order in council when the law is proclaimed.

I am asking the minister: Has that been done with respect to Bill-62?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I indicated earlier, I shall make inquiries.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the answer I received a week ago. I think it is the same answer I had about six weeks ago. The government leader said months and months ago that he wanted this bill passed immediately so the government could get on with it. We find that we get to within a few days of your declared date of embarkation, or launching, and forcing the tax, and we still cannot get an answer as to whether you have the rules and regulations ready.

• (1610)

I wonder if we could be a little more specific than that. I am not talking only about auctioneers; I am talking about the dozens and dozens of other people to whom I have spoken who have telephoned the information line attempting to find out what the GST has affected or not affected, what is exempt, what is zero-rated, and all the rest of it. The real world is out there. I am asking the minister: Have you looked at what the real world is and how businesses are administered? Have you made provision so that you are not going to interfere with and disrupt all of that because of attempts to comply with this tax?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I have indicated some time ago, the question of the honourable senator is whether the regulations have been prepared and whether they are available. I shall ascertain from my colleague the situation in that respect and I shall report back very shortly.

Senator Olson: I know the government leader said that. I heard him say that last week and a also month or so ago. Surely, it is not just the same old answer all the time that you will make inquiries. If I can quote the Minister of National Revenue, as he makes comments outside the House and in various other places, he said "Those senators don't give a goddamn what happens to the tax"—

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order!

Senator Olson: —or something like that. That is a direct quote from him. So he must follow what is going on here if he thinks that we do not give a damn what happens to Bill C-62. Just a simple inquiry: Are the rules ready or not and how much longer do we have to wait? I am not the one who has to wait. There are thousands of people who are vitally interested in how they are going to comply.

An Hon. Senator: Another year.

Senator Kelly: I wish to call the attention of Senator Olson to our rule book. Rule 20(3) says:

> If an oral question cannot be answered immediately, the senator to whom it is addressed may take the question as notice.

I believe the Leader of the Government in the Senate has done that. Rule 20(4) says:

> A debate is out of order on an oral question, . . .

The senator is debating.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy leader of the Opposition): Senator, how do you define that, saying that he is debating? Tell us about that.

Senator Kelly: I keep going back to the rule book.

Senator Frith: I know you are quoting the rule book in saying he is debating. Tell us why you say he is debating.

Senator Kelly: Exactly. The rule says very clearly that a question may be asked, that a brief preamble is all that is permitted, and the answer must be given or the question taken as notice. If a senator then says, in effect, that he is not satisfied with the answer and proceeds into a long dissertation on why he is not satisfied, then, in my opinion, he is debating. That is the basis for my statement.

Senator Frith: Well, we have your opinion and, as they say in court, it has been noted, sir. Carry on.

Senator Olson: Whatever is Senator Kelly's problem, I can explain it to him very briefly, that I was trying to coax the minister to obtain an answer in time for the people who are vitally concerned about this.

Senator Simard: We know what you are trying to do.

Senator Olson: I have heard the answer before. You can quote Rule 20(3). If we heard the same reply three times over a space of six weeks, that the minister may take the question as notice—

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Olson: —then what do we do? Do we humbly sit down and say: Well, I suppose I will wait until next week? These people are desperate. They want to be good citizens and they want to comply with the law. They cannot find the rules that would allow their accounting practices and procedures to be put in place so that they can comply. As another example—

Senator Frith: Senator Kelly has given you the rules; he knows the Rules of the Senate. Tell the Canadian people about that and I am sure that will satisfy them. They will say they did not get an answer to the question, but Senator Kelly has told us the Rules of the Senate was the answer.

Senator Simard: Now you are debating on that, too.

Senator Frith: Listen to who is talking.

Senator Olson: Well, up until now, that is about all I can do. I will tell you one other thing that happened last week in the city of Calgary. As the city sells hundreds of used pieces of equipment, trucks, garbage equipment, and other kinds of equipment that a municipality uses, it advised the auction market that there was no need to collect any GST on pieces of equipment that it consigns through its sales. If that statement is true, it is absolutely unfair. We know there is provision in here that if a municipality supplies the service directly, whether it is garbage collection, snow removal or whatever, it is not subject to the GST. If it is contracted out, then it is subject to GST. What has that got to do with their selling off surplus equipment? Are you going to establish that kind of discrimination among people and corporations and municipalities in one case, and private industry in another, and have a 7 per cent difference in how it can be treated at the auction sale when it goes up for sale under essentially the same terms and conditions?

[Senator Kelly.]

These are the questions that lead to my persistence. I do not know if it is going to do any good for me or the people for whom I am attempting to voice concern. Perhaps we can begin to get some answers. I am trying to impress upon the Leader of the Government in the Senate that taking the question as notice is not satisfactory, and it becomes less satisfactory every day as we near January 1, 1991, which is the slated date on which the government intends to impose this tax.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answers to many of the questions asked by the honourable senator are available in material that has already been published for many months by the Departments of Finance and National Revenue. I am surprised that my honourable friend has not availed himself of the opportunity to become fully briefed on the tax and its application. The independent retail questions he is asking should really be put in writing. Notwithstanding the fact that these questions have been put orally, I will take them to my colleagues and will endeavour to provide a reply as soon as possible. It should not take long, because, as I said, the answers to most of the questions are available in material which is already published.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, let me say categorically, with regard to the questions I have raised, that the answers are not available. They are not available to your senior officers of the Department of National Revenue in Alberta, because they were present at the seminar trying to inform accountants and bookkeepers as to how they should comply with the tax. Those senior officers admitted that they simply did not know how to deal with certain situations and circumstances raised by people in attendance. That is why I am asking the questions. The answer is not satisfactory. I know the minister is trying, but I want to coax him to try some more. I want to say that the information he gave a moment ago is simply not the case in the real world, where people are trying to comply with the tax. Could he at least give me an assurance that he will seek the information from the Department of National Revenue, that the department is ready to comply with all the questions and situations that have been put to them about the administration and regulations for administering this tax?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, they are ready and they have been handling thousands—I think someone told me there were 60,000 queries in the last couple of days.

Senator Olson: You probably need ten times that many.

Senator Murray: Much of this material has already been published, but I will take the specific questions of the honourable senator and will provide replies to them. I will do more than that. I will send the honourable senator a copy of the speech by Mr. Alasdair McKichan, the man in charge of the Retail Council of Canada, castigating my honourable friends opposite for the terrible disservice they have been doing to the economy by the delay and uncertainty in regard to the GST.

Senator Simard: How do you like his answer?

Senator Olson: Do not try to worry me when you have something as elusive as that. When you are conveying this information, you should ask some of those people in the ivory towers to take a look at the real world and the way that real commerce is carried on in Canada. They should then make some rules to deal with that information, and not only how to feed a computer.

TAX ON BOOKS, PERIODICALS AND NEWSPAPERS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I hope I will be more successful than my colleague, Senator Olson. My question concerns the GST on books, magazines and newspapers.

On the weekend, I spent several hours at the Salon du livre in Montreal. It was an unprecedented success. This evening, when the Salon closes, they will probably announce they had over 100,000 visitors. However, a shadow loomed over this celebration of the intellect, this splendid demonstration of the cultural vitality of a small French-speaking community. I am referring to the shadow of the GST which bodes ill for all. The work done by publishers, book sellers and authors during the past 30 years.

Sunday evening, the president of the Salon du livre de Montréal, Mr. Jean-Claude Germain, spoke to a crowd of thousands and thousands of people, to announce, first of all, the results of a survey that was just released, according to which 92 per cent of the people of Montreal were against any taxes on books. The president of the Salon du livre also asked everyone who was there to observe one minute of silence, as though the book world were already mourning the bookstores that would close, the publishers that would go bankrupt and the writers whose works would never see the light of day.

In bookstores throughout Quebec, petitions were placed in big black binders for the public to sign, under a slogan seen everywhere at the Salon: A tax on books is a tax on intelligence. It seems nearly 300,000 signatures were collected.

My question is this: Considering this unanimous stand taken by publishers, book sellers, librarians, writers and readers, will the government find a way, at the last minute, to avoid a catastrophe that would deal a mortal blow to the book world?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, Senator Hébert has already proposed this kind of amendment to the bill, and we know how that turned out. I would urge him to try again when the bill comes up for third reading debate.

AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION PROMISED BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I think there is a question I asked you and, as Senator Olson did, I complain about the fact that we put questions to you but you never answer and keep saying that you will get back to them later. So again I raise the question, on the same subject, which I put to you last week and to which you declined to respond because you said that Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland was not in the chamber. My question was directed to you, not to her.

I asked you—and again I am asking you—to clear up the situation concerning the promises which the Prime Minister allegedly made to Senator Chaput-Rolland, promises to amend, correct and change the tax on books. This is not an insignificant matter.

As a matter of fact, here is an excerpt from the emotive speech made by Senator Chaput-Rolland on October 30, just before her historic vote, if I may put it that way. I am quoting her:

> . . . I was afraid of this tax and that as an author I was sincerely hoping that the Prime Minister would keep his promise . . .

That is clear:

> . . . that the Prime Minister would keep his promise and amend it, correct it, change it . . .

Those are the words of Senator Chaput-Rolland taken right out of the Debates of the Senate:

> . . . but that, because of my loyalty to the Prime Minister of Canada, I would vote for the adoption of the tax . . .

Honourable senators, we have a right to know what exactly the Prime Minister promised. This is a serious matter!

I will therefore ask the leader of the government for the second time in two weeks—he surely had the time to consult with both the Prime Minister and Senator Chaput-Rolland in the meantime.

First, where and when did the Prime Minister make the promises? Second, they must be compelling if they convinced Senator Chaput-Rolland to vote with you when she felt like doing otherwise. Third, what are the exact amendments, corrections and changes the Prime Minister has in mind regarding this bill? A great many Canadians want to know.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add at this time to the explanations I have already given.

Senator Hébert: I do not recall any explanation. All you did is confuse the issue even further and side-step the question. Would you please remind us these explanations? I cannot recall any. So, he refuses to answer.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Right on!

Senator Hébert: He can find nothing to say. He is "up a stump" as the expression goes!

ENERGY MINES AND RESOURCES

ENERGY CONSERVATION—DISTRIBUTION OF BROCHURES

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I hold in my hand a plastic bag that was sent to my office some time during the last ten days—I believe it was last week—along with three other bags. It contains material from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources Canada. In that bag was an envelope with my name label on it. That envelope was empty. The flap states that it is recycled paper, papier recyclé. I received the letter from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is a photocopy of a letter, but it has one of these golden crests stamped on it. I do not believe it is recycled paper.

I also received an assorted collection of booklets in both official languages, which is something that I appreciate very much. But I do not think that I needed four bags of this material. One of the documents is called Guide du consommateur: emprisonons la chaleur. I presume that the bag which contained mostly English material also had the same thing. On the inside front cover of the publication it indicates that it is printed on recycled paper.

All the other brochures, as far as I could find out, are not printed on recycled paper. Furthermore, they are deluxe productions. Look at the covers on this brochure. There are four colours with glossy photos, and so on. There are also a lot of blank pages inside. This one was destined for use by the local press; that probably accounts for the fact that there is printing on one side and no printing on the reverse side.

All the other brochures, honourable senators, are not printed on recycled paper. These brochures are called Natural Gas, An Alternative Transportation Fuel; Attic Ventilation; Les Carburants De L'Avenir, Les Carburants Classiques; Les Carburants Gazeux; Heating with Electricity; Heating with Natural Gas; Heating & Cooling with a Heat Pump; Heating with Oil; windows, les fenêtres; calking, air leaks, insulation, and so on.

These are all first-class brochures and contain useful material. But why in the world would that department, and that minister in particular, not act along the lines of what they preach? Why wasn't this material printed on recycled paper? Why was the cost not reduced? We did not need these multicoloured covers. That is a waste of taxpayers' money. Why were all these things presented in an unrecyclable plastic bag? That is what I should like to know.

● (1630)

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARMS REDUCTION AGREEMENT—LIMITATION AND DESTRUCTION OF SURPLUS ARMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jeramiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, this week, as President Gorbachev stated, marks a turning point in history with the signing of the massive arms reduction agreement between the East and West. Canada was represented at that conference by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister. We have not as yet received Canada's position either from Mr. Clark or the Prime Minister, so I am relying on press reports of the Prime Minister's position. Based on excerpts of the reports I saw, I want to applaud the government for attending and signing these momentous documents, which we hope will ensure world peace in the years ahead.

[Senator Corbin.]

The Prime Minister also made some important statements criticizing all nations for providing the instruments of death in the massive buildup of arms in Iraq. The agreement, from what I have read in the press reports, appears to place limits and reductions on certain arms, but it does not appear to call for the destruction of those arms. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not Canada called not only for the limitation and reduction of arms, but for the destruction of those surplus arms.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries as to the position we took in the period leading up to the signing of the treaty on November 19. Meanwhile, I will be glad to table a copy of the speech made by the Prime Minister at the CSCE Summit in Paris yesterday, November 19.

Senator Grafstein: As a supplementary question, could the Leader of the Government advise whether or not it is a breech of these agreements for the signing parties—the nations that have signed the agreement—to ship their surplus weaponry to other nations?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would have to inquire.

Senator Grafstein: To clarify my view for the government, it appears that Iraq was shipped a number of SS missiles by the Soviet Union in the weeks and months leading up to Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. There was some criticism of the Soviet Union in the press, and its response was that a shipping surplus of missiles, which it had undertaken to reduce, did not in any way, shape or form violate previous arms reduction agreements. If, in fact, that is the case, and if the Canadian government and other nations did not cement that hole, then we have left a serious gap in arms reduction, which will provide the inconsistent result that the Prime Minister is preaching to the rest of the world which is that Iraq weaponry has been massively built up by surplus arms.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the points made by the honourable senator, and I shall make inquiries. Meanwhile, I might also send him a lengthy document, which I have not read myself. It is a press briefing by the Canadian Ambassador to the negotiations on conventional forces in Europe, Mr. David Peel, and the Assistant Deputy Minister of National Defence, Mr. Delvoie. There were many questions put and answered during the course of that briefing, and I commend it to my honourable friend's attention while I make further inquiries of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence with respect to his precise questions.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

ESTIMATES OF REVENUE GAINS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question on which the Leader of the Government in the Senate might help me. I have been trying to find, from the publications, whether the government has made any estimate of the revenue to be gained under the GST from various sectors; but I have been unable to do so. I will cite a number of examples. What revenue gain would there be to the government from the new treatment of reading materials, cooperatives, or heating fuels, as covered in the third amendment?

I thought it might be helpful, in understanding the dimensions of the changes that have been proposed, if we knew what was the revenue gain or loss. Can the Leader of the Government point us in the right direction and tell us where we might get this information and whether it is public; and, if not, will the Department of Finance provide the information that will help us assess some of the changes we have been proposing?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries and see whether that information is available. I should have thought that questions of that kind would have been asked during the course of committee hearings, and perhaps answered by the minister or officials. In any event, I shall make inquiries of the minister.

Senator MacEachen: I have inquired about committee proceedings, and the answer was—perhaps it is not complete—that no information of that kind had been put forward by officials before the committee. Perhaps the question was not asked, but if the material is available, and if studies have been undertaken by the department, may we look at them?

NATIONAL FINANCE

COST OF PROPOSED BALLET OPERA HOUSE IN TORONTO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. At the end of September, or in early October, an announcement was made by the Minister of Communications, the Hon. Marcel Masse, to the effect that the federal government had decided to give $88 million to the proposed ballet opera house in Toronto. Certain events have since taken place, and I am wondering about the status of this pledge of $88 million.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I must say that I do not know the answer to that question. I am aware that there was to have been a contribution from the Government of Ontario, but the new government decided not to proceed. I do not know what is the present status of the project, and I would have to make inquiries.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Perhaps by way of preamble I should say that I am not against the arts in any form, be it ballet or literature.

Senator Corbin: Poetry!

Senator Robichaud: Or poetry. Even sports can be a form of the arts. But there is a time for everything, and in these times of constraint, in these times when we have to tighten our belts, and when the government is going to ask the taxpayers of Canada to pay 7 per cent more than they customarily paid—

Senator Simard: It is not more!

Senator Robichaud: —how can we justify asking the taxpayers of Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or British Columbia to subsidize a ballet opera house in Toronto? I do not think this can be justified, and I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to do his utmost, if not to cancel this pledge, to postpone it until such time as the country can afford it.

Some years ago the federal treasury was in such good shape that it had to create the Arts Council of Canada so that it could spend some money. In those days it was perfectly justifiable to grant money for all forms of art, which resulted in the creation of the Canada Council. However, in November 1990, when we are in the middle of a recession, and assuming it will not get better in the next few months or years, I am wondering how a government can justify spending $88 million in the centre of Toronto to build a ballet and opera house because Karen Kain asks for it.

• (1640)

I am not against Karen Kain. I know Ms. Kain and I know that she has done a tremendous job for the Kidney Foundation, with which I am familiar. That is not the point. The point is the expenditure of $88 million by the people of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and from the rest of Canada to subsidize a group of people in Toronto.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I accept the counsel of frugality that has come from the honourable senator and I shall take it to heart. He should know, however, that in terms of program expenditure in recent years we have kept the increase to an average annual rate of 3.6 per cent, which is below the rate of inflation. This government has a very good record in terms of management of the taxpayers' money.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, a cut of $88 million would add substantially to the cuts that have already been made. That is the point I wish to make.

ENERGY

JAMES BAY II—ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT PROCESS—ROLE OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Charlie Watt: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In today's Ottawa Citizen there is an article headed, "Quebec Wins James Bay Fight—Federal Government Admits it has no Jurisdiction". There seems to be a contradiction in the article with regard to the role of the federal government.

The article reads:

> The federal decision came in a letter from Raymond Robinson, head of the Federal Environmental Assessment

> Review Office, just as a committee crucial to the environmental review process began meeting in Montreal.
> The six-man committee, with representatives of Quebec, the federal government and the Cree, failed to reach an agreement after meeting for eight hours and decided to send two sets of guidelines—one stating the position of the Quebec representatives and the other the position of the Cree representatives.

The article goes on to say:

> While it has no part to play in the review process established under the James Bay Agreement, the federal government will follow its own environmental assessment procedures for considerations such as fish, migratory birds, marine mammals and the ecology of Hudson Bay, he said.

I do believe that the Government of Canada has jurisdiction not only over the ecology of that area, migratory birds, fish and marine mammals that might be affected by that project, but also over the aboriginal people, including the Cree and Inuit.

My question is this: Is the federal government going to establish its own process by outlining that it does have a role to play in the area? Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate can clarify what that means.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COST OF PROPOSED BALLET OPERA HOUSE IN TORONTO

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to draw the attention of the Leader of the Government, following Senator Robichaud's question on financial contribution in these difficult recession years, months. First, I want to make something very clear. Would he tell us, after Senator Murray's reply to the question I will ask him, if he is suggesting that all contributions to the arts be rethought, reviewed, changed or suspended indefinitely? If so, I think Canada would waste a beautiful opportunity to continue to give some parts of the country the tools they need.

Senator Robichaud mentioned Toronto two or three times. Is he trying to tell us that Toronto is the only place where cuts should be made or decisions deferred on projects, and my question is—

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would ask Senator Kelly to read the rules to Senator Simard. I thought we were supposed to ask questions of the government, not questions of individual senators. Senator Kelly, would you point out the rules to your colleague?

[Senator Watt.]

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Then, here is my question to Senator Murray:

Could you tell me whether, as a result of your research or your contacts with Mr. Masse, and in view of Senator Robichaud's remarks, you are going to make sure that art projects—some long-awaited projects in New Brunswick—are not all given the same fate as the Toronto project as Senator Robichaud would like them to be?

It would be regrettable if they were, because, I remind you, Senator Murray, the government announced some weeks or months ago a subsidy for the Imperial Theatre in Saint. John. This is an art project and I would not want it to be abandoned after what Senator Robichaud just said. Some might say that it is an extravagant project, but it started a few years ago, with financial support from the provincial and federal governments. It had the support of Premier McKenna, of federal authorities and the city of Saint. John. I would not want to see the Imperial project forgotten, even if it is not in the Madawaska. I believe this project will influence the whole of New Brunswick if not the Maritimes.

Consequently, I invite Senator Murray to make sure that the federal government does not change its mind on this and does not follow the recommendation of Senator Robichaud. The honourable senator might want to tell us whether he puts this project on the same level as the Toronto project.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will be delighted to draw the attention of my colleague, Mr. Masse on the eloquent representation made by Senator Simard.

THE ENVIRONMENT

RAFFERTY-ALAMEDA DAMS PROJECT—COURT DECISION APPEALED BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do with the Rafferty and Alameda dams. I am sure the government minister is aware that the case before the court in Saskatchewan was thrown out by Chief Justice MacPherson, or at least the decision was unfavourable to the position of the federal government in trying to stop the building of the Rafferty dam, and eventually the Alameda dam, as well. I believe I read in the press that the federal government is thinking of appealing that decision. My question is: Does the government really intend to appeal the decision in the face of the criticism it received from the court and from all sides about the flawed process in which it was involved?

The feeling, even of the judge, was that the government attempted to politicize this whole question and have the courts decide something that ostensibly should have been decided between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan. I repeat: Is it the intention of the government to appeal this decision?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my colleague, Mr. de Cotret, has announced that the federal government will be appealing the decision taken by the Trial Division of the Court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan. Mr. de Cotret would have done so on the legal advice of the Attorney General of Canada.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Where does prosecution end and persecution begin? This dam has almost been completed. The work has been ongoing for months and it is almost finished. It is ridiculous that the government should consider making this appeal. Environmental studies indicate that the dams will not be harmful to the environment; otherwise, the Government of Saskatchewan would not have proceeded with this project. It has spent hundreds of millions of dollars on it. There is no question, after this court case, that the federal government does not have a case. What is the point of dragging this on? Can the Leader of the Government find out from Mr. de Cotret whether he is just trying to save face or whether he is trying to build a case so that, when the James Bay development goes ahead, the federal government will have some excuse to go after Quebec and try to interfere with that project?

It is obvious that the federal government had no case. If it had, the judge would not have thrown it out. Chief Justice MacPherson threw it out and was extremely critical of the federal government. Why in heaven's name would the federal government go ahead to appeal that decision? If the government is not going ahead with this appeal, does the leader not think it would be better if Mr. de Cotret resigned so that his portfolio could be given to someone else to clean up the mess?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it may be obvious to my honourable friend that the federal government had no case simply because Mr. Justice MacPherson found against it.

Senator Steuart: He is a fine judge, too!

Senator Murray: I am sure he is a fine judge, but we have appeal courts in this country precisely to hear appeals from decisions of lower courts. It must be obvious to Mr. de Cotret and to our legal advisors that there are important questions of principle and certainly legal questions that are at stake here. It is the view of the federal government that they ought to be adjudicated on appeal. It is for this reason that the government is seeking leave to appeal the decision of Mr. Justice MacPherson.

Senator Steuart: In view of the fact that the dam is almost completed and will probably be completed before the case even gets to the appeal court, can the government leader tell us what the government intends to do if the higher court throws the case out? In the event that a higher court finds for the federal government, will the Government of Saskatchewan be ordered to tear the dam down? Will that be the outcome, after hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent?

Honourable senators, the people of Saskatchewan, I am sure, are convinced that there must be some ulterior motive in the federal government's dragging this thing out. Will the Government of Saskatchewan be ordered to tear the dam down if the decision of the appeal court goes against it?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a hypothetical question, but I think I can answer it quite definitively by saying that, win or lose, we shall consult our legal advisors.

OLDMAN RIVER DAM PROJECT—HARASSMENT OF ALBERTA BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, that may be so, but this harassment of the Government of Saskatchewan and OFthe Government of Alberta with respect to the OldMan River dam has to stop. The construction on that dam, too, is almost complete. Will the federal government continue to harass these provincial governments whenever they do something which, in the minds of most people who live in the area, is beneficial not only to their environment but to their economy?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would hope that Senator Olson would avoid inflammatory rhetoric of that kind.

Senator Olson: "Harassment" is the right word.

Senator Murray: As I have indicated, there are important legal questions to be decided in these matters. In addition, there are questions of principle. The reason we have a judicial system in this country is to hear those arguments and to adjudicate them. As always, we will respect the decisions taken.

Senator Steuart: Is it possible that there is a political motive here? I can tell the Leader of the Government that Grant Devine has never looked better to the people of Saskatchewan than he has over the past two years. I am sure that he prays every night that the federal government will keep it up. Mr. de Cotret is the answer to a maiden's prayer as far as Grant Devine is concerned.

The people of Saskatchewan are wondering what this process is all about. This whole thing was dragged out until the dam was almost completed, and only then was the provincial government taken to court. Is it not a fact that the federal government is attempting to have the courts make a political decision which should have been taken between the two governments involved? I believe that decision was taken, after which the federal government broke its word and backed away.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question. Such decisions are taken after due consideration of all legal and constitutional implications. We lost the case before Mr. Justice MacPherson. We are seeking leave to appeal his judgment.

JAMES BAY DEVELOPMENT PROJECT—ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question has to do with the James Bay development project. An Angus Reid poll published in some newspapers this morning tells us that a majority of Canadians are highly concerned about the need for environmental impact studies with respect to megaprojects of the type at James Bay. Eighty-five per cent of the people consulted are of the opinion that no construction should proceed on even the preliminary works at James Bay until the environmental evaluations are completed. Seventy-six per cent of the residents of the province of Quebec share that same view.

In Canada we have been taking an ad hoc approach towards environmental impact studies. One thing may be done in the province of Saskatchewan while another may be done in the province of Quebec, and goodness knows what arrangements will or will not be made in other provinces. Is it not time for the government to sit down with the provinces, before the whole matter gets out of hand and they all end up in court, so as to try to work out an environmental impact "pact", if I may call it that, whereby all megaprojects likely to affect the environment would somehow be worked out according to a pre-arranged agreement? In that way, we would not run into major problems every time somebody wanted to do something.

I think the Canadian population has the impression that the federal government is getting soft with Quebec but is playing tough with Saskatchewan. The way things are developing with respect to the James Bay project, the federal government will be involved in lesser environmental matters. I am not saying they are not important, but they involve lesser considerations such as fish, migratory birds, marine mammals and other related problems. But the James Bay project, by the admission of any environmental expert right around the world, will definitely have an impact upon the global climate. Maurice Strong was quoted, I believe in the Toronto Star of November 20, as saying that Canada enjoys a worldwide reputation of being at the environment forefront. But when you really look at what it is doing and the implementation of its policies, its record does not really seem that good.

● (1700)

I could quote at length what Maurice Strong said, but I will save that for another day. Obviously something is not operating smoothly with respect to our own federal approach and our joint approach with the provinces with respect to environmental impact studies. Small ones as well as big ones. Has the government attempted to come to some agreement with the provinces? Does it plan to do that in the near future?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, there are frequent meetings of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment. One meeting will be held a little later this month in Victoria, British Columbia. This is a relatively new area of government activity. One of the problems is that some provinces think and expect that the federal government should automatically accept the provincial environmental assessments or reviews as qualifying under our laws and guidelines. We cannot accept that position quite as it is stated.

[Senator Corbin.]

The recent Federal Court decision in Rafferty-Alameda and Old Man obliges us to apply our environmental assessment and review process, the ERB process, to projects which may have environmental effects in areas of federal jurisdiction. We must do that.

We did reach an agreement in principle with Quebec last June with regard to Grande Baleine. Quebec insisted that the agreement in principle not provide for an assessment of the access infrastructure. The federal government is currently involved in an initial screening of the infrastructure. We would prefer to conduct a joint environmental assessment with Quebec on access infrastructure to satisfy the legal requirements of the ERB guidelines order. If Quebec will not participate in a joint review, then we will have to take our responsibility as a federal government, so far as it relates to our jurisdiction.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have a further comment with regard to this subject of the James Bay project. It seems a little difficult, even from the answers that the government leader has given us, to determine whether or not the federal government is abandoning its jurisdiction in this project as one of the headlines in the article states.

> Diom Saganash, executive chief of Quebec's Grand Council of the Cree, condemned what he called a reversal of the federal position.
> "They're basically letting Quebec do what it wants with respect to the project," he said.
> The federal decision came in a letter from Raymond Robinson, head of the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, just as a committee crucial to the environmental review process began meeting in Montreal.

I think it would be helpful if the government leader would agree to table a copy of that letter from Mr. Robinson, and if the letter does not give us a sufficient explanation of the position the government is now taking, that he provide us with additional information with regard to that position.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we obviously respect the right of Quebec, as we respect the right of all provinces, to develop their own hydro-electric resources. We have an obligation, as I have indicated, to apply the ERB guidelines to projects insofar as they impinge on areas of federal jurisdiction.

I will attempt to obtain the information that the honourable senator is requesting and table it here as soon as I can.

THE ECONOMY

STUDY BY BCNI—GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: It was reported recently that the Business Council on National Issues has retained Professor Michael Porter of Harvard University to work up a case study of Canada, consistent with those in his book The Competitive Advantage of Nations.

I understand from those press reports that they will pay Professor Porter a fee of $1 million dollars, of which $600,000 will be paid by the BCNI and $400,000 by the federal government. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could tell us how that contribution is to be made and with what end in view. Specifically, will there be a public circulation of the report that Professor Porter produces?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARMS REDUCTION AGREEMENT—LIMITATION AND DESTRUCTION OF SURPLUS ARMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, in response to an earlier question respecting the demolition or the destruction of military hardware, the Leader of the Government was kind enough to pass me a transcript of briefing notes, dated November 19, 1990, in Paris, by Mr. David Peel. On page 9 of the transcript Mr. Peel—I think it is Mr. Peel—makes a statement on behalf of the Canadian government. It is obvious that in most cases the Soviet Union, which has the most to destroy, although other countries have to do some destruction, will destroy its old equipment first. There is nothing that indicates that it has to destroy the brand new things.

Hence my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate as to whether or not this gaping hole in the armaments reduction agreement, should not be plastered over.

THE SENATE

CANCELLATION OF COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

There was a meeting of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology this morning at 9 a.m. The minister was going to appear. Then the National Council of Italian-Canadians was going to follow.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Sorry?

Senator Bosa: This morning there was going to be a meeting of the Social Affairs Committee at 9 a.m. at which the Minister was going to appear to deal with Bill C-18, the multicultural bill. The National Council of Italian-Canadians was invited to appear before the committee at 10 o'clock this morning.

I understand that that meeting was cancelled and the chairman, the Honourable Senator Marsden, was not even advised about it. I do not know whether this is a proper way to conduct the business of the Senate. I am asking the honourable leader if he can enlighten us as to whether this is the policy of the government now, to cancel committee meetings with only 12 hours notice?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not know if I can help. I do know that the leader is not aware of the situation.

Senator Marsden contacted me about the situation and I spoke with her several times. We were having some difficulty with the whips and the rooms. I do not know what the complication was, precisely. I do know that I sent a message to Senator Marsden yesterday to the effect that this meeting could not be held today. Therefore, in saying that the meeting was cancelled, senator, you are absolutely correct. In saying that the chairman was not advised until this morning, I do not think that is correct, although I do admit the advice was only yesterday. Senator Marsden had contacted me on Friday and explained to me that she was having difficulty in trying to get the meeting organized. There were difficulties the whips were having with these matters.

I undertook to speak to the whips about it. I did not manage to contact the whip until yesterday, as I was out of town. I went to Newfoundland on Friday, thank God, and I did not get back until—

Senator Frith: I am sure He thanks you, sir.

Senator Doody: I think He was pleased.

In any event, senator, that is all the information I think I can give you at the present time.

Senator Bosa: Maybe I should then put a question to the chairman of the committee.

The honourable gentleman should know that when witnesses are invited to appear before the committee from out of town, in this case from Toronto, these trips are planned ahead of time. These people have jobs, they have to ask permission to be absent from their responsibilities. I was wondering whether Senator Marsden had an opportunity to advise these people and what kind of a reaction she got from them?

• (1710)

Senator Doody: I cannot answer that. If these witnesses were inconvenienced in any way, I certainly apologize on behalf of the Senate, although it was not my doing that caused the meeting to be cancelled. Senator, you have to realize that the committee scheduling in this place over the last several months has been somewhat less than regular, if I can be generous about that.

Senator Frith: Really? What happened?

Senator Doody: On the restraints bill there were a whole series of meetings scheduled and, for some reason unknown to me, they were all cancelled. Some meetings have now been rescheduled for early December. There have been meetings of various other committees cancelled at very short notice for whatever reasons. The committee meeting schedule has not been working well here over the past month or more. We have to look at it and see what has been happening.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, who is giving these orders to cancel these meetings? Do they not come from the government?

Senator Doody: I have given you all the information I have, senator, and I have undertaken to look into it for you.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

EFFECT ON BORDER COMMUNITIES

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I believe that on November 11 a referendum took place in the state of Maine, with the result that, in Maine, stores will now be open on Sundays, that Sunday shopping will be allowed. Of course, that is causing quite a bit of concern and distress all along the Maine-New Brunswick border. I would like to have the advice of the Leader of the Government in the Senate as to what good word he could put in with cabinet or the government, or whatever else he may want to suggest for the people of New Brunswick. I should not call Edmundston a town because Senator Simard will be jumping to his feet.

Senator Frith: Just in time.

Senator Corbin: The city of Edmundston, the town of Grand Falls, Woodstock, St. Stephen, and numerous other communities right down from the border with the province of Quebec to the Bay of Fundy and Passamaquoddy Bay, there are businessmen and store owners who are very concerned about the impact this legislation will have on their own Canadian sales. That is a matter to look at seriously. There is one other matter that is even more important in their minds. I quote the Telegraph-Journal of November 15.

> Others, like those in St. Stephen, are confident they can compete with the large American department stores which will now be open Sundays and are more concerned over how the Goods and Services Tax will affect business.

A further quote in that same article from the same paper:

> "We're more worried about the GST, because with the added tax, clothing will be more expensive at our store, now they are competitive with the U.S.'s", said Hastey.

The Canadian citizens of New Brunswick who live along the border, short of telling them to stay home on Sunday and not go shopping in Madawaska, Calais, Vanceboro, Maine, or whatever, . . .

Senator Barootes: Shop Canadian.

Senator Corbin: There is good doctorly advice. I have not heard you all day, Dr. Barootes; where were you? Short of telling these Canadian citizens to stay home and shop Canadian, what advice will the Leader of the Government give them, especially with respect to their concern over the impact of the GST?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it is true that some products will increase in price as a result of the GST, and others will decrease in price. So the situation is not quite as the honourable senator would generalize it to be.

Senator Corbin: It is not "the honourable senator" who is generalizing. I am quoting the people who were interviewed for this article in the paper. They are highly concerned, and they say they are more worried about the impact of the GST. Earlier the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, I believe in response to Senator Olson's question, suggested that the business community is not playing ball with the government, that it is not doing its homework and that it is not getting itself ready for the GST. Yet we have had surveys and polls taken by assorted people demonstrating that the business community is not getting the information it requires to play ball with the government under the GST rules.

I quoted the Small Business Association in the course of a speech the other night. They sent us their memo of November 8, 1990. Having interviewed 10,539 of their members, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business came to the conclusion that 74.4 per cent said they were entirely satisfied with the government's effort to give them accurate and useful information on how the GST will affect their enterprises. I do not think it is right to blame businessmen for their so-called non-cooperation in the eventual implementation of the tax, if and when it goes through. The problem is the reverse. The government is not doing a proper job, so I do not think we should expect Canadian businessmen to be at the starting line on Jamuary 1, knowing what they are to do. Surely the government could do a better job and not blame the Senate for that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know who is blaming the business community or for what? The point I was making earlier is that business has made a lot of preparations. Warehouses have been full of goods labelled with post-GST prices, computers have been programmed, staff have been trained, and so forth. Uncertainty would be very damaging to these people. They have done an excellent job, as a matter of fact.

The short answer to the senator's question about people in Edmundston and Woodstock and various places along the New Brunswick-Maine border is that the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax, at the time the GST is being implemented, will make Canadian-manufactured goods more competitive with goods of foreign manufacturers. So my advice to the public would be not only to stay in Edmundston and Woodstock and do the shopping there, but to shop for Canadian-manufactured goods. They are more competitive and will have some price advantage in terms of the shift from the manufacturers' sales tax to the GST.

An Hon. Senator: You don't believe that, do you?

COST OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be able to inform us as to the total amount spent by his government, to date, and amounts committed to advertising the GST, including TV, radio, newspapers, dailies, weeklies, monthlies, and magazines—all the media—including pamphlets and brochures and advertising displays? Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us that information, please?

• (1720)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not carry those figures around in my head. I would have to make inquiries before I bring you a reply.

Senator Lefebvre: While preparing to answer this question, would you also include an answer concerning the funds that will be committed or have already been spent to hire the persons who are answering the telephones and dealing with the mail as a result of your advertising campaign in an effort to try to sell the GST to Canadians?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the supplementary estimates will be tabled later this week by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board. I am sure that there will be some considerable amount of information related to those matters in the supplementary estimates.

Senator Lefebvre: Thank you for that answer, but in view of the fact that we are now in the midst of this debate in the Senate, it would be helpful for all of us to know that you could put on the record an answer to the questions that I have posed here in detail and not wait for the supplementary estimates.

While you are answering that, I would appreciate it very much, Senator Murray, if you could tell us—and this follows the latest public opinion poll that shows that at least 75 per cent of Canadians are very much opposed to this GST—how many more millions this government will spend of taxpayers' money in trying to sell them something that they do not want?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should point out that just the other day I put some information on the record in reply to a question asked by our colleague, Senator Denis, on that very subject. Apparently my honourable friend has overlooked that reply.

The short answer to the latter part of my friend's question is that all the polls show that there is an enormous desire on the part of Canadians for more information about the GST. Indeed, Senator Olson was referring to this very phenomenon a while ago. It is precisely to satisfy that—

Senator Olson: They want to stay out of jail, you know!

Senator Murray: —desire that we have been conducting quite a comprehensive public information program through the mass media, brochures, pamphlets and cassettes, as the honourable senator indicated.

I will endeavour to update the statistics that I gave earlier to Senator Denis on this matter.

Senator Lefebvre: Thank you. Would you also care to inform the Senate about something else? If the latest poll shows that 75 per cent of Canadians are very much opposed to this tax; and a poll only one month or so ago showed that 83 per cent are against it; how many millions of dollars have been spent to lower the percentage from 83 per cent to 75 per cent? How many more millions do you expect to spend to try and get it at least down to 50 per cent?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, a good deal of the money has been spent in order to explain to Canadians the operation of the tax on exactly the matters that Senator Olson was referring to earlier. Senator Olson was complaining that not enough information was being put out.

Senator Olson: I asked some questions, but we did not get any answers!

Senator Murray: We have also been encouraging businesses to register and explaining how to register and how to go about the implementation of the tax. These are legitimate areas for expenditure of public moneys on information programs. I should hope that the honourable senator would not take such a reactionary and obscurantist attitude to these matters.

Senator Lefebvre: But, then, is the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate willing to admit that the total advertising budget is situated between $36 million and $50 million?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, the figure that I tabled in response to a question from Senator Denis the other day was at the lower end of the range just mentioned by the honourable senator. But, again, I shall have to get those figures updated. The supplementary estimates to be tabled by Mr. Loiselle should be of assistance to us in that regard. Those estimates should be tabled before the end of this week.

DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Lorna Marsden, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report:

Tuesday, November 20, 1990

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-87, An Act to amend the statute law in relation to war veterans has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, November 20, 1990, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

LORNA MARSDEN
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

QUESTION PERIOD

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

APPLICABILITY OF TAX TO THE CROWN AND ITS AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is with regard to a headline in The Winnipeg Free Press of today which is entitled: "Province on GST collision course."

The story states:

> The Filmon government has set itself on a collision course with Ottawa by ordering a smattering of provincial agencies not to pay the goods and services tax.
> Finance Minister Clayton Manness said yesterday the province maintains the Manitoba Public Insurance Corp. and some other agencies are government operations and as such exempt from having to remit the seven-per-cent tax.
> He said MPIC has been told not to build the cost of the GST into Autopac rates for next year. As well, he said the province is instructing community colleges not to pay the tax, slated to take effect Jan. 1.

Could the minister tell us where this matter stands? Will the government insist that Manitoba has to pay the tax on government operated bodies such as the Autopac auto insurance?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I believe I had an exchange with Senator Austin on this matter the other day. I have not seen the article to which Senator Molgat refers. I believe I told Senator Austin at the time that the Crown and its agencies are not required to pay the tax, but we have all the constitutional authority necessary to require them to collect it or remit it.

APPLICABILITY TO INDIAN RESERVES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Could the minister tell me what the situation is concerning Indian reserves? Will the GST apply to goods sold on Indian reserves? In the province of Manitoba the provincial sales tax does not apply. I received a phone call today from an individual on an Indian reserve who said that he understood that certain products sold on the reserve for use on the reserve will be subject to the GST. Is that correct?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

● (1730)

"GST-FREE" ALBERTA MUNICIPALITIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: There are a number of municipalities in Alberta which have declared themselves to be GST-free areas. I wonder if the minister could obtain an opinion as to how the government is going to deal with these local governments.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF STUDY WITH RESPECT TO APOLOGY OR COMPENSATION TO NORTHERN QUEBEC INUITS WHO WERE RELOCATED TO THE ARCTIC ISLANDS IN 1953—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the house yesterday there were comments made about the relocation of northern Quebec Inuit to the Arctic Islands in 1953. I understand from the media today that the government, in the House of Commons, responded to a report of the House of Commons Aboriginal Affairs Committee, which unanimously recommended that certain action be taken to apologize to these Inuit families and to consider compensation. I wonder if the Government Leader in the Senate could undertake to have the government response and the study on which it was based tabled in this house or distributed to senators so may we ask questions on it at another time.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have twelve delayed answers to questions, and I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

OKA STAND OFF—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on September 26, 1990, by the Honourable Senator Lorna Marsden, regarding Indian Affairs—OKA Stand Off—Request for Information.

(The answer follows:)

A response to this question in the way of a current up-date on the OKA situation was given by Senator Murray during Question Period on September 26, 1990 was overtaken by events.

PERSIAN GULF

EFFECTIVENESS OF SANCTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on October 24, 1990, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Persian Gulf—Effectiveness of Sanctions.

(The answer follows:)

The answer to the first question, are they effective in their breadth and in the degree to which they are respected, is very much yes. That has to do in part with the existence of a very effective naval blockage in which Canada is playing a commendable role. It also indicates the degree to which there is firm international support. We are monitoring that. We are the vice-chair of the Security Council subcommittee on sanctions.

As to the other question, the impact on Iraq itself, there is some impact. It is not an impact that looks like it will change Iraqi behaviour in the short term. We want to continue to press on sanctions and other peaceful means to make Saddam Hussein understand that the world is resolute in requiring him to leave Kuwait.

PERSIAN GULF

COMMITMENT OF CANADIAN LAND FORCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION
COMMAND OF CANADIAN NAVAL FORCES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION DEPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES—POSSIBILITY OF WAR—COMMAND STRUCTURE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to questions raised in the Senate on October 26, 1990, by the Honourable Stanley Haidasz, regarding Commitment of Canadian Land Forces—Government Position; October 25, 1990, by the Honourable Lorne Bonnell, regarding Command of Canadian Naval Forces—Request for Clarification; and on October 25, 1990, by the Honourable Gildas L. Molgat, regarding Deployment of Canadian Forces—Possibility of War—Command Structure.

(The answer follows:)

Canadian ships and aircraft have been dispatched to the Persian Gulf to contribute to international efforts ensuring the strict implementation of the United Nations economic sanctions against Iraq, and to deter further Iraqi aggression.

The House of Commons was given the opportunity to thoroughly address the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the actions of the Government of Canada. A motion was carried by the House of Commons on October 23rd, 1990 which condemned the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq, supported Canada's actions, and recognized the undertaking of the Government to present a further resolution to this House in the event of the outbreak of hostilities involving Canadian Forces in and around the Arabian peninsula.

From the beginning of the Gulf crisis, the Government has been engaged in a continuing series of bilateral and multilateral consultations on the appropriate international responses to Iraq's unprovoked invasion of Kuwait on August 2nd. The principal forum for these discussions has been the United Nations.

On September 9th and 10th, a Naval Conference was convened in Bahrain to discuss mutual cooperation and support among the countries which had committed naval forces to the Gulf. Canada, along with the naval representatives from other nations deploying ships to the region, participated in the meetings. As a result of these consultations, it was decided that Canada could make the most meaningful contribution within the central region of the Persian Gulf.

As a member of the multi-national effort, Canada is conducting its operations in close communication and cooperation with its allies in the region. At the same time, Canada maintains independent national command and control of our ships and aircraft through modern communication systems as they patrol their area of responsibility in the Persian Gulf. To ensure maximum coordination of the efforts of Canadian vessels and aircraft, Canada has established a joint-headquarters in Bahrain.

Canadian Forces deployed to the Gulf are, and will remain, under Canadian command and control. The Chief of Defence Staff, in consultation with the Minister of National Defence, has authorized appropriate and specific national Rules of Engagement and Levels of Force guidelines within the framework of Canadian Government policy. These guidelines deal exclusively with self defence and the enforcement of United Nations sanctions. They are detailed rules and instructions guiding the degree of autonomy that the Air and Naval Task Group Commanders, commanding officers, and aircraft commanders have in responding to a developing situation. They are commensurate with Canada's area of operations and the assessed threat in the region. Rules of Engagement tell the commanders what they can and cannot do in fulfilling their mission. Levels of Force guidelines provide amplification so that the commanders are aware of the exact limits of their authority within the Rules of Engagement.

An essential basic premise in the Rules of Engagement is the right of self defence. A commander has the inherent right to employ such force as may be necessary to protect his command and the lives of his crew. No instruction or rule has been put in place which can be construed as limiting any of the commanding officers in the exercise of his initiative and judgement when immediate action is required for self defence.

THE ENVIRONMENT

OIL SPILL IN CANADIAN WATERS—UPGRADING OF TRAFFIC MANAGEMENT EQUIPMENT AND CAPACITY TO DEAL WITH OIL SPILLS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have the response to a question raised in the Senate on October 26, 1990, by the Honourable Colin Kenny, regarding The Environment—Oil Spills in Canadian Waters—Upgrading of Traffic Management Equipment and Capacity to deal with Oil Spills—Government Action.

(The answer follows:)

I wish to table the Interim Report of the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills response capability, as requested by the Honourable Senator.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF AMBASSADOR TO IRAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the fourth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990, by the Honourable Eymard G. Corbin, regarding Appointment of Ambassador to Iran—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

The decision to appoint an Ambassador to Iran was part of a process begun in 1988 leading to normalization of relations between Canada and Iran.

The present situation in the Gulf clearly demonstrates the importance of Canada maintaining a dialogue at ambassadorial level.

The maintenance of diplomatic relations with Iran does not signify Canadian approval of Iran's policies on human rights.

Having a qualified Ambassador in Tehran enables us to advance Canadian interests more effectively, including in the field of human rights.

COUNCIL OF EUROPE

CANADA'S ROLE IN PROPOSED PARLIAMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on Tuesday, November 6, 1990, by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein, regarding Council of Europe—Canada's role in Proposed Parliament—Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

Honourable senators, of all non-member states, Canada is the most active in the activities of the Council of Europe. Canada has observer status on approximately thirty intergovernmental committees. We participate on a regular basis in the ministerial and parliamentary conferences of the Council.

In June 1991, Canada will host an informal conference of European Justice Ministers. This will be the first time that a third country (i.e. a non-member state) will host such a conference.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs of Italy, Gianni De Michelis, has encouraged the Council of Europe to be more open to both Canada and the United States. He did not, however, suggest that they be admitted as members of the Council, as an Associated Press report indicated. As the membership criteria now stand, Canada cannot be a member of the Council as it is not a European state.

Canada acknowledges the expertise of the Council of Europe in the areas of human rights, culture and law. We believe that the Council has a role to play, but it is not a substitute for the CSCE. It is necessary for these activities to remain under the aegis of an organization with a wide-ranging mandate, such as the CSCE, and that Canada be a full member of any such organization.

Given the extensive experience of the Council of Europe in the operation of a multinational parliamentary assembly, we would like to see a very close cooperation between this body and the eventual CSCE assembly. The two assemblies should, however, remain separate.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 6, 1990, by the Honourable Dalia Wood, regarding Official Languages Act—Request for Tabling of Regulations.

(The answer follows:)

As you know, the Government has tabled the draft regulations on service to the public. In order to ensure that these regulatory proposals would be fair and reasonable for all Canadians, officials of the Treasury Board Secretariat carefully examined several factors, including the requirements of the Official Languages Act,the particular characteristics, size and distribution of official language minority communities and the diversity of federal services throughout Canada. They consulted with many interested parties. The draft regulations reflect this effort.

Further to an earlier response regarding this subject, I am confident that the proposed regulations are good ones and will meet with the approval of both Parliamentarians and the public. They are designed to provide generous access to federal services to the majority as well as the minority population in their official language, while at the same time not requiring federal institutions to maintain unneeded bilingual capacity.

For your information, attached is a copy of the document outlining the Process for the Adoption of Regulations Under the Official Languages Act.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO BILL

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 7, 1990, by the Honourable Jacques Hébert regarding the Goods and Services Tax—Speech by Senator Chaput-Rolland—Possibility of Amendments to Bill.

(The answer follows:)

As I committed to undertake on November 7, 1990, I wish to table the Globe and Mail article of October 23, 1990, by Robert Matas, quoting the Prime Minister during his recent visit to British Columbia.

FISHERIES

CANADA-UNITED STATES LOBSTER AGREEMENT—REJECTION BY CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the eighth delayed answer I have is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 8, 1990, by the Honourable M. Lorne Bonnell, regarding Fisheries.

(The answer follows:)

International Trade Minister John C. Crosbie and Fisheries and Oceans Minister Bernard Valcourt announced today the Government's decision not to enter into an agreement with the United States concerning trade in lobster.

Under the proposed agreement, Canada would have been obligated to increase its minimum lobster size, in all lobster fishing areas of Atlantic Canada except the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to 3 1/4 inches.

"Although the proposal would have provided certain potential benefits for Canada in the U. S. lobster market", Mr. Valcourt explained, "the fishermen who would have been most seriously affected by reduced lobster catches were strongly opposed to the idea of increasing our minimum legal lobster size simply to match that of the U.S. There are no biological or conservation reasons for such an increase in Canadian waters, therefore, we are not going to impose unnecessary restrictions on the operations of our fishermen."

Mr. Valcourt noted that Canadian lobster landings last year were at an all-time high, reflecting the success of careful Canadian management of the stocks in consultation with lobster fishermen. "In the past ten years, lobster landings have more than doubled and the stocks remain in a very healthy condition," the Minister said. "The lobster fishery is one of the current success stories in our Atlantic fishery".

"Fishermen say that they are confident that other buyers can be found for the lobster which they are no longer permitted to sell in the American market due to the U.S. restrictions," Mr. Valcourt added. "Consequently, there is no overriding reason to deny them the opportunity to continue to catch and market the current size of lobster."

Mr. Crosbie expressed the Government's appreciation to the industry representatives who participated in the discussions leading up to the proposed agreement. "I am deeply appreciative of the time and effort which several industry leaders devoted to seeking a negotiated resolution of these issues," said Mr. Crosbie.

The Ministers noted that in making their decision the Government consulted extensively with representatives of lobster fishermen, processors and distributors, as well as with representatives of five lobster-producing provinces (Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Québec).

The Government of Canada is considering further options aimed at providing broader access to the U.S. market.

NATIONAL REVENUE

JUSTIFICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 13, 1990 by the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault regarding National Revenue—Justification of Departmental Expenditures—request for information.

(The answer follows:)

I am advised by officials of my Department that the accommodation sought and used is the most economical arrangement available. The Department has secured a daily rate of $80 per participant, where normal rates are $250.00.

I can assure Members my Department is responsive to restraint measures and undertakes events of this nature only as required and uses the most economical accommodation available.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE RELATIONS

RENEGOTIATION OF CANADA-U.S. SOFTWOOD LUMBER AGREEMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Raymond J. Perrault, regarding Canada-United States Trade Relations—Renegotiation of Canada-U.S. Softwood Lumber Agreement-Government Position.

(The answer follows:)

We are consulting closely with provinces and industry to determine the most appropriate approach to deal with a complicated and sensitive issue.

THE HONOURABLE BENOIT BOUCHARD

STATEMENT IN THE PRESS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Norbert Thériault regarding the Honourable Benoit Bouchard—Statement in the Press.

(The answer follows:)

Mr. Bouchard stated during the interview with Le Journal that it is up to Quebec to decide its options and he continues to work "as a federalist".

He has reflected the views of many Canadians in saying that it is now appropriate to take a serious look at our federal system in light of present realities.

When the Citizens' Forum was announced, Mr. Bouchard said it was "vital exercise" to find out what people in all parts of the country want for Canada's future.

During the Quebec Progressive Conservative policy convention in Mont Ste-Anne, he stressed the importance of awaiting the results of the Citizens' Forum and the Bélanger-Campeau Commission in order to have a clear view of Canada's future.

THE CONSTITUTION

BÉLANGER-CAMPEAU COMMISSION—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on November 14, 1990, by the Honourable Philippe D. Gigantès regarding The Constitution—Bélanger-Campeau Commission—Federal Government Representation.

(The answer follows:)

As I said on November 14:

Mr. Hogue sits on the Commission as a representative of the Progressive Conservative Party, not of the Government of Canada.

As such it is not within my "ministerial responsibility to report on behalf of a person who is a representative of the party, but not of the Government."

Nevertheless, I can report that the Reference Division of the Library of Parliament confirms they are receiving verbatim reports of the Commission's proceedings and I suggest my honourable friend may wish to consult these reports with respect to his query.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is 5.45 p.m. Pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3.(a), the Senate shall proceed to the deferred division on Senator MacEachen's motion in amendment to Bill C-62.

Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaudoin, that Bill C-62 be now read the third time.

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the motion in amendment negatived.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, let me do Senator Frith's arithmetic for him this afternoon. Had the eight new senators not voted, the vote would have been 51 to 45 in favour of the motion in amendment.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Let me say, however, that the result of the vote demonstrates the wisdom of the Prime Minister's having invoked Section 26. Let me also note that the Supreme Court of New Brunswick today confirmed, as the Supreme Court of Ontario had done earlier, the validity of the appointment of those eight senators.

● (1800)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am sure that all of us noted those comments, including our visitors in the gallery.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I think many Canadians hope that the Leader of the Government's gloat will be a short gloat.

I move, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-1, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

According to Provisional Rule P-1, the sitting is suspended forthwith until 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Frith: To keep the record clear, I do not think the Speaker needs to put that motion under Provisional Rule P-1. Once the adjournment is moved, it automatically operates.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO ADJOURN WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday evening, Tuesday, I moved the adjournment of the Senate under rule P-1. The rule provides that:

> If at any time before the Senator then in the Chair calls for the yeas, nays and abstentions pursuant to Rule 49, the Senator who proposed the motion asks leave to withdraw the said motion the same shall be deemed to have been withdrawn;

I ask leave to withdraw the said motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

BANK ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-90, an Act to amend the Bank Act (extension).

Bill read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the orders of the day for second reading on Friday, November 23, 1990.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, from discussions with honourable senators opposite with regard to today's business, it seems that the intention of the Opposition is to introduce their eighth amendment this evening at 8 o'clock. That will give us the afternoon in which to debate a matter of interest to everyone. It has been decided, through mutual discussion, that the Persian Gulf crisis is an appropriate topic to occupy some of our time today. There is, of course, an understanding that we will revert to Bill C-62 when we return at 8 o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PERSIAN GULF CRISIS

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, to provide a basis for the discussion, I move, according to rule 46(g):

> That the Senate do now adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance, namely: the Persian Gulf crisis.

We have been dealing for the past several weeks with a matter of great importance to the Canadian taxpayer, but at the same time our preoccupation with that subject should not blind us to the fact that we may be standing on the brink of war. The issue of war and peace has not been with us in such a dramatic way for a generation. The last time this house held a debate and took action which resulted in Canadians going to war, with the inevitable sequence of human suffering and casualties, was in September 1950 after the outbreak of the Korean war. I want to say a few words later about how that crisis was handled by the government of the day in Parliament in comparison with the procedures on this occasion.

With many thousands of lives at risk, and possibly the lives of Canadians at risk, I think the situation is serious enough to interrupt our proceedings to focus our minds on the particular question in its starkest form: Is war inevitable? We know from past experience that, whenever an international crisis becomes acute enough to raise the question of war and peace, two options are available to the international community: military action or settlement by peaceful means. Military action is always a possible option, although its results may be disastrous. However, a peaceful settlement is not always possible. That being said, I am sure that every senator would agree that a peaceful settlement should be preferred to a military solution.

Therefore, in order to answer the question whether war is inevitable, we should not begin by considering who would win the war or how the war could be conducted, but by considering what war would achieve that would not be achievable by other means, and whether a peaceful solution is workable and viable? We know that various countries involved in this conflict have their own objectives. Let us take a look at a number of the Arab countries.

We know that Iraq has two overriding objectives, regional hegemony and a dominant position in OPEC. With the achievement of those two objectives Iraq would be able to pursue some more ambitious, longer-term objectives: Arab unity, the settlement of the Palestinian issue and a position of influence in the world, based upon its newly acquired ability to disturb the world price of oil. These objectives are clear and interrelated. The strategic means chosen by Saddam Hussein for achieving these objectives are equally clear and interrelated: the massive war machine, territorial aggrandizement and manipulation of Arab and world public opinion. Saddam Hussein has sacrificed all other national policy goals to the single-minded pursuit of that strategy. The strategy calls for aggression.

It is no wonder that other Arab countries in the Middle East should feel threatened. Kuwait has had long-standing border and historical disputes with Iraq, including the exploitation of the Rumaila oil field. The military forces of Kuwait were and are no match for Saddam Hussein's. Its wealth made it an attractive target. The obvious objective of the Kuwait government in exile must surely be liberation from Iraq's occupation, either by peaceful settlement or by military action.

Jordan is also vulnerable, because of its close and long-standing relations with Iraq, the importance of its Palestinian population and its geographic position between Iraq and Israel. Of course, we all know that it has come under pressure from Saudi Arabia for its reserved, pro-Iraqi stance. The overriding objective of Jordan is to prevent an armed conflict which could trigger a sequence of events that would put at risk its very own existence. As for other Arab countries, Saddam Hussein's military might is also a direct security threat to them and his ambition to achieve domination of the Middle East a longer-term threat, since they would not remain insulated from destabilization in the area. They share in common the immediate objective of getting Iraq out of Kuwait as a first measure to contain Saddam Hussein.

If this situation triggered an armed conflict, Iraq's military forces would be crippled, but these other countries would suffer significant destruction and loss of human lives. Their preferred option must clearly be an early, peaceful solution, born out of Arab concertation which would save them from the risk of devastation. If this cannot be achieved, they could become receptive, with the exception of Jordan, to the attraction of early offensive military action by the United States and other Western countries, particularly if the military action held the prospect of being short and decisive. The time element should be emphasized because the protracted presence of foreign troops in the area would eventually contribute to the destabilization of these countries' social and political systems.

I should underline at this point that the Arab countries will not take the offensive against Iraq on their own and without the support and leadership of the United States and other Western countries, whose moves, therefore, would be decisive.

What are the objectives of the Western countries? We know that one is to obtain the widest possible condemnation of this aggression and support for Iraq's withdrawal from Kuwait. This was achieved by the initial resolution of the Security Council. Their second objective was to protect Saudi Arabia from what seemed to be an imminent threat of aggression. This was achieved by the dispatch and deployment of foreign troops, mostly American, to Saudi Arabia.

As Iraq failed to heed the demand for withdrawal, an embargo was decreed—here again, by the Security Council—to put pressure on Iraq. Means of enforcement in compliance with Security Council resolutions were put in place. These mainly consist of naval and air power.

The longer term objectives of the West are to provide a convincing demonstration that aggression does not pay; to protect energy supplies; and to prevent further destabilization in the Middle East. I think we should delve a little into these longer-term objectives. The demonstration that aggression does not pay can be understood as a key element in the building of a new world security order, a new order in which the United Nations will assume full responsibility for the maintenance of peace and security as originally conceived by the drafters of the UN charter. Between the Korean War and what may become a new Middle East war, the United Nations security system was frozen by the East-West confrontation. For 40 years peace was secured by nuclear deterrents, but, with the end of the Cold War, the United Nations security system can be made to work. In a number of ways, the Persian Gulf crisis is breaking out at a momentous time in history and will, indeed, be a test of how aggression is going to be met in the post Cold War era.

Take note of what happened in the Persian Gulf after the invasion of Kuwait. Not one but two security systems have been deployed, first to stop and then to roll back aggression—the first consisting of coordinated multinational air and naval forces deployed in the Persian Gulf area to enforce an embargo within the framework of the United Nations Security Council resolution; the other consisting of ground and air forces, mostly American, deployed in Saudi Arabia to protect Saudi territory at the request of the Saudi government. This second deployment is unrelated to Security Council resolutions. In brief, we have been operating side by side with a new, fragile world security order on the one hand, and what might be called "pax Americana" on the other. The distinction is not without meaning for the future of any new world security system.

I said that this Persian Gulf crisis comes at a momentous time in history. During the Cold War the possible escalation of local conflict into global war held in check the intervention of the superpowers. The option of large-scale military action was never a realistic one for the superpowers in any past Middle East conflict. The risk of escalation, coupled with nuclear deterrents, was too great. In today's world, war without United Nations' blessing is a realistic option for the United States, and if Washington chooses that option, aggression will not pay, but the world will have another manifestation of "pax Americana."

[Senator MacEachen.]

Turning to the protection of energy supplies, the second objective of the West, one may well wonder whether war would be the best way of achieving that. Leaving aside physical destruction, which would cause severe disruption, the world market would be bound to react with significant price increases. It already did with the Iraq-Kuwait export embargo and in anticipation of an armed conflict. If this conflict were to break out soon, further price increases would come at a most inopportune time in the North American economic cycle. The duration of the war, of settlement negotiations and of recovery cannot be foretold with any degree of confidence, but it could be quite a while before normalcy of supplies, without disruptive pricing, could be secured. That is the war scenario.

Against that, the likely behaviour of Iraq has to be weighed in the scenario of a negotiated settlement. I believe that Iraq would be most unlikely to turn off the tap. It could even be argued that if Iraq kept some degree of control over Kuwaiti supplies as a result of peace negotiations it would find itself in somewhat the same position as Saudi Arabia, arguing for lower oil prices to prevent the development of alternative sources of supply. In the circumstances, I greet with much skepticism the argument that war is necessary to protect energy supplies.

To create stability in the Middle East is, of course, a worthy objective for the West. Saddam Hussein's ambitions have emerged as a major destabilizing factor and, as a matter of priority, his ambitions must be curbed. Certainly, it is not within the space of this speech that one could analyze the history of instability in this particular region, but it is worth remembering that the Middle East has experienced instability for something like 4,000 years, and that no war, ancient or recent, ever brought lasting stability to the region.

Moreover, the performance of the West when dealing with Lebanon, the Arab-Israeli dispute, and the Iran-Iraq war is not one that would inspire superlative confidence among inhabitants of the region. Many of them would argue that borders drawn by Western powers after World War I have been a source of conflict rather than stability; and others would argue that the policy of Western countries have been driven more by economic self-interest or political opportunism than by an unfailing commitment to equity. I am not saying these things out of cynicism, but to point out that, in the pursuit of stability as a goal, Western countries have to reach down into the underlying causes of conflict and to build new ways of helping the governments of the countries concerned to surmount these conflicts.

Moreover, stability should not mean paralysis. If the Middle East has been conflict-prone, it is because too much rigidity prevented the accommodation of divergent interests by peaceful negotiation. While we all approve of the stabilization goal of Western policy, I do not see very much evidence that the Western governments most active in the Middle East are getting ready, as a matter of priority, to work on the underlying forces which create instability. Yet the fact that the Middle East has ceased to be a powder keg for East-West confrontation opens up remarkable opportunities for progress. In other words, while the invasion of Kuwait has had a catalytic effect on Western, and probably world, determination to resist aggression, it has not had the same catalytic effect on the search for, and the bringing together of, the elements of a peaceful solution.

I have not said very much about Canadian objectives, and interests and actions, because I intend to conclude with that, but I think I have said enough about objectives and related interests to establish that Arab interests, including those of Iraq, and the interests and objectives of the West, are not better served now by offensive military action.

With the array of international forces deployed against it, Iraq, while sitting on Kuwait, will not attack. A remarkable consensus has been achieved in the United Nations to condemn Saddam Hussein and to demand the withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait. An embargo supported by impressive deployment of international forces has been achieved, thanks to U.N. Security Council resolutions. Adequate defence forces have been mobilized to confront all further aggression by Iraq. These are raising a considerable amount of pressure on Saddam Hussein, and I think this pressure should be allowed to work.

Current United States efforts and initiatives to move to an offensive stance—and we have seen much of that in recent days through the activities of the President and the Secretary of State—have the effect of straining the consensus and the coalition of the multilateral alliance marshalled against Saddam Hussein. Pushed beyond the point of no return, offensive action, not backed up by the Security Council, would tend to isolate the United States in a decisive phase of the conflict. Moreover, offensive action, not sanctioned by the United Nations, would make the achievement of medium-term objectives—that is, development of the United Nations security system, the security of oil supplies, and stability in the Middle East—more difficult to achieve.

We do not at this stage—at least I do not; perhaps others do—have evidence that the United Nations strategy, backed up by the resources of countries supporting it, is failing. I think it is imperative that a serious assessment be made of the effect of the embargo on Iraq before any other moves are contemplated.

I asked the Leader of the Government a few days ago about the effectiveness of the U.N. embargo, and I must say that I received an answer from the Department of External Affairs which is not fully helpful. The answer was that the embargo is effective insofar as it is being observed; it then went on to say that it is having some impact and, in the short term, is not expected to change the behaviour of Saddam Hussein. Well, it may take longer than that, but I think we ought to have some assessment in the United Nations at the present time of the effect of the embargo on Iraq before any other move is made. Certainly, at the very least, countries deploying forces in the area, including Canada, should have an opportunity to consider a full report of the Security Council committee charged with the monitoring of the embargo.

The United States, as we see very clearly, is engaged in marshalling Security Council members to get a resolution to take offensive action in the Persian Gulf. Make no mistake about it, that is what is happening. I believe it is premature. I think that we ought to watch Saddam Hussein. I think he is feeling the pressure. He has manufactured a hostage issue to divert this pressure. The reinforcement of his troops in Kuwait is a sign more of weakness than of strength. He is beginning to talk with insistence about the peaceful resolution of outstanding disputes in the Middle East. One may be inclined to discount such talk on the basis of Saddam Hussein's past record, but if we really mean to pursue a peaceful process of settlement, Saddam Hussein's seriousness, or lack thereof, must be tested again and again without relaxation of the pressure mounted against him.

More pressure could be applied by diplomatic means to isolate him. The offer of genuine negotiations as an alternative to war should be part of that pressure. This strategy, around which a consensus can be maintained, is the opposite of an ultimatum. The Iran-Iraq war has shown that Saddam Hussein can change his mind when confronted with severe punishment. The experience of Iran in that war has shown what attrition and obsolescence can do to sophisticated weaponry when lacking technical backup support. There may be a point to comparing Saddam Hussein to Hitler, but clearly, Iraq is not pre-war Germany.

One might ask for whom and for what is time running out? It is running out for Saddam Hussein. Iraq's economy was savaged by its war with Iran. It never had a chance to recover. Heavy financial transfusions from his oil-rich neighbours have dried up. The embargo is starving Iraq of financial resources and of basic supplies. Having said that, one should not underestimate the abilities of a developing country run by a dictatorship to suffer punishment, but we can confidently say that the prospect of Saddam Hussein's achieving the unification of the Arab world by force and social upheaval is now remote. His ambition must focus on a much narrower issue: How long can he hang on to Kuwait? However, time is also running out for the president of the United States, George Bush. Congressional and public-opinion support for the United States' involvement in the Persian Gulf crisis is beginning to recede, and the shift in opinion is accelerating as a result of the United States administration's move to an offensive stance in the Gulf.

In this connection, I cannot forget a comment made one time by Mr. James Schlesinger, whom we know as a former U.S. Secretary of Defence. He said that European countries and world statesmen are naive to believe that United States' foreign policy is driven by national interests; it is driven by domestic politics. That is a truism of U.S. foreign policy, in his mind, and I think he is an authoritative observer. We have to watch the domestic politics of the United States at the present time and whether or not it is an important factor in what is happening. I hope it is only a coincidence that those leaders who have been the most aggressive in talking about offensive action in the world have been those who have political troubles at home, including our own Prime Minister and Margaret Thatcher, who said in Paris yesterday that war is an immediate option in her consideration.

• (1430)

It would be a terrible tragedy if it turned out that war was inevitable, not because it is the only option to protect the integrity of a new world security system, not because regional and Western interests are best served by it, and not because of any deadlock in the search for a peaceful settlement, but because of the political calendar and the political atmosphere, particularly in the United States.

The United States led the United Nations into an unqualified condemnation of Iraq's aggression and effectively protected Saudi territory, but it has not succeeded in providing an equal degree of leadership in searching for ways of de-escalating the Persian Gulf crisis. It turned this crisis into a personal confrontation between George Bush and Saddam Hussein. To make total withdrawal of Iraq's forces a precondition of any other peaceful move, to frontload a delicate disengagement process with this most difficult step, and to use language that increasingly sounds like an ultimatum, all have the effect of escalating the conflict and paving the ground for a showdown. The worst situation in which the West could find itself would be to have the President of the United States in a position from which he could not back off without suffering unacceptable political damage.

I will say a few words on Canada's interests and on the performance of the Canadian government in this crisis. Canada has some commercial interest in Iraq and Kuwait, mainly in the form of exports of wheat and modest imports of oil. Of course, every Canadian has an interest in the gasoline price at the pump, but these are not the kind of interests over which any responsible government would put human lives at risk in a distant military venture; neither should Canadian lives be lost to support the President of the United States in any efforts to extricate himself from political difficulties. A country like Canada could only go to war when vital national interests are threatened.

That is what we did in Korea. What was at stake there was communism against freedom, dictatorship against democracy. North Korea's aggression was the acid test of a new and hopeful world security system which was embodied in the United Nations. The Korean War was more than a local war: it was an East-West war. Our vital interests consisted of our fundamental national values, and Canada rose to defend them against communism under the United Nations flag, as we had, along with our allies, in 1939 against Nazi aggression.

The East-West cold war is over. The Persian Gulf crisis has been manufactured by a local dictator bent on military venture. There is no danger of it escalating into a world conflict. In these circumstances, the only Canadian interest worth contemplating in our going to war is the building of a new world security system or a new peace order. So far, the United Nations and the allied countries opposing Iraq have made the right moves, and no more than a few warning shots have been fired, because the resolve of all countries concerned with aggression has been focused on means of countering it diplomatically and by military deployment without recourse to offensive action.

It is clear, from the reports of the summit meeting which concluded in Paris yesterday, that this approach is still being favoured by President Gorbachev and President Mitterrand. It assumes that Saddam Hussein's mind can be changed by means other than war, which is the correct assumption at this point. If I had any choice in the matter, I would not rule out further Security Council resolutions applying more pressure on Iraq, but I think that a draft resolution leaving the U.S. free to pull the trigger at its discretion should be strongly resisted.

Since the beginning of the Persian Gulf crisis, Canada, as a member of the Security Council, had the opportunity of exercising leadership where it was lacking; that is, in the imaginative search for a negotiated disengagement. My complaint against the Canadian government is that its performance has been somewhat erratic, with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs blowing hot and cold, apparently inspired by a certain amount of "me-tooism" and deference to Washington.

The government may have wasted an opportunity to make an independent and constructive contribution to the solution of the crisis. If the government should have shown deference, it should have been to the Canadian Parliament. One would have thought that, faced with the prospect of war for the first time in 40 years, the government would have behaved differently. It did not recall Parliament after its adjournment last summer. It then dispatched some ships to the Persian Gulf. Is the meeting between President Bush and the Prime Minister a coincidence? We were then treated with a comedy of those ships highlighting in Malta because the government could not meet the requirements of section 32 of the National Defence Act, which would put them under active service.

The government did place a motion before the House of Commons in which it naturally lauded its own performance and gave itself carte blanche to pursue whatever course it saw fit—or Washington saw fit. It took the combined efforts of the Opposition parties to extract from the government an undertaking to again consult Parliament and to work out action in the Gulf through the United Nations. To this day this undertaking remains unclear.

Of course, the government has ignored the Senate, and we have heard of Canada's participation in the Security Council discussion mostly in terms of statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which have been somewhat self-congratulatory. Of course, the government has not displayed much concern for the fate of the Canadian hostages in Iraq. I will leave that to others to discuss. It is a painful question at this time, and the government is now talking of sending out ground troops at a time when Washington is taking an offensive stance.

Let me remind the Leader of the Government how the Korean crisis was handled 40 years ago.

• (1440)

Following the attack on South Korea by North Korean troops over the weekend of June 24-25, 1950, Mr. Pearson reported every day to the House of Commons which was then sitting. The Department of External Affairs' estimates were before that house and extensive opportunity was available for discussion of the Korean crisis. That was rather valuable to the government and the country, because it was in the course of that discussion that an all-party line emerged in support of the action the government took in Korea. Mr. Pearson pledged that, if necessary, Parliament would be recalled, as it then stood on the eve of prorogation. Parliament was indeed recalled on August 19, 1950. The Korean situation was dealt with in the speech from the throne and both Houses of Parliament were invited to pass the legislation which then provided the basis for Canadian participation in the Korean war.

I do admit that the issues are not as clear-cut now, but that is all the more reason for attempting to clarify them through debate in Parliament. The way in which the Persian Gulf crisis is dealt with will create a precedent for handling international disputes in the post-Cold War era. The Canadian government enjoys a favoured position for claiming loudly and clearly that the process of peaceful settlement must be given a chance to work before the world experiences yet another failure at safeguarding peace.

Perhaps I should summarize what I think ought to be some of the major features of Canadian policy:

First, Canada should work principally through the United Nations and not bilaterally with the United States, although consultation is always necessary and inevitable.

Second, while safeguarding humanitarian action, medical supplies and food supplies, Canada should favour putting the maximum amount of pressure on Iraq to withdraw from Kuwait, short of offensive action.

Third, an early report should be obtained from the Security Council sanctions committee to be made public and discussed in the Canadian Parliament.

Fourth, Canada should make it clear that it will not consider offensive military action in the Gulf without a Security Council resolution directing such action. It should also make it clear that it will oppose such a resolution being passed at this time.

Fifth, Canadian land forces should not be sent to the Gulf area—certainly not for the foreseeable future.

Sixth, Canada should initiate rounds of consultation with the countries concerned to find ways of de-escalating the conflict.

Finally, the Canadian government should not initiate or participate in offensive action without bringing the issue before both Houses of Parliament.

If instead of adopting an articulate policy the government continues on what I see as an erratic course, it may soon be shedding Canadian blood unnecessarily.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am very much moved by the importance of the issue which has been opened by Senator MacEachen. Indeed, as soon as possible after we came back to Ottawa I laid down a motion on this issue and was prepared to discuss it with Senator MacEachen or anyone else at any time during the day or night. However, I kept my remarks in my aging but ample bosom for two months, with great accretions of research notes, and even though there is no time limit in the Senate I am not going to force all of this material on you this afternoon.

From the beginning, while realizing the Senate Hansard is not a best seller, in this time of great crisis I was always afraid that at some future date some student directed by some professor might be seeking out why the Senate of Canada, the upper house of the Canadian Parliament, at a time of great crisis like the one in the Gulf, could not, in two months, find five minutes in which to discuss the grave issue. They might be surprised. So I wanted to put down here, in case someone might read the Hansard of this day, that I have been here and was also surprised that it took us this long to get to this issue which is of consuming importance to the future of the world, and potentially the life and death of many, many people.

When I was launching what I thought would be my motion I ran across something which discouraged me a bit. There was an inquiry that came into my office to the effect that apparently I, or someone, was not working on a GST speech. I answered yes. So along came someone from the CBC who wanted to see what I was doing. I told them exactly what I was doing, showed them what I had on my desk, that I was drawing on the various authorities from the realm of international affairs. The young man from the CBC said: Are you taking part in a filibuster? I said, "Totally the opposite. I think this is a very important matter and the sooner the Senate discusses it the better." I also gave him the kind of worldly wisdom that might be expected from an oldtimer. I said: If I wanted to make a filibuster speech—I know what they are like but I have never taken part in one—I would not have been extracting from these authorities, I would have brought the whole damn bunch of them into the Senate and read them, because in a filibuster, the longer you speak the better, apparently. Whereas I, as an old time professor, stupidly thought that a half decent speech was better than a terribly elongated one. But did that help him? No. When I finally appeared on the CBC's The Journal, they said: "Senator Macquarrie, starting and preparing his filibuster speech." Quite a filibuster; it has been two months since I have had a chance to give it.

However, we learn in political life that not all things work the way you believe they should so you roll with the punches. I think that is the modern or semi-modern line.

Much could be said on the issues and anxieties which trouble us these days. There are terrible uncertainties in the international situation today. So uncertain and so troubling are they that seemingly we in Canada have been asked to accept, and I guess have grown accustomed to, the inevitability of war.

I had hoped after so many years of peace that in my time we would not be facing up to this. However, it is not only in our time. It is much more immediate than that. I do not know how much more time I have left, but I read headlines like: "Will it be before Christmas? Will it be before the Congressional elections? Will it be before the night of the full moon in Saudi Arabia?" That is cutting it down to a very thin line, honourable senators.

However, as I look at this issue, being troubled about it and worried about it, I think first not of the politicians, not even of the diplomats, who I think are doing a better job than the politicians in many cases, not of the analysts, not of the advocates of a quick war, but of nearly 2,000 young Canadians who will not be involved in any theoretical discussion but will be involved in very perilous conditions on what, to Canadians, is a far-flung part of this planet.

I am fortunate enough to be a native of one of the small but most beautiful parts of Canada, namely Prince Edward Island. There I live in the place where I was born, the little seaport of Victoria. Some 200 people live there, and that figure rises to about 260 in the height of the tourist season. It is a great tourist attraction. From that little community there is a young man called Donald LaBrech who, from the very beginning, was on the crew of the Athabaska, and has been in the Gulf for a long, long time. His parents are friends of mine. He grew up with my children. If this crisis is reaching into the little place of Victoria, then I am sure there are many senators here who have to think of Canadians who are involved, and who might be heavily involved.

● (1450)

I move now to considerations of the kind of world which has brought this on. I think of the meetings yesterday in Paris. I think of the leader of the Soviet Union. During most of my lifetime these guys were considered the worst one could ever see. They were terrible types. I was in the United Nations and saw John Foster Dulles. I bristled at the insensitivity of the colossus which was running the whole world, as someone said. We now know that the cooperation of the Soviet Union is essential to what is going on in the Gulf. I like to think it is a great time, that all the Cold War anxieties have diminished; but apparently nothing is ever perfect. Victor Hugo said that the perfect smile belongs to God alone. We look at the Soviet Union and the people living near it. From the viewpoint of diplomacy in the West, it is a great thing; but for those who live in that great part of the world I wonder how great it is. I see in the Soviet Union people who a few years ago would not have dared to say boo but who now are yapping and sniping at the hand that freed them. I see, in other parts of Europe, people who in their new-found state want to pick the apples before they are ripe. That relates very closely to the kind of consensus which has built up in reference to the present situation.

I look, too, at situations which caused us anguish a while ago. Things are better even in Afghanistan, although it is not yet a peaceful or serene community, God knows. Namibia, which was a troubled spot, and was since the very first time I went to the United Nations in 1957, is now doing very well. Things are actually better in Nicaragua, for God's sake. For those of us who are not young like myself, we have never seen in our time the kind of attitude within South Africa that we see today. Even in the Republic of China, and regarding our relations with that country, things are calm. There are many flash points, that we watched with anxiety and care, which we find are growing cooler. There is a great diminution of tension. We might say, are we not entering into a new era in this world? What more could we ask?

On September 19, while listening to the radio, that tranquility was interrupted by a declaration by the Secretary General of the United Nations, who should be regarded as the leading diplomat of the world. He expressed fears not about a Gulf war, not about a regional war, but about a world war. It shocked me a little after I had completed my morning swim and morning walk, to hear that reported through the media. I wondered, in the name of God, what kind of editorial decision regarding the threat of a world war by the leading world diplomat should cause such an item to be subsumed into something else.

In our daily prayer, which the Speaker reads so well—I don't know how many of us listen to it carefully—we conclude by praying that we will continue our dedication to the cause of peace and justice throughout the world. I think it is too bad that within two months we have not had a discussion about the peace in the world.

If I were a preacher, which I very nearly became—but thank God for the church I did not—and I had a text, which I do not, it would be Benjamin Franklin's utterance that there never was a good war or a bad peace. Franklin, the great classical scholar that he was, no doubt drew upon Cicero, who caused me many problems in my Latin courses, who said:

> I cease not to advocate peace; even though unjust it is better than the most just war.

What an era we are passing through, honourable senators. There are so many signs to indicate that we are moving into a great new period of peace and comity. Then, as we rejoice that old nasties such as John Foster Dulles and Senator Joe McCarthy are no longer with us, we have new problems, and we worry about the future of the world. Senator MacEachen has raised anxieties and questions. We are rejoicing over the situation in the United Nations. I think most of us have been devotees of the United Nations. Canadians have contributed magnificently from the very beginning of that organization. The late Lester Pearson at one time served as president of the U.N. General Assembly, and from his efforts came recognition as Nobel Peace laureate.

One looks today at the close relationship betweem the UN and the U.S. Since we are all blessed with memories, until we become senile, we think of those days when spokesmen for the United States had very little time to say anything about the United Nations. It seems only yesterday that the United States was prepared to cut the organization off at the pass and not even pay its rightful dues. Those, of course, were the days of Rambo Republicanism in Washington. I have a feeling that there are still vestiges of that abrasiveness left. The choice expression of the time was "the tyranny of the majority." They could not stand the majority of the Third World. At one time the deputy U.S. representative to the United Nations was featured on television and radio as saying that if people connected with the United Nations could not stand being in New York, "we would be glad to go down to the harbour and wave them goodbye as they faded into the sunset." It is an utterance for which he should have been cashiered if not fired, and the Kirkpatricks and the Reagans probably applauded in silence, as they greeted the utterance in silence.

• (1500)

So it is still a concern, perhaps more urgently, for Canadians to evaluate their relationship with the United Nations, of which we have been a proud founding member, and our relationship with the United States, of which we are a most important neighbour. We must remember that we are here and they are over there. We must watch, particularly in this day and age, that there is not a danger of our seeing, in a too casual way, the United States as being for certain chapters, certain phases, certain film slides the United Nations itself. It would help if we can retain, even under the exigencies of the Gulf situation, the primacy of our concern for the United Nations rather than the United States. The United States is a great country. It is our nearest neighbour in more ways than geographic, but it would not be wise for Canada to subsume its interests and policies even to the United States.

I heard with interest an old Conservative friend of mine, General Richard Rohmer, on the CBC the night before last. With regard to Canada's attitude to the United States, he said that we could not be seen to be absolutely tied to every whim and fancy of George Bush. General Rohmer was a hawk when I knew him in the Conservative Party. However, he closed his interview with something to which I, as a dove, subscribe. He said: "I think war is absolute idiocy, particularly if you don't know why you are doing it." I have a feeling that it would be a great tragedy if the magnificent UN consensus were overborne or bypassed by impatience and myopia.

I believe it is far too soon to abandon this most comprehensive pattern of international relations yet put together by mankind. How could the effectiveness of the worldwide imposition of sanctions be judged in less than three months? It is only an impatient, damned fool who could judge the efficacy of a marriage in that time. We need time. Any fool in the world of economics knows there is hardly a country in the world that does not do a bit of stockpiling, and Iraq has its own warehouses. How could we expect these things to be brought to bear within a month and a half? I do not believe that Iraq is profiting by the war, as someone said about a month ago, but that it is suffering, and it will suffer more. As the Charlottetown Guardian, not noted for its international observations, said not long ago, "World leaders have a responsibility to make sure they give sanctions a chance to work."

I am also fearful of those who argue that we must immediately move into the force equation, not only because sanctions have not had a chance to work, but because I am a little dubious. That is always the problem of independent-thinking men: they are sometimes dubious. When I go into a room and everyone is thinking the same, I have the feeling, "By God, there must be someone in here who is not thinking at all." Unanimity does not fall naturally to thoughtful people. However, I have read the paliatives to the effect that the best thing to do is to have a swift, surgical strike. Kissinger has suggested a swift knockout blow, and has said that the sooner it comes the better. How often has the world been lulled into wearying, painful, endless wars by the soothing comments of a brief conflict?

I watched that magnificent PBS television program on the American Civil War. A senator from the south had said at the beginning of the war that it would be a very short, snappy war, and that as far as bloodshed was concerned, he could wipe it all up with his pocket handkerchief. I wonder what he thought four years and 600,000 casualties later? I am not quite old enough to remember the Great War, World War I, although my father served in it. I was not born until after he came back. However, Henry Ford said that he would have the boys out of the trenches and back home in America before Christmas. That did not happen. The sharp, surgical strikes do not always work. There was one launched against Libya supposedly to take out Khaddafi, but they got his young daughter instead. Panama was to be captured with the most brilliant, easy operation, and they are still opening unmarked graves in Panama City.

If there is anything that history shows—and I hope that the advisors and the war hawks will remember this—it is that it is an awful lot easier to get into a Middle East war than it is to get out of one. I am truly disturbed as I read the utterances of people today who champion the war options and over exalt the goals and the beneficial results. The immediate aim, the withdrawal of the Iraqis from Kuwait, is perfectly clear. They have no business being there. However, the idea that the end of Saddam Hussein is the end of trouble in the Middle East is a dangerous and preposterous whim. There are many disequilibrating elements in the Middle East. Indeed, we have only to remind ourselves of the people over the last few years who were the number one enemies of the United States. Libya was a long-time favourite; Syria, now an ally, was by no means on any preferred list drawn up in Washington. Post-Shah Iran was long considered to be the worst of the whole bunch and therefore it was a good thing to help Iraq. There will be many explosive issues and situations long after Saddam Hussein has gone to his just reward by being either overthrown by his own people, someone else's people or simply by events. There are other things. I am sure that Senators Murray, Roblin and Buckwold will remember the candid concerns of King Hussein who told us in Amman some few years ago about his anxieties concerning the increasing danger from religious fanaticism, which is not confined, God help us, to any particular group but to many.

• (1510)

I ponder and reflect, indeed, I shudder when I think about the great values that religion has brought to so many people; but the fanaticism and the extremism of those very people have brought so many ills to a great many more people. I recall—and I think Senator Murray, Senator Roblin and Senator Buckwold will recall—that President Mubarak had the same anxieties. These things will not evaporate and, indeed, who knows, they might be exacerbated.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Honourable senators, I will not speak as long as Senator MacEachen did so I will conclude by saying that, finally, I have trouble with the ease with which some people believe that, in this particular crisis, we will not entertain the idea of linkage, even with this bad scamp—and he is a bad scamp in my opinion—and that all other issues should be kept aside, that we do not want to be confused by the pain, anguish and suffering of other people in that volatile Middle East area. I can understand why people would like that to be the case. Concentration is a great thing in many activities. Former U.S. Under Secretary of State, David D. Newsom, put it very well in the Christian Science Monitor last week in an article headed "Linkage is Inevitable" where he stated:

> The current crisis in the region illustrates once more that the Middle East is a mosaic of inter-linked problems, whether they involve Iraq, Iran, Saudi Arabia, Lebanon, Syria, Israel, Jordan, Egypt, or the Palestinians. Efforts to isolate parts of the mosaic may be possible for short periods, but, ultimately, those who would bring stability to the region must look at the whole . . .

That is a very wise comment from this very distinguished man.

Honourable senators, I have no anxiety about what the United Nations did and I have no anxiety or regret about what the Canadian government did. I think our response and the response of the United Nations was just fine, but I have the greatest concern about our young people. I was moved more than I can say by that wonderful program on Remembrance Day when our people here contacted many of the participants in our force in the Gulf. I saw these young people, young professionals, looking just fine. But, beyond all that, they are sensitive young Canadians far away from home. It is our prayer that they will all come back. That is why I want to come through today loud and clear as a peacemaker.

Honourable senators, Senator Murray has already indicated to you today that I am not speaking for the government, and he is quite right. If they stand at 15 per cent or 18 per cent in the polls, goodness knows they do not need Senator Macquarrie speaking for them. They have enough troubles of their own. However, if I were speaking on my own motion and not on Senator MacEachen's, I would expound caution and concern as a peacemaker. The other day when the Prime Minister talked about finding extra funds for the people in the Gulf, he said no less than would be axiomatic or obvious. We send these young people—to be Tennysonian—"into the gates of hell and the jaws of death", and the least we can do is provide them with the very best, and there should be no questions about where it comes from. We owe them that. They will not let us down.

I am proud of our young people in peacekeeping forces. We have seen them in many parts of the world such as Cyprus,

Egypt and in the Asian continent and they are a credit to us. I praise them. I hope they will be back to that kind of activity rather than being engaged in a rike where, perhaps, the leadership is dubious.

I think, too, that we have to give credit for the activities of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Ambassador Yves Fortier in that they are keeping the diplomatic issue to the forefront. In my judgment my deep sentiment for many years of concern with this issue is that we should never quickly let go of the diplomatic option. If we move too fast or let anyone else move us too fast, we will never know whether diplomacy would have preserved peace and saved many lives.

One of the great Canadians in my present recognition—I say that because I have only become aware of him lately—is that splendid General Johnson, who heads a very important institute and gives great leadership. He said that war would only become inevitable if too many of us, through our attitudes and our conversation, make it possible. Honourable senators, whatever I may have said in my humble contribution at this time, my aim is to give the longest possible extension to diplomacy and the greatest opportunity for peace.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, this week in Paris the world celebrated the construction of a new world order. That new world order is a world of ideas, not a theoretical contest of ideas, but real and powerful ideas. Ideas can bring peace; ideas can bring war; but the route of any conflict is based on a conflict of ideas first and foremost. Ideas can kill.

Nationalism, Iraqi-style, infects its population with virulent ideas. Nationalism, Iraqi-style, values force and violence to achieve its collectivist ambitions of Arab unity. Nationalism, Iraqi-style, is not the sum of its parts but is one idea: one idea; one order; one morality; and one leader. One leader, Iraqis are told, becomes a unifier; becomes the leader only by his mastery of one idea—one unity.

● (1520)

The precondition is one faith. The essential lie is to conjure up enemies from within and enemies from without who can be destroyed to legitimize this awesome unity. The instrument is fear. The state, the army, the militia, the police, the bureaucracy, and then the mosques and the schools, are all harnessed to one idea. Individual rights can only be exercised within the confines of one idea. Only the state has the monopoly on this idea. Only the state can be responsible for so-called freedom.

This virulent nationalism, Iraqi style, is based on a theory of exclusion. All differences must be submerged in the collectivity for the sake of the collectivity. Nationalism, Iraqi style, purges itself violently from within in order to project an identity that has no national boundaries. Nationalism, Iraqi style, is a faith that transcends and crushes individual differences. Enemies from within are the minorities: the Kurds, the Assyrians, the Iranians, the Jews, indeed any minority whom the leader can connect to enemies without, such as Western imperialism. These irritants within the state must be destroyed, must be cleansed, all for the sake of unity, a unity that transcends state lines. Psychological projection is the tool. Blame all errors, blame all faults, blame all grievances, blame all economic conditions, on someone else, to legitimize your own state powers. This, honourable senators, is not a theoretical tract. This, honourable senators, is the political faith of the Ba'ath Party in Iraq. Ba'ath means "renaissance." This form of renaissance is preached by the sole party in Iraq. All other voices have been eradicated by violence.

All of this, honourable senators, is set out in a rather chilling book called The Republic of Fear written by Samir al-Khalil, a brilliant Iraqi scholar. This nationalist idea, honourable senators, kills, and the Ba'athist theology or Ba'athist ideology sanctifies and legitimizes violence as part of its national aims. It kills, it maims, it pillages, it tortures, it rapes, it takes hostages, all in the name of its ideology. Amnesty International, Freedom Watch, the U.S. Congress, the United Nations, the Geneva-based Arab Organization for Human Rights have highlighted these awesome and obscene breaches of human rights within Iraq where no dissent is tolerated; and now, of course, within Kuwait, where freedom is being dismembered minute by minute. So, time, honourable senators, does have some relevance. Time is important. The urgency is based on the minute-by-minute violations to persons and property. This evidence within Kuwait is uncontroverted. Time has not stopped in Kuwait. Over a million refugees in the last two months are on the move, all because of the aggressive acts.

Taking hostages is legitimate, by this Iraqi-style nationalism. All can be sacrificed for the cause—men, women and children—all for the struggle, all for unity.

These are fearsome ideas. Honourable senators, what can be more urgent to occupy the deliberations of the Senate than examining these ideas, because they have raised the threat of war and the consequent threats of death or impairment to Canadians.

Credibility for government collapses, honourable senators, when the government refuses to take Parliament, and hence the Canadian public, into its confidence. After the outbreak of hostilities in Kuwait on August 2, when the Prime Minister immediately responded to President Bush's request for support for the American-led actions against Iraq in the Gulf, the government failed to call back Parliament until September 25. We have been in session now for close to two months, but the government has not yet placed before this chamber a statement of policy to which all honourable senators could respond. I am grateful for this interlude to allow us an opportunity to bring our views forward at this time.

The United States, we have learned, has now called up additional forces which will be in place in the Gulf in the next four to six weeks. Their presence will aggregate in excess of 400,000 American military personnel alone, bringing the outbreak of hostilities yet closer. Yesterday we heard, whether it is true or not, that the Iraqi forces have now deployed or intend to deploy another quarter of a million troops in the small space called Kuwait.

So, honourable senators, I believe it is our urgent duty to examine the contours and the context of Canada's policy. The facts appear simple and clear. The solutions, as both Senator Macquarrie and Senator MacEachen have pointed out, are complex and awesome. Before addressing specific responses to Canadian actions, and what steps the Canadian government should take, we must ask ourselves: Does Iraq's unprovoked aggression, occupation, pillage, dismemberment and, finally, annexation of Kuwait call to mind any lessons from our history? Are there principles that we can draw from the bloody past that might be instructive? The history of the twentieth century is marked by what we call, loosely, progress. Surely, no greater progress has been made than in the creation and distribution of modern murder technology. What hard lessons can now be instructive? Since the turn of the century almost every region of the globe, save for North America, has suffered from mindless destruction and impairment of lives and property, all in the name, honourable senators, of the modern diseases of ideology: virulent nationalism, socialism, and fascism.

What public therapy or surgery can now be exerted to root out these vile and cancerous pathologies? The first iron rule is that democracies do not make war against other democracies. Security and peace in all regions of the world lie ultimately with the evolution of all nations towards pluralistic democracies.

Second, the modern disease called, by some, nationalism, can easily be transformed into a contagious cancer which corrodes human values and undermines respect for individual human rights. These evil ideas should be attacked. Peace and security, therefore, lie in the evolution of states to forms of pluralistic democracy which have at their very foundation respect for individual rights over collectivist visions.

Third, sanctions, we have learned, are limited, unless supported by unity and, ultimately, by the credible sanction of just war. Unprovoked aggression by aberrant states may require the use of force. Democracies may be compelled to embark on just wars in the belief that smaller sacrifices today are preferable to larger conflagrations that could be ignited if steps are not taken now.

Fourth, the object of sanctions and just war is not to deter unprovoked aggression by aberrant states alone but to suffocate and supplant authoritarian regimes from within and from without, and hopefully to infect those states with democratic ideas. Should this not, honourable senators, be our goal? Is not this precisely what Mr. Gorbachev applauded yesterday in Paris? Is this not what the president of the Republic of San Marina, in Europe, meant yesterday when he said that peace in Europe was accomplished because of the acceptance of democratic ideas? This, therefore, is the object and the hope and security of a new world order.

● (1530)

The implementation of these principles requires creative, democratic leadership and strong, coherent action. The threat of massive strength is still the best deterrent to aggressive action by aberrant states. Is that not the lesson of NATO? The threat of massive action deflates the size of the bully and diminishes the profits. Was not the best antidote to sudden aggression by Iraq immediate and strong reaction? Can there be any doubt in the minds of world figures that if America had not moved quickly at the beginning of August and the U.N. had not supported America, Mr. Saddam Hussein would now be occupying Saudi Arabia and perhaps the Gulf straits? Is there any doubt that history teaches that profiting from aggression, if not stopped, increases the appetite for aggression?

We are taught that democracies cannot choose the sources, the timing or the places of aberrant national conduct. Henry Kissinger argued that the world is an asylum. Human experience in each case requires different treatment, but at all times a strong, steady, democratic will prepared to react is the only way to contain the disease of virulent and aberrant conduct. Behind us, honourable senators—and this is what makes our generation different from previous generations—is public opinion and how it is formed. Nothing can take place in the new world order without democratic public opinion. Informed public opinion is essential.

There is a new, powerful and awesome phenomenon which we see daily on the television screens, which distorts, helps and hinders freedom. I refer to the ubiquitous media. By selection they can distort; by establishing a symmetry between personalities they can establish an unfair impression of balance. This fearful symmetry is established when on the television screens the aggressor is seen by the public to have the same legitimacy as those who would restrain aggression. So the media distort. How often in the last few months have we been dismayed or appalled by the brilliant use of the free media by Iraq in the western world? Iraq is under no illusion about the media or their strength. We know that in Iraq all aspects of the media are controlled; yet in our democracy, with free press and free media, we allow the most intolerable pieces of misinformation to be projected, giving international sanction and support for them almost a false legitimacy. Merely by projection alone does the public put the two—the evil and the good—in the same context.

Honourable senators, it is most difficult to recommend policies and hope to obtain unity among democracies as opposed to partisan politics, when confronted with the distortions of the media, which can so fragment the democratic will and ultimately cause an erosion of trust and disunity in the democratic spirit. With that caveat, may I spend some time reviewing our history, because I think it is important that we learn from some cases I would like to present to you, all of which will be familiar, and I will give you my view of what happened in them.

My first case concerns Mussolini and Ethiopia. Canada was very much involved in this particular event. In 1935 Mussolini's Italy commenced unprovoked aggression against Ethiopia in order to establish hegemony and unity in order to establish a foundation for the fascist empire on the African continent. The second example is the unilateral breach of the Locarno Treaty by Nazi Germany in the mid-1930s, at which time Nazi Germany marched its troops into the Rhineland, breaching the Locarno Pact established after World War I. The third example is the unprovoked aggression by the Third Reich, Nazi Germany, against Czechoslovakia, in 1938-39. Finally, honourable senators, there is the example of the threat to West Berlin by the Soviet Union in 1961.

In each case democratic opinion varied. Attitudes swung from isolationism to passivism. In each case public opinion questioned the need for sacrifice or, indeed, involvement. Canada played, as history now shows, not an insignificant role in each of these events, even though they took place well beyond our borders. In 1935 Mussolini, the darling of modern efficiency and state capitalism, invaded Ethiopia. The League of Nations was convoked. Italy's aggression was criticized and sanctions were proposed. The year 1935 was a crucial period in the world economy. Indeed, our present economic conditions are reminiscent of 1935. Canada, as was most of the Western world, was in the throes of a deep economic depression. Governments and parties were thrashing about for economic prescriptions. Canada was in no mood to invest public expenditures on defence either at home or abroad.

Mr. R.B. Bennett, the then Prime Minister, in the midst of this economic emergency, called a national election. The outgoing prime minister took a more aggressive position respecting Canada's roles and sanctions than his own External Affairs advisors. He instructed Mr. Riddell, our representative in the League of Nations, over the objections of Dr. Skelton, our first Deputy Minister of External Affairs, to show leadership at the league in the creation and imposition of sanctions. Mr. King, upon election in 1935, aided by Mr. Lapointe, took the opposite view; yet both King and Bennett, as Prime Ministers and as Leaders of the Opposition, decided that they would take their positions without the support of Parliament. Both were not anxious to involve Parliament and did not wish it to be apprised of the real events.

King, upon taking office, immediately restricted Riddell's actions in Geneva. At that time Riddell was assisted by a junior officer from External Affairs, one Lester Bowles Pearson, and both Riddell and Pearson were deemed to be too aggressive. They both sought to strengthen the league's collective ability to take action and impose binding sanctions. Riddell was "excommunicated" and sent to a South American conference. Canada reluctantly adopted sanction measures which were not actively enforced against Italy. For over six months, King manoeuvred to deny Parliament a glimpse of the inner workings of government policy.

Much can be learned from King's memoirs and from an admirable book written by James Eayrs entitled In Defence of Canada; Appeasement and Rearmament, which contains magnificent reprints of government memoranda and correspondence from King and other figures. In this intriguing book we find Mr. King stating his vision of the role of the League of Nations, which vision, in my view, led to its ultimate demise. In King's view, the league should have been merely relegated to functioning as an investigatory body, like a non-binding labour investigation in mediation. Of course the role of public opinion could be triggered, but he felt world opinion would be the best deterrent against the aggressive actions of these naughty states.

Here we see the pathology of a great tragedy: Canada's refusal to defend small states and to turn back aggressive action. This quiet tragedy led both the fascist regimes in Italy, Germany and later Japan to adopt aggressive acts of expansion which ultimately led to World War II. Aggression was rewarded by inaction and useless diplomacy. Canada's policy of 1935 was not merely isolationist nor could it have been deemed neutralist; it was wantonly destructive of the League of Nations. Attempts were made by Canadians and strong-minded nations such as New Zealand to stiffen the sinews of collective action, but these attempts were retarded.

The story is no better when it comes to Nazi Germany's breach of the World War I Locarno Pact, which neutralized the Rhineland. In 1937 Hitler marched into the Rhineland and no collective action was taken to prevent it. Indeed, Nazi Germany encouraged the thought that this would appease its larger ambitions. The sordid story is no better when it came to small democratic Czechoslovakia. France and England, abetted and applauded by Canada, allowed Czechoslovakia, a democratic nation, to be dismembered based on policies of appeasement. Appeasement in the 1930s was considered a policy of non-intervention, of laissez-faire, of allowing other nations to conduct their business without any idea of restraint.

Many argued then that Ethiopia, and then Czechoslovakia, were of little consequence. It was a small price to pay to maintain the greater peace and greater stability in the world for all. So little Ethiopia, an antique, ancient, absolute monarchy, and awkward little Czechoslovakia, a small but brilliant model for modern democracy, were both deemed unimportant in terms of the peace and stability of France, England, the United States, or, indeed, Canada. It is interesting to note that the only strong and consistent voice in the Commonwealth staunchly opposed to these actions was little New Zealand. I believe that chapter in history requires greater promotion.

Is it not interesting to note that in these three case studies Parliament was only reluctantly taken into the confidence of the government of the day. Ten months after Ethiopia was invaded by Italy, Parliament was called for the first time. This was done chiefly because of the hectoring of Mr. Woodsworth, one of the founders of the CCF, who was not only a staunch supporter of democracy but a grand protector of small states, whatever their political complexion. Mr. Woodsworth's philosophy was that it was necessary to protect the weaker segments in society. I believe he drew a parallel between protecting the weak in Canadian society and protecting the weak in the world against stronger nationalistic bullies.

Woodsworth and other members of Parliament nagged the government and nagged Parliament. First he was resisted by both Bennett and King. Later the two switched positions, as I said, from Prime Minister to Leader of the Opposition, and again they resisted Woodsworth's attempts to take Parliament into the government's confidence. King feared any action by Canada to stem this local aggression by the Third Reich or Italy in continental Europe or North Africa would precipitate a world war. That is what King wrote. That is what King said.

Sanctions recommended by the League were put into effect on November 15, 1935, and, as they began to work, Mussolini turned to France to postpone the League meeting in order to fend off even stronger sanctions. Meanwhile, Italy replenished its energy supplies with purchases from the United States, the Soviet Union and Romania.

Further discussions of the League's sanctions were postponed and delayed. In the interim, the whole Lavalle secret agreement was made public. The French and British cabinets had combined to purchase peace in Africa by presenting Mussolini with practically all the territory so far occupied by his armies in Ethiopia. Public revulsion swept through Britain as it did Canada. The public was abhorred. Hoare was swept from office in England to be replaced by Eden. Meanwhile, King, our Prime Minister, secretly acquiesced in the infamous pact and was delighted that France and Britain were taking the public heat.

Early in 1936, as I said, Riddell was sent—really excommunicated—to represent Canada at a South American conference, leaving King, his cabinet colleagues and the bureaucracy with a free hand to undermine the effectiveness of sanctions. Sanctions came back to the League for further consideration in February, 1936. The government procrastinated. King hid behind the procrastination of others. Meanwhile, Italian troops swept ever deeper into Ethiopia, introducing a rather novel technological feature of the day, the employment of mustard gas. Anthony Eden replaced Samuel Hoare in England and then staunchly announced that Britain would now apply oil embargoes together with other oil producing and transporting states.

Adolf Hitler, astute strategist that he was, took advantage of the uncertainty and fragile economic situation and saw there was disunity in the so-called West. He smartly marched his troops into the Rhineland in open violation of the Locarno Pact. As James Eayrs in his book so rightly points out, Hitler's aggression in itself was caused by Anglo-French irresolution and was increased ten-fold by their dilatory policies over Italy's aggression in Ethiopia.

In early May Fascist Italy entered Addis Ababa. On May 9, Mussolini declared the founding of the Fascist empire in Africa. On June 10 Neville Chamberlain, trapped by his appeasement policies, declared that the continuation of sanctions against Italy were "the very midsummer of madness." His reaction to events in the Rhineland and the breach of the Locarno Pact were mute.

On February 10 and 11 of 1936 the crisis was discussed in the Canadian Parliament. King refused to be drawn into any discussion of oil sanctions. He reminded his Parliament that the matter was still before the League and had not yet been referred to member governments for their consideration. What King did not disclose is that Canada, by his direction, had delayed consideration of oil sanctions by member governments. King decreed that Canada would consider oil sanctions after other nations had made their considerations on the merits. Let others do it, he said, and then perhaps he might move.

The next three or four months in 1936, despite the efforts by Woodsworth and other parliamentarians, finally forced debate on the general question of sanctions, collective security and the League of Nations. The government maintained, as Eayrs writes, that King's conviction was that "silence was golden." King wrote a fascinating letter to a member of Parliament at the time. He said that it was in the public interest to have as little discussion as possible raised in the House of Commons with respect to the European situation. He concluded this wonderful little note by writing the following.

> It is sometimes well to allow sleeping dogs to lie. This I believe to be especially true when they happen to be the dogs of war.

King wrote that in 1936. While the government policy of silence or reticence did not go uncriticized, it was successfully maintained. It was Mr. Woodsworth, one of the founders of the CCF, that led the way in this criticism.

In his statement to Parliament, it was King's view that sanctions might "invoke new wars or at least make impossible a peaceful settlement of the existing war." The Canadian government was not opposed to oil sanctions, King argued. Canada had supported them. However, he saw no reason to take a lead in so dangerous and controversial a matter. Why, King was asked, had the League failed? His answer, in brief, was "collective bluffing cannot bring collective security. Under present conditions most countries have shown they are not prepared to make firm commitments beyond the range of their immediate interests."

Sanctions, he argued, should be discontinued. What, therefore, according to King, was to be the mission of the League of Nations? He said it could press on with the task of disarmament or at least could seek to halt war. We could apply, he suggested, modern methods of conciliation and arbitration in settling specific disputes. These disputes could be backed by public opinion. The League, he continued, can provide a forum for discussion of economic grievances.

On June 30, 1936, the final tragedy took place. Vincent Massey, distinguished head of the Canadian delegation and one of the foremost promoters of Canada's appeasement policy both here and in England, announced on behalf of the government the end of sanctions against Italy. As Eayrs writes in his magnificent book, the great experiment was over, the great experiment had failed. It is a curious footnote to history that Eayrs notes that even later, when Mr. Chamberlain saw the errors in his appeasement policy and, indeed, abandoned appeasement, Mr. King and the Canadian government maintained their true belief in the appeasement policies.

In 1936, following his own impulses, Mr. King travelled to Europe and held conversations with leaders in Nazi Germany, including Hitler. He was left with the impression that they did not want to precipitate a general European war. He did, however, note that they did contemplate an expansion toward the east. But King satisfied himself that this expansion could be effected without conflict, that we could have a larger negotiation to settle these matters. In effect, there was linkage here.

King was somewhat surprised, after the German Anschluss with Austria, to find Nazi pressure on Czechoslovakia. King was absolutely delighted when Lord Runciman was appointed mediator between the Czech government and the German political party in Czechoslovakia headed by a Nazi puppet. King was so pleased that he cabled Runciman with his support. Even Lord Runciman winced. He was surprised to receive this voluntary encouragement from Canada. King became concerned, however, that he might have to recall Parliament to consider the measures to be introduced. He wrote to the Governor General of the day, "I have been deeply concerned during the past fortnight with the possibilities of war in the immediate future and what this would involve in the way of the immediate resummoning of Parliament."

When Chamberlain went to negotiate with Hitler, King wired his congratulations. He stated in a press statement:

> I am sure the whole Canadian people will warmly approve this farseeing and truly noble action on the part of Mr. Chamberlain. Direct personal contact is the most effective means of clearing away the tension and misunderstandings that have marked the course of events in Europe in recent months. Mr. Chamberlain has taken emphatically the right step: the world will hope that tomorrow's conference will create an atmosphere in which a solution may be speedily found of the problems that have threatened peace.

King urged Chamberlain to meet politically with Hitler. He wrote to Lord Tweedsmuir:

> You may recall how strongly I urged these personal contacts. While it is not clear that war will be avoided, it is altogether certain that but for Mr. Chamberlain's meeting with Hitler, we should be in the throes of a world war today.

On September 26 of that year Mr. Chamberlain called the Dominion High Commissioners together in support of his policy.

Chamberlain finally admitted that Hitler's profession of limited objectives was not sincere and his ambitions were much wider. Still, with the exception of New Zealand, the Dominions continued to preach appeasement.

On September 27, Chamberlain spoke to the British people. This is what Mr. Chamberlain told the British people:

> However one might sympathize with a small nation confronted by a big and powerful nation we cannot in all circumstances undertake to involve the whole British empire in a war simply on that account. If we have to fight, it must be on larger issues than that.

The Canadian government immediately issued a statement expressing its complete accord with the statement Mr. Chamberlain made that day. Then came the terms of peace, which was for the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia. Hitler was allowed his military occupation on the installment plan—not all at once. Boundaries were to be fixed by international convention. Again, Canada, without the voice of Parliament being heard, immediately congratulated and praised British policy.

This is what Mr. King wrote on September 27: "Canada was overwhelmingly favourable to the Munich settlement." Later, this delay, King argued in its own defence, was to avoid a war. "It gave us time to prepare," so argued King after the event. But from a very careful reading of the notes and memoranda by senior advisers, Dr. O. D. Skelton, then the Deputy Minister of External Affairs, and Loring Christie, one of our senior bureaucrats in External Affairs, one can conclude that in order to maintain national unity and domestic harmony Canada should steer clear of participation or declaration with respect to European involvement.

On October 8, 1938, O. D. Skelton wrote to Vincent Massey respecting the Munich settlement stating:

> The settlement, if it can be called a settlement, is not one that can bring pride or satisfaction to anyone in civilized countries, but I certainly think it is the lesser of evils.

So, honourable senators, Canada took the appeasement line which, overwhelmingly, most historians conclude led to the obscenities of the Second World War.

This is what Mr. King said to Parliament on March 20, 1939:

> Canada's resources are limited. We have a tremendous task to do at home housing people and caring for the aged and helpless, relieving drought, unemployment and building roads and meeting our heavy burden of debt and making provision for Canada's defence and bringing our standards of living and civilization to levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great wealth for this purpose. We must to a larger or lesser extent choose between keeping our own house in order or trying to save Europe and Asia. The idea that every 20 years this country should automatically, as a matter of course, take part in war overseas for democracy or selfdetermination of smaller nations, that a country which has all it can do to run itself should feel called upon to save periodically a continent that cannot run itself to these ends, risks the lives of its people. Risks bankruptcy and political disunion. It seems to many a nightmare and sheer madness.

These are not my words, honourable senators, but there is an echo of these words in the western world.

To read from the pages of Canadian history makes rather gruesome reading. Of course, we have the advantage of retrospect. But, still, prevention was not considered. Sacrifices were not weighed. Antidotes were not prescribed to the pathology of Nazism. Thus, the world, and Canada, paid an even heavier price because of the weakness of its leaders and its failure to lead.

Let us turn, honourable senators, to the fourth case, the Berlin crisis of September 5, 1961. Mr. Khrushchev wrote at the time:

> The people of West Berlin must themselves determine the social and economic system of their city and enter into free relations with any state.

At the time of the crisis, Mr. Pearson, then the Leader of the Opposition, said "We have no faith in what Mr. Khrushchev says, and he is contradicted by what he said previously and what he is doing while he is speaking. "The Russians," he stated, "have made it quite clear that they are determined to alter the present situation in Berlin and to alter the earlier agreement in which Western allies were guaranteed rights."

Mr. Pearson then said this to Parliament:

> Surely we have learned, Mr. Chairman, that peace is not ensured by surrender to blackmail. Indeed, war is sometimes made inevitable by such surrender. So we asked ourselves, is there no choice between the impossible alternatives of suicide or surrender? There must be but I do not think that we will save ourselves from this situation or others merely by relying on armed force.

Here Mr. Pearson recognized the vital importance of having armed force, as well as the threat of armed force. In any way, shape or form to have the communists at that time have any sense that unity or strength was being diluted could have led to a different result.

In 1961, if one examines the Debates of the House of Commons, one concludes that there was unanimity by both the Conservative government and the Opposition not to reject force but to mobilize public opinion against the Soviet strangulation of West Berlin. When the Soviets moved and chose an economic embargo, the American led allied airlift saved the day. The Soviets eased its embargo. This, of course, as honourable senators will recall, led to the construction of the Berlin Wall. We all know the consequences of that futile gesture. Strength, not weakness, led to the disintegration of Eastern Europe under Soviet domination.

It took patience. It took 30 years of tax dollars, vigilance and cooperative spirits. Only France of the major Western powers as we know them took a different course in Europe. Yet even France remained steadfast and vigilant against Communist aggression. So we see that appeasement in the case of Ethiopia, the Nazi occupation of the Rhineland, and the dismemberment of Czechoslovakia, led to disaster while strength, cooperation and defence saved Berlin and was a crucial bridge to obtaining peace and security in the Free World, a crucial bridge to the new world order with which we are blessed.

Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen referred to Korea. I do not believe that the example of Korea is an appropriate analogy here. The conflict was far away, between Communism and freedom and, as Senator MacEachen has said, between dictatorship and democracy. The world security system was threatened and this was more than a local matter.

[Senator Grafstein.]

To my mind the principles there and the attitudes of Iraq's leadership here are no different. There the Americans led peacekeeping through the United Nations headed by General McArthur. In my view there is a good analogy to be made here, whether or not it is appropriate or full. The action taken in there and Canada's participation there was helpful and essential.

We hear many arguments about Iraq's unprovoked aggression in Kuwait, and the arguments are not new: Why are we defending this antique monarchy? Why are we defending America's strategic oil interests? What matters if a few square miles in the Gulf are subsumed in the endless tribal warfare in the Middle East? Is any war worth any price? We supported Iraq against Iran; why now the hypocrisy? Yet, despite this cacophony of disagreement, there is now wide agreement by all parties that Iraq's aggression must be contained, that Iraq must withdraw form Kuwait. The unanimity of the United Nations resolutions and sanctions for arms support are self-evident. What then should we be doing in Canada?

If I may, I should like to focus on Iraq. I believe that one should understand, as best as one can, the circumstances in Iraq and whether or not we can take the position, as some have, that this is an ancient place where tribal warfare has existed for thousands of years and therefore there is no hope that those backward people, those people who have a faith that is not predominant in the Western World, can understand Western values. In my view, that is not the case. That is a false and bankrupt attitude to take, because who could have predicted, even two or three years ago, that the crushing theology of Communism in the East would be suffocated? Who would have believed it? not one member in this place, not one expert, not one so-called pundit. So if we take the position that these people are somewhat barbaric savages that have no hope of achieving what we consider to be democratic pluralism, it is a bankrupt approach. I believe in democracy, and I think that pluralist democracy is a natural element of individual life.

So let us go back to the beginnings of time in Iraq. Iraq is a fascinating place with a fascinating history. Some of its history commends itself because we here have been, in large measure, affected by that history. Iraq was the ancient nation of Mesopotamia. Mesopotamia means "the land between two rivers." Iraq overlaps the Tigris and Euphrates rivers which are part of what we call the fertile crescent. From Turkey the Tigris flows south to join the Euphrates coming from Syria and both merge into the one waterway called the Shatt-al-Arab, which forms the border between Iraq and Iran. Iraq is larger than California and has a population of 17 million. Sunni Arabs in the north represent 20 per cent of the population. Shiite Arabs, mostly in the south, represent 55 per cent of the population. Kurds and non-Arab Sunni Muslim people reside in the north and constitute another 20 per cent. The Bedouin occupy the sparsely populated west overlapping the borders of Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Syria. Of course, there are a number of other minorities but they are now much more sparse than they once were: the Syrians, the Jews and some other Christian sects.

The modern state of Iraq was a child of the infamous Sykes Picot Agreement in 1916 when the French and the British divided their expected spoils from the defeat of the Ottoman Empire in World War I. After World War I Britain merged these former Ottoman provinces centred on Baghdad, Basra and the northern city of Mosul to form the new state of Iraq. While Iraq's boundaries with Iran existed for 250 years between the Persian and Ottoman Empires, the other borders with Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Syria were, as one observer of the day described it, "lines in the sand drawn by the Brits." The western boundary is somewhat artificial since it divides the Kurdish people who live on both sides of the Iraq-Turkish border. Iraq is almost landlocked with no natural, defensible borders and with only limited access to the Persian Gulf. It has 26 miles of shore at the mouth of the Shatt-al-Arab and this is the only maritime route into Iraq's interior. During the Iran-Iraq war, Jordan became the vital transportation link to Iraq primarily because its internal waterway was cut off during that war.

Ancient Mesopotamia was divided in two. In the north from the beginnings of time lived the Babylonians whose predecessors, the Sumarians, developed the first system of writing and culture. The first known bureaucracy was established in Babylonia. Hammurabi, the great king of Babylonia, was the first in the world as we know it to codify and write down a legal framework for society. Astronomy and mathematics were first developed by the Babylonians.

In the north the Babylonians rivals were the Assyrians, with its capital of Nineva, which was located near the present city of Mosul. The Assyrians in the north developed the world's first militaristic culture with a permanent military force controlled by a permanent political bureaucracy. The Assyrians were noted for their cruelty and their tactics. Westerners will recall the differences between Sparta and Athens. That I think is a good analogy between the Babylonians and the Assyrians.

So today modern Iraqis have a double complex. They aspire to the grandeur of their Babylonian ancestors while they employ in politics the cruelty of the Assyrian rule. Saddam Hussein traces his modern techniques to the ancient founders of Iraq. Both Babylonia and Assyria fell around 500 BC, which led to rule by Greeks and Persians until the 7th century when an amazing event took place, the first Islamic revolt. President Hussein today calls his war with Iran "Quasuja", recalling the battle in 1637 when the tribes, newly converted from barbarity to Islam, defeated the Persians. The Muslims, through their religious fervour, established their dominance and gave Iraq its modern name.

From the very outset of Islam a schism occurred between the Sunnis and the Shiites. The split arose as a result of disputes about the succession to the profit Mohammed. The Shiites favoured Ali, Mohammed's son-in-law, and the Sunnis, guardians of Mecca's holy places and Mohammed's birthplace, chose three caliphs who disposed of themselves through vendettas and finally one emerged.

• (1610)

Civil war between the two successor groups continued for 500 years, from 750 until 1250, under rather efficient but ruthless governors. Peace came to Iraq. From 1200 to 1600, Iraq became the high watermark for political and cultural development in the world and had a much higher level of development than Europe which was involved in the Dark Ages. During that period, Iraqis ruled the vast area from Afghanistan to Africa. Mathematics, chemistry, science, medicine, and literature flourished.

However, violence was also the hallmark of the governors. The caliph became the ruler by divine right. Eventually, weaker caliphs brought in Turkish mercenaries to enforce their absolute rule. The Turks came to dominate the caliph's court. In time, the Turks became the real rulers of Baghdad because the caliphs became dissolute. When the Mongols appeared on the western frontiers, the caliphs were not strong enough to defend their power. Genghis Khan's grandson sacked Baghdad and slaughtered the population and then centuries of stagnation set in.

It was not until the 16th century when the Ottomans, originally a Turkish tribe from central Asia, built an empire culminating in their conquest of Constantinople, where they established their capital and renamed it Istanbul. Henceforth, the Ottoman empire and Sunni people became the dominant power in Islam. There followed centuries when Persians, the ancient Iranians, supported by Shiites in the south, conquered Baghdad, slaughtering Sunnis. Then the Ottomans would conquer the city again and the Shiites would become the victims. This horrible exchange finally ended when the Ottoman rule became firmly established in 1638.

Still, hostilities continued between the Turks and the Persians until the early 19th century. The south was always populated by fierce independent Shiite tribes, and the north was dominated by the Sunnis. The Ottoman base shrunk to the main cities. The population had little loyalty to any central authority because of the vast distance between Istanbul and Baghdad.

Iraqi provinces lagged behind the Ottoman Empire and Turkey in commerce and technology. In 1917 the dissolute Ottoman rule came to an end. Istanbul had entered the World War on the wrong side, on the side of Germany and Austro-Hungary. British troops invaded Iraq in the course of their desert warfare against the Turks, allies of the Germans. By the war's end, Great Britain had supplanted Turkey as the ruler of Greater Mesopotamia. Iraq was placed under British mandate. The majority Shiites did not take political advantage of the Ottoman defeat to secure civil rights for themselves. Instead, they were rejectionist—they rejected the British rule on the grounds that Muslims should not be ruled by non-Muslims. Thus, the rebellion fought by the Shiites resulted in yet another form of Sunni domination.

Honourable senators will begin to recognize the modern players because they now enter the scene. Emir Faisal, grandfather of King Hussein of Jordan, had fought with the British against the Ottomans during the Arab revolt.

Senator Roblin: I believe he was the uncle.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, thank you for the correction. Faisal's father had been led to believe that his dynasty, the Hashemites, would rule an independent state from the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean.

Some honourable senators will recall that the Faisal we are talking about here is the Faisal who was brought to light in the famous movie, "Lawrence of Arabia." He is a crucial note in history. Faisal met with the leader of the World Zionist Organization of the day, Mr. Weizman. Both reached agreement in principle on the implementation of the Balfour Declaration, the British promise of a national home for the Jewish people in Palestine. But the British never kept their wartime promises to the Hashemites. That unique accord, if it ever had a chance of success, was stillborn. Instead, former Arab provinces in the Ottoman empire, were placed under British or French mandates according to the Sykes-Picot Agreement. In Iraq, the British established a constitutional monarchy with King Faisal as the head while the French dominated Syria. Iraqi politicians were in a total state of unrest, unhappy with British domination.

Parliamentary democracy was tried but never took root in Iraq. The average life of a cabinet under the Hashemite monarchy lasted only 18 months. Faisal relied on Suni Iraqi officers who were not only strong nationalists, but pro-British. The army became the key to civilian control. The Iraqi kingdom was fragmented into ethnic, religious, sectarian and social lines. In 1932 Iraq got rid of its mandated British status.

Unfortunately, a year after Iraq's independence, Faisal died unexpectedly at the age of 56. His successor, Ghazi, was too young and impetuous to be an effective ruler. He died six years later. His young son, Faisal II was crowned king. The army became the true ruler under this Hashemite regency.

The Syrians continued to fight with the Iraqis. Army officers became heroes as they put down revolts. Both countries were in a state of constant coups. In 1936 the army initiated the first modern Arab military coup. The contest of ideas began in the 1930s between European technology on the one hand and Communism on the other hand. Fascism provided an awesome alternative. Iraq became an arena for contesting paraties promoting the ideas of Fascism, Communism and others.

Below this backdrop of contesting ideologies lay the simmering unrest in society, fomented by the battle between the fundamentalists in both the Shiite and Sunni camps. On the margins, the Kurds also Sunni-Muslims, bitterly opposed their Sunni brethren with blood vendettas against the Shiite. The majority of Shiites always felt discriminated against because, though they were the majority, they were not allowed participation under Ottoman rule. Sectional and regional interests allowed divisions in the structure against the Iraqis. This cauldron of regionalism, sectionalism and fundamentalism, mixed with modern ideologies, continues to stir the Iraqi political pot.

[Senator Grafstein.]

The Assyrians, the ancient Christian community, hovered along the Turkish-Iraq border. Friction was continuous. Kurds were incited to attack Assyrians, who were massacred. Finally, the Iraqi army moved in and destroyed their villages.

A new hero was born, General Siqui. In 1936 the first civil government, backed by the army coup, was established. The idea of Arab nationalism, we are told by experts, started with the desire to introduce liberal freedoms and democracy and quickly developed into reactionary, aggressive ideologies under British colonial rule. Many Sunni Arab nationalists, looking for support, turned to Germany, then strategically seeking to foment unrest in British areas of dominance. Fascism had an appeal that was not simply revenge against the British, Fascism provided an ideological option, an economic model. Hence, Arab nationalists of the day admired both Mussolini and Hitler. Admiration continues to the present day in Iraqi leadership circles.

At the outbreak of World War II, these nationalists confronted the British as the army forced civilian leaders and the regent to leave Iraq while seeking help from Nazi Germany. With the help of the British-supported Arab legion from trans-Jordan, the regent and his government were restored. Massacres took place, but conditions were finally stabilized by local police authorities. In 1943 Iraq declared war against the axis powers. Iraq allowed the passage of American personnel to assist the Russians. In 1947, anti-Western sentiment merged with anti-British sentiment and became agitated because of the establishment of the state of Israel. In 1948, Iraq sent a small force to fight in that first war. Even though very few were involved and very few were killed, Iraqi nationalists continued to seek a hero, and finally they found one in Mr. Nasser. Mr. Nasser opposed any idea of alliance with the West, and so Mr. Nasser and Nuri Said, the civilian leader of Iraq, developed a rivalry.

● (1620)

In 1955, Nasser turned to the Soviets for arms. In 1956, the United States cut off funding of the Aswan Dam. Nasser retaliated by nationalizing the Suez Canal. The Iraqis in the street applauded Mr. Nasser's rejection of the West. The attack on Suez by the British, French and Israeli governments, stopped by Eisenhower, led to a fresh rise in nationalism. It is interesting to note, honourable senators, that if one examines the memoirs of Mr. Eisenhower, one of his major regrets was that he did, in fact, stop the attack by the British, the French and the Israeli governments of the day.

In that period of the late 1950s, national leaders began to taste the new nationalism promoted by the Ba'athists. They overthrew the Iraqi monarchy. During the seizure of the palace, the regent, young King Faisal II, his mother and his sister, along with servants, were slaughtered. The military junta took over. Nuri Said, the pro-Western minister, seeking to escape, was discovered, shot and publicly hanged, as was the body of the regent and their families. With the rise of the Ba'athists, their military leader, called Kassem, dominated events. Civil war broke out between the Kurds and the Iraqi army. The Communist Party then fought against the nationalists for control. It was in the Ba'athist Party that Saddam Hussein, the present president of Iraq, found his first power base. Two authoritative books—The Republic of Fear by Samir al-Khalil, and Saddam Hussein and the Crisis in the Gulf written recently by Judith Miller and Laurie Mylroie—indicate that Mr. Hussein was involved in the assassination attempts against Mr. Qassim. Qassim was overthrown and his junta partner, Mr. Arif, came to power supported by the military council. Qassim was executed and his mutilated body displayed on television.

In that cauldron of authoritarian military rule, there was an irredentist philosophy. Aided and abetted by its appetite for Western support on the one hand and inflamed by Western power on the other, it fed the nationalist cause.

Saddam Hussein, now aided and abetted by a very small circle of military fanatics, mostly from his family or his small town of Takrite, now ruled Iraq with an iron fist. Saddam Hussein's rise to power, based on Ba'athist ideology and ideas, was fed by the nationalization of the Iraq Petroleum Company in 1972. Nothing happened until oil prices increased 400 per cent in 1973 following the Arab-Israeli war. Iraq broke the line and continued to produce during that period, increasing its revenue ten times in two years. Massive funds flowed in to the Iraqi government. Massive government expenditures were made on living standards through the import of consumer goods. Government allocations to industry increased 12 times, transportation rose 11 times, building and housing rose nine times. Public support for the extremist Ba'athist rule increased because of their largesse.

In Iraq, Saddam now took a different view with respect to his dealings with the superpowers. Realizing that superior technology emanated from the West, he began to reduce his reliance on Soviet technology and Soviet aid. Economic ties with the United States grew, even though diplomatic relations had been broken off since 1967. By 1980, Iraq was importing $700 million worth of U.S. goods while he continued to rebuff American efforts, including those by the Carter regime, to restore relations.

After the 1978 Camp David accords, Saddam sought to play a major role on the Arab stage. He felt loyalty to no one. With untrammelled power and burgeoning oil revenues, Saddam felt free to steer a course to make Iraq the dominant power in the Persian Gulf and in the Arab world. The only fear was that Iraq's Shiite majority would be stirred to revolt by Khomeini in neighbouring Iran, who had returned in triumph to Iran in February 1979. Hussein's aggression started in border clashes backed by sectarian strife within these boundaries. Baghdad began to support Kurdish rebels in the Iranian north and activated Ba'athist cells among the restless Shiite. Meanwhile, the Iranian Shiite called upon the Iraqi Shiite to overthrow the Iraqi government. Iraq supported Kurdish rebellion in northern Iran, and exploited the ideological threat from Iran. Saddam—and this is where it becomes, I think, relevant—offered to protect the weak Arab monarchies against the possibility of a Soviet invasion as a result of the war in Afghanistan, and when the Carter Doctrine offered to defend Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states against Iranian aggression, Saddam matched this with his own pan-Arab charter called the "Hussein Doctrine" which called for collective Arab defence and rejected any foreign presence in the Gulf. Hussein's doctrine, by the way, prohibited "any Arab state from resorting to armed force against any other Arab state."

Now, when Saddam's deputy prime minister was assassinated by a Shiite, Saddam ruthlessly deported 15,000 Shiite Kurds, and within 15 months, 35,000 were expelled from Iraq. Leading Shiite figures and their families were arrested and tortured. Exiled army officers and politicians from the regime of the Shah of Persia now gathered in Baghdad. They believed that civil dissent in Iran would enable Iraq to attack Iran, defuse the Iranian army, defuse Khomeini's support, and allow the Shah's supporters to regain power.

Hussein expected a quick victory. His war aims were threefold: Secure the eastern shore of the Shatt-al Arab; induce the secession of Kurdistan from Iran; and his larger aim was to participate in the collapse of the Khomeini regime, thereby taking power or hegemony over the region. Over the next ten years, more than a million people were killed, including young children and women who had been conscripted. Over half a million people were maimed as the war between Iraq and Iran became a war without end—no victory, no peace. Honourable senators, more people were killed in that war than in all the wars of the Middle East in this century. Having lost the war he started against Iran, Saddam then turned to Kuwait, expecting, with the support of Jordan and Yemen, to carve up the Gulf oil states and occupy Saudi Arabia, deploying the oil resources and assets that he needed in order to proclaim his power and his success with his masses.

So, honourable senators, what is to be done with a nation such as Iraq, that has the fifth largest army in the world, and has spent more than 50 per cent of its gross national product in the last eight years on military equipment and over, I believe, $100 billion for arms in that period? By the way, that was not just for conventional weapons but for nuclear arms and biological and chemical weaponry. Honourable senators, Iraq did not do this on its own. Every arms-producing nation in the world provided Iraq with these awesome weapons of modern murder technology. Germany, France, Austria, the United States, Brazil, China, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, every nation east or west that manufactures arms has supplied arms to Iraq in the last five years. Honourable senators, close to 10 per cent of all the arms purchased in the entire world in the last five years were purchased by Iraq. So now what is the world to do? Having created a monster and fed the awesome inflation of this nationalism, Iraqi style, the world is confronted with a horrible dilemma.

• (1630)

Daily the media, in its crude symmetry, places Iraq's gestures on the same moral plane as the desire of democracies to suffocate this evil and virulent form of nationalism. Canadians cannot understand where we are. We are told that the Middle East is comprised of backward people; but, if this is true, honourble senators, is it not a greater obscenity that the educated leadership, the elites of these countries, who are well educated, are bankrupt when they prepare to spend the greatest percentage of their meagre wealth for arms and destruction?

So, honourable senators, what can Canadians do? What should we do? First and foremost, the international alliance must maintain its unity of purpose. I believe there is confusion about aims. We heard two speeches, by Senator Macquarrie and Senator MacEachen, and both have different objectives. When we listen to the debates in the United States, we again hear different views from Congress. I believe Canada can develop a charter for this international alliance agreeing on a declaration similar to the role Canada played in the NATO Atlantic charter when Canada, through the offices of Mr. Pearson, drafted the objects of the alliance.

Obviously the first objective of that alliance should be the unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait. Western members may wish to inject the concept of democratic pluralism, but clearly, honourable senators, Canada can play a useful role in establishing a clear-cut statement of objectives—that we are in favour of democracy, not dictatorship, and that we want a world system in which unprovoked aggression is not allowed. Clearly Canada can play a role in articulating this new charter for the international alliance.

Honourable senators, let me make a personal comment because some Canadians, including myself, love to hide behind America. We love to criticize its leadership, yet we love to benefit from the American safety net. That is the Canadian way. In my mind there is no question that the new world order we saw signed in Paris this week was a result of America's moral leadership. It took from 1917 to 1989 to suffocate Stalinist ideology; therefore, honourable senators, why can we not set a goal to stifle the virulent form of nationalism that holds Iraq and its people captive and seek to replace them with democratic values?

Second, respecting United Nations resolutions on force, Canada should lead the way. I believe it can lead the way by establishing a short timeframe where, if the U.N. resolutions are not met by Iraq, the use of force would be automatically sanctioned. Put a timeframe on this. Let Iraq understand that daily dismemberment and destruction of human life and property is not to be allowed.

Third, it is essential to establish a legitimacy and credibility in the Middle East with Arab nations. The best way to establish that in the short run is to create a joint military command structure which includes, at its highest echelons, the Arab nations that are involved in this alliance. If we want to use the lessons of Korea, there was a joint transparent military command led by General MacArthur, but it was a United Nations or alliance command. Therefore, it is important to move forward immeditely with a command structure that is visible, transparent and widely advertised involving well-known names from Arab countries. Here again Canada can play a useful and important role.

[Senator Grafstein.]

Fourth, sanctions can be increased. Iraqi assets should be frozen in each member state of the alliance, while being widely publicized. Further sanctions could and should be considered, such as the water weapon, which I mentioned in the last few days. It has been suggested by an American strategist that the Tigris River be dammed up to quarantine the area and to demonstrate that the alliance is serious.

Fifth, Iraqi murder technology must be quarantined. Those who provide murder technology must be prevented from doing so. Honourable senators, the U.S. Senate played an interesting role in bringing this to the public's attention. A senator prepared a list of the reported and confirmed instances of military-related sales to Iraq by foreign countries. It showed that 14 nations were listed as sellers. West Germany was at the top with 70 companies, tiny Austria was not a close second with 16 companies, and the United States and the United Kingdom were tied for third, each having 11 companies. Certainly those companies' names should be publicized so that we may monitor any further shipments or contact with Iraq and perhaps stifle their activity.

Honourable senators, it is interesting that Iraq, for all its waywardness, is now leading the way in the adoption of nuclear weapons, long-range missiles, and chemical and biological stockpiles. Obviously these must be contained. The alliance should include a total ban on Iraq's murder technology. Those breaching this ban should be penalized. Honourable senators, yesterday we were advised that the agreement on arms reduction was settled in Paris, and I brought it to the Leader of the Government's attention that SS missiles from the Soviet Union, which were surplus and not caught by the agreement, had been shipped to Iraq. This is a gaping hole. We should not allow a second-hand trade in surplus weaponry. There is no agreement under the Conference of Security and Cooperation in Europe to prevent the transfer of this surplus new weaponry outside one's country.

Sixth, Canada should increase its contingency plans and back up communications for its forces in the Gulf. Surely, as Senator Macquarrie said, Canadians who are at risk should have the very best in terms of backup. Canada should consider deploying Canadian troops now in Europe on a contingency basis. It is essential. It is vital that the credibility of the alliance and the threat of force be brought home to Iraq. Members of the Arab nations must be induced to increase their support. Seventh, international organizations—and this is another important principle—of which Iraq is a member should immediately demand inspections in Kuwait and Iraq. These organizations include the atomic energy organizations, which prevent the spread of nuclear armaments, human rights organizations, the Red Cross, Amnesty International and representatives of the Geneva Convention. Their findings should be widely publicized, and Canada can lead the way.

Honourable senators, it is important not only to suffocate the aggressive attitude of Iraq, but to establish a wedge between the ruling elites within Iraq responsible for breaches of international law. It should be driven between the leadership on the one hand and the innocent Iraqi population on the other. I have a suggestion I believe would be helpful. Once again the alliance could articulate the Nuremberg principles.

The world stands against crimes against humanity. The world stands against crimes against peace. The world understands and has adopted the concept of war crimes as a prophylactic against future abhorrent conduct. Every state has the jurisdiction to bring actions against such crimes. The question of personal responsibility and personal accountability should be made clear.

● (1640)

Should not each member of the Iraqi junta be identified in order to segregate the guilty leadership from the innocent? If that leadership has breached international law, if that leadership has committee crimes against humanity, crimes against peace, if they are prima facie guilty of war crimes should they not be named? Should we not adopt Amnesty International's methods of naming names and making people within Iraq personally accountable? A public list of officials responsible could be established and publicized both in Iraq and particularly in Kuwait.

I think the Kuwaiti government-in-exile has a larger responsibility to assist the effort of the alliance in a more visible way. Turkey, Jordan, Pakistan have all suffered as a result of the invasion of Kuwait. Over one million refugees have been on the move in the last 60 days. They have lost members of their families and their property. Many have been totally wiped out. Surely the Kuwaiti government can be called upon to bring much more visible and immediate financial support to these refugees.

The alliance should establish a national claims court where Kuwaiti and Iraqi dissidents and refugees can seek compensation against Iraq enforceable after the event. Why do we have to wait? Why not start now? We know what these claims are.

The free media has an important role to play in combatting the controlled media in Iraq and Kuwait. Radio Canada International should have its budget increased in order to provide 24-hour service to Kuwait and Iraq. This has provided a very important lifeline not just to Canada and Canadians but it has provided the sustenance and hope for Iraqi and Kuwaiti dissidents seeking to fight from within.

Iraqi victims who reside outside of Iraq should be assisted in establishing an organization called Radio Free Iraq in order to provide information to the citizens of Iraq and Kuwait to counter Iraq's controlled media. Each member of the alliance has a responsibility to counter Iraqi information. Obviously we should not interfere with the free press. However, when an Iraqi statement is made or an Iraqi interview takes place on television or in print or on radio which contains information we know is misinformation, it should be immediately countered by press releases, radio and TV interviews by members of the alliance.

I will give you one example of this. It is not a distant proposition. I received on my desk a booklet entitled "The Kuwait Question", which is a letter by H.E. Tariq Aziz, Deputy Prime Minister and Foreign Minister of the Republic of Iraq to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of all countries in the world. It is dated September 4, 1990, in Baghdad. On page 27 it makes this statement. It is a very lengthy defence of Iraq's position on Kuwait. Here is what he says:

> On 15 July 1990, I delivered a detailed note to the Secretary-General to the League of Arab States in Tunis, a note substantiated by facts and figures confirming the involvement of the former rulers of Kuwait in the conspiracy to destroy the economy of Iraq, and exposing their deliberate and incessant violations, over the years, of the rights and vital interests of Iraq.

Based on what I have read in the free Western press that is not correct, but let me turn to the next statement which I think is more relevant and more curious. Here in one paragraph is his explanation of Iraq's actions in Kuwait:

> This dangerous conspiracy against Iraq led us to extend military assistance to the young revolutionaries of Kuwait in their uprising on 2 August 1990. On the following day, His Majesty King Hussein of the Hashimite Kingdom of Jordan, visited Iraq and informed President Saddam Hussein that he had made intensified contacts with a number of Arab leaders . . .

That is his explanation of that invasion. It is misleading. It is false. Yet it sits on our desks and I have not received anything from any member of government to counter this. This is an official document from the second most senior official in Iraq. When it lands on our desks I think we should immediately counter it with a statement.

All honourable senators are appalled by the interviews showing hostages with President Hussein, and the soft interviews that have taken place. We should not interfere with those interviews. I am not suggesting we should. However, immediately upon those interviews taking place responsible members of the alliance should contradict those statements and show the media how misleading and how unfortunate and how unfair they are.

It is clear that holding innocents as hostages is in breach of the Geneva Convention. Legal action should immediately be commenced by the Canadian government under the Geneva accord against the Iraqi government if all Canadian hostages are not released forthwith. There is no reason why we should not commence legal action today. We should have done it the moment we heard that Canadians were held against their will.

I conclude by asking what are the lessons of the 1930s? They are that appeasement in any form does not work. Appeasement increases the rewards of aggression. It is important that the alliance not be undermined by inconsistent positions. The threat of force is potent and it is only believable if the western world is unified on this issue. International public opinion is prepared to be unified. We need only the governments to lead the way against this unprovoked aggression. Otherwise, the lessons of the 1930s, the sacrifices of the 1940s, will have been in vain.

The last decade of the 20th century can suffocate evil ideas. It can suffocate the cult of violence. It can suffocate violent, bankrupt leadership which abuses its population in search of a false ideology. False and evil ideas can be stopped if they are attacked in their infancy and not allowed to grow and inflate the roots of totalitarianism wherever they sprout. These ideas must be treated like a plague. If they are, we will stop the plague and then we will be able to grow a healthy democratic exchange where we can foresee peace and security in every region of the globe.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, my contribution to this discussion will not be on the same scale or on the same level as the three very interesting speeches that we have heard today. While there is much that has been said with which I can concur, I am not sure that the interests of Canada would induce me to support some of the suggestions which have been made as to what the course of our policy ought to be.

The discussion has touched on a number of fascinating topics. We started off with Senator MacEachen and the record of the Korean War. I want to say a few things about that because the sequence of events in that instance are interesting.

We have had some excellent comments about the development of a new system of world peace and security, which, oddly enough, seems to be springing up from this particular confrontation in the Middle East. We had an excellent analysis of the evils of appeasement from Senator Grafstein, which I certainly can concur with. We have, of course, front and centre in our minds the horrors of war, and the difficulties and problems of engaging the people of Canada and the Canadian nation in the military operations of the kind that are being discussed these days.

● (1650)

Perhaps I could start by offering a few reflections on the Korean situation. In Mr. Pearson's biography entitled Memoir 2, which Senator Doyle kindly handed to me a few moments ago, he outlines in some detail the sequence of events with respect to the Korean situation, something which might not hurt us to rehearse. While the comparisons are not exact with our present situation, they do provide some food for thought.

The United Nations decided on June 27 to pass a resolution to declare aggression in Korea and to ask for the assistance of the members of the United Nations to deal with that aggression. Canada supported that particular initiative on the part of the United Nations.

If I understand correctly what Mr. Pearson had been trying to convey in his autobiography, and the sequence of events that he is illustrating, I read that we first agreed to send destroyers to Korean waters, and then to airlift supplies and arms to the South Koreans. If I have the sequence of events correctly, that was decided pretty soon after the resolution of the United Nations was passed.

Parliament was sitting a few more days until the end of the month of June, 1950, to resume its session on August 28 following. In the interval, Mr. Pearson went to Washington to consult with the Americans, in particular Secretary Acheson, and others, as to what the Americans thought about Canada's position and the whole of this. He did not see the President, but, after all, he himself was not the Prime Minister. In those days he was Secretary of State for External Affairs. He spoke to Mr. Acheson and they discussed a number of things. Mr. Pearson records:

> Finally, we were concerned with the United Nations aspect of the above developments; what the policy of members of the United Nations, like Canada, should be in these circumstances, particularly in regard to active assistance to operations in Korea.

I do not mention this in a critical way, but merely to say that before Canadian policy was set he did take the opportunity to go to Washington and to consult with the Secretary of State of the day as to what the American view was with respect to Canada.

One of the things that Mr. Acheson suggested was that, and I am quoting from the book, ". . . he was emphatic that even single battalions would be not only politically valuable but effective help in present circumstances." If I were to comment on that, it would be to say that the same kind of valued considerations pertained in the Korean situation as pertain today in respect of the American view of Canadian policy. They wanted us then, and they want us now to take part in the proceedings because they felt it would add legitimacy to what was being done. It seems to me that is somewhat similar to the circumstances in which the government at the present time has been struggling.

I notice in Mr. Pearson's account that on August 7, which was three weeks before Parliament convened, the government started to recruit for the Canadian volunteer battalion that was to go to Korea. It was after these events took place that Parliament met on August 29 and dealt with these questions of assistance to the United Nations effort in Korea. Nothing particularly hinges on this account, as far as I can see, except to say that, generally speaking, the same kind of international considerations pertain when we have a situation like the Korean situation or the situation such as we have in the Gulf these days. There is a parallel here that should not be entirely overlooked.

I say, by way of comment, that while the operation was under the general aegis of the United Nations Military Committee, to be sure, in fact that duty was delegated to the United States military authorities who actually conducted the war. Thus, there are parallels here that perhaps are of interest to us as we consider what has been going on.

What about the course of events? It seems to me a remarkably hopeful fact that as the world struggles to deal with this question, the United Nations has taken on new importance and a new lease on life and is potentially, perhaps, in the process of framing a new peacekeeping apparatus, a new peacekeeping policy and instrumentality, for which all of us have hoped for many years but never thought to see in the way that we see it now. We do not know—and heavens knows we have had fumbles in the past—whether this new development will prove to be that new approach to the peacekeeping question that we seek. However, it is certainly an opportunity which should not be overlooked, and one which I think deserves the clear support of the people of Canada and ought to be a policy objective of the government of this country, as I think indeed it is.

To think that the United States which has been so cavalier about the United Nations in recent years, has now come back to the fold and is paying up what it owes, as indeed the Russians are doing; and to think that the Security Council can speak with a united voice these days on matters of this kind, where their peripheral interests, if I can use that expression, are concerned; and to think that the United Nations can muster up the intellectual energy to pass resolutions of the kind they have, condemning the aggression in Iraq and making a number of proposals as to what should be done—in particular to approve and organize an embargo to an unprecedented extent and effectiveness—is, I think, one of the most hopeful signs that any of us have seen in a long time with regard to the question of keeping peace in the world. The way this firm stand against an important instance of aggression has been taken is something which should attract our attention, because it seems to me that this is a development which demands, I think, the support of the nation, the government, and certainly members of the Senate.

However, I think that we must bear in mind that the effectiveness of what has happened depends on the effectiveness of what is going to happen. In other words, if we cannot maintain this attitude of unity, of united dedication to the task; if we cannot maintain the impetus that we have already put in motion with respect to peacekeeping and to this aggression, then the whole thing may collapse like a house of cards. It seems to me that nations which have an interest, as we have, in peacekeeping in the world must see that that kind of attitude does not prevail and that the unity and singlemindedness of purpose that has been demonstrated so far continues. It can only continue if we continue to support it.

I agree with those who say that if we can increase the effectiveness of sanctions, then we should do so. Let us look into matters of that kind. We also have to recognize that this is one of the hard facts of life where balance and judgment are deeply concerned. We also have to recognize that if we are not willing to consider what alternatives we have if these sanctions do not succeed, then we may find that the whole exercise goes for nought. This is not to say that I am preaching military action—I am not. I am one who says that, yes, we have not yet given sanctions the full opportunity to do their stuff. We must do that. There is no reason to pay any attention to those impatient people who want to see military action taken tomorrow—not at all. I would resist that. I want to see sanctions given full force and effect and time to show what they can do. Having said that, we must recognize the fact that somewhere along the line we may be asked to take other decisions. We have not reached that point yet and we may not ever reach that point—certainly it is not before us at the present time—but it is an issue that cannot be excluded from our thoughts and judgment in this particular matter.

• (1700)

The Leader of the Opposition made a very interesting distinction which, I confess, should have occurred to me. It is that there are two forces at work here: the force of the United Nations with respect to the sanctions, and the force of the United States as protector of Saudi Arabia. We have to admit that these are at the present time two different lines of action. I know that it is the purpose of the United States to secure the consent of the United Nations to any military activity should it be required. I dare say that that will be discussed by heads of state for the next little while. I am one of those who would like to see that possibility regarded as a last resort, and not something that we should willingly jump to at the present time. On the other hand, let us recognize that if U.S. military power were not in Saudi Arabia, who could say what Iraq would have done with respect to that country. Certainly they would otherwise have had the physical force to do what they would have liked in respect to occupying the property of their neighbours in that part of the world. So I am not condemning the United States for sending its military forces to Saudi Arabia; nor am I willing to condemn the Government of Canada for the small efforts it is making in that connection. I believe that this particular move must be considered with a very real sense of realism if we are to ensure that we do not get a militry reaction on the aprt of Iraq that would otherwise be impossible.

The importance of American military action in the Gulf cannot be overlooked. It is part of the whole process. I am not saying that I want to fight, not tomorrow at any rate, but it is part of the whole process and it has to be regarded and supported in that particular respect.

I come back to Senator Grafstein's theme about the necessity to take into consideration the questions of appeasement and collective security. I admit that of the long chain of events that he has outlined for us to show how those concepts have been honoured or dishonoured, as the case may be, in times gone by, the question of collective security is at the heart of the issue. However, it is necessary to keep a certain sense of balance here because appeasement and collective security with respect to Hitler is one thing, and with respect to a country like Iraq it is another thing; it is a different proposition. That does not mean that the principles of collective security do not apply, but the solutions that we adopted in the previous case are not necessarily the solutions we would adopt in this case, although I have to admit that we are walking a very thin line there, and I am not prepared to say how the balance should fall at the present time. These are issues which we must all take into consideration.

I want to say a word or two about Iraq because some of us may have the notion that it is an invulnerable country with a large military establishment, modern weapons of war and, indeed, a nation that can sit out whatever can be done by the rest of the world to bring it to heel. I do not know how things will turn out, but I am not so pessimistic as to think that sanctions may not be effective, and I am not so pessimistic as to think that this man who runs Iraq is so completely inflexible that none of the things the rest of the world does get across to him. I do not think that that is the case. It is his job to put up the best front that he can, and if we get ourselves a few months to let the sanctions work, he will find himself in a more difficult position than he faces today. He is not inflexible. After all, whoever saw such an astonishing volte-face as the one he demonstrated with respect to the war with Iran. After fighting for eight years and losing hundreds of thousands of people and uncounted treasure and any gain he got from the Iraq-Iran war, he gave up because he thought it was in his interests to do so. If that is the case, he may consider some time that it is in his interests to make some further democratic approaches with respect to the situation in which he finds himself now.

There is one thing that I would caution against: I do not like these unconditional surrender policies that have been popular in the world. We were pretty big on them at the end of World War II, and we did pretty much the same thing in World War I. We must never put ourselves in the position where there is no alternative but to go ahead and indulge in military action. It is necessary to keep open the possibility of diplomatic settlement in these matters. I can conceive it as being quite possible that if things get rough enough in Iraq, the man might decide that he is willing to make some concessions on Kuwait and agree to some inspection of his chemical and nuclear warfare systems. After all, he has invited the International Energy Agency to inspect his use of nuclear materials. I realize that that does not mean very much because he can hide a lot, but it represents an appreciation of approaches of that kind to the various problems at hand. While I think it would be "Pollyannaish" to say that any accommodation is in sight at the present time, there is that possibility sometime in the future if we are content to keep up the pressure.

I caution honourable senators to remember our experience. Our experience in a far greater, more dangerous and desperate situation than anything you can imagine in the Middle East, our East-West confrontation, has been solved. That confrontation was solved in a number of ways, but one contribution to the solution of that problem was the steady, confident determination on the part of the NATO Alliance to hold itself together even though members were tempted at times to make some kind of off-the-cuff deal or some arrangement that would break up that alliance. The fact that that alliance held steady, determined and resolute but not aggressive or offensive over that long term of years, is part of the reason why we have this happy situation that we have in Europe today. The lesson from that experience to be applied to Iraq is that there is no greater enemy than ourselves. Our most difficult problem is holding our alliance together and keeping it firm, united, determined and steady and, at the same time, avoid offensive action of the kind that would lead to war, which no one really wants or supports. It seems to me that that is the kind of lesson we ought to apply to this situation. The more we niggle, complain, cast doubt or criticize about holding firm, although that is the privilege of every citizen of this land, the more disservice we do to the cause and to ourselves. I do not mean to say that we cannot stand intelligent criticism—and we have had some here today—about what is going on and about what should go on. Those are necessary parts of our process, but we should try to keep within due bounds and to remember that it was the slow and steady pace that won the day with respect to the East-West contest that has now come to such an unexpectedly happy conclusion.

Honourable senators, I have a little more to say. What should Canada's policy be? The first item of Canadian policy is to support this new peacekeeping initiative which is now growing under the auspices of the United Nations. We should do nothing that will take away from the development of that policy, and it ought to have the support of the Government of Canada and Parliament. I think we should recognize that an embargo is something that does not produce results overnight. We have seen embargoes in other cases, and sometimes they have not worked very well. In other cases they have had some real influence on the course of events. Perhaps South Africa is one such example.

● (1710)

In any event, I entirely agree with those senators who have spoken, and I suggest that we should not be impatient, that we should let this embargo work. I would also suggest that we hold our fire until we see that it is having some effect on the general situation we face.

If it comes to a matter of force, it is very important that it should be under the auspices of the United Nations in one way or another. Perhaps the United Nations Military Committee should not be the body to run the war, but any militry force should certainly under the auspices of the United Nations as, indeed, it was in the Korean situation.

If we look a little further ahead into the future—I am not sure that it is a possibility here, but at least it is worth mentioning—I think we should be trying to imagine some kind of security arrangement, setup or plan for the Middle East which does not exist at the present time. Surely there is room for constructive, imaginative work in this respect because we have to recognize that the people will not really be very happy to accept the military presence of the United States. We should recognize that if a security structure is to be developed there it will have to be done by the people concerned. While talking about that, I am not only talking about the fighting in Lebanon or the animosity between the Syrians and the Iraqis and the Iranians, I am talking also about the situation in which the Jewish state finds itself. The importance of security for them has to be one of the great issues that will undoubtedly, in due course, emerge from whatever happens in this Middle Eastern development.

Honourable senators, it is a good thing to reflect on some of these matters. I am happy that you have given me the opportunity to offer a few rather disjointed and disconnected remarks with respect to it. It is my hope that we will be able to see our way clear to ensure that the initiative and the drive of the United Nations become the central point of our policy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate for me to withdraw the motion which I made to launch this debate.

Senator Roblin: Yes, that is right.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—NOTICE OF MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Stan Waters: Honourable senators, I wish to give notice of a motion; but before I do so, I wish to express my regret that I was not informed that this debate on Iraq was going to take place. I would have appreciated some notice of that. As an independent sitting over here at third base, I suppose it is pretty easy for some of you to forget the independents. It would have been very helpful to have had some warning of this motion, because I would have liked to participate. I have had some considerable experience of peacekeeping and war and I have some views which I think could be constructive.

Honourable senators, I wish to give notice that I shall be moving an amendment to Bill C-62 following the results of the vote on the eighth amendment.

Senator Roblin: If it makes you feel any better, I did not receive notice either.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at this point I would suggest that we suspend the sitting until 8 o'clock this evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8 p.m.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I rise to speak to this amendment, which those of us on this side of the chamber believe to be progressive and consistent with our party's policy toward tax reform based on ability to pay, I am reminded that this is the second anniversary of the Conservative Party's renewed mandate to govern the country. Two years ago today—

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Black day.

Senator Perrault: —this Conservative government, with 43 per cent of the popular vote—

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: It was 12 per cent of the vote in Québec.

Senator Perrault: —assumed power after a well-financed campaign in which they festooned their political bandwagon with gaudy promises including promises to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in every section of the country from coast to coast.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Jobs, jobs, jobs.

Senator Perrault: Two years ago there was not a single cloud in that blue Tory sky.

Senator Fairbairn: They were lurking.

Senator Perrault: Yes, they were lurking just below the horizon; no question about that. It was a no-hard-times campaign, as I recall. It was a very positive and upbeat campaign. There was no talk then of an alarming and burdensome national debt, no talk of dismantling, reducing and destroying Canada's carefully and painstakingly constructed social system, the network which Canadians turn to when they are in trouble. There was no talk then of Americanizing unemployment insurance and removing the government from this very essential feature of that social security net. There was no talk of clawing back pensioners' benefits. There was no talk of removing cost of living protection and all of the other shabby features of this government's hidden agenda.

During the last federal campaign, the Prime Minister spoke on the subject of tax reform. Oh, we have been told in this debate that the Canadian people knew there would be a GST. Why then did the Prime Minister not talk about it in his campaign from coast to coast? Senator Waters, I have yet to discover one speech which the Prime Minister made in Alberta promising to impose a 7 percent GST in that province; nor have I heard such speeches in British Columbia. We were, however, given some indicators that there would be changes in taxation.

The Prime Minister said that he, indeed, is a former working man who drove a truck. He said he knows what it is like to suffer and struggle, and that he knows the difficulties faced by the working people. It is for these reasons that he is devoted toward making the taxation system fair and equitable to ensure that the rich pay and that there is care for the poor. This was the generalized way in which we were signalled that there would be some changes in taxation.

Oh, I recall one incident when Mr. Blenkarn made a rather imprudent speech during the campaign when he said that what the Tories really had in mind was a tax that would apply on all goods and services. Mr. Wilson quickly distanced himself from that type of irresponsible talk. Do you remember that? Yes? The Conservatives are nodding their heads. Well, you have good memories for certain things.

● (2010)

I also remember that the Prime Minister said words to this effect: "Heavens to Betsy, we do not have that in mind at all. We want a fair, just and equitable taxation system." The Right Honourable Prime Minister said that the goal of a new Conservative government with a renewed mandate would be to create a fairer taxation system—that is, a just system. That oratory was enough to bring thousands of Conservatives to their feet applauding from coast to coast. They loved that; and you are still applauding! You must be masochistic—that is all that I can suggest.

Senator Frith: The sound is of one hand clapping!

Senator Perrault: No one could, or would, wish to quarrel with such a commendable goal of fair taxation. But we have lived to see the value of Conservative campaign promises.

There have been thirty-two tax increases since the Conservatives came to power in 1984. The manufacturers' sales tax, which the Prime Minister never tires of condemning indignantly as being unfair, punitive and negative, has been increased by this Conservative government three times since 1986, from just over 9 per cent to over 13 per cent. So much for Tory oratory compared with Tory performance.

The thrust of Tory taxation policy since 1984 has been strongly and demonstrably regressive. This is not even a matter of speculation; it is a demonstrable fact. The only people who have benefited from Conservative taxation policies since 1984 are the very wealthy in Canada. The rest have suffered. All the tax breaks have been for the wealthy, while the disadvantaged received a few crumbs brushed from the Tory revenue table.

This reminds me of Oliver Twist, who pleaded to the school master, "Please, sir, may I have more?" The disadvantaged in Canada today are saying, "Please, Conservative government, can we have more?" They are receiving the same rebuff directed to Oliver in that great play.

An Hon. Senator: And more taxes!

Senator Perrault: Yes; that is correct. If the GST is passed, the average Canadian family with children—and again these are facts, not political sloganeering—will pay $684.00 more next year under the GST even with the refundable tax credit. Does this really represent progress? Is this the version of "progress" according to that Conservative hidden agenda? Approximately 46 per cent of Canadian families with incomes under $30,000.00 will actually be worse off under the GST even with the GST refundable tax credit.

Senator Frith: Tory times are hard times!

Senator Perrault: That will occur under the GST. Again I ask the question: Does this fulfil the promise made by the Prime Minister during the campaign? Under the GST a $4.6 billion dollar tax burden would be transferred from corporations to Canadian consumers.

The disturbing and dismal fact in Canada of the 1990's is that middle income groups are under a terrible seige. Most of them cannot afford the lawyers and the chartered accountants to find tax loopholes for them; they are just being wiped out. Middle income families are being attacked mercilessly by this government.

Now it is two years later. Oh, we have come a long way since those heady days of 1988. What a difference a few months have made! Never in the history of Canada has a federal government disillusioned more people more quickly.

A new poll announced one hour ago revealed that Conservative support across Canada has dipped to an incredible low of slightly under 15 per cent, and the country is in a state of economic crisis. Compared with October of last year, there has been an increase of 60.6 per cent in bankruptcies, representing disaster for 4,700 individuals and 1,100 companies.

Can any of us remain complacent in the face of statistics of that kind? So far this year bankruptcies are up by 40 per cent, representing 34,000 individuals and 9,400 Canadian companies.

Do the government senators really represent a party that wants to continue these types of insane economic policies?

Senator Leblanc: Yes!

Senator Perrault: Do you really want to continue that? Do you really understand what it means to lose your lifesavings in bankruptcies and be wiped out in the way that thousands of Canadians are being wiped out?

Senator Gigantès: No, they never have understood.

Senator Perrault: On this second anniversary of the Tory triumph many hundreds of Canadian factories and shops are darkened, and 160,000 good-paying industrial jobs have gone since the signing of the so called free trade deal. They have vanished! Many of those jobs have gone to the United States. Some have gone to Mexico to take advantage of those "subhuman wages" that I cited in this chamber the other day.

Senator Nurgitz: How many have come to Canada, though?

Senator Perrault: Is this really what the Conservative Party promised Canadians two years ago? Have you fulfilled your mandate? Have you kept faith with Canadian people, wherever they live in this country?

Senator Stanbury: They do not think so!

Senator Perrault: Is this your much-touted return to the market economy and rugged free enterprise?

The question that now has to be asked is: Will your party survive the calculated policy idiocies that are destroying the country? No wonder one of your veteran members of Parliament, Patrick Nowlan, quit your party in dispute just this afternoon to join the others. He was fed up! The Nowlan family have been an adornment of the Conservative party for years. They cannot take it any more!

Senator Balfour: That is no disgrace!

Senator Perrault: The proposed goods and services tax now before us is framed in the same reactionary and predictable Conservative mode. As members of the Senate Opposition have demonstrated in recent weeks, the proposed GST is burdened and laden with inequities.

What interests me is the fact that some of you know that there are weaknesses in this bill that should be corrected, yet you have stood in your places and have voted for something when you know that it is wrong. That is the dismal truth. You know that it is wrong for some of these measures to be imposed and you know what it is doing to some of the lower income groups in this country. Yet, like the Don Cossack choir on attack, you all sing in unison. Some of you have indicated that your consciences are troubled, but when it comes down to the vote, party discipline directs that you vote for government policy, which I suspect you know is wrong.

We have in the Senate a Liberal Party Opposition, together with allies in the Senate which I am happy to acknowledge—people who are keeping the faith with the Canadian people and especially with the 85 per cent who believe that the GST is the wrong tax at the wrong time. They are among the vast majority who are willing to pay their fair share but who are not willing to permit Canada's poor to be victimized and small businesses, single mothers and others to be harassed out of existence.

We have done, and are doing, our best to oppose the GST in the interests of all of Canada. We have advanced alternative proposals, because undeniably there are debt and deficit challenges in this country. Those challenges have to be met. We cannot avoid that. Yet despite our best efforts, it is obvious that the pledge was a sham. There has never been any intention to amend the GST bill, despite the fact that we took the Prime Minister at his word when he assured Canadians that he would consider reasonable Senate amendments.

What is the Leader of the Government's definition of "reasonable"? What did the Prime Minister mean when he went on these open line shows across the country saying, "We are reasonable people. If they are reasonable amendments, we will consider them." We do not even have a Conservative majority in this chamber willing to stand up and defend most of these weaknesses in the GST. Are you so ashamed of the bill that you cannot stand up and speak, or is the muzzle on? Have you been told, "Do not say anything; you might get into trouble"?

Senator Poitras: We have tried our best!

Senator Perrault: Stand up after I have finished and start defending the bill, because very few of you are.

Senator Poitras: I will!

● (2020)

Senator Perrault: What did the Prime Minister mean when he said that he would support reasonable amendments? Give us a few examples of amendments which you feel would be reasonable, and let us sit down and confer together.

Despite our best efforts, it is obvious that the pledge was a sham. There are indications that there has never been any intention to amend the GST bill to remove provisions which are blatantly unfair. Our efforts to amend what has been described as a "seamless garment" have been reasonable. I mention the following:

Our battle for those who live in the north: Not one of you has defended the iniquitous, regressive taxation that you will be imposing on people who live in northern Canada and in its remote parts.

Our efforts to help the students: Those of you associated with educational institutions know the impact it will have on students already under terrible stress trying to earn enough money in a bankrupt economy to pay their fees.

Our efforts to remove the GST provision to tax books: The United Kingdom has a VAT, but they specifically excluded books. They say it is an integral part of society to have a well-educated population and that to tax books sends out the wrong signals. But here we are going to tax books in the year in which we are dedicated to battling all sorts of problems, when we are trying to enhance the literacy campaign. In the year of the battle against illiteracy, we start to tax books.

Our efforts to reduce the burden of medical costs: It is true that, following our summer deliberations, it was the majority view of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee that we should not proceed with the goods and services tax bill. But we are reasonable people, and this has not deterred us from attempting to amend the bill to make a bad bill better and to remove some of the bill's defects.

Let me go now to the substance of these amendments, which I hope senators opposite will support. At least give this Christmas gift to the Canadian people. Give them an opportunity to feel that at least the bill is going to be fair.

As our committee travelled across the country, one criticism was heard everywhere and every time hearings were held. It was that the GST is a regressive tax, a tax which cares not whether luxuries or necessities are bought, a tax which takes no account of whether the purchaser is rich or poor.

The Minister of Finance claims that this is a progressive tax, but his claim is supported only by organizations such as the Business Council on National Issues. Every single social group, labour group, community group, co-op, credit union, and agricultural organization, as well as every provincial government, claims that the GST is regressive and wrong. It is an inherently regressive tax which is not made progressive by the addition of meagre tax credits for the very poorest of Canadians. The tax credits only lessen the regressive nature for the poorest; they do not eliminate it at all.

The tax credits do nothing for the hard-pressed middle class, which is a designated cash cow.

A typical comment on the regressive nature of the GST was heard by the committee in Vancouver from Ms Cathie Yingling, representing the United Church of Canada, B.C. Conference, Committee on Health, Housing and Social Services. The United Church is very familiar with Canada's social problems and has worked for years to try to cure some of them. Ms Yingling stated:

> Bill C-62, the proposed goods and services tax, will . . . tax people on their current consumption. While everyone will be affected by the GST, rich and poor alike, with a 7 per cent rate, the fact remains that lower and middle-income people have to spend all or most of their income on goods and services just to maintain a decent living standard and have nothing or very little left for savings.

Does anyone on the other side dispute that? Of course not. You cannot dispute it.

Savings and investments will not be taxed. Indeed, the reason that you lost one of your members of Parliament for Alberta was that he thought it was blatantly unfair for Mr. Wilson to exempt his own profession, with reference to stock market transactions.

Senator Murray: How many members do you have from Alberta?

Senator Perrault: Talk to the member who defected from your party and find out the reasons why left. That was one of the main ones: looking after one sector of the economy and then imposing the tax on the other.

Your total support in Alberta is now about 5.0 per cent, and you will lose every seat in that province. You know the figures as well as we do. So don't gloat about your power in Alberta; you don't have it any more.

The United Church spokesman then stated:

> Savings and investments will not be taxed. The net effect of the GST, therefore, is to shift the tax burden mainly on to the backs of the lower and middle-income people in Canada. We believe this is an unjust form of taxation on these middle and lower-income Canadians.

Reverend Art Griffin, also of the United Church, stated:

> Seven per cent on rich and poor alike. That is the terrible travesty of this suggested tax. Surely it should be graduated, if it is to be at all.

How can the GST be progressive if it is not graduated? How can it be progressive if it cannot differentiate between the purchase of a Ferrari and the purchase of children's winter boots? Only in a Tory mind could you cook up something that would tax a Ferrari the same as it would tax winter boots or children's clothing. The justice of that escapes some of us.

Mrs. Beth Loring, Co-Chairman of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Victoria, Social Justice Commission, stated before our committee:

> Up to now in British Columbia there has been no tax on children's clothing until they reach the age of 15. After that, there is a 6 per cent provincial tax. This mother is now going to have to pay 7 per cent on her children's clothes.

Presumably, that will be on top of the provincial tax.

This criticism was heard not only in Vancouver but from coast to coast. It was heard from people in the areas represented by senators sitting opposite. People from your regions have told us this. Are we to understand that, despite the fact that those people feel it is wrong that children's clothing should carry the same rate as a brand new Ferrari, you are going to vote for it, regardless of what the people in your region want? That will discredit the Senate more than anything.

This criticism concerning taxation on children's clothing was heard not only in Vancouver but from coast to coast. At the other end of the country, in St. John's, Newfoundland, the committee heard from Dr. Laurel Doucette of the Social Action Commission of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of St. John's. She stated:

> The introduction of a consumption tax at this point in the history of the province is unthinkable. No one, apart from the current federal government, expects the tax credits provided for low-income people to be adequate in the first year of the tax, and due to inflation the credits will decline in value and application after that. People who are illiterate, or who, because of low income do not pay income tax will not know how to apply for credits.

We were told this by every single social welfare organization in Canada. Are you telling us that, despite the fact that these agencies in your own regions, in your own provinces, in your own cities and towns are telling us this, you are going to ignore their advice and are going to follow government orders and vote for something that is clearly wrong?

Dr. Doucette further stated:

> Those who do successfully apply will be hard-pressed to resist the urge to use the lump sum payment on overdue bills or on special family needs, rather than applying it to spending over the course of four months.

The question of whether all eligible individuals would apply for the credit was raised not only by social welfare groups but also by individuals such as Robert Campbell of Toronto, a laywer, who stated:

> One characteristic of the GST is its unfairness, but I wish to comment specifically on a point that was stressed by the Minister of Revenue . . . and his reference to the fact that lower-income groups have been reached out to by the minister or his department in order to acquaint those people with their entitlement to refundable sales tax credits. In many cases I suggest that people in that category will not be recompensed. The GST credits will not be received by those who do not file income tax returns. I understand that it is estimated that 15 per cent of lower-income earners who qualify for GST refundable tax credits will, for various reasons, file no income tax return and consequently will receive no reimbursement. This group will include transients, illiterates and immigrants who are suspicious of or fear the bureaucratic process.

Witness after witness claimed this tax was unfair. Significantly, almost all the people said they wanted a fair tax system, that they would be pleased to make their contributions to debt and to deficit reduction if they felt that the taxation system was just.

The Minister of Finance claims that it is progressive, that the GST is a tax which all Canadians will grow to love after they learn to live with it. There is no doubt that some Canadians will find it very easy to live under this system—the people who buy the Ferraris. Some Canadians will not feel the impact of this tax in the same way as others will. When Mr. Cosmo Mannella, a labour relations officer with the Carpenters' Union, appeared before the committee in Ottawa, this is the picture he painted of tax reform under the Mulroney government:

● (2030)

> Under the personal income tax, the more you make, the more you pay. Even after so-called "tax reform" under the Tories a manager with an income of over $70,000 pays 29 cents of each extra dollar of income in federal tax compared to the 17 cents of each extra dollar paid by a worker with an income of $25,000. That difference is not big enough, as I shall argue later, but at least it is there.
> Under the GST, by contrast the manager will pay the same 7 per cent tax as the ordinary worker on a light bulb, a movie ticket, a hamburger, or whatever it is they buy. It doesn't matter how well off you are, you pay the same amount to the government, and that is not fair.
> But it is worse than that. A manager, unlike an ordinary worker, can afford to save rather than spend a significant share of his or her income. Most ordinary people these days do well to put something aside for a rainy day, let alone invest in stocks and shares, mutual funds, real estate or what have you. They spend virtually all their income on food, shelter, clothing and, yes, on the occasional meal out and a movie. Virtually all of their income will be taxed under the GST, while the savings of the wealthy will escape the tax.

Are you arguing that point that he makes? There is total silence on the other side.

> As a result, the GST will take a higher percentage of income from low income families. To take one example, a family of two adults and two children will pay 5.2 per cent of their income in GST if they have an income of $30,000 but just 3.9 per cent if they have an income of $100,000. That is hardly fair.

Is it any wonder that church groups in both Newfoundland and British Columbia called for a special sales tax on luxury items? With the GST, no special sales tax is possible. Why should it not be possible to devise a variable tax rate, a rate that recognizes that there is a difference between luxuries and necessities, between Ferraris and children's snowsuits, between other large expenditures and diapers?

The amendment that I have brought forward tonight is but a start in changing the regressive GST into a variable and progressive goods and services tax. If you intend to impose your majority will in this chamber, at least consider an amendment which will make it fairer. The amendment would place a higher tax rate on luxury automobiles, expensive jewelry and clothing.

What is the impact? Let me give you two examples. The first part of the amendment would set up an increasingly higher rate of taxation for expensive passenger automobiles, for example. Suggested tax rate for cars costing between $30,000 and $40,000 would increase from 7 per cent to 10 per cent, then to 15 per cent for vehicles between $40,000 and $50,000, and 20 per cent for passenger automobiles priced at $50,000 or more. Is this unfair? Does this appeal to your sense of justice? We are suggesting something that will raise money to help pay some of the bills of this country. We are saying that this is one way to make the very wealthy pay a fairer share.

If the Liberal amendment carries, the proposed GST rate would also rise to fifteen per cent for any personal item of clothing greater than $1,000. In addition, certain other expensive items would be subject to an increased rate of taxation, with a 20 per cent GST applied to goods costing $3,000 or more. Is this unfair?

The list of luxury goods to be taxed at a higher rate, along with the applicable rate of taxation, will be subject to review on a regular basis. On the other hand, the second part of the legislative modification would offer a zero rate of taxation to children's clothing, non-prescription drugs and books which under Bill C-62 are all to be taxed at the 7 per cent rate.

The proposal to zero-rate books, the second such attempt by Liberals in the Senate, is particularly noteworthy, given the offer made yesterday by the Quebec finance minister to exempt books from the provincial GST as long as the federal government followed suit. The federal government should take immediate advantage of this offer from the Province of Quebec and let the other provinces do the very same. This would be progress.

Honourable Senators, some people suggest that having a variable rate of taxation would make the Canadian taxation system unique in the world. Let us put some international comparisons on the record. The substance of this amendment is easily justifiable with international comparisons. The Leader of the Government has talked about increasing our international competitiveness. I believe it is important also. In defending the GST, he often points to European countries where value-added tax has been introduced as if we would somehow go backwards in failing to adopt this regressive and unfair tax.

Let us look at the examples set by European countries and examine how their respective governments have established VATs. Contrary to government claims, uniform rates of VAT are not the general rule in Europe or elsewhere in the world. They are the exception. Several countries have seen fit to introduce variable or multiple rates of taxation on goods and services, which is the spirit of this amendment that we are introducing tonight. For the information of honourable senators, let me identify a few of these countries that have variable rates. They are: Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Cote d'Ivoire, France, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Korea, Luxembourg, Mexico, Morocco, Netherlands, Nicaragua, Niger, Norway, Portugal, Senegal, Spain, Sweden, Taiwan, Turkey and Uruguay. I did not invent these facts. That list is taken from Value-Added Tax, International Practice and Problems, a scholarly essay published by the International Monetary Fund.

Further, many of the above-mentioned countries moved from a uniform rate to multiple rates. Others introduced a variable rate VAT from the very start.

I suppose you could say that all of these other countries are wrong and we are right. Perhaps Michael Wilson, Brian Mulroney and the Leader of the Government in the Senate are the only ones who have got it right. As they used to say in the army, "The only one in step is my boy Johnny." Somehow I do not think so. In point of fact, over 75 per cent of Canadians think Michael Wilson and Brian Mulroney are dead wrong.

We had a plebiscite on the Vancouver City ballot on the weekend, as Senator Lawson knows. I believe 86 per cent were against the GST. Are you so hard headed that you are not going to admit that there are variations in this tax? Do certain politicians on the government side have such inflated egos that they cannot admit that perhaps we can do things better?

As honourable senators know, the evidence is overwhelming. Multiple rates do exist and are prevalent in the majority of countries using a value-added tax. There are three basic reasons to zero-rate goods or services in jurisdictions where governments have introduced a value-added tax. Let me speak briefly on these points.

The first reason has to do with improving the progressivity or fairness of the value-added tax. This feature has, unfortunately, been lost or, at the very least, much reduced in our income tax system. Under this Conservative government, under the cover of tax reform, we have reduced the number of brackets for income tax purposes from ten, if my memory serves me correctly, to only three. The progressive nature of income tax in this country has been, for all intents and purposes, destroyed. The rich now get a much better break under Tory-style tax reform than they used to under previous Liberal administrations.

● (2040)

"Fairness" is a simple word that means so much for ordinary Canadians, but with a uniform tax rate of 7 per cent on virtually all goods and services, it is a word that has fallen on deaf Tory ears. Variable rates introduce some sense of equity with the GST. It is an attempt to make a bad tax a little better. Who can seriously argue that low income households do not spend a higher proportion of their income on children's clothing? Honourable Senators, children's clothing should not be taxed, wherever children live in Canada. It is abhorrent to the concept of Canadian fair play that people who live in northern Canada, because they live in a colder climate and must wear warmer clothes, have to pay much more for their children's clothing than people who live in Toronto.

The second reason for zero-rating or even exempting goods and services is that they are deemed to be meritorious. Here one can think of health care and education and books. To tax books is to impose ignorance. Literacy and education would seem to be a meritorious endeavour. Books contribute to our country's continued education. They ought to be free of tax, as they are in the mother country, the United Kingdom.

The third and final rationale for applying a zero rate of tax on certain goods and services is that these may be too difficult to tax and that administratively it just makes common sense not to tax them. Regardless of the reasons one chooses, books, children's clothing and non-prescription drugs should not be subject to the GST.

[Senator Perrault.]

Consider the experience in other parts of the world. Take Belgium, for example, where there are six different categories of tax ranging from 1 per cent to 33 per cent. In Brazil the tax ranges from 9 per cent to 11 per cent, and in Columbia there are 7 categories ranging from 4 per cent to 35 per cent. This is the pattern, not the exception, throughout the world. In other countries, luxury items are the ones that attract high taxes in the sure and certain knowledge that they are going to be purchased by people with a lot of money.

I should like to conclude my remarks by saying that variable rates will make the tax more difficult to administer for federal bureaucrats, but whose interests are we serving in this country, the public interest or the bureaucrat interest? I don't need to be elected to know where my loyalty lies in this respect and my honourable friends should not feel any different. This is clearly a proposal which is going to make the system fairer for the people of Canada. It will help out hard-pressed families with children, whose expenses are so high during their growing years. Our loyalty should be with the people of Canada and the people we represent.

Twenty-four new senators were appointed after August 24. Surely they were not sent here to serve as a mouthpiece for the Prime Minister. They should be authentic spokesmen for the hopes, dreams and aspirations of people living in their own regions. Those consumers who can afford luxury goods should pay more tax. Honourable senators, that is just plain common sense.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable Senators, the purpose of Senator MacEachen's amendment tonight, to which Senator Perrault has spoken so articulately, is to respond to the concerns of many, many witnesses who gave evidence before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in every part of Canada as that committee travelled across the country and listened to evidence during the summer months. Those concerns spoke to the essential unfairness of the goods and services tax as concocted by the Mulroney government and the government's unwillingness to make amendments to remove that unfairness. People were entitled to expect fairness because of repeated statements made by Mr. Wilson throughout 1989. On April 27, 1989, in a statement called, "The Goods and Services Tax" , Mr. Wilson stated:

> A central element of the government's plan for sales tax reform is its commitment to improving the overall fairness of the tax system. With sales tax reform will come a more equitable sharing of the tax burden.

A little later he stated:

> The government believes that a more effective approach to achieving fairness is to maintain a broad sales tax base while relying on instruments capable of directing assistance to lower and middle income Canadians.

Fairness, again! Further on he stated:

> In addition to the new GST Credit, other income tax changes that will benefit middle income households will be introduced as part of sales tax reform.
> In combination, the refundable sales tax credit and other income tax changes will result in a more progressive system after reform than before.

One more quote from that statement is:

> As a further element in the commitment to fairness, the Minister of Finance has indicated that the new tax will not be allowed to prejudice the reasonable opportunity for home ownership that Canadians would otherwise have enjoyed.

Mr. Wilson spoke about fairness in April of 1989. Then, in the technical paper on the goods and services tax, dated August 1989, the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, said in one of his first statements:

> To ensure that the proposed GST system is fair, the existing FST credit would be replaced by a new GST credit.

Fair, again, is what he says.

Then, in December of 1989, in a document headed "Goods and Services Tax, tabled in the House of Commons by the Hon. Michael H. Wilson, Minister of Finance" he said:

> The government has consistently maintained that sales tax reform should be accomplished in a way which contributes to a fair and progressive tax system.

He went on to say:

> In reviewing the trade-offs necessary to secure a lower rate for the GST, the government has ensured that equitable treatment across income groups remain a fundamental element of the reform.

Mr. Wilson is either trying to fool us or does not understand fairness in a tax system, nor does he understand the evolution of the Canadian tax system.

Since its genesis in 1917, the federal Income Tax Act has been frequently amended and it was substantially revised in 1945 and 1952. But by 1962 there was widespread agreement that a further revision was necessary. In that year the federal government established the Royal Commission on Taxation under the chairmanship of Kenneth Carter, a chartered accountant who practised in Toronto. The commission reported in 1966 with a six-volume document which constitutes perhaps the most thorough, lucid, and brilliant analysis of income tax policy that has ever been produced.

Given that the main purpose of taxation is to raise revenue, the question arises as to what subsidiary objectives could be pursued by tax. The Carter Commission took the view, which is very widely shared, that equity—and that is fairness—should be the major subsidiary objective of that system. The commission also addressed other objectives, such as neutrality. The main objective, however, was equity.

The commission distinguished between horizontal equity, which requires that persons in similar circumstances bear the same taxes, and vertical equity, which requires that persons in different circumstances bear appropriately different taxes. Carter held, and again his view is very widely shared, that both dimensions of equity require that tax be levied in accordance with ability to pay.

While the ability-to-pay criterion is widely accepted as the measure of equity in a tax system, the opposition to Carter's recommendations showed that many people could not accept all of the implications of that criterion.

Senator Murray: Including the Liberal government of the day.

Senator Stanbury: Absolutely, I agree, but that was in reaction to public response. I see no reaction to public response in this case.

The tax legislation of 1971 accepted some of Carter's recommendations and rejected others, but the net effect of the reform was an improvement in the equity of the system. The end result of the process of tax reform was a far cry from the Carter report. The 1971 legislation made four basic changes in the Income Tax Act.

• (2050)

1) It broadened the tax base; 2) it restructured the rates of tax; 3) it introduced new averaging provisions; 4) it altered the tax on corporations and shareholders so as to partially integrate the corporate and personal income tax. In all, a much more equitable system.

Whatever gains have been made over the years in the promotion of equity in the tax system risk being totally voided by this new and outrageous GST proposal, which is regressive.

At issue here are two different philosophies which were very well summarized in the book on Canadian taxation, written by Linda McQuaigh entitled: Behind Closed Doors; How the Rich Won Control of Canada's Tax System. On the one hand, McQuaigh points out that there is the Carter Commission philosophy of equity and that everyone should pay according to their ability to pay. That is, the greater the individual's income, the larger the proportion of income which could be relinquished in tax.

On the other hand, we now come to the Wilson Tory philosophy. The best way to describe it would be to indicate that if the first philosophy above can be described as "make the rich pay", then the Wilson school of thought can be called "make the rest pay".

Rather than taxing individuals on their income, the proponents of the "make the rest pay" school often suggest taxing individuals on the basis of consumption. That is exactly what the GST is doing.

Money spent would be taxed, but money saved would be tax exempt. At first glance, that may seem fair. People who want to pay less tax can simply consume less.

An unmistakable fact emerges; lo and behold, honourable senators, the rich are able to save more, which is what makes them rich. Both the poor and middle classes tend to spend the bulk of their income to cover basic living expenses. Any tax based on consumption is bound to hit those who, by necessity, must consume almost everything they receive.

Senator Frith: And therefore are poor.

Senator Stanbury: Therefore they are poor.

A consumption-based tax then turns the ability-to-pay concept on its head. The heaviest burden falls on those who are least able to pay. Naturally, there are no amendments which will remove the general regressiveness of this tax, because it is a regressive tax. The tax falls most heavily on those who cannot afford to pay. Although it is not quite as bad as Mrs. Thatcher's poll tax, but it follows the same principle, which is that everybody pays the same rate regardless of their resources. We all know what is happening to Mrs. Thatcher. Mr. Wilson claims that the GST is not regressive because of the credits that are available to the very poor. That is nonsense. Even the largest credit of $275.00 per adult, and $100.00 per child cannot compensate a family for the cost that is added to their expenses by the tax. Attrition begins. The poor would not even get the value that was promised to them. The Senate committee report has a section on page 1465 which is headed, The Tax Is Unfair. The members of the committee said this:

> Even more important than the technical flaws in the Bill is the matter of fairness. Any tax that is going to raise $18.5 billion per year and constitute a major part of the federal tax arsenal must meet some basic elements of fairness. The GST, and other VAT-type taxes, is not generally viewed as meeting those basic requirements. It is a regressive tax: lower income individuals spend a greater share of income on consumption and are therefore obliged to pay a greater proportion of their income in sales taxes. To make it more acceptable, the federal government is including a system of enhanced refundable tax credits as part of the GST package.
> If the basic structure of the tax is going to be determined by the tax credits, they must continue to be effective. Instead, the provisions of the Bill ensure that, only temporarily, would they do the job which they are meant to do.

The most important effect, if anything can be more important than theft from the poor, is the erosion of the spending power of those members of our society who are more prosperous than those who get credits. Those people pay exactly the same for goods and services; their toothpaste, a movie, their books, a haircut, the same as a pauper or a millionaire. They are the foundation of our society. Just because they earn a decent living, they pay everything; income taxes, provincial sales taxes, excise taxes, municipal taxes. In fact, they pay 52 percent of their income in taxes and now this super surtax called the GST.

The Prime Minister notes the people do not like the GST because they do not enjoy paying taxes. What an insult to the solid, responsible, middle-class Canadians. As long as the people feel it is their fair share, they pay all their taxes without complaint. What they cannot abide, and will not abide, is a government that dumps on them and allows those with more money to go free.

Oh, I know senators on the other side will say, "Oh, the wealthy pay more because they buy more." What a cop-out. When a millionaire takes his family to a movie, it costs him an unnoticeable smidgen of his income, while costing the worker earning $30,000 his entire entertainment budget for the week. Yet you want them both to pay the same amount of tax. The government claims the tax is less regressive because of the tax-free status of basic groceries, prescription drugs and medical devices. That benefits the well-to-do who typically consume more of those goods. Therefore, the tax-free status of these items profits the rich even more than the poor, and continues the regressivity of the tax.

The Committee Report, at page 1467, had this to say about the fairness of the zero-rated and tax-exempt items:

> The system of credits is not the only means by which the Government has promised the people that the adverse consequences of the GST would be mitigated. Some products are to be zero rated while others are to be tax-exempt.
> The Government, for example, has made much of the fact that residential rents are tax-exempt. This exemption serves to conceal the GST paid on inputs but it certainly does not eliminate the tax. This is particularly ironic because the FST is being discarded because of its invisibility.

The people are angry. I thought I might give you an example of the sort of thing they are sending around to show their anger. This is called A Day in Your Life Under the GST.

> In the new world of the GST, Big Brother won't be just watching you, he is going to have his hand in your pocket every time you turn around.
> A day in your life under the new Mulroney/Wilson GST will look something like this:
> You wake up—shut off the new alarm clock you just paid 7% more for.
> Brush your teeth—you paid 7% more for the brush and the toothpaste
> Take a shower—you paid 7% more for the soap, the shampoo, the towel, and everything else in the bathroom
> You dress the children for school in the new shirts, pants, socks, coats, hats and shoes you just paid 7% more for
> You hand them their school books—you paid 7% more for the books too
> If you can still afford it, you drive to work
> You have a flat tire on the way—it costs you 7% more for repairs
> Park the car in the lot—it costs you 7% more for parking

Senator Frith: Unless it is caviar! You can eat all the caviar you want and you do not have to pay the GST.

Senator Perrault: And if all of this is too much for you and you drop dead from paying this new tax, that will cost you 7 % more too, because this tax even applies to funerals.

The only way you can avoid paying the tax is to:

stop eating anything which is not defined as "basic groceries" by Big Brother in the Department of Finance don't buy any more clothes or shoes

unplug the phone

unplug the t.v.

unplug the fridge

turn off all the lights

shut off the electricity

turn off the furnace and sit in the basement and whatever you do—don't die!

And while you are down there, you might offer up a silent and tax free prayer that the Senate will defeat this outrageous new tax nightmare.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear! And consider yourself lucky because next year the tax will be 15 per cent.

Senator Stanbury: That is right.

Senator Fairbairn: If you live in the North, it is much worse.

Senator Stanbury: I said the people are angry, not because they decline to pay their fair share but because they feel deeply that this government is ripping them off; this government which 43 per cent of them elected only two years ago. They cursed the 43 per cent who voted Tory, even if they themselves were among them. They cursed the abuse of the parliamentary system which keeps them from throwing the scoundrels out for another three years. They blessed the Fathers of Confederation for having the foresight to give them the Senate of Canada, which is at least one check or balance against an elected dictatorship.

Senator Steuart: Thank God.

Senator Fairbairn: In 1910, the people of California solved a similar problem with their State government by establishing the remedies of initiative, referendum and recall in their constitution.

Senator Frith: They did it in Arizona; they recalled the government.

Senator Stanbury: That is right. The people of Canada are ready today to insert similar remedies into our Constitution. They know we need some kind of a shepherd's crook to yank a failing Prime Minister off the stage; some kind of restraint is needed for an irresponsible government.

This amendment is a symbolic attempt to balance the books just a little. Tax the toys of the rich at a rate that has some impact on their judgment. Relieve all of society from the burden of paying a tax on books, children's clothing, and non-prescription drugs. There never should have been a tax on these items, and we all know that. We have demonstrated this in the debates on our earlier amendments.

It is quite normal for value added taxes to have special rates for special items. Of 50 countries with VAT, 25 of them have a variable rate. It is perhaps worth noting that in only five of the 50 countries have basic rates remained at or below 7 per cent.

Of course, that is another worry of the public here in Canada. They know two things: one, that unlike any other country in the world, they will have two consumption taxes to pay at the federal and provincial levels; two, that value added taxes are such a money machine that governments cannot resist frequently doubling or tripling the rate.

The amendment calls for a special rate on expensive cars, clothing and jewels. These are the items where dealer showrooms or boutiques display an ambience which quietly says if you have to ask the price, you should not be there.

Senator Frith: You cannot afford it.

Senator Stanbury: We are saying if the tax is a consideration in your purchase you probably should not be there either. If you are there, then you should pay a little extra in gratitude to your society. Make it possible for you, as well as others less fortunate than you, to buy tax-free books, children's clothing and non-prescription drugs. These items consume a goodly portion of the income of poorer families, and should not be taxed as they are vital to every family.

I know you do not want to commit our government to using the surplus over the 18 billion dollars from the FST to reduce the national debt. If you should change your mind, a variable rate may be a good way of developing a surplus without having such a regressive tax. I do not think the people would object if you said we needed the extra money to reduce the national debt.

It makes me remember the wartime 47 years ago when I proposed to the young lady who became my wife. We carefully picked out a diamond ring which was a mere chip and cost $50. As I recall it, I had about $150 in the bank. The total purchase seemed possible but then the jeweller reminded me that there was a 50 per cent wartime luxury tax on jewelry. The purchase consumed half my bank account and was quite a shock to me as a soldier receiving $2.25 a day. I happily paid the tax. Indeed, I was blissfully happy then and continue to be so to this day.

Senator Frith: That was the best investment you ever made. Make one more move as smart as that one, Senator Stanbury, and you are home.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, this amendment will help to make the bill less regressive and bring it more in line with the evolution of Canadian tax policies. I support the amendment and ask other honourable senators to do likewise.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Stanbury, toward the end of your remarks, you mentioned the fact that in this particular case, as a federal state, this tax is being imposed on a lower level of tax already in existence in the form of provincial sales taxes. Of the 50 odd countries that have this form of tax, do you know of one other country that has two levels of sales tax where one is piled on top of the other?

Senator Stanbury: I am advised that there is not a single other country in the world that has such as system.

Senator van Roggen: Or has ever attempted such as system?

Senator Frith: Perhaps Brazil.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I too would like to support this amendment, and I think the Tories should also.

Senator Frith: Author, author! I am just reading the book.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. I think the Tories should support this amendment out of a need to show that they lack hubris and that they are not so arrogant that the gods will destroy them.

The Tories should support this amendment as they see we are in a recession. There are 60 per cent more bankruptcies this month than in the same month a year ago. There are hundreds of thousands of jobs, never to be recovered that are being lost in manufacturing. Small firms have been driven into the ground through high interest rates due to your policies.

The rich, who have money to lend, are the sole benefactors of high interest rates. Would it not be a sign of decency for you to not show your wealth when everyone around you is poor. The intelligent rich understood what Marx was saying when he said, "Workers of the world unite, you have nothing to lose but your chains." They understood that if the chains were covered in gold, perhaps thin gilt, the workers would tolerate them a bit more. The intelligent rich, the intelligent rulers, the intelligent bosses of major industries in other countries do not have the colossal differential advantage in earnings that is enjoyed by Canadian and US bosses. Why is that so?

• (2110)

Why? Because they care about social peace. They care about appearances; they care about not being selfish brutes. But you will pay for this. This amendment might save your skin and might save some seats in the House of Commons if you pass it, because people will say, "Well, there is a dram of decency in Tories."

Senator Cools: Where is it?

Senator Gigantès: If they pass the amendments, some people might think there is a dram of decency. It is indecent, in economic times like these, when farms are being foreclosed; when people are getting to the point where they can no longer pay their mortgages; when young couples cannot buy a home; when businesses everywhere are closing down and hundreds of thousands of workers are going to be much poorer than ever they were before and will not regain the type of jobs that they now have because we will have some new free trade agreement with Mexico and our nice Canadian capitalists will move to where they can pay $45.00 a week to get a job done.

Have the decency to pay a little more tax when you are riding in a Ferari! When you are driving around in what one of our colleagues opposite calls his Ford—because Jaguars are not being made by Ford, they are owned by Ford—let it be known that you have had the decency to pay a little more tax. If you can afford a Jaguar, and you can afford 20 per cent tax on it, truly. It will make for a better feeling in the country. You should care about that.

You cannot move all your production into poor countries and exploit the poor Mexicans and other poor people, because if you pay them $45.00 per week they will not have enough money to buy the cars that you are making, or whatever else you are making. Meanwhile, you will have thrown your workers here out of work. These are the same workers who are buying your cars and your products. You will impoverish your customers here, move somewhere else and screw those workers by paying them terribly small amounts. But who will buy your products? For God's sake, start being intelligent and start being decent.

High interest rates have ruined this country. I demonstrated the other day— and I am sure none of you would like to check this, but you can if you want— that this government, in the first five years of its mandate, could have had a national debt $85 billion dollars less than it was in December of 1989. Why was it higher? Because corporate tax this year had to be lowered much lower than that in the United States.

At a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce we heard from one of our colleagues that, "No, it is not possible. Our taxes are much higher than they are in the United States." Well, of course. That is the leit-motif. That is the rallying cry of Tories that they are being taxed more than others. So what do they do? They shift the tax burden onto the poor and the lower middle class through this iniquitous indirect taxation, and they do it in the most inept way.

This is the crowd that said they would create harmony in federal-provincial relations. Even with a bunch of Tory governments out there, they were not able to get an agreed single tax. They could not even do that. With eight provinces on board, they could not even get the Meech Lake Accord passed with the support of the two opposition parties.

There is the incompetent apprentice sorcerer over there who was responsible for that. It is people like that who, in their immense incompetence, do not understand that it is suicidal for their freres politically in the other chamber to have this kind of tax, which is badly organized, appears unfair, and on which they accept no amendments— that is, no amendments such as the one today; no amendment such as the one on the North, which they turned down. This will make the miserable life of people in our northern parts even more miserable and will literally cause deaths from hunger, cold and exposure. But they do not care. They will be rolling around in their great big Jaguars and Rolls-Royces, buying more jewels, and expensive clothing, and shifting the burden of tax onto those who cannot afford it. This is the sort of thing that destroys the fabric of a society.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Gigantès: This is from a government that has loosened the east/west link by loosening the common services and benefits that are important to keep a country together, from a government that is selling our birthright to the Americans without conditions. Professor Richard Lipsey, the great prophet of the free trade agreement, said in his book that the most important thing about this agreement in years to come will be that it has established the right of Canadian capitalists to invest unhindered in the United States. Well, whoopee! Isn't that terrific? These wonderful multibillionaires will take their marbles to the United States and the rest of us, the workers who will be deprived of jobs over here, are supposed to look at this as being absolutely wonderful. Well, at least preserve appearances.

I recall the story of King—

Senator Stanbury: You would think that they would be smooth about it at least.

Senator Gigantès: They are not. They are crass and incompetent.

King Victor Emmanuel, the little Italian king who served along side Mussolini, one day dropped his handkerchief on the balcony of the palace from which he was watching a strutting parade. Mussolini bent and picked up the handkerchief and said, "Your majesty, may I retain this as a keepsake?" The King said, "For God's sake, give it back to me so that I have something in which to hide my face!"

This amendment provides you with something with which to hide your face!

Senator Cools: Hide it!

Senator Gigantès: Have some decency. Do not go around strutting with your lack of feelings and your lack of solidarity towards other human beings who are less fortunate than you are.

Herbert Spenser, your prophet, said that the rich are rich because they are the elect of God. The converse is that the poor are not the elect of God, so they deserve to suffer. I never expected that I would see this principle applied in 1990 in so stupid a fashion in a country like Canada, a country known around the world for being a caring country and a country that had built unity through care for its citizens; a country that established equalization payments because it said that it was important for people all across the country to have equal benefits at a certain level.

It is contrary to this very philosophy to tax those who are least able to bear the tax. It is contrary to this philosophy to hit the North. By the time the tax works its way through transportation over long distances, the people in the north will be less able to warm themselves, less able to cover themselves, less able to buy ammunition, less able to buy skidoos. The prices will double, 7 per cent on 7 per cent on 7 per cent.

But, of course, you don't care. You are sitting in your marvellous, air-conditioned, beautiful Jaguars or Rolls Royces, probably covered with a fur blanket and having chauffeurs to drive you around. This is the Marie Antoinette syndrome. At least I am told she was good-looking. Apart from the ladies opposite, the rest of you are not good-looking.

There we go. "Let them eat cake." But you tax the cake. What you do not tax is your caviar, the caviar of the stock broker friends of Mr. Wilson—Mr. Wilson, who upon entering office said, "What this country needs is more rich people." What has he been doing ever since? Making more rich people. And how? Not by improving the economy in general, not by thinking of Canada as a national unit, but by selling it to the Americans.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Gigantès: And by increasing the taxes of the poor and decreasing the taxes of the rich.

Senator Haidasz: You should hide your faces.

Senator Gigantès: Now we are offering you, with this amendment, that handkerchief of King Victor Emmanuel in which to hide your shameful faces.

You have already rejected—and that was criminal—the amendment with regard to the North. You rejected an amendment on medical services and on education. Of course, on education it is understandable. I remember that on an earlier occasion I was asking the Leader of the Government, who was talking about some people he was appointing to some board in the Atlantic provinces, whether all the appointees were Tories and whether they could read. He said, "Some of them are Liberals." I said, "Well, of course, then, some of them can read." This was at a time when the Tory government had not read things that were happening. They got worse. They couldn't even pronounce the word "recession".

This is a government which has been lying from day one. It started back in the campaign in 1979. Mr. Crosbie, whom I like very much, said, "If we told people what we plan to do, we couldn't get elected." This is on record. He said it publicly. It is on TV and it is in print.

At least he is frank. This is one of the things one likes about Mr. Crosbie. He is prepared to confess the enormity of being a Tory—the enormity of being a Tory, the "state line." Unfortunately, Plato invented it or at least defined it. It has always been used by the rich.

The intelligent rich have the talent of hypocrisy. They pretend that they are not all that much richer than anybody else. But not you, oh no! Let the people in the North die. Let the kids not be able to afford one more book which they may need, so long as you can go around wearing big, fat jewels and driving Fords-Jaguars, in other words.

What is with you? Don't you have any self-knowledge? Don't you understand what you are doing? Don't you understand what you look like? Must you all imitate your puffed-up, impossible, incompetent Prime Minister, the man who is so eaten up with his desire for self-aggrandizement that he launched himself off in all directions without having planned anything, and spoiled all his major endeavours through lack of preparation, through lack of intelligence? And I am being generous.

On the Free Trade Agreement he gave to the Americans what the Americans wanted and did not obtain what we wanted. I will not go so far as to say that his former American masters suggested what he should do. But for someone who had directed branch plants and closed down a whole town because he was told to do so by Cleveland, it becomes second nature.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Then came Meech Lake. He was supported by all three parties, by eight of the ten provinces, and he screwed up. How much more incompetent can anybody get?

The GST was going to be a wonderful tax. Everybody was going to be taxed more heavily, but it was going to be visible. In other words, you were going to get it right between the eyes, not in the back. It turns out that he could not get his Tory premiers on board, he who was going to bring great harmony. So now we have the most complex, impossible indirect tax system in the world. There is no other country that has so stupid, so impossible—

Senator Haidasz: Screwed-up!

Senator Gigantès: —so screwed-up a system. Thank you, Senator Haidasz. I didn't dare say it in case somebody accused me of being unparliamentary.

Senator Meighen: Tell me about the Tory Premier of Quebec.

Senator Gigantès: Do you wish to address me, sir?

Senator Meighen: I did.

Senator Gigantès: You did? Would you repeat, please.

Senator Meighen: I asked you to name the Tory Premier of Quebec.

Senator Frith: You know who it is.

Senator Gigantès: Right now is not the time to criticize Mr. Bourassa. Let's leave him out of it. Among other things, the man's health gives some concern, maybe not to you but to me.

We have the GST which is now the most complicated tax ever devised anywhere. We have offered you a series of amendments which would clearly have improved it. Your Prime Minister said, "Well, of course, if they had offered us some amendments, we would have been prepared to consider them."

Never, never! We offered amendments. Everybody agrees they were good amendments. There is no one in this country who disputes that the amendment relating to the North is decent and proper and necessary.

We had Madame Solange Chaput-Rolland giving us another of her sermons on morality and on how much worse we are than anybody else and how much worse our modesty is than hers—she who, she tells us, has known all these great people and has written all these great books, and her conscience was absolutely savaging her about the books. Yet, she voted to have books taxed. She was given figures by Senator Hébert which showed that bookstores would close, that small publishers would close. But no, it is part of the pattern of how the rich capture the tax system. You are going to harm this country irreparably.

● (2130)

I am worried about your party. I wrote an article which appeared in various newspapers. I said it is a tragedy that at this time, when for the next two years English Canada will have discussions with Quebec, your party is being discredited in English Canada, your Prime Minister is hated in English Canada and there will not be an interlocutor for those discussions with Quebec. This GST, your behaviour and your rejection of proper and decent amendments is aggravating the situation. You are in power; we are not. You are going to screw-up again and the country will pay.

Being in power does not mean riding roughshod over the poor in the North and depriving children of clothing.

Senator Barootes: We will screw-up again like 1984 and 1988.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: There are occasions when nations make mistakes in electing people and they live to regret it. Your party is perhaps the one that will put an end to this country because your party has people who are so taken up with their own self importance that they cannot see the misery they are inflicting on the weak.

Senator Barootes: You talk about arrogance, talk about your former leader.

Senator Gigantès: You rejected the amendment regarding the North. Today you tell us to pay a little more on jewelry, Jaguars and Rolls Royces, so that the kids of the poor can wear new boots this winter.

You are a decent man, Senator Barootes. Why are you getting into this stupid fight? You have looked after the poor. Coming from you, it is not believable when you try to be partisan on such an issue. Senator Barootes, you do not want the poor to suffer and you know it.

Senator Meighen: Is this part of the sixteen hours?

Senator Gigantès: No, we will get to that in good time.

Senator Kelleher: Keep drinking lots of water.

Senator Gigantès: Just looking at you makes me hot under the collar. The liquid goes out through my pores and not through my bladder.

This is unbelievable. You are offered a chance to redeem yourself with a series of decent amendments, but you are incapable of saving yourselves. You are shaming this country; you are shaming your party, and you are damaging Canada. For God sake, wake up and repent.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable Senators —

Senator Haidasz: On behalf of all multi-millionaires, continue.

Senator Di Nino: May I have the pleasure of addressing you, Senator Haidasz?

Senator Haidasz: Yes.

Senator Di Nino: Thank you. Some of these comments are directed at you.

I should like to take a few moments of your time, honourable senators, to express some opinions on what has taken place in this chamber in the past weeks. I will then address the issue being debated and the amendment put forth this evening.

The past several weeks have been a most interesting time in my life.

Senator Gigantès: I am glad you appreciate it.

Senator Di Nino: I am sure it has been just as interesting for all of us, honourable senators. When summoned to serve my country in the chamber of sober second thought—and that is a misnomer—I looked forward to stimulating and challenging debates with learned men and women, men and women of wisdom and wit. I looked forward to a time of learning. I anticipated participating in debates on issues which would affect all Canadians as well as future generations, our grandchildren and those who follow them. I must admit I wondered at my ability to participate in such debates with men and women of legendary reputations, famous for their oratorical skills.

I came here with an open mind, prepared to listen to all sides. I came here prepared to change my mind where and when convinced by my honourable colleagues.

Senator Cools: Convince us.

Senator Di Nino: Today, honourable senators, I am sad to state that the past few weeks have been frustrating, humiliating and certainly disappointing. The wisdom and wit has generally been lacking. The oratorical skills have, at best, been misdirected, and the behaviour in this chamber has been an embarrassment to all of us.

Senator Stanbury: We agree.

Senator Di Nino: I have been called names I have not heard since my school days. I have been addressed in offensive terms, certainly unparliamentary terms. At times it has appeared to me as if the only objective is to gain political brownie points. I have wondered whether the experiences in the chamber during the sitting are the norm or the exception. Honourable senators sitting on both sides have attempted to reassure me. They claim this period has not been normal. As a matter of fact, some have opined that a number of honourable senators have been behaving in an abnormal manner. I take comfort in their sincere comments, but I wonder if the damage done is irreparable.

One thing is sure, honourable senators, no one in this chamber—or for that matter, no political party—will gain from our behaviour. There have been some sane moments to temper the insanity of the past few weeks, but most of these moments have come from the participation of independent senators. Senator Pitfield made good sense in his presentation on October 25. Senator Molson has at least on two occasions brought us back to the real world. I must say the person who has to date impressed me is Senator Everett. He has been eloquent, sensible and courageous.

Let me now direct some remarks to the GST issue. That the tax is unpopular is not arguable. Any tax measure which either changes or increases taxes will be unpopular. That the tax is all bad, or is, or will, be responsible for all of the country's ills is very arguable.

• (2140)

The debates have emphasized the negative aspects of the GST, and that is fair game. The opposition's role is to oppose, but it is also important to put on the record the positive aspects of the new legislation.

The federal sales tax and the manufacturers' sales tax are universally condemned as bad taxes—bad for the country. The removal of the federal sales tax and the manufacturers' sales tax has been recommended by successive governments for over the past 50 years. The alternatives would all be difficult to sell to an electorate. Therefore, no other previous government has had the political will to tackle this issue. The Mulroney government has decided finally to act on the recommendation of the numerous surveys, studies and reports conducted during past decades. The Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other cabinet ministers have all admitted that practical experience will lead to changes in the legislation, as is the case with most legislation. I share that opinion.

The main ingredient missing from the arguments put forth by honourable senators opposite is the benefit to the Canadian economy from increased economic activity. The manufacturing sector, the sector which creates the jobs in this country, has been the most supportive of the GST. We are already seeing reductions created by the GST. The automotive industry is at the forefront in this regard. Perhaps I can read into the record a list of names of those businesses which have publicly committed to pass through any identifiable savings to consumers. They are: Black and Decker, Ford, General Motors, Chrysler, Nissan, WCI, Inglis, Camco, Du Pont, Interhome Energy, Imperial Oil, Sears, Eaton's, Hudson's Bay, Canadian Tire, Bell Canada, Ontario Hydro, Hydro-Québec and so on. For the record, I would also like to name some of the many Canadians who have supported the GST. I believe that all of these people have presented their views to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Irwin Gillespie of Carleton University has said that the MST-GST tax substitution is, on balance, a good tax reform. Robert Clark, an economist at the University of British Columbia, said:

> My overall verdict is that, as compared with the manufacturers' level sales tax, the proposed tax is significantly more equitable to households in the same income groups and in different income groups, substantially more efficient in the allocation of resources, and more visible than the present tax has ever been.

He concluded by saying that the GST was the most appropriate form of general sales tax for the federal government to introduce.

The Commodity Tax Committee of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants stated: "We, therefore, strongly support the initiatives being considered by the government to reform this antiquated system." The Economic Council of Canada stated: "This is a badly needed reform to an obsolete, inefficient tax." The C.D. Howe Institute viewed the GST as vastly preferable to the FST.

[Senator Di Nino.]

I will not bore honourable senators with quotations of other groups of witnesses.

Senator Haidasz: What did the Catholic bishops say to the committee? They said that it is an immoral tax.

Senator Di Nino: The point that surely must be made is that it is difficult to understand why the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would virtually ignore all of this evidence in recommending that no further action be taken in the Senate on this legislation. "Axe the tax" is all that committee recommended.

That position is all the more difficult to accept when one considers that barely three years ago the same committee, including many senators sitting opposite, recommended that as soon as is practicable the government introduce legislation to implement a broadly based multi-staged sales tax to replace the existing federal sales tax system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Di Nino: Unlike the existing tax, which is imposed at multiple rates on only one-third of all goods and services consumed in Canada, the GST will apply at a lower uniform rate to most goods and services. This will mean that sectors across the economy will be treated more equitably and that consumer decisions will not be distorted, as they are by the current system.

It seems to me that the GST will provide a strong incentive for companies and individuals to conduct their affairs legitimately and openly. This will result from the fact that the GST removes the federal sales tax from business inputs to lower operating costs, increasing competitiveness and profitability. This will create more jobs.

The Canadian Manufacturers' Association appeared before the finance committee of the other place a little over a year ago. Representatives of the organization stated:

> The CMA has been pursuing reform to the current federal sales tax for more than 35 years and finally someone has heard us . . . The current federal sales tax, aptly called the manufacturers' sales tax, discriminates against exports, favours imports and is levied on a narrow base of 75,000 businesses. It is complex to administer as is evidenced by the 22,0000 administrative provisions. The CMA supports the government's proposal to proceed quickly with the implementation of a goods and services tax.

The current FST is a mode of tax harmful to Canada's economy. The GST will lower production costs, making companies better able to compete at home and abroad. Similar taxes operate successfully in 48 countries around the world. The GST will improve Canada's international competitiveness, leading to greater investments and more jobs.

Let me now address, if I may, a few comments on tonight's proposed amendment. There are three basic reasons why I strongly disagree with the amendment that has been put forward tonight. The first of those reasons is complexity.

Let me talk about the current federal sales tax for a few minutes. One of the basic structural problems with the current federal sales tax is the fact that it is applied to a narrow base at a high rate. While senators opposite might like the arbitrariness and inefficiencies that result from such a system, we on this side do not, and there are very good reasons for this. I mentioned the arbitrariness of a system with varying rates and exemptions. Under the current sales tax system there are approximately 260 court cases pending, and this is in addition to the hundreds of disputes that are currently being handled by Revenue Canada. These cases specifically relate to the fact that under the current system there are arbitrary judgments and administrative arrangements that must be made in order to keep the system working. Currently there are 22,000 such deals that must be administered by Revenue Canada to make our 65-year old tax system function.

Let me provide senators with a few examples of what happens with a narrow tax base. Complexity arises because the tax is not applied to all products and because a distinction between taxable and exempt items is often difficult to define and sustain. For example, directories, catalogues and children's colouring books are taxable while other books and magazines are not. Regular footwear and tennis shoes are exempt from tax while ski boots and bowling shoes are taxable. Major disputes have gone before the courts to resolve the boundaries between taxable and exempt goods. Is fluorinated toothpaste exempt as a health care product because it claims therapeutic qualities or is it taxable as a cosmetic? If electricity is not taxed, should flashlight batteries be exempt from tax because they are containers of electricity?

Such disputes raise issues of economic fairness and millions of dollars of tax revenue are at stake in their outcome—

Senator Frith: Unlike the divinely simple GST!

Senator Di Nino: Complexity is aggravated by the fact that, where the federal sales tax does apply, it is currently applied at three different rates: 9 per cent, 13.5 per cent and 19 per cent. Multiple rates have led to disagreements over what is taxable and at what rate. For example, even though the list of construction materials eligible for the 9 per cent rate runs for several pages, there are frequent disputes over whether certain types of flooring materials and built-in furniture are eligible for the 9 per cent rate or whether they are taxable at 13.5 per cent as regular household supplies. Equally important, the existence of three rates adds significantly to business compliance costs.

A recent study of selective businesses undertaken for the government by a private consulting firm indicates that a firm producing goods taxed at two different rates sustains compliance costs that are approximately 50 per cent higher than they would be if only one rate were applicable. In light of the fact that more than half of all firms subject to federal sales tax produced goods taxed at more than one rate, the dimensions of these compliance costs are significant.

Opposition senators have indicated that a single GST rate does not provide for a higher tax rate on luxury goods.

• (2150)

However, honourable senators should know that the government also has the excise tax system which applies tax to jewellery, alcohol, tobacco, and other products such as automobile air conditioners. All products are taxed under the excise tax system. Therefore, the government does have the capacity to tax the selected goods at a higher rate.

The second major criticism we have with the proposed amendment is that the numbers do not add up. While this has been a problem with several of the amendments that have been proposed by honourable senators opposite, it seems that they have not learned from prior shortcomings.

Tonight they are suggesting that by placing a higher rate of GST on expensive or luxury goods, it will somehow pay for the removal from the tax base of such goods as books, children's clothing, and non-prescription drugs. This clearly is not the case. The rate on goods and services would have to be raised in order to keep this amendment from potentially costing the government hundreds of millions of dollars.

The major criticism that we have with this amendment is that it flies in the face of what the rest of the world's industrialized countries are doing. Around the world, during the last decade, we have seen nations reform their tax systems in order to achieve greater fairness and more economic efficiency. The principles of tax reform are a comprehensive broad base and a low-uniform rate of tax. In this way, loopholes are closed, distorting exemptions and exceptions are kept to a minimum and the operation of the system both in terms of administration and compliance is greatly simplified.

What this amendment proposes is that Canada turn tax reform around the world on its head. Instead of simplicity, there is complexity. Instead of fairness across all economic sectors, there are relative advantages for one sector over the other. These are the hallmark of a regressive, abusive system.

The GST as a structure today is a progressive and fair system of tax. Families with an income of $30,000 or less will be better off than they are under the current system. Canadians with a higher income will be paying a greater share of their income in sales tax than they do today.

The Department of Finance learned lessons from European countries in the design of the GST. Other countries told us to keep a single rate of tax. We were able to learn from the mistakes made in these countries, and these lessons were incorporated in the single rate, broadly-based GST.

I would like to conclude, honourable senators, with some remarks that I am sure that most in this room are not going to like.

Further to my earlier remarks, my experiences in this chamber have left me suspicious of and doubting the motive behind the debates of the honourable senators opposite. I viewed their presentations with suspicion. Frankly, it seems to me that the Liberal senators' performance is only intended to foster partisan political gain.

I may be wrong, but that is my honest opinion.

Some Hon. Senators: You are wrong.

Senator Di Nino: Some of the amendments proposed by the honourable Liberal senators have merits, and I will be prepared to debate these merits. Unfortunately, I believe these amendments were crafted solely for the purpose of attracting public sympathy for purely political reasons.

Senator Frith: Ask the co-ops about that.

Senator Di Nino: I am aksing. In asking my colleagues to vote against this amendment, as I intend to do, I offer my cooperation to all senators who, after this impasse has been put behind us, are interested in rebuilding a chamber of reason, wisdom, and respect.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Di Nino: For the sake of our children and grandchildren, I hope and pray we can soon put aside these past weeks and get on with the job we have been entrusted with, the job of continuing to make Canada, my country of choice, the best country in the world.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to ask one question, since the honourable senator mentioned how good this goods and services tax is for Canada. My question is a very simple one: I had some talks with the senator some time ago concerning the North and the livelihood of the people, and what has been occurring over the years. I wonder if the honourable senator can enlighten me as to how the goods and services tax is good for the North. I have not heard one single word relating to the North. Perhaps he can educate me as to how this goods and services tax is good for the North.

Senator Di Nino: Honourable senator, first of all, as you have already indicated, you and I have had a chat about my experiences in the land and in the northern country. At some more opportune time I will make somecomments which will support my honourable colleague in his endeavours.

As it relates to the GST, I truly believe that in some cases, yes, somebody is going to pay a little more tax. In other cases, the tax will be reduced. In balance, if you truly want to be honest about it, I believe you will find that in balance there will be very little difference whether in the North or in the other parts of the country.

Senator Frith: Do you have that straight? Next question?

Senator Leblanc: I am quite surprised to hear that. We are going to pay a bit more, but in a sense it is quite fair. That is what you are saying. Honourable senators, I was quite shocked to hear that our minister, the Minister of Indian Affairs, only two days ago had learned that Inuit are taxpayers. That indicates how much this government knows about the North.

Senator Gigantès: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

If I understand the Minister of Finance and some of his declarations, this tax will collect more money than is now being collected. In a period of recession it means taking more money out of the pockets of consumers. There will not be a reduction in the deficit if more money is not taken out, and they say they will reduce the deficit. But at a time of recession, how will taking more money out of the pockets of consumers increase economic growth? It is difficult to understand. No economist would understand it either.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Di Nino: Perhaps I can enlighten you again, honourable senator, that the Minister of Finance, and the Finance Department, have stated that in the first year the GST is anticipated to be revenue neutral.

Senator Frith: And deficit reduction neutral too.

Senator Gigantès: I have an excellent bridge in Brooklyn to sell you and some wonderful swamplands down in Florida.

Senator Di Nino: That particular statement was confirmed by the Conference Board of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Di Nino: What Finance is saying, and I agree with, is that the elimination of the FST, the manufacturer's sales tax, should, and will, increase economic activity in the country. When that happens, then there will be additional revenue from this increased economic activity which will help reduce the deficit.

Senator Gigantès: I do own a piece of swamp, which is my senatorial thing. I will buy another one and sell you that one. I have some in Florida. If you can believe all that — it was a great speech, but your faith does you credit. Obviously.

Senator Di Nino: Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Gigantès: Saint Paul would be proud of you.

CHARLES DE GAULLE

TRIBUTE ON ONE-HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, today marks the One-hundredth anniversary of the birth of one of the twentieth century's greatest figures, Charles André Joseph Marie de Gaulle, who was born on November 22, 1890, in Lille, France. Charles de Gaulle was a great figure who stood for freedom when others refused to take a stand. He stood for friendship after the Second World War. He joined in the alliance with Germany in 1963, with another great statesman of Europe, Konrad Adenauer. That agreement in 1963 in turn led to the new Europe which we celebrate this week.

Finally, probably one of his greatest achievements was his ability to understand the constitutional malaise of the country in which he resided. He was able, in a peaceful way, to transform the constitutional makeup of France in peacetime.

As we know, honourable senators, great leaders are not perfect. Charles de Gaulle had many faults and made errors in judgment, but he is still entitled to an honoured place in the pages of history, and we should so respect that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

OFFICIAL REPORT

CORRECTION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I wish to bring a correction to the Hansard of November 20. I am quoted as having said:

> Having interviewed 10,539 of their members, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business came to the conclusion that 74.4 per cent said they were entirely satisfied with the government's effort to give them accurate and useful information—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Barootes: Sounds great!

Senator Corbin:

—on how the GST will affect their enterprises.

I said no such thing. I said they were entirely unsatisfied, or dissatisfied, if you wish.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was asked by some of my colleagues if Senator Murray would be available for the start of the Question Period. We had planned to proceed with Presentation of Petitions and then to Question Period in due course. Senator Murray has said he is available now, and I believe there is agreement to commence with Question Period and then revert to petitions.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Stewart has a committee report to present.

Senator Frith: I overlooked that. Perhaps we could have Reports of Committees and then proceed to Notices of Inquiries, Notices of Motions and Question Period, following which we could revert to Petitions.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the ninth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which deals with the monitoring of the implementation of the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement.

I ask that the report, but not the staff report to the committee, be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senateand to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix, p. 3936)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Stewart, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

PERSIAN GULF

UNITED STATES RESOLUTION ON USE OF FORCE—CANADIAN COMMITMENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government arising out of the subject matter we discussed yesterday afternoon. It has to do with whether Canada has made any commitment to the United States to support a resolution on the use of force in the Persian Gulf. There have been reports that a number of countries, including Canada, have committed themselves to supporting such a resolution if it were brought forward. The report also says that a number of other countries have not yet agreed. I wonder if Canada has been asked for such commitment, and, if any undertaking has been made, has it been surrounded by any qualifications?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have been in Europe for the past few days and have met with the leaders of governments of other countries. I have no information that would indicate that we have committed ourselves to a particular resolution at the UN Security Council. I am not aware that there is a draft circulating along the lines the honourable the Leader of the Opposition has indicated, but I shall make inquiries immediately to see what further information or comment the Prime Minister or Mr. Clark may have on this matter.

GRAIN

URUGUAY ROUND—INTERNATIONAL SOLUTION TO SUBSIDY WAR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could help me to understand what the trade minister, the Honourable John Crosbie, means when he says, and I quote:

> There's still no sign that the European Community is prepared to break the impasse over farm support that threatens to destroy any chance of liberalizing world trade, says federal Trade Minister John Crosbie.

He goes on to say, and I quote:

> Unless there is some satisfactory solution in agriculture, it's extremely unlikely there will be a successful conclusion of the round.

That refers to the Uruguay Round. Does this mean that there has been no movement in trying to find an agreeable international solution to the subsidy war that has led to the devastatingly depressed prices for grain in the international market? Is Mr. Crosbie now admitting that they have made absolutely no progress in trying to correct this disastrous situation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it appears that the European Community countries were unable to agree on their position internally until mid-November. At that time they put forward a proposal which we discussed in a general way here in Question Period several days ago. The proposal, in the view of Canada and other countries, is quite inadequate. As I recall, it provided for a gradual decrease in support of some 30 per cent from a base year, which was very, very high compared to the proposal that we put forward, which called for the elimination of export subsidies and reductions in tariffs, and quite severe cuts in trade-distorting subsidies internally.

• (1410)

Compared to those proposals, the European Community's position is regarded as inadequate, and indeed their posture as inflexible. Mr. Crosbie has said what I think most observers agree to be the case, that without some agreement on agriculture the round itself is in peril of failure.

Some progress, I think, had been made on such matters as a dispute settlement mechanism. There was rather less progress on intellectual property and services. However, the big hang-up is agriculture. The fateful day is the Brussels meeting in early December when some decision will have to be taken as to the future of the round.

What more can I say? The round itself is in grave peril unless the countries decide to take what little they can get in the agricultural field and elsewhere and call it a day. However, it will not have been a very successful round.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my question was somewhat more specific than the general round, although I am sure a lot of Canadians are interested in the whole.

As I recall it, the European Community offered about a 30 per cent reduction in subsidies during the 1990s. I do not have the quotation in front of me, but it seems that Mr. Yeutter, speaking for the United States, simply rejected that out of hand. It was not satisfactory for the United States to even consider withdrawing certain rules they have, and financing to support those rules, for the export of a number of agricultural products, particularly grain.

As I have said, my question was somewhat more specific. Is there not some other action the Canadian government is taking in trying to resolve these severely-depressed prices for grain? In other words, if this round fails, which as Mr. Crosbie says, appears likely, then grain producers in this country have nothing to look for in the government's efforts to resolve this subsidy war, which is causing the Canadian Wheat Board to lower prices as much as to meet the competition. The United States, for example, because it has a bigger treasury, can borrow more than we are able to do, and it can pass that around to its producers. It seems that we are now down to one single action. Either we get some success in agricultural subsidy reduction from this round or the grain producers will continue to be faced with the kind of disastrous situation that they have been facing for the last two years.

I just hope the minister can give us some encouragement that the government is trying to do something else.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows that we are trying to do many other things. We were instrumental in putting agriculture at the very top of the agenda for the Uruguay Round, where it belongs. As I said, unless the impasse on agriculture can be resolved, the Uruguay Round will not have been successful. However, the honourable senator knows full well that we are not idle in the bilateral context either.

Further to that, we played a leadership role in the Cairns Group, as the honourable senator knows, and the Prime Minister himself brought the question of the subsidy wars to the top of the agenda of the meeting of the Group of 7. We are active on a great number of fronts in trying to solve this problem. The immediate challenge is to get a long-term solution at the Uruguay Round where our efforts are being deployed.

EFFECT OF UNITED STATES POLICIES ON CANADIAN PRODUCERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, this is fairly frustrating since everything that the minister has said is being done is a failure. We have had examples of that before. I do not think the minister should hold up as great efforts things that his own ministers are now saying will fail, such as the Cairns Group and all its efforts, as well as getting the matter to the top of the agenda, when the consideration of the agenda is a failure. That does not raise a great deal of hope.

I should like to ask the minister even more specifically about what kind of answers we are getting from the United States, particularly from Mr. Yeutter, concerning the devastation that its policies are causing Canadian producers. It has gone on for so long. The minister has said that we have had so many bankruptcies that they are now on the way down. That is because there are not enough people left to go bankrupt. Those are not comforting thoughts.

I hope that Senator Kelly will not interrupt this discussion. I can tell him, before he does, that this matter is of great importance to the people of Canada from where I come.

Can the minister give us some indication of what type of response we are getting from the United States? There was a time when representatives of the government could talk to the Secretaries and other senior officers of the United States Department of Agriculture, as well as the United States Treasury, and actually get some reasonable responses, especially if something damaging was being done to our producers by them. Can the minister tell us if we are getting any reasonable replies from the United States?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The honourable senator is seeking information additional to that which I have been able to provide this afternoon. I shall make inquiries. I shall ask whether there is further information that is available and I shall bring that into the house at the earliest possible opportunity.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, have we now reached the point at which the minister admits that they have not been doing anything?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Olson: That is what he said. All I know is that what we have been doing to date has been a failure.

I know that the minister has not had a great deal of time to go to many cabinet meetings as of late. Surely, he knows whether there has been anything done besides totally relying on whether or not the Uruguay Round and the Cairns Group input into that round were going to succeed. We now come to the point in time where the minister responsible for all these matters says that it looks like that will fail. Do we now have to go to search for something else to do? Has not anything else been done along the way?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is seeking quite detailed information, including information on the content of discussions between Canadian ministers and officials and their United States counterparts. I do not have that kind of information before me. I would have to make inquiries and I have already under taken to do so.

• (1420)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, let us put aside the details for now. Can the honourable senator tell me whether or not serious discussions have been underway directly with United States senior officials?

Senator Murray: I think I can give the honourable senator that assurance.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL TRADE ORGANIZATION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. What progress has the government made in its initiative, which I think is a very useful and constructive one, to discuss with our trading partners the formulation of an international trading organization?

Senator Murray may recall that part of the original arrangement at the beginning of the post-war era was the Havana Charter. It was a parallel charter to one of monetary reform, and it led to the GATT arrangement. I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs has put forth a very interesting idea, and I wonder whether, as one of the alternatives to the possible failure of the Uruguay Round, the world might be interested in the negotiation of an institutional system to carry out these negotiations within the context of the institution, rather than within these ad hoc rounds that have been taking place and have been successful up until the world trade community reached this quite intractable agriculture issue?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the Minister for International Trade, the Honourable John Crosbie, made some comments on that matter some time ago. I do not have them before me. I would have to ask him for a report on what progress, if any, has been made along those lines in the discussions at Geneva or elsewhere.

MEXICO

TRILATERAL TRADE ARRANGEMENT—COMMENTS BY MEXICAN AMBASSADOR TO CANADA—ATTITUDE OF CANADIANS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, to continue in this vein of international trade policy, another initiative, if that is the right word, which the government has undertaken is to agree to negotiate the terms for a trilateral trade arrangement among the United States, Mexico and Canada. I wonder whether the minister can tell us what the government's policy reasons are for bringing us into those negotiations.

I should tell honourable senators, by way of explanation, that the Mexican ambassador has in the past two days chided—and I think that word is fair—Canadians for their rather negative and defensive attitude toward entering into this possible negotiation. The ambassador said in a public speech that all he sees in the attitude of the government and the business community of Canada is a sort of defensive position, that Canada had better be there in case more harm is done to us than would otherwise be the case.

I think that the Government of Mexico has a point to make in saying that if Canada feels entitled to be present, it should have a positive attitude toward a new relationship and a concept of development of the North American region.

I wonder if the government leader can give us some guidance on government policy. I would like it to be clear to honourable senators that I am in no way reflecting a negative attitude towards the potential for value to Canada in these negotiations which may be ahead of us. I am eagerly seeking information at this stage.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I appreciate the position taken by the honourable senator. I too read at least a media account of the speech made by the Mexican Ambassador to Canada. His criticism of the Canadian business community seemed to be that it was excessively preoccupied with protecting its share of the United States market in these trilateral discussions and that what they should be looking at is the fact that Mexico represents a market of, I believe he said, 86 million people with rising incomes and, therefore, considerable opportunity for Canadian exporters. That is the point that the Mexican Ambassador made, and it seems to make sense. That is the view that Canada is taking in these consultations. For the moment, they are consultations among Canada, the United States and Mexico with a view to establishing a basis for a trilateral negotiation with the objective of a three-way free trade agreement.

• (1430)

The first consultations were held in October, I believe in Houston, and further consultations were held at a senior official level this week in Washington.

Senator Austin: What I am asking for, honourable senators, is guidance with respect to the Canadian criteria. I do not mean the Canadian negotiating points specifically, but a set of goals which is the policy of the government, what it is that we would hope to achieve, and why those things are desirable for Canada. I have read all of Minister Crosbie's statements and, of course, they are couched in very general and cautious terms. There is not much guidance yet.

Senator Murray: That is a fair question, but I want to emphasize that our position going into these talks is not a defensive one. It is, I know, a more aggressive position on the part of Canada, recognizing the importance of the Mexican market and recognizing also the importance to the world of lowering barriers to trade and investment around the world.

I may say that Mr. Crosbie will be meeting later this week or early next week in Houston with his United States and Mexican counterparts.

APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF NEGOTIATOR

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary. I may have missed this, but has Canada named a chief negotiator for these particular negotiations or is it anticipated that we will be doing so soon?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators. The current discussions are described as consultations, with a view to laying the basis for negotiations that would lead to a three-way free trade area, and while there have been ministerial meetings involving Mr. Crosbie in particular, we have been represented in the official discussion by a senior bureaucrat, Mr. Don Campbell, a deputy minister in the Department of External Affairs and International Trade.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

GOVERNMENT PLAN FOR EARLY PASSAGE—ROLE OF SPEAKER

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader. I have been watching the minister on TV and in the media lately, and he is very confident that the GST will be passed early, within the next week or two. I have also heard the Minister of Finance say the same thing. Mr. Jelinek has said there is a committee of cabinet of some kind to prepare a plan and that the plan will be implemented. We all know that the only way that plan could be implemented would be if the Speaker agreed to it. I should like to ask the minister if there have been any discussions that included the Speaker of the Senate on any arrangements that may be used to get the GST through the Senate.

senators, I dealt with some questions on this matter the other day. No one, to my knowledge—certainly not I nor any minister—has stated that Bill C-62 would be disposed of in the Senate by a particular date. Mr. Wilson and I have expressed our confidence that the Senate will have dealt with the bill—indeed will have passed the bill—in good time for it to be implemented on January 1, 1991.

Senator Lucier: That is fine, but that does not come close to answering the question. I never suggested that you had agreed on a particular date. I am saying that both you and Mr. Wilson have been very confident that the bill will go through very soon, and I do not think there was any doubt about that. There were also statements by Mr. Jelinek that there was a group in cabinet assigned the task of putting together a plan to get the GST passed early. We all know that that cannot be done without the complicity of the Speaker. We know the rules of the Senate. You know the rules of the Senate. You know that there are no time limits, and you also know that if the rules of the Senate are followed you cannot pass this quickly. Since you seem to be so confident that the bill will be passed quickly, I should like to know if there have been any discussions with the Speaker. Has the Speaker been part of any negotiations that will be used at a later date to try to get the GST through the Senate?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, the answer to the last part of the question, of course, is no. Why should I not be confident that Bill C-62 would be disposed of in good time by the Senate? We came back here on September 25 and the Senate has been preoccupied almost exclusively with that one issue ever since. The third reading debate has been going on now for two and a half weeks or more, which is extraordinary if not unprecedented. We have disposed of seven amendments at third reading stage, again an unprecedented number of amendments at third reading. The vote on the eighth amendment takes place this evening. I do not know what my honourable friend is suggesting here when he says that within the rules we cannot dispose of Bill C-62. Assuming that the eighth amendment is disposed of this evening, the question becomes: Shall the bill be read a third time? That is not a debate which, in our parliamentary system, goes on forever. If the honourable senator is suggesting that the right of the Opposition to filibuster or to delay is unlimited, then Parliament really has a problem.

Senator Lucier: I recall, about the first week in October, hearing the Minister of Finance say on TV, "We will have this through next week. I just talked to Mike Duffy and we are going to have it through next week." It seems to me that the fact that we have been a long time on third reading—as you say an unprecedented time—might give you a clue that you may not be as close to having it passed as you think you are. I am asking, since you think there is going to be something done to help you pass the GST: Have any negotiations taken place with the Speaker? You have said no. I accept that part of your answer.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, following on Senator Lucier's question, and Senator Murray's response, that after the eight amendments he would go directly to move the previous question, it seems to me that it ignores the point that was made by Senator Waters yesterday, that he intended to introduce an amendment on the conclusion on the eighth amendment vote. I also want to advise honourable senators that it is my intention, on the conclusion of Senator Waters' amendment, to seek recognition from the Speaker for the purpose of introducing an amendment. I hope that has not been overlooked.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what I said was that when any amendment is disposed of, the question then before the house is the main motion, and that is a fact of parliamentary procedure and practice. I think my friends, Senators Lawson and Waters, know that so far as the government is concerned, and so far as senators on this side are concerned, we are quite prepared and are quite happy to provide the same opportunity to independent senators as was provided to Liberal senators, namely the opportunity, within a certain time frame, to propose amendments and have a vote.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: If my honourable friends are surprised, I can only say I am surprised they are surprised.

Senator Gigantès: We are surprised you are surprised!

Senator Murray: I think Senator Lawson and Senator Waters know that is the position of the government. We were prepared to have a house order—because it would take a house order—along the same lines as that passed here a few weeks ago which would give our independent senators the same opportunity the Liberal senators had.

Senator Bonnell: Does that mean eight amendments?

Senator Murray: No. I think they also know that there is no interest on the other side in voting for or in facilitating such a house order.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hear someone saying "Shame!"—shame that we would not support or try to persuade these independent senators to accept a limited number of amendments when we assume they heard what happened to our amendments.

Senator Olson: They were just ignored!

Senator Frith: They were absolutely ignored. It was purely mechanical. Automatons stood up and defeated them all. So is it any surprise to the leader that the independents might think they might not want to make the kind of deal we made, considering the results?

Senator Murray: I can only say—

An Hon. Senator: Trained seals!

Senator Murray: —that I think the independent senators are capable of speaking for themselves. The proposal I have made, so far as I am concerned, is still on the table.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: I would like some clarification.

Senator Frith: That is what you will get if you make any deal.

Hon. Stan Waters: Senator Murray, I would like to draw your attention to the interview you had with Don Newman of Newsday about a month ago in which he asked you this very question:

> Are you concerned that some of the independent Senators, and Senator MacEachen mentioned Senator Waters from Alberta, and I suppose he's a good one to think of in connection with the GST, that they may try also to move amendments, or has this been precluded, in your view, by the agreement?
> Senator Murray: No, no. There are six independent Senators, and no agreement that the leader of the Opposition and I could make is going to bind people who are not in either of our caucuses. Of those six independents, only two have declared themselves as being against the GST. So those two Senators will have an opportunity to move an amendment each—that is what the rules provide here. They can't filibuster forever, but there will be an opportunity for an amendment or two if there are two Senators opposed to it. But this won't go on forever, and I wouldn't want to prevent them from exercising their democratic right in an orderly, Parliamentary debate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: That, I think the honourable senators know, is exactly what we were trying to accomplish in discussions that were held earlier this week. We wanted to give the honourable senators the same opportunity that Liberal senators had, each to move an amendment and to have those amendments debated and voted on in a package of time. That is what I meant by an orderly debate.

Senator Frith: Oh, I see!

Senator Perrault: Oh, oh!

Senator Lucier: Here go the rules! Here go the rules!

Senator Murray: My friends opposite do not like the way it turned out, but they agreed to it. I think it was an orderly debate.

Senator Olson: It was a useless debate!

Senator Murray: They had the opportunity that honourable senators and members of Parliament seek in any debate, which is to put forward their point of view, in some cases to put forward their alternatives, and try to persuade other senators and public opinion of their position concerning the GST and their amendments. As the honourable senators know, from discussions that were held with several of my colleagues, that is what we were trying to accomplish by those discussions. It is to be regretted that Liberal senators will not facilitate what we are trying to do.

Senator Frith: Limiting their debate! We certainly will not facilitate limiting their debate.

Senator Waters: Honourable senators, at the risk of being repetitious, Senator Murray said that he was not going to bind people who were not in either caucus. I took great comfort from that remark, and I assumed that we would be operating under the old Rules of the Senate, and that Senator Lawson and I would not be constrained by any agreement you made with the other caucus.

Senator Frith: Well said, sir!

Senator Murray: The Senate operated under the provisional rules for the eight, and I certainly did not have in mind doing anything but negotiating a similar arrangement with our friends who are independent senators. I think it is a perfectly reasonable position for us to take; and, for the life of me, I cannot understand why our friends opposite will not accept it, unless, of course, they want to use independent senators to carry on an endless filibuster.

Senator Frith: Why would we limit them? Why in God's name would we want to limit them?

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, in fairness to Senator Murray, what he says is true. There have been discussions with some of his colleagues, representing the government, and Senator Waters and myself about time limits. We met again yesterday, and it was left that a representative of the government would speak with representatives of the Opposition to determine if something could be worked out, and they would then get back to us. No one has come back to Senator Waters or myself, and the first response we heard, other than what the government leader ahas just said, is that no arrangement has been worked out. So we simply assumed, and are proceeding on the basis, as Senator Waters just described, that we are operating under the rules of the chamber and will be entitled, as Senator Murray was quoted as saying by Senator Waters, to offer our amendments under the Rules of the Senate. We are proceeding on that basis.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy leader of the Opposition): You can officially assume that we will not do anything to limit your debate and your amendment powers. You can assume that as being officially on the record.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, inquiries were made of independent senators and of Liberal senators, and I think I can state, on behalf of Senator Doody and myself, that we were not able to elicit much interest or to reach an agreement with the Liberals on the matter of a house order, which would facilitate an amendment from Senator Lawson and Senator Waters.

Senator Frith: "Limit" is the word, not "facilitating".

Senator Murray: It is facilitating the business of the Senate. I suppose we will be getting into this later on this afternoon or early this evening, and I want to remind everyone that the provisional house order provides that no motion for the previous question would be receivable until after the eight amendments from the Liberal Party had been disposed of. Therefore, it is clear that a motion for the previous question is receivable after the eighth amendment has been disposed of. This matter can be discussed in the usual channels now, if honourable senators are interested. I was interested in facilitating an opportunity for Senator Waters and Senator Lawson to move their amendments along the same lines that my friends opposite had.

An Hon. Senator: They have that right!

Senator Murray: Yes, they have a right, but I also have a right, after eight amendments, to move the previous question.

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: You want to choke them off!

Senator Olson: You have no right!

Senator Murray: I beg your pardon? Read the rules. We will discuss this matter this evening, but the rules are clear.

Senator Barootes: The Liberals would not cooperate!

Senator Frith: We refuse to cooperate in choking them off!

Senator Barootes: Muzzle them!

• (1440)

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, let us be perfectly clear on what Senator Murray has just said. He has said that unless the independents agree to a time limit, which is not in the rule book, then they are going to be prevented from doing what they have a right to do under the rule, which gives them the right to move an amendment.

Unless they agree to a time limit, which I presume is six hours because that is all we had on each amendment, the government leader is going to move the previous question before they move their amendments. Is that what you said?

Senator Murray: The Honourable Senator Olson can save his synthetic indignation for later. I think it fair to say that we were embarked on what I consider quite constructive discussions with the independent senators. It is the failure of my friends opposite to cooperate which has led us to this.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: You publicly stated that nothing bound them.

Senator Waters: I have two questions arising from that.

First, are you suggesting that either by accident or design no consideration was given to the rights of independent senators when the original house order was made?

Second, are you now saying that in the absence of an agreement between the government and the Official Opposition to limit the debate we will be stripped of our rights? Is that what you are now saying?

Senator Frith: That is what he is saying.

Senator Barootes: The Liberals are stripping your rights.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this is a matter for debate later this afternoon. However, I can tell the honourable senator first of all that the house order was negotiated among four senators representing the government and the Official Opposition. Independent senators were present the day the order was passed and had an opportunity to express their views. There is nothing unusual about that. There are independent members of Parliament in the House of Commons who do not participate in inter-party negotiations in that place.

I think it is also fair to observe, although it is perhaps of no satisfaction to Senator Lawson or Senator Waters at this stage, that it was open to them to take part in the debate at the report stage and on any of the seven amendments, and within the same time frame to have moved subamendments.

My only point in asking some of my colleagues here to meet with independent senators was to arrange the business of the house in the same way it had been arranged for the previous eight amendments. We would then have a package of time available to independent senators to move their amendments. That does take a house order. Without a house order I do have the right—it is in the rules and is confirmed in the provisional house order—to move the previous question.

I still would like to see some negotiations take place on this matter. I prefer an orderly debate, as I have said, and I remain prepared to facilitate the presentation of amendments by independent senators.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Did the Leader of the Government authorize members opposite to discuss these matters with the other independent senators who are not present today?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what I got from the question is a reference to the four independent senators who are not here. To the best of my knowledge we have contacted or certainly tried to contact all of the others with regard to possible amendments.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Could you tell us what their position is on the question of amendments?

Senator Murray: Subject to confirmation, my understanding is that there are only two independent senators who wish to present amendments.

Senator Grafstein: That was not my question. Did you contact them with respect to the rules applying to independent senators regarding amendments? It may very well be that they choose not to move an amendment themselves, but they may have views about the role of independent senators and the rights of other independent senators to present amendments. That is my question.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, they have views on a number of things and they have, including Senator Pitfield, expressed those views in the course of this debate. Again, my objective in this matter, since we will be, and have been, dealing with Bill C-62, is to facilitate amendments from those independent senators, whoever they are, who wish to present amendments.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: The Leader of the Government in the Senate gave an interview a couple of days ago in which he sounded every bit the ultimate democrat. He said that all members would be allowed to speak in this debate, that there would be no limits. I hope he has not changed his mind.

[Editor's Note: At this point the honourable senator played a tape recording.]

There is a tape in which you said "We will just sit and wait them out." There is no restriction on their freedom. This is the exact tape that you recorded with the CBC. Are you changing your views today? You are hedging in your commitment very carefully to make certain you can get that vote exactly when you want it. However, you are on tape and we can replay it any time.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, whatever else that sound was, it did not sound like me.

Senator Perrault: That was your voice.

Senator Frith: You were ice skating but the ice broke.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in response to a question by Senator Lucier, stated that the Speaker would not be involved in negotiations, or he was not involved.

I would like to ask the leader if he would give members of this house the assurance that he will not impose on the Speaker, like he did previously, a ruling that does not exist in the rule book?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I imposed nothing. The advice I gave to Mr. Speaker, or anyone else, with regard to a resolution of the problem that existed at the time was given in the foyer to the national media. That was my advice. If it is asked for again in that context and that forum, I shall continue to express my opinions freely.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Before I ask my question, I would like to pass on a little advice that would be given to someone starting out as a salesman. It was always to tell the truth and then one never had to try to remember what one said. The leader of the government was obviously having a little difficulty remembering what he said in all of these interviews he gave.

I understand clearly what you are saying to the independent senators, and that is: "Knuckle under or we will muzzle you." Is that not what you are telling them?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am saying that I want to give the independent senators—and I think we were having some quite constructive discussions along these lines—the same opportunity that my friends opposite had with regard to moving the amendments.

Senator Olson: Eight amendments? Each?

Senator Murray: Hardly. I think the rules provide that they are entitled to one amendment each. I think they are quite capable of speaking for themselves, and we will be into this matter a bit later in the afternoon.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, a few minutes ago the Honourable Senator Lawson read an extract from a newspaper interview the honourable leader of the government gave in which he said that the independent senators would be allowed to present amendments, but that he would not want the debate to last forever. I wonder if the government leader would define that term for us a little more narrowly? Is it six hours and three minutes or something less, or something considerably more?

• (1450)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that, like all these matters, is a question for discussion and negotiation among the parties. Again, I deplore and regret the fact that my friends opposite have not been willing to embark upon those discussions in a constructive way.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED CAVENDISH PLANT IN NEW BRUNSWICK—PROVISION OF FUNDS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to move on to big potatoes. It was reported in Maclean's on November 12, 1990, not to mention in a multitude of other media, including radio, television and newspapers, especially in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, that Ottawa and New Brunswick had agreed to provide a new Cavendish plant with $14.5 million for pollution control equipment; a $10.5 million investment tax credit; and $4 million in funding for employee training for the proposed new Cavendish Farms Plant at Grand Falls, New Brunswick. That firm also has a big potato plant on the island. In Grand Falls it is moving across the road from McCain Foods.

The question I wish to put to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Has this assistance program been approved formally by the government? If so, by which agency? I assume it would be ACOA and probably some other departments. If it has been approved, has it been announced? If it has not been announced, is it still being negotiated? When can we expect a formal announcement by the federal government on its participation in this deal?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, like the honourable senator, I was following some of this through the media for some time. However, I am really not very up to date with my information. I am interested in having the answers to the same questions, and I shall inquire and report back.

Senator Corbin: If the honourable government leader finds specific answers to my specific questions soon, I shall greatly appreciate it.

Senator Murray: That should not be difficult, honourable senators.

THE CONSTITUTION

APPOINTMENT OF EIGHT SENATORS— EFFECT ON COMPOSITION OF REPRESENTATION IN HOUSE OF COMMONS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On November 20, 1990, Mr. Justice Stevenson of the Queen's Bench of New Brunswick came down with his decision respecting an application made dealing with the constitutionality of the appointment of the eight senators and the consequent composition of the other place.

As the Leader of the Government will know, we presented in this place a notice of motion which was to be dealt with probably later today. However, in advance of that matter being dealt with, perhaps I might ask the Leader of the Government some questions, since we have now been advised—and I am refering to information given in the other place—that the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, in response to a question asked by the Hon. Herb Gray, advised that she, on behalf of the Government of Canada, will be appealing the decision of the New Brunswick court because, as was reported in Hansard of the other place, "We do not agree on the implications of section 26."

The Leader of the Government in the Senate will recall that on or before—and certainly following—the appointment of the eight senators, we on this side of the house asked that the government spare the provinces and individuals expense and confusion by having a reference on the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada with the consent of the Attorney General of Canada. In light of the circumstances and the commitment of the government to appeal the New Brunswick decision, would the government agree now to take a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada so that the uncertainty surrounding not just the position of senators but the composition of Parliament could be dealt with quickly?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, both the Ontario and New Brunswick judgments confirm the validity of the appointment of the eight senators under section 26. As I understand it, in Ontario the other party has launched an appeal. In New Brunswick, that aspect of the judgment which was contrary to the Ontario decision, that having to do with the representation of New Brunswick in the House of Commons, is being appealed by the Attorney General of Canada.

I understand there is also a case relating to this matter in general coming up in the Supreme Court of British Columbia within the next few weeks.

I would have to ask the Attorney General for a statement as to Senator Grafstein's suggestion that the federal government ought to try to deal with the matter by way of a unilateral reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Grafstein: My suggestion is not that there be a unilateral reference, but that there be a reference with the consent of the various parties concerned in order that the terms be agreed upon and so that the lower courts can be leapfrogged and the matter taken directly to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Had the government followed the suggestions presented by senators on this side of the house earlier this fall the matter would already have been dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada. Thus, the uncertainty which I think is increasing in the country would have been settled by Christmas. As it now turns out, if these appeals work their way up through the courts, then, under the present situation, there will be uncertainty in at least two provinces. If there is a different decision handed down in British Columbia, that would make a third case of uncertainty. This will heighten the uncertainty, which means that these matters will not be dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada until the middle of next year at the earliest. In the meantime, I think there is a serious cloud of uncertainty over the deliberations of not just this place but also the other place in terms of important measures which have been and are anticipated to be passed by the government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not agree that uncertainty is increasing. With regard to the essential question—that is, the validity of the eight appointments under section 26—certainty is increasing since both the judgments of Ontario and New Brunswick were without ambiguity whatsoever. They very clearly confirm the validity of the appointments under section 26. I think that is the essential question.

However, my friend has raised some finer legal points on this matter. I would not try to answer them without taking counsel and without asking for a report from the Honourable Kim Campbell.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: For the information of senators opposite, and in particular for the information of the Leader of the Government, we were told, when we raised this issue with the government, that it was a simple matter which could be dealt with expeditiously. Indeed, senators who are experts in constitutional law opined that such was the case. The Attorney General of Canada, in representations to the courts of Ontario and New Brunswick indicated that this was a serious and important matter with obvious widespread constitutional ramifications and therefore should be considered seriously.

My concern is that the decision of the New Brunswick court is absolutely silent on the question of the validity of legislation passed by Parliament in the period of time since the appointment of the eight senators. There is absolutely nothing in Mr. Justice Stevenson's decision, as I read it, to indicate that he was asked to rule on the validity of legislation in the other place and, therefore, the effect on Parliament during this period when the other place is not properly constituted. So there is a question of uncertainty since the judgment of Mr. Justice Stevenson is silent on that point, and I assume that it is silent because he was not asked that question.

• (1500)

It strikes me that the government has increased the uncertainty by not moving, with the consent of the applicants, to the Supreme Court of Canada so that the questions may be properly framed to finally put to bed this heightened uncertainty.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with the greatest respect for my friend, who is a lawyer—and I am not—it is extremely far-fetched to suggest that there is anything in Mr. Justice Stevenson's judgment that in any way casts the slightest doubt on whether Parliament is properly constituted or whether the laws as passed by Parliament are valid. One need only read the way in which he approached the subject of the right of New Brunswick, as he found it, to an eleventh Member of Parliament to see that that is the case. The Justice called on the government to make arrangements to create an eleventh MP for New Brunswick, and that is where he left off. The fact that he was silent about the validity of laws passed by Parliament and about whether Parliament is properly constituted should not, it seems to me, be interpreted as meaning there was any question remaining on that matter.

However, as I have said, my honourable friend has raised some fine legal points, and I shall ask the Honourable Kim Campbell to make whatever comments she thinks are proper and appropriate to the matter.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have one other matter that I should bring to your attention, since the independent senator has raised a question concerning the eight senators. It says at page 17 of the decision of Mr. Justice Stevenson of the Court of Queen's Bench of New Brunswick, which was given on November 20:

> If Parliament fails to promptly devise a method of creating and filling an eleventh seat, the court could be asked to do so.

That is a pretty strong statement, certainly as strong a statement as I have read in decisions directing Parliament and, in effect, the government to take the initiative to proceed promptly.

Senator Frith: Or the court will do it.

Senator Murray: Or the court will be asked to do it.

Senator Grafstein: Mr. Justice Stevenson says, "the court could be asked to do so."

Senator Frith: It means that he would assume jurisdiction.

Senator Grafstein: The decision goes on to say:

> While the court cannot tell Parliament what to do, it is the guardian of the constitutional rights of citizens and will, if necessary, find a way to ensure that those rights are observed.

That is as staunch, strong and powerful a statement as has ever been given by any high court to Parliament.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that statement does not cast any doubt whatever on whether Parliament, the House of Commons or the Senate, is properly constituted; nor does it cast any doubt whatever on the validity of the laws passed by Parliament, which was the point my honourable friend was pursuing earlier.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, if one even agrees with the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the decision of Mr. Justice Stevenson is silent and therefore that there is no impropriety or unconstitutionality or ultra vires with respect to legislation passed since the eight appointments—and I do not—certainly the question of unconstitutionality or impropriety comes up if Parliament fails to follow a directive of the court which says, "If Parliament fails to promptly devise a method of creating and filling an eleventh seat . . ." In effect the Minister of Justice has said to Parliament, "We are not going to move; we are going to appeal." Certainly, during the period of appeal, the government runs a terrible risk that having received, in effect, a directive from the courts its legislation may not be properly constituted. What happens if the appeal is not granted, say six months hence? What happens with legislation passed by Parliament from November 20, 1990, onward, laying aside the legislation that may be called into question from the date of the appointment of the eight senators? Is it not a terrible risk the government is running?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is a wonderful advocate and if I am ever in a really tight corner, I shall retain him.

Senator Olson: Try answering the question.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Like the Leader of the Government, I am not a lawyer either, but I shall try to ask my question in such a way that he will find it harder to duck away from it by using the argument that he is not a lawyer. My question picks up on the point just made by Senator Grafstein. If honourable senators will read the judgment of Mr. Justice Stevenson, in layman's terms he is essentially making the following point: First he makes the point that New Brunswick is entitled to an extra member of Parliament. He then goes on, by quoting the relevant sections of the Representation Act, 1986, to make it very clear as to why New Brunswick is entitled to an additional member.

My first question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate addresses his comment of a minute ago, that there is no question about the legitimacy or constitutionality of the House of Commons. If, in fact, as Judge Stevenson has ruled, New Brunswick is entitled to one additional MP, and if that MP is elected, it is very clear that at that point all the other provinces are in violation of the Representation Act. Let us apply the formula of that act by which MPs are assigned. You can trust my mathematics if you wish. On the basis of that formula, and that New Brunswick is entitled to one additional Member of Parliament, every province, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, gets additional seats. In fact, the total number of MPs in the House of Commons would increase from its current level of 295 to 373.

Senator Frith: Three hundred and seventy-three?

Senator Simard: Question?

Senator Kirby: Yes, 373.

Senator Simard: Come to the question.

Senator Kirby: I will be delighted to do so. My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Does he agree that under the circumstances I have described, that the constitutionality of the House of Commons is clearly in doubt. If one accepts that, New Brunswick is entitled to one additional MP.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Grafstein referred to exchanges in the House of Commons between the Minister of Justice and various members of that House in which she made the statement that there is no question as to whether the House of Commons is properly constituted. I have not heard from anyone, until this moment, the rather fascinating argument that Senator Kirby has made, but, there again, I would have to ask for a comment from the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada on that matter. He is suggesting that we are in contravention of the Representation Act if Justice Stevenson's decision is upheld and the extra seat is created for New Brunswick. There are a number of hypotheses there, to begin with, and I would like someone in the Department of Justice to take a close look at them before I reply.

● (1510)

Senator Kirby: I would suggest to the government leader in the Senate that my argument is not very sophisticated. It merely says that, if the House of Commons is based on proportional representation, and if you change the number of members from one province, you clearly, by anyone's mathematics, have skewed the proportional representation. You have to adjust all other provinces proportionately. That is all I did, using the stated formula. So it seems to me that you cannot arbitrarily add or subtract MPs from one province without adjusting the others. That is exactly what the Representation Act says, and the Constitution says you cannot do that.

Whether or not the government leader in the Senate accepts my argument, it is clear that there is an element of uncertainty now surrounding the constitutionality of Parliament as a whole, taken as two chambers, the House of Commons and the Senate. It is also clear, in a number of legal minds and people I have talked to since Judge Stevenson's judgment came out, that some element of uncertainty is raised as to the ultimate legality of legislation passed by a Parliament which is no longer properly constituted. In light of that uncertainty, all that we on this side are asking the government to do is to eliminate that uncertainty by expediting this case to the Supreme Court of Canada, since it is going to go there anyway, rather than risking a situation in which a substantial number of bills get passed and then the Supreme Court rules that, in fact, Parliament was not properly constituted and, therefore, the legislation is not legal. I would like the government leader in the Senate to explain why the government is so afraid to take this issue to the Supreme Court and why it will not, in fact, deal with it?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are in court. We are appealing the decision of Mr. Justice Stevenson at the Court of Appeal of New Brunswick. The Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada has stated, on her responsibility in the other place, that there is no question at all but that Parliament is properly constituted. Therefore, there is no question in the minds of the government insofar as the validity of legislation passed by this Parliament is concerned. Having said that, if there are additional points that Ms. Campbell should make by way of comment or response to the questions raised by Senator Grafstein and Senator Kirby, I will invite her to do so at an early date.

[Senator Kirby.]

Senator Kirby: I should point out to the government leader in the Senate that he is asking us to accept or to believe a statement from the Minister of Justice when this same Minister of Justice told us, for example, when the eight senators were appointed, that they were appointed as regional senators and that they did not represent a province. Both statements have been repudiated by judges in Ontario and New Brunswick. Given the fact that many of the previous statements made on this issue by the Minister of Justice have been shown to be wrong by judges in the Supreme Court of two separate provinces, I ask the leader why we should accept the glib and simple statement from the Minister of Justice that Parliament is properly constituted?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the essential point that has been adjudicated in the cases in Ontario and New Brunswick has been the validity of the appointments of the eight senators under Section 26, and I, as a layman, put the judicial score now at federal government two and Liberal senators zero.

Senator Simard: Right on!

Senator Frith: But we are only half way through the first period.

Senator Kirby: Since the Leader of the Government believes he won the New Brunswick case, may I ask why the federal government is appealing? This is the first time I have heard of the winner of a case appealing the judgment. Would you please explain to us why you are appealing, if you think you won the case?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is one aspect of the decision, having to do with the House of Commons, where we feel, with respect, that Mr. Justice Stevenson is in error and the decision should be appealed, and we are doing so. However, again, he is absolutely unambiguous and categorical in stating that Senator Ross, and by extension the other seven senators appointed under Section 26, were properly and validly appointed.

Senator Kirby: Just so we are clear, honourable senators, since Senator Murray made a comment a minute ago about extending the principle from Senator Ross to the other seven, let me point out that there are two totally separate legal questions. One is whether the New Brunswick appointment is, in fact, constitutional, and the second is whether the process by which all eight were appointed is constitutional. They are two separate questions, and as Senator Murray knows, courts and judges are proceeding to deal with the second question. One cannot conclude, on the basis of the two judgments that have been rendered, that all eight are, in fact, constitutional appointments.

However, I should like to make one final point to Senator Murray. He should look at the experience of the federal Parliament with respect to constitutional issues being challenged, and the historical precedents in circumstances where the federal government lost a case and decided to appeal. For example, when an attempt was made to repatriate the constitution in 1980 and 1981, the federal government ceased and desisted. It stopped taking any action whatsoever with respect to that constitutional resolution and said it would wait until the Supreme Court had ruled. In light of the fact that the federal government is appealing the New Brunswick decision, and in light of the fact that that decision clearly deals with the question of the legitimacy and constitutionality of the House of Commons, why is the government not following the precedent which has been so clearly established in the past? Under circumstances where a Supreme Court judge in one of the provinces has ruled in a way that the federal government does not regard as acceptable and is therefore appealing, why is the government not ceasing action on Bill C-62 and taking the issue directly to the Supreme Court of Canada, as has happened every other time in Canadian history that the federal government has been left in a position where it lost a court case?

Senator Murray: I am aware, of course, of the precedent of 1981-82. I do not know that that has been the course that has always been followed. Whether it has or has not, the logic of the honourable senator would indicate that we should shut the whole place down because we are appealing one particular aspect of a decision which, frankly, in its essence, was favourable to the federal government's case.

Senator Kirby: Senator Murray knows very well that, when Royal Assent takes place, the reason that the House of Commons comes to the bar of the Senate is that Royal Assent takes place on the clear understanding that both Houses are legally and constitutionally constructed, and that is precisely the issue which comes into doubt as a result of Judge Stevenson's decision. So I ask you again: Why do you not attempt to remove the uncertainty? Clearly, the only answer is that you have to be afraid of the court's answer. The reason you are not going directly to the Supreme Court is because you are going to attempt to jam legislation through in the hope that the court will be afraid to annul legislation that has already passed.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, again, we do not accept the statement that the honourable senator has made to the effect that there is some cloud over Parliament and some question as to whether Parliament is properly constituted—

Senator Bonnell: The judge just told you there was!

Senator Murray: —as a result of that one aspect of a judgment made in the New Brunswick court. We do not accept the senator's contention, for the reasons on which my friend the Minister of Justice and Attorney General may wish to elaborate. Nor do I think it is proper or very fair of the honourable senator, having asked the question as to why we are not making a direct reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, to answer it himself in the most pejorative of terms. I will see if there is a comment or a response that Ms. Campbell wishes to give on that particular question and, if there is, I will bring it in very shortly.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, just one further point on this issue, if I may. To take the logical extension of Senator Kirby's position, is the Leader of the Government and members opposite of the understanding that if, in fact, Mr. Justice Stevenson is correct in requesting an additional seat in New Brunswick, the proportional representation and, indeed, the representation of each of the regions of the country, becomes distorted? The result would be that for Quebec, which has always been very jealous and protective of its representation in the House of Commons, its representation should be increased, not by one, but by in excess of 20, if my calculations are correct. The same applies to my problems. Certainly senators opposite, who have been so zealous in ensuring that their regions are fully and properly represented, should be concerned about the serious cloud on the composition of Parliament.

● (1520)

It strikes me that it is not fair or appropriate for the Leader of the Government in this place to take a cavalier attitude toward this issue, as did members opposite whenever we raised this issue since the session commenced. Now we have a serious cloud that affects not only members opposite, but all members in terms of their regional representation in the House of Commons. If that is out of whack, everything we do here may be called into question. Surely members on both sides, especially Senator Beaudoin and others who are constitutional experts, are as concerned about this particular issue as the courts.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I hardly think it is cavalier of me to undertake, as I have done, to see whether there is an official statement that the chief law officer of the Crown wishes to make in response to the points that have been raised by my friends opposite.

Senator Grafstein: Would the Leader of the Government undertake to keep these issues in question in mind and, at the earliest possible moment, advise this place what the response of the Minister of Justice is to these questions? I think it is important that we have some degree of understanding as quickly as possible as to the government's position.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure that Ms. Campbell will provide me with any statement or information she properly can on those points at this time. Meanwhile, it is only fair to note that she appears daily in the House of Commons for Question Period, where members of Parliament have an opportunity to put these same questions and others to her.

Senator Olson: But we don't! We have to ask you!

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, the minister said several times that the government does not accept the New Brunswick court ruling as it affects the House of Commons. You have been clear on that, and I understand that. Why are you so quick to accept, without reservation, the other part of the ruling of the same court? You seem to be saying that there is absolutely no question about the eight senators, because that is what the New Brunswick court said.

Senator Murray: And the Ontario court, too.

Senator Lucier: Which can still be appealed.

Senator Murray: It is being appealed and so can the New Brunswick decision.

Senator Lucier: What I want to know is why are you so clearly accepting one half of the judgment and not accepting the other half? Why are you going in two different directions? Same court, same judge, two different things.

Senator Hébert: Same answer.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DELAY IN RESPONSE TO QUESTIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has said several times in this most recent exchange that he will bring in a response from the minister at an early date, and it is that aspect I would like to ask him about now. On September 26 I asked a question concerning the events in Oka, which were then in progress. Every day we read more about questions that are being raised as a result of the events this summer. Two days ago I had a response to that question, which was that this question was overtaken by events. It took two months to get a non-response to a question on which a great deal more substance would have been appreciated.

On November 6 I asked a question concerning copyright and the current misunderstandings and anxieties that have been raised by the lack of response on copyright. Yesterday I asked a question about a study for which Professor Michael Porter is being paid $1 million and about the federal contribution to that.

I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us how his response to questions is now being organized. Can I, in particular, expect to get an answer to the copyright question before two months have passed? I am receiving letters on the subject every single day.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I will do my best, honourable senators. The other day I had a box score as to how many questions we had answered and how many remained pending within the hands of various ministers and departments. I think our record is still good, but I appreciate the point the honourable senator has raised about her question on copyright, and I will do my best to get a reply soon. In fact, I will make a special inquiry.

Senator Marsden: I appreciate that. My criticism is not that the questions are not answered, but they take a great deal of time to be answered, and, in some cases, are non-responses.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question along the same lines. On page 3259 of the Senate Debates of October 26, I asked a question relating to oil spills in Canadian waters. My question was:

> Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. A year ago September the Interim Report of the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills Response Capability was issued. The report, as senators will recall, was very critical of Canada's capability to prevent and clean up spills, and there were problems with outdated vessel tracking technology. There was an un-updated and incomplete inventory of Canada's equipment to clean up spills.
> Since the Senate will be discussing Hibernia today, in the chamber, could the Leader of the Government advise us when the final report, which it was announced was due last December, will be forthcoming? Could he explain also why there has been such a long delay in the issuance of that final report.

On November 20, page 3866, Senator Doody replied:

> I have the response to a question raised in the Senate on October 26, 1990, by the Honourable Colin Kenny, regarding The Environment—Oil Spills in Canadian Waters—etcetera. The reply was as follows:

> I wish to table the Interim Report of the Public Review Panel on Tanker Safety and Marine Spills response capability, as requested by the Honourable Senator.

The Interim Report was tabled a year ago. It was in the question I put to you. Thank you. You have tabled it again. The question was: When are you going to table a final report? I thought my question was very clear. The second part of it was: Why is it taking so long? Does anyone read the answers that you table?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yes, usually. I am sorry if there has been a problem with that particular question—or, rather, with the particular answer. I shall make new inquiries of the minister of the department concerned and attempt to satisfy the honourable senator with a proper and complete reply.

Senator Kenny: If you are making inquiries, on September 27 I asked 25 questions on the order paper about terrorism and public safety. On October 3 I asked eight questions about oil spills. On October 4 I asked 25 more questions about conservation and alternative energy research. Do you have any idea when we are likely to receive answers on these questions?

Senator Murray: I shall make inquiries, honourable senators.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

MEMBERS APPOINTED TO THE COUNCIL OF THE GST CONSUMER INFORMATION OFFICE—REMUNERATION AND EXPENSES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I am confused about a document I received on my desk, perhaps this morning, about the GST Consumer Information Office. On the second page it says ten new members were appointed, and that they will assist the chairperson, the vice-chairpersons and the chief executive officer. These people were appointed on June 12, 1990.

I have a series of questions. First, how many members were appointed on June 12, 1990?

PAYMENT FOR ACTIVITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Keith Davey: Obviously there were some. I would like to find that out. Are the ten new members paid for their activity?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Again, honourable senators, I would have to inquire.

Senator Davey: I would like to know if they are paid, how much they are paid and what their travel expenses are.

● (1530)

I am also a little confused. At page 2 it says the office was set up to inform people of the foreseeable impact of the GST on the price of goods and services. Then it says it is an independent organization. On page 1 it says:

> The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Peter Blais, today announced the appointment of ten new members . . .

That does not sound to me like an independent organization. I am merely looking for advice. Is the GST Consumer Information Office an independent organization?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is the intention, but as with all such agencies some minister has to take responsibility before Parliament for them. I will have to inquire as to what the legal authority was for setting up that office and exactly what its relationship is to the Minister and Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, just before we leave Question Period and the question of the court cases and appeals, may I offer a brief, perhaps edifying comment? It is a story about George Walsh, a very famous lawyer in Toronto who eventually became a judge, as did his son, who is still a judge as far as I know.

George Sr. was very famous for quick-witted responses. On one occasion he is reported to have been before the court of appeal in Ontario where he had three appeals in a row. He argued the first appeal and when it was finished the next case was called and he stood up and argued that appeal. The next case was called and he stood up again. One of the judges asked him, "Mr. Walsh, do you appeal all your cases?" to which Mr. Walsh replied, "No, My Lord, only the ones I lose."

CITIZENS' FORUM

TERMS OF REMUNERATION OF CHAIRMAN AND COMMISSIONERS—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on November 7, 1990, by the Honourable George van Roggen, regarding Citizens' Forum—Terms of Remuneration of Chairman and Commissioners—Request for Tabling.

(The answer follows:)

> As I informed honourable senators the other day, Mr. Spicer is paid at the same rate as he was as Chairman of the CRTC—the position from which he has taken leave of absence in order to chair Citizen's Forum.
> I have been informed that the pay range for Mr. Spicer's level—referred to technically as GIC 10—is in the range of $124,400 to $151,300.
> I have also been informed that the other members of the Citizen's Forum panel, whose responsibilities, unlike those of the Chairman, will be part-time, are remunerated on a per diem basis in a range of $450 to $600.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have the response to a question raised in the Senate on November 13, 1990, by the Hon. Raymond J. Perrault, regarding Transcription of Proceedings—Availability to Senate.

(The answer follows:)

> I am informed that there is no official transcript of Mr. Spicer's informal meetings with residents of Tuktoyaktuk and Inuvik.
> I understand that these meetings were primarily intended to inform residents of Tuktoyaktuk and Inuvik about Citizen's Forum, and to give them an opportunity to meet the Chairman. Other meetings, which will be part of the actual Forum dialogue, will follow later.

AGRICULTURE

MAJOR SALE BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—REQUEST FOR DETAILS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Hon. H.A.

Olson, regarding Agriculture— Major Sale by Canadian Wheat Board— Request for Details

(The answer follows:)

As indicated in the response to the honourable senator's question of November 8, 1990, details of sales are not released by the Canadian Wheat Board nor indeed by the government. The only information available on recent Canadian Wheat Board sales consists of an indication by the Board on November 16, 1990 to the effect that several million tonnes of grain were sold to the Soviet Union. The Board has later confirmed that these sales included wheat, durum and barley. No other details are available.

AGRICULTURE

DELIVERY OF INITIAL QUOTAS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to a question raised in the Senate on November 15, 1990, by the Hon. D.G. Steuart, regarding Agriculture—Delivery of Initial Quotas.

(The answer follows:)

Information regarding the percentage of farmers able to deliver their initial quota is not available in that form. The Canadian Wheat Board reports, however, that as of November 21, 1990, approximately 80-85 per cent of the wheat and durum from the initial 1990/91 quota has been delivered and that approximately 55 per cent of the barley from Series A contracts and the A quota have been delivered.
