> In-book promotion costs are assumed to decrease by 3 to 4 %, commensurate with the reduction in the print order. This is because the cost of printing these is half their cost, and there will be at least a 4.5 % decrease in the numbers printed. The cost-per-unit could increase with the shorter print run. A 2.25 % reduction is assigned to fulfillment costs since fixed costs prevent a full 4.5 % decline to parallel the loss of circulation.
> Promotional costs at newsstands, in the media and through special events are assumed to be reduced by 4.5 % in response to the reduction in allocations and sales.
> Newsstand RDA is assumed to decrease by the 9 % decline in newsstand sales. Freight costs will experience a similar decline.
> Although there is a shortening of the print run because of the decrease in volume, we assume that because of substantial fixed costs for set-up and higher per-unit cost, production expenses will decline by 3 to 4 %.
> We assume no change in circulation promotion costs (postage, lists, lettershop and computer costs), since most magazines are already at maximum market saturation.
> All expenses, except for salaries and employee benefits, are considered taxable under the GST. Certain items used by magazines, such as promotional and administrative materials, are currently subject to the FST at 13.5 %. We assume that suppliers will pass any savings on these materials along to the publishers.

They assume. Let us hope that they assume right.

> All services purchased from foreign suppliers are tax-free, but do not give rise to input credits. All goods purchased from foreign suppliers are subject to 9% GST upon importation.
> The government's estimate of a 2.25% increase in inflation as a result of the tax, which is thought much too low by many, has been applied in the model as of January 1991.

So, as you see, they are really Conservatives.

> All expense items are affected, as are revenues from advertising and list rentals. Because of their price sensitivity, the 2.25% cannot be added to subscription and newsstand prices or to ancillary product prices: the publishers will absorb this inflation.

They then discuss the effect on sample magazines.

> We have obtained detailed information of five Canadian magazines that are broadly representive of the industry as a whole. Using the assumptions detailed above, we ran the data through a computer model to determine what the financial impact of the application of the GST would be.
> For each of these publications we give a description of its general nature, give examples of what other Canadian publications have similar editorial content and which have similar circulations, and identify its main U.S. or foreign competitors.

The first example is Canadian Art, with which many of you are, of course, familiar. The circulation is 18,000.

> Description:
> Canadian Art is a national publication with a specialized editorial content. It is generally considered to be irreplaceable in the service it provides to the cultural community. It is representative of small, special-interest publications with low advertising revenues and less than monthly frequency.

Magazines with similar editorial content: Artsatlantic, Applied Arts, Border Crossing.

Magazines with similar circulation but in other domains: Canadian Yachting, Rotunda, Discovery, Wine Tidings, Century Home.

U.S. competition: American Artist, Art & Antiques, Art in America, Art News.

Effect of GST: The profit level declines from a current loss position of minus 5.7 per cent to a loss position of minus 12 per cent. That is what will happen to this irreplaceable Canadian Art. Will it survive? Maybe not, or in order to survive, they will have to get more and bigger grants from the Canada Council.

The next example is Canadian Business with a circulation of 87,000.

> Description:
> This is a national publication dealing with a broad range of business matters. Although facing stiff American competition, the U.S. magazines do not provide a similar coverage of Canadian business news and analysis. It is representative of viable, general interest business publications with relatively large paid circulations.

Magazines with similar editorial content: Vista, Financial Times, Equity, Revue Commerce.

Magazines with similar circulation: Toronto Life, Canadian House & Home, Les Affaires.

U.S. competition: Business Week, Forbes, Fortune.

Effect of GST: Current level of 6.59 per cent declines to a barely break-even level of 0.07 per cent.

Will it survive?

Senator Cochrane: Never!

Senator Hébert: I do not think so.

Coup de Pouce, which is a French magazine aimed at women, has a circulation of 140,000.

Description:

This is a profitable French-language women's magazine that helps fund less profitable sister publications.

Because it is profitable, it permits the publication of others.

It is representative of large circulation, profitable, regional publications, advertising-driven by mass-market advertisers.

Magazines with similar editorial content: Chatelaine, Femme Plus.

Magazines with similar circulation: French Chatelaine, Femme Plus, TL Fashion.

Foreign competition: European women's magazines.

Effect of GST: Current profit position of 7.11% declines to a barely break-even position of 1.10%.

Will it survive? We do not know.

Eastern Woods and Waters: circulation 15,000.

Description:

This special interest monthly magazine faces regional competition from U.S. publications. It is represenative of regional, special interest magazines with little potential for circulation growth.

Magazines with similar editorial content: Western Sportsman, Alberta Hunting and Fishing.

Magazines with similar circulation: Alberta Hunting and Fishing, Pacific Yachting.

U.S. competition: Field & Stream, Outdoor Life, Arizona Hunter and Angler.

Effect of GST: Current break-even position declines to a loss position of minus 3.16%.

Will it survive the GST? We doubt it. Since it is a business, I do not think they will keep a loss position of minus 3.16 per cent. It will probably disappear.

● (0400)

Hon Jack Austin: Senator Hebert, if I correctly understand what you are saying, the news you are giving us about the Canadian magazine industry is quite alarming. Most of the information that you have given us indicates that our Canadian magazine industry, particularly the specialized circulation part of it, is quite marginal in economic terms but is kept alive by virtue of the particular interest of small groups of Canadians within the sector, for example, the Canadian Art magazine to which I subscribe. That is a fine magazine and there is none other like it in Canada. If it disappeared there would be nothing to replace it. No foreign magazine would take an interest in Canadian art, particularly the promotion of emerging Canadian artists.

It appears to me that the situation is particularly alarming because, not only is the GST coming onto this scene, we are also in an economy that is experiencing a recession with diminishing buying powers on the part of subscribers and diminishing economic capacity from those who have fostered the continuation of this magazine activity.

I wonder, Senator Hebert, what you believe is the purpose of the government in applying the GST to the Canadian magazine industry and adding to its burden? I mean, is it the "cold shower" that the Prime Minister said Canadian businesses should take in order to be competitive in the real world? Is it the application of the Darwinian test: In other words, those that deserve to survive will do so, and those that cannot survive in economic terms obviously offer no merit to Canadians and therefore should not be continued? I wonder whether the government is mean, or whether the government has just missed the point here, or has indicated any kind of interest in amelioration of the problems that you have outlined?

Senator Marchand: Not a "cold shower"; down the drain.

Senator Hébert: It is difficult to answer your question, senator. What is the reason? I do not think, frankly, that the Conservative government wants to kill the Canadian Art magazine. I do not think that that is their purpose. Perhaps they do not care. Perhaps they are stupid. Perhaps they are just not aware of these facts. Perhaps they do not believe the facts and figures produced, not by me but by the three big firms that came together and studied four typical magazines.

On top of that, the magazine, Canadian Art, which you read, one of the reasons why it barely survived is, first of all, because its publishers have a grant from the Canada Council. However, its survival is most likely because the contributors are paid very small salaries, because they believe in and love what they are doing, and they would write for that magazine at a price that would be ridiculous in the United States, for example. That is one of the reasons why these magazines are always on the verge of collapse.

Why is the government following this course? Frankly, I do not know. Stupidity? Ignorance? Certainly not maliciousness. I cannot imagine the government willingly wanting to see a good magazine like Canadian Art disappear, or for that matter Canadian Business, although with a 0.07 per cent profit, maybe it will survive.

Senator Austin: The difficulty, Senator Hebert, with Canadian Business, to which I am also a subscriber, is that recently the Globe and Mail's Report on Business magazine has become a competitor in the same business market. I am not at all sure what the financial resources of the Canadian Business group are, whether they are comparable to that of the Globe and Mail and the Thompson organization. Probably they are not. In the Darwinian struggle, probably Canadian Business will be threatened and could go under. I wonder whether Canadian Business has been a supporter of the GST in its editorial policy? If it has, it may want to reconsider.

Senator Hébert: You realize, senator, in a short while, if the GST becomes law, you will be deprived of at least two of your magazines, and probably more. So you have to reconcile yourself, right now, to the fact that you will have to read American magazines from now on because there will be very few Canadian magazines left.

The final example was a very successful magazine which is called Owl. This is a magazine for children. The circulation is fairly high for Canada, being 98,000 copies. It is a high-circulation magazine published by a non-profit organization, which may explain why it exists. With its sister publications, it is able to achieve good economies of scale. It is subject to competition from a U.S. magazine that has similar editorial content. Since it has almost no advertising revenue, it is representative of all magazines relying almost exclusively on subscription income and some grant revenue.

Magazines with similar editorial content: Chickadee, Hibou, which is the French equivalent—and Wow Magazines with similar circulations: with sister publications, compares to Equinox, Harrowsmith, U.S. competition: Highlights, Ranger Rick.

The effect of the GST on these fine Canadian children's magazines will be to take their current profit position of 2.09 per cent, which is not much, to a loss position of −1.36 per cent. Will they survive? I do not know.

[Translation]

Talking about magazines, I wonder how many of the senators opposite are familiar with Mast Head, The Magazine About Magazines. In any case, the senators will no doubt permit me to give them an idea of the feelings of periodical publishers by citing a brief text by Bill Caluski, written in play form. Of course, I'am not as talented as Senator Royce Frith, who is a great actor, but I get by. The play is printed on a single page of the magazine. Its title is:

• (0410)

[English]

The GST In Four Acts or "Exit Weeping" by Bill Kaluski. Starring:

Gucci the Loafer—The Prime Minister

Diva—His Adorning Wife

The Advisor

Mikey Welchon—The Finance Minister

The Consultant Guy

The Policy Lady

The Blank One—Chairman of the Finance Committee

SCENE 1: Take It to The People

A recently redecorated room in a recently renovated building.

GUCCI: I'm getting tired of always screwing the people.

DIVA: You shouldn't have to do it all. Let Mikey do it.

ADVISOR: Don't worry, Boss. Another 2 1/2 years or so and every Conservative will get the rest they deserve.

Loud cheer from 93% of the audience. The other 7% had to send their cheers in before the box office opened. Had the play not opened they could have deducted this cheer from a future play.

GUCCI: Chin dropping. What the hell was that? Chin still dropping.

ADVISOR: Only working people and there won't be many of those as time goes by.

DIVA: I was reading about them in a magazine last night.

GUCCI: Chin resting in the basement. Don't worry. There won't be as many magazines, either. Well, Mikey, Diva says it's your turn to "take it to the people."

MIKEY: Well, Boss, I've been working on this great new tax plan. It will increase the strength and number of small businesses.

GUCCI: How's that?

MIKEY: By closing down marginal small businesses and turning successful large ones into relatively successful small ones. It's especially effective on magazines.

GUCCI: How do we implement it?

MIKEY: First we tell people that it's 9% and how great it will be for everybody. Then we say, "If you have any ideas on how to make it better you can talk to Blank One's Finance Committee." We, of course, ignore any suggestions and move the rate down to 7%. People will think they're getting a break and start worrying about how to comply with the tax legislation. So we tell them we're going to help them. We print up three or four different versions of the legislation. We hire consultants and policy people and institute information lines . . . ahhh, it'll be grand, Boss.

SCENE 11: Pin Ball Wizards

Another planet.

GUCCI: Well, Mikey, do our "follow Canadians" understand how the Get Screwed Tax is going to help them yet?

MIKEY: Well, Boss, The Blank One has met with some representatives of the publishing industry and they don't seem to get the point.

ADVISOR: Tell them it's on the end of the shaft they're getting. GUCCI: Don't they realize that everyone watches TV anyway? Oh well, Mikey, I think it's time to set up Operation Pin Ball for these publishing people.

MIKEY: Do you think it'll work?

GUCCI: Are you kidding? Here's a group of people who give sales agents a 90% commission while they keep 10%. They ship 25% of the product to 50% of their client list without a hope of getting paid. They continue to ship thousands of copies every month to retailers hoping to get paid 50% of 30% six months later. They spend $50 to get an order worth $20 and give refunds to anyone who asks for one. Then they pay consultants $1,200 a day to find out why they're losing money.

MIKEY: Operation Pin Ball it is.

SCENE 111: The Huddle

A level playing field

MIKEY: All right, team, here's the play: Pin Ball. Consultant Guy, you run over as if you're going to help. Then, whenever anybody asks you anything about the legislation you send them to The Policy Lady. If they want clarification you send them to Hot Line Roulette. Now Hot Line, it's crucial that you never give the same answer twice to the same question. If you think things are getting too clear, send them back to the Consultant Guy. Policy Lady, you fake like you're doing something. Then, when these publishing people are totally frustrated, read the legislation back to them. If they still have any life left in them, send them back to The Blank One. Blank One, you know your job. On 7% . . . BREAK!

SCENE IV: Lights Out

Behind closed doors (thanks, Pierre!).

DIVA: What's wrong, Gucci? I'm saving money by only shopping when we go to the States. I even save 7% by ordering my magazine subscriptions from the U.S. You're getting tax money from people who haven't been taxed since Confederation. Every man, woman and child who buys anything, uses anything or plans anything get taxed. You haven't had a Cabinet minister arrested or under investigation in at least a month. What could be bothering you?

GUCCI: It's those publishing bastards. Despite how hard we've worked, I think they'll find some way to survive.

DIVA: Now, now. Why don't you put on your cowboy suit and we'll play "Ronnie and Nancy." You always feel much better after that.

Curtain. Fade to red ink.

[Translation]

Now let us come back to the main topic of my remarks, that is to books (after that lengthy aside on the problems of magazines). Let us come back to books and the danger the GST represents for books.

This time I am going to give the floor to the writers, without whom there would of course be no books. Here, for example, are recent remarks by Mr. Bruno Roy, who is President of the Quebec Writers' Union:

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

> There is great consternation and desolation in literary circles.

I mentioned that the Montreal Book Fair, not last week-end, but the week-end before, was a success such as no one has ever seen. More than 100,000 persons attended it, yet there was still a gloomy atmosphere because people at the fair—writers, readers, book store owners, publishers—realized perfectly well that they were celebrating the end of an era. It wasn't the great annual book fair, but rather the end of an era.

So, here is a writer who speaks on behalf of other writers and says . . . He begins by speaking about the consternation and desolation prevailing in literary circles.

> The intention to impose a tax on books proves the government's lack of coherence, discernment and responsibility with respect to culture, not to mention the fact that actual collection of the new GST will result in what outgoing Quebec Minister Yves Séguin has called "administrative chaos" . . .

It should not be forgotten that this did not happen in the other Canadian provinces. A Minister of Revenue resigned because he was opposed to the GST and was unable to agree with his provincial government, which accepted the tax and even wants to double it by creating a provicial GST. The provincial minister, Yves Séguin predicted a shock, administrative chaos.

> The measure is backward because many expenditures will be unproductive. As for the idea of taxing books, its underlying premises are dubious and contradictory.

The appendix to the minister's statement reads as follows, and I am quoting Mr. Wilson:

> By not taxing a number of major goods and services, the current consumption system is discriminatory with respect to the goods taxed.

That's on page 44.

> The premise here is that books are like soap, a commercial good. Out of a concern for equity, they must therefore be taxed in the same way as pure consumer items. Not to tax books . . .

He is obviously parodying Mr. Wilson:

> . . . is obviously a discriminatory factor for the government.

● (0430)

What an abberation! That's what is preventing the government from not taxing books: to exempt books would be to discriminate against soap manufacturers.

The same appendix reads:

> The GST system includes specific rules for recognizing the specific role of charities in society.

I'm quoting the French text, of course. That's not at all what they say in English. The English is apparently totally different so as to complicate matters even further.

In a "distinct society", particularly that of Quebec after Meech Lake, culture obviously plays no specific role. No. A future tax on books will be there to remind us of that fact. But what kind of fantasy world are we living in? It must be understood that we are faced with the logic of the cultural industries that impose on culture, and thus on books, its own definition. Culture is a good. It is also a service. In this way, books are submerged in a market economy that makes the laws. But whom do I need to convince? Books cannot be considered exclusively as a commercial good. That would be ridiculous. The value of a book does not lie in the density of its ink or thickness of its paper. Aren't books said to be food for the mind? The analogy presupposes that books fulfill a basic need, just as food does for the body. To doubt that fact is to take the short view. Free access to books in libraries clearly proves that books are not goods like any other. That's true. No other good is offered free of charge to the public in the same way as books are in libraries. There must be something particular about those goods.

We also know that the new tax will exclude certain essential goods such as food, health services and educational services. The question arises: Can we seriously exempt educational services from the GST without exempting books, which are its primary vehicle? There is some incoherence here. The government is not taxing education, but is taxing the primary instrument of education, books.

The Quebec Writers' Union believes that access to knowledge cannot be considered a luxury. Books are the ultimate democratic means to developing human beings. Taxing them means making them elitist. But elitism is not something that troubles the people opposite us. That is their philosophy.

Taxing books means taxing this access to power, to development, to skill, to information, because what is being taxed is everyone's access to education. The imposition of a tax on books constitutes a denial of this fundamental democratic tenet bequeathed to us by the Quiet Revolution.

What responsible government can ignore the fact that a people's intellectual and cultural vitality are made possible by books? Particularly since the imposition of a tax on books is a discriminatory factor in access to books. Students and teachers, readers and authors must pay this new tax. They will not receive any of the rebates designed to offset the increase in cost as a result of the tax. Furthermore, we will witness the impoverishment of libraries as a result of declining book purchases.

That is by way of an answer to Senator Molgat, who, a few moments ago, asked me a question about libraries. And it's all very clear; it's all common sense. The tax will impoverish the libraries; fewer books will be purchased, and fewer opportunities will thus be available to readers. An additional paradox is that books may be more expensive in Hull, Quebec, than in Ottawa, Ontario. That would be a perfect example of discriminatory access to books. And that of course was calculated when the Quebec GST was still in the news.

The Quebec Writers' Union finds it wholly irresponsible and ridiculous that books are to be subject to the federal GST. In actual fact, raising the price of books means reducing the earnings of writers.

The government says it wants to protect low-income workers from losing purchasing power and thus to reduce unfairness in the system. In the book industry, writers will be the hardest hit, and doubly so, both as workers, through reduced income, and as consumers, as a result of increased book prices. One of the components of the writer's economic condition is the price of books. It is quite clear that the imposition of a tax on books will place downward pressure on a writer's earnings and become a structural factor in that reduction.

In 1985, 28% of authors in all fields of writing wrote full time, and nearly 73% earned less than $5,000. With very few exceptions, writers are low-income individuals. Very few writers who write full-time escape poverty.

Ultimately, the application of a tax on books, whether federal or provincial, will deny the importance of the writer's trade and make the social and economic remuneration of the writer's work even more unfair. And all because the trend toward "commercialization" in the book industry appears to be incapable of improving the economic situation of writers as a whole.

This new tax will deal a mortal blow to the function of books in the development of culture. To what and at what price are we saying goodbye? Writers in this country have kept Quebec literature alive. Today, these solitary workers may well see their day-to-day efforts come to nothing.

A government that taxes books taxes all of society. That means that every dollar of tax on books is a further blow to our culture. The government pretends to be unaware of what makes our society distinct, but it is less its economy than its culture. That means that its language is the most direct path to the attainment of knowledge. Limiting access to books means limiting access to Quebec literature.

This twofold restriction on access pave the way to the impoverishment of our language, our literature and our culture. For that reason, the Quebec Writers' Union believes that the tax on books attacks the very basis of the distinct society. Such a tax means there is no sense of the role culture plays in a society. As the writer Robert Baillie has said: Books must be protected from the damage caused by a tax that would be both a death sentence for Quebec culture and the instrument of that culture's execution in the very short term.

Taxing books removes all real meaning from those efforts that have built and now sustain our vital literature and culture: the development of reading habits, the establishment of a network of libraries across Quebec, instruction in literature, passage of bills 90 and 78 on the status of the artist and thus of the writer, copyright review in Ottawa, the many book fairs throughout Quebec, the present literacy campaign, development courses, publishing grants, the next policy statement on libraries, etc. Taxing books—and this is why it is wrong—will seriously impede Quebec's cultural development.

Consequently, an exemption, which may be seen as a privilege, must be considered in this case as a necessity. Cultural protection is a major reason not to tax books. The geocultural situation indicates the logic of this exemption. If it is clear that, in the activity of economic exchange, books, as part of the cultural industries, have been unable to escape the production-consumption cycle, it is also clear that reducing books to a type of commercial exchange will lead political decision-makers into social and cultural irresponsibility. These days, however, this seems to have become our fate.

And it's signed by Bruno Roy, President of the Quebec Writers' Union.

[English]

Senator Austin: Senator Hébert, could you explain to me the situation in the province of Quebec in terms of the agreement to collect GST as it applies to books, which was arrived at between the province of Quebec and the federal government? We have talked about the apparent harmonization of the tax policy. As you know, Quebec is the only province which has entered into an arrangement with the federal government. Suddenly—and to me, at least, surprisingly—the Quebec government departed from the idea of harmonization and withdrew its own GST from the sale of books. I wonder what was said by the appropriate ministers of the Quebec government with respect to the reason for this decision, and why there is disharmony between that government and the federal government over this question.

In addition, I would like to ask you whether anything has been said publicly about negotiations which might take place between the federal government and the Quebec government with respect to this question of the taxation of books sold in the province of Quebec. You have mentioned the important questions for Quebec concerning its culture and the development thereof. Here is a government which seems to be loading the people of Quebec with an additional burden as it affects the development of their culture and of their education. Coming from the Pacific coast, Senator Hébert, I am interested to know what lines of thought have developed differently in Quebec, why there is such disharmony in the tax policy and whether any member of the Quebec government or the federal government has indicated that this matter might be negotiated again.

Senator Hébert: I think, first, that the Minister of Cultural Affairs in the province of Quebec was dedicated to the book industry and put up quite a fight. Second, there was this important weekend meeting of all of the youth of the provincial Liberal party. The young people of the party made quite a case for the book industry. Even the Minister of Finance, Gérard Lévesque, was present, because Mr. Bourassa was sick and could not attend. Gérard Lévesque is one of the important ministers of the cabinet. When he heard this motion coming from a young Liberal requesting that the provincial government not apply the GST to books, the Minister of Finance responded. I saw him on TV. He was categorical in saying to these young people that they did not understand how serious the matter was, that all of these cash registers that had been geared for the GST could not be changed and that the tax had to apply to books.

Then a young Liberal stood up and said: "Thank you very much, Minister, but the survival of our culture must be more important than your cash registers. Please fix them, because we are going to vote to abolish the GST on books." And so they did.

Things like that happened in Quebec. There was also a very strong front, a coalition of authors and publishers, that placed pressure upon the provincial government.

I must admit that, most probably, the Quebec government has listened a little closer to the people of that province than the federal government has listened to Canadians in general on this matter. That is, I think, the reason why this has happened in Quebec and has not happened in the rest of the country.

Senator Cools: I wonder if I could put a question to Senator Hébert. It is a little more than a question; it is a probe, so to speak, as to whether he has considered a few things.

I have been reading the debates in the House of Commons on Bill C-40. After the speech made by the critic, Mrs. Finestone, many other speakers followed. As I perused some of the speeches, I noticed that the preoccupation therein was essentially the relinquishing of the national unity public role of the CBC.

We are living in interesting times. We are living in an era in which telecommunications from the electronic systems are bombarding us literally minute by minute. We are living in an era, for example, in which large numbers of children, I am told, are not learning how to use knives and forks because what they do is eat fast foods with their fingers. This sounds a little absurd, but I am told this is already the case—there are large numbers of children growing up who do not eat with knives and forks but with their hands, quickly and readily. One can understand that, because there are great cultural incursions from south of the border bombarding our young people.

Coming to the subject matter troubling me, it is essentially this, that if the government is bringing in a measure that will have a result such as the one respecting books, it seems to me that the government is assisting the already rampant tendency in our young people not, perhaps, towards illiteracy, but towards a state less than leteracy. I am told that, increasingly large numbers of high schools and colleges in this country are faced with the problem of young people who have difficulty reading.

I know there are large numbers of people who describe this phenomena with a variety of names. Some of them have tried to convince me that we are living in a visual society and learning will not occur without audio/visual aids. You and I know, because we have had the privilege of a certain kind of education, that that is a lot of rubbish. In the long run, learning comes from study and study comes from reading.

Essentially, my question is whether you have any view on the cause and effect relationship of a poor literary policy regarding books on an increasingly audio/visual society?

[Translation]

Senator Hébert: I have the feeling, Senator Cools, that all that is logical. It is clear that, since books will be harder to obtain because they will be more expensive, young people who have to go without them will watch more television because it is less expensive. What is in watching television? It means opening the mind and heart to values that are not Canadian 80 per cent of the time. That is about our level of consumption of American programs.

I have the feeling that this will be a catastrophe from a cultural point of view. This is one of the consequences of this abominable tax.

I have before me a document that I found for Senator David who asked me questions about the attitude of European countries, and so forth. The Commission of the European Communities did a study not long ago on the issue of taxing books. It is dated January 1987.

I think it is a shame that Senator David did not want to stay up with me tonight so that I could have given him this document. We will get it to him some other way.

[English]

> This submission to the Commission of the European Communities is made on behalf on all those concerned with books in the European Community . . .

[Translation]

So here, we step outside of Canada for a moment. Let us take a look at what is happening in the rest of the world in this field. There are European governments which have conservative governments; some of them have more liberal governments. There are all kinds of things in Europe. We know these countries; we are quite familiar with Europe. This is what they have to say:

[English]

> . . . and it is an urgent plea that zero rating should be applied to books and learned journals in the forthcoming Community legislation to harmonize the VAT system.

[Translation]

They have made a great deal of the fact that in some countries there was no tax on books and that in other countries the rate was much lower than that applied to other products. Now, they themselves recognize that this situation is unsatisfactory and that they would have what is known as a "zero rating" for books throughout the EC.

[English]

> Those concerned with books in the European Community have been making representations to this effect for the past ten years at least. In advance of the new legislation, we wish to emphasize how important it is to the future prosperity of the European Community that the principle of not taxing knowledge, and particularly books and reading, already accepted in so many countries, should be accepted throughout the Community.

[Translation]

This is what the Europeans are headed for. As far as we are concerned, we are always 20 years behind, for some unexplained reason.

[English]

> GELC Book Publishers Group of the E.E.C. and GALS Group of Booksellers Associations in the E.E.C. represent their industries in all member states. But in writing, we know we also have the strong support of all other groups concerned with books—authors, printers, librarians, and readers—and have widespread support from all sections of the community, including in Parliament, Government, the education system, the churches, the professions, comemrce, and the public at large.
> In 1984-85, the UK National Book Committee, (which represents all those concerned with books in the UK—authors, publishers, printers, booksellers, librarians and readers undertook a major—and successful—campaign in the United Kingdom to persuade the British Government to retain zero—rating for books and learned journals, and won enormous support.

[Translation]

Of course, this was the Conservative government which we headed until just recently by the "Iron Lady". Despite this, the representations made to the government of the United Kingdom were successful.

[English]

> The representations made to the British Government, and a sample of the letters, articles and speeches in support, are set out in the enclosed book, "Don't Tax Reading: The case against VAT on knowledge." We hope that the Commission will study this book as it makes a powerful case. We will also be pleased to supply copies of the British research on the consequences of VAT on books, undertaken by two distinguished Oxford economists, which makes disturbing reading. We apologise that, as a result of this campaign and research, many of the examples given in this submission are taken from British experience, but other similar materials are available from other member states.
> It should be emphasized that the submissions made in respect of books apply also to learned journals, often produced by the same publishers or by the learned societies, and which are vital for the transfer of learning and the results of research.
> Exemption not the answer
> We must stress that the so-called "alternative" to zero-rating of exemption is not a beneficial or acceptable solution. We appreciate that there are plans to permit exemption for small and medium-sized undertakings, for cultural workers, and for some second-hand goods, in each case for good reasons. Thus, for cultural workers, the willingness to permit (or require) exemption no doubt stems from the recognition that the output of cultural workers should be available to the public as cheaply as possible, to encourage cultural output, help cultural workers to obtain adequate earnings, and stimulate the wide availability of cultural works. All of these valuable objectives apply to books, but, while exemptions may help keep prices low (and avoid complications) in a simple transaction between, say, an artist and a buyer, the same is not true of a cultural industry with an inevitably complex structure.
> Exemption requires each undertaking to pay tax at the appropriate rate on its inputs, but as the tax paid cannot be recovered on outputs, it has to be recovered through the price. So the price of a book must be increased at each exempt transaction by at least the tax on inputs. Many of these inputs will (in a two or three band system) be taxed at the standard rate.
> In a complex industry with a long production and distribution chain, which is likely to be part-exempt and part-taxed, the resulting higher prices for outputs, and the tax charged on those higher prices by non-exempt suppliers, may actually result in a higher final price than if tax were paid at a low positive rate throughout the chain. Even if exemption is only accorded at the first stage (authors) and the last stage (bookselling), the fact that some inputs will be exempt, and some taxed at the standard rate and some at a low rate is likely to result in a final price higher than if a low rate were charged throughout. Further customers entitled to reclaim VAT, or entitled to rebates, would not be able to recover the tax element in the price.
> We suggest that imposition of VAT on books at any rate is wrong in principle, but exemption would be at least as bad as a low rate and probably even worse.

[Translation]

He is still talking against exemptions.

[English]

> Further, zero-rating involves fewer problems than would exemption in trade between member states, in that it brings transactions within the normal system, while exemption inevitably leads to problems between exempt and non-exempt suppliers in different countries . . .

I speak now on the case for zero-rating of books.

> Exemption is not therefore a viable or beneficial solution. The arguments for a zero-rate are, however, very strong.
> Within a VAT system, zero is in fact a tax-rate—a rate to be applied to those products that the tax authorities agree are essential commodities or are deserving of the highest encouragement. A zero-rate permits the supplier of the product to recover tax on inputs and to sell that product with a zero tax addition, thereby giving the greatest benefit to the consumer and to those who have contributed to making the product available. Once the logic of differential rates for different ranges of product, based on their social value, is accepted, there is no logical reason why a rate should not be set at zero, to provide the maximum benefit. Indeed, except for the simplest transactions, this is the simplest solution, as such products are then treated administratively in the same way as other products.

[Translation]

It is of childlike simplicity, isn't it, perhaps it is too simple for Mr. Wilson! He likes things complicated.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): He has experts.

Senator Hébert: Yes, his officials too think complicated things are fun.

[English]

The social, educational, and cultural value of books is hardly likely to be disputed.

[Translation]

Well, that is "disputed", isn't it, on the other side? They don't seem to be taking it very seriously.

[English]

Books are the bedrock of European civilization and technology, and they are a significant part of Europe's place in the world. They provide important, indeed vital, services in the community:

[Senator Hébert.]

(a) they are a major means by which individuals acquire education, both specialist and general, formal and informal;

(b) they build and transmit the culture, history and science of our society;

(c) they are essential to the development of ideas in a democratic society;

(d) they provide essential and varied information; and

(e) they provide entertainment and stimulation.

The particular importance of books in all the principal book markets can be readily accepted: in schools and colleges, universities, libraries, business, the professions, and in the home. The special value of books to society is further evidenced by the public funding of libraries to lend books to individuals free of charge.

[Translation]

No other product is given out free of charge. They know that reading is important for the development of the citizens.

[English]

Discrimination between popular and quality books is not possible. Although it is clear that not all books are of equivalent social or educational value, it is impossible to conceive of a tax system which distinguishes between "good" and "bad" or "popular" and "quality" books. Indeed, "popular" books have great value in society at large: comic books, for example, are vital for teaching reading and for learning to comprehend ideas. It would be wrong therefore to seek to limit the benefits of zero-rating to "good" books, even if such could be identified by objective standards. The educational system does not exist just to produce highly educated people; it exists to give the entire population the best opportunity to get the most out of life and to cope with its problems.

For that, you need books.

> Indeed, the U.K. research revealed that no less than 75 per cent of all books sold were of demonstrable educational or cultural value. Thus, schools, universities, reference and specialist books amount to some 45 per cent total sales. Children's books of all kinds (a further 10 per cent) are undoubtedly of educational value. If only 25 per cent of fiction sales, and 75 per cent of general sales, are also accepted as being educational or cultural, it is clear that the great majority of books sold are important for education and cultural development.

> Further, research surveys show that no less than three-quarters of all books bought by the general public are bought by the socio-economic classes C, D, E, rather than by the wealthier sections of the population.

Senator Cools: Excuse me, senator, I am not too sure I understand your reference.

Senator Hebert: I though it was really quite clear.

Senator Cools: C, D, E; I am just wondering what "D, D, E" stands for. Is that an acronym?

Senator Hebert: I am sure you know that. Not "C, D, E", but "CEC", which is the Commission of the European Communities.

> The member-states of the European Community spend many billions of ECUs annually on their formal education systems—the UK, for example spends over 18 billion pounds. By contrast, the potential yield from VAT on books is minute. It would be absurd to spend such vast sums on universal education, and then to discourage, by taxing them, the availability and purchase of the books that are its basis.

> Zero-rating is an efficient and justifiable means of encouraging the availability of books, and so encouraging education, both formal and informal. Indeed, the tax foregone by governments through a zero-rate is an inexpensive way of promoting education and culture by encouraging individuals to pursue those activities.

[Translation]

It seems simple to me. These are simple, obvious ideas that the government should understand.

[English]

> While there are obvious advantages in simplicity and neutrality in indirect taxation, these are not over-riding considerations. Clear grounds exist for favourable treatment of books, which are consistent with the general principles of indirect taxation and with European Community policy. In fact, absolutely neutrality in taxation policy is undesirable—and no doubt, unachievable—when faced with such issues as the need for education, literacy, and an informal society.

Particular arguments for zero-rating of books

Apart from the overall importance of the availability of a wide range of books at the lowest possible prices, free of all taxation, there are a number of special factors affecting the economic environment in which books are marketed which justify the special treatment of zero rating.

(ii) The value of books to the community is such that the authorities very properly devote considerable funds to making them available through libraries, including public libraries. This has a major effect on the market, affecting particularly the market for new books and those by new authors, making it unusually difficult for an author to become established through high sales to the public.

(iii) There is a substantial second-hand market for books, affecting particular school books and university student texts, which is important to the widespread availability of books and which not only has a considerable economic importance in itself, but also affects the economics of book provision generally.

(iv) The book market is essentially an international business, and significant customers such as libraries (particularly in English-language countries) are likely, if a tax is imposed in the European Community, to select books from no-tax countries.

Like the United States.

(v) Books are also exports on a large scale from the European Community to other countries, and contribute not only to the balance of payments but to diplomatic and cultural influence and to the growth of trade generally. France, Germany, Greece, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the UK are all substantial book exporters. Higher domestic prices and a restricted choice as a result of a positive rate of tax would damage this business and influence.

(vi) In the UK a recent study showed that between 6 and 10 per cent of adults are functionally illiterate-

The figure is much higher in Canada, as we mentioned earlier.

—and so unable to play their full part in society. The habit of reading requires constant practice, which means that books must be cheaply available, an objective deserving of full public support.

(vii) In an age in which available knowledge is expanding very rigidly, and in which individuals have to acquire fundamental new skills several times in their lifetime, it is vital that books are easily and cheaply available. Indeed, the need for well-trained people in a wide range of skills is increasingly acute.

(viii) Education and training are acquired at least as much—perhaps more—through reading, as through the formal education and training system.

(ix) It is worth noting that the information industries are themselves major creators of employment, and need particular encouragement in Europe. It is estimated that of the 19 million new jobs created in the USA during the 1970s, 72 per cent were in the information sector.

Consequences of a positive rate of tax

The economists who studied the consequences of imposing a positive rate in the UK concluded that price elasticity of demand for books was unit (-1), i.e. that sales volume would decline in proportion to any price increase (over and above general inflation).

However, it is generally accepted that the increase in retail prices would be considerably higher than the rate of tax, where a positive rate replaced a zero-rate, because of costs of collection, et cetera, particularly in small bookselling shops without specialist staff.

Hon Roméo LeBlanc: Would the honourable senator permit another question? I have listened with great interest to his lengthy and very informative exposé on books.

Senator Hébert: Did you say lengthy?

Senator LeBlanc: Lengthy in the proper sense of the word. Adequate coverage of the subject.

Senator Austin: You mean complete.

Senator LeBlanc: There is one thing that strikes me. In the discussion about the taxing of books, there are always a series of other items dragged into the discussion. For example, if you exempt books, should you exempt magazines? If you exempt magazines, should you exempt records and audio tapes? And if you exempt those, do you exempt theatre tickets, et cetera?

Senator Cools: Concert tickets.

Senator LeBlanc: Since the discussion took place in the British context, where even in the less wealthy areas of the British Isles, I found it very interesting that of all the public institutions, the library is most important. I remember travelling way up north in Scotland to the Isle of Skye or to Portree, and the library was a visible major institution.

In a library, books are free to read and borrow. It is interesting that the British should have maintained and develop this tradition with great pride. In fact, as the honourable senator said, a very small "c" Conservative government like Mrs. Thatcher's did, in fact, concede that books should be an exception. Not one of a hundred exceptions, but that exception.

It is interesting that the British Broadcasting Corporation was, for many, many years, the only purveyor of music and sound; through radio at first, and also eventually on television. Although the BBC was recognized as a very important instrument, it was still accepted by the public that there be an annual fee on licences to cover the expenses of the BBC. The BBC was not allowed commercial broadcasting for many, many years; in fact, I was about to say generations.

Some of us who are a little bit long in the tooth also remember that in Canada you could not have a "steam" radio, which is what I term it in my broadcast language. That was the old style radio, starting with a crystal set and possibly a battery. If the household had one electric bulb, there might be a wire connected to a radio, but that was not so in every household.

In those days, above the radio you had to have the framed licence. Again, although we tend to think that radio is free, radio was not free; there was a charge.

On books, however, there was never a charge. Not only was there never a charge but you can borrow a book, and if you bring it back before the expiry of the number of days which you have been allocated, you can have the book renewed for free. This is so unless the book is on a reserve list for which there are a lot of requests.

I find librarians to be some of the most healthy people because they are the only people in our society who want us to take more books, who want us to come back and who want to give us something. Not too many other people in this society have that attitude.

So I suspect that this exception for books is so non-contested, is so accepted by the general public that, in fact, if this government had conceded nothing else, if it had conceded not one iota except to exclude books, I think we could have accepted it. I even think that we could have accepted a tax on magazines although I accept a lot of the argument that Senator Hébert made. In fact, if this government had wanted to develop some goodwill about the GST, if they had exempted books, they might, in fact, have avoided a lot of the flack and a lot of the opposition that this most unpopular tax is facing. I wonder if Senator Hébert shares my view that you could really exempt books because of their almost sacred character. I suspect that there would have been an extraordinary broad support in the country for such an exemption, and does he understand why this government did not accept our amendment?

Senator Hébert: I think you are quite right. It would have been a very simple thing to do. Surely, it is the least costly of the demands that were made for exemption, involving very small amounts of money that the government would have been deprived of. Yes, and it would have created much goodwill in the country. I think you are right. They could have succeeded just by this concession to reconcile, maybe not everybody, but some people in this country. But they did not do it. They are stubborn people. They do not listen. They do not realize that this thing could have happened to them.

> However, it is generally accepted that the increase in retail prices would be considerably higher than the rate of tax, where a positive rate replaced a zero-rate,because of costs of collection, etc, particularly in small bookselling shops without specialist staff.
> This is aggravated by the economics of book production, in which very substantial "first-copy" costs have to be spread over the copies likely to be sold. So a reduced sale inevitably results in higher unit costs and hence higher unit prices, with spiralling consequences. Thus, the actual price increases would be substantially higher than the rate of tax, and the decline in sales would also be greater.

These are the same arguments that we heard from the people from Quebec or from Toronto, the same argument. It is true here, it is true in Europe, in Great Britain, in France, in Spain, in Portugal, in Germany.

> With a positive rate of tax of, say, 5 per cent, it is estimated that sales would decline (or are lost) by at least 10 per cent.

We are talking of 7 per cent in our case.

> Profound damage to cultural enterprises.
> The effect is most severe for small print-run titles, which include literary fiction, new authors, works of minority and specialist interest, translations, poetry, academic monographs, and the like, on which the richness of our culture depends.

[Translation]

Things that are difficult to sell but which are the basis for culture.

[English]

> Such works typically generate a nil or low return, so that an increased price and reduced sale can make their publishing, already marginal, impossible. In consequence, a tax hurts particularly those works that society most desires to encourage.

[Translation]

Very popular novels will manage, even with the GST.

[English]

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Will Senator allow a question?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: Your response about government seeking to encourage creativity brings to mind your own experience, Senator Hébert, when you were a part-time commissioner of the CRTC, and, if I recall correctly, you were one of the advocates, as was the CRTC of the day, of greater Canadian drama on television, and that there is a greater insistence by the government for the laudable aim of increasing Canadian drama on Canadian television, both CBC and private networks. This was a goal, and I am not sure whether or not that proposition or that principle still animates the current CRTC, but I know that it was very much alive and well when you were a part-time commissioner of the CRTC. I assume, therefore, that if there was a small impulse on the part of the CRTC of the day to encourage greater Canadian content and greater Canadian drama on television so that Canadians could be unified by seeing on television a mirror of their own existence, as opposed to seeing on television a mirror of American experience, the key to the impulse was the author, the Canadian author. How can you have stories projected on the screen without somebody writing those stories? If I recall correctly, that impulse to increase, not just the quantum of the Canadian drama, but the quality of Canadian drama was very much dependent upon establishing an atmosphere where Canadian authors could flourish. That meant that Canadian authors had to be employed. The only way it is possible to create a new school of Canadian authors—who have not only to write for television and for the cinema but for magazines and books—is to give them as many work options as possible. To this day, then, we hear the laudable objectives enunciated by Minister Masse and others to the effect that we should expand the base of Canadian drama.

• (0520)

I would ask Senator Hébert whether this tax does not appear to him, based on his experience and knowledge of government goals, to be counterproductive of those goals. Rather than encouraging authors to flourish, we hear the price sensitivity argument, which says, in effect, that the higher the price, the fewer the books; the fewer the books, the lower the revenue; the lower the revenue, the fewer the authors. The end result of the sequence of those events has the effect of driving Canadian authors away from Canada, if they truly want to be creators. And if I recall correctly, the word "author" comes from the Latin word "auctor", which means "creator" or "originator".

The result is that the creators, as they did in the late sixties and seventies, say to themselves that the only way they can survive as creators is to go south or to go east to Europe. Those were the two options. One could not make it in Canada as an author.

Senators on this side have all spoken about the examples of the European experience, where, notwithstanding the general consumption tax, those communities, believing as we do that the creative endeavour is different, apply to it measures that are different from those applied to other commercial sectors. If we really wanted national unity or national identity, would that not be the course to follow? Does this not drive a wedge into the government's proposition of creating greater Canadian content, greater Canadian awareness and a greater sense of patriotism? Does it not drive a terrible wedge into the laudable concept that senators on all sides cherish, which is that of national unity? Is not this GST, in a strange way, by striking at authors, the writers of our society, ultimately attacking the roots of unity?

Senator Hébert: The honourable senator is absolutely correct. The reason for that is that it attacks our soul. From there, it attacks our unity, our values—it attacks everything. And, as he mentioned in his question, the increase in prices has an immediate effect.

I will continue reading this interesting study issued by the Europeans, who are aiming at convincing all members of the European Economic Community to drop this tax completely from books, as has been done already in Great Britain and in quite a few other countries. The argument is aimed at convincing the few who would resist. No country, except Denmark, taxes books at the same rate as that applied to other goods.

The report continues:

> An increase in prices resulting from a positive rate of tax, however low, would therefore do profound damage to the availability of books. It would also do great damage to all those responsible for making books available. Thus, authors, particularly literary, academic and new authors (on whom the future of our culture depends), would suffer diminished earnings, and the already difficult prospects of being published would become even more remote.
> For publishers—again, particularly literary and academic publishers—similar consequences would apply. Literary publishing is at best a marginal activity, but it is the source of much other cultural activity, including television.

And this ties in with what Senator Grafstein mentioned a moment ago. Where will we find the authors for our television dramas or our National Film Board or the private sector of cinema if we do not have creators, if we do not have authors of books?

> A positive rate of tax would prevent the publication of many titles, reduce the print orders of many others, and kill many successful small companies and enterprises.

[Translation]

As we can see, the disappearance of these small publishing houses, bookstores and writers who will never be published that the representatives of Canadian organizations mentioned to us, they all bring forward the same arguments, but are they really the same? To what extent is this kind of respect—that we should have for books and these creators or writers—really universal?

[English]

> Printers, who depend substantially on book printing work, would also suffer severely from loss of trade, with damaging consequences for employment.
> Booksellers would suffer to at least the same extent. Inevitably, the distribution system for books is highly vulnerable.

[Translation]

This is the same message we heard from other representatives, whether they were from Quebec or Ontario or somewhere else in Canada.

[English]

> To serve their public, booksellers need to carry a wide range of often slow-moving stock, a fact of life which cannot be altered by the greatest efficiency, marketing zeal, or use of new technology. Typically, a small- or medium-sized quality bookseller providing good, services (special ordering, for example, at nil margin) makes only a 3 per cent net profit on turnover. A fall in sales would drive many such bookshops out of business, and seriously damage the distribution and the wide availability of books.
> In a recent speech, the chairman of the British Arts Council—

[Translation]

The British Art Council is the equivalent of the Canada Council.

[English]

> —described the vulnerability of the book distribution system as one of the major barriers to the spread of literary culture.

Libraries and the education system would suffer from higher prices and from the reduced range of books available. (To the extent that this is compensated by exemptions or rebates, the net yield of the tax would decline.)

Readers—consumers—many of whom (as has been stated above) are from less wealthy parts of society—would have to pay higher prices, without possibility of rebate, and be offered less choice, particularly of minority titles, to the detriment of their education and advancement, their awareness of new ideas, the stimulation of their intellects, their use of increasing leisure time and their enjoyment.

• (0530)

When I read things like that I try to imagine myself sitting on the other side for a moment and feeling that I will, by my vote, be partly responsible for such a result in my society. I do not know how they can live with it. They sleep, most of them. Maybe that is the best way to live through that. To continue:

Low yield from tax on books and journals

While we appreciate that the Community's own budget is not (under the present system) affected by whether or not particular products enjoy a zero-rate, it should be noted that the yield from a positive rate of tax on books and journals is insignificant, especially compared with the benefit to be achieved and with other forms of expenditure, (for example,on education) to achieve those objectives.

[Translation]

It's really stupid, the more I read this argument, the more I realize there is no explanation. It's sheer stupidity in every sense of the word.

[English]

In the UK, the Treasury estimated in 1984 that the gross yield of a positive rate of VAT at the UK standard rate of 15 per cent would be 85 million pounds, before taking account of reduced sales, reduced profitability of the book industry (and so reduced corporation or profits tax), the need to give rebates to library and education systems, and to increase student grants to compensate for higher prices. The economic research suggested a net yield of only 30 million pounds.

At a low rate of 5 per cent, the gross yield would be under 30 million pounds, a net yield of perhaps 10-15 million pounds. Throughout the Community, the net yield would scarcely exceed 100 million ECUs.

Such a minor contribution to the Governmental budgets of a Community of 320 million people is not justified against the enormous benefits of a zero-rate. The Community could, indeed, give a positive encouragement to achieving these benefits by excluding book and journal sales from the tax base of its budget.

Consequences in countries with positive rates of tax

Although the UK, Ireland, and Portugal have zero-rates for books, and Italy, and now Greece and Spain, have rates of 2 or 3 per cent, other member states currently have low rates of between 5 and 7 per cent.

They call it a low rate at 7 per cent because they go as far as 20 and 25 per cent.

Senator Frith: On other things.

Senator Hébert: On other things, but even on books in the case of Denmark, the only exception. Denmark imposes its standard rate of 22 per cent on everything.

It is not possible to generalize about the consequences of these taxes for the market for books in each country. Countries with minority languages already face particular problems because of the limited size of their markets.

That applies to French Canada very easily.

The book trades throughout the community are all facing acute problems arising from competition from other media, reduced public spending on books, and > increasing costs. The Spanish book trade, which recently faced the new imposition of a 6 per cent tax . . .

Now reduced because they realized that it was a crime to have 6 per cent on books, and we are talking here of 7 per cent:

> . . . reported—on the basis of careful research—a grossly disproportionate reduction of sales of some 25 per cent, a much greater price elasticity of demand than that estimated by the UK economists.

Senator Frith: Can I ask a question, senator? Is there any information in this material as to how long it takes, when there is a reduction, for the industry to recover?

In other words, there is some trend, as you say, in European countries where a tax has been imposed, in all countries I take it where there is only one level of tax, to repent and try to bring the rate down. What you have been saying is that the imposition of the tax in the first place had a very bad effect on the industry. The statistics are there to show that profits dropped, I assume there have been closings in many cases and bankruptcies and so on, so that you would have the classic economist's description of an industry on which this damage had been inflicted by way of a tax and the resulting shrinkage of the industry with all the human consequences. When there is a reversal or a repentence, is there any information as to how long it takes for the industry to catch up?

I ask that not out of academic interest. The government has refused to accept an amendment exempting books. It says it will consider it in due course. We do not know what "in due course" is. Of course, the tax will have been in effect by the time the expiry of whatever "due course" is arrives. So I think it would be useful for us to know, when we are considering the government's stubbornness in refusing to accept any amendment or any exemption for books, how long it might take for the industry to recover after this tax has damaged it in the way that there is no doubt it will on the basis of the projections here in this country and the experience in other countries.

Senator LeBlanc: Surely someone will have died by the time the government's mind is changed.

Senator Frith: It is like Keynes and the short run. In the long run we will all be dead.

Senator Grafstein: Just before you rise, Senator Hébert, I am glad you have returned because I believe this marks a very important occasion in the life of the Senate. It is very rare that senators cannot only observe history but be a direct witness. I think senators on all sides should note that Senator Hébert has been speaking, based on Senator Molgat's rough calculations, close to 16.5 hours from the time he began.

Senator Hébert: With breaks.

Senator Grafstein: With some breaks. But in terms of absolute time as opposed to continual time, apparently that marks an historic point in Senate history as being the longest speech. According to Senator Molgat's calculations, that works out to 16.5 hours.

• (0540)

Senator Hébert: You talk as though I were through.

Senator Grafstein: You are not, senator, I just want to pause now.

Senator Frith: Are you half way through? Have you come to the turning point?

Senator Grafstein: I think it is important to note that it is so rare that we can not only observe history, but participate in an historic occasion. I notice that senators opposite are now alert, and even the importance of this occasion is instilling them with renewed vigour and observance.

I think it is important that we should not only note this momentous occasion in Canadian history, in the history of this institution, but also say to Senator Hébert—and I do not think senators would ask him to respond—but I have been here for a goodly portion of Senator Hébert's speech yesterday evening and this morning, and all of his comments have been cogent, learned, and not repetitive, because he has given us insights not only with respect to the GST, and the impact on the cultural community in Canada, but is about to embark on a much fuller, comparative analysis in other jurisdictions.

I think, honourable senators, we can conclude, or I can conclude this interjection, by saying that when we talk about authors and the importance of authors to Canada, we can include Senator Hébert as an important creator, originator, and author of this truly momentous and, I think, wondrous moment in Canadian history.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Ottenheimer: Was that rehearsed?

Senator Grafstein: That was spontaneous, senator. I did not realize until a few moments ago that this occasion was marked. Perhaps you would like to add your comments, just to indicate that it is a bi-partisan note.

Senator Ottenheimer: Perhaps we can get somebody to do a mural of the occasion.

Senator Grafstein: That is one good idea. I presume it will be without GST.

Senator Frith: Do what?

Senator Grafstein: A mural.

Senator Cools: Of Senator Hébert?

Senator Grafstein: Something to commemorate Senator Hébert.

Senator Cools: I think that is a wonderful idea. I think you should propose it, senator. I would be happy to second.

Senator Hébert: Thank you for your impressions, Senator Grafstein.

As far as the question of Senator Frith is concerned, I must admit that I have not found, in all of the documentation that I have read on the subject, a specific answer to your question. Possibly it exists. If you were to enquire with the publishing association in the U.K., we might find some answer to your questions.

It is obvious, however, when you see all these countries that have so quickly regretted having taxed books in their country, with all the consequences that we have enumerated previously, that the consequences must be very, very difficult. It seems silly not to take advantage of what is happening in Europe at this stage when it is still possible for us not to make this mistake, not to be as stupid as all these European countries readily admit that they have been in taxing books. We can benefit from their experience. Why is it that the government does not realize it and does not prevent all the difficulties, all the bankruptcies, all the loss of jobs, all the frustrations, all the books that will never be published, authors that will never come alive and become authors. All of these consequences are so enormous.

Senator Frith: And obvious.

Senator Hébert: And obvious.

What you do not understand is that the amount of money that is involved is so little compared to what the GST will bring to the government. I think this is a case of stupidity.

Acceptance of principle of not taxing knowledge;

The principle that knowledge—particularly books and reading—should not be taxed, has attracted wide international support.

Why is it that we are different from the rest of the world?

A similar principle is entrenched in international law by the Florence Convention, which provides that, to encourage the international dissemination of knowledge, tariffs should not be imposed on books, and the Protocol of which urges against the imposition of taxes on books for libraries.

As long ago as 1860, the leading British statesman, William Gladstone, described a duty on paper for publications as, and I quote;

A tax on literature and education, which has long stood in evil odour in this House [of Commons].

When first setting out proposals for VAT in the U.K., when the U.K. joined the European Community, another, more recent statesmen, Iain Macleod, said, and I quote:

On the general principle of avoiding a tax on knowledge we intend that books, journals, newspapers and broadcasting shall be at a zero rate.

This means that we are coming to the argument of Senator LeBlanc that books are perhaps not enough. We should think of journals, newspapers, and why not broadcasting?

The Royal Commission on the Press in 1977—always in the U.K.—said that, and I quote:

> To remove the concession (of zero-rating) would disrupt the economy of existing publications.
> Sir Geoffrey Howe, then British Chancellor of the Exchequer, said in 1983, and I quote:
> > We consider that the Commission's arguments [against zero-rating] take insufficient account of the social, political and economic consequence of the changes suggested.
> But the principle is by no means confined to countries which now have a zero rate. Politicians, teachers, academics, librarians, and representatives of readers in all member states have urged the validity of the principle of not taxing books, and the practical benefits which follow.

● (0550)

> The European Parliament resolved in 1981 that "exclusively economic criteria should not apply to the book industry and trade, because of the specific nature of books as products which directly affect the interests of the citizen in the cultural, educational, and information fields.

Nobody listens.

> This is a principle which the European community could adopt with honour and practical benefit, as an example to the world.

And to Canada.

> Proposal
> We therefore submit that, in preparing and considering the draft legislation on harmonizing the VAT system, the Commission should propose, and the European Parliament and the Council of Ministers should accept, that a zero-rate should be applied to books and learned journals.
> We urge the adoption of this proposal, which we know has very wide public support throughout the European Community.
> DON'T TAX READING.

[Translation]

In any case, since we are still talking about Europe, I would like to quote an extract from the International Publishers Bulletin, denouncing the negative effect of a tax on books. It is very short, but I think it brings out a new point. It is the International Publishers Bulletin, dated 1988, so just two years ago.

[English]

> "Books are different"—This statement has been made so often that, even those who are in agreement, are tired of hearing it. Others believe that the book trade should comply with normal market laws and regulations, just as other trades do, hence the slightly passive attitude in certain sectors of the book trade in the face of an increasing number of threats to tax books eg. VAT, sales tax, postal charge increase, import duties etc. Why not fall in line with other trades, aren't publishers and booksellers businessmen too?

We have heard that and I am sure that that is the reasoning of Mr. Wilson and his colleagues in the cabinet.

> At first sight, the taxing of books as an ordinary product may seem an enterprising venture, but in fact it would be very wrong. Not because the book trade is incapable of coping with the laws of the market place (competition in publishing is just as keen as elsewhere as proved by recent mergers and takeovers), but rather because the position the book occupies in society is unique. Just as the author's work once written, somehow escapes from its creator, the book once published, escapes from the hands of its publisher. The work outstrips its author and the book its publisher. Whether the diehards of marketing and management like it or not, the book is still the foremost instrument in transmitting knowledge from one generation to the next, in the creation of new jobs through ongoing instruction, in the accumulation and use of knowledge and expertise and also in creating social identity for both individuals and groups of people. This does not however mean that sound management should be less important in publishing houses and bookshops than in other trades—on the contrary as brilliantly demonstrated by Leonard Shatzkin's article in IPA Bulletin No. 3, 1987.
> May we remind those looking at the Book as a mere commodity that the first basic economic rule is to listen to the marketplace and not to impose laws and rules from the outside. The marketplace has never looked on books as mere commodities. The consumer knows from school age onwards that cultural, economic and social promotion derives from education via books. The intrinsic value of the Book cannot be commensurate by its commercial value and retail price. The IPA—

International Publishers Association.

> —cannot agree to the taxation of books at any given rate, be it 23% or 2%—

Certainly not at 7 per cent.

> —without wide and public debates on the importance of the Book in Society. The IPA cannot accept authoritarian decisions taken by the European Economic Community to tax books between 4% and 9% regardless of any consideration as to the place of books in national or intereuropean societies. Are we still living in democratic countries? Or do we have to suffer authoritarian decisions taken miles over people's heads which will have an enormous impact on the future of our societies.
> We feel that political authorities and economic forces which are educating the rising generation must recognize the basic and indeed decisive contribution of books to society's economic, financial and cultural life. Any tax on books will inevitably divert greater segments of the public from the quest for knowledge and economic progress. The higher the tax, the larger the number of lost readers.

I like this expression "lost readers". What a catastrophy for a society to lose readers.

> It is ironic and almost tragic to listen to politicians insisting ad nauseam that the future economic development of their countries depends on education, on schools, universities and vocational training of the existing and future work force and to hear at the same time these politicians demanding the levying of taxes on the very products which determine economic development—Books.

It looks as if it has been written specifically for Mr. Wilson and his colleagues in the cabinet.

> It is intolerable to hear bureaucrats asserting that a pound or so extra on the price of a book will have no effect on readers or on access to books, neither on the level of sales. This is of course sheer nonsense and shows a total contempt of the public as a whole.
> The upward harmonization of taxes on books, so assiduously promoted by the EEC can only be regarded as a lack of judgement—

That is another expression that would fit the present government.

Senator Frith: And that is putting it rather nicely.

Senator Hébert: Yes, nicely. Lack of judgement.

> —not to say an underestimation of the value of works of the mind—
> —and as a sign of the a loss in the sense of values.
> It has been known for 30 years that the primordial condition for entry into the EEC is a willingness to levy a tax on books. A country which does not tax books is not truly European. The yardstick by which a European country is measured is by the way in which it applies taxes, especially taxes on books.
> On entering the EEC, Spain was imposed a 6% VAT on books whereas before books were not taxed.

In Spain.

> This has resulted—

I think this is a partial answer to Senator Frith's question some time ago.

> This has resulted in a retail price increase of 25% taking into account additional charges and costs related to VAT.

So it was not an increase of price equal to the tax but much higher.

> In Germany (FR), where books carry 7% VAT—

That is exactly what we are—

Senator Frith: Proposing.

Senator Hébert: Offered or proposed.

> —German authorities decided in 1987 that there was no reason to treat books any differently from other products and that VAT on books should be fixed at 14%.

That is because they were already there for the rest.

● (0600)

For German readers, the doubling of the tax meant an additional annual expenditure of 900 million marks or 600 million US dollars. It is hard to believe that the German authorities saw this as the right way to help young people, workers and employees in industry to obtain better qualifications, to help German industry to improve its performance and modernise German industrial equipment and scientific research. Were they not rather motivated by the principle that taxes must be "harmonized", that all products should be given the same fiscal treatment regardless of the item taxed and regardless of its users? Another lesson to be drawn from this German experience is that as soon as the tax on books, however low, is accepted, there is the risk that it will increase and even double at any time. The acceptance of a tax on books is seen as a recognition that they are mere commodities, that education and culture can be traded just as any other service. Great Britain and Ireland are struggling to keep taxes off books, but how long will their governments be able to resist the pressure from Brussels? We think that they should carry on resisting and that other countries should help them. Do we have to take to the streets and forbid the use of books for days or even weeks in order to force governments to look into the role of the book and the place of authors and publishers in society, at school, at work, during free time and in communications in general? It is high time to give back the slogan "books are different" its true force and scope and bring it to the full notice of the public at large, and its political representatives. Our adamant rejection of any text whatsoever on books will eventually lead politicians to ask the right questions about the status of the Book—and Knowledge in society as a whole.

As we all know, there is no better way of controlling authorship, publishing and reading than that of taxing books.

Censorship may arise from political, religious or moral pressure as well as from economic pressure, that is to say taxation.

Censorship forbids the greatest number accessed to published works. This is precisely what taxing books is doing.

Don't tax books.

I have another document dealing with European publishers, because they have much more experience than we do. And this is why I would like to go along with Senator David's suggestion. This is a declaration of principle by the Federation of European Publishers for an active book policy for the single market.

The publication, free circulation and availability of a wide range of books in various categories—literature, books for wide distribution, children's books, educational, university level and professional works—represent a major cultural stimulant for the European single market. The Federation of European Publishers, which represents publishers' associations from all member States and members of the publishing industry throughout the community, all of whom are responsible for a significant portion of global book production, expects that institutions of the European Community will take positive steps intended to promote the free circulation of books within the community, and particularly the following measures.

Fiscal measures. Considering the essential role played by books in social and cultural development, the public's access to books should not be hindered by the levying of taxes. The Federation of European Publishers, the FEP, supports the campaign by the European community against taxing books and in favour of a zero VAT rating for books. It asks that the reduced-rate range for sensitive items, to which it is already agreed that books belong, be set from zero to six per cent and not from 4 to 9 per cent, as currently provided for in the Brussels Commission's guidelines.

In most of the member States, systems already exist which enable all readers to obtain or find books at a low price and to take advantage of the many networks of qualified second-hand booksellers.

During the meeting in Luxembourg, no progress was made on this item. The Commission's proposal of 4 to 9 per cent for the reduced rate and 14 to 20 per cent for the normal rate with the possibility of maintaining some current zero ratings is still being negotiated. An in-depth discussion is not expected to occur before early in 1991.

The Council also reviewed the temporary measure of the VAT. It is already accepted that for a certain length of time after January 1, 1993, the VAT will still be added in the importing country.

I would like to come back to Canada for a moment and talk about distributors, because one of their extremely important jobs is to distribute books and periodicals. There are various methods of distribution, but there is one that is called "Periodical Marketers". There is a firm called "Periodical Marketers of Canada."

[English]

It is > —a national association of 31 geographic wholesalers of periodicals and paperback books, serving some 23,000 retail outlets with primarily English-language material.

[Translation]

So, that means it is a network which does not involve the bookstores themselves, but affects newspaper depots, smokeshops, and some pharmacies which have pocketbooks or magazines in a corner.

[English]

> The estimated retail value of publications handled by PMC Members—typically some 2,500 to 3,000 periodical titles—

[Translation]

Of course, that covers American, French or British titles.

[English]

> —and 6,000 paperback book titles—

[Translation]

Once again, needless to say, most of these are not Canadian titles, most of them are American.

[English]

> —will be of the order of $600 million in 1990.

> Our member firms constitute one of the most remarkable marketing and distribution systems in Canada, in that through their combined efforts, publications are made available within days of their printing to a mass market of consumers throughout the country. The range of periodicals handled by PMC members includes weekly news-magazines, popular and general interest consumer magazines, special interest periodicals and foreign newspapers. The major sources, by national origin, of this material are Canada, the U.S., Britain and France.

The GST and Canadian Publishing

> Members of Periodical Marketers of Canada are fundamentally opposed to application of the Goods and Services Tax (GST) to reading matter. Their major concern is for the depressing effect which the GST will have on periodical and book sales. Presentations to the House Finance Committee by publishing groups indicated that each percentage point increase in price results in a similar percentage point reduction in demand. Other reasons include the following:
> > Free and unfettered exchange of information has always been regarded as a privilege of citizenship in Canada. At no time in our history has the federal government imposed a tax on reading matter.
> > As the existing Federal Sales Tax has not been imposed on the printing or sale of publications in Canada, the GST will constitute an entirely new and onerous tax without offsetting savings from the elimination of the FST.

[Translation]

Because, as we are constantly reminded in government circles, that this is just a change of tax. That in any case we were paying the manufacturers' sales tax. That really it is just a change to make things easier. But we forget that when we are talking about books there has never been a tax on books, not on fabrication or binding or printing or distribution at any stage. Consequently, the story about the tax on manufactured goods is far from convincing.

[English]

> A well informed citizenry is vital to Canada's political, social and economic well being. Taxation of information materials constitutes a serious impediment to the goal of a knowledgeable, informed electorate.

Of course, if they were to inform an electorate, some of the people who make up the government would not be there at all. Perhaps that is the reason for this. The brief of the Periodical Marketers of Canada continues:

> Canada recognizes it faces a serious literacy problem, in that up to 25 per cent of Canadians may be functionally illiterate. The taxation of reading materials imposes a further burden on educational organizations and a discouragement to the non-literate to become readers.

> At a time when the maintenance of a distinctive Canadian culture is becoming increasingly problematic, the imposition of a tax on periodicals and books will impose a heavy economic burden on Canadian publishing companies, most of whom constitute small businesses and are ill-equipped to withstand further erosion of their customer base.
> In view of the concerns enumerated above, Periodical Marketers of Canada has requested that periodicals and books be zero-rated, should the GST be implemented in Canada. To date, this appeal has been ignored by the Minister of Finance, the House of Commons Finance Committee, and the House as a whole. We earnestly urge the Senate . . . to correct this serious error in order that Canadian periodical and book publishing be spared a tax burden which will inevitably contribute to the demise of distinctive Canadian voices in these fields.
> The GST as it is presently constituted poses serious technical and administrative problems for our members. This is due, in part, to the fact that periodicals and paperback books are supplied on a fully returnable basis.

[Translation]

They are not sold, they are put into storage.

[English]

> Retailers determine the extent and volume of their order, and remit only for those copies sold. The GST legislation, however, appears to trigger tax liability at the time of original supply to the retailer. Revenue Canada has indicated it does not regard periodical distribution as being qualified for inclusion within the consignment provisions of the GST legislation. The necessity to collect the GST from retailers and to subsequently issue GST credits for unsold publications will impose an undue, costly and complicated administrative responsibility on our members.

And this was supposed to be simple. I remember that that was one of the characteristics of this tax. Senators can see how simple it will be for these people.

Senator Frith: Simple, yes—it is all very easy for an actuarial genius.

Senator Hébert: It will certainly not be simple for periodical marketers in Canada.

> For importers of publications, the consequences to cash flow will be even more burdensome in that the GST legislation requires payment at time of entry of the tax on all of the product being imported. In the case of periodicals and paperbacks, some 50 per cent of all product is returned unsold. Distributors will thus face a wait of some weeks before they are able to recover via input credits the excess tax they will have paid on product at time of entry. Financing this additional charge will represent a heavy burden on importers, seriously affecting their productivity and efficiency.
> The existence of a domestic periodical distribution system having the capability of making Canadian product available to citizens across the country is entirely dependent on non-Canadian material being available to sustain the cost of a national distribution system. Withdrawal of non-Canadian product because distributors are unable or uninterested in absorbing the added cost of financing cash flow to meet GST obligations would seriously erode the system, possibly rendering it uneconomic and incapable of continued existence.
> Other Consequences of the GST
> Members of PMC are concerned about the broader consequences of the GST—the adverse effects it will have on the broader economic and social fabric of Canada. Our concern is based on extensive consultations we have had with accounting advisors, the concerns we have had expressed to us by many of the thousands of retailers we serve, and our own independent judgments, formed from the collective experience of our members as business proprietors and as participants in publishing and distributive activity in Canada.

[Translation]

Of course, they are all wrong; only the government is right.

[English]

> The following observations serve to indicate our concerns with the GST as a whole, and lead us to the conclusion that the tax should be abandoned in its entirety.

[Translation]

Consquently, they are not simply defending their own cause, but they are also denouncing all the negative effects of the GST.

[English]

> 1. Despite assurances by the Department of Finance, the GST actually represents a totally new tax, and is not merely a replacement of the existing Federal Sales Tax. The FST, at 13.5%, is levied at the manufacturing level on manufactured goods only (representing 30 per cent of the GDP), while the GST will apply at 7% on the retail value of all goods and services, except basic food, medical supplies and resale housing. As the tax is to be imposed at the retail level, the effect will be to maintain taxation on manufactured goods at approximately the present level of the existing FST, while also extending taxation to a much broader segment of the economy than in the past.

2. In view of the insistence of the Department of Finance that the existing FST is counter-productive and must be eliminated, the Minister has not explained why the tax was raised in 1989 from 12% to 13.5%.

3. Apologists for the GST assert that the FST is unfair because it affects only the manufacturing sector of the economy. However, the present FST is paid by all sectors, in a ratio equitable to their consumption of manufactured goods. It is worthy of note that the FST does not now apply to production equipment or goods used in production.

4. When the GST was introduced, the Department of Finance assured Canadians it would be revenue-neutral, and would raise only sufficient monies to replace the FST and provide rebates to low-income Canadians. However, in the technical paper outlining the GST, it was stated that revenues would be applied to deficit reduction.

It is very difficult to understand this reasoning but I do not try any longer. To continue:

5. Canadians generally recognize that the federal deficit has reached an excessive level. However, the Minister of Finance is unable to assure Canadians that additional monies raised by the GST will not be spent on purposes other than deficit reduction.

That was made quite clear the other day when senators on the other side voted without exception against the motion presented by one of the independent Senators to that effect. To continue:

In addition, it is not possible for the federal government to assure Canadians the GST will not soon be raised beyond 7%.

Oh, no, the government will not say that. To continue:

6. Most countries which have introduced VAT-type taxes have experienced a revenue flow considerably in excess of original expectations. The Department of Finance is unable to assure Canadians that the revenue flow from the GST in 1991 may not be closer to $35 billion rather than the $25 billion estimate.

What is 10 billion? To continue:

7. Federal tax reform has been calculated to harmonize taxation regimes between Canada and the United States, so as to discourage Canadian emigration. It is perplexing, therefore, that Canada would wish to embark on a VAT-type tax when the United States does not have such a system.

8. It is recognized that the GST will provide a benefit to business corporations by virtue of the fact as registrants under the legislation, they will be able to recover their GST payments through input tax credits.

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Senator, would you answer a question? You have been talking about the amount of money the government claims it will get from the GST, as well as the effect of a VAT tax imposed in other countries but not the United States. In the research you carried out, can you tell us whether the tax experts who studied this are expecting that it will bring in more or less than the government is claiming?

We have heard conflicting statements about what the government will do with any surplus. Is there any guarantee it will apply it to the deficit? In addition, what has been the experience in other countries as to the rate of tax? Does it stay the same? The federal government has claimed it does not intend to raise the tax in the immediate future.

As well, do you have any information as to why the Americans have not put in place a tax similar to this, and what effect that will have on us since they are our largest trading partner? Perhaps you can comment on what you think that could do to a trading relationship which seems to be in trouble since free trade began.

Senator Hébert: I am not an expert by any means, but I understand the Americans were not inclined to introduce such a tax because in a country where you have many levels of taxation, such as here and the United States, it is very difficult to administer. That is why Québec has done what it has done with respect to the GST and its provincial tax.

As far as the amount of money it will bring in is concerned, I just read to you the comment that the Department of Finance is unable to assure Canadians that the revenue flow from the GST in 1991 will not be closer to $35 billion rather than the $25 billion estimate. In other countries it has brought in more money than predicted. Our Minister of Finance, of course, is very prudent and does not mention that the government may take out of our pockets about $10 billion too much. To continue:

> 9. Notwithstanding assurances of the Department of Finance, we anticipate that the GST will represent a significant factor in increasing the rate of inflation in Canada. Existing forecasts of minimal impact are based on the presumption that manufacturers will pass on savings from elimination of the FST, and that labour unions will not seek offsetting compensation. The Canadian Labour Congress has warned that its members will seek compensatory increases in their contracts.

There is the inflation. To continue:

> The announcement by the federal government of the establishment of a watchdog agency to monitor price effects of FST elimination may be an indication of the magnitude of the problem to come.

Senator Frith: Senator, before you leave the subject of the GST as a replacement for the manufacturers' sales tax, I wonder if you noticed the story in the Globe and Mail yesterday, December 3. The headlines is: "Study raises questions over GST benefits".

We have often heard of organizations outside the government, economic study groups and others, who have, as a result of their studies, raised serious questions as to some of the assumptions made regarding the GST and some of the selling points used by the government with reference to the GST. I do not think any argument made by the government is more common or has been more persistent than the fact that anything, even a GST, is worthwhile as a replacement for the manufacturers' sales tax. They argued that during our committee hearings and they have repeated it time after time after time. They tell us we will love the GST because we hate the manufacturers' sales tax.

This study is not from an outside organization, it is from Statistics Canada. The sub-heading is: "Statscan conclusions not so positive as Finance Minister has argued". It reads as follows:

> OTTAWA—A study published by Statistics Canada on Friday raises serious questions about one of the major assumptions used by Finance Minister Michael Wilson to promote the economic benefits of the proposed goods and services Tax.
> In singling out the benefits of the proposed 7 percent tax, Mr. Wilson and his Finance Department have said repeatedly that the existing federal manufacturers sales tax is "a silent killer of jobs," in part because it imposes a hidden tax on exports.

• (0630)

> The GST will replace the manufacturers' tax.
> "The replacement of the FST system with GST would, on average, reduce exporters' costs by almost 1 per cent, thereby making Canadian producers more competitive in international markets and increasing opportunities in export industries," the Finance Department said in its technical paper on the GST, issued last year.

That is 1989.

> But the Statscan study, which quantifies the effect of indirect taxes on the prices of commodities, says the impact of the FST on exports is only 0.5 per cent, significantly less than the estimate from the Finance Department.

So what we see is a statement of the Finance Department, cut very significantly by the Statscan study.

and this is understandable, this will not be great news to you:

> Mr. Wilson declined to comment on the study, which he said he hadn't seen.

On the basis of what is said, and on what he has been saying, he wishes he has never seen, and probably wishes he never will see.

> A Finance Department official conceded that the Statscan study shows the effects of the FST to be less than the 0.8 per cent figure his department had calculated.

Here he is trying to make the best of a bad scene.

> However, he said the GST's real advantage is not so much on lowering the price of exports, in any case.

After we have been hearing all last year, and this year, that that is one of the major advantages, that it will lower the price of exports and thereby stop being a silent killer of jobs, it is neither silent nor a killer of jobs, according to the study.

The study goes on:

> Bigger benefits flow from the GST because the current manufacturers' sales tax discriminates against Canadian-made goods in favor of imports and because business will be able to claim a credit for GST on inputs, thereby reducing the cost of business investment, he said.

This is still the Finance Department.

> The study, published in The Canadian Economic Observer, a Statscan publication, calculates the effect of indirect taxes including sales and excise taxes, import duties and property taxes on the price of goods. It also calculates the values of subsidies received through the production and distribution process.
> "When the GST replaces the FST, investment in plant and equipment will no longer be taxed," the study said. "Under the GST, exports will also be exempt from tax, but here the impact on effective rates will be less noticeable, since under existing practice, the impact of FST on exports is confined to the indirect effect coming from the contribution of intermediate inputs (in 1989, the rate was only 0.5 per cent)."
> Total indirect taxes increased by 85 per cent between 1981 and 1989 or about 8 per cent a year.
> The effective indirect tax rate ranged from 5.2 per cent for food to 122.8 per cent on tobacco products and alcoholic beverages.

So much for the long sales job about the attractiveness of the GST as a replacement for the manufacturers' sales tax.

Another Wilson balloon burst.

You had not, perhaps, noticed that on the subject you were dealing with. Am I right?

Senator Hébert: Yes, you are right. I thank you very much for bringing it to our attention. I am sure that it will help us all to understand what we are dealing with, which is a very bad bill.

Senator Olson: That is the question to answer now.

Senator Frith: "Had you noticed it?," was my question. His answer was, "No".

Senator Hébert: Senator Frith is right, as he very often is.

In the conclusion of the Periodical Marketers of Canada presentation it urges members of the Senate to recognize the virtually universal rejection of the GST by Canadians, and to take steps to return the legislation to the House of Commons.

> We believe The Senate has a constitutional responsibility to carefully review legislation originating with the House of Commons, and to withhold its concurrence if it is felt that passage of such legislation would be detrimental to the best interests of Canadians.

I think we have proven that many times.

> In the case of the Goods and Services Tax, we urge that this legislation not be assented to, and that it be returned to the House of Commons.

[Translation]

A number of senators facing me, I am convinced, are beginning to be moved by the unanimity of the witnesses statements. How could they not be? They would of course have preferred not to hear them so they could fall asleep in peace this evening, after reading a good book! In any case, most of them aren't even listening, which is the safest way of keeping your mind safe from any thoughts that are not in conformity with the party line. To those who are worried, I imagine that my good friend Senator David would say, as he said to me yesterday:

> They may be right, but believe me, they are exaggerating. Their arguments are emotional and rarely supported by clear figures. Let's rely on Mr. Wilson—he is not emotional and he knows how to count.

That is the end of that imaginary quotation from Senator David.

So, I would not like to end this discussion (I am slowly coming to the end) without quoting at least one study that could not be called emotional since it was put out by the very serious Marketing and Economics Group of Woods Gordon Management Consultants. I will not read the entire study to you, just the summary because time is passing and it is nearly seven o'clock!

[English]

Woods Gordon was asked to confine its analysis to the economic impact of the tax, although it is evident that there will be considerable cultural and social impacts should the tax be implemented. The focus of the work was on 12 representative case studies consisting of four book publishers, four booksellers and four periodical publishers drawn from a number of provinces.

Some investigation of industry statistics was also carried out, although detailed study of industry impact was beyond the scope of the present work.

Most books and periodicals in Canada, and in many other countries, have been largely exempted from commodity taxes—

TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

• (0640)

Hon. Jacques Hébert: That is, federal and provincial sales taxes—

—in the interest of avoiding barriers to communication and culture. The recent White Paper on Tax Reform has proposed a universal end to exemptions with the imposition of a multi-stage sales tax. The tax may take one of several different forms but the broad effects on publishers and booksellers are expected to be the same.

For purposes of the analysis it has been assumed that the provinces will tax whatever the federal authorities tax, and that the combined rate will be, effectively, 15 per cent of the retail sales price. Some 200 Canadian-based book publishers produce and import just under half the books sold in Canada, and generate sales of approximately $600 million dollars, or $900 million dollars in retail. The balance of books sold in Canada are imported directly by individuals, institutions, et cetera. The total value of the retail book market in Canada is some $2 billion.

Most publishers are small and highly dependent on government grants. Grants and other measures to assist the industry have been put in place to counter the strong influence of imported books and to help foster Canadian content in the educational and entertainment market.

The economies of publishing trade books—trade books, novels, art books, how-to-do books, et cetera—which account for almost half of the industry's sales, are quite different from those of publishing text books for elementary, high school and college use. Tradebook publishing is a marginal activity for all but a few, since success increasingly depends on producing best sellers for which foreign publishing, film and television rights may be sold.

Textbook publishing, under the stimulus of "Buy Canadian" policies have been more profitable, but heavy investment is required and prospects generally have dimmed as funding for print materials has suffered under budgetary constraints in several provinces. About 5,000 people are directly employed by book publishers.

The book selling industry is not well documented. Apart from two large chains with 50 per cent of the retail market, excluding sales to campus bookstores and non-traditional outlets of mass merchandisers, most bookstores are relatively small, single or two or three-branch operations. Small booksellers generally make low profits and subsidize their operations by taking sub-normal salaries as owner-operators.

[Translation]

What always amazed me is that the pleasure of working in a bookstore, of handling books, selling them and looking at them somehow makes up for the meager wages. You do earn much less if you work in a bookstore than in a pharmacy or a hardware store. That is because the magic of books is operating even on the employees of a small bookstore.

[English]

There is an animated discussion in the other corner and it is not very helpful for the stenographers. I personally do not mind, but it is not very considerate toward the stenographers.

Although book stores sales have, in general, kept pace with the rate of growth of retail sales, Canadian family expenditures on books dropped 38 per cent in real terms between 1978 and 1984.

Periodical publishing is a very diverse industry with some 1,100 Canadian publishers producing around $835 million dollars in sales, of which some $475 million dollars came from advertising sales and the balance from subscription and single copy sales. Imports account for about 60 per cent of combined single copy and subscription sales.

Periodicals may be categorized by subject matter or by the profit/non-profit motive of the publisher. Publishers derive their revenues from advertising (about 60 per cent of total revenues) subscription, and single copy sales. The Canadian periodical industry as a whole and 60 per cent of periodical publishers incurred a small loss in 1984.

A small loss, not a profit.

Of the four groups surveyed by Statistics Canada, only the very largest with annual revenues greater than 1 million, representing less than 10 per cent of all publishers, made a pre-tax profit in 1984. Periodical sales grew strongly in the 1970s, as did advertising in them, but in the past few years periodicals have lost some ground.

Books and periodical publishers and book sellers alike face other economic threats besides a new tax.

Senator Frith: Why don't we let senators opposite fill the time with their talk.

Senator Hébert: I am hearing voices. I am hearing the voices of senators.

Senator Frith: It is all right. They are real voices; they are not fanciful.

Senator Hébert:

Prime among these are postal rate increases which could potentially add some $170 million to the industry's costs and the removal of barriers against unfair U.S. competition, the future of which the bilateral trade negotiations with the United States are bringing into question. It is also evident that applying a new commodity tax equally to domestic and imported books and periodicals will be very difficult. Many imports, which are imported by mail in small value packages, will escape tax unless the government chooses to spend far more on collection than it derives in revenue.

As noted earlier, imports account for over half the sales of both books and periodicals. So the inability to tax a proportion of imports will mean that they will enjoy an unfair advantage over books and periodicals published domestically.

If a commodity tax is imposed, most book publishers and sellers and most periodical publishers will seek to pass it on to readers and/or advertisers.

The published studies on the way in which demand by readers and advertisers will shift in reaction to price increases are not conclusive. Furthermore, most studies and industry tests have looked at price sensitivity in the context of constant relative income and constant relative prices of competitive products.

The White Paper on Tax Reform poses a completely new situation in which many consumers' disposable income will rise and the relative prices of most goods and services will change. However, the one thing that is clear is that since books and periodicals are not currently subject to tax, books and periodical prices will likely rise faster than most other commodity prices.

The economic statement accompanying the White Paper projects inflation at about 3 per cent after tax reform and, in this context, there must be declines in the price of other goods and services which compete with books and periodicals. Other industry may have the opportunity to cut employment costs in recognition of higher after-tax incomes, but the book and periodical industries generally pay low salaries and wages, and employees could be expected to resist any pay restraint.

In view of the uncertainty over the impact of price increases on demand, it was decided to test three different reactions by publishers, booksellers, readers and advertisers. We believe that these scenarios represent the most reasonable range of reaction that might occur, although we suspect the second scenario is the least likely of the three.

• (0650)

The first scenario assumes that the market will bear no increases and that the whole burden of a new tax falls on the supplier. Total physical volume of sales is assumed to remain static, as are costs.

The second scenario assumes that the market, advertisers and readers will bear half the costs of the tax.

[Translation]

I can hear you from here, Senator Bolduc.

[English]

They are not listening and most of the time they would not understand, in any event.

The second scenario assumes that the market, advertisers and readers will bear half the costs of the tax without reducing the physical volume of purchases. Costs are unchanged as in the previous scenario.

Finally, it was assumed that publishers and booksellers would pass on a 15% price increase to the market, which would react by reducing its physical purchases by a similar amount, leaving the industry with unchanged revenues. However, the industry would reduce its variable costs.

The table opposite summarized the pre-tax profit position after grants and other income of each of the cases studied at present and under the three scenarios. It will be evident that only the large firm in favoured categories, i.e. textbook publishing, emerged from the tax with some profits left.

I think I will repeat that sentence.

It will be evident that only the large firms in favoured categories, i.e., textbook publishing, emerged from the tax with some profits left.

I may remind you that it is Woods Gordon Management Consultant that is talking after a long and in-depth study.

Senator Frith: Why is that?

Senator Hébert: Why is that?

Senator Frith: Yes. Read that sentence again.

Senator Hébert:

It will be evident that only the large firms in favoured categories, i.e. textbook publishing—

That they will survive.

Senator Frith: Because they have such huge volume and guarantees.

Senator Hébert: That's right. They will have some profit left.

Senator Frith: And guaranteed sales.

Senator Hébert: Yes, but the others will disappear.

Senator Frith: The taxpayer will pick up that tab, because those books are mostly sold to school boards.

Senator Hébert: That is right.

The most favourable scenario is generally the absorb—50% one, the scenario which most cases believe to be highly optimistic because they believe that the market is more sensitive to price increases than this scenario implies. We generally concur with these reservations, especially insofar as short-term market reactions are concerned. In the longer term, markets may be somewhat less price sensitive, but few publishers or booksellers have the financial resources to withstand even shortterm reversals. The impact on the small firms, generally Canadian-owned and entirely Canadian-based, will be particularly hard.

We also examined the possibility of firms making drastic cuts in costs or in the nature of their operation if forced to do so by unacceptable earnings. Changes examined included large staff cuts in various functions, closing branch operations, reducing expenses for advertising and promotion, reducing investment in new projects and reducing the number of works by Canadian authors. Many of these changes would be unacceptable to the firms concerned who already earn subnormal returns, and who remain in business largely because of their dedication and commitments.

Other changes, that is reducing outlets and investment, often mean sacrificing the future in order to survive for the present. In any event, in most cases even these drastic cuts are not sufficient to change the financial result by enough to tip the balance from bankruptcy to viability. As noted earlier, the ability of firms to withstand reduced profits or increased losses in these industries is minimal. Most of the smaller firms are under-capitalized, and increased losses on the scale shown are sufficient to wipe out their equity in one or two years. The table below shows the number of years required to eliminate the equity under each scenario.

The result of the case studies are confirmed by an analysis of industry data using the same three scenarios. The book publishing industry, which is currently profitable in all sectors, although many smaller firms make a loss and many rely heavily on grants, shows a loss in all scenarios for Canadian-owned trade book publishers, and in all but the absorb-50% scenario for foreign-owned trade book publishers. Canadian and foreign-owned textbook publishers show a loss under the absorb-100% scenario, and only marginal profits under the other two scenarios.

The bookseller industry, which is currently profitable in the large and medium-sized groups, would show large losses in all sized groups under the first scenario; that is, it cannot absorb the tax. Profits are also severely reduced under the two other scenarios; that is, firms pass on the whole tax and see volume decline, and when firms are able to pass on half the tax without any drop in sales. There is a marginal difference in results between these larger two scenarios. However, both are somewhat less severe in their impact on profit than the first scenario.

The periodical publishing industry as a whole incurs a small loss at present with only 40% of publishers being profitable. Of the four sized groups of publishers surveyed by Statistics Canada in 1984, only the very largest, with annual revenues in excess of one million dollars, made a profit. This group accounts for less than 10% of the total number of publishers surveyed. Under all three scenarios, every group makes a loss, although within each group there will be individual firms which continue to be profitable.

We believe the scenarios presented represent the reasonable range of possibilities for the industry, and that the severe financial difficulties projected for most elements, particularly the small firms, are likely to occur. The industry itself believes that some of our scenarios, in terms of cost-cutting and the market's willingness to accept price increases, are optimistic. We are inclined to agree, but have shown these scenarios because we recognize governments may have a different perspective. To the extent that the scenarios are optimistic, then the situation will be worse than projected. In view of the likely consequences of an MSST, it seems appropriate to continue the long tradition of exempting books and periodicals from commodity taxes.

I am coming slowly to the end—

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Hébert: —but there are still some things that I would love to have shared with senators.

[Translation]

I would like to quote a few lines from a short study carried out by one the researchers at the Library of Parliament, namely Mr. Terrence Thomas from the Economics Division.

This is a brand new study, dated November 2, 1990, and because it is so recent, I think we should take a look at it. It is very short. I know Senator David is always interested in knowing how long things are. In this case, not very long, only five pages long.

[English]

Publishing has long had a special position among Canadian industries. Since Confederation—

[Translation]

Of course, we read that before, but it is worth repeating.

[English]

—for example, books have not been taxed, and the government has several programs that involve subsidies to publishing. A study by Woods Gordon in 1987 ("Impact of a Multi-Stage Tax on Book Publishers, Booksellers, and Periodical Publishers") set out the favoured position of publishers under the existing tax system:

> Under the existing FST (Federal Sales Tax) system, exemption from the tax is extended to most books, magazines and newspapers. Manufacturers of these items are entitled to exemption on all their purchases of raw materials—

[Translation]

I think I should repeat for senator David, who asked me the question on Monday, I think. Senator David, you did ask if there were exemptions for products such as equipment, presses, etc.

Let me read you a few lines from Woods Gordon which, I believe, will answer your question.

[English]

> —consumables and production machinery. Non-production assets, such as office furniture and equipment, must be acquired FST-paid by all manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers of such publications.

[Translation]

So, the manufacturers sales tax must be paid on office furniture in printing operations, but not on what actually makes up the books.

[English]

> It should be noted, however, that for sales of these non-production assets, the FST is paid on either the Canadian physical manufacturer's sale price or on the duty paid value if imported—often one or two trade levels before that of the purchaser.
> Most provincial governments exempt books and periodicals from retail sales tax. However, in some provinces, periodicals sold on newsstands are taxed.
> In other words, the existing indirect tax system in Canada provided an indirect subsidy to the publishing sector, allowing prices in publishing to be lower than they would have been if taxes were spread evenly over all sectors. There are several reasons, of course, why publishing received such favourable treatment, but we can ignore these reasons for the moment. What is important now is that the proposed Goods and Services Tax (GST) will eliminate much of this implicit subsidy.
> A first effect of GST on publishing, therefore, is that the prices of published material should rise relatively more than the prices of other products. If consumers are sensitive to price changes of published material—an important point to be discussed below—the purchase of such material will fall and the revenues of publishers will also fall. Given the precarious financial position of many publishers, the lost revenues could drive some out of business (or force them to change current practices). In addition to these price effects, there are income effects to consider; if GST increases income, as some predict, there will be positive income effects leading to more purchases of books and periodicals. Obviously, what is wanted is the net effect of price and income changes; here, most observers think that the price effects will swamp the income effects (more detail will be provided below).

[Senator Hébert.]

The above focuses directly on the supply side, on companies that publish books and periodicals. There is also the demand side. Each sale is, of course, also a purchase, so it might seem that we can be indifferent to which side we analyze. But when we look at the demand side, at the people buying books and magazines, we see more than the mere purchase of commodities—we discover reading. Although the effects of GST on reading are obviously related to the effects on the publishers—fewer books and periodicals will be bought and read—reading is not this easily measured.

Reading is a skill that is important in a developed economy and in a democracy. Both the economic and political systems work better with literate citizens, and it is for this reason that publishing, with its obvious links to reading, has enjoyed special status in Canada (as well as in many other countries). In terms of the current GST debate, many people argue that publishing should be "zero rated"—that is, the output of publishers should not be taxed, while any GST paid on inputs by publishers would be fully deductible. Zero-rating would re-establish the indirect subsidy the current system offers publishers.

In its brief to the Senate's Banking Committee, the Don't Tax Reading Coalition provided several reasons for a zero rating for publishers and booksellers. The following list is based on the brief:

1. A zero rating would be consistent with current domestic and international prices;

2. All stages of the manufacturing process, from paper to thread, have been exempt from the Federal Sales Tax since Confederation;

3. Consumers and producers have never paid tax on reading matter;

4. As 75 per cent of books in Canada are imported from the U.S., booksellers would face a cash flow problem if required to pay GST at the border;

5. Education, essential to our remaining internationally competitive, will be hit with the tax (and there is no guarantee that the revenues from the tax will flow back to our schools and universities);

6. The principle of tax-free reading and writing is a democratic one and does not discriminate among Canadians; and

7. A GST on books and periodicals masks any support the government might give to reading and writing, and certainly throws up contradictory signals about official policy towards literacy . . . .

As mentioned above, what GST does to publishing depends on the net result of price and income effects. Economists have developed the concept of "elasticity" to provide a useful way of summarizing the possible influence of price or income changes on the quantity demanded of some good or service. The elasticity gives the percentage change in the quantity demanded following a 1 per cent change in price (or income). The following

The estimates not in parentheses come from an Informetrica study prepared for the Department of Communications . . .

● (0710)

The minus signs before the price elasticities reflect the fact that an increase in price will lead to a decrease in quantity demanded; the income elasticities are positive, showing that an increase in income will lead to an increase in the quantity demanded. Note that there is a seeming precision to these estimates that may not be warranted . . .

The Informetrica study noted that the elasticities estimated by them and by Coopers & Lybrand were roughly consistent. As the Informetrica study concluded:

Those studies highlight the importance of the income response providing an offset to the shift in relative prices. However, the general conclusion is relatively clear that personal consumption of print media will be lower under a comprehensive MSST {Multi-Stage Sales Tax} regime than it otherwise would be. (p.32)

By removing the inefficiencies of the old tax, the new tax was forecast to improve productivity and the international competitiveness of Canadian firms. For 1991, Gross Domestic Produce was forecast to be $288 million higher than it would have been under the old tax system. Total consumer expenditure was forecast to be $224 million higher, but consumer expenditure on books, magazines and newspapers was forecast to fall by $24 million.

CONCLUSIONS

The Informetrica estimates are by no means precise. The gains in GDP, to cite only one example, are probably much too high given that the GST will not be revenue neutral. Nevertheless, the Informetrica study probably provides rough orders of magnitude for the effect of the GST on publishing in Canada. Price effects will be more important than income effects. Without the implicit subsidy that the current tax system provides (and that a zero rating under GST will restore), publishing will suffer relative to other sectors in the economy. Given the precarious financial condition of many publishers there could be considerable shake-out in the industry.

That means a lot of businesses will have to close their doors.

I have a lot of other material, but I feel it would be unfair to continue when other people here want to speak, so I will conclude rapidly.

[Translation]

During the past hours, or should I say days, I believe I exhausted every argument in favour of the government making books tax exempt, which arguments also apply to magazines and newspapers. I have repeated, in summary form, the arguments put forward by professional associations as well as by independent experts, as you may have seen tonight or this morning, I have lost track.

I echoed the earnest pleas of cultural groups which, although they do not benefit directly from the publishing industry, are very much aware of its importance to a nation's culture. I recall that all countries that have a similar tax—except for one, Denmark—either exempt books or tax them at a preferential rate. Finally, I mentioned the example of the Government of Quebec, which, after taking a very rigid position similar to that of the Mulroney government, finally saw the light. It realized that taxing books in a country like ours is a crime against culture, the kind of crime intellectuals and, through them, the population of this country, do not forgive easily.

I imagine the Government of Quebec gave in because it was afraid of the common front of intellectuals throughout the province, of the publishers, booksellers, librarians, unions and practically all pressure groups in Quebec except, of course, the manufacturers association. That was the only exception. This is a very clear case where fear was the instigator of wisdom.

One wonders why the federal government remains unmoved by similar arguments, not just from Quebec but from all Canadian provinces and the Territories. One wonders why the fear of being forever ostracized by the intellectuals of this country fails to move Mulroney, Wilson, Masse and the rest. Is this another demonstration of the arrogance that tends to take over small minds when they are in power? Is this a form of contempt for culture, a contempt that has always been a characteristic of conservative governments and right-wing parties?

Of course, when the party in power—two more years left—is down to 14 per cent in the polls, it's reasoning maybe that it can hardly go down much further. What is one unpopular measure more or less? The 14 per cent must include all Canadians in favour of the GST, in other words, the wealthy who are not bothered by this tax; the manufacturers who stand to benefit very nicely; and a few innocents who trust the Conservative Party's policies without asking questions. Among those innoncents I think we should include the senators opposite, including those independent senators who must be Conservatives because they always vote with the government. I am referring to Senators Molson and Everett.

So when you are down to 14 per cent in the polls, you can afford to thumb your nose a little longer at the 86 per cent who don't agree in any case. The Mulroney government reasons as follows: let's ram the GST through, whatever it takes; let's limit debate in the House of Commons by using closure as often as we can; let's abuse the Constitution and stack the Senate with eight more Tory senators. With those independents who are shameless Tories, we have a majority. Let's use the Speaker of the Senate to change the rules of this Chamber as required.

The goal is to ensure, by fair means or foul, that the GST is passed by the Senate soon enough so that it will come into force on January 1. The opposition will scream, a few bleeding-heart editorial writers will perfunctorily criticize our less than democratic methods, the people will complain a little, and then we'll prorogue Parliament until March 1991. Hurrah for the holidays! Only a few days left before Christmas to do your shopping. Jingle bells! Jingle bells!

Mulroney and Wilson will be satirized a bit during special holiday programming on the CBC. Sure, we'll stay down at 14 per cent in the polls but the GST will raise billions. When the time comes—maybe a year before the election—we will have enough money in the pot to distribute those pre-electoral goodies. If the intellectuals are still screaming, if Senator Chaput-Rolland—who just came in—is still hanging on to the coattails of the Prime Minister, as she swore to do in her historic speech, we may be able to reduce the GST on books, even though 20 or so publishers will have gone bankrupt and 50 or so bookstores will have closed their doors. Maybe then we can think about promises!

There will still be enough to woo the female electorate with a nebulous daycare project or some other program that is popular according to the polls. That's it in a nutshell, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to speak on Bill C-62, the first observation that I would like to make is that I do not think I will be as long as Senator Hébert. I realize that many members opposite will be disappointed by that observation, but nevertheless that is the case.

What I would like to do in my remarks is deal with four separate subjects, the first of which will be to talk about the regressivity and the unfairness of the GST and the way it is being implemented. The second point will be to talk about the impact of the GST on the Atlantic Provinces in general, and Nova Scotia in particular. The third point I would like to deal with is the fact that the government has often argued that there are no alternatives to the GST, and I would like to talke about some of those alternatives. Finally, I would like to make a number of concluding remarks on the debate over the GST that has permeated all walks of life in the past couple of months.

It seems to me that one of the best ways to begin my observations on the GST is to give you some illustrative examples of the kinds of letters which many of us have received, not just on this side of the chamber, but I believe on the other side of the chamber as well, with respect to the GST, and with respect how people feel about it. I have selected a couple just because they are ones that I have received recently. Let me give you an example.

Owen Calhoun, writing to me recently from Burlington, Ontario, said the following:

> Dear Senator Kirby;
> I have just been reading the scenario presented to you by Laurent Thibault, President of the CMA.
> The uncertainty of the GST being in place by Jan. 1/91 has nothing to do with making it difficult for companies to make the necessary capital outlays for equipment. It is nothing more than anxiety to retrieve the FST credit on their inventories.
> I appreciate your concern for assurances that companies pass along the savings from the eradication of the FST but your concern is in vain.
> The consumer and taxpayer will not reap any benefits from the GST, now or ever.
> Most prices have been increasing over the past few months and continue to increase to compensate for the FST credit. The government is too far away from the forest to see the trees and the GST will be the final straw on the camel's back.
> The people of this country are fed up with money grabbing governments and it is time that we got back to a government of the people, for the people and by the people. A Majority government is not a people's government and should be prevented with a controlled number of seats.
> The government needs a new set of rules laid down by the people and enforced by the Senate and Governor-General.
> The recent act of Mulroney to appoint new Senators for biased reasons indicates that the government may control the Senate for their own selfish reasons. All the more reason for an elected Senate of unbiased Senators.
> For the sake of the Canadian working people and a united Canada, put the GST in the trash can where it belongs.

Please defeat the GST. I give you that as an illustration of the kinds of letters which we have been receiving for a long time on our side of the house. As I go through my speech, I will be referring to other letters which I think reflect fairly and clearly the view of a great number of Canadians: that the GST ought to be stopped, for a variety of reasons. One of those reasons is the fact that the tax is perceived to be, by a great many people, both regressive and unfair.

Indeed, the words "regressive" and "unfair" were the words which the committee heard more than any others. Witnesses from St. John's to Vancouver, from Toronto to Whitehorse and Yellowknife, all talked about regressivity and unfairness. They all talked about how the GST will hurt small businesses, non-profit organizations, charities, health care practitioners, and low-income Canadians from coast to coast.

All of this, despite Finance Minister Wilson's promise before the committee that, I quote:

> GST protects Canadians of low and modest income. It is a fair tax.

I would like to offer a three-stage rebuttal to Mr. Wilson in the form of excerpts from testimony before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee during its cross-country hearings this summer.

First, I would like to cite passages from the committee report that speaks to the issue of the fairness, or in reality, the unfairness of Bill C-62. Secondly, I would like to cite excerpts from testimony on general issues from witnesses who appeared before the committee in Ottawa, since these groups tend to represent national organizations. Thirdly, and finally, I would like to turn to more specific testimony, excerpts that reflect the problems created by the GST in each city, province or territory we visited this summer.

To begin with, let me turn to the broad issue of the fairness or the lack of fairness of the tax. Even more important than the technical flaws in the bill—and certainly witness after witness, particularly from the business sector and particularly from the small business sector, talked about the technical flaws in this bill—even more important than the technical flaws is the issue of fairness. Any tax that is going to raise $18.5 billion a year, and constitute a major part of the federal tax arsenal, must include some basic elements of fairness.

The GST and other VAT types of taxes are generally not viewed as meeting this basic requirement of fairness. Generally, the GST and consumption driven taxes are viewed as regressive taxes because lower income individuals spend a greater share of their income on consumption, and are therefore obliged to pay a greater portion of their income in sales tax.

To make the GST more acceptable, the federal government is including a system of enhanced refundable tax credits as part of the GST package. If the basic structure of the tax is going to be determined by the tax credits, then these tax credits must be effective, and must be fair. Instead, the provisions of the bill ensure only temporary fairness. The tax credits do not do the job which they are meant to do.

Indeed, it is precisely in order to deal with this problem, in order to deal with the fact that the tax credits decline in value relative to the cost of living over time, that we introduced as one of our eight amendments, an amendment which would have fully indexed the tax credits and fully indexed the level at which those tax credits cut in. It is indeed unfortunate that members opposite chose not to support that amendment, since the government has repeatedly argued that the tax is fair. That argument is completely undermined by the refusal of members opposite to support that particular amendment which we introduced in this house two weeks ago.

The tax credits and the income threshold which decline, as I have said, over time, are only indexed to take account of inflation in excess of 3 per cent. Thus, the real value of the credits would decline over time and an increasing number of individuals and families would have these benefits reduced. Eventually, even the very poor would not be protected from the extra costs imposed by the GST. Indeed, after only five years these same families would lose up to $300 of the purchasing value of their credits. That amounts to one half the maximum value of credits for which they are eligible, and this reduction in purchasing power, in real value, can occur after only five years.

In the past, the Conservative government has made statements about adjusting these sales tax credits and the income threshold over time. However, the committee was not in a position to evaluate the government's intentions. The committee could only judge the GSt on the basis of legislation which was before it; not on the basis of vague promises made by the government.

Clearly Bill C-62 does not provide for full indexation of the refundable sales tax credit and income threshold and, indeed, this is one of the major failings of the bill. This is not the only problem with GST credits. The $100 single adult credit is not fully obtainable unless the individual's income exceeds $11,169. We are told that this credit is designed to reach the working poor. That is a laudable goal but why must it also be denied to the very poor who are in most dire need of assistance?

Moreover, if Quebec continues to treat the refundable tax credit as income, for purposes of determining social assistance, the GST tax credits would merely offset social assistance benefits to the poor in that province. The net effect would be that the GST tax credit would amount to a transfer of revenue from the federal government to the provincial government and not to those who are most in need of help.

Honourable senators, it is indeed regrettable that about a week ago up to five provinces were contemplating, in effect, taxing back the GST credits to low income Canadians by reducing social assistance payments in an amount equal to the GST tax credit. When that story appeared in the media, the government made no argument and did not attempt to say how strongly it would lobby the provinces not to tax back that money. It did not indicate what other measures would be taken to ensure that the GST tax credits ultimately were received by Canadians for whom they were intended and were not ultimately given to provincial governments. The GST completely fails to take into account the high cost of living in Canada's remote regions. The GST would apply on the final price of goods and services including transportation costs. Transportation costs are a significant component of the price of goods in the north, particularly in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, but equally in some of the more remote regions of southern Canada.

Although the average Whitehorse family would pay $400 more GST than the average Canadian family, this is not reflected in the value of the tax credits. The committee was also told that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 40 per cent higher than in southern Canada, with outlying settlements across the Northwest Territories and particularly in the high arctic having a cost of living which is more expensive than in Yellowknife.

Thus, not only are the credits too small, but the income threshold of $24,800, at which the GST credits start to be reduced, will not reflect the same standard of living in the north as in southern Canada. Again, honourable senators, an attempt was made by members on our side to correct this element of unfairness in the GST. We introduced an amendment last week which would have exempted the GST for families living north of 60, in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

Again, in spite of having heard witnesses testify at hearings in Yellowknife and Whitehorse, it was members opposite who took the view that it was acceptable for the government to impose a GST which was clearly more expensive and more harmful to the people living in remote and northern regions of Canada.

It was members opposite who decided to defeat that liberal amendment because they believe that increasing the cost of living in the north is, in fact, an acceptable policy for the federal government to follow.

The system of tax credits is not the only means by which the government has promised the people that the adverse consequences of the GST would be mitigated.

Some products are to be zero rated while others are to be tax exempt. The government, for example, has made much of the fact that residential rents are tax exempt. This exemption serves to conceal the GST which is to be paid on inputs into the cost of operating rental property. Therefore, that component of the GSt will inevitable wind its way into the rent structure.

In fact, the exemption on rent serves to conceal the GST paid on inputs and it is particularly ironic that this component of the GST should be hidden. One of the strong arguments the government has made in favour of eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax has been that it is invisible. In spite of that, this government is replacing what it says is an invisible federal sales tax with an implicit and invisible tax on residential rents.

In the case of new rental accommodation, in fact, the increase in rents caused by the GSt will be substantial. Again, in hearings across the country this summer, the GST committee heard evidence which outlined the extent to which the GST would increase rents, particularly in new buildings.

Many Canadians are finding it difficult to purchase their own home and, indeed, the possibility of home purchase has decreased significantly for many Canadians as a result of the high interest rate policy in the government. The government has assured Canadians, nevertheless, that the affordability of housing will not be affected by the GST. In spite, of those reassurances by the federal government, the evidence received by the committee suggests otherwise.

For example, under the GST, land will be taxed for the first time. Across Canada, particularly in major urban centres, and not merely Toronto and Vancouver, land constitutes a large part of the price of housing. In the cities of Toronto and Vancouver and, indeed, in much of the golden horseshoe in southern Ontario and in the peninsula in Halifax, new home prices could increase by 4 per cent as a result of the GST; a figure which is substantially higher than that quoted by the federal government. In Toronto, this amounts to a 10 per cent increase.

In our hearings across Canada this past summer, the committee received presentations and data from a variety of groups. They made it clear, particularly with respect to new homes, that the GST has already slowed the housing market, and will continue to do so. Even though the sale of used housing is free of tax, it is anticipated that this market will also see price increases as a result of the GST. Since used housing is a substitute for new housing, an increase in the price of new housing will inevitably drive-up the price of used housing. More directly, however, many of the soft costs associated with purchasing a home, real estate fees, legal fees for example, will now be subject to the GST. A 7 per cent tax on these costs would increase the price of a home by nearly 1 per cent. Again, I repeat, that is a 1 per cent increase at a time when Canadians are finding it increasingly difficult to buy their own home.

There would be a GST rebate of 2 1/2 per cent on purchases of newly constructed homes valued up to $350,000; in other words, although the GST will only be 4 1/2 per cent on homes valued up to $350,000, the government will only rebate 2.5 per cent, and the rebate will decline until the GST hits its full value of 7 per cent at $500,000. There is no similar rebate offered on rental accommodation. The committee heard that the cost of new rental accommodation will increase substantially. On average, the GST would raise residential rents by 2 per cent in Ontario, as even older buildings will be subject to the tax on many inputs.

Similarly, the committee was told that the GST could raise the price of monthly rentals by $27 to $56 in Vancouver; that is $300.00 to $600.00 or more a year. Low-income families can ill afford such rent hikes, particularly in tight rental markets where almost one-half of the tenants with incomes below $25,000 a year already pay 30 per cent of their income in rent. The committee was very concerned that the government had chosen to discriminate against rental accommodation by not providing rebates on newly constructed rental units. That was one issue that was debated in most of the major cities, given the importance of rental accommodation in those communities.

Those of us on this side of the house do not understand why the government has chosen to discriminate against renters in this way. Indeed, the government's policy appears to favour those who can afford to purchase a new house, to favour those of higher incomes over those with more modest incomes who must rent their accommodation.

Although the GST does not tax basic groceries, it is misleading to say that it does not tax food. The committee has been told by several organizations, most notably the Canadian Restaurant and Food Association, that 40 per cent of the household food dollar is spent in eating establishments. When food items which are not basic groceries, either by the nature of the items or by the size of packaging, are added in, the notion that food is not taxed, proves to be completely false. In fact, if one looks at the significant increase in the amount of money the average family is spending eating out because of the increase in the participation rate of women in the workforce, it is clear that the impact of the GST on the cost of feeding a family is going to grow rather than lessen over the next several years.

It seems extraordinary to this committee and to members of the committee on this side of the house that in introducing Bill C-62 the government should fail to address adequately a problem as fundamental to a sales tax as the issue of regressivity. Indeed, the government has proposed a tax which simply, in spite of all of its rhetoric, does not meet the test of fairness. This tax is unfair to lower income families. It is unfair to those living in high-cost parts of the country. It is unfair to those who are renters. Essentially, what the government is saying through its legislation is, "if you are on a low income and if you live in a major urban area or in a remote part of the country, particularly the north, then we are going to treat you unfairly and you had probably better decide to move somewhere else in the country.

This theme of regressivity and unfairness recurred throughout the testimony the committee heard. Witnesses in Ottawa and in cities across the country spoke of regressivity and unfairness not merely in relation to the issues I have just raised, but in fact in relation to a myriad of other issues as well. Witnesses spoke of the inequity of the GST toward pensioners and senior citizens, toward fishermen, toward the cooperative movement, toward the tourist industry, toward Indians and native peoples, toward farmers and toward small businesses.

The following are excerpts from testimony which I think highlight very clearly what witnesses who came before the committee saw as the regressivity of this tax. Speaking for the committee in Ottawa, Pat Grady of Global Economics on the 30th of May this year, said, and I quote:

> 2.1 million, or 46 per cent of Canadian families . . . earning less than $30,000 per year will actually pay higher taxes in 1991 as a result of the GST.

Effectively, half of the Canadian taxpayers will have their taxes increased as a result of the GST.

With respect to the impact of the GST on pensioners, Claude Edwards, speaking on behalf of the Federal Superannuants National Association, said to the committee, and I quote:

> We consider the proposed goods and services tax to be a regressive form of taxation, which will have a more adverse impact on low income Canadians who are obliged to spend a greater portion of their incomes on necessities than Canadians with higher incomes.

Claude Edwards then went on in particular to talk about the percentage of seniors classified as Canadians with lower incomes, and therefore the very regressive effect and unfair effect which the GST would have on those Canadians.

With respect to the issue of GST tax credits, Wolfe Goodman of Goodman and Carr, a Toronto firm, made the following observation and I quote:

● (0750)

> . . . the system of sales tax credits . . . will only take account of inflation in excess of 3 per cent . . . I submit that this is grossly unfair to the poorest and most vulnerable people in our community.

Again, Mr. Goodman was emphasizing the theme which anti-poverty organizations across the country stressed, which is how unfair the tax will be to low income Canadians.

One might assume, on the basis of much of what has been said by the government about the GST, that there are no alternatives. In a few moments I will be talking about that issue in detail, but I merely illustrate the fallaciousness of the observation that there are no alternatives by referring to testimony given before the committee by Neil Brooks, a professor of law at Osgoode Hall and a noted authority on taxation. He said the following:

> There are just all sorts of problems with the refundable sales tax credit . . . it clearly can't remove any of the regressivity over middle-income classes . . . Middle-income classes are clearly going to pay a much higher percentage of their income in this sales tax than high-income people are, and they are not going to qualify for any of the refundable sales tax credit..even with the credit federal consumption taxes are regressive.

Again, with respect to the impact of the tax on senior citizens, the Canadian Seniors Network appeared before the committee in Moncton. Mrs. Jean Woodsworth of the Canadian Seniors Network said the following:

> We . . . believe that no matter how you try to adjust the system with tax credits, a regressive tax is still a regressive tax. It will hit lower and middle-income Canadians more than the wealthy . . . Not only is this tax unfair, but it also comes at a time in our lives when our financial options—- that is to say, the financial options of senior citizens, > —-are very limited.

Shirley Carr, speaking as President of the Canadian Labour Congress, testifying before the committee and addressing specifically the issue of regressivity of the GST, said the following:

> [The GST] is regressive because the same rate applies to all taxpayers and because low and middle-income households spend a far higher proportion of their income on current consumption than do high income households . . . it is particularly unfair because it will apply to a wide range of essential goods and services, including some heating fuels, electricity and children's clothing . . .

Terence Hunsley, the Executive Director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, put the GSt in the context of the overall tax policy of this government since 1984 when he said the following:

> Over the years, the combined effect of the de-indexing of the benefits in the tax system generally has left people who are in lower income categories worse off than they were when this government took office. Even though there may be periodic adjustments, when you take a look at the > cumulative effects of the tax changes and the changes of the benefit system, low-income families are worse off than they were in 1984. The overall impact of this government's changes to the taxation system is and has been regressive and the GST will further exacerbate that situation.

Honourable senators, I have given you those quotes from national organizations who testified before the committee at our Ottawa hearings in May because I think they reflect the tone, the attitude, and the concerns which many people have expressed. To give senators a little of that flavour and to indicate that we were not merely hearing from the leaders of national organizations but, at the same time, heard from other organizations, let me cite testimony from witnesses who appeared before the committee during its cross-country hearings.

In Charlottetown, for example, Mary Boyd, the Director of the Social Action Committee of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlottetown, speaking to the committee there on July 9, said:

> . . . 25 per cent of low income people do not file income tax forms. If those people can be found, we feel that they would not be able to fill out the rebate forms without help . . . this tax will generate a lot of problems for low income people.

The point Ms. Boyd was making was that low income people may not in fact apply for the GST tax credit because they may not know how to do so. Consequently, even though the GST tax credit is not fully indexed and is regressive, the fact is that it will be non-existent for many low income Canadians because they will not know how to apply for the credit.

Similarly, the impact on rural Canadians can best be summarized in a quote from a witness who spoke to us in Moncton. He said the following:

> In Port Elgin, [New Brunswick,] the town where I reside, there exists little employment and many social problems. A couple of years ago some determined individuals managed to establish a community non-profit organization, which includes a food bank, a limited school lunch program, a used clothing centre, a recycling centre, a literacy program, and is in the process of establishing a telephone help line. Taxing inputs, mail, heat, hydro, telephones and the sale of clothing will do little more than create a burden . . . To further burden organizations which help the needy, underprivileged and illiterate of our society is nothing short of political suicide . . . .

I wish he also had added that it is nothing short of being morally wrong.

> A consumption tax takes too much from low-income Canadians, and a tax policy such as this GST will only serve to produce a more divided society.

For the Newfoundlanders in the house, it was interesting that Earl McCurdy, the Executive Director of the Fishermen Food and Allied Workers Union in St. John's, and someone who has been working for a long time in connection with organization fishermen in that province—one of the very early people involved with he Fishermen's Union, as it was called several years ago, in Newfoundland—asked to appear before the committee when we met in St. John's. He said the following:

> Any fisherman having taxable sales in excess of $30,000 must register and file returns, even though the sale of fish carries an actual tax rate of zero. In other words, fishermen will have to charge no tax and collect no tax on their sales, but because anyone whose sales exceed $30,000 is required by law to file a tax form with the government with respect to the GST, these fishermen will have to file such a form. I think it is unreasonable to require fishermen to tie up scarce resources and to contend with the complicated regulations associated with the GST.

Another witness who appeared in Halifax and spoke of the unfairness of the GST in particular was Sid Pobihushchy of Co-op Atlantic in Halifax. Indeed, it was his testimony and the testimony of people like him from the co-operative movement across the country that led members on this side to propose one of our eight amendments. An amendment which dealt with the patent unfairness and regressivity of the GST with respect to Co-ops. Speaking before us in Halifax he said:

> . . . in Atlantic Canada there are 26 co-operatives that are called direct-charge co-ops . . . Only those who have an ownership in the co-operatives are entitled to shop there . . . . The owners of the co-op pay for the overhead through a direct charge, and those co-operatives are preoccupied with selling food stuffs . . . to their members. The GST . . . will have to be paid . . . on the direct charge that is levied to pay for the overhead, whereas their competitive store across the street . . . will not be required to pay the GST . . ."

The witness then went on to point out what a significant impact the GST would have on co-op stores in small communities across Atlantic Canada. Even the Consumers Association and its various provincial members told us that they were opposed to the GST because of its unfairness. Witnesses from both the National Consumers' Association and various provincial consumer associations stressed that to us in cities across the country.

The tourism industry is one of the industries which claim, with considerable justification, that they are being extremely unjustly treated by the GST. Although we received evidence to this effect in many locations, it was Ms. E. McTaggart of the Niagara Falls Visitor and Convention Bureau, speaking to the committee in Toronto, who put the threat that the GST imposes on the tourism industry in perspective when she said the following:

> Major suppliers of foreign visitors, most particularly from the United States, have made it adequately clear that they will reject Canada in favour of other destinations as a direct result of the GST . . . We have letters from tour operators in the United States who say very clearly that Canada will be a hard sell. Those threats have been clearly stated by the National Tour Association and the American Bus Association.

As I say, other witnesses made it very clear that the impact of the GST on the tourism industry would be very deep.

The impact of the GST on Indians and native Canadians again was discussed at length in this house when we discussed the northern amendment about a week ago. However, in that discussion we were focusing primarily on the impact of the GST on the north. Perhaps it is worth the observation that the GST is also unfair in the way it treats native Canadians. Chief Oscar Lathlin of the Assembly of Manitoba Chiefs, speaking to the committee in Winnipeg, said the following:

> The assembly of Manitoba Chiefs opposes the fact that registered Indians should be charged with this tax in the first place. The technical paper suggests that only the sale of goods on reserves should be exempt. In fact, this would discriminate against those reserve residents who only have access to retail outlets outside their communities.

The Chiefs then went on to talk about the discrimination caused by the GST. Native Canadians who live on reserves will not have to pay the tax while those who live off the reserves will pay the tax.

The GST was also seen as being extremely unfair to farmers. Harvey McEwen of the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, speaking to the committee in Regina on the 25th of July, said the following:

> With virtual uniminity Canadian farm groups have rejected federal proposals for administering the GST in the farm sector . . . Specifically, our concerns are related to the implementation of the GST including the impact of this new tax on farm cashflow and on the farm economy, the cost to farmers and taxpayers of a flawed and cumbersome tax rebate program, the potential for bona fide farmers to be denied registrant status because of off-farm income or less than adequate market returns, the complexity and confusion in tax compliance and administration . . . all indicate why we believe these tax proposals are unfair to Canadian farm groups.

The Canadian Federation of National and Provincial Taxpayers, speaking to the committee in Edmonton through their spokesperson, Kevin Avram, said the following:

> The manufacturers' sales tax is said to be a silent killer of jobs, and it needs to be addressed. However, the GST as proposed, accompanied by the current government's spending intentions, is not the answer . . . Surely the process to replace it [MST] should be better thought out and have greater public support than the disastrous proposal currently being put forward.

I have already spoken of the unfairness of the tax with respect to northern Canadians and the fact that witness after witness at our hearings in Yellowknife and Whitehorse spoke to this concern.

Perhaps more surprising to members opposite is the fact that the GST is also seen as unfair to provincial governments. The Honourable Mel Couvelier, the British Columbia Minister of Finance, spoke to the committee on the second day of our hearings in Vancouver. I should point out that he was not the only provincial Minister of Finance to speak to the committee. The Minister of Finance from New Brunswick also spoke to the committee in Moncton. Both those Ministers of Finance had essentially the same message to give us and that message can be summarized in this quotation from Mr. Couvelier, who said:

> . . . the British Columbia legislature passed a unanimous resolution condemning the GST and urging the federal government to withdraw the proposed new tax. We believe that the GST is seriously flawed but, more importantly, the whole rationale for imposing a federal retail sales tax is flawed . . .

• (0810)

Mr. Couvelier said:

> The most obvious flaw is that it is extremely complex. It will make Canada the first developed country to impose two distinct levels of retail sales tax.

Mr. Couvelier then went on to talk about the difficulty of having the federal and provincial government in the same tax field when the taxes and the respective collection systems were not integrated.

In the quotes I read to you in the last few minutes, I have essentially taken one quote from each witness who appeared before the committee in each of the 12 cities we visited. I did that because I thought it was important to have you understand the widespread and universal way in which this tax is viewed across the country, as being regressive and unfair. I did that because it seems to me that it is not only national organizations who are making this observation about the tax; it is also Canadians in local and regional organizations. Many individual Canadians came to speak to the committee as we travelled across the country.

I think it is a fairly safe comment on this tax that a number of Canadians who would normally be supportive of government policies, in a variety of ways, went to the trouble of appearing before the Senate committee, and were almost universal in their condemnation of this tax. It was precisely that level of condemnation which led us on this side of the house, those Liberal members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to conclude that the tax ought to be defeated.

I finish my comments on the issue of regressivity by making an observation on the presentation before the committee in Ottawa by the National Council on Welfare, because I think it has done a better analysis of the impact of the GST on the poor, on low-income Canadians, than any other organization.

Essentially, what they told us in their analysis was that the attempt by the government to ease the burden of the GST on the poor by enlarging the refundable sales tax credit and extending it higher up the income ladder does not meet the objective of fairness.

It is true to say, as the government has repeatedly said, that the maximum tax credit for adults will rise from $140 in 1990 to $190 in 1991, and the rate for children will move from $70 to $100. While these changes are welcome, they do not adequately reflect, and do not adequately protect low-income Canadians from, the added burden they will face as a result of the GST.

The enhanced sales tax credit will reduce, but not remove, the federal sales tax burden for poor families and poor individuals. Any small gains will be short-lived. They will be short-lived, in part, because the tax credits will be indexed only to the rate of inflation minus 3 per cent. They will be short-lived, if they live at all, in part, because some provincial governments have indicated that they may tax that money back from low-income individuals. Any gains will be short-lived because, as the cost of living rises, the percentage of low-income individual's income spent on consumption will increase. It is inevitable that these people will become poorer and poorer.

By way of illustration, one only needs to note that the $24,800 threshold for the sales tax credit will be the same for all households. As a result, families with children will be treated less favourably than childless couples and single Canadians.

A single person with an income of $24,000 a year, which is $9,000 above the current projected poverty line of $15,000 a year for a single person, will be eligible for a maximum sales tax credit. However, a couple with three children and a combined income of $30,000, which is $2,300 below the projected poverty line, will receive only partial sales tax credits.

All of this is brought about because of the basic fatal flaw with respect to the fairness of the GST, which is its lack of full protection against inflation. In the absence of that protection it is inevitable that the poor will simply get poorer.

In 1991, for example, the after-tax sales tax credit for a single elderly Canadian, a Canadian senior citizen, with an income of $12,500—and there are a great many Canadian seniors whose income is in that range—the after tax credit for single elderly Canadians with an income of $12,500 will amount to $317, or 2.5 per cent of income. By 1996, the sales tax credit will have declined in constant 1991 dollars from $317 to $249. So a pensioner's net sales tax burden will rise to $358, or 2.9 per cent a year.

One could continue to play with other examples to illustrate the point, which is simply that inflation and the GST will hurt the poor in two ways. First, inflation will eat away at the refundable sales tax credit, reducing its value by 3 per cent year after year after year. Second, it will steadily depress the real level of the income threshold for the credit, because these income levels at which the GST tax credits become effective are also increasing at a rate which is 3 per cent a year, less the rate of inflation. The result is that over time the tax credits will help fewer and fewer Canadians. Partial indexation is also imposing a rising income tax problem on the working poor. The working poor are that segment of Canadian society which the government repeatedly states it wants to help. Unfortuantely, it is pushing the tax-paying threshold for income tax further and further and further below the poverty line.

Even without further increases in the GST, low-income Canadians face the growing burden from sales and income taxes. They will be worse off in 1991 than they were in 1984 when the Conservatives came to office; and worse off in 1992 than they were in 1991. The same pattern will continue year after year after year.

Senator Hays, did you have a question?

Hon. Dan Hays: Yes. I wonder if I could ask you a question, Senator Kirby, in the context of something you just said. Perhaps you might be able to comment in a helpful way on the extent to which this regressive tax is going to be very difficult for consumers.

I would like to make my point with a couple of short quotes. One is from the Canadian Tax Paper No. 89, which discusses the goods and services tax and its rate. I quote from page 125 of that paper. It says:

> It appears to be agreed among the experts that experience has shown that a value-added tax is much more complex and expensive to administer than its supporters have claimed, and that only a relatively high rate will justify its imposition. In EEC countries standard rates tend to be in the upper teens; current rates, and the rate at time of introduction, (in brackets) are as follows:

I will give the two rates.

> Austria, 18 per cent, (16); Belgium, 19 per cent, (18); Denmark, 22 per cent, (10); France 18.6 per cent, (13.6); Germany, 14 per cent, (10); Ireland, 23 per cent, (16); Italy, 18 per cent, (12); Netherlands, 19 per cent, (12); Norway, 20 per cent, (20); Sweden, 19 per cent, (11.1); United Kingdom, 15 per cent, (10). In most countries current rates are twice or more those proposed for Canada. It is to be noted however that there are provincial retail sales tax rates in Canada of 7 to 12 per cent, which generally have no counterpart in Europe. The total Canadian rate of general consumption tax will therefore be fairly similar to the European rates.

In other words, the combined provincial-federal tax. The point made is that to justify the high cost to administer the GST or a value-added tax it has to be at a fairly high rate. In fact, I can not remember the exact source but I read somewhere that for the first five years of the value-added tax in Great Britain the average cost of implementation was 11 per cent of the dollars collected. At $20 billion a year over the next five years, the GST is a very expensive tax at 7 per cent.

The other thing I would like to tie into this to round it off, is—

Senator Barootes: By any chance, is the senator advocating a higher rate than the 7 per cent?

Senator Hays: No. I am glad that that provoked a question, because the point I am going to try to make, and ask Senator Kirby to comment upon, is that, because it costs so much to administer the GST, it really does not make much sense to have it unless it is at a fairly high rate. So that at 7 per cent it is a very expensive tax to collect for the moneys generated.

I would like to quote something prompted by the recent StatCan release of information. I think just a little of this will really highlight the problem on which I would like Senator Kirby to comment.

Senator Steuart: It might enlighten Senator Barootes as well.

Senator Hays: Perhaps. Let me go on here.

> StatCan has also calculated effective tax rates for the consumer price index and its major components. The resulting rates in 1989 were 5.2 per cent for food, 10.2 per cent for health and personal care, 11.4 per cent for clothing, 12.1 per cent for recreation, reading and education, 19.3 per cent for housing, 25.1 per cent for transportation and 122.8 per cent for tobacco and alcohol—for an overall rate of 19 per cent. The reason these rates are higher than for the economy as a whole is that the consumer is more heavily taxed than any other group.

That is the case in 1989. I would like your comment on the idea that a 7 per cent tax being added on to the provincial tax would make us comparable to the consumption tax in Europe. In fact, if you compare it to 1989, we have very high taxes on consumption as it is. That is the point you have made about regressivity. Can you give us a helpful comment, with your rich background in government, on the effectiveness of a tax that is low and the likelihood of its being raised to make it a more efficient tax? In other words, if you have the capital invested to collect and do the necessary audits, there is going to be immense pressure to raise the rate.

If you look at the 1989 StatCan numbers and you look at the calculation of our present numbers, adding the two levels of government together and comparing them to the European community, it is going to leave us with a horrendously high consumption tax. At least that is what I conclude from looking at these notes.

Senator Kirby, you are at a point in your speech where you are commenting on that topic and I would be interested in some elaboration.

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Hays. I would be glad to do that because the point I have been making in this first section of my speech has been the universal view, from 80 to 90 per cent of the witnesses who appeared before the committee this summer, that in its current form the GST is regressive and unfair. One of the biggest problems with the GST is going to be the fact that, because the threshold at which the tax credits cut in is not indexed relative to the rate of inflation, over time the regressivity of the tax will increase.

I raise that in response to your comments, because, as you indicate fairly clearly, based on the history of the provincial sales taxes in Canada and the history of sales, VAT and consumption taxes of various kinds in other jurisdictions, using the data quoted by you, Senator Hays, these taxes do increase over time. An increase in the rate of the tax combined with the existing provisions in the GST with respect to tax credits and with respect to inflation protection of those credits clearly indicates that the unfairness and regressivity of the tax is only going to become worse rather than better.

Indeed, one can anticipate a situation in the not too distant future where Canadians will probably have the most regressive tax system and, as Senator Hays pointed out, the highest tax system. If you are an individual Canadian taxpayer, the sales tax you face is the combined federal and provincial taxes and not merely the federal tax taken by itself.

The point that Senator Hays has made is, in fact, a fitting way to finish my specific comment with respect to regressivity and unfairness. His comment leads to the inevitable conclusion that not only is the current proposal unfair and regressive but, in fact, it will worsen over time. As it does worsen, it will lead to a situation in which low-income Canadians, the working poor, single parent families and the elderly will all be left considerably worse off than they were when this government first took office in 1984.

With respect to the impact the GST has on particular groups of Canadians, I have just spent some time talking about its impact on low-income Canadians. I would like to move from there to talk about the impact of the GST on a particular region of the country.

Perhaps this has not been the case since 1984, but during the period 1965 or '66 through to 1984 one of the major historical roles of Canada's federal government was to act as a major redistributor of income, both to individuals and to regions which needed help. I have discussed at some length the way the GST, and, indeed, I might add parenthetically, this government's entire tax policy, reverses the historic redistributed role of the national government by the regressive and unfair nature of the tax on low-income Canadians.

I should now like to comment very briefly on the impact of the GST on Atlantic Canada in general and on Nova Scotia in particular. I begin with a quotation which appeared the other day in a Nova Scotia newspaper in which, in commenting on the GST, said the following:

> The GST is a consumer tax which will hurt the economy. It will fire up the flames of inflation. It will impede economic development. It will hurt and indeed reduce provincial income, provincial revenue, and it will hurt and reduce all public services in this region.

Honourable senators, lest you think that this is merely an idle statement by someone who is simply commenting in a newspaper on the Atlantic Canadian economy, let me tell you that that quotation is from a Nova Scotia newspaper. Those words were uttered by a premier of one of the Atlantic provinces. Indeed, the author of that particular condemnation of the GST further stated:

> The GST is a consumer tax which will hurt the economy, that it will impede economic development in the region, that it will reduce provincial income and that it will hurt all provincial services.

That is a direct verbatim quote from one of our newest colleagues in the Senate, Senator Buchanan, which he made when he was the Premier of Nova Scotia and which in fact he made barely six weeks before being sworn in in this place, and as a Nova Scotian. In fact, I congratulated the premier at the time for what I thought was a well-reasoned and sound observation on behalf of the people of his province with respect to the GST. I must say I have been somewhat surprised at the incredible conversion that can occur on an Air Canada flight from Halifax to Ottawa when you are coming here to be sworn in to the Senate. It is truly a remarkable conversion and one can only hope that between now and sometime in the future when the final vote on this bill takes place that the then premier, now Senator Buchanan, will revert to his previous accurate perception of the impact the GST will have on the people of Nova Scotia.

With respect to the economic situation in general in the Maritimes, I think it is important to understand that because we have, relative to Quebec and Ontario, and indeed relative to the West, a very small manufacturing sector. There are very few firms in the Atlantic region which will benefit from the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax. The federal government continually argues that the number of jobs that will be created by the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax will be the biggest, single benefit of the GST. The fact is that those jobs will not be created in the Atlantic region because we do not have the manufacturing base to begin with. Indeed, as members in this chamber know very well, the Atlantic region survives largely on its resource base, particularly on fishing, and to a lesser extent on forestry, mining, and tourism. When one looks at the impact of the GST on small individual fishermen—and I gave you an example a few minutes ago when I read a quote from Earl McCurdy, one of the organizers and original founders of the Newfoundland Fishermen's Union—it is clear that the GST will have a negative impact on the fishing industry and on the thousands and thousands of Atlantic Canadians who are employed in it.

More importantly, the GST will increase the depth and length of the recession which has been in Atlantic Canada in its current phase since the late spring of 1989 because of the beginning of the collapse of the fish stocks, particularly the northern cod stocks. As a result of the decline in fish stocks and the subsequent closure of fish plants, the impact across the region, or the economic downturn across the region, has been significant. A variety of economists pointed out to our committee this summer that the downturn in the Atlantic region is going to be exacerbated by the GST, particularly by its impact on the fishing industry. It is therefore not surprising that opposition to the GST is stronger in Atlantic Canada than in any other region of the country. Poll after poll has shown that between 90 and 95 per cent of the people in the Atlantic region oppose this tax. In Nova Scotia, for example, all three political parties, including the provincial Conservative Party, oppose the GST and have said so publicly through a unanimous resolution through the Nova Scotian legislature.

[Senator Kirby.]

The income statistics for the region indicate that Atlantic Canadians, in Nova Scotia in particular, pay a tax rate which is considerably greater than the national average. The Nova Scotia average tax rate, for example, is 5 per cent higher than the national average tax rate. This tax is paid on incomes which are 12 per cent below the national average.

● (0840)

Data presented to the committee by the federal Department of Finance, as well as data from the Economic Council of Canada, indicated clearly that the GST will increase this gap between the Atlantic provinces and the rest of Canada. Federal programs and services to Atlantic Canada and other disadvantaged regions have been a fast-shrinking proportion of federal spending over the past ten years. One only needs to look at recent legislation like Bill C-21, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, and the aid given to the fishery last year, to understand how Atlantic Canada has suffered under this government.

Indeed, one can make an argument, as several spokespersons in Newfoundland did when the fishery aid package was announced, that it was part of a resettlement or relocation program rather than a fishery aid package. This so-called aid only encourages people in the region to get out of the business and to move out of the region.

Indeed, since 1984, almost every federal budget has shifted money from regional development toward investment in Ontario and Quebec. Many recent federal budgets have argued that money invested in Ontario and Quebec does or should come from regional development funds, the pocket of money available for the less self-sufficient regions in Canada. Yet in spite of this reduction in federal transfers or assistance to the region, in spite of the fact that the Atlantic provinces, including Nova Scotia, have much smaller tax bases and much smaller business tax bases than the other provinces in Canada, the federal government has in the past several years significantly reduced the rate of increase in contributions to health and post-secondary education. The result is that provincial governments in Atlantic Canada have been disproportionately affected by this government's fiscal and monetary policy.

By way of illustration, students in the Atlantic region now pay the highest university tuition fees in Canada. Hospital user fees are increasing while at the same time hospital beds are closing. In this economic climate, the impact of the goods and services tax on the people of this region will be negative and far reaching.

I will provide senators with another illustration. Significantly more Atlantic Canadians depend upon pensions and other non-wage incomes. These will not be adjusted upwards to accommodate the effect of the GSt on the cost of living. Therefore, the result of the implementation of the GST on these thousands in Atlantic Canada will be a significantly lower standard of living.

Partial indexation of most social security and income support programs, including the GST credits for low-income Canadians, means that the elderly, the disabled, the seriously ill and single mothers will be very hard hit by the GST. This impact will be particularly harmful in a region that has a greater than the national average share of people on low incomes.

I spoke earlier in my remarks about the fact that the co-op movement will be badly hurt by the GST, that under the GST, co-ops will face double taxation, that they will be taxed on groceries and so on. Consider price increases on things like food and other products sold by co-ops at a time when many studies, including those conducted by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, indicate that food and other items are over-priced in the Atlantic region more than anywhere else in the country. They are also priced significantly higher outside major metropolitan areas—outside places like Halifax, for example. The cost of these basic items is considerable higher in small towns than it is in Halifax and elsewhere in the country. Again, this situation will be exacerbated by the GST.

I spoke earlier about the perceived unfairness of the GST with respect to the tourism industry. Tourism industry representatives across the country, in appearances before the Senate committee, commented at some length on that unfairness and on the way in which it would end up hurting the industry. The fact is that the tourist industry in the Atlantic region is one of the few bright spots in the regional economy.

The tourist industry has been growing steadily now for nearly two decades. Indeed, if you look at unemployment data, you will find that in the last couple of years, between the months of May and June, the unemployment rate has fallen by as much as 6 per cent. This indicates that significant increases in seasonal employment in the tourist industry take place during the summer months of June, July and August. In Prince Edward Island, in particular, that number is significantly higher. It is also clear from evidence given by tourist associations and other groups that tourists are not going to be prepared to pay a significantly higher rate of sales tax. Consider, for example, a situation in the Atlantic region where provincial sales taxes are currently in the order of 11 per cent. Add to that the 7 per cent GST and you are now asking tourists to pay a sales tax in the order of 18 per cent. There is absolutely no way that that is going to be easily accepted by tourists visiting the region. It is clear that the GST is going to have a negative impact on that industry.

The Conference Board of Canada, in a recent report, pointed out that in each of the last four years Nova Scotia's real domestic product grew more slowly than the rate of growth in gross national product. The current economic circumstances will make this situation worse because of the impact of the GST on both the fishery and the tourist industry. They are the backbone of the economy of the region.

When one talks to fishermen about the GST, as I have done in meetings in a number of communities, on finds that the GST is confusing and frustrating. It appears to the average fishermen to involve filling out mountains of forms and a variety of other bureaucratic and administrative processes when, in fact, fishermen, technically speaking, are not subject to the tax because of the nature of their business.

One would anticipate that with the creative ability of fisherman to find ways to deal with bureaucratic situations, there might very well be a sharp decline next year in the number of fisherman with sales in excess of $30,000. Therefore, one might well end up with a situation whereby the net effect of the GST is to drive a significant amount of the Atlantic economy underground.

One of the fundamental aspects of the GST is that businesses will be paying the GST on business purchases and then collecting the GST on sales, and if the two amounts are not in balance they would either collect the difference from the government or pay the difference to the government, whichever the case may be. The problem that this procedure creates for a fisherman, for example, is that his money, which he will have paid when he bought certain inputs, would be tied up waiting for refunds on the GST. I can tell you, honourable senators, having spent a considerable amount of time, particularly in 1982 and 1983, visiting fishing communities across the region, that an inshore fisherman who has house payments, boat payments, payments to his crew and payments for supplies, and so on, will be left in a situation in which he has significant GST to pay. And he will be left waiting for GST rebates from the federal government. He will be in a very difficult situation in terms of meeting his ordinary, basic living expenses.

It is in part this problem of having to have what a larger business would call working capital, required in this case because of the way the tax is to be paid, which is going to make life even more difficult for fisherman. The situation will inevitably become worse by the arguments and disagreements and inefficiencies of the GST which will arise over time. Disputes will arise with respect to the level of income or level of rebate to which an individual fisherman is entitled, which will further complicate a fisherman's life.

Indeed, fishermen in the region will tell you that the present fuel tax rebate program for fishermen is already so confusing, so botched from an administrative standpoint, involves so much paper work and so much time, that many of them do not apply for these rebates. Indeed, some do not apply for these rebates because they simply do not understand all the regulations.

When you try to explain to fisherman that the GST tax credits will work better and be more efficient for them, handled more efficiently than fuel tax rebates, they simply laugh at you and make the observation that it is clearly impossible for the federal government to run any rebate program efficiently. They will inevitably try to find creative ways to avoid paying that tax, or at least avoid paying it on time.

It is not merely in Nova Scotia where this problem exists. As honourable senators know, there were many stories in the late 1970s and early 1980s of Newfoundland fishermen having a major problem running afoul of the tax department. The result was, as many of you will recall, that hundreds of fishermen were audited and many were placed in an extremely difficult situation because of demands for repayment by the federal income tax department.

This is the image, this is the legacy, this is the feeling that these fishermen have with respect to complex and detailed taxpaying schemes. Based on their track record, fishermen will tell you that the rebate proposal with respect to the GST is just foolish and not workable. I repeat, it will simply encourage a great many honest and hardworking Canadians to curcumvent the system by finding a variety of ways to take a significant percentage of their income underground and to in fact keep income below the $30,000 threshold.

Indeed, the GST leaves fishermen with a choice between two evils. They either circumvent the tax system or they leave their money tied up with the federal government for prolonged periods of time. As I say, they do not have enough working capital, enough excess cash, to be able to do that.

So, honourable senators, both fishermen and the tourist industry are being hit at a time when both industries are in decline and the Canadian dollar is artificially high. We learned this the other day when a former Conservative cabinet minister told Canadians that it is artificially high because a side deal was made in the Free Trade Agreement to keep the dollar high. That, as we know, is having a devastating effect on the fishing industry.

In the face of all these pressures, fishermen are struggling to survive and now the government is going to make the situation considerably worse with the implementation of the GST. Therefore, we have a situation in which the two biggest industries in the Atlantic region, the fishing industry and the tourist industry, are going to be devastated by the GST. So you have a situation in which the GST hits lower income Canadians, and the core of the economic strength of the Atlantic region, while offering essentially nothing in return.

I say "nothing in return," because even if the GST does succeed in creating jobs in the manufacturing sector, even if it does succeed in making Canadian manufacturing companies more competitive, those jobs will not be located in the Atlantic region. That's because the Atlantic region has very little in the way of a manufacturing base which can benefit from the reduction of the manufacturers' sales tax.

It is because I believe that the GST hits the Atlantic region unfairly and disproportionately; because it imposes more burdens on the region than on other regions, relative to the benefits which will accrue from the GST, that I am opposed to this bill. It is why members on this side have been proposing amendments to make it fair, and why in fact the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee argued in favour of killing this bill. We did so, as I have pointed out, because the bill is inherently unfair. It is unfair not only to the people, it is equally unfair to the low-income regions of the country and the regions of the country which lack a significant manufacturing base.

Having dealt with the issue of regressivity and unfairness with respect to both individuals and regions, let me turn to the third part of my remarks, which deals with a question that has often been asked by members opposite and by the media, which is whether or not there are other alternatives. Clearly the issue that one has to deal with, given the billions of dollars that are intended to be collected by this tax, is whether or not this is the only way of solving the government's tax problem.

It has been said—

Senator Olson: Before you go on, I recall a meeting we had in Halifax which marked the first time we received a major, well-researched brief respecting the unfairness of the tax as it is described in Bill C-62 with respect to the amount that will be paid by the regions.

The biggest item, of course, is that transportation is added. There are other factors that get into the cost, bringing it up to the point where they apply the 7 per cent GST. I would hope you would tell us about that because I remember your being there, and because it fits in so well with the arguments you have made about the tax being regionally unfair.

Senator Kirby: Thank you, Senator Olson.

I will answer your question in two parts. The first is to point out that one of the great difficulties of governing Canada is trying to ascertain policy by using national averages. I am reminded of what I think is one of the great lines ever uttered at a First Minister's Conference. Looking around the chamber, I know at least one or two persons who were there with me. It was in a period of 1968 when Ike Smith, subsequently Senator Smith, was Premier of Nova Scotia. In commenting on the problem of dealing with national averages, at the end of a very eloquent speech he spoke of the need for low-income regions of this country to be given the opportunity to raise their standard of living and he looked forward to the day when every Canadian province would be above the national average.

I refer to Ike Smith's observation because, to pick up on Senator Olson's point, it is clear that national average data is misleading when one looks at the impact of legislation like the GST.

As Senator Olson pointed out, a couple of the witnesses before the committee in Halifax, I think, in fact, one was the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, had examined the impact of the GSt on the region. It was clear from their examination that the GST would unduly affect the region because it has, to begin with, a higher level of taxation. It has to begin with lower average incomes; it has to begin with a higher percentage of people on either fixed incomes, such as senior citizens, or on low incomes, and there is no manufacturing base upon which to reap the benefits of the GST. When one looks at national aggregate statistics, it is fairly clear that there can still be huge problems in some regions of the country in spite of the fact that one can make national statistics or averages look good.

Honourable senators, if we are going to fundamentally alter our tax system by doing away with the manufacturers' sales tax, then the question obviously becomes what should other alternatives be? I want to comment briefly on some of those alternatives because I think it is an important issue, and it is one of the areas in which members on this side of the chamber have been greatly concerned with.

You will find that any tax book, or any books on tax theory, whether they are written by economists, lawyers, or public finance experts, begin by saying that there are three basic fundamental tests of any tax system. The first is that the system must be fair; the second is that it must be efficient in an economic sense; and the third is that it must be understandable. Any tax system that fails to meet the three tests of fairness, efficiency and understandability, in fact, fails to meet the test of a tax system that ought to be put in place. Those three principles underlie any text one reads on public finance, on tax theory, whether from a federal standpoint or an economic standpoint. It seems to me that in the light of those three tests—

Senator Frith: Three strikes and you're out.

Senator Kirby: —you will find that the GST fails miserably to meet each of those three tests.

Let me simply illustrate that by pointing out that the tax is clearly regressive, since it taxes Canadians who make $10,000 at the same rate as Canadians who make $100,000 a year. It is clearly unfair because, as I pointed out in my opening remarks, tax credits to poor Canadians are not indexed to the rate of inflation and therefore they will diminish proportionately. Indeed, it is a sad comment, it seems to me, that members opposite voted against an amendment which at the very least would have dealt with that very negative, regressive element of the tax.

The second test of a tax system, as experts would put it, is that the tax must be efficient. Clearly, from every single piece of evidence the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee heard this year from the business community, the GST fails to meet this test of efficiency. For small business, the GST will be an administrative nightmare. If the tax is to go ahead, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business has pleaded with the committee to support a one-year delay. John Bulloch argued very strongly that Canadian small business members of the CFIB, members of the backbone of the Canadian business community from coast to coast, are simply not going to be in a position where they can effectively and efficiently administer the tax system. Their preference would be an absolute minimum of a six-month delay but preferably a one-year delay.

Indeed, the European Economic Community is a popular topic with this government since they tend to cite the economic benefits of a value-added tax by giving examples of countries in the EEC. It is interesting that the Minister of Finance has carefully ignored the fact that in April 1967 the EEC directed that there would be a lead time of two and a half years before the introduction of VATs. That was to be the minimum time before the implementation of any value-added tax or GST. For example, in Italy, it took five and half years to introduce the GST. In other European countries, the length taken from the passage of the legislation to implementation of the tax was a period averaging over two years.

Taxes like the GST need administrations that perform four functions. First, they need to compile a list of taxable businesses and businesses that are exempt, and to distribute to these businesses explanatory material about the tax. Secondly, they need to design and mail and receive tax returns, refund input credits, and receive tax payments. Thirdly, the administration connected with a tax like the GST needs to monitor its implementation and be able to deal with questions related to the tax and to resolve disputes. Fourthly, and finally, the administration needs to be able to carry out audits and enforce compliance.

All of these tasks may be in some way similar to the administration of income tax. When you talk to experts with respect to a value-added tax, as the committee did this summer, the fact is we find these tasks are much more onerous due to the frequency of GST returns and refunds. All of this means trouble for small business and for individual Canadians.

Generally speaking, GST accounts are prepared by in-house staff. Small business either does not have this capability or cannot afford the necessary accounting staff. Even if it could, the complexity of the GST would dictate that in-house staff would have to farm out certain aspects of the accounting process. The GST is that complex.

Presently, 75,000 businesses file federal income tax. By moving it from that size to 1.6 million, increasing it by over a million and a half businesses, the government has been forced to hire 5,000 extra tax men just to make sense of the GST.

The revenue minister, that great figure skater, Mr. Jelinek, has boggled the mind of small business by introducing a myriad of ways to calculate and pay the GST. Members opposite have clearly specialized in attempting to learn as little as possible about the GST so that they will be able to say to their friends, after the conclusion of this debate, "Well, maybe we would have a different view if we had understood it". One need only look at data and information from Mr. Jelinek's department. I managed to get on the mailing list for all his material, which is quite interesting. As an aside, I also happen to be on the mailing list for Mr. Wilson's special video tape telling us how the federal government is wasting our tax dollars, but that is a subject for another day.

With respect to the information on the GST, members opposite may be surprised to discover that, according to Mr. Jelinek, there is the normal way of calculating the GST; then there are two different ways of streamlined accounting for calculating the GST; and then there is the new and improved quick method for calculating the GST. I say this peripherally as a mathematician. Using each of the four methods, given the same basic data, I was able to come up with examples which, in fact, wind up with four different calculations of tax payable.

There is one mathematical error in one of the methods but I would just as soon let that become front page news when people start paying GST.

I cannot resist asking the question: What message is the government trying to deliver with this system? Are they trying to say to Canadians that it is a straightforward system and here is how you do it? Or are they trying to say to Canadians that this tax is a complete and utter administrative nightmare and that they clearly do not know what they are doing and it clearly needs to be simplified? As a matter of fact, the government is saying, "Here are four possible ways you can pay it; pick and choose which method of tax you want to use."

Clearly, this tax is going to be an administrative disaster. At the risk of making a partisan comment, which I would hate to do, I cannot resist making the observation that many of us on this side of the house look forward to the daily press stories which will occur day after day after day once this tax is in effect. It is clear that the number of administrative disasters is going to be legend, and that day after day after day there will be complaints, snafus, administrative mistakes, errors, and a host of other things. All these events will reinforce, in the minds of Canadians, the government's managerial incompetence in running the program. As I said, I make that statement merely as an observation and not as a partisan comment. Nevertheless, it is not an unfair prediction of what will happen if this tax goes into effect.

The last of the criteria the textbooks have laid out for a successful tax is that it must be understandable, that essentially it must be a tax of simplicity.

Let me address this issue with a couple of illustrative examples. Again, these examples were presented to the committee during our hearings. The first illustration I would give you is that a bag of Oreo cookies and a bag of Twix chocolate bars can be sold side-by-side in a grocery store. They are clearly direct competitors and they are side-by-side because that is the way they are grouped in the grocery store. They are competitors both by their positioning on the shelves and by their ingredients. Now, the question is which of those two is taxable? The answer is that Oreo cookies are not taxable because they are a basic food, and Twix cookies are taxable because they are not a basic food.

On the other hand, if I buy a six-pack of yogurt, do I pay the GST? The answer happens to be no. Do I pay the GST if I buy one container of yogurt? The answer happens to be yes.

The question is if I buy six containers of yogurt and wrap an elastic band around them and take them to the check-out counter, am I buying one or six? That is clearly going to be an issue of dispute between the clerk at the check-out counter and the consumer. In one case, the yogurt is taxable; in the other case it is not.

Those two illustrations serve to highlight the kind of arguments that will take place. They are given to show how idiotic it is to have a tax which, at its outset, has many loopholes, variations, exceptions and varieties. If members opposite don't think that is an absolute recipe for administrative disaster, I don't know what is.

Again is dealing with the simplicity of the tax, let us look at the practicalities of administration in a small firm. Better than any other example I can give you, this illustrates that the GST is far from being fair to people and far from being simple. The process starts with routine bookkeeping and administration of the firm. Every business keeps a set of books to record major purchases and file invoices. The GST will add an extra column to the accounting book because we need to keep track of the tax. If the small businessman wants to reclaim the tax he pays, he must insure that all entries are supported by an invoice or tax receipt, giving the registration number of the person from whom he made the purchase.

In entering the GST input into the ledger, the bookkeeper will need to distinguish between disallowed input taxes and those input taxes that are allowed. For sales, the firms will need to ensure that the GST is charged at the appropriate rate and that all and necessary information is on the invoices. The amount of GST charged will also need to be entered into the ledger so that output tax can be totalled for the government, unless, of course, the proprietor is using one of the three new and improved simplified methods of accounting, in which case the system is entirely different. So what you have is a circumstance in which the system that a business uses is changed, depending on which of the latest messages from Mr. Jelinek the business has taken the time to read.

I give you that only to illustrate that the basic fundamental principle of any kind of tax is that it be simple and easy to understand. That is clearly not met by the GST. Indeed, I have established that the GST fails to meet the basic three requirements of any tax system: the requirement of fairness or equity; the requirement of efficiency; and the requirement of simplicity and being easy to understand.

Thus, it seems to me that Bill C-62 flies directly in the face of the government's stated goal of tax reform. In 1987, when the government introduced its white paper on tax reform, it promised that taxes would be fair, efficient and understandable.

While members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee from both sides of the chamber disagreed on what should happen to the GST, it is fair to say that there was agreement on one thing. That was that the present manufacturers' sales tax is flawed and that we ought to find a way of correcting the flaws or, alternatively, that we should find a way of eliminating the tax. The issue that then came before the committee was whether or not the GST was the correct way to do that.

• (0920)

When one looks at the micro-economic, administrative and political advantages attached to the abolition of the Manufacturers' Sales Tax, one understands why a decision was made to remove the tax. But when one begins to look at the solution chosen by the government, the solution to implement the GST, one begins to have some second thoughts on whether or not having decided to remove the Manufacturers' Sales Tax, indeed having been forced to remove it as a result of the Free Trade Agreement, one becomes skeptical when one examines the government's proposed GST.

It became fairly clear that the replacement of the manufacturers' sales tax was essential, and the question members on the committee and in this house have essentially been asked is whether or not the imposition of the GST at a rate of 7 per cent is an appropriate solution. I would suggest to members of this chamber that one of the reasons it is not an appropriate solution is that it is going to significantly boost the consumer price index. The government says it will boost the consumer price index by 1 1/4 per cent. Every witness before the committee said that it would boost the index by somewhere between 2 and 3 per cent.

In part, this added increase will come from the fact that labour unions said to the committee, but have also made it clear in settlements which have been negotiated thus far, that upward wage pressures will result as workers attempt to get back the income they are going to lose as a result of the GST. So the notion that workers will in some sense eat the cost of the GST, which is an assumption built into the government's estimate of the 1 1/4 per cent impact on inflation, is clearly not true. The GST is clearly going to have an adverse macro-economic effect which will be concentrated in the first few years of its implementation.

In a recent note published in an academic journal, the macro-economic effects of the GST were discussed, and essentially what they pointed out was that the accumulative macro-economic effect at the end of the second and third year of the tax would be significantly greater than in the first year because it will take two or three years for the labour catch-up. We are therefore not looking at merely, as the Minister of Finance has said, a one-time shot, a one-time impact on the rate of inflation; we are looking at an impact on the rate of inflation which is going to grow for some considerable period of time.

Economists have gone on to argue that the favourable effects of eliminating the Manufacturers' Sales Tax become apparent over the longer term. Indeed, following the removal of the MST, macro-economic models would suggest that real output would be higher without the GSt and the economy would be more efficient. However, all of these models show that there will be an onward and continuing annual impact on the rate of inflation caused by the GST as individuals and firms seek to recoup the cost of the tax. Indeed, it has been suggested from a number of the analyses that have been done that the net effect of the increase, the net effect of the GST, will not simply be a one-year impact but that it is likely to take almost a decade before the impact of the GST is fully felt. Therefore, the macro-economic effects of the GST are really quite substantial.

The second issue is what does monetary policy do to deal with this problem? A number of alternatives have been considered. In one case, monetary policy acts to neutralize the exchange rate effects of the fiscal policy, and, secondly, monetary policy acts to maintain real, aggregate demand growth.

In the case of the first alternative, the economy adjusts relatively smoothly. In the case of the second alternative, there is a very significant negative effect. The point I am making is that as a result of these various pieces of analyses, the net effect will be a significant impact in the rate of inflation, that it will last a significant length of time, that it will not merely be a one-shot deal as has been argued by the government. More importantly, if the macro-economic policy of the government is, as the Governor of the Bank of Canada keeps saying, oriented towards keeping the rate of inflation down, if that is the policy and the orientation of the government, then one cannot help but wonder why they are introducing a policy which flies in the face of that goal. It seems rather ridiculous to be telling the country that we are having high interest rates and a high dollar because we want to reduce inflation, and then take a tax policy initiative which in fact adds significantly to the rate of inflation.

One begins to wonder how the country's economic policy can be run when we have a situation in which the governor of the central bank is pursuing his stated objective of price stability, or zero inflation, as he calls it, and the Minister of Finance is pursuing his basic objective, which is to introduce a tax policy which is going to increase the rate of inflation by more than 2 per cent on an annual basis for several years.

I repeat it was true that members of the committee on both sides agreed that some changes needed to be made in the Manufacturers' Sales Tax system. We not did necessarily agree, as I pointed out, with the proposed solution, and one of the reasons we did not is the impact the tax is going to have on the rate of inflation.

Another issue we considered in committee is what the impact of the tax would have been had the government decided to proceed with a lower tax rate, say, of 3 per cent or 5 per cent. For example, a tax rate of 5 per cent or less GST would obviate the need for the complex special treatment which Bill C-62 contains for new housing, since the existing sales tax burden on housing is estimated to be 4.5 per cent. Therefore, eliminating one tax and replacing it with a 5 per cent tax would be comparable. Using a lower rate would also have made the provinces more willing than they are at present to participate in a national sales tax, since if the GST rate were combined with a provincial tax rate, it would be less dramatic at the point of purchase.

Again, there was testimony before the committee from two provincial ministers of finance—one from New Brunswick and one from British Columbia—who argued that, in effect, the federal sales tax should not be proceeded with until a federal-provincial agreement had been reached to combine the two taxes.

One of the problems, of course, with a lower percentage tax rate is that which Senator Hays raised a few moments ago in his question, namely, because of the enormous cost involved in administering the GST, the lower the tax rate the less actual net revenue to the government. The cost of collecting the tax codes not depend on the rate of tax; it depends on the administrative system. Therefore, the efficiency argument—using the proposed method for administering the GST but doing so at a rate of 3 or 5 per cent—was clearly disregarded by the government because it wanted the extra revenue. But it does raise the question that, if this GST goes into effect, it is fairly clear that what will happen is that the rate will be increased over time simply because there will be increased administrative costs. Therefore, in a sense, little of the increased tax revenue will go directly to the bottom line.

The legislation creating the GST, Bill C-62, is full of flaws, errors and administrative difficulties. It is also true that a couple of alternatives that were presented to the committee deserved more serious consideration. They ought to be seriously evaluated in an objective sense before proceeding with the GST.

I would like to talk this morning about two of these particular alternatives, one of which is the single tax. That was proposed by Dennis Mills in a book called, 'The Single Tax' and in which the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance in the House of Commons, Don Blenkarn, has written a comment. I would urge senators opposite to take a look at it.

The second alternative I would like to comment on this morning is a proposal by Professor Neil Brooks. His proposal was not only well received by other witnesses before the Committee but was favourably commented upon in a number of newspapers and magazines across the country.

I raise this issue of alternatives because I realize that nearly half the members opposite were not in this place when the GST hearings were being held. They may therefore not be aware of the fact that there are alternatives, and that these alternatives ought to be looked at before Bill C-62 is simply rubber stamped. It is fairly clear that some thoughtful people in Canada have examined this issue for some time and have come to the conclusion that there are alternatives which ought to be considered.

Let me turn for a few moments to the single tax proposal of Mr. Mills and the variation on Income Tax proposal by Mr. Brooks. I repeat that they are worth serious examination, if only because of the technical flaws and glaring inadequacies of Bill C-62. I gave an example of those a few moments ago when I talked about the tax situation with respect to competing products on the grocery shelf—the bag of Oreos and Twix. Another example is the fact that when the GST goes into effect, soft drinks will be taxed but coffee will not. I do not know if someone is making a judgment there or is suggesting that soft drinks are bad for you and coffee is not. That certainly is not what many doctors would say. My point is simply that what the GST will do is introduce significant price distortions in a variety of areas within the food industry.

A second flaw connected with the GST relates to the GST in the non-profit sector. A number of examples were presented, and again I simply provide senators with an illustration of technical problems associated with the GST in relation to the non-profit sector.

[Senator Kirby.]

When the Committee held meetings in Charlottetown, it heard moving testimony from an individual who pointed out that a non-profit woodworking business in P.E.I.—a business which in fact employed handicapped Prince Edward Islanders—would be subject to the GST on its sales, in spite of the fact that it is a non-profit organization and is barely surviving. It was pointed out to us, as another example, that the Royal Canadian Legion will have to pay tax on what goes into making the wreaths and poppies for Remembrance Day. Clearly, both of these illustrations are examples of socially desirable activities that would be harmed by the GST.

The amateur sports community is another example of an area in which huge problems will develop with the GST. For example, many amateur associations will not qualify for the 50 per cent rebate on GST-paid inputs because they are not national organizations and because they do not receive at least 40 per cent of their funding from government. In other words—and some of the new senators may not realize this—in order to be eligible for the GSt rebate on inputs, an amateur sports association has to be a national association, and it must receive 40 per cent of its funding from government. In other words, if an amateur sports association is self-reliant, and therefore it does not receive 40 per cent of its income from government, it will not get the GST rebate. On the other hand, if the association is dependent on the government because it cannot raise enough money on its own, it will receive the GST rebate.

It is clearly patently idiotic to structure a tax system in such a way that it offers a rebate to those who are already relying on government handouts to survive but not to those organizations which have shown the initiative and the ability to survive on their own with very little, government funding. It is absolutely ridiculous to disqualify an organization from the GST rebate because that organization has been successful at fundraising. What the government seems to be saying is that if you are good at what you do, we will tax you further. If you are not very good at what you do, if we already have to support you and you cannot survive on your own, then we will make life easier for you and give you a rebate.

Another issue which sports associations repeatedly raised was the fact that fees paid on sports programs directed towards children over the age of fourteen would be subject to the GST but those aimed at children under fourteen will not be. No one, including the Minister of National Revenue during his two appearances before the committee, has ever offered an explanation as to why programs aimed at youth in the crucial 15-18 year age bracket are less important and therefore should be taxed than those aimed at children. Indeed, when one looks at the problems caused by drugs and alcohol, one would have thought that no government would put in place an impediment to programs which enable these teenagers to get involved in good, socially desirable activities. The notion that programs ought to be taxed because the individuals are over the age of 18 struck many members of the committee, including some opposite, and many of the witnesses, as absolutely ridiculous.

Again we have other situations in which not only taxpaying firms will having increased administrative burdens as a result of the GST, but charities and non-profit organizations will face similar administrative burdens because many produce both tax exempt and taxable goods. Consequently, they will need to apportion their costs and sales between the two types of activities in order to claim the 50% rebate and input tax credit. They must also collect and remit these taxes, and again they will have the same problem I described some time ago that fishermen will have with respect to working capital. This will represent a challenge for business, but it will represent a very difficult hurdle for charities and nonprofit organizations who rely largely on volunteers and do not have the money, or indeed the expertise, to deal with the new and complex administrative system.

Another part of the economy that will clearly be badly hurt by the GST is that part which involves public institutions at the provincial and municipal level. I am thinking specifically of municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals. All organizations in this sector have a number of problems with the GST. First, the tax rebate percentages that have been offered are based on the average amount of sales tax currently paid by each of these sectors. Clearly, this is only rough justice since some organizations pay more sales tax than the average, while others pay less. Furthermore, on a cash-flow basis, the new system imposes a very heavy cost on municipalities, universities, hospitals and schools because they must finance the GST when they pay the tax, but do not receive their rebate until some considerable time later.

The Canadian Hospital Association, as an example, calculated that the effect on cash-flow could amount to $95 million per year for the hospital sector, and one need only pick up any newspaper in any major city across the country to realize that hospitals are closing because they do not have enough money to keep existing beds open. Yet calculations from the Canadian Hospital Association indicate that the impact of the GST, because of its impact on working capital will be to drive up hospitals'cost in this country by $95 million.

All these organizations are extremely concerned about the administrative complexity of the GST. The Federation of Prince Edward Island Municipalities told us, for example, that small municipalities cannot cope with the GST. Representatives from the Canadian Hospital Association said they would not be able to implement the tax in January, 1991 because of the lead-time required to design and implement a new administrative system. Municipalities across the country told us that they could not be ready to implement it until at least mid-1991. They also told us they are facing significantly increased costs as a result of the GST.

Representatives of the city of Toronto and the city of Edmonton, for example, testified that GST protection is a major negotiating item with their unions. In addition, they have questions about the taxability of various, quasi- or para-municipal organizations. For example, is a municipal non-profit housing corporation taxable or not? If so, under what set of rules is it taxable? That is unclear from reading the material provided to me by the Minister's department. It is also unclear from questions which, for example, the city of Edmonton itself has asked the federal government.

A more complex situation arises when you take a case like the city of Edmonton, which operates a number of commercial enterprises such as telephone and power companies that would be subject to the tax even though they are utilities and therefore monopolies. Therefore, as Ron Hayter, an Edmonton Alderman, told the committee when we were there, Mr. Wilson's assertion that taxes on municipalities would not rise because of the GST was simply a fake assumption. Mr. Hayter went on to state:

> However, in Edmonton's case the commitment of Mr. Wilson will not be honoured. In fact, unless the terms of the bill are altered, the impact on the city of Edmonton will be significant, adding more than $20 million in additional tax per year to the backs of the citizens of our community.

He makes that statement on the basis of the increased tax which will accrue through municipal corporations such as telephone and power companies and through the additional taxes which will result from the application to the GST to non-profit corporation such as housing corporations.

The GST will also have a damaging effect on companies carrying on business with municipalities, because services provided in-house will not be taxed, while contracted out would be subject to the GST. This government has been arguing strenuously for privatization. They want to get government out of business, and to contract out to the private sector, thereby reducing the number of services that are provided by government. In fact, the GST will have the opposite impact. The GST will say to governments—such as municipal and provincial governments—that if they provide the service in-house, using their own members, that service will not be taxed because it is a service being provided in-house by government. On the other hand, if the same government were to contract out the service and seek a supply of that service from the private sector, that service would then be taxed because it would be provided by a private-sector company.

● (1000)

The President of the Canadian Construction Association, Mr. John Halliwell, in testimony before the committee in Toronto, said:

> Our members . . .

meaning the members of the Canadian Construction Association,

> . . . are greatly concerned that this will increase the amount of work done by in-house, and consequently that work will be lost to the construction industry.

Instead of pursuing the government's policy of reducing the size of the government and increasing the contracting-out business, the government has ensured the opposite.

Again with respect to the flaws in the GST, when one looks at the evidence that was given before the committee from co-operatives, the GST will penalize co-ops for three reasons: First, it will levy GST on the share capital of co-operatives because, unlike a normal share issue, the issue of shares in co-operatives is considered to be a taxable membership fee, not merely a share in the normal sense of equity. Second, the GST will penalize those co-ops that recoup their costs through taxable direct charges to their customers rather than marking up non-taxable items such as food, by taxing that direct charge. Third, because of the layered structure of the co-ops—particularly in the Atlantic provinces where they are tiered—these businesses would have to account for GST at several levels of their organization, thus placing an unnecessary and unfair administrative burden on co-ops compared to their competitors. The GST is unfair to co-ops in this case, but also to a variety of other organizations as I have already mentioned, such as municipalities, schools, and so on.

In addition, there is a significant negative impact of the GST on health care. Health care provided in health care facilities or by recognized health care practitioners would be exempt from the GST. However, Bill C-62 discriminates between health care institutions and practitioners, dividing them into two different categories.

Long-term care facilities operated by the public sector would receive the same 83 per cent rebate that hospitals receive, while others operated on a non-profit basis would receive the 50 per cent rebate level that goes to charities. These long-term care facilities operated for profit—long-term care nursing homes, for example—would not be eligible for any rebate on the tax paid on their purchases.

The committee heard evidence that a number of important health care practitioners' services would be taxable under the GST. Although these are health-care services, they will be taxable. They include: dieticians, social workers, veterinarians, and psychotherapists for children. For reasons that are entirely unclear to the committee, the exclusion of these practitioners from the list of exempt services clearly contradicts the government's assertion that health care will not be taxed by the GST.

Although physicians are exempt under the GST, they will have to pay tax on their own purchases but will not be permitted to charge tax on their sales. Evidence given to the committee by the Canadian Medical Association indicates that physicians are being asked to bear the cost of the GST and accept lower incomes because they are being asked to pay the tax on their inputs, but will not be left in a position where they can recoup the tax on the sale of their services.

It is important to recognize, therefore, that the claim by the government that the GST does not tax health services is simply not true.

One of the most interesting organizations to appear before the committee was the Funeral Service Association of Canada.

[Senator Kirby.]

They told us how the GST would affect them. With respect to the application of the GST to funerals, the committee made the observation that this was surely the first time in Canadian history in which the government was determined not only to tax you while you were alive, but indeed to tax you after you had died. Heretofore it has been true to say that the only two things in life that are certain are death and taxes. However, now there will be three things in life that are certain: death, taxes, and taxes after death.

If senators opposite were in a position to speak their mind and were not forced to be totally captive, I believe that all members of the committee would conclude that the GST on funerals is wrong. Indeed, it is absolutely ridiculous to tax the service provided by a funeral director when the funeral was paid for by the bereaved of a deceased years in advance. That sounded, to put it mildly, more than a little crass.

The situation with respect to funerals is compounded by the fact that officials at the Department of Revenue have given different answers to identical questions with respect to which services are subject to the GST.

Again we have the government arguing that education would be unaffected—that is, that the GST would have no impact on education. We have seen again—and Senator Hébert made a compelling argument about this earlier today, yesterday and Friday—that the GST will have a significant impact on education because of the tax that it will impose on books. Therefore, the claim by the government that the GST will be "education neutral" is wrong.

As I look on both sides of this chamber, I realize that there are several members here, including several on the other side, who have been university professors and in some cases are still associated with universities. They know as well as we do that the level of concern university students have with respect to the GST and its impact on their education costs is justified. There is no question that, contrary to Mr. Wilson's statements, it will have a negative impact on education.

The insurance industry has highlighted another area of concern that shows how inefficient the GST can be. Frankly, the transitional rules that have been implemented with respect to property and casualty insurance companies are rather stupid. Under the GST, any claim that they settle after January 1 they will have to pay GST on, even if that claim was for an accident that occurred before January 1, and even if the premiums that are used to finance the payment of that claim were fees based on pre-GST rates.

In other words, the insurance industry has been left in a position in which it has already charged rates in 1989 and 1990—as well as previously—related to the tax structure that then existed, but must now pay GST. In other words, if there is an accident in December, November or October of 1990 and the lcaim is settled on January 2, the insurer will have to pay the GST on that claim, even though it is based on an accident that took place prior to the implementation of the GST. In some respects the proposed application of the GST to the insurance industry,as put forward by government, amounts to retroactive legislation.

Hon. Dan Hays: I may have missed something, but I started to listen carefully when you introduced the segment of your speech where you spoke about alternatives to the GST. You were to refer to the single tax and the Brooks' proposal. Perhaps I am out of sync. with your speaking plans, but I wanted to add one more alternative that has been discussed, and to seek your comment on it.

For the purposes of other honourable senators, it is described in the May/June 1990 Canadian Tax Journal. This is an article by Messrs. Dungan, Mintz and Wilson. They talk about a number of alternatives, one of which is the simplified consumption tax. They go on to state that:

> The second alternative would match or perhaps even surpass the efficiency gains expected from the GST but would avoid the administrative costs and complexities associated with the GST and proposals such as the SCT. This alternative is the abolition of the federal sales tax and the replacement of the lost revenues via an income tax that would be closer to being a personal expenditure tax system than the present income tax system is. Federal income tax rates would be increased to make up most of the revenue lost through the abolition of the federal sales tax. To mitigate the adverse effect on savings that such a rate increase would involve, reform of the income tax would also include a liberalization of RRSP/RPP contribution limits, the introduction of an investment income deduction, and income averaging.
> The proposed reform would improve upon the efficiency gains that the GST would achieve by taking the logic of the GST proposal one step further:
> Since there would be no federal sales tax, the indirect federal sales tax burden on all capital goods would necessarily be zero. There would be no hidden taxes on any business inputs.
> The existing advantages to imports would be totally eliminated for all goods and services.
> Since there would be no federal sales tax burden, this burden would not vary from one type of good or service to another.
> In addition to allocative and dynamic efficiency gains, the abolition of the federal sales tax would involve non-trivial administrative savings. After a brief transition period, the cost of administering the federal sales tax system would disappear. What is at least as important, firms and their advisers would no longer have to cope with the complexities of the federal sales tax. Since the administrative costs of the GST would be even higher than those of the MST, the abolition alternative represents an even greater potential saving of administrative costs relative to the proposed GST than it does relative to the existing MST.

In a footnote I note that this is where I remember reading that the costs in the United Kingdom of the value-added tax in its first five years of operation equalled 11 per cent of the moneys collected under the tax.

They go on to state:

> The abolition proposal also offers the opportunity for a major political-economic reform. By completely abandoning the sales tax field, the federal government would establish this area of taxation as being one of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

That is something that should appeal, in particular, to our colleagues from Quebec. They go on to state:

> It would not be unreasonable for the federal government to obtain an appropriate quid pro quo, such as a surrender by the provinces of any future claims to estate tax revenues (an area that the provinces have already abandoned, for understandable reasons) or to other specified tax revenues.

Perhaps you would comment in this context on this type of tax reform as a third alternative to the ones that you have either discussed or proposed.

Senator Kirby: I am glad that you raised that point. I will postpone my detailed answer to your question until I have discussed in some detail Dennis Mills' single tax proposal and also the proposal of Professor Brooks. However, that comment from the Canadian Tax Journal fits in well. It indicates that there are a variety of alternatives that exist which people have contemplated. In the view of many members of the committee these alternatives have not been thought through well enough. I will come back to your point in one moment.

Before I do that, I wish to point out one or two other major problems that have been raised by the GST. If we are to look at what our other logical alternatives are, we need to do so in the context of what the problems are that we are trying to correct. Since the GST was presented to the public and the committee as a means of dealing with the problem of the manufacturers' sales tax, the question we are really being asked is this: What is the best way to deal with the removal of the MST?

Another area which needs to be dealt with concerns the problems associated with used goods and works of art. Several witnesses who appeared before the committee expressed their concern with the way in which Bill C-62 will apply the GST to used goods and works of art. This is of great concern since the majority of art purchases in Canada are purchases for investment, just as stocks and bonds are made for investment. The application of the GST to these items will, in the opinion of many art and antique dealers across the country, move investment priorities away from their area toward stocks and bonds. A great many of us feel that it is unfair to skew investment in that way.

However, what is far more important is that the zero rating of exports, including exports of works of art, will create a situation in which Canada may lose a large part of its works of art to foreigners since purchases will be made free of tax whereas purchases made by Canadians of the same types of works of art will be subject to the tax.

The list of problems concerning the implementation of the tax is long. There were many representatives of associations and organizations which appeared before the committee who stated their concerns with respect to implementation. For example, the Canadian Association of Customs Brokers now tell us that under the GST they will not enjoy the same degree of bad debt protection as other taxpayers will enjoy. The jewellers' association pointed out that the transitional provisions, namely the inventory rebate provision, will in fact treat them unfairly. The Investment Advisory Services Association has pointed out that investment advisory services are taxable whereas services provided directly by brokers are not. Flower wire services and telecommunications carriers have pointed out that certain forms of long distance communication will be taxed while others will not. The list goes on and on.

The basic point I make in giving this list of problems has to do with the fact that the transition provisions and problems associated with the bill are not just one but many, and that they will be in place for a long time to come. In trying to deal with these issues, I raised the subject a few moments ago concerning the fishing industry and fishermen in particular. I talked about the creation of an underground economy, which will almost certainly result from the implementation of the GST. In fact, the general perception and belief of many is that the GST will increase substantially the size of the underground economy.

When we talk about the underground economy, what are we really talking about? We are talking about a firm which, from a tax standpoint, will operate illegitimately or outside the tax system. It is outside the tax system in the sense that the business it does is done in Canada and it does not pay tax on that business. In fact, the government is the net loser in such a scenario.

There are a variety of ways in which to avoid such taxes. One of the most obvious is to conduct transactions for cash only as opposed to cheque. Another way is to do a series of transactions for payment in kind. That is to say, people will trade services rather than pay cash for them. When that happens, firms will bear no compliance costs. Clearly, they will be better off than firms with whom they are competing who agree to operate in the above-ground rather than in the underground economy.

Underground firms will have none of the disadvantages of registered businesses. An opinion given informally to members of the committee by many people who understand the small business sector expressed the concern that what would happen is that there would be a significant increase in the size of this economy, and that the net result would in some way be a decrease in government revenue.

One has to ask about the wisdom of having a tax structure which essentially encourages people to flout the law deliberately. Another problem with the GST which has been raised with the committee concerns visibility or the lack thereof, or the questionable visibility of the GST. Originally, as senators will recall, Mr. Wilson said one of the great things about the GST is that it would be visible, and thereby replace an invisible tax. The fact of the matter is that most provinces intend to apply their provincial sales tax on top of the GST, as opposed to applying it parallel thereto. If it is to be visible, cash registers will have to be equipped with two separate components so that they can list both the provincial tax and the GST. The fact of the matter is that most cash registers simply cannot perform those two functions. According to retailers, what will happen in many provinces is that all the consumer will see is a single compound tax rate, including a tax on a tax. Thus, visibility of this tax at that level will be lost.

Other retailers have presented some very interesting views on this point. Sears, which is a major retailer, has stated publicly that it will show the price exclusive of GST, and add the tax on at the cash register. Other equally big chains such as Woolworth's have stated that it will include the GST in its posted prices. As a result, it will be increasingly difficult to comparison-shop because, in some cases, one will compare a GST-included item with a GST-excluded item. To that extent the visibility of the tax is diminished because it will be visible in some cases while in others it will not.

In still other cases, when one pays a bill one will not know how much of the bill includes a component for the GST. Rent falls into this category, as do day-care services and dental services. In essence what has happened is that the laudable or desirable objective of a visible GST has been lost through the method of implementation of the bill. In fact, the method of implementation has led to what is easily the most complex tax bill we have seen. This multi-stage tax, in fact, is regressive and will hurt in particular small business.

There was an interesting study done in the U.K. which dealt with the cost of complying with the U.K. value-added tax, and which showed that the cost of complying with the value-added tax is 40 times higher for small businesses as a proportion of sales than it is for large firms. Businesses making only taxable sales must account for tax paid on purchases and taxes owed on sales, whereas the complexity increases substantially when you get into a business on which some things are zero-rated and tax exempt and some are not.

Indeed, there is a forthcoming book which I believe may actually be on the market now by Professor John Whalley and Deborah Fretz of the University of Toronto in which they indicate, and again I quote:

> The particular form of VAT that Canada proposes to introduce is, by international standards, surprisingly complex. It also has a relatively narrow base and, if European experience is anything to go by, further complications may yet develop, including multiple rates.

By "multiple rates", they meant different items were to be taxed differently. The complexity of the tax is most evident for small retailers selling food products. The definition of basic groceries, for example, is, of course, replete with anomalies—and they talked about some of those—and it will clearly be up to the retailer to ensure that the tax is correctly applied. Large retailers who have computerized check-out scanners can program their computers to do this, but small retailers cannot.

As we know, in many cases in small retail establishments, people at the check-out counters are part-time employees, usually students, who will have to be taught a very complex system in order to know to what to apply the GST and to what not to apply it. Therefore, the administrative problem posed by the GST to the small business sector, but particularly to the small retail business sector, is absolutely enormous.

This problem has been compounded enormously by the failure of the federal government to obtain provincial agreement to fold the federal and provincial taxes together and put them on the same base. The Canadian Federation of Independent Businesses said bluntly that this two-tiered system is such that it is simply unworkable from their point of view. Indeed, the CFIB has been absolutely adamant that government should not proceed to implement this tax without the cooperation of the provinces.

The recent agreement by Quebec to harmonize its provincial sales tax with the GST, although a step in the right direction from the point of view of the Canadian economy, Canadian consumers and the Canadian business community, is considerably short of national consensus, and even then the agreement was reached at the cost of the resignation of the Minister of Revenue in Quebec. Now we are beginning to see cracks in that agreement when, for example, we note that Quebec does not now itend to tax books but that the federal government still intends to tax them. One suspects that, down the road, one may very well see a situation in which federal-provincial agreement, even with Quebec, begins to fall apart.

In other provinces in Canada we see, in fact, federal-provincial agreement even further apart than that because we see Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, for example, challenging the issue in court.

It is an interesting to note, by the way, that the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the OECD, recently commented on the GST. It concluded that the biggest single flaw in the tax was the failure of the federal government to reach federal-provincial agreement on the tax. It then talked about the higher administrative and compliance costs that this would necessitate. Indeed, the sorts of figures that the OECD referred to were in the order of $400 million—subsequently the government has told us it is $475 million—as the cost of having to implement the GST.

Of all the tax alternatives which were presented to the committee—and I intend to comment on those—none is as damaging to the Canadian tourist industry as the GST. As I have already said in my comments with respect to the impact of the GST on Nova Scotia, it is very clear that the GST significantly hurts regions of the country which rely heavily on tourism as a main part of their business, the Yukon being another very, very good example, and Prince Edward Island another. It does this by discouraging tourists from coming to Canada because the rebates foreign travellers receive on tax paid on accommodation and goods purchased and taken out of the country is such that it will be received later on. However, people will still have to pay the money out in advance, and they are only eligible to receive it back after spending over $20. The history of tourist rebates of that kind in other countries has been that a lot of people do not apply for it and do not pick it up.

It is also very clear that the GST, in terms of hurting the economy, will have a significant impact on Canadian retailers living near the U.S. border, as we have seen happen in the electronic and print media in the last little while. The fact is that increasingly, Canadians are crossing the border to do their shopping, and the GST will significantly compound that problem.

Foreign travel receipts are an extremely valuable Canadian export, which were worth $7.2 billion in the last year for which data was available, namely, 1989, and we will be hurting this industry even with a complicated refund process. That clearly runs counter to the government's statement when it introduced the GST that its purpose was to relieve the cost burden on Canadian exports or on export-oriented industries like the travel industry rather than to increase the costs of such an industry.

Indeed, it was in dealing with the tax industry that Mel Couvelier, the Minister of Finance in British Columbia, made the observation that the GST:

> . . . will represent a significant price shock to the economy at a time when high interest rates and an artificially high dollar are already choking off economic growth.

That point, which Mr. Couvelier stressed in his remarks to the committee, is clearly relevant because, again, we have a situation in British Columbia where, for a variety of reasons, the fishing industry and the forest industry are in trouble. Using the GST has not only hurt those industries but has hurt the tourist industry, which make the situation in British Columbia even worse than it is today.

The question is: What does the government intend to do with the revenue under these circumstances? According to the government, what firms will do—using economic theory and not practical street sense—is to pass along the supposed savings from removing the manufacturers' sales tax. Yet, manufacturer after manufacturer told us that would not occur. We heard witnesses before the committee from manufacturing organizations saying repeatedly that they were not sure how much of the MST savings would be passed on to consumers. That appears to be a complete exaggeration. Therefore, the benefit that consumers were supposed to achieve as a result of the GST will clearly not be achieved.

It is equally clear that, during the transition period, significant problems will emerge in a number of industries, in part because of the haphazard manner in which some of the rebates are being given. The government decided that, for administrative simplicity, it would have a uniform, flat rate of rebate related to inventory on December 31 of some 8.1 per cent. That is obviously an unfair way to proceed. If a firm is in a position where it has had its inventory in place for some time—and it may have had a large inventory on which it paid the full 13.5 per cent—what will happen is, again because the government is trying to ease its administrative burden, a number of firms would be better off under the GST and a number would be worse off.

Indeed, it is precisely because of firms telling us that they will not pass on all the savings from the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax, and precisely because labour union leaders from one end of Canada to the other have told us that they will insist on their members getting back the increased cost of living which they will suffer as a result of the GST, that it has become apparent to us that the impact on the rate of inflation will be significantly greater than the 1.25 per cent forecast by the government.

The government made two incorrect assumptions when it forecast that 1.25 per cent increase in inflation: first, that workers would not get any of the increased costs back, and would not seek to do so, and, second, that the full savings from the manufacturers' sales tax would be passed on to consumers. Neither of these things will occur and that is why, again, a very negative macro-economic effect will accompany the passage of the bill.

The second point I would like to make relates to one of the arguments the government has used repeatedly, which has to do with the wonderful things a GST-type tax did when it was introduced in New Zealand. That model has been repeatedly presented in Canada as the model for Canada to follow. Yet, when one looks at the economic evidence resulting from the New Zealand experience, the situation is not nearly so reassuring.

The introduction of that country's GST does not appear to have gone particularly smoothly. The rate of price increases jumped dramatically in the year of introduction, significantly more than, or virtually double, what had been forecast. Economic growth stagnated for three years in New Zealand when this kind of tax was introduced, and in Canada we are introducing a GST into an economy that is already in a recession. It is hard to imagine, therefore, a worse time for introducing this type of tax.

In addition, in New Zealand, tax and tax transfer measures designed to protect lower income families were not indexed to inflation and they were not adjusted when the GST was increased. The result was that the poor in New Zealand were in worse shape two, three, and four years after the introduction of the GST than they were before it was introduced.

Finally, one cannot help but note that, while the government has said repeatedly that the GST is designed to be revenue neutral, subsequent comments made by Senator MacDonald at the committee hearings in Whitehorse indicate that it was rather idiotic for the government to continue to claim that the GST was revenue neutral when it was patently obvious that it was not. Since that time, I notice that the government has stopped making that claim. At the time the bill was introduced, the revenue neutral claim was made. When one looks at all of the data presented to the committee from the Chief Statistician of Canada, including the observation that 60 per cent of personal expenditures are spent on services, one has to wonder how much a tax could eber be considered revenue neutral.

It was the Canadian Advertising Foundation that pointed out that the GST was not simply a replacement of the FST. The government claim that the GST was revenue neutral lead the Better Business Bureaus of Vancouver and Toronto to label the government's GST advertising "offensive and misleading." The Standards Division of the Canadian Advertising Foundation ruled that government radio advertising stating that the GST is not an additional tax is "deceptive" because the GST will be applied on a much broader base than the FST, including such services as restaurant meals and haircuts. In other words, we have a situation where the public communications program of the government has been ruled deceptive, offensive and misleading by neutral organizations in the country whose role is to enforce better business practices.

In short, what has clearly happened is that the government's explanation of the GST has been deemed clearly untrue and not credible, not only to the average Canadian but to people who make judgments about whether or not a particular piece of advertising or public communications material is fair and truthful. Indeed, it is remarkable when a government is accused of leading an untruthful advertising campaign. One would have assumed that, of all the organizations in the country, one ought to expect some moral and truthful leadership from the federal government. I must say, however, that based on the track record of the Prime Minister in that department, I am not the least bit surprised that not only are his statements misleading but we now have a situation in which the actual advertisements are misleading.

Again, it was Mel Couvelier, the British Columbia Minister of Finance who said to the committee:

> It is no secret that the federal government sees the GST as a solution . . . to stem the red ink and slow the growth of the mountain of debt . . . I am frustrated by the federal mindset that sees a tax grab as the only solution to our fiscal dilemma.

That is a statement from the Minister of Finance in British Columbia.

● (1050)

The points I have made today clearly illustrate that not only in the minds of Liberals on this committee, but in the minds of a great many other people, the GST is not seen as being fair. It is also clear that the tax is not efficient for reasons I have already explained. Our tax structure must be competitive with that of our major trading partner, the United States. The United States does not have this kind of tax and has deliberately rejected it in the past as unworkable in a federal country. Americans do not face the same high level of taxation that Canadians face. So we have a situation in which the GST will exacerbate an already difficult situation. The Minister of Finance of New Brunswick told the committee the following:

> The goods and services tax represents a massive federal invasion of the sales tax field, which, until recently, was exclusively a provincial domain. If the federal government decides to use the goods and services tax to reduce its deficit, it will do so on the backs of the provinces by raising its initial 7 per cent rate and crowding the provinces out of this very important revenue source. This could result in a reduced ability to deliver provincial services or increased reliance on other taxes such as higher personal corporate taxes.

In other words, the situation with respect to the impact of the tax on provinces, on the economy as a whole, and on various individual groups and regions of Canada, will be negative.

We need to deal with another alternative. Our committee was particularly impressed—and I believe this was true of members on both sides of the committee—with the testimony of Professor Robin Broadway, who argued that the GST would increase the reliance on sales taxes, leading inevitably to further erosion of the federal government's position in the income tax field. In other words, there would be a continued shift from income to consumption taxes.

In 1970 the personal and corporate income tax revenue collected by the federal government was 2.5 times the amount collected by the provinces. In 1987 this ratio had slipped to 1.7 times. Professor Broadway believes that there are powerful reasons for the federal government to maintain its dominant position in the income tax field. Harmonization of the Canadian income tax system across provinces, which achieves a high degree of equity and efficiency, is coming under increasing strain as special provisions such as flat rate taxes in the western provinces erode the principles of harmonization. The income tax system may be the only means by which the federal government may address, on a national basis, issues of redistributive equity.

I return to a point I made at the beginning of my remarks when talking about the Atlantic region. There is a very strong belief among senators on this side of the house that one of the major roles of the national government is to redistribute income to individuals and regions that need it. The point that Professor Broadway was making is that the erosion of that federal role with regard to income tax may have an impact on the ability of the federal government to use its redistributive powers to ensure continued national programs in areas such as health and social services.

Professor Broadway went on to argue that, since the end of inheritance taxation, the only instrument left to the federal government to address redistributive equity is the personal income tax system. That has been the goal of the system. Although raising personal and corporate income taxes is obviously one option for replacing the manufacturers' sales tax and the federal sales tax, the fact is that the committee looked at a number of other alternatives. We did so because we thought there were a series of fundamental questions about the GST which remain. For instance, does the federal government really need to levy its own sales tax? Could the federal government vacate the sales tax field and raise income taxes instead? If some form of national consumption tax is desirable, must it take the form of a European-style credit invoice value-added tax, with the associated paperwork burden that requires tracking every transaction in the economy, or are there not, as has been suggested, some other ways of doing it?

The government has completely bypassed any public debate on these questions in its haste to introduce the GST. So far, the government's strategy in promoting the GST has relied solely on comparing it with the manufacturers' sales tax. However, no matter how damaging the manufacturers' sales tax is, this does not lead inevitably to the conclusion that the GST is the best alternative. Only a rigorous comparison between the GST and other alternatives can determine that. Unfortunately—and I say "unfortunately" because this is a view that was expressed to the committee by a number of academics and economists from leading national organizations—the government has failed to produce any studies which show conclusively or otherwise that the GST is the best alternative. That is why the committee began by deciding that it was not in favour of this alternative, and therefore would not reject all the other alternatives. The committee is saying that the GST is replete with errors, but by not proceeding with the tax the committee hopes that the government will take some time to examine other alternatives.

I would like to now talk very briefly about those two alternatives. One alternative is the single tax proposal which many of you have seen. If you have not seen it, I urge you to do so. I know that Senator Barootes had a copy of this book the other day, because I saw him avidly perusing it. In fact, it is an alternative to the GST. It shows that there are other ways of achieving the government's objectives.

Senator Barootes: That is the latest joke book that I have read.

Senator Kirby: Senator Barootes would regard it as a joke because he is so totally committed—unlike the other people in his region—to blindly following the policies of the government. He regards any other alternative as a joke. Perhaps that says something about the sense of humour of doctors. It certainly does not say anything about the sense of humour of people in Saskatchewan, knowing people like Senator Steuart and some other members opposite.

There are a number of points to be made in connection with Dennis Mills' single tax proposal which bear investigation and comment. The single tax integrates current personal and corporate income taxes and replaces all the accompanying paperwork with two tax forms. One is the personal compensation tax and the second is the business income tax. Both become fully integrated and all income becomes classified either as business income or personal compensation and will be taxed accordingly, so that even the current system as we now know it, and not the enormously complex system we will have after the GST, will be significantly simplified.

All taxpayers would benefit from this simpler system. The average taxpayer would merely have to complete a tax return on a form the size of a postcard. In fact, the tax form is approximately double the size of a postcard, if you wish to see what it looks like. On this particular form individuals will be required to pay a tax based on all income, wages, salaries, pensions, dividends, interest and capital gains. All other forms of income would be taxed as business income.

For individual tax calculations, the total income is taxed at 25 per cent, and then tax credits are applied to deal with the regressivity problem. The net effect of the set of tax credits and the tax structure proposed in the book on the single tax—although one recognizes that one could use the same percentages or vary the actual percentages—has the following implications:

First, a family earning $10,000 with two children under the age of 18 would continue to pay no tax under the single tax proposal, just as they do now. But under the single tax system, their tax refund would rise to $2,000, which is significantly greater than the $300 or $400 it is at the present moment.

A family earning $20,000 with two children would pay no tax and receive a refund of $582. Other families with two children would all pay less tax under the single tax than they do under the current system, including the system of GST rebates—that is, the GST tax credit.

The tax on individuals and corporations is the same, but the individual tax has generous tax credits that make the overall system more progressive than our current system.

The present tax system has low exemption levels, a huge network of credits, special purpose exemptions and a complicated—indeed, some might state not understandable—method of calculating taxable income, especially if income is derived from sources other than straight employment. The net result is that the current tax system is such that those with time, resources and significant incomes can set up complex financial arrangements and fancy corporate structures in order to minimize their tax burden, whereas those who simply receive income from employment have no opportunity to take advantage of these kinds of tax openings or structures—and some might call them loopholest. This builds considerable inefficiencies into the tax system. It is an unfair system not only both in terms of vertical equity but also in terms of the horizontal distribution of taxes within a particular set of taxpayers at a particular income level, because taxpayers making the same amount of income, depending on the source and the method that they are able to use to hide it, are taxed in quite a different way.

The single tax would eliminate all those inefficiencies and inequities. Experience in other countries suggests that it would also reduce the probability of tax evasion because the high income marginal rate is lowered—as stated in this book—to a level of 27 per cent, which is considerably lower than it is now.

The principles that I have just outlined pertaining to business could be applied to individuals, because at that point it catches all business income at its source and taxes it only once. It avoids the multilayered or multilevelled tax system that we have now. Under the single tax system, every business would add up its revenue from selling products or services, and its dividends received from Canadian corporations. Certain costs would then be deducted from them, for example, costs for outlays for goods, materials, services, dividends, and so on. The depreciation expense would also be deducted. What remains would be taxed at a taxable rate of 25 per cent.

All businesses, big or small, would be treated the same, which is exactly why the Conservatives would not like it since it would treat their rich friends the same way that it treats small business members of the CFIB, and so on. Under the single tax system, all businesses, big or small, would be treated the same. All would have a form that could be filled out. As I have said, on which all information fits onto a card that is basically the size of two postcards.

The big advantage of the single tax is that everyone is seen to be paying the same basic rate. But low income taxpayers, especially seniors and those with children, would have less of a burden and would pay into a tax system that is less regressive and more in line with their ability to pay. It would restore the element of progressivity to our tax system that used to exist a long time ago but which, as a result of tax changes made by governments of both parties over a 20-year period, has become almost non-existent.

The second big advantage of the single tax system is that it makes the system more air tight because there is much less likelihood or opportunity for individuals to avoid paying their fair share. Tax credits are made more pronounced and more progressive. Indeed, the tax credits are targeted at the family, the elderly and the disabled, and contain a prudent investment for saving for retirement by enhanced RRSP and charitable contribution benefits.

One of the advantages of the single tax is that all income is taxed at the same rate rather than the system we have now, under which, depending upon the—

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Senator Kirby, would you entertain a question?

Senator Kirby: Yes. I would be delighted.

Senator Barootes: Speaking of the Mills' one flat tax, are we now to accept that the Liberal Party advocates this type of tax system in view of the fact that he is a member of the Liberal group in the House of Commons?

Senator Kirby: Thank you for your question. I understand, Senator Barootes, that you have trouble with this concept. In contrast to the situation in which you find yourself, our party has a tendency to say that people who have ideas should be encouraged to speak about them and to comment on them rather than merely reflect in a puppet sort of robot-type fashion the views that you are told to espouse.

I realize that that is a difficult concept for you to understand, because it is something that you are not used to, but our party has been encouraging people to try to explore a variety of different alternatives to the GST. The fact is that Mr.

Chrétien has appointed a committee consisting essentially of people who are experts in the field of economics and tax law to help us develop a proposal. We have said that we will be commenting on that and stating what that proposal is well before the next election.

It is fair to state that one of the options our party will be definitely looking at is the single tax. It is not fair to say that that is the position that we have now adopted as a party.

Senator Barootes: Mr. Mills has presented this document to your party. Did they adopt it or did they reject it at that time?

Senator Kirby: Just so that we are clear, he did not present it to a national policy committee of the party. However, he has discussed it in a number of places. Frankly, he even discussed it before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee

• (1110)

In fact, an idea along with many others which our committee heard was one from professor Neil Brooks who has another alternative, an income tax alternative. Personally, I prefer the single tax alternative. There may be other alternatives even better coming down the road; I do not know.

The important point I am trying to make is that on the basis of evidence put before the committee by witnesses it is evident that there are a number of alternatives to the GST which were either not explored by the government or which were explored by the government and then rejected without explanation. If we are to have major tax reform of the type which the GST will cause, then it is essential that the Canadian public understand that the chosen option is the best option.

One of the biggest problems that the committee found in dealing with the GST was that we were being told that, "Major tax reform is required. Here is the alternative. We are not prepared to show you or talk to you about what the other alternatives are". A great many of us found that frustrating. Indeed, I would make the argument that if the government looked at other alternatives—and I have no evidence that it did—then it did itself an enormous disservice by failing to explain those other alternatives to the Canadian public. The government has failed to say, "Faced with a range of options, this is the direction in which we plan to go". I hope that Dennis Mills' proposal will be very seriously considered by the party, along with other alternatives. I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that by the time the next election rolls around there will be alternatives before the public which will be ours compared with the GST which is yours.

Senator Barootes: Did Mr. Mills suggest this as an alternative to the GST, or was it his alternative to corporate and personal income taxes?

Senator Kirby: The answer is both, in the sense that what Mr. Mills has pointed out is that the revenue generated by the single tax would be equal to the revenue generated by the current corporate and personal income tax, as well as the manufacturers' sales tax.

Senator Steuart: I have in my hand the book by Dennis Mills. Is it not a fact that on page 111 and subsequent pages he puts forward other tax reform proposals? He revisits the Carter Commission proposal, one of the most comprehensive studies of the tax system ever made in Canada, and perhaps in any other western country. As happened with the GST, the public, unfortunately, accepted some of the proposals and rejected others which it did not like. We ended up with a proposal that was neither fish nor fowl, unfortunately, and one far more complicated than the one we had.

Is it not a fact that he also talks about the Bradley-Gephardt fair tax proposal, which was put forward in the United States? There is also a proposal put forward by John Ferguson—an earnings tax proposal. Could you comment on those? Does this not indicate that as a Liberal he is putting forward a great many proposals?

Senator Kirby: Yes, I think that is the case. In fairness to Senator Barootes, having looked at those alternatives, Mr. Mills says in his conclusion that the single tax approach is the best.

One of the points I was trying to make is that from the government's point of view it is really quite unfortunate that it did not effectively do the same thing with respect to the GST. Instead of putting forward a whole range of options to deal with the country's tax problems, it merely presented one option which to a great many of us seems to be filled with a number of flaws.

When we look further at the single tax proposal we see that one of its appealing points is the fact that it eliminates the potential for tax avoidance—tax avoidance not being illegal and it being something which good accountants do—because it simply eliminates most of the tax shelters which exist at the moment. The single tax proposal is advantageious since it is more efficient than a number of other tax systems. It is more efficient because it is easier to administer and enforce. It does not have the multistage problems associated with the GST. Therefore, it is less costly to the economy. At the same time it would produce at least as much revenue as the present tax system produces. When I say the present tax system, I mean the tax system which involves both the current income tax system—corporate and individual—and the manufacturers' sales tax or its replacement.

Second, the fact is that lower marginal tax rates will lead to more take home pay and all the incentives that members opposite have argued would result any time you have a lower marginal rate system. Therefore, it has significant incentives built into it. If we look at the history of what happens as marginal tax rates have changed we find that in the 1920s, because marginal tax rates in North America have gone up and down like a roller-coaster, the United States cut marginal tax rates by two-thirds. Yet, in the course of doing so the United States doubled its tax take from the wealthy. By cutting marginal rates and by eliminating loopholes the United States increased its revenues.

Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute—and, goodness knows, the Fraser Institute is not a friend of members of this side of the house—has stated,

> In then Finance Minister, and now Senator, Allan MacEachen's 1981 budget, marginal rates were dropped from 70 per cent to around 50 per cent and the total amount of taxes collected from top earners actually increased. Not only did this happen here, it also happened in roughly the same period in the United States and the United Kingdom.

I use that quote only to illustrate that historically decreasing tax rates increases revenue because that in turn decreases the incentive for people to get around the system.

In Canada, what happens under our current situation, as opposed to what would happen under a single tax system, is that there is an incentive for people who spend a considerable amount of time, energy and money to find creative schemes to avoid paying taxes. Most of these schemes would be eliminated by a system such as the single tax or any other system which would give people incentives to earn more, because they would have to give less to the government. In fact, I recently talked to someone who had moved from Ontario to Florida several years ago. He pointed out that under tax reform in the United States the marginal tax rate in a state like Florida is 28 per cent on the top incomes. At a rate of 28 per cent, this individual pointed out he was paying more tax than he would in Canada where the marginal rate was 50 per cent. In Canada he had a variety of ways of sheltering income from tax so his effective tax rate was something like 26 per cent or 27 per cent rather than the 28 per cent on everything taxed in Florida.

It seems to me it could be very misleading to look merely at what the total marginal tax rate is, because a simplified tax system with fewer loopholes and lower rates is not only fair but can also simultaneously actually generate more revenue for the government.

The single tax system also has the advantage that it provides strong incentive for investment. The simplified depreciation allowance and the deductibility of dividends, for example, make for a healthy balance sheet, thus making it easier to raise capital. Equal treatment of dividend income and the deductibility of dividends paid to Canadian residents also provide an incentive to individuals to invest in companies, and will also encourage companies to seek equity financing instead of debt financing.

If one looks at the Atlantic provinces and indeed the small business sector in general, the biggest single problem facing many of these companies when they do get into financial trouble is their tendency to want to ope for debt rather than refinancing through equity. That is because debt financing is easier to achieve and, in part, because they want to maintain ownership in their company and therefore do not want to give up the equity. However, the single tax system can be structured in such a way as to encourage increased investment in equity rather than debt. It seems to me that that is not only good for the average Canadian investor, but is significantly better for the business community.

[Senator Kirby.]

One would argue that, if properly structured, the single tax system would clearly help communicate the message, not only in Canada but elsewhere, that Canada is in fact a good place and a strong place in which to invest.

Another advantage of the single tax system is the perceived gains from the resulting macroeconomic benefits derived from such a system. Economists estimate that the economic distortions caused by the current tax system cut 10 per cent to 20 per cent from the GNP. They will tell you that essentially there is somewhere between 10 per cent and 20 per cent of the GNP which is eliminated as a result of the current tax system as a result of all the gameplaying that takes place in an attempt to deal with the loopholes or take advantage of the loopholes that exist in the system.

The introduction of the single tax system would, in the opinion of many, unleash the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada by eliminating the distortions and disincentives of the current tax system. Government could concentrate, instead of tinkering with the tax system, on doing what governments ought to, which is providing goods and services to Canadians. In particular, when one looks at the impact of the single tax system in our current tough economic times, one can see quite clearly that if one adjusts the flat rate to 25 per cent, which is what is proposed in this book, the single tax system will in fact be completely revenue neutral. By "revenue neutral" I mean that it would not only generate the same level of revenue as the current personal income tax and corporate income tax system, but would also generate income to replace the manufacturers' sales tax.

Therefore, it seems to me that it has an advantage the current GST does not, in that the current GST, because it is a consumption-driven tax, will in fact serve to increase inflation and thus further prevent the lowering of interest rates. The GST will, in turn, keep the dollar at an artificially high level. Therefore, we have a situation, as I said earlier today, where the GST is causing undesired side effects. In medicine, you would say that you had given people a medicine which would solve one problem but would create a series of more serious side effects. The GST is in fact creating side effects in the economy which are bad for the economy and which clearly would not occur if a different tax system were implemented.

It seems to me, therefore, that the single tax is but one example of a tax alternative to the GST which meets the revenue objectives of the government,—by which I mean that it meets the objective of eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax while at the same time leaving us in a position to generate the same amount of money while eliminating a lot of the negative side effects. The single tax, because it is not a consumption tax, eliminates all the undersired side effects with respect to the tourist industry and the insurance industry. It eliminates all the sides effects I talked about earlier this morning, yet you still receive the revenue. It seems to me, then, it is an alternative which clearly ought to be considered.

The second alternative which the committee heard about at some length was presented by Professor Neil Brooks of Osgoode Hall. Some of you may have seen a number of articles in the Globe and Mail—or it may have been the Toronto Star. One of those two newspapers carried two or three fairly lengthy extracts on the Op-ed page which summarized Professor Brooks' proposal. He began from the same position as both parties in the House, which is that the manufacturers' sales tax ought to be abolished and, indeed, as a result of the Free Trade Agreement, has to be abolished. It has to be abolished in part because it imposes a tax on exports that is not borne by goods produced by competitors. It also distorts prices and, finally, it leaves the service sector completely untaxed, which, given the relative size of the service sector in the Canadian economy, is clearly not a situation we can continue to sustain for any length of time.

Mr. Brooks then goes on to argue that the only responsible way to make up the revenue that would be lost by abolishing the manufacturers' sales tax is to strengthen the progressive income tax system. Unfortunately, if one goes back to the 1987 white paper produced by the government, one finds that the government argued back then that this element of tax reform could not be accomplished. In effect the government was unwilling to deal with the issue of making the income tax system more progressive as a means of solving the revenue shortfall it would incur by eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax.

However, what the Brooks study shows is that the government's claim that it would take a 35 per cent increase in income tax rates in order to make up the lost revenue is simply not true. If one looks at the government's paper in 1987 and examines statements by the Department of Finance at that time, one finds that that statement is completely false and borders on fabrication. In fact, what Neil Brooks shows in his study is that it would take only a 15 per cent increase to federal rates—not total rates but merely the federal rates—to make up the lost revenue, and this would involve increasing the bottom rate by 2.7 percentage points, the middle rate by 4.2 percentage points and the top rate by 4.6 percentage points.

In other words, essentially Professor Brooks says in his proposal that the manufacturers' sales tax could be abolished and all the revenue could be made up through the existing tax system simply by increasing the rates slightly. In fact, when you do that, the top income rate ends up being only 51 per cent, which is still lower than it was in 1984. It is not as if it leads to rates which are so usurious that Canadians will automatically flee the country, at least at the rate which we had in the early 1980s.

● (1130)

Hon. D. G. Steuart: We have been going over all of the tax proposals made to the Carter Commission. He recommended that if you could follow through on his original tax reforms and stick strictly to equity, both horizontal and vertical, the aim would be to do away with the federal sales tax. He also suggested that the federal government should, rather than unilaterally doing away with the federal sales tax, negotiate with the provinces in order to have them move out of the corporate income tax field. Moving out of the sales tax field would leave the provinces a great deal more room for a tax that they would consider basically their tax, and they would then move out of the corporate income tax field, which the federal government has always considered its particular domain. He also thought it would be better if the provinces were not in the corporate income tax field, which they would probably use as a tax incentive to encourage industry to go to their particular province, thereby setting up a bad competitive situation within the provinces.

Do either Mills or Brooks move in that direction and suggest that, at any time, the federal government might use this as a condition on which they would move out of the sales tax field, thus vacating the field and encouraging provincial governments to possibly move further into it and to get out of the income tax field?

Senator Kirby: Yes, as a matter of fact, Dennis Mills' proposal in particular and, to a lesser extent, the Brooks proposal argue that the importance of the federal government's maintaining an even stronger position in income tax is related to the importance of that revenue being used by the federal government for redistribution purposes to regions of the country like yours and mine, Senator Steuart. But there are also advantages to avoiding a duplication in the system and, if the federal government stayed out of consumption taxes and the provinces got into consumption taxes on services—not merely on goods the way most of them are now—which seems inevitable in light of the fact that 60 per cent of the economy of the country is now in that service sector, there could easily be a readjustment that would allow the federal government to strengthen its role vis-à-vis income taxes. Hopefully, this would lead to some weakening of the provincial role in income taxes, and, at the very least, to not having the provincial governments increase their income tax role. That is why it seems to me that some discussion of alternatives would be desirable. There are alternatives.

Both Brooks' proposal and Mills' proposal effectively point out that there are ways of achieving the desired objective, which is dropping the manufacturers' sales tax and getting the revenue without the GST. I think your point is well taken.

If I were to put the Brooks proposal in point form, what it says essentially is that, first, the manufacturers' sales tax or the federal sales tax ought to be eliminated and the current associated federal sales tax credit would be eliminated. It says that federal taxes would be increased so that, in a sense, the bottom rate would become about 20 per cent; the middle rate would become 31 per cent; and the top rate would become 35 per cent. That, of course, is the federal tax rate; provincial rates would be on top of that. It says that excise taxes would be increased on tobacco, alcohol and gasoline. It further says that government revenues from corporations would be increased by approximately $2 billion to recover part of the windfall that would result to the private sector, to corporations, from the removal of the MST.

A proposal along those lines—and you could certainly think around the edge of those lines in a variety of ways—would have the effect of being revenue neutral; of eliminating all of the marked distortions and competitive disadvantages of the existing manufacturers' sales tax system—to pick up on Senator Steuart's point—leaving the general sales tax base, the consumption tax base, to the provinces and, in fact, making the federal tax system considerably fairer and more progressive.

A variety of the Brooks proposal has subsequently been developed using different computer models to achieve the same objective which is revenue neutrality and the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax.

Under the Brooks proposal, the system is considerably fairer because the after-tax income of families in the $30,000 to $35,000 range is, in fact, $270 greater than it is under the GST. The after-tax income of families in the over $100,000 range would decline slightly but the income tax alternative for low-income families would be that their after-tax income would decline substantially.

I come back to the fact that I do not understand the situation where the Governor of the Bank of Canada insists repeatedly that he is managing a macroeconomic policy with, one might say, the sole objective of reducing the rate of inflation and yet the Minister of Finance is managing an economic policy which appears to have as its primary objective increasing the rate of inflation. The fact is, whether it is the single tax proposal or the Brooks proposal, both decrease inflation by about two points, thereby reducing pressure on interest rates with all the attendant advantages that brings, like a lower dollar, and lower debt servicing costs.

The argument that the government has made for the GST, which is that we have no choice, is clearly wrong. What the Brooks proposal makes clear is that there are alternatives and that there are choices to be made. We on our side are essentially arguing that these choices can be made and these alternatives ought to be explored prior to this country locking itself into the GST. Compared to the proposed GST, either of the two income tax alternatives that I have described—either the single tax proposal of Dennis Mills, which I personally prefer, or the Brooks proposal—are considerably more straightforward than the GST. They achieve the objective of the MST being abolished and they generate a system that is not only fairer but which is perceived to be fairer. The consumption tax field is best left to provincial governments. It has the enormous advantage, from the consumers' point of view and from a macro-economic point of view, of being a fair system.

● (1140)

In 1991 the manufacturers' sales tax would raise $18.5 billion in tax revenues. However, if it is abolished, provincial revenues would decline by approximately $1 billion because the provincial taxes or sales taxes are based on the selling price, which includes the manufacturers' sales tax. Provinces levy their retail sales tax on the price of goods, which include the MST. If the MST is abolished, the price of goods will drop and, thus, provincial sales taxes and tax revenues will decline—or so the argument goes.

For the change to be revenue neutral to all levels of government, $19.3 billion of revenue must be found. Approximately

[Senator Kirby.]

$2.3 billion of the manufacturers' sales tax falls on goods purchased by the government sector. Therefore, if the MST were abolished and the reduced taxes reflected in prices, the government sector would need $2.3 billion less in revenues to finance its purchases. Approximately $2.3 billion of the manufacturers' sales tax falls on alcoholic beverages, tobacco products and gasoline. There is little reason for reducing the tax on these products and, therefore, the relevant excise taxes would be increased to recover this revenue. If the manufacturers' sales tax were abolished, the refundable sales tax credit could be repealed, a saving of $900,000 or $.9 billion. If the manufacturers' sales tax were abolished and the cost reductions passed on directly through prices, the consumer price index would decline by slightly more than 2 percentage points. This would save the governments $1 billion in transfer payments to individuals and provinces. It would also result in additional income tax collections of two-tenths of $1 billion or $200,000 because of the reduced tax indexing effects.

Finally, if the manufacturers' sales tax were abolished, there would be a substantial windfall to corporations. In 1991, $1.5 billion of the manufacturers' sales tax would be levied on exports. Since Canadian corporations are price takers—not price givers or price leaders—in world markets, corporate profits would presumably increase by this amount. Moreover, some large percentage of the manufacturers' sales tax levied on corporate fixed capital investment likely falls on corporate profits. Therefore, if the MST were abolished it would seem fair to raise the revenue collected through corporate income tax by $2 billion. That is essentially keeping the status quo. This additional revenue from corporations could be easily raised without increasing the basic corporate tax rate. The lower tax rate for manufacturing and processing credits could be abolished.

One of its justifications has always been the additional burden that the MST imposes on corporations engaged in manufacturing of processing. Other corporate tax incentives might be abolished or loopholes closed. Measures might be taken to increase corporate tax compliance. The large corporations tax might be increased or a minimum corporate tax might be enacted.

My point in listing that litany of options is simply to point out that there are alternative ways of doing what needs to be done in terms of eliminating the MST and raising the revenue. It is not necessary to simply proceed with the GST. It is for that reason that the Brooks' proposal received much support from the committee. One of the things it does is reduce the regressivity of the tax system.

The main argument against consumption taxes from economists and others has been that they are regressive. Low-income individuals spend a significantly greater percentage of their income on consumption than high-income individuals. Therefore, it is unfair to introduce a consumption tax which significantly impacts lower-income Canadians. That is a basic issue which the Brooks' proposal attempts to address. Whether or not one likes this proposal or some of the other proposals, one ought to examine them in much greater depth and detail than we have.

Historically, that has not taken place. What has happened is that one proposal has been put forward and that is essentially all that has happened. Canadians from coast to coast have been left with the problem of having to decide whether to accept the GST in a vacuum without really understanding other alternatives and without understanding the merits of the single tax, the merits of the Brooks' proposal, or the merits of a myriad of other proposals, and without understanding why the federal government decided to proceed to introduce the GST without fully exploring all the other income-driven schemes, including expenditure schemes which close loopholes and raise taxes by reducing deductions.

One has the sense that the federal government did not fully explore all these alternatives before reaching a conclusion to proceed with the GST. The government, along with everyone else who has commented on the tax issue, concedes the regressivity of the goods and services tax and concedes that regressivity is not something that is desirable. Since it is patently obvious, using the data I presented some time ago, you can show quite clearly that the system of tax credits which the government is proposing is regressive because they do not meet the standard of adequately protecting low-income Canadians, one wonders why the government did not look at other alternatives which would have solved its basic problem. The proposed refundable sales tax credit is an inadequate solution to the regressivity problem, partly because of the failure to index to the cost of inflation. That is true for both the level at which the credits cut in and the credits themselves. We must remember that there is a relatively unprogressive or regressive tax system in the country at the present moment—provincial sales taxes. That simply makes the situation considerably worse.

More importantly, the GST imposes huge administrative costs on the government, which need not exist if you went to either of the two options I have talked about. There already exists a mechanism to deal with the taxes that are based on income. Whether they are income for corporations or income for individuals, a system exists for collecting those taxes. That is something which is not a huge administrative burden. In some of the proposals I have talked about today, those proposals meet the test of progressivity without any new administrative costs.

Finally, we have a situation with either of the two proposals or alternatives that I talked about this morning where it is abundantly clear that the macro-economic effects or rate of inflation are significantly reduced. In fact, in the case of the single tax proposal they are deinflationary; that is, the rate actually comes down instead of going up. Furthermore, it eliminates a lot of distortions in the system.

Honourable senators, prior to embarking on such a massive step in tax reform as is covered by the GST, clearly one of the things that should have been done was to look at alternatives. That would have avoided a lot of the problems that I have enumerated this morning in connection with the GST. In addition to eliminating those problems, the position of the government with respect to the income side would have been maintained.

When I look at the fact that the GST is a substantial intrusion of the federal government into a tax area traditionally occupied by the provinces; when I look at the fact that the two levels of government have been unable to agree on a common sales tax base; when I look at the fact that the business community says repeatedly to our committee that they are concerned about the enormous costs they will have to incur by keeping two sets of records, duplicate tax procedures, and so on; and when I look at all the other negative impacts of the GST—while at the same time realizing there are other alternatives that meet with the government's basic objective, namely, to eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax and maintain revenue neutrality—I begin to wonder why it is that we wound up in this country with the alternative that we did.

I want to tell the government that clearly one of the things that needed to be done was to look at other options and have serious discussions of those options. It was the failure of the government to look at other options and the government's absolute refusal to look at alternatives that would have met their objectives that led those of us on this side of the house to argue that the only responsible conclusion for the committee to reach, which we did in our committee report, was that the bill should be defeated. In doing so we have said to the government, "Go back to the drawing board and look at the many other alternatives that exist. Then come back with a proposal that does not have those negative attributes but still meets the objectives." I indicated in my summary comments this morning that there are other ways of doing this.

Hon. Dan Hays: Senator Kirby, I should like to ask you a question involving what you think the timing of the withdrawal of the GST should have been. Was there ample notice to the government during the Blenkarn committee hearings? Should it have come to the Senate at all? I am curious about that.

You talked a lot about the government failing to pursue alternatives. I am sure that they were considered by someone in the bureaucracy. I should like to ask you when you think the government should have been on sufficient notice that this tax was—as we on this side believe—too complicated, unfair and simply not going to work as far as the Canadian people are concerned.

There was a point when the government should have realized this. It is late in the day now. They have their bits in their teeth and the tax will be implemented no matter what—at least that is the way it appears. But there was a point when it would have been easy for them to back off and say, "This is not the right thing to do." When do you think that was?

Senator Kirby: That point was probably in 1988, when there was considerable opposition to the GST in circles where it was discussed.

Even the Prime Minister has said, for example, that a tax on books is wrong. Yet we introduced an amendment to exclude books and members opposite voted it down. It is patently obvious that the tax discriminates against people living in northern Canada, yet when we introduced an amendment to correct that problem, members opposite voted it down. It is obvious to anyone looking at the situation that there are other considerable problems that we attempted to deal with by way of amendment; for example, the lack of progressivity and the regressivity of the bill.

What we are seeing is a situation, as we saw in Meech Lake and in other government initiatives, where there is absolutely no flexibility or willingness to accept any change. There has never been a situation where a government has been as intransigent on as many issues as this government has. Our problem, Senator Hays, is that even if some people somewhere in the government realized a couple of years ago that there were other ways of achieving the objective, the nature of this government, as typified by the Prime Minister, is such that they shall never back off, compromise, change their minds, amend or otherwise change their views on anything. That is the fundamental problem.

In concluding my remarks, I should like to make the observation that one of the questions that our committee struggled with—that is, those of us on our side of the house—was the question that given all the problems with the tax; given the fact that what was needed was a massive rewriting, was: How do we deal with that? Are there ways of doing it? Should the committee do what we ultimately did, namely, recommend that the bill be defeated? Frankly, that is an issue that bothered a lot of us during the summer. Because some of us on the committee were concerned about this, we frequently asked witnesses who appeared before us whether or not they thought the Senate ought to defeat the bill and whether or not it was legitimate for us to do so. The type of reaction we received from a number of people played a very clear factor in a decision by those of us on our side of the House to make the recommendation to the committee that we did.

● (1200)

I will now give honourable senators an example of just such an opinion as presented by Mr. David Orchard who testified before the committee on July 25 in Regina. In response to the question: "What should the Senate do faced with this situation?" Mr. Orchard made the following observation to the committee:

> Many people criticize the Senate as being undemocratic and an old-age-folks' home. The Senate is the one institution that has provided real opposition to Mr. Mulroney and his government . . .
> What moral authority does this government have to impose the policies that are universally opposed by the people of this country? . . . He has no moral authority for the GST . . . The Senate is the one democratic thread that we have left in the last six years.

I believe that statement typifies other statements that we heard from individual Canadians as we travelled across the country. On the basis of public opinion polls it is fair to say that statement typifies how the average Canadian views the role of the Senate. They now look upon this government's actions with such contempt, distrust and a sense of utter disgrace—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Kirby: I would be quite happy to respond to the noises from the other side. The fact is that the public view—and I use words such as contempt, disgust and utter frustration without levity—about the government has reached the point where fewer than 15 per cent of the people support it. In regions of the country like Atlantic Canada, that figure is down to 5 and 6 per cent. Something like that occurs only when people are at the point where they have a complete sense of disgust and frustration with the government.

Indeed, witnesses who appeared before the committee argued that the tax is unfair. They argued that it is regressive and wrong for the government to proceed to implement such a tax under these circumstances. They argued that we, as senators on both sides of the house, have an obligation to deal with this sense of frustration and with the fact that they are so strongly opposed to the tax.

It is a sobering experience to attend a committee hearing in any part of our country. I say this in recognition of the fact that there are 24 senators opposite who have not yet had the opportunity to travel across the country with a senate committee. Even though they were appointed here to rubber-stamp one particular bill, I urge them not to be so automatic with other pieces of legislation. It is a moving experience to sit through hours of testimony and to find that there are average citizens sitting at the back of the hall who have been there all day, waiting for their five minutes at the end of the day when they can walk up to express their views. The fact that people from all walks of life are willing to wait all day to come up and say their piece shows something of the importance with which people view the Senate.

Another example of such a view was presented by Dr. Edward Agnew of Winnipeg, who at the end of the day came before the committee to state the following:

> Government of the people, by the people, for the people is in jeopardy in this country and this piece of legislation is helping to get rid of it.
> In fact, at the present time Canadians are wondering what the democratic process in this country is all about . . .
> This goods and services tax must be defeated because it is undemocratic legislation . . . And you, senators, are the only people who stand between the democratic process of Canada that I used to know and straight dictatorship.

That is not an argument made by someone deeply involved in partisan politics. It is an argument made by a general practitioner in Winnipeg who took a considerable amount of time to sit and listen to witnesses from various organizations, and who took advantage of the opportunity to come before a Senate committee at the end of the day to express his views in the five minute walk-on session. I say that parenthetically because I recognize that there are a great many new members in the chamber, that henceforth when Senate committees travel—and I argue strenuously that they should continue to travel—the learning experience involved is enormous in terms of seeing people on their home ground and listening to their remarks.

Senate hearings of this type should provide for walk-ons at the end of the session. The effect is that one really gets to hear what Canadians are truly thinking. One gets to hear Canadians who truly care about the system. It is in that context that Dr. Edward Agnew of Winnipeg made his comments about both the GST and the role of the Senate, something which I think is important for us all to understand.

I know that members opposite will not believe me when I say that those of us on our side who were members of the committee this summer began the hearings with the view that the outcome of the process would be that we would recommend a number of amendments to the bill since, obviously, a number of amendments were necessary. It had not crossed the minds of many of us that the outcome of the committee process would be a recommendation that the bill be defeated. In fact, what happened during the hearings, from one end of the country to the other in twelve cities in every province and territory, is that the more we listened to the criticism of this piece of the legislation, the more we realized that it was not amendable. We realized that it would require a massive number of amendments and an extensive number of revisions. It would require a total rewriting.

The only responsible thing to do was to decide to recommend to the House that the bill be defeated and that the government go back to the drawing-board. We did that because the witnesses we heard from made it clear that the bill will have an extremely negative impact on small business. It was made clear that the bill will have a very negative impact on the rate of inflation, pushing it higher than the government predicts. I say that because we know that the two underlying assumptions of the government's forecasting model that workers will not try to catch up on the added cost of the GST, and that manufacturers will pass along the savings from the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax to the consumer—

Senator Lefebvre: Would the honourable Senator Kirby allow a question, please? Before entering the chamber a few moments ago, I was in my office listening to part of your speech which no doubt my colleagues here in the house find as interesting as I do. Do you feel, Senator Kirby, with your experience, including that before you came to the Senate and the vast experience you have had in government that, if there were an opportunity in this place for a free vote at the third reading stage of this bill, some of the senators on the other side of the chamber would no doubt join us in voting against it?

Senator Kirby: I am happy, Senator Lefebvre, that you raised the question because one of the things that has bothered me has been the fact that, because many of us on this side of the chamber changed our opinions as we had the committee hearings and learned about the bill, and because 24 of the 52 members opposite are in fact new to this chamber—

Senator Lefebvre: The GST Senate.

Senator Kirby: More than just the British eight. There is a considerable number of senators who were not part of any of the GST debate and did not hear the witnesses; who did not have the opportunity, in fairness to them, to be educated in the way in which some of us were as we travelled across the country. I would share your view that, in a free vote as opposed to a partisan vote, I think we would inevitably find a number of members opposite who, on the basis of their mail and phone calls and, frankly, from what they learn from the very good speeches we have given on this side of the chamber in our attempt to educate them, there would be some reasonable chance that some of those senators would change their minds.

We know, alas, that one thing the party opposite does not allow is free thinking of any kind. Indeed, it remains to be seen whether the abortion bill is as free a vote as we are told it is supposed to be, but I remain to be convinced that that will occur. However, I share your view that, in fact, if it were a free vote, we would have a result which would be significantly different.

Another reason, as I have said, why we reached the conclusion that this bill ought to be defeated was in fact because of all of the arguments made about the rate of inflation and the importance of keeping it down. We find it difficult to support a piece of legislation which, by its very nature, will have a significant impact on the rate of inflation, not only this year but in subsequent years. It is also a fact that the government did not explore the various alternatives to the GST. However, more important than anything else, the reason people like myself came to the conclusion that we ought to vote against this bill stems from the fact—if I go back to the remarks I made some time ago—that this bill is essentially unfair to lower-income Canadians and to the poor and lower-income regions of the country.

It is a fact that lower-income Canadians spend a greater percentage of their income on consumption and are therefore obliged to pay a greater percentage of their income on sales taxes. Credits to these individuals are not indexed to the rate of inflation so their real value would be eroded to nothing over time. The fact is that this particular consumption tax will be imposed on low-income Canadians it is patently unfair, and is the sort of legislation that one expects from a Conservative Party against which the Liberal Party has fought for years and years. It is precisely on that basis, as much as anything else, that members on this side are opposed to this tax.

When one looks, for example, at the $100 single adult credit, we realize it is not fully obtainable unless one's income exceeds $11,000. The government tries to tell us that this credit is designed to help the working poor. In fact, what it is designed to do, of course, is to deny this credit to those low-income Canadians who most need it.

When we go to the northern part of Canada and talk to people in Whitehorse and people in the Yukon, they tell us that people in that region will have to pay about $400 more in GST than the average family in the rest of Canada. This is a figure, by the way, which is not disputed by the government. It is important to note that that $400 figure has been accepted by the government as a legitimate statement. When we realize that the tax credits proposed by the government do not reflect this discrepancy in the cost of living between one end of the country and the other, between northern and southern Canada, we realize once again we have a piece of legislation which is incredibly unfair and incredibly unprogressive and regressive. It is that kind of legislation that we, as Liberals, have always opposed and will continue to oppose.

I look at the impact which this tax will have on the low-income regions of the country, not merely on low-income individuals but in the Atlantic provinces, and in the Province of Nova Scotia, in particular, and the impact it will have on the fishing industry and on the tourist industry, and I realize that really what is happening here is one more major piece of government economic policy that has been designed—either deliberately or inadvertently, but nevertheless clearly designed—in a way that will have a very negative impact on the region of the country I represent. It seems to me that is another very compelling reason for me, and indeed for all Liberals on our side of this chamber, to oppose this tax.

I said some time ago that everyone who has commented or written on the issue of taxes has said that taxes need to be fair to all. This tax is not fair to regions and to low-income individuals. For a tax to be a good tax it needs to be efficient where efficiency is both an administrative concept and an economic concept. I pointed out in my remarks this morning that this tax completely and utterly fails to meet the test of efficiency both administratively and in broad economic terms.

It is a fact that, in order to be put in place, a tax needs to meet the test of being simple, understandable and easy for Canadians to deal with, but it is very clear that this tax does not do that, and I believe I have illustrated that this morning.

One final point I would make is that lest members opposite—and particularly the 24 new members—think that these views are the views simply of a Liberal, the conclusions I have just reached are conclusions that are supported by people in all walks of life, representing all political parties in all regions of the country. The fact is that the tax does not work economically. It does not tax Canadians equally. It is not practical and it simply does not work. Canadians across this country deserve better and we are going to try to give them better, which is why we decided to defeat this tax and why this party has said that if we are in power following the election, we will get rid of the tax.

We are not alone in this view. The Premiers of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario, none of which are Liberals, are sufficiently opposed to this tax that they are taking the federal government to court. Premier Filmon in Manitoba has expressed some severe reservations about it. Premier Devine, of course, has flipped-flopped on the issue, depending on how much federal money he was promised. Premier Bourassa saw the GST for what it was, a cash-cow, and he jumped on board. Premier McKenna recently expressed doubts about it. Premier Wells and Premier Ghiz have both expressed concerns about it and, of course, we know that the Premier of Nova Scotia was opposed to it, at least until he got appointed to this place. Therefore, it seems to me, and I say this to members opposite, that the views of those of us who are opposed to this tax are not simply the views of partisan Liberals; they are in fact the views of 85 to 90 per cent of Canadians. They are the views of the elites, whether they are leading business organizations, academic organizations, consumers' organizations or poverty organizations; they are the views of the premiers of every single province of this country with the exception of the Province of Quebec; and they are the views of Canadians who have looked at this and said to themselves repeatedly that this tax is an unmitigated disaster. It is exactly for that reason that members on this side of the house came to the conclusion that the committee ought to recommend that the bill be defeated, and it is precisely for that reason that members on this side of the house intend to vote against the bill on third reading.

• (1220)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if I could paraphrase the late great star, Bette Davis, I would say, "Fasten your seatbelts. It's going to be a bumpy ride." I say that from a personal perspective because I know the next while will be a bumpy ride for me because it is my turn to join with each other senator who opposes the GST, Bill C-62, and to try to put together, in one final speech, the reasons for that opposition.

Senator Frith: One, but maybe not necessarily final.

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly, in this particular phase, I have to put together the reasons for my opposition and the concern about how the GST has moved its way through this chamber; and also to express the views of Canadians who have remained consistently strong in their protest over the last year or so.

It may also be a bumpy ride for my friends opposite on the government benches only because I know they have reached the point where they do not want to hear about, speak about or even think about this tax any longer. They want it passed.

Senator Frith: No applause.

Senator Fairbairn: They have shown that through their virtual silence in this long debate; through their acquiesence in procedures that have never been used before in the Canadian Parliament to force this bill ahead; and they have shown that through their votes to defeat the ten amendments which were moved by Liberal senators, Reform Senator Stan Waters and Independent Senator Ed Lawson. Yet, the GST is probably the most widely unpopular piece of legislation ever brought before the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Frith: I thought you were going to say "wildly."

Senator Fairbairn: It is probably the most wildly and widely unpopular piece of legislation ever brought before the Parliament of Canada.

Forget for a moment that well over 75 per cent of Canadians are against this tax. Forget for a moment that millions of Canadians have signed hundreds of thousands of letters and petitions. Forget that thousands of telephone calls have been made to all of the nearly 400 politicians sitting in both the House of Commons and the Senate to protest this tax. Forget for a moment that every social organization in this country from the churches to anti-poverty organizations to native organizations to northerners to the small business community are opposed to this tax. Forget for a moment that witness after witness after witness came before the Senate committee which travelled across this country and in the north during the summer, and came prior to that to the House of Commons committee and said, "Don't bring in this tax." Consider only what will happen if this tax goes through.

As stated in the federal budget last spring, by 1991 to 1993 Canadian consumers will be paying almost $21,935,000,000 more in tax every year with this new 7 per cent tax on consumption. With a population of roughly 26 million, that works out to an average of some $843.65 each. Or some $3,374.60 for a family of four. Some will pay more and some will pay less depending on what percentage of their income is expended on the now taxable goods and services they purchase.

According to the government plan, starting on January 1, 1991, the manufacturers' sales tax will be eliminated and, as a result, Canadian businesses will pay $20,430,000,000 less per year in tax.

The accounting firm of Peat, Marwick, Thorne testified before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which studied the GST, that approximately 75,000 businesses will no longer pay the tax and that that works out to an annual tax saving of $272,400 for each business. We are told those savings will be distributed to all other businesses and consumers in the form of lower prices. Some will, of course, save more and some will save less depending on the size of the business and the products they deal in.

Honourable senators, I recite these figures because I think it is important for us to realize the size of this shift of the tax burden. It is a shift from the corporate sector onto the backs of ordinary Canadian consumers. The sum of $20 billion collected annually by this new tax, as estimated, is about the same as that collected in indirect taxes by all ten provincial governments put together and that, according to Statistics Canada, was some $21.6 billion in 1989. I am sure all senators will agree that this is not an insignificant amount of money.

Let us make no mistake about what the government is attempting to do here. This is a massive change in our tax system, a change which I do not believe the Canadian people deserve to have foisted upon them in this manner.

Throughout this whole debate the people of this country have really been misled by their own government. Someone suggested to me the other day that it makes the Nixon years in the United States seem like a period of open government. Never has the art of deception been used with such dogmatic rightness of purpose than it has been used by this government to try to force this tax on all Canadians.

• (1230)

Honourable senators, in this house we have witnessed some of the harshest moments perhaps in Canadian parliamentary history. Our debates have been rough, but that is nothing new for democratic assemblies, particularly in Britain and the United States, in comparison to which we might be considered timid. The dictionary of parliamentary language offers a great deal of latitude, I suspect, to cover the unexpected and the unintended in the heat of political battle. However, not often does our language or our tactics descend to the purely personal.

I will not belabour this point unduly, as it has been raised at least twice in this chamber by opposition senators. However, I do want to express my own deep regret at words used in accusation by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Murray, against Senator Molgat during angry moments in this house on the night of November 22.

The apology elicited from Senator Murray that night paled in insignificance to the damage he caused in falsely maligning Senator Molgat. Unfortunately, it did not match in any meaningful way the message which was conveyed on television, radio and print throughout this country. Each of us in this chamber is a fair target for political invective, mild or harsh. However, the personal comments of Senator Murray that had no base in fact are now etched in the public mind as a vignette of this debate.

Senator Molgat, who is a respected member of this house, deserves better than that. Senator Murray, who is also a respected member of this house, is certainly capable of a far greater effort to clear the public record than he chose to make. I have made a point of mentioning this today, honourable senators, because those comments maligning Senator Molgat have been mentioned to me by numerous people from the area that I represent, and elsewhere, as a value judgment against him. It is very sad that a special effort was not made by Senator Murray to extend the apology as widely through the same media that reported the charge.

In a sense, this is part and parcel of what has been happening during this debate, which has ranged over the past many weeks since September 25, 1990, when we returned from the summer break. What has happened to this place is perhaps that this Senate is no longer viewed as a truly democratic institution. Many people say—and perhaps all senators will have had this argument over the years—that it never was a democratic institution, because we do not come here as elected members, representing precise constituencies, with the exception of the senators who are here from Quebec. We come here because the Prime Minister of the day appoints us. How we get here is one thing. There is considerable debate about that, as well there should be. I think—and many senators think—that we should be elected and, thus, directly accountable for the use of our extensive powers. However, that is for another debate.

The fact is that we are placed in this chamber to do a job, and a major part of that job is to review legislation. Our job is to read it, perhaps amend it, and even reject it based on whether or not we think it is a good law or a bad law. We are supposed to listen also to what Canadians think. That is our obligation and responsibility as senators. We do that, normally, under the rules of the Senate. However, in the last two months the rule book has been torn up and, figuratively speaking, thrown out the window.

I recall—and I believe all senators will recall—the events of October 4, 1990. Perhaps it would be useful to think back on those moments and the effect that they have had, not just on the debate on Bill C-62, but perhaps, in the longer term, on the whole way that this house will operate in the future.

Senators will recall that at that time senators were out of the chamber for a period of time, with the bells ringing as a result of a motion that had been moved by Senator Frith. Then, late in the afternoon, the Speaker of the Senate, Senator Charbonneau, wrote a letter to Senator Murray, Senator MacEachen, Senator Doody and Senator Frith. Senator MacEachen was out of the country at the time. Carbon copies of the letter were sent to Senator Phillips, Senator Petten, Senator Molson, Senator Lang, Senator Lawson, Senator Pitfield, Senator Everett and Senator Waters. This correspondence was not conveyed to any other individual senators, to my knowledge, either on the government side or the opposition side.

Senator Charbonneau indicated to the people to whom he wrote:

> In my opinion, in light of the failure of the mechanisms established by political parties within the Senate to assemble senators for a division within a reasonable time, I will be stopping the division bell and will proceed to put the question now before the Senate at 5:30 p.m. this day.

Senator Charbonneau went on to say that he had taken this decision, after much reflection, to protect the rights of individual senators to perform their duties.

Honourable senators, I can recall that Senator Frith received that letter at approximately 5:05 p.m. and, after very swift and necessary consultations, was in the process of responding to it in writing. He realized that there would not be enough time to send it by messenger, so it was his intention to deliver it directly to the Speaker in this house. He was in the process of signing the letter and coming down here to the chamber just before 5:25 p.m. when we heard the order that the doors be locked. When we got downstairs, they were locked. The vote had been taken. As we came in, the order paper was being raced through, almost to the point of reaching the item on the GST.

Honourable senators, we have gone through a long and angry discussion about the events of that day. I will not dwell on them at any great length. They clearly provoked an outburst from this side, many of whom had not even received the word until well after the vote was taken. Events took place that I think it is fair to say none of us are proud of. In fact, all of us were sincerely distressed that those events ever had to take place. However, they were in response to a severely and sincerely distressing occasion, the likes of which had never happened in Canada before in either house or, as far as we know, anywhere, particularly in our Commonwealth or in the United States, namely, where a vote was taken in which only one side of the chamber participated.

The atmosphere that prevailed following that occasion has been a difficult one in this chamber. I would venture to say that it is only because of a fairly deep-rooted pattern of what could be called collegiality that we managed as well as we have. Another part of it is cooperation, which takes place normally every day between the leadership in this place and the senators in this place. Only because of that were we able to work out the provisional rules under which we are now operating.

However, it is very difficult, as all senators know, to get the message, good or bad, out of the Senate concerning what is happening here. Sometimes that is very sad, because there are often fine debates in this chamber. There are outstanding discussions and reports out of our committee system, but we have a great deal of difficulty getting messages to the Canadian public through the media from this chamber. In this case it has slowly been getting out that something rather extraordinary happened here during the course of this debate. I would quote from Jeffery Rose, the head of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, who said:

> Our institutions are set up for people who can exercise power with self-control. We've had 125 years of cautious progress out of respect for the public.
> What we're seeing now is the collapse of our institutions because a government failed to exercise that self-control and that respect for the public.

Mr. Rose referred to the Prime Minister as:

> . . . a radical reformer who is confronting our national institutions to the breaking point. The man is not a democrat. He deserves to be judged by history as a very, very destructive force in democracy.

One of the questions that arose from the events of October 4 in the minds of Canadians, who, after all, are the ones who are most deeply concerned as individuals about the GST, is: If a government does not respect the rules as they apply in this country's Parliament, how can it expect the citizens of this nation to respect either this Parliament or the laws made by it? If the people do not respect their own Parliament and the laws that it makes, they are unlikely to respect or accept a bill that they find as abhorrent as Bill C-62.

If Bill C-62 passes, I guess we will see whether, by its actions taken here and elsewhere in the House of Commons, the government is really passively giving permission, by its own actions, for forms of civil disobedience never before seen in this country.

Senator Kirby quite properly stated that many of us went into the committee hearings this summer with fairly open minds—at least with an ambivalent mind of where or how far one wanted to take opposition to this bill. I was not on the committee travelling across the country, but I did attend the hearings that took place in Edmonton, which I am told by people who did travel across the country was probably—which ever way one looks at it—either the high point or the low point of the visits of the committee, given the exchanges of animosity that took place between the witnesses, in particular with senators from the government side. Perhaps most startling was the lively way in which there was audience participation both inside the meeting room and outside in the hall at that meeting.

The thing that struck me, not having been inured to these events by travelling across the country, was the number of witnesses who themselves brought up the question of civil disobedience in terms of dealing with the GST if it were passed. Perhaps through naivete it had not really crossed my mind at that point in time that feelings were running that strongly among what is I think in comparative terms, a population very responsible compared with others. At that time we heard references to the State of California and the type of public protests that were prompted many years ago, back in the 1970s, on the question of taxation under Proposition 13 in that state. Taxpayers of that state rose up. Indeed, they had their way.

I suppose all of us will have memories of this debate and the presentations made before the committee. One memory I have in particular has to do with two elderly women who sat in rapt attention for two days and who were on the list to appear at the very end of the hearings during the walk-on session. The walk-on session is something which I think the committee very rightly instituted, something which enabled individuals who were not attached to official groups to come forward and to speak for five minutes to offer their views and concerns. The two women about whom I speak came up individually and spoke as seniors on behalf of their particular seniors' group. This took place in the City of Edmonton. At the end of her remarks one of the women looked at all the senators—and Senator Hastings will remember this in particular—and she said quite bluntly, "I am not going to pay this tax. What are you senators going to do about it?" This was in a public forum. The media were present and the venue was perhaps somewhat intimidating. But that is what she said.

I spoke to these two ladies afterward to commend them for their courage and for their interest in sitting through two long days of hearings which were very difficult and then to come forward on their own to make a presentation. They told me that they had been talking about the tax for quite a while in their groups and that they were very concerned. They told me that in whatever way they could they were not going to pay this tax. However, one lady said, "We had not decided when we came here whether or not we were prepared to go to jail". She told me that she and her friend had talked it over the night before and had decided they were prepared to go to jail. That is the story of only two very nice senior citizens in this country. However, it is indicative of the extremes to which this tax has prompted Canadians to go.

We understand well in this chamber the feeling of the extremes because, as I said earlier, we have gone to some pretty heavy extremes on our own, particularly on October 4 when there was that one-sided vote and the lock-out. Before I leave that subject I wish to read again into the record some comments made by the former Commons Speaker, Jeanne Sauvé. These comments were made at a difficult time in proceedings in that chamber back in 1982 when there was a bell-ringing episode of not a few hours but of two weeks. This was an episode over the energy legislation which the Conservative opposition argued should be split. It was an omnibus bill. I remember that the government eventually responded and divided the bill into several parts. I remember the bell ringing in particular because the Speaker of the House of Commons after the first few days allowed that there would be a single symbolic type of bell which would ring while all the others would be silenced. That single bell rang for two weeks. It was located right outside my office door when I worked with Mr. Trudeau. Thus, I have a very strong affinity with the difficulties of operating under such conditions.

There was a lot of pressure on Madame Sauvé to do something. There was nothing in the rules that was of any help to her. Yet, a lot of people said, "Do something. Cut off those bells". At the end of the episode at the House of Commons she told the house why she had refused to cut off the bells. She said:

> What would have been the consequences of an arbitrary decision that did not derive from any of the rules approved by this House nor from a precedent with any relevance to the present situation? It would have meant breaking with an age-old practice that has proved its worth. How can the Speaker make sure that all members available to take part in the division are in the House? Is it the responsibility of the Chair or the Whips? What would prevent the Speaker from setting the time of the division in other circumstances? The Chair would have set a precedent that might create even greater confusion in the case of a minority government. In any event, such action on my part would have been open to allegations of partiality. Clearly, the Speaker must at all times be impartial.

Those were wise words made after an extended period of pressure, probably unlike any pressure that any Speaker has suffered here in this place or in that place in the last several decades.

• (1300)

We compare her attitude with that of Senator Charbonneau on October 4. As senators will know, some senators were sufficiently concerned about the actions of Senator Charbonneau on that night and the almost helpless position that would put members of this chamber in if it were used as a precedent again now or in the future with other governments, with other senators—it is a feeling of helplessness because there is no recourse to a vote conducted by only government members of the chamber—that they decided a course of action. As this very difficult debate commenced and continued through its next phase, which is in effect the third phase we are in now, it was felt by some senators that perhaps others who value and respect the rules and traditions of Parliament should be invited to watch what has been taking place and will take place in the Canadian Senate.

Senator Molgat, Senator Buckwold, Senator John Stewart, Senator Stan Waters and Senator Ed Lawson sent a letter to the head of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of Canada, Mr. Girven Fretz, Member of Parliament, House of Commons. In the letter and factum attached, the senators set out the position which had occurred in this chamber. I do not want to read the whole letter or factum, but I will read part of it. It is the part that concerns the actions of the Speaker and I quote from page 5 of the factum attached to the letter to Mr. Girven Fretz:

> The position of the Speaker of the Senate is not comparable to that of the Speaker of the House of Commons; rather, the Speaker's position is similar to, but not the same as, that of the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords. Under the Constitution Act, 1867, s. 34, the Speaker of the Senate is a government appointee. He (she) is allowed to take a partisan position in debate, and may vote to support a party position; consequently, the Speaker never has been vested with discretionary power by the Senate.
> The rules of the Senate do not confer on the Speaker the right to decide whether or not a prima facie case has been made when a breach of privilege has been alleged. Nevertheless, Speaker Guy Charbonneau has arrogated this right to himself. This he did on October 4, 1990.
> The rules of the Senate provide that divisions are not to take place until the Government Whip and the Opposition Whip enter the Chamber and indicate that they are ready for the vote. At five o'clock on October 4, 1990, Speaker Guy Charbonneau wrote to four senators (the Leader of the Government, the Deputy Leader of the Government, the Leader of the Opposition, and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition), with copies to the six independent senators, stating that he intended to conduct the pending division, for which the Whips were preparing, at 5:30 p.m. that day. By writing his letter he recognized that he was acting contrary to the rules and practices of the Senate. He failed to notify the vast majority of the senators by letter. At 5:25 p.m. he ordered that the doors of the Chamber be locked and proceeded to conduct the division although no member of the Opposition was present.

This appears in Senate Hansard of October 4, 1990, at page 2343. Later it was revealed by Senator Michael Pitfield, an independent, that Government supporters had been told in advance what Speaker Charbonneau intended to do.

That is contained in Senate Hansard of October 4, 1990, at page 2343, and October 9, at pages 2426-7.

> Immediately following this vote, 30 Liberal senators, over a period of eight hours, raised successive questions of privilege concerning the propriety of the Speaker's action. Allegations of collusion between the Speaker and the government were made, and were not denied by either the Speaker or the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Not a single government supporter rose during this debate on the question of privilege to defend the actions of the Speaker. Upon the conclusion of the debate the Speaker rose, not to address the question of privilege and explain or defend his unprecedented action, but to call the Orders of the Day. The Speaker's conduct, and his refusal to explain his actions, precipitated an unprecedented response by the members of the Opposition, which had the effect of suspending the consideration of all business, though the Senate continued to sit.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

And as I said earlier, this unprecedented response and the circumstances which led to it, I am sure, are regretted by all.

The other point I would like to touch on very briefly is that in spite of the shock that went through all of us, both because of the Speaker's action and the explosion it generated, all of us I think were hoping there would not be an occasion where such an overt action would prompt any similar kind of explosion. However, on November 22 there was again an explosion and, in this case, it was the situation when the Liberal senators had concluded the debate and the vote on the last of eight amendments that they were able to move as a result of the provisional rules that had been hammered out through the good offices of Senator MacEachen, Senator Murray, Senator Frith, Senator Roblin and Senator John Stewart.

At the end of the final amendment, clearly, the issue of the rights of independent senators to move amendments was at issue. This had been noted even as the provisional rules were agreed to weeks before. The question was raised immediately, "What about the independents?" At that time Senator Murray had indicated, yes, they would have the right to proceed. He had noted that it was not possible for either him or Senator MacEachen to impose their negotiated or provisional rules on people who were not part of their caucuses.

At any rate, it would have appeared that Senator Murray's resolve had weakened. On the evening of November 22, after Senator Waters had indicated for two days he would be on his feet to immediately seek the floor to move an amendment, and Senator Lawson indicated the same—Senator Murray, as anticipated, was up on his feet although not as quickly—

Hon. Colin Kenny: Would you allow a question? Did you say that immediately following the vote, 30 Liberals, over a period of eight hours, raised successive questions of privilege concerning the propriety of the Speaker's action; that allegations of collusion between the Speaker and the government were made and were not denied by either the Speaker or by the Leader of the Government in the Senate; that not a single government supporter rose during this debate on the question of privilege to defend the actions of the Speaker; and that at the conclusion of the debate the Speaker rose not to address the question of privilege and not to explain or defend his actions but to call the Orders of the Day? Can you explain why no one on the other side got up and tried to defend him? Can you explain why he did not get up and defend himself? Why were we the only people who spoke?

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you for the question which flows directly from the material I was reading earlier. On looking back on that occasion, I suppose the essence of the matter is that this whole action on the part of the Speaker had been one in which the government, the Leader of the Government and the Prime Minister, were very much involved and that, therefore, in their minds there was no reason to defend the action they took to hold a vote in those circumstances. I presume that the state of mind was that there was no need to explain or defend an action that was intended to get on with passage of this bill. It is hard for me to answer that question because I obviously cannot get into the minds of the people opposite.

Senator Kenny: My impression was that they were embarrassed and that they felt that if they said anything they would simply prolong the debate and that they could not defend what they were doing. You cannot defend the indefensible. It is best just to keep your head down and take as much of the heat as you can because every time you stand up you are drawing attention to the fact that you have done something wrong and improper. I think that explains the silence that we are witnessing today. They do not have anything to say because they hoped to just sit us out. How do you feel about that, Senator Fairbairn?

Senator Fairbairn: I think that is evident. I suppose that back in the balmy days of October 4 there was an expectation that this debate would fizzle out in a short period of time, particularly if some very dramatic and decisive action were taken which, in effect, turned out to be an interference with the Rules of the Senate as they had existed for a very long time. Whatever the case, obviously that did not occur and here we are today still debating and arguing this bill in the third reading process.

As you know, a very similar occurrence took place on November 22. If anything, I think it was more restrained, but another fundamental rule of the Senate, which had been clearly understood for many years, Rule 26, all of a sudden became unclear and had to be reinterpreted against a new background.

As a result of that the efforts on behalf of Senator Molgat to have the Speaker recognize Senator Waters and his right to move a motion on behalf of himself as a representative of the Reform Party were unsuccessful. Senator Molgat was not recognized but Senator Murray was. Part of the reason given for the recognition of Senator Murray was that the Chair, as a courtesy, always recognizes one of the party leaders before anyone else which, again, is not stated anywhere in the rules. Indeed, in a very tight situation, particularly when independent senators who do not have the support of caucuses or advisers or what have you, are trying to maintain their position as senators equal to any of us, it would seem to me that at that point in time the Speaker should have been even more scrupulous in adhering to the Rules of the Senate, not less.

This discussion, again instead of moving the process ahead, resulted in prolonged discussions and negotiations over a period of almost four days, which eventually did permit Senator Waters and Senator Lawson to move an amendment. However, ironically, I would think in the view of the government who were very anxious to cut off as much as possible any debate on this issue, this, in fact, extended the length of this debate. I must say, happily, it did, in the end, preserve the rights of the independents in this chamber to take an equal part in the proceedings and the debates, but it was a difficult moment for them.

Honourable senators, at the very beginning of my remarks I wanted to talk about the procedures and the difficulties we have had in this place. It has turned this issue, in a sense, from a straight legislative battle over a bill into something much more fundamental. The second part of the issue now becomes the state of our democratic processes in this institution on Parliament Hill as we have known them and as Canadians have known them and had faith in them for a very long time.

I have worked on this Hill in one capacity or another for more than 28 years. This certainly was a serious occurrence. Often, when things are procedural, they become internalized here on the Hill and only the people on the Hill understand them or care about these fights. Everyone else says, "Why don't you get on with things?" The strange aspect about this is that people across the country are beginning to ask questions about what is guiding us and the democratic spirit that is perhaps faltering as a result of actions that have taken place here.

I would now like to turn to the tax in Bill C-62. I do not think anyone has argued that the old manufacturers' sales tax is a good tax. There are certainly many things wrong with it. People have been saying that through many budgets and many of the years that I have been on this Hill. The lobbyists have come here and said, "For God's sake, do something about the manufacturers' sales tax in some way."

However, to say that in order to assist 75,000 businesses we have to immediately put hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of Canadians in greater economic difficulty is nonsense. It is like saying that the only way to cure a headache is to cut off your head. Even the government agrees that Canadians will pay more with the GST than they did before the GST. They know as well as anybody else does that the $20 billion that business saves by not paying the old tax will not all be passed along to consumers in the form of lower prices.

In the 1990 budget, government experts assumed that inflation would go up by only 1.25 per cent and that this increase will happen only in the first year. Most other experts say that it will be much higher. The Senate committee report on the GST summed it up very well. Even though the report became a controversial document, I hope that honourable senators have read it. I went through it in a fairly brisk way in the beginning, but as this debate went on I read it in more detail. It is a very good report.

I would like to read the part of the report that deals with the GST. The first part of that section is about the minimum estimate.

> The government estimates that introduction of the GST would result in a one-time increase in the Consumer Price Index (CPI) of about 1.25%. While several economic "think-tanks" concur with this estimate, it has been criticized on at least two grounds. First, the Government's 1.25% estimate assumes that the savings from removing the current Federal Sales Tax would be fully passed along to consumers. Many groups believe that this assumption is unrealistic and fails to take into account a number of special circumstances including inadequate inventory rebates and regulated or uncompetitive markets.
> Second, the Government assumes that organized labour is either naive or is powerless to address a reduction in the purchasing power of its wages. According to the information received by the Committee, members of organized labour are well aware that the GST would reduce their real income and are extremely skeptical about the Government's price estimate. This is already being reflected in new labour contracts that contain GST protection in the form of cost of living allowance clauses and fixed wage increases. To the extent that labour is successful in obtaining further wage hikes because of the GST, this will feed into firms' cost structures and result in higher prices. In the real world, expectations are crucial but there is no indication that the Government has built a wage response into its price impact estimate.
> A realistic appraisal came from the Chief Economist of the Conference Board of Canada, Mr. J.G. Frank who told the Committee regarding the Board's own price impact estimate of 1.4% and the Government's 1.25% forecast, "I would say to you, again candidly, that is a lower bound estimate. That is the minimum you can expect, and it goes up from there based on how those two assumptions are at odds with reality."

Hon. Joan Neiman: Senator Fairbairn, just to bolster what you are saying, a neighbour of mine had some work done by Ontario Hydro a week or two ago. The man who was there happened to be a union steward who had just completed negotiating next years's contract.

He mentioned that the 7 per cent GST is built into their contract. There is also another 6 per cent for the inflationary cost to themselves over the year, plus 1 per cent for negotiating the contract. I did not realize they did that, but he said that all the union people to whom he was talking at that time in Ontario were doing exactly the same thing. Are you aware of that happening across Canada?

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Neiman. That is a vivid way of illustrating that the 1.25 per cent assumption was really blown out of the water the moment it was made. I have read a number of briefs that came from labour organizations in every part of this country, covering hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers. Obviously, it goes back to the whole idea of fairness. In their mind, fairness is levying a tax on the assumption that it will bring down prices, which is a perilous assumption. The other assumption is that the working men and women of this country will not either ask for wages or expect those wages to be negotiated by their unions.

Already there are a number of major contracts in Canada now under negotiation. Very definitely they have built into them a GST component. In effect either way the 1.25 per cent rate, as the chief economist of the Conference Board of Canada said, was certainly a lower bound estimate. Certainly in the last several months many other economic voices in Canada have indicated that a more realistic increase in the inflation rate, taking all these other things into consideration, would be more like 2.5 per cent. In fact, in preparing for this speech I have even read—and I will get this at some point—that other groups have suggested that it could go as high as 3 per cent.

Senator Neiman: Can we expect the settlement made by Ontario Hydro to be passed along quite shortly to the public in the form of higher rates?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. As Mr. Frank concluded, these assumptions—that is, the full pass-through of FST savings and no wage price inflationary spiral—are key to the government's estimates of the price impact of the GST. As you have so clearly pointed out, that falls short of taking into consideration the reality of other real forces in the economy.

That was found under the heading of "Price Effects of the GST." Again, honourable senators, I am quoting from the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The next section deals with removing the federal sales tax. It states:

> In estimating the impact of the GST on the overall price level, it is important to assess how the price of individual goods and services are likely to react. The application of the GST will affect relative prices by raising significantly the price of services and other items that currently bear no direct federal sales tax. The brief received from Informetrica Limited indicated that the GST would raise the price—> —of recreational services by 8.0%, restaurant, hotel and tavern services by 7.4%, natural gas by 7.3%, electricity by 6.8%, women's and children's clothing by 5.9%, footwear by 4.8% and so on.

This relates to part of your point as well, Senator Neiman. It goes on to state:

> In order to achieve a small overall price increase from introducing the GST, the prices of other goods currently subject to Federal Sales Tax must fall when that tax is removed. It has been suggested that the price of automobiles, furniture and household durables that now contain the Federal Sales Tax will decline once this tax is removed. However, for this to happen, manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers will have to lower their prices to reflect the elimination of this tax. Much of the debate about the price impact of the GST centres on whether firms will actually pass on to consumers the savings from the sales tax reduction or whether they will simply increase their price markups.

The Government's assumption that 100% of the saving from eliminating the current Federal Sales Tax will be passed through to the consumer does not depend on the good graces of business, rather, it is believed that competition will force firms to pass on the cost savings. In competitive markets—

And that should be in black letters here.

—firms that attempt to use such an opportunity to increase their profit margins are likely to be undercut in price by their competitors. Michael McCracken suggested to the Committee that there is a significant degree of competition in Canada which has been enhanced recently by the Free Trade Agreement and the appreciation of the Canadian dollar.

However, Mr. McCracken and others also expressed concern that the regulated sectors of the economy including the telephone company, the electric power utilities, the transportation sector and the food sector regulated by marketing boards might not make the appropriate price adjustments immediately. As Mr. McCracken cautioned, ". . . the CRTC, the National Transportation Agency and the various marketing boards—need to be sensitized to this situation. They need to ensure that, on January 1, someone has done the necessary calculations and provided the information necessary to make the appropriate price adjustments. If they do not do it or if they do it six months after the fact, that could create a problem."

Professors Jack Mintz and Thomas Wilson expressed doubts about the extent and speed of the price reductions from removing the current sales tax. In their brief to the Committee they state, "Finance Canada has estimated that the GST will raise prices by about 1.25 percentage points, assuming that competition will force Canadian business to pass on the savings arising from the elimination of the FST. However, no allowance has been made for possible differential short-run impacts of sales tax reform on prices in industries which are not highly competitive or which are subject to regulation."

This quote comes from a paper called, "Alternatives to the Goods and Services Tax", which was released in August of this year. The report further states:

Other witnesses were skeptical of business passing on the savings from removing the current Federal Sales Tax. The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) has developed its own estimates of the price impact of the GST based on different assumptions about the degree of pass-through of savings. According to CUPE estimates, if 50% of the FST saving is passed on, the price impact of the GST would be about 2.8% while a 30% pass-through rate would raise prices about 3.4%. CUPE believes that even if organized labour does not attempt to protect their real wages through increased wage demands, "the cost of living impact of the GST can be expected to be in the neighbourhood of three percentage points—far in excess of Mr. Wilson's estimate of 1.25 per cent."

That is far in excess of Mr. Wilson's estimate of 1.25 per cent.

Not only labour groups have expressed scepticism about the reduction in certain prices as the FST is removed. Representatives of the Canadian Home Builders' Association told the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations that they expected about two-thirds of the savings from the MST to be passed through to the consumer. While a number of companies provided that Committee with verbal assurances that they would pass along the savings, some firms indicated their intention to maintain the same absolute dollar markup on merchandise. Maintenance of the same dollar markup on a lower cost implies an increase in the percentage markup. In their report on the GST, the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee states, "We believe that for the consumer to benefit fully from the elimination of the FST, business should not increase their percentage markups after the GST has been implemented, given that operating costs have been reduced.

That quote is from the report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations entitled Living with the GST. It is dated June 1990.

An important consideration in whether firms are able promptly to pass along any savings from the elimination of the current Federal Sales Tax is that the sales tax embedded in inventories be removed. The Government has designed a rebate scheme to compensate firms for Federal Sales Tax paid on inventory purchased prior to the introduction of the GST on 1 January 1991.

The rebate percentages are based on estimates by the Government of the average amount of tax paid by business on various categories of goods. The general rebate of 8.1% covers most types of inventories with the following rebates for particular goods: 11.1% for motor vehicles; 5.6% for building materials; 2.8% for mobile homes and modular building units; 2.5% for small grocery and convenience stores; 1.4% for propane; and a per litre amount for gas alone and diesel fuel to be made public in December.

As the Government has designed these percentages to reflect the average sales tax component in inventories, the rebate provided to some firms will obviously exceed the amount which they actually paid while the compensation to other firms will be less than the tax paid. In general, the tax content in a merchant's inventory is likely to vary according to the trade level and the number of stages in the production chain.

For instance, the sales tax in the inventory of a wholesaler that purchases directly from the manufacturer could amount to 11.9%. The proportion of a retailer's inventory > accounted for by Federal Sales Tax would tend to be lower reflecting other price markups at the wholesale level. This will also tend to vary according to the price markup on a particular product and the number of trade levels between the manufacturer and the retailer. In addition, inventories held at great distance from the point of importation or manufacture will have a relatively low FST content because transportation costs to the retail market are not directly subject to FST.

> Complicating matters still further is the fact that some products are taxed at the wholesale level rather than at the manufacturer's level. While the Government has decided to increase to 11.1% the rebate provided to automobile dealers, this has not been extended to other industries, such as cosmetics, which are also taxed at the wholesale level. The Committee also heard from the Canadian Importers Association, autoparts dealers, building supplies dealers, pleasure craft dealers and a furniture retailer that the 8.1% rebate would fail to fully compensate for the tax content of their inventories.
> Only if firms receive a full rebate for the tax paid on their inventory, will they be in a position on January 1, 1991 to reduce their prices to completely reflect the removal of the Federal Sales Tax. Where the rebate is inadequate to compensate firms for the tax content in their existing inventories, they can hardly be expected to reduce their prices fully until the old inventory is sold. Thus, even where firms intend to pass along any savings it may be some time until the expected price reductions on certain goods materialize.
> At a cost of $19 million, the Government has established a GST Consumer Information Office (CIO) within the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to monitor the implementation of the GST. Primarily, the CIO's purpose is to provide public information on price increases and decreases as the GST is introduced and the current Federal Sales Tax is removed. However—

Senator Davey: Senator Fairbairn, do you have any additional information on that Consumer Information Office? The other day in Question Period I asked Senator Murray if he could give me some information on who were chosen, and how and what they were being paid. I still have not received that information from him. To be fair, it has only been about a week since I asked the question. However, do you have any additional information as to what is the purpose of this office and when it was started? In your opinion, is it very useful?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not have additional information. I suppose it is too early to say whether it is useful or not. Your question to Senator Murray was an interesting one. Perhaps if Senator Murray has received an answer to the question he would want to transmit that answer. I would certainly be more than pleased to include it in my remarks this afternoon.

Senator Davey: What is the date to which you are referring?

Senator Fairbairn: What I am reading from here is the report of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The report came out on September 25. The Consumer Information Office was established prior to that time.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Davey: My question to Senator Murray was prompted by the fact that they appointed ten or twelve, or maybe even fifteen, new members to the board about a week or ten days ago.

Senator Fairbairn: It would be interesting to know what they do and to get a better idea of exactly who are there and how they operate. As I said, if you have the information, Senator Davey, I would be more than pleased to include it in my remarks, or perhaps you would be able to include it in yours.

The report continues:

> Primarily, the CIO's purpose is to provide public information on price increases and decreases as the GST is introduced and the current Federal Sales Tax is removed. However, the CIO can also investigate consumer complaints about firms' pricing practices and inform the public of any irregularities.
> A body like the CIO, which has no formal powers to roll back prices, is likely to have little influence on the behaviour of prices when the GST is introduced.

And I think that is similar to situations in the past where there have been very worthy people involved in watchdog committees which, because of lack of teeth, as it were, have been unable to give any force to their public moral suasion. And, indeed, that is a sentence that comes up here:

> Any power the CIO might have would stem from its ability to exercise moral suasion with companies and trade associations and to inform the public of irregular pricing practices. Even here, its ability to affect prices is limited. Publication of the names of businesses that are believed to be guilty of pricing abuses would leave the CIO open to the risk of legal action for defamation, according to testimony received by the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee.
> The Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee also heard that in most cases the amount of FST embedded in the price of a product is virtually impossible to determine. Beyond that, the CIO will only be able to monitor a fraction of the huge number of products on the market. Finally, as already indicated, some firms simply will not be in a position to reduce their prices immediately due to inadequate rebates on existing inventories. Monitoring these firms, or attempting to persuade them to lower their prices, would be adding insult to injury.

I will go on to the next section of the committee report—and I am glad to see Senator Buckwold here. It is music to his ears, I am sure, to hear these words again.

Senator Buckwold: An inspiration!

Senator Fairbairn: I am sorry that Senator Neiman is not here at the moment because she expressed in her question a few moments ago some concerns about labour demands, and that is the next section of the report I want to refer to at this point.

> The failure of firms to quickly pass through savings from removing the current FST could cause the initial price increase from the GST to exceed the Government's 1.25% estimate. GST-driven wage increases reached in anticipation of the tax could also affect the size of the initial price hike. Whether this "one time" increase escalates into a wage-price inflationary spiral will depend on the results of subsequent wage negotiations and the extent of provision for cost of living allowances. As indicated, organized labour is sceptical of the Government's price forecasts and expects substantially larger price hikes due to the introduction of the GST. These expectations are crucial because they form the basis of labour's wage demands in upcoming negotiations with management. If labour is convinced that the GST will raise prices by, say 3.0%, it will seek wage increases to offset that amount. The labour groups that the Committee heard from appeared to be taking an aggressive stance toward upcoming wage negotiations, not only as a result of the GST, but also because they perceive that past wage increases have not kept pace with inflation.
> To the extent that unions are successful in negotiating higher wage settlements in anticipation of the introduction of the GST, this will feed into firms' cost structures and affect the realized price change. However, it is important to distinguish between wage settlements that provide a fixed increase in anticipation of the GST and increases in the form of cost-of-living allowance (COLA) clauses that take effect with a lag. The first type of wage increase has an immediate impact on firms' cost structures. COLA clauses, on the other hand, affect wages with a lag since these calculate wage increases based on the previous period's inflation rate. In this way, the initial price effect of the GST could result in higher wages in subsequent periods that feed into further price increases.
> In a forthcoming article in the Canadian Tax Journal.

—and I believe, Senator Buckwold, that this article has been published under "Alternatives to the Goods and Services Tax". It was published following the release of your report. The article itself was presented in advance to the committee:

> Professors Peter Dungan, Jack Mintz and Thomas Wilson of the University of Toronto estimate the impact of the GST on a number of economic variables. Building a wage response into their model, the authors assess that the GST would raise the Consumer Price Index by 1.7% in 1991, —considerably higher than the 1.25 per cent the government has estimated.

> In the August 1989 Goods and Services Technical Paper, the Government acknowledged that increased wage demands could derail its own estimates of the GST's price impact. "The challenge that Canadians face is to realize these benefits as quickly and as smoothly as possible. This can be done if there is no inflationary response to the one time increase in the price level due to the introduction of the GST. Inflationary price and wage behaviour would, on the other hand, threaten sustained economic growth and delay the achievement of the economic benefits that the GST makes possible.
> The Minister of Finance told the Committee that it is not surprising that the labour movement is trying to use the GST as a bargaining tool but that it must recognize what a company can afford to pay. The Minister states, "If a company agrees to a wage settlement that is higher than it can afford to pay, if it accepts the argument that there ought to be a higher wage settlement as a result of introduction of the GST, that would be a mistake on its part, and I think most companies operating in the Canadian environment understand that.". . .
> Notwithstanding the Minister's comments, there is evidence to suggest that labour groups are having some success in incorporating GST protection in their wage contracts. For instance, the Canadian Auto Workers have obtained GST-linked COLA clauses for customer service workers at Air Canada and for workers at Boeing and DeHavilland Aircraft. It also has achieved increased cost of living protection in recent contract negotiations with Ford Motor Company. The Canadian Union of Public Employees is advising its members to go after a 9% wage increase to provide insulation from the GST. Other labour unions are also seeking protection from the GST either through fixed wage increases or by means of COLA clauses.
> A major concern is the reaction of monetary policy to any GST-generated price increase.

• (1400)

The Governor of the Bank of Canada told the committee that a one-time price increase could be accommodated by monetary policy, but that what monetary policy must guard against is the risk that the initial price increase will trigger successive demands for compensating wage and price increases. He said that should an inflation process take hold, it would greatly damage our economic prospects and that, therefore, monetary policy must be prepared to offer strong and early resistance to any such development. These comments by the governor indicate his resolve to take early action to prevent a one-time price effect of the GST from escalating into a wage-price spiral. It is uncertain whether the governor will consider recent wage settlements including cost-of-living protection in labour contracts as indicative of increased inflationary pressures. However, it is clear that if higher wage demands raise the underlying rate of inflation as opposed to a one-time price increase, the governor is prepared to neutralize these with monetary policy. Other price pressures, such as the recent escalation in world oil prices, also threaten the Bank of Canada's zero-inflation target at this time. This report, honourable senators, was written in September, but it says that unfortunately, with the country on the brink of a recession—which we now know is upon us—and the prime interest rate currently at about 12.5 per cent, any attempt to wring inflation out of the system through tighter monetary policy would only heighten the threat to the Canadian economy.

That was the section of the report that I felt was worthwhile reading since it touches on the various aspects of price effects of the GST.

If average non-expert Canadians want to keep track of how they themselves are doing financially with this new tax, they have to take the time to calculate the percentage of the old tax they now pay on every product and service consumed; they have to keep track of how that price changes as a result of the removal of the old tax; they have to calculate the exact amount of the GST paid every month, day and week; they have to calculate the change to see if they are spending more or less under the GST; and, of course, Canadians will pay more, a lot more. That is the primary reason that they are signing petitions, writing letters and telling us to stop the tax.

Consider what the government is asking Canadians to accept. This is not an annoying little increase in the tax on cigarettes and alcohol. This is not an annoying little increase in the tax on gasoline or a special tax on a single commodity or on a single service. This, honourable senators, is a tax on everything and it will rain down on the heads of every consumer literally dozens of times a day.

On a lighter note, I recently came across a document in my "in" basket which outlines how Canadians will all be forced to live under a new tax. It is a bit on the lighthearted side but it, nonetheless, captures, perhaps very realistically, how this tax will affect individuals. It is called, "A day in your life under the GST." It begins with a quote from George Orwell—"Nineteen Eighty-Four—it was a bright, cold day in April and the clocks were striking 13." It then says that in the new world of the GST big brother won't be just watching you, he is going to have his hand in your pocket every time you turn around. A day in your life under the new GST will look something like this: You wake up, you shut off the new alarm clock for which you have just paid 7 per cent more. You brush your teeth. You paid 7 per cent more for the brush and for the toothpaste. You take a shower, you paid 7 per cent more for the soap, for the shampoo, for the towel and everything else in the bathroom. You dress the children for school in new shirts, pants, socks, coats, hats and shoes you just paid 7 per cent more for. You hand them their school books and you paid 7 per cent more for the books too.

If you can still afford it, you drive to work. You have a flat tire on the way. It costs you 7 per cent more to repair it. You park the car in the lot, 7 per cent more for parking. Take a coffee break, 7 per cent more for the coffee and 7 per cent more, if you can afford the snack.

In keeping with trying to build up your economic situation, you buy a lottery ticket for the Saturday draw, 7 per cent more. You collect money for a going away gift for one of your co-workers, 7 per cent more. Have lunch, pick up a sandwich, 7 per cent. A bowl of soup, 7 per cent, a cup of tea, 7 per cent, dessert if you can indulge in it, 7 per cent and you go back to work and try not to think of how ripped off you feel.

You might slip out for a haircut, and it might not make that much of a difference on Parliament Hill, but in some of the other establishments you will pay a hefty 7 per cent more.

Senator Buckwold: A clip joint.

Senator Fairbairn: On the way home you stop for gas, you pay 7 per cent more. I should tell you, Senator Buckwold, that my husband, Mike Gillan, was noting to me on the weekend that he had just filled the tank of our car and that the week before it cost $25 to fill that tank and on the weekend it cost $33. On top of that the projected 7 per cent is a real blow. This article goes on to say that if you stop at the hardware store on the way home for a can of paint to paint the rec room, you will pay 7 per cent more and 7 per cent more for the paint brush and the screwdriver.

Then, looking at the children, you pick up, perhaps, a hockey stick, a football glove, a Barbie doll, 7 per cent more.

Dog food and cat food will cost 7 per cent more.

If you have been in the habit of giving them treats, I suppose you would pick up a tin of Snausages and a tin of Pounce and they would cost 7 per cent more. However, those kinds of treats will undoubtedly become a luxury. In fact, maybe owning a dog or a cat will become a luxury.

Senator Buckwold: You will have to pay for the veterinarian services.

Senator Fairbairn: I do not even want to think about the veterinarian services. Having five animals myself, it is bad enough without the 7 per cent.

Senator Simard: Don't start a war.

Senator Fairbairn: On the way home you stop for a take-out pizza or chicken or quick dinner for yourself and the family, 7 per cent more. If you take your youngest child to an early show—one of the current favourites is Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles or Fantasia—it will cost you 7 per cent more. Popcorn and snacks will cost 7 per cent more. If you take one of your children to gym class it will cost 7 per cent more; another child to a computer course, it will cost 7 per cent more.

• (1410)

Then, when you return home, put the children to bed and sit down and write your cheques for the utility bills, the gas bill will cost 7 per cent more, the oil bill will cost 7 per cent more, and the electricity bill will cost 7 per cent more. The cheque to the plumber who fixed the leak in the bathroom sink will cost 7 per cent more. Postage stamps for the envelopes that you are mailing the cheques in will cost 7 per cent more.

You sit back in your new chair, which was 7 per cent more, to look at your television set, another 7 per cent. A better idea might be to read one of those books that cost 7 per cent more. If all of this is too much for you and you have some kind of a seizure and have the misfortune to die, that will cost you 7 per cent more because this tax even applies to funerals.

The only way you can avoid paying the GST is rather depressing. You can stop eating anything that is not defined as a basic grocery. You cut back on new purchases of clothes or shoes; you can unplug your phone, television, fridge, lights, furnace, and, whatever else, do not die. When you are sitting there in the dark you might offer up a silent prayer, to this point tax free, that the Senate will defeat this outrageous new tax nightmare.

One could write a similar kind of tale as people face the Christmas season. Charles Dickens' ghost of Christmas-yet-to-come could not have invented a gloomier picture than what is being inflicted upon us with the prospect of this tax.

Senator Buckwold: Scrooge Wilson.

Senator Fairbairn: Should the tax go through, it will be in full flight by next Christmas, at which time you will be paying 7 per cent dozens of times a day as you go out to prepare for the Christmas season. It will apply to everything. All those special things that we buy for our homes at Christmas will cost 7 per cent more.

Hon. Peter Stollery: May I ask a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Stollery: I suppose there will be a budget at some point in this coming year, would you not say so, Senator Buckwold?

Senator Buckwold: That is the history, yes.

Senator Stollery: We have a deficit that seems to be increasing because of the interest rates. People are talking about a deficit well over the $30 billion deficit we have been running continually for some time. The Ottawa Citizen has a very interesting article in today's paper regarding the increasing deficit. It says:

> As the economy plunges deeper into recession, an economic think-tank warned Monday the federal deficit will soar by $8 billion next year to more than $35 billion.
> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney hinted he may consider an NDP proposal to establish an all-party committee to look for solutions to Canada's economic woes.
> "We are in difficult economic times and obviously any good, concrete proposals will be looked at," Mulroney told the Commons.
> But Finance Minister Michael Wilson again ruled out any quick drop in interest rates, saying "we've had increasing inflationary pressures."

I am not making these predictions. This is an article by Eric Beauchesne.

Senator Fairbairn: Are the consultants Ernst & Young?

Senator Stollery: It does not say, but it predicted the deficit will rise by almost $8 billion next year to $35.5 billion, the unemployment rate, now at 8.8 per cent, will climb to 9.7 per cent, while the GST and high oil prices will push the inflation rate up to seven per cent.

You said that next Christmas the cost of everything will be 7 per cent more, compounded of course by whatever your provincial tax may be. Have you given some thought to the fact that the government may have to increase the GST, if, in fact, it is passed and goes into effect? Those are big ifs, of course.

Prime Minister Mulroney said:

> We are in difficult economic times and obviously any good concrete proposals will be looked at.

Do you think that one of the proposals that the Prime Minister would be inclined to look at—and I certainly would if I were the Prime Minister, having established the goods and services tax—would be the 7 per cent or do you think that in the first budget, having to deal with a possible $35 billion deficit, one of the first places the government will look in order to increase their revenue will be at the 7 per cent?

The government claims that the tax at the moment is revenue neutral. It came out at 9 per cent, so they have lost 2 per cent. Do you think the first thing they would want to consider is getting rid of a revenue-neutral tax and in fact collecting money for the deficit? Do you have any thoughts on the realistic chances that the GST will be only 7 per cent a year from now, if it is actually passed and goes into operation?

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you for the question, Senator Stollery. Let me start by expressing the hope that it will not be passed and in effect.

I suppose one would be forgiven for feeling that in the back of the government's economic closet there is a plan already set out for 9 per cent tax, because that is what it was initially supposed to be. It was pulled back to 7 per cent, perhaps, to make it more politically palatable.

As the recession takes hold, in a few months things will be infinitely worse than they are now. For many months leading up to the recessionary statistics that we have seen recently, many economists have been saying that this is the wrong time for this tax. The history of the value-added tax in many countries—and I will get to that later in my speech—has been to increase it rapidly in some cases; in some cases after waiting for one or two years. If I am not mistaken, I think Japan is still at 3 per cent-and it went through hell bringing in its GST. I think it lost a couple of prime ministers along the way.

Senator Buckwold: It is at 3 per cent.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. At the moment it has not been raised.

Senator Stollery: Of course in England it is 15 per cent, isn't it?

Senator Buckwold: Tell him about the increase in New Zealand in four years.

Senator Simard: What does that prove?

Senator Buckwold: It proves that you are awake.

Senator Fairbairn: At any rate, the possibility is certainly there. But whether it is an increase in the GST or other mechanisms the government has, certainly when we face next Christmas we will be under more stringent conditions one way or another, whether it is through the GST or something else.

Even if the government is totally wedded to this particular form of the tax, there is a certain logic at this point in time in withholding it for a period of many months until the economy and the people of Canada are in a better situation to receive it.

Senator Stollery: Would you not say that by that same logic the government would be wise not to go ahead with it at this point? But if they do go ahead with it—that is, if they do as they appear to be determined to do—by following the same experience of every other country that has imposed this tax, do you not think that this is the first place that the Finance Minister will look in his next budget to raise some money? Do you not think that this will not likely be a 7 per cent tax by next Christmas, but the very minimum that we can look forward to is the 9 per cent tax that they started off with?

Senator Fairbairn: You would make an excellent lawyer, Senator Stollery, in leading witnesses. I am not prepared to say that it is likely, but it would not surprise me to see it raised. I suspect that there could be a brand new raise in the tax by a brand new minister.

Senator Stollery: That is an expensive Christmas pudding for next year.

Senator Fairbairn: We may chuckle about Christmas, but it may be the only time of year that there is a great deal of joy in the land. Rightly or wrongly, it is the time of year that has grown over a long time to be less and less of a religious observance and more and more of a commercial occasion. Rightly or wrongly, this is portrayed through television and all the media. It is not an insignificant thing to think of all of the extra things—leaving the idea of gift giving aside for the moment—that North American families have come to regard as normal and commonplace.

You start with your basic Christmas trees. They get more expensive every year without a GST. You then get into all the things that you put on them to make them attractive for your home and your children. One by one, whether it is icicles, snow spray, decorations or whatever, they will all come under the extra tax.

Last night my neighbourhood was a blaze of Christmas lights. They are all up now. They will also be part of that extra expense, as will Christmas wreaths. This is just a portion of the whole myriad of things that you have to purchase before you even start to get into what are genuine parts of the Christmas spirit, namely, the giving of gifts to people who are close to you and your families.

Senator Buckwold: When you hire a Santa Claus will you have to pay 7 per cent tax, for example?

Senator Fairbairn: You would be a good person to hire for Santa Claus, Senator Buckwold.

Senator Stollery: What about the Christmas pudding? Is it taxed or is it considered a food?

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Fairbairn: You would have to phone the GST phoneline to have a reading on that. That might be an interesting thing to do. Had I had more time, I would have found out that information.

I noticed in an article the other day which emanated from Philadelphia that someone had taken the trouble to take the Christmas carol entitled "The Twelve Days of Christmas" and had placed a price tag on everything from the partridge in a pear tree to the ten lords a-leaping and the however many ladies dancing. It occurred to me that if you go through all the kinds of items—

Senator Stollery: I suppose it would depend on whether or not you bought a large Christmas pudding or whether you got it in—

Senator Fairbairn: Or whether you purchased the ingredients and made it?

Senator Stollery: No; or whether you bought it in a small package. I suppose it could then be considered candies or food. Do you think the same regulations that apply to candy and chocolate bars apply to Christmas pudding?

Senator Buckwold: As long as it was six servings or over you would pay no tax.

Senator Fairbairn: Then you would not get a small pudding.

Senator Stollery: Then you would get one large Christmas pudding.

Senator Buckwold: But you would not pay any tax.

Senator Steuart: Is that with or without hard sauce?

Senator Fairbairn: You would pay tax for the hard sauce. I am sure of that.

At any rate, honourable senators, what we are talking about here—and you can go through all of the kinds of things that children want, whether they be skates, hockey sticks, helmets, dolls, or the rest of it—is that the price is moving up with every item. We talk about that in terms of ourselves or in terms of middle-class Canada, which has developed these traditions and has been able to accomplish them over the years.

I ask honourable senators to take a look at the impact of the tax not on middle class Canada but on the very poor. It will be horrendous, particularly at this time of year. I am talking about that very large and almost totally unrepresented group of people in our society who some sociologists call the underclass. We like to think of the underclass as being segregated to the streets of New York or other big American cities. However, honourable senators, in every city of Canada we are now developing our own underclass, and all the new kinds of services and institutions that have become necessary to deal with them. We are talking about street people who do not even have homes to go to, let alone gifts to buy. They will be turning to the soup kitchens such as those provided by the Salvation Army and the food banks which are now a permanent feature of our society. We are talking about the bag ladies whom we see more and more of in our streets, especially now amid the rush of Christmas shopping all over Ottawa. We are talking about the rural poor who are hidden far away from those food banks and those soup kitchens. They have not even recovered from the last recession. In many cases, if we are talking about the farm community, as you know, Senator Buckwold, in Saskatchewan in many cases debt has forced farmers off the land in droves, or they are barely hanging on, battered down by droughts, interest rates and the vicious subsidy wars which are being fought by other countries and depriving Canadians of having viable prices for their grain at a time when there has been a relatively decent crop for the first time in years.

On top of everything that is going on here and what we are debating in this chamber today, we have only to look at the national news every night to see that the difficulties and the near riots in Geneva are of such moment as to share the headlines with the Persian Gulf activities. Just before I came into the chamber I was in the Senate Reading Room watching the news in which one of the representatives attending the meetings in Geneva said that the whole GATT discussions could collapse within two hours as a result of the failure to come to grips with the agricultural problem. With the exception of one or two incidents on the Hill a few years ago, one involving tobacco farmers and another involving dairy farmers, we do not have Canadian farmers taking to the streets as they were in Geneva forcing a violent retribution from the police.

With the underclass about which I am speaking we are moving into a situation in which Canada will not be immune from this type of social strife. It comes back again to how much individuals will bear. If we are thinking of the single mother on welfare trying to scrape together enough to feed, clothe and shelter herself and her children, we see that they can barely do it now, without facing a world in which she may, if she has the skill, the time or the energy, have to get into rebates and tax credits. I personally very sincerely believe that on the day that you have to purchase item by item individual things for your family it is little comfort to know that down the road you will receive a cheque, somewhat after the fact.

This is also true of elderly pensioners who can barely manage on a tiny pension cheque which is eroded constantly by inflation. These are the people whose voices are not being heard in this debate. To a large degree they are not heard very often in Canada because they are the ones who have neither the opportunity nor the strength to come out to protest on Parliament Hill or to present briefs to committees. They cannot do that because they are working at two or three jobs every day trying to keep their heads above water. These are the people whose voices ought to be listened to more attentively by all politicians than they are today.

One brief to which I would like to refer, because it speaks for these people, was presented in early July in Charlottetown to the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is not a long brief, but it says perhaps more elegantly and eloquently than I what these Canadians are suffering and will suffer. I wish to quote from the brief of the Social Action Commission from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island:

> The GST will hurt people on low incomes more than proponents of the tax care to admit. A single parent with two children with a $15,000 income will pay $735 in GST while receiving $580 in tax credits. This family, already in poverty by national standards, will be $155 poorer. A one-earner family with two children and an income of $15,000 yearly will be even worse off. This family will pay $938 on the GST while receiving tax credits of $580. The Ecumenical Coalition for Economic Justice states:
> > The real value of the tax credit will diminish over time as the result of inflation. Specifically, these credits will increase only by the amount which annual inflation exceeds 3 per cent—rising one per cent if inflation is 4 per cent, 2 per cent if inflation is 5 per cent, and so on. In other words, so long as inflation exceeds 3 per cent—and it has every year since 1971—the credit's real value will decline by 3 per cent each year. Single people living on government pensions or welfare payments, most of whom are women, will suffer a further income loss. Some provinces intend to deduct from a single person's welfare cheque the value of any tax credit they receive under the GST.

I find that very hard to believe.

Senator Frith: What do you find hard to believe?

Senator Fairbairn: That some provinces intend to deduct from a single person's welfare cheque the value of any tax credit they receive under the GST.

Senator Frith: One has already backed off.

Senator Fairbairn: I hope they will all back off.

● (1440)

> Moreover, a quarter of those who live in poverty do not file income tax forms, which must be filed in order to collect the tax credit. High income earners are much less affected because they spend a smaller portion of their income on goods and services. Their savings and investments will not be touched by the GST.
> . . . the Social Action Commission agrees with the positive alternatives to the GST made by the Pro Canada Network. The many alternative proposals would have particular benefit to Atlantic Canada, a region which stands to lose the most by this regressive tax.

The GST will hurt people on low incomes more than proponents of the tax would care to admit. A single parent with two children with a $15,000 income will pay–

Senator Simard: Wrong.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard is limited to one word, one word every six hours.

Senator Simard: As long as she got the message.

Senator Frith: Say it again so he can't say "wrong" for another two or three hours.

Senator Fairbairn: I will continue: The GST will hurt people on low incomes more than proponents of the tax care to admit.

Senator MacEachen: That's right.

Senator Frith: He says that's wrong, therefore, he does care to admit it, is that right?

Senator Doody: Wrong.

Senator Fairbairn: Well, I think Senator Simard cares about those low-income Canadians. For instance, a single parent with two children with a $15,000 yearly income will pay $735 in GST, and this family, already in poverty, will be $155 poorer.

Senator Spivak: Excuse me, Senator Fairbairn, what did you say that income was of the single parent?

Senator Fairbairn: A single parent with two children with a $15,000 yearly income will pay $735 in GST while receiving $580 in tax credits which is a gap of $155. That, Senator Spivak, was contained in a brief by the Social Action Committee in Prince Edward Island.

Senator Buckwold: I have a question just for clarification. The Social Action Commission, I think it was.

Senator Fairbairn: The Social Action Commission, pardon me.

Senator Buckwold: The Diocese of Charlottetown, this would be a religious group, I would presume. Would you be able to tell us what religious group this was for the Diocese of Charlottetown? I believe it would be the Catholic group.

Senator Fairbairn: I believe so, Senator Buckwold. They have been quoted in the brief as well. They are obviously working with other religious denominations because they are quoting the Ecumenical Coalition.

Senator Frith: Anglicans have a diocese, too.

Senator Buckwold: In your opinion, then, would you be able to trust the statistics that have been given in that region as well as you might trust the statistics from the Department of Finance of the Government of Canada?

Senator Fairbairn: Let me put it this way, Senator Buckwold, I have a great deal of confidence in the statistics that are presented by the Social Action Commission from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. I suspect that the closeness of its work to the individuals that it speaks about in that community would give them a pretty basic idea of the accuracy of the figures about which they are talking. When you ask me about the Department of Finance, I do not think the Department of Finance wilfully runs around trying to dispense inaccurate figures, but sometimes when you are closeted with your charts, your papers and your experts in an isolated, hermetically sealed room in the Department of Finance, you tend to come out with such aberrations as the GST which makes an assumption of national averages which would have the Minister of Finance suggest that the GST will advance the cause of northerners by the same average as it will the cause of those in southern Canada. That is patent nonsense. Basically, I would bet my nickel on the reality of the figures of the Social Action Commission in Prince Edward Island.

[Senator Frith.]

To continue with their brief, they say:

> The Pro Canada Network has proposed several alternative ways to raise needed revenue. Progressive taxes in which the wealthy pay a higher percentage of their income than the poor is one such obvious way. For example, in 1987, 93,000 corporations, or one in three of all profitable companies, paid no tax at all. Their profits amounted to $27 billion that year. A total of $1 billion to $2 billion could be raised by instituting a minimum 20 per cent tax on profitable corporations.
> In 1988 corporations in Canada owed the federal government $36.1 billion in deferred taxes. These taxes are the equivalent of interest free loans. By charging interest on deferred corporate taxes at current interest rates, and by eliminating over time the special tax breaks which give rise to deferred taxes, the government could raise from $4 to $5 billion.
> In 1989 only 1.7 per cent of corporations were audited by Revenue Canada. Every dollar spent on audits to corporations adds $17 to revenue recovered. Clamping down on corporate cheaters could raise as much as $3 billion without creating a whole new layer of bureaucracy.
> Under the current tax system, 80 per cent of the cost of such items as lavish private parties to company boxes at sports stadiums are tax deductible for businesses and professionals. The elimination of this particular tax would raise an additional $1 billion. Another $1 billion could be raised by eliminating tax breaks on money borrowed for corporate mergers and acquisitions, and by tightening tax rules for multinationals and real estate developers. The elimination of the manufacturing and processing tax credit would raise another billion dollars.

Senator David: Where are these statistics coming from, the last one you were giving us, the billion dollars?

Senator Fairbairn: These statistics, Senator David, come from the brief which was presented to the committee by the Social Action Commission in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

Senator David: You believe these statistics more than those of the Minister of Finance?

Senator Hastings: Yes. Who believes him?

• (1450)

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Would Senator Fairbairn permit another question? Another report was issued yesterday that may be of interest to our colleagues and it can perhaps test the validity of this one. I am referring to an article in this morning's Gazette and the headline is, "GST report warns of damage to North—Ottawa urged to set up credits for poor, home buyers". It is printed under the byline of Keven Ward of the Canadian Press. The article states:

> Ottawa's proposed GST would be particularly damaging to economies in northern regions of Canada's provinces and the territories where costs are already high, according to a report made public yesterday.

To offset the impact of the goods-and-services tax, the federal government should set up GST credits for institutions, new home buyers and low-income families in northern regions, the report said.

It also suggested reducing taxes to combat higher heating and transportation costs . . .

The report by Ernst & Young was commissioned by the provinces and the territories last year at a conference in Val d'Or.

It studied the impact of recent tax measures taken by the federal government on the northern economies of Ontario, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec, Labrador and the territories.

Ontario's northern-development minister, Shelley Martel, tabled the report in the legislature and called it proof of the need for Ottawa to help the North's fragile economy cope with the GST.

"This federal tax grab is being imposed on a region whose residents can least afford a reduction in their take-home income," she said.

"I want to emphasize that the GST on its own is the wrong tax at the wrong time for Northern Ontarians."

Ernst & Young's report was also critical of the federal Burnelle Commission on the northern tax allowance because it recommended limiting tax deductions to the extreme northern regions of the country.

Senator Fairbairn is known for her interest in the people of the North and of the poor in Canada. She may have missed this report because she does have a lot of material with her. So much material is coming out now condemning the GST from people who have a lot of credibility that it is very difficult to keep up with it. I thought I would bring this to Senator Fairbairn's attention to see if she would like to comment on it.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Lefebvre. I appreciate your reading this into the record. As Senator Lefebvre says, so much is coming out it is hard to keep up with it. The report that he referred to has obviously had a large enough impact on its release yesterday that it is being given prominent play in a number of newspapers. I have here the Globe and Mail that I was going to read from. Senator Lefebvre has saved me and honourable senators from hearing this again. There is also a very good story by Richard Mackie in the Globe and Mail.

Senator Doyle: Who was that?

Senator Fairbairn: I am sure Senator Doyle will remember that he is the son of Victor Mackie who I used to work with many years in the Parliamentary Press Gallery. He does a fine job.

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Doyle used to sign editorials with him.

Senator Doyle: Not quite.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as I was mentioning earlier, the whole question of the North is one of the truly most vulnerable areas of the GST. Later on in my remarks I will spend some time on that issue partly because so many people did come to visit us, and because recently, when we were moving an amendment on the North the mayors and representatives from the Inuit areas in northern Quebec, Labrador and the Arctic came here. It is vulnerable because, again, there are assumptions made here in Ottawa—and this is by no means new—that what makes sense here is easily computed into the rest of the country on an equal basis. But the reality of Canada is that it is completely different in every part whether it is resources, culture, climate, geography or whatever. As you move away from the centre and you take in that fundamental linkage in the history of this country, which is transportation, you will find a different reality and a different strength in how this tax will cut.

If Senator Lefebvre will stay around I will have a few comments to make on the North which will reflect the views of people who live, work and govern in the North.

Senator Lefebvre: I would not miss it.

Senator Hastings: We will all be here.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I want to go back to my discussion of Charlottetown, P.E.I., which is far away from the centre and a beautiful part of this country and finish with the brief by the Social Action Commission who told the Senate that, in their view, the wealthy should be made to pay their fair share. They said:

> In 1950 individuals and corporations paid roughly the same share of federal government revenue—28 per cent each. Today tax revenues from individuals account for 47 per cent of this revenue and the corporate share has fallen to around 10 per cent. Since Michael Wilson became Finance Minister in 1984, Canada's income tax system has become increasingly unfair. Canadians have witnessed a reduction in the number of income tax categories, a drop in the tax rate for the wealthiest and increasing tax rates for lower and middle-income Canadians. This is in addition to a number of across-the-board flat surtaxes. A genuinely progressive income tax structure would establish more brackets for high-income earners and progressively higher rates that could raise between $2 billion to $4 billion more a year.
> Taxing capital gains would raise $500 million in revenues. Restoring the federal tax abolished in 1971 on estates and inheritances would raise $1 billion to $2 billion in new revenues. The introduction of a tax on net wealth, which already exists in 12 OECD countries, could earn an additional $1 billion to $2 billion.

• (1500)

> In addition, Canada is one of the few countries in the industrialized western world that does not have a comprehensive tax on luxury items.
> There are other valid ways to overcome Canada's deficit problems. It is estimated that a 3 per cent drop in interest > rates would cut the cost of servicing the debt by $5.1 billion in the first year, rising to $10 billion per year within four years as existing debt is refinanced. Such a cut would still leave Canadian interest rates above U.S. levels. An interest rate cut would also stimulate a slow economy and therefore indirectly increase revenues. The end result would be a more just and sustainable Canadian economy.

The commission continues:

> The federal government's failure to deal with high and rising unemployment is resulting in a further loss of public revenue. Every 1 per cent reduction in the unemployment rate would lead to an increase in production of 3 per cent and an increase in federal revenue of $4 billion to $5 billion.
> The above examples, when added together, amount to a minimum of $24.6 billion and a maximum of $36.5 billion in additional revenues each year. These figures prove that the deficit problem has been greatly overstated.

The commission goes on to say:

> The GST is one of a series of anti-Atlantic region measures imposed by the federal government. The Conference Board of Canada estimates that 280,000 jobs will be lost in Canada if the GST is implemented. If this figure is averaged out according to population, Prince Edward Island will lose 1,400 jobs. This will have an even greater impact than the removal of CFB Summerside. The GST, together with the removal of the base and the cutbacks in regional development programs and VIA Rail, will have a devastating effect on this province.
> Furthermore, the destructive Bill C-21 would now be law if it were not for the ability of the Senate to hear the distress signals sent out by so many Canadians. We hope and pray that neither the GST nor Bill C-21 will ever become law.

Honourable Senators, this brief was presented in July, before the addition of the eight extra senators to the Senate, which had Bill C-21 and the clawback bill whizzing through this chamber earlier this fall. Judging from this brief, that would be very sad news indeed for the Social Action Commission. The commission goes on to say:

> The well-being of this region is at stake. Low income families are already paying $628 more in federal sales tax than in 1984. A 7 per cent sales tax on hundreds of new goods and services, such as electricity, home heating fuels, clothing, footwear, haircuts, housing transactions, and associated services will overtax the already overburdened.
> Over 17 per cent of families on Prince Edward Island earn less than $15,000. Other Atlantic provinces have even more startling statistics.

This should interest Senator MacEachen. It says:

> Nineteen per cent of families in Nova Scotia, more than 23 per cent of families in New Brunswick, and over 26 per cent of families in Newfoundland earn less than $15,000.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

> A tax which places a greater burden on lower income Canadians stands in stark contrast to the gospel preferential option for the poor.
> The GST represents a corporate windfall. Under the old federal sales tax approximately 50 per cent of the tax was passed on to consumers. Corporations paid the other half. The GST places the whole burden on the consumer. Returning any portion of the manufacturers' sales tax savings to customers is entirely voluntary.
> Mr. Wilson claims that the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax will make corporations based in Canada more internationally competitive. However, it was also Mr. Wilson who raised the MST from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent.

Senator Stollery was asking whether or not I thought Mr. Wilson would be inclined to raise the GST. As this brief from the Social Action Commission in Prince Edward Island notes, it is Mr. Wilson who raised the manufacturers' sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. If his trend line is any indication, the GST would follow the same upward movement.

Senator Stollery: Would you have any ideas about the possible increase in the GST from 7 per cent to 9 per cent, if the GST unwisely is put into operation? I cannot help but continue to reflect on the article by Eric Beauchesne.

For everyone's information, the group who did the predictions mentioned in this article is Informetrica. They are suggesting that the deficit will rise to $35 billion next year.

Senator Buckwold: What is the date of this article?

Senator Stollery: This is dated December 4. The Prime Minister himself has said:

> We are in difficult economic times and obviously any good, concrete proposals will be looked at.

It seems to me that you might be able to enlighten us as to what kinds of proposals the Prime Minister would be looking at. There is an increasing deficit. The Minister of Finance has to deal with this increasing deficit. He has the problem, as I know you are aware, of the feared Tokyo real estate crash, which concerns the international financial community, because of the tremendous over-value of the Japanese property market. If it crashes, as many people think it will, the Japanese will be taking their money home. As Senator Buckwold, Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, is very aware, that is another pressure on international interest rates. Never mind the local Canadian pressures, there are large international pressures that the government has to be concerned about. After all, it is not in control of the Japanese property market, where prices for small pieces of land in central Tokyo have become astronomical. It is worth millions of dollars. Thousands of people, if not tens of thousands of people, companies and so on, have borrowed against these inflated property values. If that market crashes, which a lot of people think it will, what will that do to inflation in Canada? The interest rates will be affected and that will add even more to the deficit. The Prime Minister is quite right to be interested, finally, in what other people's ideas might be about reducing the deficit and our grave financial situation. It is the first time that I have ever heard him say that he might be interested in listening to some other people's opinions. At the same time he has the unemployment problem.

I should like to know whether, from your vast reading on the subject, you can give us some indication of when and by how much the GST can be expected to be raised in the coming year—that is, 1991?

Earlier you talked about next Christmas and the situation for people doing their Christmas shopping. As you know, Senator Fairbairn, and as Senator Buckwold, a merchant himself, knows, 60 per cent of the retail business is done in the two months before Christmas. We are not just talking about things dangling on Christmas trees; we are talking about the economic backbone of the trading economy, which takes place between November 1 and Christmas Day. What kind of situation and perspective—that is, financial landscape—do you see for next year, if this tax goes into effect? In particular, what date do you think we can expect the budget? By how much do you think the tax will be increased? I do not think anyone believes that it will survive even one budget at 7 per cent because it is such an obviously simple way for the government to raise revenue. I am sure that Senator Buckwold knows about this. I do not happen to recall what each percentage point is worth on the GST.

Senator Buckwold: It is now $1.5 billion.

Senator Stollery: Senator Buckwold informs us that it is around $1.5 billion. So that if it went back up to 9 per cent, the government would be looking at another $3 billion worth of revenue. If we are going to the European levels of GST—and the one that comes most quickly to my mind is the British one of 15 per cent—this is an enormous amount of money. It could have a tremendous impact on this economic fiasco which seems to be upon us. It is not all of the government's making, but the government has certainly been doing its share to make it as bad as possible.

Do you have any more thoughts on that subject?

Senator Buckwold: Before Senator Fairbairn answers, I wish to ask a supplementary question. It is the same question, but I wish to relate it to the provinces. Not only do we have the federal goods and services tax but we have something unique in Canada, namely, a provincial tax in all provinces except Alberta—

Senator Stollery: And they are all different.

Senator Buckwold: —with a retail consumption tax not on services. I will come to that in a minute to get your comments on it.

When you talk about the 15 per cent tax in the United Kingdom—that is, a goods and services value-added tax—there is no provincial or state tax in addition to it. Canada is quite unique. That is one of the major problems with this tax, namely, that we have the duality of taxation which is not blended. One province, Quebec, has indicated that they are ready to come on board. What the quid pro quo was, I am not sure, though. I do not even think that the people from Quebec realized what they were getting into either, although the book people suddenly came alive and Quebec has withdrawn its support from that at least.

In Quebec the arrangement is that their present tax, which I understand is 8 per cent, will stay at 8 per cent for the first year. But it will only apply to goods. The following year, at the beginning of 1992, they will move into the entire range of tax on services. Because they are broadening the base or the scope, that tax will be reduced to 7 per cent. Some people from Quebec think, "Isn't that great? We will have a lower tax than 7 per cent." Keep in mind that that tax will also be extended to services.

You will recall evidence in the committee that services today represent about 60 per cent of the expenditure of an average family. Not all, but a good part of that will be taxed. The impact is unbelievable when you combine the two tax bases. Keeping in mind Senator Stollery's question concerning the impossible increase, and considering that we have a duality of taxes, it is not a question of what the increase will be but how much Canada can afford to pay in consumer taxes when you add both of them together. If the tax continues to be added for a period of time, the provinces will probably come on side whether they like it or not, if only to raise money. It is a great thing to be able to tax the taxi ride, the admission to a theatre, the funeral that we talked about—

Senator Hastings: And providing the hearse.

Senator Buckwold: —and anything else that they see fit to do.

In Newfoundland the provincial tax is now 12 per cent. It was indicated to the committee, and is still maintained, that the 12 per cent will be added to the 7 per cent. In other words, the provincial tax will be on top of the 7 per cent. That will also take place in most of the maritime or Atlantic provinces from what we are told. The reason, again, is money. They are desperately anxious to have money. If the base is higher—

An Hon. Senator: Then the federal government is cutting them down on it.

Senator Buckwold: Correct. They are cutting down on it. When you look at an effective tax rate on consumer goods in Newfoundland of 20 per cent—because that is what it is, namely, 7 per cent plus 12 per cent on top of the 7 per cent—and compound it, you are up to 20 per cent.

In answering Senator Stollery's question about what you think the rate might be, perhaps you could answer my question. In view of our competitive position vis-à-vis the United States and other areas that people shop in—especially in the U.S.—and keeping in mind that 95 per cent of the Canadian population is within driving distance of American shopping, how high can we put a consumer tax on goods and services in Canada and still maintain a retail business?

Senator Fairbairn: That is quite a mouthful from both of you.

Senator Hastings: Yes. They were good questions.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, they were excellent questions.

● (1520)

Senator Fairbairn: That is a fair challenge to the imagination to respond. I will do so partly with a comment. I think Senator Buckwold made a fundamental point when he asked how much more can people be expected to pay or how much can they actually pay. That is central to this entire debate. I said in a speech recently in this chamber on an amendment by Senator Waters, which amendment would have postponed the tax for a year, that it is almost insulting to have government spokespeople suggest that Canadians should start tightening their belts. Canadians have been tightening their belts progressively for a very long time now. Whether or not Statistics Canada indicates that a recession is just beginning, people in many parts of Canada have been tightening their belts in what they believed was a recession for some time now.

The other point is that in comparison with other countries we are very different for two reasons. Senator Buckwold pointed to the first one. It is that of all the countries which have a value added tax in some way, Canada is the only one which has this dual tax system. That is staggering when we think of people in Newfoundland having to pay the combined taxes. Consider the people of Quebec. Until recently I was obsessed with the price of books. I was thinking that the people of Quebec for the first time would be paying 15% tax on a book. When we consider that that applies to clothing, shelter and other items, then, something has to give. The people will not be able to pay. Perhaps union contracts will keep the heads of others above water, but there are many people who do not belong to unions and do not have year-round jobs but instead have seasonal jobs.

The other thing we are not doing in this country is giving any indication as to where, if this rise is coming under very desperate economic circumstances, the relief is to be found. In other countries income tax has been lowered. There is no indication that that will happen in Canada. That is a partial response to your question. Something simply will have to give. There are a great many people in this country right now who are still very sceptical about the government and what it plans to do with this tax even if it is passed. They think that it will not come into force for some period of time. They think that because, first, it is not ready and second, because of the recession. There is a suspicion among some retail businesses that that will be the case.

Senator Buckwold: A minister has said that already.

Senator Fairbairn: Minister Hockin very recently may have let the inner cat out of the bag, even though his comments were repudiated almost immediately by Ministers Jelinek and Wilson.

At any rate, as far as raising the tax is concerned, I begin by saying that I am not even sure the tax will be applied. If the tax is applied, then it is inevitable that it will be increased. The obvious hike will be to 9 per cent since that is what the government started off at.

[Senator Hastings.]

You have to remember, Senator Stollery, that the Prime Minister is all over the map on this issue. He has talked about the fact that perhaps the tax on books and bibles will be lifted. He was even caught by the enthusiasm of the moment when he responded to some student in British Columbia when he said that they would review that. I do not think that people in Canada—

Senator Stollery: Why would they review it after and not before?

Senator Fairbairn: Exactly. I do not think that Canadians are prepared to give them the luxury of the benefit of the doubt on taking their word that perhaps down the line the tax will be removed. In fact, I think that Quebec has put the government right on the spot with what it has done concerning books. It understood very quickly that this whole thing is nuts. They are withholding their tax on books for a year and possibly longer in the hope that the government will recant. I think Gerrard Levesque said when he made his announcement, that it was in the hope that when—and I say if—the GST comes in, that it will force the federal government to withdraw the tax on books. I do not have a lively enough imagination to know when or how much the government will increase the GST by, if it is approved. However, I believe like every other Canadian that the GST will not go down. I believe that it will definitely go up.

Senator Stollery: I cannot help but be intrigued by the implication of Senator Buckwold's question vis-à-vis this increase in tax and its effect on Canadian merchants. As honourable senators well know, we went through the free trade debate a year ago in this place. We have been monitoring it ever since. The tax is already as high as 20 per cent in Newfoundland. We will be looking at a 25 per cent sales tax in Newfoundland, which includes the GST on top of the sales tax, in the very near future. In Ontario, where I come from, we will be looking at a very high tax. What will happen to the merchants who live within a short distance of the border? What will the implications of the Free Trade Agreement be on them? I think that the average Canadian believes that part of the Free Trade Agreement gives the citizen the right to go over to the U.S.—and I am not sure that I agree with it—to buy things. At some stage, under this agreement, down the road one will be able to cross the border to buy things and bring them back to Canada without paying any duty.

This poses another administrative question. Does this mean that if this situation involves a large number of people who do their shopping across the border, as opposed to a selective few who do their shopping now, that these people will be involved in a situation such as that concerning New York and New Jersey. In New Jersey there is a whole big shopping area on Highway 17 across from New York City. There are no state taxes in New Jersey which is a big deal in New York. On a given Sunday there are thousands of people who go to these places because they save about 8 per cent on average in taxes. As you know, in the U.S. there are also municipal taxes added to the state sales tax. Let us say that that whole shopping area is based on the fact that New York State shoppers go across to

New Jersey to this vast warehouse area to cut-rate stores to do their shopping. If that starts up in Canada, what will happen? Do we then have to establish an even more onerous customs check than we have, because now the customs officers, I suppose, have a system of stopping cars and checking the contents, but they cannot possibly check all the cars at the most heavily-travelled border points, we are told, in the world, where millions of people cross during a year.

Senator Fairbairn, I wonder, given this increase that we are predicting, what is this going to do at the borders? Are we going to have to bring in an entirely new level of customs checks not, ironically, for the duty, because the duty will have been done away with by the Free Trade Agreement. In fact, what is far worse than the duty, a massive tax regime is being substituted that does not exist across the border.

I suppose the idea is that when one comes into Canada and has bought something outside of Canada one is supposed to pay the provincial taxes and the federal GST tax. I assume that is the way it would work. But how is it going to policed? How are they going to process the millions of visitors who cross yearly between Detroit and Windsor, between southern Ontario and Buffalo, between Ottawa and Ogdensburg, between Quebec and Burlington, Vermont, and in British Columbia? How are they going to deal with this?

Do you think the government has thought this part of the proposal through? This is going to put a huge strain on the Customs and Excise people at the border. They are certainly going to have to increase their numbers. They are going to have to stop every car because everybody is going to be doing it, and I use the example between New York and New Jersey because it is not far from here and many of us have been there. Have you any thoughts on that problem as this tax increases during the year?

Senator Fairbairn: I would suggest, Senator Stollery, that some of these issues probably have not been anticipated in any depth whatsoever by the government. It is interesting that you should mention border crossings because it was either this morning or yesterday morning that I heard a radio report that traffic was becoming so heavy from Canada down to the United States, all across the country in the border areas, that their customs people are now thinking of charging a passage fee just to go across the border. That is a whole new element. I certainly have not heard or read of any major thoughts on that, but it is one that would add a whole new dimension and, indeed, it would need a whole new bureaucracy to deal with it.

However, we are talking about people who can afford to do that kind of thing, who can afford to hike over the border and do their shopping in the United States, and I think probably, just to return to the conclusion of the brief from the Social Action Commission in Prince Edward Island, that's fine for those people, but the people whom this commission is speaking for are people who would never be able to afford to get as far as the border to take advantage of this kind of situation.

In the concluding part of this brief, the commission states:

> The GST will replace the MST and make up the shortfall in Customs and Excise revenues caused by free trade.

It is interesting that they should say that just after Senator Stollery's questions. He is psychic, he anticipated the continuation of this brief. The brief states:

> To achieve this, the federal government is willing to allow such destructive side effects as lowering farm income, lowering wages, cutting social programs, increasing inflation and continuing high interest rates.
> The government claims that inflation will rise by 1.25 per cent if the GST is passed. We agree with researchers who claim that even if 50 per cent of MST savings are passed on to consumers, inflation will increase by more than twice the government's estimate. Associated costs will increase the inflation rate by approximately 3 per cent.

This figure is not that different from those of the other people who appeared before your committee, Senator Buckwold.

The commission goes on to say that:

> The alternatives we propose would curb that inflation threat. Furthermore, the inflationary effect of the GST is predicted to push the Canadian economy into a recession.

As I said earlier, this brief was presented early in July, and even without the GST we are already pushed into a recession.

> The disappearance of 165,000 jobs in manufacturing, (8 per cent of the Canadian manufacturing work force) is but one example of the downturn already evident in the economy.
> We disagree with Mr. Wilson that Canadians must choose between paying the GST or suffering deep cuts in public spending. The alternatives we have outlined prove that Mr. Wilson's claim is false. The government has chosen to protect the wealthy at untold and unnecessary expense to low and middle-income Canadians. This is a grave injustice.

The commission notes:

> Pope John Paul II stated in Mexico that there is 'a social mortgage' on the means of production. Capital and technology must be used for constructive rather than destructive purposes in the development of peoples.

That is the conclusion of Pope John's remarks. The brief continues:

> There are constructive alternatives which respect the principle of social mortgage. Please reject the GST in favour of a progressive tax system which ensures that the needs of people on lower incomes will finally be attended to by making the wealthy pay their fair share. We ask also that you ensure that any new tax system be, above all, equitable, especially with respect to having wealthy Canadians and the corporate sector contribute their fair share.

That concludes the brief by the Social Action Commission for Charlottetown which I think made a very thoughtful contribution to the hearings of your committee, Senator Buckwold, when you were in that province.

● (1540)

Senator Stollery has repeatedly asked as to whether or not this tax will stay at 7 per cent if it is put in place. He asked me to use my imagination and tell him when and how and by how much it would rise. I have to confess that I cannot put my thought processes into the government's mode on this tax, but anyone who has watched the current Minister of Finance in action since 1984 knows that we have had no less than 32 separate tax increases.

Senator Lefebvre: How many?

Senator Fairbairn: Thirty-two.

Senator Lefebvre: That must be a record.

Senator Stollery: I have a question for Senator Fairbairn: If I heard you correctly, you said there had been 32 tax increases, is that correct?

Senator Fairbairn: That is right.

Senator Stollery: I recall that when this government was elected there was a provision that was part of the election platform to allow every person a $500,000 capital gain tax-free.

Senator Kenny: A chicken in every pot!

Senator Stollery: It was a $500,000 chicken in every pot. Could you tell us what happened to that $500,000 chicken and how long was it before it was killed or, should I say, plucked?

Senator Fairbairn: I cannot give you the answer to that, Senator Stollery, but there is no question that all the other chickens are coming home to roost with this particular tax.

Senator Kenny: And that is nothing to crow about.

Senator Lefebvre: They are real vultures.

Senator Kenny: They laid eggs.

Senator Fairbairn: Never did I know we had such farmyard expertise here outside of the agriculture committee.

Since 1984 we have seen income tax rates going up and up and up; and we have also seen the removal of indexation protection over 3 per cent. We have seen countless new taxes in the form of user fees in our national parks, in our national museums, and in a whole range of new areas. When it comes to taxes, this current government has boldly gone where no others have gone before.

Let us look only at the old manufacturers' sales tax to get some idea of what the government and the minister may have in mind. In 1984 the manufacturers' sales tax was 9 per cent and that, coincidentally, as I mentioned before, was the same percentage that was proposed for the GST when it was first introduced. As you will recall, that 9 per cent manufacturers' sales tax was referred to by the Minister of Finance, Michael Wilson, as "a silent killer of jobs." How many times did you hear him say that the MST was, "a silent killer of jobs"? According to the minister, that 9 per cent tax was just about the most horrible thing that had ever hit the tax rolls of this country. It was just about the worst nightmare for our manufacturing sector that ever was. It stifled growth in addition to killing jobs. It hurt our exports. The list of its sins is too long for me to recite today, even in a speech of this length.

Now, a normal person hearing the minister say all those nasty things about the MST would have thought, quite naturally, that the first thing on the minister's list of priorities would be to get that tax rate down as fast as he could. Can you imagine how surprised Canadians were when almost the first thing he did was not to lower the MST but, instead, to raise it. He did not raise it just once, he raised it on four separate occasions. It went from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. In fact, honourable senators, the Minister of Finance turned the MST from a silent killer to a mass murderer of jobs.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Neiman: You made them sit up and take notice.

Senator Fairbairn: It seems to have charged some senators out of their slumber.

It is almost as if the minister were saying to Canadian businesses: "I think this is a really bad tax, but I don't think you guys realize how bad it really is, so I'm going to show you. Take that, and that, and that, and that! Now, don't you agree with me that it should be eliminated? Don't you agree with me that we should be socking it to the consumer directly instead of to you guys in the corporate world?"

It is small wonder that spokespersons for big business have been tripping over each other in the race to the microphones to denounce the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax and to welcome the new 7 per cent tax on everybody else except them.

Will the minister raise the tax after it is brought in? I ask and Senator Stollery asks. Given his record, honourable senators, Canadians can be forgiven for wondering what else he has in store. His response to this very question was very interesting. In reply to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on May 22, 1990 he said: "No finance minister could provide a precise answer to such a question. Circumstances change; the world changes." Well, he can say that again.

The minister cast further doubt on his intentions when he went on to say that nearly 60 per cent of the countries which have a similar tax have, in fact, raised that tax substantially since it was first brought in.

Honourable senators, if the Minister of Finance raised a tax that he hated on four separate occasions over the past six years, what is he going to do with a tax that he really likes? It boggles the mind. Canadians can be forgiven if they suspect, as do I, and I believe as do a lot of other senators on both sides of this house, that if the Minister of Finance has his druthers that tax will go up to 9 per cent or 10 per cent. Perhaps it will go even higher before he is finished with it. On the other hand, if the tax goes through, Mr. Wilson may be finished with it before it starts its upward rise. Honourable senators should know what the experience has been in other countries which have a value-added tax. Some countries have already been mentioned, and I should like to draw your attention to a few other countries. Senator Stollery was talking about the United Kingdom, which began its GST at 10 per cent and now it is at 15 per cent. A number of other countries also raised their rate, and I will list a few right now.

● (1550)

Argentina raised theirs from 16 to 18 per cent, which is a small increase. Austria raised theirs from 8 per cent to 20 per cent. Belgium had a slight increase from 18 per cent to 19 per cent. Brazil started at 15 and raised theirs to 17 per cent. Denmark began at 10 per cent and it is now at 22 per cent.

Senator David: Over how many years?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator David, it came in at the end of the 1960s at 10 per cent and is up to 22 per cent now. That is a long period of time. It is also a very hefty raise.

France's GST has drifted up from 13 per cent to 18 per cent. Germany has raised their tax from 10 to 14 per cent. Ireland has raised their tax from 16 per cent to 25 per cent. Luxembourg has raised their tax from 8 per cent 12 per cent. Mexico has raised their tax from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. The Netherlands is similar to Denmark. Over that similar period of time, they have raised their tax from 12 to 20 per cent. Again, that is a big jump. New Zealand came in in 1986 at 10 per cent. Last year it was up to 12.5 per cent.

Senator Buckwold: That is a 25 per cent increase in four years.

Senator Fairbairn: That is right. In his testimony before the committee, the minister explained that in most countries when they brought in a value-added tax like the GST, they also lowered their income taxes. He neglected to explain to the committee why he was not doing the same thing. We have not heard a word about that.

As I said a few minutes ago to Senator Buckwold, everything cannot keep going up on the tax side and the price side, and down on the other side without an explosion of some sort in this country. Time and again during the committee hearings people were talking about civil disobedience.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, I have two questions that come to mind. Most of us are aware that the Scandinavian countries are highly taxed countries. They have become so expensive that people do not go there as tourists because it can be a crushing experience. These high taxes make it impossible.

My first question is this: Is there any evidence as to how devastating this is on the tourist industry? The tourist industry is more important to Canada than other countries because we lose so much of our foreign exchange because of the severity of the winters and the closeness of the United States. One of the means to offset that is our own tourist trade into Canada.

The example would be what happened to the Scandinavian countries between, say, 1950 and today with their tourist industry because of the high costs. I have another question. If you have an income tax system such as in Sweden, we are told that, not so long ago, you could end up paying more income taxes than you earned. There were a couple of famous tax rebellions by individuals. They were paying 102 per cent taxes. Those countries, as an offset to the GST, lowered the income tax, which everyone agreed to.

It has occurred to me that it is a bit strange that there was not more controversy in some of the other countries on that interesting list that you have read to us who would have objected to the abandonment of the progressive tax system. Is this not a transfer of the progressive system? You have just said that there is a transfer going on generally in the western world from the progressive tax system to the sales tax system and to taxation of the poor. I cannot understand why more people are not objecting to this.

I did not realize that all of those countries had this value-added system. Every one of them lowered the income tax system when they brought this in. What a condemnation of society that we seem to be developing in the western world and in Canada.

Could you possibly enlighten me on my two questions?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Stollery, there may well have been over the years a hue and cry in some of those countries. We know about the cost of living in some of those countries, and I will get into some thoughts on that a little farther on in my speech. In many of these countries the income tax was brought down. Of course, in these countries they also do not have a dual tax system.

The other point you mentioned was tourism. Again, I will touch on that later. However, in parts of Canada this is a major and growing industry. I think of my own province of Alberta. The summer before last I was in Alberta listening to the tourist industry on the question of the VIA Rail cuts, that marvellous cross-country train that went through Banff and the mountain passes to Vancouver.

The tourist industry was out in force explaining what the loss of that route would do to their business from abroad—not only from the United States but also from Japan and all sorts of places. In the tourist industry, unlike a lot of other places, their packages start selling almost five years in advance. Right now people will be making decisions about travelling in Canada based not solely on that specific instance. That is a place that they will no longer travel to because it is no longer available—but when they take their savings and look at where they wish to go in the world and see that our tourist industry is being touched by even the threat of this new tax, tourist operators will have to make some value judgments now as to what they can expect from people outside this country.

When our friends were here from the North you heard—and I will go over some of that later; perhaps if I do not come to it before six o'clock, then later this evening—about the absolute fear in the North about what this would do to a fragile but potentially extremely exciting industry that is just starting to grow on its own in northern Canada. You know more about that than I do because you are up there doing all that exciting canoeing, and that kind of thing. You know the kinds of expenses that are involved in doing the exciting kinds of exploring of northern Canada that you have done. If you are coming from outside the country, they are even worse. This tax and the impact that it will have at a tough time on industries that show such promise in our country is quite frightening for them and quite debilitating for all of us.

To get back to the Minister of Finance and what he was saying before the committee, the question always comes up about the timing of the GST. So many times I have heard from other senators and from witnesses that the timing could not be worse. That is borne out in spades by the kind of information that has been coming out this fall.

Most Canadians believe that the best time for this tax is never, but here we are in the midst of what we are told is a real made-in-Canada recession, a recession that has been brought on by the now somewhat or thoroughly discredited policies of the current Minister of Finance. Instead of trying to make it easier for Canadians to weather the storm, he will make it a lot harder by bringing in a tax on everything.

This is a government that has unapologetically followed a policy of high interest rates and a high dollar when many economists and many of the government's big business friends have been telling them lately that it is the wrong thing to do. In the part of the country that I come from in the west, the question of the dollar and the question of interest rates just adds to all the other non-man-made disasters such as the drought one year, and floods or both the same year, grasshoppers, and God knows what, on top of things that they have no control over. The farmers in my part of Canada cannot understand why, given the hurt that is done to that industry already, the whole question of the high interest rate has not—over the last five years and, in particular, the last couple of years—been seriously considered by the government in a way that would enable them to exist in this industry.

Honourable senators, far away from the farmlands and the ranchlands of this country we go into our supermarkets and are quite happy to buy reasonably priced foods at prices comparable to those in other countries. But one day we will walk into those supermarkets and either there will be a much higher cost to pay for Canadian food or we will find that the food is coming from other countries of the world because our farming industry, our ranching industry, our poultry industry and our dairy industry have basically wound down. It will not be the fault of the farmers of this country. It will be the fault of us and our levels of government that have failed to see what those very damaging policies have driven that industry into. Senator Olson knows a great deal more about that than I do, having spent his life involved in the farm community. But even from where I sit the evidence is clear. The need is very desperate.

In spite of these kinds of messages, the government has not listened. It was just last Saturday that all the speculation ended surrounding the silly game of, "When will Michael Wilson admit that there is a recession? Will he ever admit that there is a recession? Is there a recession?"

Senator Lefebvre: Has he mentioned the "R" word yet?

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Fairbairn: Yes; he has finally mentioned it. I will put on the record the reason why he has mentioned it, Senator Lefebvre. This quote is from one of my favourite newspapers, the Globe and Mail. It tells us on December 1, 1990, under the headline "Recession becomes official."

Senator Lefebvre: Wow!

Senator Poitras: Do you know what it is?

Senator Lefebvre: He is only six months behind Canadians, you mean.

Senator Fairbairn: More than that. At any rate, I will put this on the record. It is a clear and factual story by Drew Fagan of the Parliamentary Bureau here in Ottawa. It states:

> The recession became official yesterday—

That was on November 30—

> as the economy shrank 0.3 per cent in the third quarter because of continued weakness in business investment and modest consumer spending.

● (1610)

> The contraction marks the second consecutive quarterly decline in Canada's gross domestic product, which is the technical definition of a recession.
> The results released by Statistics Canada yesterday were not as bad as many economists had expected. On an annual basis, the economy shrank 1.0 per cent, compared with widespread expectations of a decline of about 2.0 per cent.
> As well, Statscan adjusted its figures for the second quarter, ended June 30, to a decline in economic output of 1.2 per cent on an annual basis, compared with a previously announced 1.6 per cent drop.
> Nevertheless, there was little sign of economic strength, and no signal that the trough of the recession has been reached.
> "You would have to be an outrageous optimist to say that this is now the bottom," Douglas Peters, chief economist at the Toronto-Dominion Bank, said yesterday. "This is not going to be as bad as the 1981-82 recession, but it's still going to be the second worst recession we've had since World War II."
> The last recession went on for six quarters and resulted in a total contraction in the economy of 5.3 per cent.
> It is generally believed now that this recession will last about 15 months with the second quarter of 1991 being the final period of weakness before a return to economic expansion. The total contraction in the gross domestic product this time, economists say, likely will be about 2.0 to 2.5 per cent.
> Patti Croft, an economist at Burns Fry Ltd., noted yesterday that the sudden spurt of business activity that brought the economy out of the 1981-82 recession likely will not be repeated in mid-1991. Instead, it will be a slower recovery, she said, as consumers and businesses methodically regain the confidence to spend and invest.

> Statscan said yesterday that the gross domestic product tumbled 0.8 per cent in September, the largest monthly decline since the recession began in April.

Thus, in the minds of Statistics Canada, if not in the mind of Michael Wilson, we have been in a recession period since last April.

> That result, added to the 0.4 per cent fall in economic output in August, marks the worst back-to-back monthly economic performance since April, 1982.
> It also helped erase the small economic growth recorded in the first three months of 1990.
> Because this economic downturn has been anticipated for more than one year, companies have been careful to pare inventories and do not have the stock that burdened many businesses in 1982, she noted. As well, companies have been faster to lay off employees at the first sign of economic trouble.
> But the widespread prediction of a return to economic growth next summer, which was supported by Finance Minister Michael Wilson yesterday, is predicated on two key factors. One is that the Persian Gulf crisis will be resolved with a return to lower oil prices . . .

That is a moot point. We do not know about that.

> . . . the other that the apparent U.S. recession will be short and relatively mild.
> "If you tell me that war will break out, the Canadian recession will be longer and deeper," Mr. Peters said. "In that case, it could easily be as bad as the last recession, and in Ontario and Quebec it would be worse."
> A few months ago, most analysts believed the economy would grow marginally in the last three months of 1990, as consumers tried to beat the Jan. 1 onset of the goods and services tax by shopping early. But yesterday's results, particularly the September figures, indicated that that won't be the case.
> Economic figures already released for October, such as increases in unemployment and inflation and depressed retail sales and housing construction, are considered indicative of a particularly weak fourth quarter.
> "There really isn't anything driving the economy," said Fred Morley, senior policy analyst of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. "The situation seems to be getting progressively worse right now."
> In the past, the onset of a recession has led to greater government spending as Ottawa tried to stimulate the economy in the absence of private sector investment. But Mr. Wilson ruled out that strategy yesterday, pointing to the government's continuing need to limit the federal deficit.
> According to Statscan, corporate profits have slipped for six successive quarters and that has led to a decline of 3.2 per cent in business investment in plant and equipment in the third quarter ended Sept. 30. After a three-year investment boom, the total business spending on plant and equipment has dropped 4.9 per cent in the past two quarters.
> Export performance was also weak. Shipments of goods and services slipped in the third quarter to $162.5-billion from $166.6-billion in the second quarter.
> "Exports, although they grew in the first half of the year, have been generally listless as the U.S. economy has slowed," Statscan said.
> Consumer spending constitutes the third major engine of economic growth after business investment and exports. It grew by 0.3 per cent in the third quarter after a decline of 0.4 per cent in the previous three months.
> But Statscan noted that the third quarter increase was marginal compared with the jump of 3.4 per cent in over-all disposable income. That came after large income tax payments depressed disposable income in the second quarter.

● (1620)

> However, the personal savings rate jumped to 11.5 per cent in the third quarter from 9.6 per cent three months earlier.
> "Household spending behavior has become more cautious," Statscan said. "Increasingly, decisions about major purchases involving housing, automobiles and other durable goods are being deferred."

So that story gives you a good snapshot of the economic situation here in Canada. On the same page under this story there is a similar story from Washington that states that the U.S. government's economic forecasting gauge yesterday belatedly signalled the likelihood of a recession that most economists believe already has begun. Three consecutive declines in the U.S. Commerce Department index, and U.S. President, George Bush, at a news conference, confirmed the bad news and attributed at least part of the economic weakness to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait and the subsequent disruption of world oil prices.

That gives you a fairly good indication of the state of the recession and it updates statistics I gave when I was giving a speech, again, I believe, it must have been on Senator Waters' amendment, a week or so ago.

The one thing that is not referred to in those stories is the bankruptcy figures which have come out very recently. It is reported that 5,922 consumers and businesses declared bankruptcy last month, which is up by almost 61 per cent from October of 1989. Those figures showed a sharp increase in bankruptcies in the month of September and in the first ten months of this year the figures from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicate that 33,938 consumers—

Oh, hold the phone.

Senator Hastings: Order.

Senator Fairbairn: Would that be for you, Senator David?

Senator Hastings: Is the Prime Minister calling?

Senator Doyle: No, John Turner.

Senator Hastings: Hello, hello? Somebody answer the phone.

Senator Fairbairn: Just to restate, I was talking about in the first ten months of 1990, 33,938 consumers and 9407 businesses went bankrupt in Canada, which is a 40 per cent rise over the figures for the same period in 1989.

Another indicator is retail sales. A survey was released in October and, for instance, in British Columbia retail sales companies were asked for their attitude about the GST and the response indicated that 77 per cent of the retailers in that province expect sales to decrease after the 7 per cent GST is implemented. This is because of consumer perception of higher prices and also consumer resistance to the tax, and that fits in with some of the comments we have heard even on the question of civil disobedience.

The Ottawa Citizen, on the same day as the story I read from the Globe and Mail, printed the type of headline you would expect for a declaration of war, "The Recession is on". "The question is: how long will it last and how tough will it get?" I won't repeat the statistics because they are the same in this article as in the other one, however, there are some comments I would add to the record.

> "People are terrified of losing their jobs and their homes", said Michael Marzolini, president of pollsters Insight Canada Research Ltd. "The last recession left deep scars."
> The first to feel the pinch are the poor who were only just recovering from the last recession, said Lise Corbeil Vincent of the National Anti-Poverty Organization.
> "They lose their jobs first because they have the most fragile hold on employment."

Senator Kenny: Senator Fairbairn, would you entertain a question?

Senator Buckwold: If it is an entertaining question.

Senator Kenny: We know that the goods and services tax will slow economic growth and cost Canadians jobs. The Conference Board of Canada predicts that the Gross Domestic Product will fall by 5 per cent in 1991, that consumers' real disposable income will drop by 1.9 per cent below what it would have been but for the goods and services tax.

The Conference Board also predicts that the total employment in 1991 will be lowered by 72,000 jobs as a result of the new tax. These job losses are predicted to hit the service sector hardest because it is more labour intensive. I think these are the people you were talking about. In particular, the report predicts that the tourism industry will be devastated and, moreover, the board's predictions are based on the most optimistic set of assumptions possible, namely, that wages will not increase in 1991 in response to higher inflation, that the Bank of Canada will not raise interest rates, and that businesses will fully remove the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax before adding the 9 per cent goods and services tax.

I was wondering how you saw this tax affecting employment, and particularly tourism in the province of Alberta. As the chamber knows, Alberta is particularly dependent on tourism. Could you comment on that for us?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, perhaps just to make a couple of comments following on comments I made in response to Senator Stollery. Both he and Senator Kenny, who worked in the oil-related industry in Alberta, will know that certainly oil and gas is the backbone industry in that province, but also in recent years it has been a very volatile and fluctuating industry. Alberta in the last decade and a half has been very much looking to diversify its economy so that it will not be constantly based on the fluctuation in the price of oil or gas, which is often out of our hands, as it is today because of events in the Middle East and the situation in the Gulf.

As Senator Kenny will know, the tourist industry in the province of Alberta was particularly hit by VIA Rail cuts. As I said earlier, the glorious cross-country train that went through Banff and the Rockies to Vancouver is no more. That cut in itself affects all of the tourist industry in Alberta because that train drew so many people there, and to parts of Alberta where tourists would not normally go. That was last year. This year it is the GST. And the tourism industry in Alberta is absolutely beside itself. This has been an industry which has been on the rise and it is an economic challenge in an effort to fill that—I do not want to say "vacuum."

Senator Kenny: After the Olympics.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. It was also hoped that it would give some stability to the area. If we take care of our environment—which is a moot point in Alberta—we have one of the most glorious tourist areas in Canada in the Rocky Mountains. This has been seen as the stabilizing factor and the potential future for the economy of Alberta. This is one of the reasons that the government of Alberta is almost apoplectic about the tax and why it has taken the matter to court. They see this as a severe attack on the strength and viability of the tourist industry in that province.

In answer to your question, this is a major blow to that part of the country.

Senator Stollery: I have a supplementary question. This will have a devastating effect on the tourist business in Alberta which has already been hit so terribly by the cancellation of railway services. As I understand it, there has been an increasing number of Japanese tourists visiting Alberta, as well as tourists from the offshore. Has any consideration been given to a system of rebates. I know that Senator Buckwold will have this information.

Although the Alberta government does rely heavily on the petroleum and grain industry, I would imagine that in the future tourism would benefit the area of Jasper and Banff and would be a high employer of people. I know that other countries which have instituted high tax regimes often come up with some kind of a scheme so that when a foreign tourist buys a service he can receive a rebate. In some countries in Europe when a tourist buys something in a shop he will receive the tax back upon leaving the country. Of course, he has to fill out a form and surrender it to the customs authorities and so on.

Have there been any discussions between the federal government and the Alberta government about implementing some system to deal with this problem in Alberta? As we all know, Japanese tourism is an important source of foreign exchange in terms of Japanese currency. We sell Japan all of our natural resources such as timber, grain and sulphur but this is a way in which we actually have some real foreign exchange.

Has a system been devised or contemplated that would allow tourists to receive a rebate on GST paid when they leave the country?

Senator Fairbairn: I know of no discussions specifically with the Province of Alberta. Perhaps Senator Murray could help you on that score.

Senator Buckwold: Perhaps I might be allowed to indicate that the government has made some concessions in that regard.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Buckwold says the government has made some concessions.

Senator Buckwold: Perhaps I could be allowed to put the government's case.

Senator Frith: Make your statement in a form of a question.

Senator Buckwold: My question would be whether Senator Fairbairn is aware of the fact that the government has made a concession to the tourist industry. Tourists who spend the equivalent of $20 in tax on goods, not on hotel accommodation or on meals, but on the actual goods that are purchased, they can then fill out a form, as you would overseas in the United Kingdom, and receive a rebate. As long as the tourist has paid more than $20 in tax he will be rebated. However, that does not help insofar as the very major expenditures of the cost of hotel rooms and transportation are concerned.

Senator Fairbairn: I was not aware of those details and I thank Senator Buckwold for them.

I would like to return to some of the comments that were made following the statistics that came out at the end of last week which caused the headlines to indicate that the recession is now on in Canada. Mike McCracken, the President of Informetrica in Ottawa, in comments following the release of these statistics indicated that the outlook is pretty bleak. He said that we have the first signs of panic in both the business and consumer sectors. That is very worrisome. This is going to be a significant recession. Certainly the second worst since the war, said Ted Carmichael who is the Senior Economist with Burns, Fry.

To conclude some of those thoughts on the onslaught of the recession, I would just like to share with senators the words of Don McGillivray in his business column which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on Saturday, December 1. McGillivray writes:

> If Mike Wilson goes down for the count in this recession, I think I know what his last words will be: "It's not as bad as 1981-82."
> The finance minister said it again and again Friday . . .

That was Friday, November 30. The article goes on:

> . . . after the news from Statistics Canada that economic output had dropped for the second quarter in succession.
> "We are certainly not anything like 1981-82," Wilson told Opposition Leader Herb Gray. "We're not in the same type of recession as 1981-82," he told Steven Langdon of the New Democrats. And a minute or two later, he was saying again that the state of the economy is not "anything near what we were in 1981-82."
> This recession, so far, has lasted eight months. The 1981-82 recession lasted 18 months.

● (1640)

> If Wilson means the economic damage of eight months of this slump is not as great as that of a year and a half of recession last time, he's right.
> But neither he nor anyone else can tell what next year will bring. It was the third and fourth quarters of the 1981-82 recession that brought the sickening economic plunge.
> We'll know better how bad a recession it is in three months or six months.
>
> Some of the factors Wilson cites as ground for optimism are straws.
> Take, for example, his frequent assertion that "we went into 1981-82 with interest rates in excess of 21 per cent. This time the peak in the interest rate was 14 per cent.

Senator Corbin: Senator Fairbairn, will you permit a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Corbin: Since you are touching on the subject of interest rates, I would like to know your views on the matter as they relate to interest rates and credit card costs.

We have received today in our offices a December report which says that Canadian consumers spent over $381 billion on goods and services in 1989. Imagine the repercussion of that amount in terms of the GST.

The press release also says that many Canadian consumers used their credit cards to make these purchases. Studies show, however, that only half of these consumers usually pay off their credit card balances in full each month.

Earlier today, after I had shovelled out my driveway, I looked at the local newspaper and read some comments pertaining to the GST. These columns are written for the so-called benefit of the people out there who do not know too much about the GST and the provisions of the bill. These columns tend to facilitate the understanding of the impact of the GST on the average person.

One of the points that I picked out is that there would be no GST on credit card transactions. Nevertheless, there is an impact in terms of consumer costs in the use of credit cards. You would certainly be aware that Master Card, which is used by the Bank of Montreal, Banque National, Canada Trust, Supercharge, Coopérative du Crédit du Service Civil, Niagara Credit Union, Shell, Royal Trust and Vision, has interest rates on an annual basis that range from 21.5 per cent for the Bank of Montreal; Shell, Royal Trust, and Vision have 22.5 per cent annual interest charge down to 19.25 per cent for Niagara Credit Union.

Visa has comparable interest rate charges. They are in the same bracket, but they do not go as low as some of the Master Card syndicated users. Visa is used by Bank of Nova Scotia, Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Central Guarantee, Centre Desjardins, Laurentian Bank, Montreal Trust, Royal Bank, Toronto Dominion Bank and Vancouver City Savings.

Those interest rates in the bracket of 19.25 per cent up to 21.75 per cent are considered to be moderate. However, the true consumer credit card, that issued by Canadian Tire, for example, charges an interest rate of 28.8 per cent annually. Eaton charges 28.8 per cent; Home Hardware charges 28.8 per cent; Hudson's Bay charges 28.8 per cent; PetroCanada 24 per cent; Sears charges 28.8 per cent; Simpsons charges 28.8 per cent; Ultramar charges 24 per cent.

Senator Simard: Question!

Senator Corbin: Woodwards charges 26.4 per cent; Zeller's charges 28.8 per cent.

Another category of credit cards is charge cards that have an even higher interest rate. American Express, besides having an annual fee of $55 per card, has what they call a late penalty rate of 30 per cent annually. Diner's Club, which also has an annual fee of $55, has a 24 per cent late penalty rate.

I will stop there. I could go on, but every honourable senator could study this in the peace and quiet of his or her office.

Senator Simard: Question!

Senator Corbin: The question was put at the beginning of this recitation, in case some honourable senators were not in the chamber when I began the question which I am now pursuing.

The government of the day has decided that there will be no GST on credit card transactions. Do you know why that is so? Referring again to those columns I was reading earlier today, in some cases officials in the either the Department of Finance or Department of Revenue say that the administration of the GST on credit cards or charge cards would be too complicated and, therefore, they did not think they should bother with it.

Nevertheless, the immorality of the high interest charges on credit cards is an issue in itself. I should like to put that in the earlier context of what this does to the tourist trade.

I do not think I would ever break Senator Simard's record for interrupting other speakers, so I will just ignore him.

Senator Simard: You would think the preamble would come before the question, not after it.

● (1650)

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, you know that Senator Doody, Senator Phillips and Senator Murray told every one of you to keep quiet and not to interject, heckle or ask questions. You can do what some of your colleagues were doing earlier in the sitting—that is, go play cards in the corner—but please leave me alone.

Senator Simard: I was playing cards, too.

Senator Fairbairn: Is that what you were doing?

Senator Poitras: They told you to ask questions.

Senator Corbin: I never needed a hint by anyone over there in terms of doing my duty as a senator—never. I do not intend to solicit any hints today, or ever. I am a senator of many years of experience and I will continue doing what I think I do best on behalf of the people of New Brunswick, whom I happen to represent.

Senator Simard: Isn't there a rule, though, Mr. Speaker, that says one senator is allowed to speak once?

Senator Corbin: You do not talk to the Speaker.

Senator Simard: I will address it to my colleagues.

Senator Corbin: Senator Fairbairn, as I was saying—

Senator Simard: There is a rule that unless it is a question—

Senator Corbin: As I was saying, because Senator Simard has not been recognized by his party to have the floor—

Senator Simard: —until he has made his speech.

Senator Corbin: I will relate my comments to the concerns that you expressed earlier in terms of the tourist trade.

Most tourists use a credit card when they travel. I certainly do. I do not want to have too much cash on me. I have cash plus a credit card, which will carry me over if I ever run short of cash.

In any case, the GST will already be charged on your credit card purchases. That can tally up to quite a substantial number of dollars when you travel, because you will be paying the GST on your hotel, on telephone calls made from your hotel room, on meals, on your air ticket, your bus ticket, and a number of other things. I do not suppose that senators will be charged the GST when they use their railway pass, but there are few opportunities now for senators and members of the House of Commons to use their railway passes since that government over there discontinued much of the passenger service in this country. It really does not count for much any more.

I should like to have your views—since you were talking about the negative impact of high interest rates—on these grossly higher, unfair and immoral credit card and charge card rates. Please tell us in your view why the government decided not to charge the GST. Would it be, for example, that they did not want to interfere with the high interest rate charge on credit cards? That is one way for the government to keep the dog at bay, namely, by not adding to the concerns of those big companies the additional annoyance of a GST on credit card transactions. I realize that this is a circumvoluted question, but I made it plain talk so that simple-minded senators on the other side of the house would understand what it is all about. Please forgive me for taking so long to put the question.

Senator Fairbairn: Not at all, Senator Corbin.

Senator Lefebvre: The background is important.

Senator Fairbairn: I have not had an opportunity to read that release, but I share your concerns on the rates of interest that are charged. One can only speculate that, as you have indicated, the government itself said that it would not levy the tax on these charges because of the complicated factors involved.

I must take you into my confidence, Senator Corbin, and tell you that, given my Scottish background, I take a very dim view of credit cards. In fact, probably if I had my way, I would keep my money in a sock. I myself never had a credit card until I became a senator and discovered that, travelling as much as one does back and forth, it is quite difficult and very unwise to keep that amount of cash in your pocket.

Senator Corbin: Would that be because senators are required to travel on days when banks are closed, for example, on weekends and Sundays? In other words, that is the nature of our work. Therefore, a credit card comes in handy at such times. Would that be one of the major factors?

Senator Fairbairn: Absolutely. We have become so trapped by the credit card mentality in North America, and probably elsewhere, that your credit card is almost your open sesame wherever you go. It becomes an essential tool of transaction and travel.

One of the reasons why I have a dim view of the credit card mentality is that I have seen a number of people who I know very well, who in all other ways are intelligent, responsible people, who go off the track in their use of credit cards. With interest rates such as they are on credit cards, very well-meaning people can swiftly find themselves in extremely difficult situations and overwhelming debt situations by using that tiny square of plastic to buy them a way of life that they are not able to afford.

If you are looking for some kind of enthusiastic response from me on that question, I find that in a basic way perhaps it is necessary in the economic society that we live in today. It is certainly fraught with a great deal of difficulty, particularly for people who are just on the edge and use the credit card as a means to live the kind of life that they would like to live. The only way that you can get out of it ultimately is, perhaps, by death. But sooner or later you have to pay. Personally, I find it a dangerous and unsettling part of our economy in North America. I may be in a great minority and I may be old fashioned, or whatever—

Senator Corbin: No. You are not old fashioned; you are avant-garde.

Senator Fairbairn: In that sense I think it is a potentially destabilizing influence within our society.

I should like to carry on with the subject of interest rates by reading this column by Don McGillivray. Don, as you know, is definitely—

• (1700)

Senator Simard: Liberal!

Senator Fairbairn: No, Senator Simard. He calls them as he sees them.

Senator Simard: He sees a Liberal all the time.

Senator Fairbairn: No, no!

Senator Simard: We know that.

Senator Fairbairn: You have not followed him for as long as I have followed him. We bear as many arrows from Don—

Senator Simard: He is consistent.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, he is. We bear as many arrows and scars from Mr. McGillivray as you do.

Senator Simard: He is a Liberal—

Senator Fairbairn: He may be critical of the current government, but he is certainly not consistently Liberal. He is consistently critical of government.

At any rate, on the subject of interest rates, he has talked about Finance Minister Michael Wilson hanging his hat on the fact that this recession is not as bad as the recession of 1981-82. Mr. McGillivray points out in his article that we have only been through eight months of this recession while the other one went on for 18 months. He states that the latter part of the last one was the really punitive part for the people of Canada.

Speaking of interest rates he states:

> Wilson knows that it's the real interest rate, not the nominal interest rate that is the killer. Real rates are calculated by subtracting inflation from the nominal rate. In 1981, the real rate was at an economy smashing level of about eight per cent. This year, it has been about nine per cent.
> There's no guarantee there that this will be a milder recession.
> Wilson often claims interest rates have been reduced by close to two percentage points from the peak of 14 per cent in May. Actually it's more like one and a half percentage points. The prime lending rate at the banks is 13.25 now compared to 14.75 in May.

Senator Balfour: How about 21 per cent?

Senator Fairbairn: He is going to get to that, I am sure.

> But even if the drop were two points, it would be much less than the reduction in lending rates in the early part of the 1981-82 recession.
> We had a tight-fisted Scrooge of a central bank governor then in the person of Gerald Bouey. But Bouey was not quite as fanatical about high interest rates as John Crow is.
> In the first eight months of the 1981-82 recession, the bank rate came down by more than five percentage points from its peak. And the prime rate at the commercial banks dropped more than six percentage points.
> Bouey, in other words, did three times as much to cure that recession as Crow has done in the same stage of this.

Another scary thing about this recession is that the man who is about to send inflation climbing with his goods and services tax is the same Michael Wilson who says interest rates will be further reduced only "if we are confident we can keep our inflationary pressures under control."

Statistics Canada's new numbers suggested that Wilson's own spending is not exactly under control.

It's starting to climb as a proportion of the gross domestic product, which means that we can expect the finance minister to quit citing how well he's doing in restraining spending as a percentage of the GDP.

In the third quarter of 1990, federal spending amounted to about 18.1 per cent of the GDP. That's higher than it has been since 1986. Other levels of government are holding their spending steady as a percentage of GDP or even reducing it a bit. So the bulge in federal spending is the main reason total spending by all governments is up.

In the latest quarter, it was 44.6 per cent of GDP compared to 44.1 per cent in 1988. An increase of half a percentage point may not seem much. But it's $6.8 billion or more than $250 of extra spending for every Canadian.

You ain't seen nothin' yet.

That is an article by Don McGillivray from the business pages of the Ottawa Citizen of last Friday.

Senator David: Is the interest on the debt comprised in those spending figures?

Senator Fairbairn: That is not stated in the article, Senator David.

Senator Simard: Don't ask a loaded question.

Senator Fairbairn: Don't ask me to fathom Don McGillivray's mind.

Senator Balfour: I thought you were going to deal with 21 per cent.

Senator Fairbairn: I was hoping that Don would.

Senator Davey: It is not 21, it is 14.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, from those statistics on the weekend—

Senator Davey: I must apologize to Senator Balfour. I thought he was talking about the Prime Minister's standing in the polls. Senator Fairbairn was talking about the interest rate.

Senator Lefebvre: The Prime Minister is at 12 per cent.

Senator Fairbairn: At any rate, getting back to the GST and the government's policies on it and looking at the type of statistics that have come not from Mr. McGillivray but from Statistics Canada, it is clear that this is a government that cannot be swayed by reason, by Statistics Canada or by the very real evidence that its economic policies are in part helping to destroy the economic stability of the country rather than to fix it. I believe this is a government that is so hidebound by its own ideology and that it is so convinced of the rightness of its position that anyone who dares to question its conclusions is branded as knowing nothing.

It appears that Canadians are incapable of understanding the fine points of the GST. One of the most infuriating aspects of the debate over the new tax has been the way the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have refused repeatedly to pay any attention to what the people of this country are saying about the tax.

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Fairbairn, would you entertain a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Lefebvre: As a long-time journalist and a follower of polls perhaps you could help me out, since I am not an expert on these matters. In the by-election that was held in Sainte-Marie the Tories received 8 per cent of the vote. In the by-election held in Oshawa they received 4 per cent of the vote. In Beauséjour they do not even have a candidate. So that amounts to zero, using new math. Is that how the Conservatives add up to 12 per cent nationally?

Senator Fairbairn: That is a very difficult question to answer.

Senator Hastings: They are now called the other party.

Senator Fairbairn: I understand that in Senator Hastings' province and mine they are at 3 per cent.

• (1710)

Senator Hastings: They are listed under "others".

Senator Fairbairn: As a matter of fact, Senator Lefebvre, as I move relentlessly along, I have a section in my remarks that is devoted to a kind of survey of the latest polls and statistics.

Senator Lefebvre: I am looking forward to it.

Senator Fairbairn: I will get to that a little later if you are still here.

Senator Lefebvre: Around midnight? I want to be here.

Senator Hastings: February the 4th.

Senator Fairbairn: As I was saying—which prompted Senator Lefebvre's intervention—the government really dismisses criticism, any criticism, by saying that no one likes taxes, so the millions of complaints that Canadians have about the GST are not really valid, only the experts can comment.

Senator Corbin: We don't mind paying taxes, but we would like something in return.

Senator Fairbairn: It is like an architect saying that everyone always complains when my building falls down, but what do they know, they are not architects. It is that kind of mentality.

Senator Corbin: And it matters.

Senator Fairbairn: It does matter what people say because it is the people who are going to be paying the new 7 per cent tax on everything. They are the experts. They know exactly what this tax will mean to them and their pocketbooks. As I said earlier, this is not a minor sort of attack on smokers or drinkers.

Senator David: Attack is right.

Senator Frith: And other sinners.

Senator Fairbairn: Now, Senator David, you of all people should be thinking about this tax and thinking about quitting smoking.

Senator David: No, I am talking to the government.

Senator Fairbairn: You have to set an example to others, particularly Senator Barootes. This is not just a tax on smokers or drinkers, and it is not just a one-cent adjustment on the price of gas for drivers. It is not just another attempt to take away from old age pensioners their inflation protection. This tax is all pervasive and, as I said at the very beginning, it is gargantuan. It is $20 billion per year. That is a lot of money which we will all have a lot less of if this tax goes through.

One does not have to be an architect to know that a lot of Canadian households are going to be very strained. Some of them may collapse under the weight of the accumulation of this tax on top of everything else they are paying. You do not have to be an expert in economics to know that bringing in this tax, particularly during the early part of a recession, is a form of madness.

Let us look at the history of how this tax came to be, and I do not believe anyone would really call this a proud history or a noble one. It is little more than a form of deception on the part of the Minister of Finance and the government. Shortly after the 1984 election, the government undertook what it claimed to be the most extensive tax reform since Confederation. This is something that new Ministers of Finance often do. I can remember Mr. Benson was conducting the biggest tax reform since confederation—

Senator Corbin: That was a real one.

Senator Fairbairn: —and there were probably a lot more Ministers of Finance as well. His was not the biggest tax reform. The interesting part about all those other tax reforms, which indeed caused in their own way—

Senator Corbin: What about John Crosbie's reform in 1979?

Senator Fairbairn: It was so brief it is hard to remember.

Senator Hastings: They have all been defeated at the next election, haven't they?

Senator Fairbairn: One thing that is noteworthy about the tax reforms in the past is that they, too, prompted an outcry of sorts from the public—nothing in comparison to this one—and they were changed, all of them were changed. They were adjusted. The government compromised and they were changed. The government responded to what it heard from the same kinds of Canadians all of us have been hearing from.

Senator Corbin: Except that the 1979 reform was made by the people.

Senator Fairbairn: Well, as I said, that was such a brief span that it is hard to remember, although I do remember very well the details of December 13, 1979. In any event, at the beginning we all heard from the current Minister of Finance as to how he and his colleagues were going to radically alter the tax system to make it better, fairer and simpler for all of us. I think all Canadians were given the impression that tax reform would mean less taxes for those who could not afford them and more taxes for those who could.

We were led to believe also that the Minister of Finance and his band of reformers were going to go through thousands and thousands of tax exemptions for business and for the rich and slice those exemptions down to a very few. We were all led to believe that the inequities in the system, which discriminated against those who live in the regions and those on low and fixed incomes, were going to be eliminated, and we were all led to believe that we would soon be entering a whole new age of fair taxation.

Under the current government of Mr. Mulroney, which we have come to know so well, it is not what the government says it will do, it is what the government actually does that is important to the country. What has it done? Senators may recall that one of the very first acts of this government was to attempt to withdraw inflation protection from the pension cheques of elderly Canadians.

Senator Frith: It is not only what you do, but it is what you try to do.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators will remember as well the incredible public outrage in response to, in my view, a totally unjustified attempt to take from the elderly. I guess that unwarranted attack on the elderly marked really the last time in the history of this government, given the fight that was put up by the seniors, that the views of Canadians were actually accepted by the government, for whatever reason, and I think some would say there might just have been a cynical political reason that the government reversed itself on this tax. In fact, we witnessed some of the most colourful and passionate demonstrations on Parliament Hill by seniors and others who were opposed to this tax. Who will never forget the words of that one little protester who said to the Prime Minister, "Before the election you promised us everything, then, right after the election, it was bye, bye, Charlie Brown."

• (1720)

Senator Frith: "You lied to us, Prime Minister."

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, that is right. The government very wisely backed down from that attempt. The very attempt gave us a very clear signal about where the government wanted to go in terms of taxation and of the kind of society that they wanted to build in this country. That first attempt at a raid on the pension cheques of the elderly failed; but the government later on was able to do by the back door what they were not able to do by the front door, and that was to bring in the clawback provision which has just been passed by the Senate with the help again of the newly appointed eight extra Conservative senators.

As honourable senators will know, we, on this side, did not support the clawback. In fact, I, personally, received as much mail on the clawback legislation alone as I did on the GST, and I received a heck of a lot of mail on the GST.

Part of this was that the clawback is a reflection of the kind of mode government policy is moving into. The clawback is an outright attack on the universality of social programs which have been hard fought for and hard won on behalf of the less advantaged in this country and particularly, in this case, the elderly people of Canada who contributed from the earliest days to what they believed in the end would be a full pension cheque.

The government's clearly right-wing agenda for change also included a whole slew of other changes to this tax system. All of these were designed to take money out of the hands of low- and middle-income Canadians and to put money into the hands of the wealthy and big business. It is, honourable senators, the old trickle-down theory of Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher and the argument goes something like this: If rich people and big business are given the room to grow, it will eventually trickle down; it will trickle down to the low- and the middle-income groups in our society and make them better off. The theory it leaves out, of course, is that it is not big business and it is not the rich who create jobs and opportunities in this country. It is the small business sector and middle-income entrepreneurs who are the job creators and the generators of wealth in our Canadian society. Instead of helping to lighten the burden on low- and middle-income Canadians, the government has done nothing but add to the burden on those sectors.

Honourable senators, I mentioned earlier the tax increases which have been brought in by this government for individuals since 1984. I will just drift through them here for a few minutes. This is a chart of major tax increases for individuals introduced by the Conservative government from 1984 to 1989. The first part of this is indirect taxes, sales and excise taxes. The increase in the federal sales tax was from 9 per cent to 10 per cent in October of 1984; from 10 per cent to 11 per cent in January of 1986; from 11 per cent to 12 per cent in April of 1986; and from 12 to 13.5 per cent in April of 1989. There has been a steady and relentless increase in the federal sales tax which I would say bodes ill for the future of the GST if it shoudl ever come into effect.

There was then the extension of the federal sales tax to new items. In July of 1985 it was extended to candies, soft drinks and pet food. In July of 1987 it was extended to snack foods, which a number of our young people almost survive on, and in January of 1988 a 10 per cent federal sales tax was introduced on long distance telephone calls and cable services. Then, in June of 1989 that sales tax for long distance calls and cable services was increased again from 10 per cent to 11 per cent. Then, in January of 1988 there was an increase in the federal sales tax from 8 per cent to 12 per cent on paint, wallpaper, toys and handicrafts.

There were repeated increases in federal sales and excise taxes on gasoline. It was increased by two cents a litre in September of 1985; one cent a litre in January of 1987 and one cent a litre again in February of 1987. There was an increase in federal sales tax on leaded gasoline to equal the sales tax on unleaded gasoline in April of 1987. Honourable senators, on it went, one cent a litre in April of 1988; one cent a litre in April, 1989; one cent a litre on unleaded gas in April, 1989; and one cent a litre in January of 1990. That has been the increase in federal sales and excise taxes on gasoline.

Senator Stollery: Since when have these increases come into effect?

Senator Fairbairn: These major tax increases, which are indirect tax increases on the sales and excise tax have occurred between 1984 to 1989. The ones you were asking about just now on gasoline took place from 1985 to last January.

Again, in respect of indirect taxes, there has been an increase in federal sales tax on alcohol and tobacco. The first increase was in May of 1985; the second one in February of 1986; the third one in February of 1987; the fourth one in January of 1980; and the fifth one in April of 1989.

In direct taxes, income taxes, we have the following statistics: First is the elimination of the Registered Homeowners Savings Program in May of 1989. Then there is the elimination of federal tax reductions for low-income Canadians in January of 1986. Then there was the de-indexation of the personal income tax system, family allowances and tax credits in January of 1986. There was then the temporary 5 per cent and 10 per cent surtaxes on personal income from July, 1985 to December, 1986. Then there was the permanent general 3 per cent surtax on all personal income taxes in July of 1986.

Changes to the marital exemption occurred in January of 1986. The increase in general surtax from 3 per cent to 5 per cent on all personal income taxes occurred in July of 1989. There was a surtax of 8 per cent for high-income Canadians imposed in July of 1989. The clawback of old age security pensions and family allowances occurred in April of 1989. There has been a steady march upwards from 1984 in both the indirect and direct taxes by this government.

The impact of these new taxes on average Canadians has been, in some cases, incredible. When you add them up and include the potential GST, a family with two children in which both parents work and earn a total of $45,000 will have seen their taxes increased by over $3,400 between 1984 and 1991. That is an incredible amount for a family with two children. That is definitely living on the edge.

In the last few years, I think it is safe to say that under this government it has cost much more to live in this country. But Lord help you if you dare say to the government that this kind of thing is not the right economic policy to be pursuing at this time or, in fact, at any time. Once again, the government is not interested in listening to what the people of this country are saying. They are not interested in discussion or debate. It is, as it has been with a number of issues, including Meech Lake, "my way" or "the door way".

One has to reflect that if there had been some kind of effort at accommodation on these issues, the Canadian people might have been farther ahead. Quite frankly, the Conservative government would have been much farther ahead instead of being down at 14 per cent in the polls at the moment.

Over the last several weeks many of us have had cause to reflect on the extraordinary events which have taken place in this chamber against the backdrop of the wave of democracy which has flooded across Eastern Europe, washing away decades of closed dictatorships. Whole systems collapsed because their governments refused to take into account the voices of their own people. We have prided ourselves on the strength of our democracy and its institutions, which are supposed to represent the voice of Canadians. Yet, who is listening to that voice? Is our Prime Minister listening? Is the Minister of Finance listening? Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate listening? Are they listening to the people who gave them the reins of power? Are they hearing the advice and the appeals for change?

After all, honourable senators, there is nothing sinister about compromise. This is a country so vast in distance and so different in climate, geography, resources and culture that it never would have survived as a country without compromise by successive leaders. Compromise is not a sign of weakness. It is a sign of strength in Canada. But today's leadership rejects the word.

Senator Simard: Words, words, words!

Senator Fairbairn: Compromise, I suggest, Senator Simard, is far more than a word. It is the kind of glue and foresight that has kept this country together. As I say, it is not a sign of weakness in Canada; it is a sign of strength. But people in this government simply dismiss any criticism of the new tax by saying that we, the people, do not understand it and that if we did we would be all for it.

Unfortunately for the Prime Minister and for the Minister of Finance, we do live in a democracy. Their tactics in the House of Commons and in the Senate notwithstanding, the people of Canada do understand this tax. They understand it perhaps better, in a sense, than the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance because they will live with it in everything they do. They certainly understand it better, I would suggest, than many of the senators opposite in this house.

The government is now paying a price for having misled Canadians from the beginning about what this tax really was all about. There has been much talk about the claim by the government that the GST was a major issue in the 1988 election campaign and, therefore, they have a clear mandate from the people to move ahead on it. Some people, myself included, who travelled a great deal across the country during that campaign certainly say that this was not a major issue in those seven weeks.

I would like to bolster that comment by reading an article that was written by Linda McQuaig. She was the author of Behind Closed Doors: How the Rich Won Control of Canada's Tax System, which is an excellent book. She is a former reporter with the Globe and Mail. Her column, which appeared in the Globe and Mail, on October 17, 1990 is entitled "Keeping the public in the dark." It says:

> One of the most misleading statements coming out of Ottawa these days is the contention of Brian Mulroney's government that the goods and services tax was part of its 1988 election platform.
> The government is advancing this theory now, of course, in an effort to suggest that it was elected with a mandate to impose the GST. Even if the electorate is now overwhelmingly opposed to it, the theory goes, the public elected the government knowing full well of—even presumably endorsing—the GST.
> This is a considerable distortion of what happened. It is true that the government had indicated in vague terms in its 1987 tax-reform documents its intentions to replace the Manufacturers Sales Tax with a new sales tax. But the government went mum on the subject during the 1988 campaign. This silence was with good reason.

• (1740)

> The new tax was going to benefit only a small segment of the population—primarily manufacturers, who had long disliked the existing sales tax and would enjoy a much lighter burden under the GST. Indeed, some $4 billion of the sales tax burden was to be transferred from the corporate sector to the household sector.
> So the government saw no particular advantage in mentioning the new tax to the general public during the election campaign. It was bound to raise suspicions that the tax would be used to soak additional revenues out of the public for the ongoing war against the deficit.
> For the Tories there was no advantage in turning the GST into an election issue. Everybody who would like the new tax—manufacturers, business economists, tax experts—already knew about it. The rest were better kept in the dark.
> So the government was set to let the issue slumber throughout the campaign, even though the GST was a central part of the Tory plan for its second term and all was in readiness to set the wheels for the new tax in motion as soon as the votes were counted. Everything was going according to plan when Don Blenkarn stumbled on to the scene.
> Mr. Blenkarn, the feisty Conservative chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee, was scheduled in the early days of the election campaign to make what promised to be one of its dullest appearances. He was to address a tax conference at Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto. The event actually had nothing to do with the election, having been booked months earlier.
> In the course of the day-long session, Mr. Blenkarn told the audience of economists and tax experts that the government planned to collect billions in additional revenues through the GST.

This evoked little interest: The tax specialists in the audience already knew it. But when Mr. Blenkarn's comments about the additional revenue raising potential of the new tax were reported the next day on the front page of the Globe and Mail, the cat was out of the bag. The increase that only experts were supposed to know about was now in the hands of the electorate—a dangerous place indeed. So how did the government react? If it is true, as the Tories now maintain, that the government had "campaigned" on the GST, surely its response would have been to say, "Yes, Mr. Blenkarn is right, the new tax will raise considerable extra revenue and this is necessary for deficit reduction." They would have said then what they are saying now.

But both Prime Minister Mulroney and Finance Minister Michael Wilson were quick to deny the accuracy of Mr. Blenkarn's comments, insisting that he did not speak for the government.

As the issue percolated over the next few days—Ontario Treasurer Robert Nixon piped in with comments about how Ontarians would find themselves paying a lot more sales tax—the government repeatedly denied that the new tax would raise any additional revenue.

Mr. Wilson insisted that it would be "revenue-neutral"—that is, would not raise additional money. It was not a vehicle for deficit reduction. With the government's assurances, the issue died.

Since the election, Mr. Wilson has been more frank. On CBC's Morningside radio program last month, he told host Peter Gzowski that the GST would raise additional revenues for deficit reduction.

"But I thought it was revenue-neutral?" Mr. Gzowski said. Mr. Wilson replied: "Well, no, it helps us get the deficit down." So much for honesty on the election trail.

The government now argues with ferocity that the GST is really the only option for reducing the deficit—choosing to ignore other fairer options, such as a detailed proposal developed by Osgoode Hall tax professor Neil Brooks to abolish regressive sales taxes altogether and raise the lost revenue through modest increases in the income tax. This option, which the government has refused even to consider, would save Canadians hundreds of millions in administrative costs alone.

The Tories now concentrate their fury on the evils of an unelected Senate, insisting that the shenanigans in the upper chamber are blocking the will of Canadians to have the GST put in place. But Canadians never endorsed the GST—not now and not during the election campaign.

Is the Senate really blocking the will of the people, as the government suggests, or simply blocking the will of the government, on an issue where the government was less than honest at the one time when Canadians were in a position to register their opposition?

Could it be that the Conservatives don't trust an informed Canadian public to make the right decisions, that they believe the only way to put their policies in place is sometimes to circumvent the will of the people? Are the antics in the upper chamber the real threat to democracy?

That concludes the column written by Linda McQuaig.

Senator Davey: I have a couple of questions arising from the article that you read, which is a fascinating article. I suppose the article explains why Mr. Blenkarn has never been in the cabinet.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes; exactly.

Senator Davey: He has been around here a long time. In fact, I have known him a long time. I have been with him on endless airplanes. He is a charming and smart man. I have always wondered why someone of that stature—and I think he has a great deal of financial knowhow—has never been in the cabinet.

Senator Fairbairn: He is too forthright.

Senator Davey: The question I want to ask you concerns our friends opposite and their attitude towards the GST.

The GST is enormously unpopular everywhere, anywhere you go. Yesterday afternoon I was stuck in a snow storm on St. Clair Avenue in Toronto. I was driving along in a lower income retail area. To my astonishment there was a grey sign which said: "No to the GST." It was a fairly large sign. It was not put up by the Liberal Party, or by us, or by any of our friends, but it was there. It was in every store window along both sides of St. Clair Avenue. To me that is a measure of how unhappy Canadians are with the GST.

I have listened to you a great deal today and have learned a great deal. These people do not care that the GST is so unpopular. My question to you is: Is it that they don't care, or is it perhaps that they do not know? Could you express an opinion on that?

Senator Fairbairn: Well, Senator Davey, I would not even attempt to try to speak for any one of the senators opposite. I just cannot believe that not only the feeling of the Canadian public but the reasons behind their feeling is not clearly known to each and every one of us in this chamber and in the other chamber. It has been articulated in continually growing anxiety and, now, real anger for over one year. It has been reported in every facet of the media over and over again. Every poll indicates that opposition among the public of Canada from coast to coast to coast ranges between 75 per cent and 85 per cent. None of the enormous efforts at so-called "selling the tax" has moved that opposition.

One of the reasons is that this is an issue that the public themselves not only understand but believe. They tell me, as I am sure they tell everyone in this chamber, that they believe they are the experts on this tax, especially in terms of how it will affect them. How it affects them ultimately has to say a great deal about how it affects the country.

We have received many thousands of petitions on the matter. In one way or another we have received petitions from probably millions of Canadians. We have tried to reflect upon some of them in this house. Yet, there are millions that were not presented to this house. I cannot believe that there is not one member on the government side of this chamber who did not receive any petitions at all, any phone calls, any letters or any representations from any groups.

Having said that, I cannot believe that each of us does not understand the public feeling toward this tax, along with the strength of that feeling and its consistency. I can only conclude that in this, as in other measures, in recent years there is a feeling that one courts the public before and during an election campaign and, once a secure majority government is obtained, the public becomes insignificant in the establishment of government priorities and government policies. It is extraordinary. It makes our democracy pretty hollow when you have this many people consistently and strongly urging change.

It is true that people would like the tax to come out in another way, a way yet to be explored. There are alternatives which I will get to later. However, Canadians are asking for change. They are asking for amendments. They are asking for compromise. They are asking for reassurance. What they get is this: "We won a majority and you can turf us out if you don't like what we do in four or five years". Others have said that this is a tyranny of democracy. That is a very apt description of the situation. There is no way that all of us can remain either untouched by, truly indifferent to, or ignorant of the feelings of Canadians on this tax.

Senator Davey: So the public knows that the government does not care.

Senator Fairbairn: That is right. As usual, Senator Davey, you simplify matters greatly.

I am glad that you asked me the question that you did, since I was just getting into the whole area of how not only the government has not been forthright with Canadians on this issue but how it has treated them like children. They have been treated as if they do not need to know, or as if they only need to know one way and nothing that is contrary to that way. One does not have to be an economist or an accountant to figure out that shifting $20 billion worth of taxes off corporations and on to the backs of consumers will mean an increased tax burden for individual Canadians. That is pretty simple. Because Canadians were expecting fair taxation it took them a while to come to the realization that this tax was going to hit them, and hit them very hard.

The reason it took that extra time is that the government deliberately told us all a completely different story about what the tax was all about. We should take a look at what the story was at first.

When the Minister of Finance first talked about the idea of this tax he talked about it as being revenue neutral. A great many Canadians on hearing that thought that what he meant was that there would be no change. The Minister of Finance did nothing to explain to Canadians that his concept of revenue neutral meant revenue neutral only to him. He meant to say that as far as the books of the Government of Canada are concerned, there would be the same amount of money coming in with the new tax as there was with the old. That statement was and is totally wrong for three reasons.

The first reason is that the minister's last budget states that the tax will be used to reduce the deficit. If it is to be used to reduce the deficit, then it is raising more money than the old tax, not the same amount of money as the old tax. The budget even included figures which showed that the new tax would bring in approximately $2 billion more than the old tax, after rebates are taken into consideration. The minister's revenue neutral claim applied only to the federal government and not to individual Canadians. What he did not want to tell us is that it applied to a whole range of new products and all services, products and services that are currently not taxed at all. Therefore, it is far from revenue neutral for individual Canadians. It will cost everyone a lot more every time they open their wallet or write a cheque or use their credit card.

The Minister of Finance made the claim that his new tax would not cost more than the old tax, even as he was raising the old tax. He raised it from 9 per cent in 1984 to 13.5 per cent today. The question is, revenue neutral at what? Nine per cent, 10 per cent, 11 per cent, 12 per cent, 13.5 per cent? Honourable senators on the government side do not have to take my word for that. We also have it directly from Senator Finlay MacDonald. I mentioned before this passage in the testimony that was taken in Whitehorse while the Senate committee was there.

Senator Frith: We would all like to hear it again.

Senator Fairbairn: It was so clear and so open and so honest.

Senator Frith: So beguiling.

Senator Fairbairn: There is no guile involved.

Senator Frith: Beguiling.

Senator Fairbairn: Beguiling all right. It is so absolutely crystal clear from Senator Finlay MacDonald, who is a great communicator, that I thought I would just go over his thoughts again to get the whole question of revenue neutral in a nutshell and to put it aside, perhaps, for all time.

Senator Simard: Why don't you just conclude?

Senator Fairbairn: I just have so much more to say, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Just conclude.

Senator Fairbairn: No, no, I have lots more I want to say. I know you want to hear what Senator MacDonald said in Whitehorse because you may have missed it when I read it before.

Senator Simard: We don't miss anything.

Senator Fairbairn: I will bet you were there. You were there hanging on to his every word, Senator Doody, and this will be music to your ears, to hear these articulate words again from Senator MacDonald. He said:

> I do not think we should be conning the witnesses or the people who are here to hear us. It was said a second ago that it has been admitted that this tax is not intended to reduce the deficit.
> I will admit it. I admit it as one member of this committee. With all due respect to my leader, I admit that this is the most screwed-up thing that the Government of Canada, my government, has done.

That is pretty clear.

Senator Frith: But he is never here when that is referred to. It's bad luck, I guess.

Senator Fairbairn: He hasn't been here before, but I will mention it to him. Senator Finlay MacDonald went on to say:

> The government has come out with revenue neutrality and they try to explain what it is. They do so after talking about laying this big burden on our grandchildren. They go through all of this performance. Then they say it is revenue neutral. They say it will help reduce the deficit. Well, how in the name of God can it help reduce the deficit if it is to be revenue neutral?
> I said yesterday that I did not think this was misrepresentation on the part of the government. It was just a dumb mistake in communications. They didn't know what on earth they were doing . . . Everyone knows that this tax will be a windfall, and that it is intended to get at the deficit. Therefore let us be done with these gags between ourselves about "revenue neutral" and such things as that.

An Hon. Senator: Good for Finlay.

Senator Fairbairn: Well, it was good for Finlay, but it is a troubling thing, what he said, because this has been an important question all along with the goods and services tax. It is the question of revenue neutral or deficit reduction. The troubling thing Senator MacDonald said was that he did not think this was misrepresentation on the part of the government, it was just a "dumb mistake in communications," that they didn't know "what on earth they were doing."

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Simard: What are you trying to prove?

Senator Fairbairn: What I am trying to prove is through the words of Senator Finlay MacDonald, that it is not hard to go one step further and say that the government made a dumb mistake with the GST and did not know what on earth it was doing.

Senator Simard: No, what you miss, Senator Fairbairn, with Senator MacDonald, you have to be able to read between the lines.

Senator Fairbairn: I just did. I was reading between the lines. I know Senator MacDonald.

Senator Frith: And what is between the lines is plain space.

Senator Simard: I asked Senator Fairbairn the question, not you.

Senator Fairbairn: I have known Senator MacDonald, I am happy to say, for a great many years and I think his comments were very profound.

Senator Simard: You don't understand him, that's the problem.

Senator Fairbairn: I do understand him.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard thinks that Senator MacDonald's mind is a blank space because that is what is between the lines.

Senator Fairbairn: But Senator MacDonald has a very, very incisive mind.

Senator Simard: I know he does.

Senator Fairbairn: He has a very incisive and intelligent mind and I am truly reading between the lines of these extraordinary and, I think, quite revealing comments. I am sure that Senator Doody was held enthralled at the moment they were said.

Having referred to that committee hearing in the words of Senator Finlay MacDonald, I want to just speak a moment to the report itself on the question of revenue neutrality and deficit control and the size of government, because I suspect that some of the concerns expressed in the report were a direct result of these very well-reasoned and candid remarks of Senator MacDonald. I would like to read a couple of pages from the report on this question:

> The FST was projected to earn the federal government about $18.5 billion in 1991. Its removal and the introduction of the GST have been described by the federal government as being alternatively "revenue neutral" or "deficit neutral". The Government has also described the GST as an important weapon in the fight against the deficit.
> It is possible that the Government has underestimated the yield from the GST. The New Zealand experience indicates that substantially more taxpayers registered than was originally thought to be the case and that revenues per point of tax exceeded original expectations. Whether the original estimates of the Department of Finance in Canada are more accurate than those of the New Zealand government remains to be seen.
> Nevertheless, a common concern expressed by witnesses dealt with the "inevitable" increase in the GST rate, consistent with the efficient use of this "cash cow". New Zealand, which only recently introduced its own variant of a VAT, has already increased the rate by 25%

• (1810)

> The Canadian Federation of Independent Business stated that the cost of administering the tax is efficient only when the rate reaches 15%. Indeed, the historical evidence shows numerous examples of increases in the VAT rates over time. Some examples of increases since the VAT's introduction in major industrialized nations are: 8% to 20% in Austria; 10% to 22% in Denmark; 13.6% to 18.6% in France; 10% to 14% in Germany; 12% to 18% in Italy; 12% to 20% in The Netherlands and 11.1% to 23.46% in Sweden. Not only is the increasing reliance on the VAT remarkable as witnessed by the jump in rates, but it is also revealing to note that the original rates in these examples all exceed the proposed GST rate for Canada. Is it then inevitable for the GST rate to climb substantially in Canada?
> The Fraser Institute in Vancouver has been a vocal critic of government spending and its growing involvement in the operations of the economy. It has tracked the increasing average tax burden of families since 1961. In a submission to the Committee, the Executive Director of the institute, Mr. Michael A. Walker argued for some kind of tax limitation clause to be attached to the GST. Although the institute supports the principle of a GST, it is concerned about the potential of the tax for raising substantial additional taxes. The National Tax Limitation Committee, a division of the Fraser Institute, believes that "... unless there is constant and unremitting attention focused on the GST, the rate will inexorably creep up and with it the size of government.
> This view was particularly prevalent in western Canada. For example, in Regina the Association of Saskatchewan Taxpayers told the Committee that "The GST will not solve the problems of unrestrained government spending—more money available to spendthrifts will encourage them to spend more ... Replacement of the Manufacturers Sales Tax (MST) by the GST is not the reform that Canada needs—elimination of the MST, along with a general tax reduction is what we need." That brief went on to say that "The problems that Canada faces are run-away spending, run-away debt, and run-away taxation ... The solution is obvious. Less. Less government, less taxation, less spending, less regulation and no more debt."

That, honourable senators, would certainly be a utopian world. The report went on to say:

> This same position was presented to the Committee in Edmonton by the Canadian Federation of National and Provincial Taxpayers, and in Vancouver by the Greater Vancouver Libertarian Association who stated that "Even if the new tax was to reduce the deficit or the debt we would be opposed to it because the logical first way to alleviate this sorry state is to reduce government spending, not to soak the taxpayer more."
> These witnesses and others who presented similar concerns viewed the GST as leading inevitably to higher taxes. What might initially be a tax reform would ultimately become an increasing tax grab. Indeed, the Minister of Finance has always maintained that the rate might go up in the future if circumstances warrant.
> These views are best expressed in an article deposited with the Committee by Mr. Walker in Vancouver, entitled "The GST: A Wolf in Sheep's Clothing." According to the authors, Jean-Luc Mique and Pierre Simard ...

Is he a relation, senator? "A Wolf in Sheep's Clothing." At any rate, according to the authors of this article, both of them from the University of Quebec—

> ... nine out of ten Canadian economists favour the tax because it is a more efficient revenue raising tool than the FST but the vast majority of Canadians don't like it.

> While the orthodox economist believes that governments raise tax revenues to pay for needed public spending, the authors believe that governments spend to curry favour with the electorate. The more tax revenue available, the more they will spend. Thus the GST offers "... the assurance of ever rising rates in the coming years of permanent federal deficits." It is possible, therefore, that circumstances will always warrant rate increases. The features of the GST which supporters view favourably, i.e. the fact that it is efficient and a stable source of revenue, prove to be not a virtue but a vice.

> Every tax imposes an economic penalty on the economy, although some are worse than others. The FST is a case in point. According to the Department of Finance, the removal of an $18.5 billion FST and the introduction of the GST will generate $9 billion in efficiency gains. This is almost 50 cents on the dollar. Since the GST imposes efficiency costs of about 10 cents on the dollar, the average cost of the FST at existing rates is almost 60 cents on the dollar. At the margin, a one percentage point increase in the FST imposes an economic penalty far higher than 60 cents per dollar of tax revenue.
> If the GST rate does climb significantly over time, the advantages of this tax reform will tend to be eroded.

The minister, in his promise to Canadians after he talked about revenue neutrality—and we have dispensed with that—said that he was going to remove that bad, old manufacturers' sales tax, that "silent killer of jobs" which was invisible and replace it with the new goods and services tax that would be highly visible. He said that Canadians would now know exactly what they were paying. There would be no more hidden taxes, no more prices hiked up artificially by this hidden manufacturers' sales tax. That commitment lasted just about as long as it took to say it. It was practically the first commitment that bit the dust, just as soon as the final details of the tax were announced.

Suddenly the minister said that it was not possible to make it visible. He could not force businesses to put it on the cash register receipt. So, what happened to visibility? It joined the long list of other "itys" that this government has long since lost-like credibility and believability.

The next great promise of this new tax was that it was going to make the whole system simpler. It was going to be so simple that a child could run the whole system. After being encouraged by Senator Simard, and having tried to read the bill, that promise was nothing more than a cruel joke. Instead of becoming simple, it will mean that every single transaction—

Senator Frith: "Except ye become a little child." That is the salvation of the GST.

Senator Fairbairn: Well, God help us all, Senator Frith. At any rate, instead of becoming simple, it will mean that every single transaction by every single Canadian man, woman and child will now become much more complicated and complex.

Every time you go into a store you will have to deal with provincial sales taxes—if you are shopping in any other province but Alberta—and with federal sales taxes, and whether the new tax is on the total price of everything you bought or whether it is included in the price and whether or not a piece of cheese in a plastic wrapper or a muffin is taxable or tax free, depending on whether or not you buy it in a grocery store, in which case it is probably tax free. But if you buy it at a snack counter it will be taxable, depending on whether or not you want to eat it there or if you want to take it home with you, but if you want to have it heated up and eat it there the tax will apply, etc., etc., etc.

It is simple, all right. Everyone understands it perfectly!

Senator Frith: It is a rap song. Do it again.

Senator Fairbairn: It is a rap. Perhaps I will get the hang of that after all.

Ask any small business person if it is simple. They are the ones who are now receiving hundreds of different forms in the mail from Revenue Canada telling them how to set up an extra set of books to collect and remit the new tax. Some of them have already complained that just collecting the new tax is going to put them out of business.

Recently on The Journal, the CBC public affairs program, we all saw the story of two elderly sisters in Nova Scotia who operated a small handicraft business, as a number of people do in the small towns and villages of Nova Scotia, particularly on the beautiful island of Cape Breton, where Senator MacEachen comes from.

These sisters sold things like tea cosies and small knitted and embroidered doilies. They also took other people's handiwork and sold it on consignment. Their operation was as much a social centre of their neighbourhood as it was a business. These two elderly sisters do not think the tax is simple.

In fact, what is happening to them is very sad. They are going to close up their shop because of this new tax. They said they simply will not be able to cope with all the forms and the hundreds of entries they are going to have to make to keep track of how much tax to send to the government.

But the real proof—not only the sentimental proof of real people—the real proof that this new tax is anything but simple is the fact that the government has had to hire 4,000 new tax collectors just to collect the tax. If it is so simple, why do they need so many new people simply to collect it? Do not ask me. You will have to ask Michael Wilson that.

The next revelation that came on this tax came with the announcement of the President of the Treasury Board—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order, order! It is now 6 p.m. The sitting is suspended until 8 p.m.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before the dinner hour, I was in mid-sentence, as it were—

Senator Molgat: When you were rudely interrupted.

Senator Fairbairn: I was discussing events leading up to the GST, how we got to the GST, and some of the early commitments, that are now as dust, on what the tax was going to be or not going to be. We briefly discussed revenue neutrality versus deficit reduction, in which I was enormously helped, as I had been before by the comments of Senator Finlay MacDonald during the hearings in Whitehorse, and we talked about the question of visibility, which began as commitment to a visible tax, which then sort of fell off the table.

I talked a bit about the complexity of the tax and how very difficult it was for people to understand, and also that the tax itself, rather than being a simple proposition, was extremely complex, almost to the point of incomprehension in some parts.

When we adjourned for dinner, I was just beginning to make reference to the announcement of the President of the Treasury Board that the cost of implementing what has been described as a very simple tax—which will now apparently require 4,000 new people to deliver—is now up to $475 million, which is double what the minister originally said it would cost. Almost half a billion dollars to collect this simple tax! Can you imagine the price tag if this were a complex tax? So much for the description of "simple".

As many of you know, honourable senators, the tax is not simple at all. It is horrendously complicated, particularly for the small business people who will have to collect it on behalf of the government. There was another commitment early on by Mr. Wilson that he would give small business a grant of $1,000 to help ease their costs of converting their cash registers and other equipment to collect this simple tax. That promise, like some of the others, also dropped off the table, so there is no real assistance for small business, and that is one of the reasons, I suppose, that so many of them—I guess it is still around 50 per cent—have not yet registered for the tax.

I also want to refer to what the senate committee had to say about the so-called simplicity of the tax, but before I do that, I should like to read an excerpt from Bill C-62, this so-called simple legislation which we are being asked to make the law of the land. I should just like to read a small part of a very large bill, just as an example for honourable senators, I suppose, of what all of us are in for in trying to figure the thing out if, indeed, it should become law. I have chosen for my reading clause 207 of Bill C-62, which you will find at page 121.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senator, would you please explain it as you go along?

Senator Fairbairn: What I will do, Senator Stanbury, is read it first and then ask you perhaps to adjudicate on whether or not a humble person like myself could indeed even attempt to explain it. This clause deals with the change in the use of real property:

> 207. (1) For the purposes of the Part, where a registrant who is an individual acquired real property for use as capital property in commercial activities of the individual, and not primarily for the personal use and enjoyment of the individual or any related individual, and the individual begins, at any time, to use the property exclusively for other purposes, or primarily for the personal use and enjoyment of the individual or any related individual, the individual shall be deemed
> (a) to have made a supply by way of sale of the property immediately before that time;
> (b) to have acquired the property at that time for use otherwise than in commercial activities of the individual; and
> (c) except where the supply is an exempt supply, to have collected, at that time, tax in respect of the supply equal to the amount determined by the formula
> $$(A \times B) + [C \times (100\% - B)] - D$$
> where
> A is the tax calculated on the fair market value of the property at that time,
> B is the percentage that, immediately before that supply, the use of the property in commercial activities of the individual is of the total use of the property,

C is the lesser of

(i) the tax calculated on the fair market value of the property at that time, and

(ii) the total of the tax that was or would, but for section 167, have been payable by the individual in respect of the acquisition of the property and the tax that was payable by the individual in respect of improvements to the property or, where the individual was deemed under subsection 208(2) to have received a supply of the property at an earlier time, the total of the tax deemed under that subsection to have been paid by the individual at that earlier time and the tax that was payable by the individual after that earlier time in respect of improvements to the property, and

D is the tax, if any, that the individual is deemed under section 190 to have collected at that time in respect of the property.

Now, I used this clause to illustrate that one could understand it only with considerable assistance, along with, I would suggest, one heck of a run on the services of accountants. I know that some people in accounting firms have had to take special training so that they could understand the bill in order, in any way, to explain it to their clients. I have used that as an example to show that, in spite of the declarations of the Department of Finance and the minister, this is not a piece of legislation that is at all understandable to ordinary Canadians. Indeed, I can understand why individuals and businesses find the possibilities of having to deal with these kinds of clauses in the bill totally daunting.

When one thinks of calling up the information number, this is not the kind of clause on which you would ever be able to get any kind of satisfaction.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senator, I wonder if I might ask a question. It occurs to me that a clause like that is going to require interpretation by somebody at least as capable as Michael Meighen or Michel Cogger or one of the excellent tax or corporate lawyers on the other side. I am sure they will do very well in their practices in interpreting these matters. I suppose the same is true of accounting firms. However, I wonder where even they are going to find out what this clause means, because, from what I can gather, the hot lines do not understand it and the people from Revenue Canada running seminars to explain what these clauses mean are not able to give the answers. Where would you suggest that ordinary people, such as yourself or myself, might go to get some reasonable interpretation that would stand up with the department, and perhaps even with the courts, on such a clause?

Senator Fairbairn: I suspect you are quite right that people like Senator Cogger and Senator Meighen, and perhaps even Senator Austin, will certainly have their legal talents brought to bear on this kind of situation. I frankly do not know where you would go, Senator Stollery, other than to an accounting firm.

Hon. Michel Cogger: You got the wrong senator. He is not Senator Stollery. He is Senator Stanbury.

Senator Stanbury: Thank you.

Senator Fairbairn: I am sorry. I just had so many questions from Senator Stollery this afternoon that I just look over my shoulder and expect him to leap.

Senator Stanbury, I think one would have to go to an accounting firm, and yet, as I say, somebody is going to do mighty nicely out of this because there are not going to be great numbers of accountants across this country who will have expertise sufficient to deal with the complexities of this bill. Indeed, I know there are firms in my home town that are making an investment in some of their accountants by virtually sending them back to school on this thing. I was initially quite surprised at the number of accountants who were contacting me about this tax. I figured that accountants would find this a wonderful new addition to their repertoire, but in fact a number have been coming to me asking if they could have copies of some of the alternatives, such as the single tax or Neil Brooks' proposal, to study because they have reached the conclusion that this is a bad tax themselves.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Senator Fairbairn, would you permit a question? I wonder if you should perhaps ask for Senator Cogger's help in this regard. He must be following your speech with very close interest because he noticed that very small slip between Stollery and Stanbury. Obviously, he has been listening to you very intently. I think, as you read that clause, he must have grasped the real essence of what it was all about, and he should be able to provide us with some in-depth information on the matter.

Senator LeBlanc: He is too modest.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Molgat, I thank you for that suggestion. I would be delighted if Senator Cogger has been able to come to grips with this piece of legislation. In the future, I would certainly be glad of any assistance or explanation that he could offer, because I know he is very willing.

• (2015)

Senator Molgat: I wonder if he might be prepared to do that now, since we are right on the subject.

Senator Murray: He wishes to speak later in the debate.

Senator Fairbairn: I understand from Senator Murray that he is going to speak later in the debate. I would be grateful, Senator Murray, if Senator Cogger could put that small portion of the property part that I read into understandable language for us.

Senator Cogger: I am looking at it and I will reply in due course.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Senator Fairbairn, I wonder if you would allow me to interrupt to bring to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the gallery of Mr. Richard Holden, a distinguished member of the Quebec National Assembly, a member of the Equality Party, and also a member of the Bélanger-Campeau Commission which is sitting in Hull tomorrow.

BILL TO AMAND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Lynch-Staunton. I am sure Mr. Holden, being a lawyer, is probably very interested in this tax, and there certainly will be a fruitful field for him as the Quebec government harmonizes its tax with the federal one.

Another commentary that I would like to draw to the attention of senators underlines again how difficult this bill will be for ordinary Canadians. It is an article that appeared in the Sunday Edition of the Toronto Star. Like so many other Canadian newspapers at this point in time, the Toronto Star is preparing a series of articles, as did the Citizen on the weekend, in an attempt to examine the tax, tell us how to go about following it and what it means.

This series of articles in the Toronto Star began on Sunday and is written by one of its experienced reporters, John Picton. In his kick-off article John Picton begins:

> Confused by the GST? Join the club.
> It's a mess!
> And it's going to be an absolute paper nightmare.
> The federal government's goods and services tax is scheduled to become law in just one month, on Jan.1, 1991, and the general view from grocery distributors to morticians, from builders to auto dealers, is one of utter confusion.
> We talked to scores of people to try to get to the bottom of how the GST will affect you, and there are thousands who still don't know how it will work.
> In fact, several people who are considered leaders in their fields gave wrong interpretations about the new tax, simply because they don't understand it.
> And this despite the millions of government dollars being spent on advertising, hot-lines and seminars.
> It hasn't been easy to get the facts on this remarkably complex new tax. I spent six weeks probing, phoning and tracking down experts in many fields. Some said simply that they did not know.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

Today, The Star begins a series of stories—to run daily—on just how the GST will affect our lives.

How it'll cost you an extra $143 for an average funeral; how on a $167 basket of groceries you'll save $1.55; how it'll add about $9,000 on the price of an average new home; how it'll cost doctors, lawyers and other professionals; how Metro officials say it'll kill our lucrative tourism industry.

In some cases, you'll be paying the GST for buying five doughnuts or less; in others, for six doughnuts or more.

The tax will also be levied on Remembrance Day poppies and on the kids' photo with Santa Claus.

Under our present system, we pay a 13.5 per cent tax on a wide variety of manufactured goods and there are about 75,000 manufacturing firms, importers and wholesalers who pay that tax and add it to their prices as a cost of doing business.

Under the GST, most forms of business will be caught in the tax net and an estimated 1.4 million enterprises across Canada will be collecting it, from sawmills and steelworks to the local variety store.

Not that the pain ends there. Some provincial governments are looking at the GST as a windfall and see it as a way of filling their coffers, too.

Former Liberal provincial treasurer Robert Nixon wanted to apply the 8 per cent Ontario sales tax on top of the GST, which would have been a form of double taxation.

So, if an item cost $100, the GST would have added $7 for a total of $107 and the 8 per cent provincial sales tax would have added another $8.56—for a total of $115.56.

That accounting system would have made Ontario an estimated $200 million a year in additional revenue.

New Democratic Premier Bob Rae has said his government will add the provincial sales tax solely on the price of a product before the GST is applied.

Therefore, the price of that $100 product to the consumer will be $115, including the 7 per cent GST and 8 per cent provincial sales tax.

Sitting with their calculators in their highrise offices in Ottawa, Revenue Canada officials haven't missed a thing in their grab bag of taxable items, although business people with revenue of less than $30,000 a year will not have to register to collect it. (If they don't register, they won't be able to claim any refunds, either).

One of the most complex issues civil servants have had to deal with is the definition of groceries.

"Basic" items are tax free, the new law says. Then it gets complicated.

Snack foods are taxable. So are carbonated beverages, confectionery, and ice cream, sherbet and yogurt—but only when packaged in single servings.

Then there are what one accounting firm has described as the "absurd inequities".

For example, a carton of milk bought at a fast-food outlet will be subject to the GST, while a jar of caviar bought at a grocery store will be listed as a basic grocery item and will be tax free.

Also, granola products sold primarily as a breakfast cereal will be tax free, while other granola products will be taxable.

Says the accounting firm Coopers & Lybrand: "Undoubtedly, granola bars will soon be advertised as the latest breakfast meal."

Real estate is included in the GST. Buyers of new homes costing $350,000 or less will get a GST refund equal to 2.5 per cent of the purchase price.

There is a special formula for refunds on homes priced between $350,000 and $450,000, while there is no refund planned on new homes costing more than $450,000.

And there's likely to be increased pressure from landlords for bigger rent increases since they can't claim refunds for the GST paid on the purchase, repair or improvement of residential complexes.

That is the first in this series of articles. Senator Stanbury, you will perhaps wish to follow the articles. The next article was supposed to be yesterday and it was on supermarket shopping. I guess there will be a whole raft of articles. Perhaps we will hear from you on them, senator.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Senator Fairbairn, I wonder if I might ask a question. The distinctions which are drawn—"distinctions without a difference" is probably the way to describe them—between granola bars, cereal, five doughnuts not in a package and six doughnuts in a package must have required some genius on the part of someone in the public service. I would not think that public servants would lay claim to having had that type of genius; it must surely have been Mr. Wilson himself who developed these distinctions and made sure that public servants put them into the bill to make it difficult for people. I cannot quite understand how anyone would have had the audacity to impose some such codification of indistinct distinctions on the Canadian people and expect them to live by it. How can the ordinary grocers in the corner stores, if there are any left, or even the major chains, be sure that they are making the distinctions so that they will not fall prey to those 4,000 policemen who are being hired to go after them?

Senator Fairbairn: That is a good point, Senator Stanbury. Michael Wilson is personally a nice guy, but I would not have thought he would have the capricious imagination to come up with these things; perhaps it was somebody more along the lines of the Prime Minister. Who knows? Perhaps Senator Cogger had a hand in it, because he has a good imagination. At any rate, these are what the accountants are referring to as "absurd inequities". Not only will it be a major task for people who are supposed to be overseeing the administration of this tax, but I think there will be some rather unpleasant arguments at cash registers between the people purchasing and the cashiers, or even small corner store operators, none of whom will be able to in any total way understand why it is that six of one are tax free but five of another are not. That is one reason why the people of Canada, as I was saying earlier this afternoon, have maintained such a fundamental and consistent objection to the tax. They object to the ways it will apply to commodities they will be buying and services that they will be using. But I suspect that is nothing compared to the feeling that they will have if this tax is passed and they find out what these intricate interpretations mean, which will make it even more horrendous than they already think it is.

• (2030)

Hon. Jack Austin: I wonder if you have dealt with the complexity of the definitions of "zero rated", and "exempt", in dealing with these categories that you have been speaking about. That is something that Senator Cogger could help us with when he gives his permitted address during debate on this motion.

I will just give you some additional examples, and this is from Peat Marwick's GST Quick Facts document. It talks about some taxable groceries.

> Beverages, other than those that contain at least 25 percent fruit juice, candies and confectionaries, snack foods, single servings of ice cream. Sweet and baked goods sold in quantities of less than six. Single servings of yogurt, pudding or beverages. Heated food, prepared salads, sandwiches and food platters.

Then there is a note,

> Not an exhaustive or specific list, exceptions exist.

And then you could wander through even such a small document with very considerable confusion as you say, and you go to the list of 60 consumer items and how they are rated. Basic grocers are "Z rated." Now you look back at the front:

> Z means "Zero rated" supply. The registrar is not required to collect tax on consideration but still entitled to input tax credits on taxable purchase.

And then you come to unsweetened croissants, and that is also Z rated, which is going to be very exciting.

Senator Fairbairn: What is an unsweetened croissant?

Senator Austin: This is something Mike Wilson apparently favours and when he put these rules together he did not want his unsweetened croissants taxed.

Now pet food is taxable, that means the registrant must collect tax on consideration for supply made in the course of a commercial activity, and is entitled to input tax credits on all taxable purchases.

And then we have a number of items that are exempt; for example, day care is exempt.

> Exempt means that the registrant is not required to collect the tax for consideration but is not entitled related to the input tax credits.

And I wanted to mention some very quick categories. If you are running a grocery business, or a fast food store or any one of these supplies, just look at this: A carton of ice cream is Z rated. Cookies in a box are Z rated. And fishing licences are T rated and flowers are T rated, but fruit juice is Z rated, but you have to go back and make sure that it contains less than 25 percent. And then ice cream cones are taxable and pet foot, as I say is taxable, and soft drinks are taxable and take out food is taxable, but unsweetened croissants are Z rated.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you for that—I was going to say elucidation, but in all conscience, it only fills me with almost a sense of despair at the thought, and I say this quite sincerely for somebody like ourselves in this Chamber, that if the tax goes through we are in a position to say, "Well, you know, what the heck", and go ahead. But there are people, many people, to whom those kinds of things are things that they already agonize over buying, and indeed for some of them they would be considered luxuries. Those are the people to whom this will add just another layer of hardship on an already very difficult life. And those are the people that have to exist with this kind of gobbledegook day in and day out, who are counting their pennies on purchases that they make each day. They do not budget by the month or by the week; they budget by the day and indeed by the item. And it is for these people that the tax credits and things like that will not be there in their hands or there to help them on the day they are going through a store trying to get some comparative prices on goods.

Comparative picing is already a difficult thing to do, and with this tax it really becomes that much more difficult in terms of the frustration as well as the payment and the choices people will have to make. I mean, what are we trying to do to the ordinary people of Canada, particularly the ones who are on low and poverty income?

Senator Austin: Well I think your point is extremely well made. If I may add a plea for another group, they are the small merchants of Canada. The people who operate grocery stores in Lethbridge, which is your own region, or those in my part of Canada, are going to find much enhanced costs in trying to track these different categories, and are going to make mistakes and are going to have to hire accountants and are going to have to submit themselves to tax examiners.

Senator Fairbairn: They are going to have to lay off workers.

Senator Austin: They are going to have to try to get those costs under control; they are going to have to add the cost of the administration of the GST to the markup on the product they are selling. And what happens then to the people you have been describing? We are under enough pressure in today's economy with a recession and reduced earning power, without having to pay the higher costs that will flow through the system because of the GST. I would venture to add, Senator Fairbairn, that this will drive many smaller merchants out of business, because the larger people like Safeways have computer systems and automatic checkoffs and can run programs and thus will have a competitive advantage over the smaller merchants. It is no accident that the Consumers Association of Canada is one of the largest centres of resistance to this particular legislation.

[Senator Austin.]

Senator Stanbury: I have just a supplementary question. I assume, Senator Austin, when the poor merchant has to acquire advice from his or her accountants, or lawyers or any other expert consultants that are required, he or she will have to pay GST on that as well.

Senator Fairbairn: Of course. That is true, and I think your point is very well taken. I do know from my home town—and that is no different from any other centre—yes, there will be small operations that are already throwing up their hands, and they are already throwing up their hands because of the pressure that they are under with the recession even before they get to the GST and the whole thought of the GST, if it comes. And these are people who, when you go home and they see you on the street or whatever, will come up and say, "Hang in there."

But there is a point that you did not make, and that is that, faced with these costs, smaller operations wishing to stay viable will also, in order to manage their own books, probably have to let staff go. If you compound that town by town, city by city, it has to be adding to the unemployment situation, which is on the rise in any event.

Talking about small business, Senator Austin, I was just about to read from the report of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee the portion about the tax being too complex. The first paragraph I am about to read relates to the difficulties which small businesses experienced in Britain, and I will just read from the report. It is not a large section.

> The GST is not only unfair, it is extremely complex. A multi-stage sales tax, such as the GST, is regressive with respect to compliance by business. A British study found that the cost of complying with VAT . . .

Value added tax . . .

> is 40 times higher for small business as a proportion of sales than for large firms.

And that is exactly what you are saying with the small firms as compared to Safeways or some of the other large chains.

> Businesses making only taxable sales must account for tax paid on purchases and tax owed on sales. However, the complexity increases as the number of zero-rated and tax exempt items are added to the system.
> The evidence from a forthcoming book by Professor John Whalley and Deborah Fretz indicates that, "the particular form of VAT". . .

Value Added Tax . . .

> that Canada proposes to introduce is, by international standard . . .

Not just our standards, but international standards . . .

> surprisingly complex". It also has a relatively narrow base and, if European experience is anything to go by, further complications may yet develop, including multiple rates."

And this is a portion contained in a book from these two authors entitled "The Economics of the GST, from the Canadian Tax Foundation" and it has already appeared.

> The complexity of the tax is most evident for small retailers selling food products. The definition of basic groceries is replete with anomalies and it will be up to the retailer to ensure that the tax is applied correctly. Large retailers who have computerized checkout scanners can program their computers to distinguish between taxable and tax-free products. For smaller retailers, these distinctions must be made by the cashier.

● (2045)

You can just imagine the kind of confusion and consternation that that will cause.

> Suppliers of exempt and non-exempt goods and services must apportion their inputs in order to claim input tax credits on purchases used to produce taxable supplies.

I can think of a lot of Canadians who could not get through that process, and I would have a lot of difficulty myself.

> This poses particular administrative difficulties for those who supply both types of goods, such as financial institutions, education institutions, charities and non-profit organizations, and landlords whose complexes include both long-term residential and commercial supplies.
> Under any VAT-style tax, the compliance cost for small business is already substantial but the Government has magnified this beyond tolerance by proposing to introduce the GST without folding it and the provincial sales taxes into a single national regime. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business (CFIB) has said that the two-tiered approach is unworkable and has been adamant that the GST not proceed without the cooperation of the provinces. As the CFIB told the Committee, "What this Government is proposing is the absolute worst sales tax in the world. It is the worst system that man could possibly devise." The Saint John Board of Trade indicated that, "small business would face an administrative nightmare." Yet, the federal government has decided to proceed with the tax anyway.
> The recent agreement by Quebec to harmonize its provincial sales tax with the GST, although a step in the right direction, is considerably short of a national consensus. Even then, the agreement was reached at the cost of the resignation of Quebec's Minister of Revenue. The premiers of the other nine provinces stated in a joint communique released at the premiers' conference on August 13-14 that they find the GST unacceptable and believe that it should not proceed. The recently-elected premier of Ontario, Bob Rae, has vowed publicly to fight the GST. It has been reported that both Alberta and British Columbia are considering the possibility of a court challenge to Bill C-62.

This report was produced on September 25. Since then, British Columbia and Ontario have joined Alberta in its constitutional challenge to the tax, and I shall say a bit more about that in a few minutes.

> The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has recently commented upon the proposed GST. That organization has concluded that the lack of federal-provincial harmonization is the most serious shortcoming of the new tax, leading to needlessly higher administration and compliance costs. These costs are also raised by failure to tax basic groceries.

Complexity of compliance is harmful to the economy. Resources must be spent in an activity which adds nothing to the goods and services people wish to consume. This complexity is also reflected in the higher administration costs to the Government, which must hire an additional 4000 people and spend an extra $200 million . . .

Senator Stanbury: It is now $350 million.

Senator Fairbairn: That is right. The report goes on:

> . . . to raise the same amount of money that it now collects. This makes no sense.

Again, so much for simplicity. The next big commitment from the government was that they would lower marginal income tax rates for low and middle-income Canadians by 1 per cent, when the tax is brought in, to help offset the increased costs to Canadians of the new tax. That commitment also went the way of the dodo bird. There will be no reduction in income tax rates to offset this new tax, at least not according to anything I have read or heard from the Minister of Finance. This is important because, as was pointed out by other senators this afternoon, the thing that makes the Canadian tax unique in the way it is being applied is, first, no other country that has a value-added tax has a dual tax system; second, most of the countries that have a GST-type tax have supplemented it or complemented it with a reduction in personal income tax, but there is no indication that that will be the case in Canada.

Senator Stanbury: It will in the next election.

Senator Fairbairn: I was just about to add that until somewhere down the road the government will again wish to try to gain the affection of Canadian voters. I suspect that this tax will hang around the neck of the Conservative Party like an albatross for many years to come, if it is put in place and if the Canadians who presently disapprove of the tax maintain that attitude as it is introduced in their daily lives.

The minister also used to say that moving to a tax on consumption could only be done with provincial cooperation, because, except my own province of Alberta and the two northern territories, every province has a sales tax of its own to collect. Unless they are coordinated, it will just be mass confusion. That was the view of the minister at the beginning of this exercise. In fact, the minister's own white paper on the new tax announced that a federal tax on consumption would be "unworkable" without the cooperation and the participation of all provincial governments.

The reasons not to proceed without provincial cooperation were pretty clear to the minister at that time, as they were and are to everyone else, but the minister has gone ahead with his tax, not only without provincial cooperation, but in the face of legal challenges to the constitutionality of the legislation itself by three provincial governments.

I refer to the court challenge by the Government of Alberta, which is now supported, as I said a few moments ago, by British Columbia and Ontario. I do not want to get into the legalities of that court challenge, but I would like to refer you to a brief press release that was put out by the Provincial Treasurer of Alberta, Dick Johnston, and the Attorney-General, Ken Rostad, when they announced that the Government of Alberta would proceed with a legal challenge to the proposed GST on October 11, 1990. According to their press release, a reference was directed on that day to the Alberta Court of Appeal under the Judicature Act, which was to ask the court to hear and consider certain questions regarding the constitutional validity of the GST.

> This legal challenge is part of our campaign to stop the GST.

So said Mr. Johnston.

> We believe that in whole and in part this tax violates several sections of the Canadian Constitution that are clearly in the realm of provincial authority . . .

That is what Mr. Rostad said.

There are three key elements to the province's reference. First, the GST infringes upon provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights by interfering in the regulation of commerce. All businesses, through the production and distribution chain, are forced to be federal tax collectors, while the purpose of the GST is only to collect net tax revenue from the final consumer. The GST will be an administrative nightmare for every business person. They are regulated to collect the GST for the federal government and are forced to do so largely at their own expense. In the case of zero-rated goods, such as exports and food, this entire tax collection superstructure is imposed on businesses for no revenue purpose at all, as the sale of zero-rated commodities yields no net revenue to the federal government.

According to Mr. Johnston:

> Alberta businesses do not need another layer of regulation any more than they need another tax . . .

The second point of their challenge is the GST amendment to tax provincial crown property, which contravenes section 125 of the Constitution Act by levying the GST on fees charged by the provincial government for certain uses of its natural resources. The federal government effectively taxes the province in the performance of its constitutional responsibility for the management of these natural resources. The GST will also tax provincial property by imposing the tax on top of provincial fuel and tobacco taxes and on liquor revenue, which are crown property.

Said Mr. Rostad:

> We cannot allow this constitutional intrusion by the federal government,

[Senator Fairbairn.]

The third point of their challenge is that the GST increases the tax burden on health care, education and municipal services which are the constitutional responsibility of the province. If the Alberta government were to provide educational service, Albertans would not bear a GST burden on education because the Crown has constitutional immunity.

• (2100)

> Albertans are being penalized for their choice to have education delivered in a manner that is responsive to local concerns.
> Even with a partial rebate the GST is an interference with the discharge of provincial constitutional responsibility. "We will fight the federal attempt to syphon off money that Albertans pay for health care, education and municipal services", said Mr. Johnston.
> The Canadian economy has already plunged into an Ottawa-made recession under the weight of the high interest rate regime of the federal government. This strategy has been strongly attacked by the Economic Council of Canada in its 1990 Annual Review.
> The GST will inflict further damage to the national and provincial economies and prolong the recession, if it is implemented.

So, honourable senators, that gives you some background of the legal position of the province of Albera. This case is now before the courts.

With the GST, as we have noted, Canada would become unique among other countries with value added taxes as we would be the only country having two sales tax systems.

Senator Austin: Senator Fairbairn, many of the provinces will be adding their sales tax of this GST; in other words, taxing the tax. For example, I understand there are provinces that actually intend to increase their revenues by adding their sales tax to the GST. Do you know how many provinces will be doing so? I am sure your own province of Alberta will not do so because it does not have a sales tax.

Senator Fairbairn: I do not. There have been no definitive statements or speculations from provinces in Atlantic Canada as to how they intend to go about it. As I said earlier, in Ontario the former provincial treasurer, Mr. Nixon, had said that that was precisely what he was going to do, probably figuring that, if the tax was going to be in place he ought to use it for the maximum benefit of the Government of Ontario, which would have brought in some extra $200 million per year. However, the new premier of the province of Ontario, Mr. Rae, has indicated that they will apply their own provincial tax before the GST is placed on goods, as I understand it.

Senator Austin: So Ontario and British Columbia will not add their tax to the GST as a tax, but some of the others will. For example, will Nova Scotia, which already has a 10 per cent sales tax, add that to the 7 per cent GST? Perhaps Senator Finlay MacDonald knows whether that will be the case.

Senator MacDonald, do you know whether Nova Scotia will add its 10 per cent provincial sales tax to the 7 per cent GST?

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: I have not discussed that with the new premier yet.

Senator Austin: When you do discuss it, what representation will you make?

Senator Comeau: Harmonization!

Senator Austin: You can see, Senator Fairbairn, that this absence of harmonization is an unfair direct cost to the individual Canadian taxpayer.

Senator Fairbairn: It is. As I said earlier, in the white paper that the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, put out, he said that without this kind of harmonization the GST was, in his words, unworkable. Again he has withdrawn from that position and we are now left with an uncertain and ragged prospect across the country, if—and I always say "if", Senator Austin—this tax becomes law.

Senator Stanbury: Senator Fairbairn, in connection with that big "if", you have been discussing the court challenges to the GST, particularly the initiative taken by Alberta and now joined by British Columbia and Ontario. You have also indicated the unaniminity of the nine provincial premiers with respect to the unhappy nature of this tax. Has the federal government taken any steps to have this important constitutional question referred to the Supreme Court of Canada so that it may be reasonably and urgently determined? If the GST were to be enacted—and I agree with you that it is an "if"—how could it be put into effect while the matter was before the courts and before the Supreme Court of Canada had an opportunity to rule on it?

Senator Fairbairn: That too is a pertinent question, one whose implications you would have more expertise in understanding than myself.

The answer to your first question is, no, the federal government has made no effort to refer this to the Supreme Court for an opinion. It did not choose to take that route with respect to the appointment of the eight extra senators, which is obviously the subject of a number of court cases, and a reference, determined one way or the other, might have prevented a great deal of anguish to those who now sit in the Senate. People often ask me why Alberta—or an individual citizen—does not refer this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. A lot of people do not understand that only the federal government can initiate that kind of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Your second question about where this leaves the legitimacy of the tax is also to the point. Obviously, there are cases in the court system across this country, which, regardless of the decision of the lower courts, are probably all going to end up in the Supreme Court of Canada. After months of agony, uncertainty and extensive financial cost, instead of clearing the decks for a piece of legislation that the government clearly believes in, the whole system is muddied until this group of court cases works itself through that system. They are not marching side by side; they are progressing in an uneven course with respect to timing. So these questions will remain up in the air even if the tax itself gets through this house.

Senator Austin: Senator Fairbairn, if the tax is passed and the courts then find that it is unconstitutional in respect of the provisions that require a provincial government to act as a tax collector or to be a taxpayer under Bill C-62, a good part of the system will fail, because, in most provinces, a significant part of the economy runs through provincial organizations, such as Ontario Hydro or, in British Columbia, B.C. Hydro. There are a number of other activities that are taxable or zero-rated that will be tested by this constitutional question.

One of the unfortunate facts is that any tax paid—and Senator Stanbury and others who are lawyers may assist in this respect—is not recoverable should the law ultimately show, by decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, that it was unconstitutional, because there is another law that says a tax once paid, even under mistake of law, is nonetheless not recoverable. So federal government has nothing to lose in its cynical attitude toward this legislation, although the taxpayers have a good deal to lose.

When I have the opportunity to speak, I will be discussing some of the legal authorities in this area.

With that background, my question to you is whether you think the federal government's belief that it can pass this tax, that it can enter into taxing arrangements with the provinces, is one that will stand. I know that in my province and in yours the provincial governments have insisted they will make no agreement with the federal government until the adjudication of this legislation; yet I am told—and you may be able to assist me in this regard, as could a Conservative senator—that basically the policy of the Minister of Finance is to put the tax in place and then say it is a fait accompli, and the provinces can make arrangements to collect more revenue than they are collecting from their sales taxes by entering into agreements with the federal government. So the provinces are offered the political excuse that the legislation is now passed and, therefore, the tax is inevitable; whereas, at this stage, some provinces believe it would be politically undesirable to support this federal legislation. I wonder if you could add anything to that conundrum.

Senator Fairbairn: First, I would like to say that I hope you will let me know when you are giving your speech, because I would like to listen to the legal part of your argument. Second, clearly the belief of the Minister is that, if they can get the bill passed, they can then force or in some way bully the recalcitrant provinces to fall into line.

Senator Austin: Bribe!

Senator Fairbairn: That is your word. At any rate, they may be misreading some of the provinces, as I believe they are misreading the Canadian public. They think the public will grumble, get used to it and then forget all about it. I do not think that will happen. My province of Alberta tends to be stubborn in areas where it has a strong belief in its own powers. Because of its position as the only province that has no provincial sales tax, I am not sure that it will be easy to fall into line, regardless of the political rationale that may be offered.

Right now we are into a very tough economic situation in this country, and if you look even at the small bit of the problem that we have touched on so far tonight you can see it is a nightmare. It is an incredible mess. While everyone is trying to cope with the very tough economic situation in every other aspect, right on top of it is going to be this uneven, discriminatory tax that will be operated throughout this country in different ways by different governments. It is just another way in which our country is, in my view, becoming destabilized, not just among regions but between provinces. I am absolutely certain that the ramifications of that have not been carefully considered by the federal government.

Senator Kenny: Senator Fairbairn, when you were reviewing the impact this would have on Alberta, did you find that the provincial treasurer made any comments about how it would affect the provincial government budget and whether they would forced to raise taxes or cut services or run larger deficits? In many people's minds, the GST represents an attempt by the federal government to push its deficit problem onto provincial governments, and every provincial premier, including your own, has opposed this. The Conference Board of Canada study, commissioned by the provincial governments, indicated that during the first three years of operation the GST would reduce provincial tax revenues by $6.9 billion, and that the provinces would be faced with three alternatives: recovering these lost revenues through additional tax increases of their own; reducing services to the public; or running larger provincial deficits or smaller surpluses. I do not know whether Alberta has considered these or not, although I am sure they have. The report by the provincial governments on the impact of the GST says:

> In addition to needlessly threatening the economic situation in the short term, the federal GST would seriously jeopardize the provinces' financial position, already made difficult because of the federal government's policy of progressive financial withdrawal from health care, post-secondary education and regional economic development. The economic impact of the GST could thus be worse if provincial governments had to adopt measures to restore their fiscal situation.

If the GST takes effect in 1991, consumers face combined federal-provincial rates of sales tax ranging from 7 per cent in your province, as you mentioned, to 19 per cent in Newfoundland, where they would have their 12 per cent provincial sales tax on top of the 7 per cent federal GST. Worse yet, consumers face the prospect of even higher sales taxes if the provincial governments are forced to raise tax rates to recover lost revenues. In fact, provincial governments have already indicated that the GST would leave them with no choice but to raise provincial taxes.

There is a comment from Newfoundland, which I suspect is mirrored in your province, where Mr. Kitchen said:

> We will probably have to raise our provincial sales tax from 12 per cent to 15 per cent or more if the GST isn't withdrawn . . . Either that or we will have to increase our provincial income tax rate, which is now 62 per cent of the federal rate, to 75 or 80 per cent.

Alberta has traditionally had some of the lowest provincial income tax rates and, undoubtedly, they are going to have the same problem. The whole business of the lack of federal-provincial cooperation that has gone on in this area is, I am sure, terribly irritating to people in Alberta. Understanding that provincial cooperation is critical to the success of any reform of the sales tax system. I know that Finance Committee members in the other house were shocked to learn that the federal government never actually put any sales tax proposal on the negotiating table with the provinces. I have heard provincial premiers or ministers in your province commenting on it. I did not know if you were planning on commenting on this further. The comment that I have here in the report from the other place says that provincial governments were never asked whether they would join a unified national sales tax system before the federal government broke off negotiations on the subject. Do you have any comment?

Senator Fairbairn: I thank you, Senator Kenny, for putting those remarks on the record, because they do very much mirror what has been said in my province by the provincial treasurer, whose riding, as you may know, is in the City of Lethbridge, as is that of the Minister for Advanced Education. We hear a fair amount about this. In politics, one finds strange allies, and we have found ourselves in a great deal of agreement on this particular issue. It is almost completely incomprehensible, although perhaps one should not be surprised, that an issue as major as this was not put on the table by the federal government and thoroughly discussed and argued in advance with the provincial treasurers. I suspect that this was deliberate and that the rpovincial treasurers were presented with a fait accompli, the expectation being that they would knuckle under and go along. Well, that did not work. In fact, this whole tax has caused a lot of anger at that level in this country. We should remember that the Minister of Finance said it was essential to have the provinces on side, and perhaps that is why there has been that extra antagonism which keeps the provinces from agreeing.

Senator Kenny: I am told there is, in fact, a tax revolt in Alberta, that the provincial government indicated they have no intention of collecting the GST in Alberta liquor stores and that they are simply advising people that on January 1 they are not going to collect it. They have no intention of acting as tax collectors for the federal government. Can you confirm that?

Senator Fairbairn: That can be confirmed, because one of the underpinnings of their constitutional challenge in the court is that they are not going to be made tax collectors for the federal government.

Senator Austin: I have an additional question to follow up that question, Senator Fairbairn. I also understand that, as a result of this proposed tax, the dispute within the Conservative party in the Province of Alberta is leading to a split in their organization between the federal wing and the provincial wing, and that a number of provincial politicians have said that they are fed up with the federal Conservatives over this and other matters. Can you tell us if that is really happening?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. The provincial party had its annual meeting not too long ago, and one of the major debates at that convention was to put in motion the machinery to split the federal and provincial Conservative party in Alberta. In fact, feelings were running so high that there was a very negative feeling about having federal MPs even attending and being involved in that convention. Obviously, I am not a member of the inner conclaves of the Alberta Conservative party, but—

Senator Kenny: Tell us anyway.

Senator Fairbairn: There is a very uneasy relationship, to put it mildly, between the two levels, and although the premier himself in the past has, I think, been in favour of a unified federal and provincial structure in the province of Alberta, certainly at that last convention, probably seeing the strength of the views that were being neglected, he too came to the conclusion that it was probably a good thing if they operated in their separate jurisdictions, because their jurisdictions were so different. I think what has happened in Alberta has happened with the Conservative party elsewhere in Western Canada. It is quite something in the Province of Alberta, which has had such a very strong Conservative base, both provincially and federally for so long, that that base is now being eroded at both levels at a rate that, to them, must be quite frightening.

From talking to friends in the provincial wing of the party, I know they believe they are being entrapped and that their fortunes are being forced downward because of their association, in the minds of the people of Alberta, with the policies of the federal party, most particularly the policy of taxation and the GST.

I think they are looking with considerable alarm at the massive attraction, community by community, that the Reform party of Canada is having in Alberta. Senator Waters' party is a federal party. However, at the moment it is having a debate within itself as to whether to put some of its muscle into a full-fledged provincial party in Alberta, where the Reform party began. I know the provincial Conservatives are very agitated because they feel that their base is being eroded and that the Reform party may just move in for the kill. Interestingly, the Reform Party did take out a provincial charter for the purpose of the election process that brought Senator Waters to this chamber. In order to participate in that process, they had to be constituted as a provincial party. So they are there, kind of lying in the weeds. From my remarks, you can probably gather that there is a great deal of anxiety and, indeed, anger within Conservative ranks in the province.

Senator Austin: It would be very interesting to have Senator Twinn's comments about the impact of the GST in the province of Alberta, on the various communities in Alberta and, of course, on his own party.

• (2130)

Senator Fairbairn: I am sure as the days roll on Senator Twinn will want to participate in the debate.

Senator Twinn: I did not hear what you said.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Austin was suggesting that it would be interesting to hear your personal perspectives, Senator Twinn, on the situation of the Conservative party in Alberta, federally and provincially at this point. I was merely suggesting that at some point in the debate you may well want to enter into it and talk about it from your perspective, which obviously is much closer than mine.

Senator Austin: And defend the GST in Alberta.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Twinn does attempt to defend the GST in Alberta, as I understand.

Senator LeBlanc: Senator Fairbairn was a journalist a little after I was, but we all remember the period towards the twilight of the government of Mr. Diefenbaker when a large number of voters looked for a transitional party where they could park their vote until such time as the dust settled. That period comes to mind and reminds me of the debate that is presently going on, especially in places such as Alberta. The Créditiste Party in the Province of Quebec, to everyone's surprise, suddenly ended up with 26 allies of Mr. Caouette in the House of Commons. I was one of those with James M. Minifie who travelled the regions that voted Créditiste at that time. We were not overly surprised, but we thought that the Liberal Party of Quebec had received a big jolt, and I see some similarity in the present situation.

As for Senator Twinn's position, I think I can understand him to be somewhat reluctant to accept a complimentary ticket on a cruise on the Titanic. I can understand his reticence to come out on the record on that one.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you Senator LeBlanc for also taking my mind back to those days of 1962 when the Créditistes led by Réal Caouette marched in a very healthy band into Ottawa when Mr. Diefenbaker lost his majority and came back with a minority government. Probably there is more similarity between the Créditiste movement as it developed at that time in Quebec and the Reform Movement as it is developing in the west than there would be between the Créditistes and the Bloc Québéçois. Réal Caouette campaigned on a very simple slogan: "What have you got to lose?" With his vigorous and electrifying style he marched through rural Quebec saying, "What have you got to lose?" In all those ridings the answer came back, "Not much. We will vote for you."

In the province of Alberta there is a great expectation that there will be a large number of Reformers sitting in the House of Commons after the next election. Indeed, if that party chose to operate provincially, I think the same would be true. That party is definitely filling a gap and also collecting people who are very disillusioned and frustrated.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With the Liberals.

Senator Fairbairn: With the Conservative party and the Conservative government. The people who are moving to the Reform party are predominantly from the Conservative party in Alberta. If you were to look at the polls both provincially and federally in Alberta, Senator Lynch-Staunton, you will see that the Liberal party has been doing pretty darn well for a party that for many years has had a very low percentage of the popular vote in Alberta. In the last provincial election we elected eight MLAs. In the popular vote we were clearly second, ahead of the NDP.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We are talking federally.

Senator Fairbairn: The federal party as well has risen considerably in the federal polling that is done in the province of Alberta and, indeed, is well ahead of the Conservative party. In the election for the Senate spot which Mr. Waters won handily, the number two in the race was Bill Code of the Liberal party. Number three in the race, which in a sense was very sad, was Bert Brown, who ran for the Conservatives. If anyone in this country has worked for Senate reform and a Triple E Senate it has been Bert Brown, a farmer from Alberta, who is a wonderful person and was in there under the Conservative banner and came third.

The main point of our argument is that there has been a rather large shift in the balance of politics both provincially and federally in the province of Alberta, and I think it would have to be of moderate concern to the party you support.

Before this very interesting exchange of views took place, I was talking about how Canada is unique among other countries that have adopted this type of value-added tax, because we have a dual tax system and that means two separate tax collection systems. One will be for provincial sales taxes and the other for the new GST, if it passes. The increased costs will put Canadian firms at a competitive disadvantage with firms in other countries that do not have to cope with two separate tax collection systems. In the event the GST passes, the person who has to make judgments at the cash register or in the corner store will be subject to one of four possible sales tax scenarios. On every sale every day that person will have to decide whether to charge both the federal and provincial sales tax, whether to charge only the federal tax, whether to charge only the provincial tax, or whether to charge neither the federal nor provincial tax. That will put one heck of a burden on a small business which, after all, is there primarily not as a service to any government but supposeedly as a service to the public, and which at the same time wants to make a profit. Now there will be an overhanging set of decisions that, in the case of people who are operating on a very small margin, will really tax their commitment to keep those businesses operating. I am not sure it is understood across Canada that it will be up to the retailer to keep straight what taxes apply to which products and services and to make sure that the appropriate federal and provincial taxes are collected and remitted to the respective governments. More than one million small businesses in Canada that do not currently pay federal sales tax will now have to collect the GST on behalf of the government.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

I want to share with senators the comments of the Senate committee which criss-crossed the country to study the impact of this tax and the whole question of dual tax systems and the case for integration. It is not a long portion of the report but it is worth taking a second look at it, because we really do stand alone in this area of a value-added tax. The report states:

> A unique feature of the proposed Canadian tax system as of 1991 (if the tax goes through) is the fact that two distinct forms of consumption tax would apply at the retail level in most of the country. These taxes would have separate bases and different rates of tax. Retailers would have to determine the tax status of each item under the GST and impose the appropriate tax rate. They would then have to perform a similar determination with respect to the provincial tax.

Senator Austin made the following point earlier:

> For small businesses in particular, this could entail high compliance costs.
> Numerous witnesses pointed out the unnecessarily high compliance costs of a dual tax system. The St. John's Board of Trade referred to this lack of integration as "the most serious shortcoming of the GST" and indicated that "small businesses will be faced with an administrative nightmare." The Canadian Federation of Independent Business was equally harsh in its condemnation of a dual tax system. The CFIB brief to the committee stated "that the most serious problem with the GST from the perspective of small firms is that the tax is not harmonized with provincial systems . . . Some of the worst situations will be faced by retailers dealing with goods that are treated differently under their provinces' retail sales tax compared to their treatment under the GST. Small grocery stores, combination food stores and restaurants face some of the worst nightmares as the absurdly complex rules applying to food and the way it is sold will render compliance extremely difficult if not impossible.
> Another point raised by the CFIB concerns the consumer confusion that will result from a dual tax system that individuals do not understand. Most provinces will apply their sales tax on the GST inclusive price. A typical cash register can show the pre-tax subtotal, the GST payable, the PST payable and the total. These cash registers cannot show the intermediate sub total which consists of the GST inclusive price and which is in most cases the base upon which the PST is to be applied.

● (2145)

> To put it simply, most cash register receipts can easily be interpreted by consumers as charging an excessively high PST rate. This might lead to confrontations between retailers and customers and unfair accusations and fraud.

I must say, that in reading the contents of this report, as I have been periodically today to bolster these various points, I find the report to be as clear as anything I have read on the GST.

> Thus from the point of view of compliance costs, there is a very clear reason for integrating federal and provincial consumption taxes. The case for integration is also strong on economic grounds. The federal government has argued that this stage of tax reform could generate additional output equal to 1.4 percent of the GDP. This gain is due to the elimination of the FST from exports, the removal of the tax from business inputs, elimination of the preferential treatment according to imports, and an end to the price distortions arising from a tax which imposes significantly different tax rates on different products. Most of these problems also plague the provincial retail sales taxes which in total raised 14.3 billion in 1987.

Retail sales taxes do not extend preferential treatment to imported goods. But every other criticism of the Federal sales tax applies equally to existing retail sales tax. They tax business inputs and consequentially result in significant amounts of tax cascading.

Senator Cools: Could I interrupt to put a question to you? As you review the testimony put before the committee, I find that essentially what we are doing is repeating the things that the nation said to us.

I wondered if in your research for your speech today whether you were attentive to the testimony of a Mr. Wolfe Goodman of the firm of Goodman and Carr.

Senator Fairbairn: No I have not included that testimony in my comments.

Senator Cools: Perhaps, then, I could read just a couple of comments by Mr. Goodman, who is an accomplished lawyer with a strong background in the field of sales tax. The conclusions he makes fly in the face of everything we have been told. For example, on page 41:7 of issue No. 41 of The Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, he says:

Unfortunately, this leaves only consumption taxes as a possible area for a tax increase.

In a moment I will come back and show how he got there, but his conclusion from this, and I quote directly was:

There is an astonishing degree of public hostility to consumption taxes, although it is difficult to see why this should be the case.

Mr. Goodman says, "it is difficult to see why this should be the case."

Senator Fairbairn: I sure don't agree with him.

Senator Cools: Not at all. Mr. Goodman said in his opening remarks to the committee:

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and honourable senators. It is a great privilege to be invited to appear before this committee and to submit my views. I have been involved in the sales tax field for many years, as one of the very few lawyers, initially, in this country to have had an interest in sales tax.

He continues, and I am quoting directly.

Happily there is a growing interest among lawyers, as among accountants, in the sales tax field.

He continues, and I quote:

I was honoured by being appointed Chairman of the Federal Sales Tax Review Committee, appointed by the Honourable Mr. Lalonde in 1982, which reported in 1983.

This gentleman who appeared before the committee and told the committee these rather startling things, based on what seemed to be reasoned grounds, with some very cogent and, I thought, potent arguments was a man who had, one could say, quite serious credentials. Speaking of the committee appointed by Mr. Lalonde, Mr. Goodman said:

Among its recommendations was that the federal sales tax system, which has existed up until now, should be replaced in due course by a tax levied on the consumer dollar at the same proportionate rate, either a retail sales tax or a value-added tax.

We have moved a considerable distance since 1983, and the government has now brought in legislation to enact a goods and services tax.

Mr. Goodman continues:

My position, quite simply, is that we need the goods and services tax. There is no acceptable alternative to it.

I am reading from page 41:6 of the testimony.

There is no acceptable alternative to it. My reasoning is quite simple. We owe it to our children and grandchildren not to saddle them with an enormous federal budget deficit, a debt burden that keeps growing year after year. We have to take steps urgently to reduce our annual federal deficit.

This is very interesting.

Senator Cochrane: What is your question?

Senator Cools: Please be patient. Mr. Goodman continued:

Our areas for success in reducing federal government expenditures are extremely limited. This means, inevitably, that if we are going to make any progress, it must be through increased tax revenues. Of course, if our economy continued to grow indefinitely, and social welfare expenditures declined while tax revenues generated by increased prosperity continued to increase, then we might conceivably deal with this problem without increasing tax rates. However, supply side economics has not achieved that result in the United States and I submit that it is not very likely to achieve it here.

This is Mr. Goodman speaking.

As a result, we shall have to increase tax rates, and the question then is: Which taxes are to be increased and how.

He continues,

There seems to be very little room to increase corporate tax rates. There are pressures of international competition which require that Canadian tax rates not fall too far out of line with those of our trading partners. It seems unlikely that we can significantly increase personal income tax rates. There is a concern that very high rates blunt incentive and cause valuable people to leave for other countries. It seems even less likely that we can > reinstitute death taxes, which we abolished a number of years ago. Even if we could reinstitute them, they would not contribute much to the total tax revenues. They do not in any country. There is not a country that raises as much as 2 percent of its tax revenues from death taxes.

Then he comes to the conclusion where I initially began. Is there someone in a hurry?

Senator Cochrane: What is your question?

Senator Cools: Do you want me to put a question to you? If you have something to say to me you can stand and put the question to me. She is not pressing me.

Mr. Goodman went on to say:

> Unfortunately, this leaves only consumption taxes to a possible area for a tax increase.

And then he comes to this astonishing statement:

> There is an astonishing degree of public hostility to consumption taxes, although it is difficult to see why this should be the case.

I would have thought that senators opposite would have found this particular testimony of interest, because from what I was given to understand this is the intellectual conceptual framework that gave the government its guidance in this matter.

I see Senator Nurgitz nodding his head, so obviously Senator Nurgitz knows the work of Mr. Goodman.

Senator Nurgitz: Exactly, and he is making the government's case.

Senator Cools: He is making the government's case, and he obviously made up the government's mind on this matter. He wanted to assure us that all this nonsense we were hearing about complications, and about how the GST would be so burdensome for businesses, was rubbish. He went on to say on page 41:10:

● (2200)

> How complicated is the GST? If one looks at the legislation it looks formidable. Those are the explanatory notes and there is the bill. There are hundreds of sections. However, for the vast majority of businesses, this is a very simple and straightforward tax. An example which has probably already been given to you, honourable senators, is that of the business that has two nails on the wall. Every day, as the business makes purchases of goods and services, the invoices showing the GST that has been paid on those purchases are put on the first nail. Every day, as sales are made, the invoices for those sales showing the GST that has been collected are put on the second nail. Once a month or once a quarter the taxes on the first and second nails are added up, and the smaller total is subtracted from the larger. If, as usually happens, the total on the first nail of purchases is smaller than the total on the second nail of sales, then the difference is remitted to the government. If, however, the total of taxes on the first nail is larger because the inventories are increasing or being accumulated, then the business will claim a GST refund on the difference between the two.

[Senator Cools.]

Later on, he said:

> You may well ask if the system is so simple, why is the bill so complicated?

Senator Cogger: Is that the question?

Senator Cools: I keep hearing voices from here, there and everywhere. The honourable senator should consider that he is getting a study of the bill without any effort.

Senator Petten: That's right.

Senator Cools: As a member of the committee, I took the reference seriously, to study, on behalf of the Senate, this piece of legislation. So I would ask those on the other side who did not have that opportunity to view this intervention as an opportunity at hand, a benefit, as economists would say.

Senator Petten: A kindness.

Senator Cools: That too.

Mr. Goodman continued:

> You may well ask if the system is so simple, why is the bill so complicated? The answer is that there are many pages that deal with special situations. In the United States the pattern of legislation is rather different, and most special situations would be dealt with in regulations having the force of law. In Canada, under the present federal manufacturers' sales tax, special situations are dealt with by departmental rulings that do not even have the force of law. They are sometimes rather broad interpretations by government. The draftsmen of the goods and services tax have attempted to include virtually all of these special cases in the legislation itself. That accounts for its considerable bulk.

Senator Cogger: Is that the question?

Senator Cools: I had better repeat the statement, because I believe that the honourable senator missed it. It is very important. Mr. Goodman said:

> You may well ask if the system is so simple, why is the bill so complicated? The answer is that there are many pages that deal with special situations. In the United States the pattern of legislation is rather different, and most special situations would be dealt with in regulations having the force of law. In Canada, under the present federal manufacturers' sales tax, special situations are dealt with by departmental rulings that do not even have the force of law. They are sometimes rather broad interpretations by government. The draftsmen of the goods and services tax have attempted to include virtually all of these special cases in the legislation itself. That accounts for its considerable bulk. But I emphasize that while it may look formidable, it is not a particularly difficult system to comply with for the average business.

My question to Senator Fairbairn is: Has she given any attention to the intellectual and conceptual framework of the development of this piece of legislation? Another witness who appeared before the committee told us that, while the government has said that it could produce a value-added tax, the government has never showed us its logic in the development of its thoughts and conclusions that led to this legislation, its final proposal. So, in essence, has the honourable senator given any consideration to what the government has claimed to be the intellectual purpose of this legislation?

Senator MacDonald: Yes or no.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Cools. That was a very interesting development of a point of view by the witness, Mr. Goodman. Certainly I have tried in my remarks this evening and earlier today to follow some of the thought processes of the government as they have described them to us. I am not sure that I have been able to capture the essence of their intellectual approach to this measure. Senator Nurgitz has indicated he believes that Mr. Goodman expresses that process well from the government's point of view. I would suggest that perhaps Mr. Goodman suffers from some of the same shortcomings from which the Minister of Fiance suffers. Clearly, one of the major shortcomings that the Minister of Finance suffers from is a total disregard for the reality of the situation among businessmen and individuals in Canada. It is not something that is talked about within the Department of Finance or within boardrooms, but ordinary Canadians know how this monster will affect their daily lives. I have great respect for intellectual processes, but this is very much what politicians would call a bread-and-butter issue.

Mr. Goodman, the Minister of Finance and others may say that this measure involves in essence a very simple, logical tax that is easily understood. In the next breath, one has to ask, as Senator Stanbury asked earlier, "Why do they need 4,000 people at considerable expense to fan out across the country to help individuals to understand this tax?" Senator Austin has a very neat little handbook that provides a quick synopsis of the tax. It has been designed to explain to ordinary people what it means. It is virtually incomprehensible even though it was done by an accounting firm that is supposed to know the answers. I am sure that we all have respect for one another's intellectual thought processes, but I think at some point we must realize, especially in something as down to earth and as fundamental as this tax system, that the GST falls far from the mark in terms of responding to the fundamental and personal needs of the people of Canada.

It would be interesting as the debate goes on, Senator Cools, to explore the comparisons between Mr. Goodman and the other gentleman, noting that Mr. Goodman gives a passing nod to the fact that there seems to be a large degree of hostility toward the tax.

Senator Cools: He is astonished by it.

Senator Stanbury: Perhaps that says something about Mr. Goodman.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, it seems as clear as a bell to him, so perhaps he should be out there travelling across the country training people so that it can be clear to all of us. Perhaps he could work with Senator Cogger to that end.

Senator Cogger: If you are not nice to me, you will not get a Christmas card.

Senator Fairbairn: Am I on your Christmas list, Michel?

Let me come back to the committee report. I was talking about retail sales taxes, and I had reached a point where I was explaining that retail sales taxes do not extend preferential treatment to imported goods. The report went on to say:

> But every other criticism of the FST applies equally to existing retail sales taxes. They tax business inputs and consequentially result in significant amounts of tax cascading. A large portion of provincial retail sales taxes is invisible and therefore cannot be removed entirely from exports. Tax cascading results in different effective tax rates being applied to different products, even though the statutory rates are the same.

• (2215)

> The Committee heard testimony from the government of the province of British Columbia, that integration of the provincial sales tax with the GST would require an increase in the provincial tax rate of one half percentage point just to maintain revenues at previous levels. On the surface this is surprising given the broader tax base of the GST compared to all provincial counterparts, and this result can be explained by the fact that the GST itself eliminates all tax cascading.
> Taxing business inputs and the resulting tax cascading is in fact a significant source of provincial tax revenue. In Ontario, for example, every percentage point of tax raised revenues equal to 1.54 per cent of retail sales in 1987. Since the tax base is only a fraction of the retail sales base, close to one-half of tax revenues comes from a hidden tax on business inputs.
> The Province of Ontario relied most heavily on such a hidden tax in 1987. Four other provinces engaged in substantial taxation of business inputs. These were Manitoba, British Columbia, Newfoundland and Saskatchewan. On average, each percentage point of tax produced revenues equal to 1.38 per cent of retail sales.

Which was a bit lower than the Province of Ontario.

> Provincial sales taxes are not the visible tax we think them to be. A substantial component consists of hidden taxes on business inputs resulting in a wide variety of economic costs which are similar caused by the FST. Thus there is a great need for reform of those provincial taxes.

The concluding paragraph of this section of the report says:

> Failure to integrate provincial taxes into the federal GST harms the economy in two important respects. In the first place, it generates a substantial amount of excess compliance and administration costs. Secondly, it limits the output gains available to the economy. So full integration of the two tax regimes would add another $4 million $500,000 in output gain to the $9 billion resulting from the reform of the federal tax system.

The small business compliance costs were dealt with in the report, and I would like to touch on them because there is comparison with international evidence in this area. The report says:

> A value added tax can, in many instances, be a relatively inexpensive tax to comply with. Such a tax can also be designed so as to be very difficult to administer and comply with. Some of the VATs in Europe have such a complex design. With a greater number of tax rates and more exempt products, the compliance costs associated with a tax regime can increase dramatically.
> The Canadian Federation of Independent Business (CFIB) is particularly concerned with this issue, specifically as it affects the small business community. The CFIB has also been a vocal critic of the provisions of Bill C-62. In testimony before the Committee, by John Bulloch, the CFIB's president described the tax as "the absolute worse retail sales tax system in the world. It is the worst system that man could possibly devise".
> This assessment of the tax was based on the lack of federal-provincial harmonization as well as the use of a European-type invoice method GST. These features raise overall compliance costs of the tax. Moreover, there is a great deal of evidence to suggest that compliance costs weigh more heavily on small businesses than they do on larger firms.

Here is where the report refers to international evidence. It says:

> A recent study of the U.K. VAT tax shows that overall compliance costs have fallen by about 25 per cent from fiscal year 1977-78 to 1986-87 demonstrating that experience with a taxation system can reduce the costs of compliance. This same study also showed that the costs for the smallest of firms rose over the same period.
> These very high costs can be offset by making use of the small traders exemption. Nevertheless, small registered traders still face tax related costs . . . which are many times higher than those faced by large traders.
> A study of American retail sales taxes shows that average compliance costs differ between states by a factor of almost 2, attributable mostly to differences in the tax base. It is the determination of the tax status of individual items which accounts for the bulk of compliance costs. As a consequence, food and drug retailers face the highest costs. Similarly, compliance costs increase as the taxation base in a state becomes narrower.
> These characteristics are consistent with those fund in a number of other countries employing consumption taxes.

The next commitment made by the minister I want to touch on was that his new 7 per cent goods and services tax on everything from diapers to funeral shrouds was going to be a fair tax. He told us that in terms of taxes, it met the test of fairness, meaning that it was not a regressive tax and that it would not take a larger bite out of the pockets of low- and middle-income Canadians than it did out of the pockets of high-income Canadians. But as the Canadian Council on Social Development said in a brief on the tax on October of last year:

> The council opposes in principle any tax mechanism that is regressive. The GST is such a tax. The proposals to make the GST less regressive by using a refundable tax credit are commendable, but while the tax, once introduced, will apply in perpetuity, no such guarantee is provided for the tax credit. In fact, by not fully indexing the basic $275 credit to the cost of living, the government is already admitting in advance that the real value of that credit will fall.

Senator Stanbury: Senator Fairbairn, would you accept a question? You mentioned the amount of the credit as being $275. Has there been any calculation of how much it is likely to cost a family to pay the GST on their normal purchases of both goods and services? For example, families who do not have a washing machine and must go to a laundramat to do their washing, who have to find some way of getting to work, who have to buy some groceries not required as basic groceries because of the distinctions that are drawn within the act—those families are getting a credit, which seems small considering what they will have to spend on the GST during the course of the year.

I have seen some figures that indicate the relationship between the size of the credit they will receive and the actual expenditure a normal family will have to make on GST-related goods and services within the course of a year. I am not sure if you have seen any of those figures or if you could give us any idea of the relationship and, therefore, the adequacy of the credit, which the minister says is the excuse for saying that it is not a regressive tax.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Stanbury, earlier this afternoon I was reading from a brief which, unfortunately, I do not have at the moment. I handed it in to the Hansard reporters, but I would be pleased to give it to you later. It was from the Social Action Commission in Prince Edward Island, which was attached to a diocese in Charlottetown. It had prepared a brief basically focusing on the effect of the tax on low- and middle-income Canadians. It made some comparisons between what they would get as a credit and the degree to which it would fall short of what they were paying out. I do not have those figures on the tip of my tongue, but I would be glad to give you the brief.

The conclusion was—not only from that particular group—that the credits certainly fall short of what it is going to cost people at that level. This has been recognized by a great variety of witnesses and individuals, and I would be surprised if the Minister of Finance had the gall to claim that the credits were going to help that level of Canadians break even on their costs. One of the things about this tax—and it is hard to see the basis on which the credits are established—is that no government or economist can have any idea of what the daily charge of the goods and services that a Canadian, who may not be at the economic level of Canadians that the tax department is interested in, will be spending each day when they do not have the credit in their hands and what percentage that will form of the limited income they have. I would hope that even this government would not try to flog this tax as being one that provided credits that would meet the extra cost to those people.

• (2230)

Senator Stanbury: May I ask a supplementary question? As I recall, there is also a turn-around point at which a family begins to lose credits, and I believe it is very low.

Senator Fairbairn: It is $25,000.

Senator Stanbury: And, if I remember correctly, to get any credits at all, when you get down to the minimum, the person has to earn as little as $16,000.

Senator Fairbairn: Less than that.

Senator Stanbury: I am just wondering how in the world that figure could be justified when we know the poverty level and the cost of normal family living. Where would that turn-around figure come from when it is so terribly low?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not know. I do know that I have one friend who does some income tax work for farmers up in west Quebec, and she was explaining to me another anomaly whereby somebody who earns, say, $10,000 a year will get a bigger credit if he or she goes through the formal application than somebody who earns $6,000. This is one of the things in this system that just does not make any sense.

Getting back to the tax and the credits, as I was saying, these basic credits are not fully indexed. Really, by not fully indexing these credits to the cost of living, the government is already tacitly admitting that the real value of these credits will begin to fall almost immediately; yet the revenues from the tax will rise fully with inflation. So, in 1991, during the first year of operation, poor Canadians will immediately start to feel the pinch as the amount spent on tax and the real value of the tax credits start to diverge. Again, I think the Senate committee report summed it up rather well in terms of the value of the credits and the burdens of the GST. This may give you some more precise idea, Senator Stanbury. I will just go through part of the credit system portion of the report. It reads:

> The provisions of Bill C-62 introduce a refundable GST credit system with the following maximum annual amounts: $190 per adult; $100 per child; and a $100 special singles credit. This compares with the existing FST credit delivering maximum amounts of $140 per adult and $70 per child in 1990. The GST credit system also increases the turning point beyond which the credit is reduced to approximately $25,000 and allows single parents to claim an adult credit for one child. The benefit reduction rate is 5% of family income in excess of the threshold.

That is one of those sentences that is a little confusing.

> This enhanced system of credits is the primary mechanism by which families earning less than $30,000 per year are to be made better off, according to the Government. In examining the distributional consequences of this tax reform, the federal government estimates always assume that the full amount of the FST will be removed from prices, with the full amount of the GST added on. Numerous witnesses, such as the Canadian Council on Social Development—

Which I have just read from.

> —and the Social Action Commission (PEI), among others, challenged this assumption, both for goods eligible for the FST inventory rebate and goods produced and consumed under the new system.
> The credits are not intended to offset the entire amount of GST paid—rather they are intended to offset the additional tax burden for lower and middle income families. Many witnesses before the Committee had views different from those of the Government regarding the additional impact of the GST on households' tax burdens, primarily because of differing views as to the degree of FST savings passed on to consumers.
> The federal government has claimed that households earning less than $30,000 will be better off with the GST. The question is whether the enhanced refundable tax credits offset the additional tax that lower and middle-income households face with the introduction of the GST? To answer this the Committee has examined the distributional consequences of the GST, using a variety of data sources including the published statistics of the Department of Finance and the Statistics Canada Social Policy Simulation Database and Model. This model is based on Revenue Canada's taxation statistics as well as Statistics Canada's surveys of consumer expenditures.
> When the Department of Finance presents its estimates of the changing tax burden of the GST versus the FST, three items determine the impact on lower income households: 1. the difference in gross tax paid; 2. the difference in refundable credits; and 3. the impact of indexation provisions on a variety of taxes and transfers. However, as Mr. Patrick Grady—

Of Global Economics Ltd.

> —pointed out to the Committee, these indexation provisions operate with a lag. For 1991 there is effectively no indexation benefit. In addition to these three items, one can consider the impact on households of a less than full pass through of FST savings.

On the question of indexation, the report says:

> The system of GST credits is subject to the same indexation provisions that apply to the income tax system in general; that is, the credits and the threshold are indexed to the rate of inflation, measured by changes in the CPI, in excess of three per cent. Thus the real value of these credits will generally decline by 3% per year.
> Virtually all opponents of the tax cited this feature as a major flaw in Bill C-62. It is instructive to note that some proponents of the Bill also commented critically on this feature. In particular, Dr. Robert Clark of the University > of British Columbia noted, as did the Economic Council of Canada and the Conference Board, that refundable tax credits are an efficient means of introducing progressivity into the GST. Since it is so important, Dr. Clark insisted that its real value must be protected. Another vocal supporter of the GST called convincingly for the full indexation of the credits and the turning point.

Senator Cools, you will be interested in this because the gentleman you were quoting, Mr. Wolfe Goodman, is also quoted in this report in terms of full indexation of credits.

Senator Cools: Oh, yes.

Senator Fairbairn: He said that not to index them fully would be "grossly unfair to the poorest and most vulnerable people in our community."

Senator Cools: Yes.

Senator Fairbairn: The report continues:

> The credits, in addition to other elements of the tax reform package, are designed to make the GST package progressive at the lower to middle income levels. As the real value of these credits declines with inflation, this progressivity will diminish.
> The federal government's claim that the GST will make families with incomes below $30,000 better off is true in the first year of operation, according to Mr. Ken Battle of the National Council of Welfare. But in testimony before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations, he stated that the value of the credits will quickly be eroded by inflation and the Government's claim, in only a very short period of time, will no longer be valid.

Senator Austin: I think, Senator Fairbairn, that was the basis for the amendment that was proposed on this side, and it would have been extremely valuable to have heard the government answer those particular items of evidence which were brought before the House of Commons Committee and before our committee. It is amazing that senators on the other side do not have anything to say to these points which you are making now. There is an opportunity even at this moment for senators on the Conservative side to defend the government, to defend the absence of full indexation so that there would be complete equity available in terms of these credits. It really causes confusion, at best, and alarm, in fact, that the government is using a policy of "trust us to jiggle with the system every two or three years". In the meantime, the lower income parts of the Canadian community are going to feel the bite of this regressive policy.

Senator Fairbairn: I agree, Senator Austin. I think it is particularly regrettable because the government has shoved the question of the credits right out in front as some sort of justification for being able to talk about this being a progressive tax. There is not much long-term comfort to lower-income Canadians who have seen the trend over the last six years of de-indexing, de-indexing, de-indexing. As Mr. Battle says, the fact that the credits will be quickly eroded by inflation, because they are not fully indexed, means that the government's claim, with which it is highlighting this tax in terms of fairness, will, in a very short period of time, no longer be valid. I do not think this is a message that Canadians fully understand.

Senator Austin: I wonder why the government insists on putting Canadians in opposition to other Canadians with policies like this? We saw something similar with respect to the question of unemployment insurance, which was before us a few months ago. The government set up a benefit for a small group of Canadians with respect to maternity benefits, in order to create a pressure group to bring about legislation which was at the expense of unemployed workers in many parts of Canada, and which was a smoke screen to allow the government to withdraw from contributing to unemployment insurance.

The Minister of National Revenue is loudly and frequently promising to send out tens of millions of dollars of rebate cheques as soon as this legislation is passed. Of course, people will get money in their hands early, but will also buy a system which will make them worse off because of the regressive character of the rebate system. Why does the government set up the Canadian community against itself in order to get its way?

Senator Fairbairn: I cannot answer that question. However, in the last several years we have seen a growing and vast divergence between rich and poor in Canada. It is something that we saw in Britain during the Thatcher years and, to a large extent, also in the United States. Once this divergence takes hold as part of a conscious policy of a national government, it is extremely difficult to reverse it.

Earlier today I talked about the risk of establishing in our country an underclass resulting from the combination of this tax and other economic policies during difficult economic times, which will get more difficult. In Canada we like to think we do not have a great divergence between rich and poor and that we have a social security net that is sufficient to catch people. That social security net has an awful lot of holes in it now. I believe that, in some of our great cities, including Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, we are perilously close to having a firmly established underclass. That is also true in Calgary and Edmonton. I do not believe that we would have so established, as a part of our social service network, a maze of food banks struggling to maintain their existence if there were not an excruciating demand from a firmly established underclass in our society. We are not dealing with that. We certainly are not dealing with that in this tax. We are not even talking about it in this country, because it is not something we want to face up to.

During the last six years I have spent some time on the subject of literacy, and if I can make it to that part of my speech I will say a few words about that. However, one of the tip-offs with a country as well thought of as Canada is that we see ourselves as a very caring and sensitive nation, and yet we have in this country close to 40 per cent of our adult population struggling with varying degrees of "functional illiteracy." There are 1.5 million Canadians who are "basically illiterate," and it goes up from there. One-third of our adults who are functionally illiterate are high school graduates; another third of our teenagers drop out of high school every year. On the one hand, if one-third of the adult population who are functionally illiterate are high school graduates, and on the other hand more than one-third of teenagers drop out every year and will enter that category, then we have a problem of massive proportions and we are not doing very much about it. However, it is a tip-off.

I know that Senator Berntson, who is in the Chair, is concerned about this problem and has worked very hard on the issue of literacy in the province of Saskatchewan. With literacy figures such as that, if you scratch the surface you will see people who are poor, people who are discriminated against, people who are abused physically, mental and sexually, people who are homeless, and one million children who are living below the poverty line. Those children cannot learn after the first half of the month because the welfare cheque runs out. They do not have enough food to eat and are crowding into the food banks. We do have an underclass in Canada and we are building a bigger one.

When talking about credits, I regret to say that the people who are struggling at that level will not even know that credits are available. They will not know where to go, where to look or how to apply for them.

Senator Cools: Mr. Goodman had a suggestion on how to teach those people to get those credits.

Senator Fairbairn: There are many people like Mr. Wolfe Goodman, Mr. Jean De Grandpré and Mr. Simon Reisman who, with all the best will in the world, do not see below a certain level. They do not see the people who are below a level that to them is a trainable, teachable or advanceable level. They do not see the underclass. When I became interested in the literacy issue, I read material by Northrup Frye. Several years ago he was talking about an underclass in Canadian society, and I would say that it has grown in leaps and bounds since then. Any government in Canada, federal, provincial or municipal, that does not cast its eyes downward to fairness and equality, and to help that level of our society, is permitting us and itself to diminish the quality of our own place in society. Perhaps because of the hour of the night I talked longer on that issue than I intended, but I believe that most profoundly.

Senator Austin: Senator Fairbairn, I think not long enough. The conjunction of events is a particularly cruel one. The GST will be falling on those people whose full incomes are committed to basic necessities. They do not handle their basic necessities very well with whatever incomes they do have. The GST will fall on them, then the "made in Canada" recession, which is part of the government's policy for introducing the GST as neatly as possible, will cause this part of the Canadian community to be the first victims. They will be part of the rising unemployment numbers and will then fall on Canada's welfare rolls.

The federal government and provincial governments share responsibility for welfare. In the last day or two we have heard of the rising deficits of provincial governments. They are being very aggressive and very uncaring about supporting people who are applying for welfare, and this government is seeking to reduce the rate of growth of that support. We find ourselves with a set of events in control of no one authority that are very similar to those in the Depression when Prime Minister Bennett said the poor were not his responsibility, they were the responsibility of the province. The province said they were the responsibility of the municipalities. The municipalities said they were the responsibility of the province. We ended up with work camps, with people on the rails and with people who had no place in our economic system. I am not saying we are at that stage now. The reason we are not is that we still have an operating social security system. However, I would suggest the point you are making is that the GST is one more pressure on that part of our community and one more degradation of their economic position.

Senator Fairbairn: That is exactly the point I was making, and also a point made in the committee report from which I have been quoting.

Senator Cools: Senator Fairbairn, perhaps I could put on the record the reference that I made to Mr. Goodman. It is from the proceedings of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, Issue No. 41, of Tuesday, June 5, 1990, at page 41:8 where Mr. Goodman stated:

> The Department of Finance is of the view that virtually everyone who is entitled to these credits actually receives them.

This is corny, isn't it? It is an indictment. Malthus might have done better.

> I am not quite as confident of that. I believe that an outreach program is necessary in order to ensure that those people who are too unsophisticated or too frightened of government to file claims for sales tax credits, or child tax credits, for that matter, will be persuaded to do so.

That is quite poignant and to the point.

Senator Fairbairn: That was a very humane proposition by Mr. Goodman and certainly one that is sadly needed in this country, as we point out.

On the question of fairness of the tax, I wish to quote from another section of the committee report.

• (2300)

> Even more important than the technical flaws in the bill is the matter of fairness. Any tax that is going to raise $18.5 billion per year and constitute a major part of the federal tax arsenal must meet some basic elements of fairness. The GST, and other VAT-type taxes, is not generally viewed as meeting those basic requirements. It is a regressive tax. Lower income individuals spend a greater share of income on consumption and are therefore obliged to pay a greater proportion of their income in sales tax. To make it more acceptable, the federal government is > including a system of enhanced refundable tax credits as part of the GST package.

> If the basic structure of the tax is going to be determined by the tax credits, they must continue to be effective. Instead, the provisions of the Bill ensure that, only temporarily, would they do the job which they are meant to do.
> The credits, and the income threshold after which they decline, are only indexed to take account of inflation in excess of 3%. Thus, the real value of the credits would decline over time and an increasing number of individuals and families would have their benefits reduced. Eventually, even the very poor would not be protected from the extra cost imposed by the GST. Indeed, after only five years, some families could lose up to $300 of the real value of their credits, which amounts to one-half the maximum value of credits for which they are eligible.
> In the past, the Government has made statements about adjusting these sales tax credits and income thresholds over time. However, this Committee is not in a position to evaluate the Government's intentions.

As you said, Senator Austin, earlier, what the government is saying is, "Trust us, trust us to do the decent thing," and if we judge by the polls the Canadian people are fresh out of trust for this particular government. So the committee said:

> We can only judge the GST on the basis of the legislation which is before us and clearly, Bill C-62 does not provide for full indexation of the refundable sales tax credits and income thresholds.

And that is basically what we have to do as we are asked to pass legislation. In this house we have to make make judgments in the absence of commitments—and indeed I have seen in recent years commitments that were made either change or disappear.

> This is not the only problem with the GST credits. The $100 single adult credit is not fully obtainable unless the individual's income exceeds $11,169. We are told that this credit is designed to reach the working poor but must it also deny the very poor—

This is who we are talking about.

> —who are in the most dire need of assistance?

This is what I was trying to explain to Senator Stanbury a few moments ago, and let me just repeat that. We were having a little conversation at the time, and the committee in its report was saying:

> The $100 single adult credit is not fully obtainable unless the individual's income exceeds $11,169. We are told that this credit is designed to reach the working poor but must it also deny the very poor who are in the most dire need of assistance?

These are people who are well below that level. It does not make any sense. The report goes on:

> Also, if Quebec continues to treat the refundable sales tax credit as income for purposes of determining social assistance, the GST tax credits would merely offset social assistance benefits to the poor in that province.
> The GST credits completely fail to take into account the high cost of living in Canada's remote regions. The GST would apply on the final price of goods and services inclusive of transportation costs—

Senator Watt, you have gone over and over that point.

> —which are a significant component in the price of services in the north. Although the average Whitehorse family would pay about $400 more GST than the average Canadian family, this is not reflected in the value of the credits. The Committee was also told that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 40% higher than in southern Canada with outlying settlements even more expensive. Thus, not only are the credits too small but the income threshold of $24,800 at which the GST credits start to be reduced will not reflect the same standard of living in the north as in southern Canada.

Senator Austin: Senator Fairbairn, I wonder if it has come to your notice, and I also would like to draw the attention of Senator Cogger to this particular item—

Senator Fairbairn: I hope you are taking notes, Senator Cogger.

Senator Austin: —that Ernst & Young, a well-known accounting and economic consulting firm, issued a report which was made public yesterday on the effects of the GST in Northern Canada.

Senator Cogger will recall the debate here during the course of an amendment which we proposed, to deal with the GST in Northern Canada.

According to Ernst & Young, who were commissioned by the provinces and the Territories last year, the proposed GST would be particularly damaging to the northern economies, both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and also the northern regions of Canada's provinces.

And Ernst & Young are proposing to offset the impact of the GST by the setting up of credits for institutions, new homes buyers and low-income families in those northern regions. They are also suggesting reducing taxes to combat higher heating and transportation costs.

Senator Cogger will recall our debate. According to Ernst & Young the GST would reduce the purchasing power of northern consumers and add greatly to the cost of manufactured goods and tourism in that area.

In studying this question of the development of northern Ontario, the new Ontario Minister of Northern Development, Shelly Martel, in tabling this report in the Ontario Legislature said this:

> This federal tax grab is being imposed on a region whose residents can least afford a reduction in their take home income.

Then she went on to say, "I want to emphasize that the GST on its own is the wrong tax at the wrong time." And if those statements are true for northern Ontario, they are more than doubly true for the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

So I wondered if Senator Cogger, in his address that Senator Murray has authorized, will take this report into account when he touches again on the northern questions, and I have added these comments simply to emphasize the accuracy of the statements you are making.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Austin, and I know for Senator Cogger's interest that Senator Lucier is obtaining a copy of this report, and I am sure he would be very glad to provide an extra copy for Senator Cogger.

Senator Cools: Senator Cogger is not listening.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes he is.

Senator Cogger: If I did not know any better, I would think you are trying to drag me in.

Senator Fairbairn: No, no. We want to be sure, seeing as we know you are going to speak and we look forward to it, that on some of these points—because of where you sit you will be able to give us some insight and perhaps some more background information that we do not have. And I would not dream of trying to drag you in, Senator Cogger. I know that if you want to jump in you will.

The report continues:

> The system of credits is not the only means by which the Government has promised the people that the adverse consequences of the GST would be mitigated. Some products are to be zero rated while others are to be tax exempt. The Government, for example, has made much of the fact that residential rents are tax exempt. This exemption serves to conceal the GST paid on inputs but it certainly does not eliminate the tax. This is particularly ironic because the FST is being discarded because of its invisibility. The price of exempt items such as residential rents would go up in price as a result of the GST. In the case of new rental accommodations, the increase can be substantial.
> Many Canadians find it difficult to purchase their own home. The Government has reassured Canadians that the afordability of housing will not be much affected by the GST. The evidence received by the Committee is quite the contrary. Land will now be taxed for the first time under the GST. It constitutes a large part of the price of housing in high-cost housing markets. In the cities of Toronto and Vancouver and in the golden horseshoe area of southern Ontario, new home prices could increase by 3%, substantially higher than the figures cited by the federal government. In Toronto, this amounts to a $10,000 increase.
> Even though the sale of used housing is free of tax, that market should also see price increases as a result of the GST. Since used housing is a substitute for new housing, an increase in the price of the latter should drive up the price of the former.

● (2315)

> Since used housing is a substitute for new housing, an increase in the price of the latter should drive up the price of the former. More directly, soft costs—realtors' fees and legal fees—will now be subject to the GST. A 7 % tax on these costs could increase the price of a home by 0.5 %.

That is what the Senate report had to say on the subject of credits.

Senator Berntson: Are you asking for the question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Berntson: I am calling for the question.

Senator Fairbairn: No, not yet. I have a little way to go.

Senator Forrestall: How long will you go on?

Senator Fairbairn: I do not know; as long as I can. I have been working on this speech for quite a while.

Senator Forrestall: Will you be okay?

Senator Fairbairn: This invigorates me, and I know that Senator Keon is keeping a close eye on me. I am fine, Senator Keon.

One area that is of particular interest to me in Canadian society is senior citizens. We have not heard a lot about them in the consideration of this tax. A marvellous organization has been established in this country within, I would say, the last four years, called One Voice, the Canadian Seniors Network. It is playing a vigorous role in putting before government and the media the voice of seniors across the country. Jean Woodsworth, a marvellous lady, is the president of the organization. She presented a brief to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Cools: I believe she is related to the late J.S. Woodsworth, one of the founders of the CCF Party.

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, she is. In any event, I would like to go into that brief because it outlines, probably better than any group, the position that seniors face in relation to the GST.

One Voice, The Canadian Seniors Network, represents hundreds of thousands of seniors through individual membership and affiliated provincial and local networks across the country.

Senator Kinsella, you know about that setup, and isn't it a terrific organization? They said in their brief:

> As early as 1987 when Mr. Michael Wilson introduced the first stage of tax reform, One Voice advised against increasing government revenues through regressive taxation measures such as consumption taxes. We felt then and continue to believe that no matter how you try to adjust the system with tax credits, a regressive tax is still a regressive tax. It will hit lower- and middle-income Canadians more than the wealthy. We continue to recommend that the government use the progressive income tax system to raise revenues so that all Canadians and corporations pay a fair share. Loopholes must be closed. The recent tax cuts granted to wealthy taxpayers by reducing the top income tax bracket must be re-examined. We also believe that we must reconsider the possibility of taxing wealth, perhaps through an inheritance tax.

> We oppose the direction this government is taking in reducing universality and cutting or capping transfer payments earmarked for social programs. In a short five years, these measures have begun to seriously erode the safety net Canada has developed over the last half century and in which we, as seniors, have had some part. The result will be increasing inequity among Canadians, property, ill health and, we are convinced, greater costs in the long term than the amount saved now.

One Voice goes on to list briefly some of their concerns and criticisms of the GST:

> The tax is regressive, I repeat, and will hit lower- and middle-income Canadians much harder than wealthy people. There is general concern that manufacturers or retailers will pass on savings when the manufacturers sales tax is replaced by the 7 per cent GST. We believe prices will simply go up.
> Seniors and others on fixed incomes do not have the financial flexibility to meet the extra rise in inflation expected due to the imposition of the GST.
> Seniors spend most of their income on the necessities of life mostly because of generally lower income levels. Families also spend most of their income due to the high expenses of child rearing. These two groups will pay a greater proportion of their income in tax due to the GST than other Canadians. What is the reasoning for this?
> According to our calculations, the proposed tax credit is not enough to compensate for the increase in taxes, particularly with the addition of tax on services. The credit is not fully indexed to inflation. It will go down each year, becoming less effective at buffering the poor.
> Mr. Wilson introduced the tax on the basis of fairness and simplicity. We see this tax as unfair and certainly not simple. The complexity of administering the flow-through mechanism, the growing confusion about tax exempt and tax-free status, and the change in calculation methods for small business all have made this tax hard to understand and extremely expensive to administer for both businesses and the government.
> The government is claiming that the GST is simply replacing the outmoded MST on goods. However, more than replacing the existing tax, the GST will be imposed on services, a major part of our spending that has never been taxed before. This is not just a replacement tax. It is an additional tax of enormous magnitude. The new tax will not be visible, as Mr. Wilson had originally promised. If that was the major flaw with the MST, it has not been solved with the proposed GST.

Senator Molgat: Senator Fairbairn, may I ask a question? You have raised an interesting point. Seniors are really not in that part of their life where they are buying goods. They have made most of their purchases of washing machines, dryers and household goods. They purchase more services than they do capital goods. Because under this legislation services will be taxed, the impact will be proportionately higher on seniors.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Do you know whether any studies have been conducted in that regard; that is, on the spending and buying habits of different age groups and how those habits change as they get older and move away from purchasing capital goods to purchasing services? I should imagine that Statistics Canada could provide figures of that kind. I had never focused on that particular point until you raised it.

Senator Fairbairn: That is one of the reasons I wanted to re-read this brief. Apart from everything else, it is a very cogent, well-presented reflection of not only their position but that position as it will be affected by the tax. I do not know whether Statistics Canada has a breakdown of the buying habits of different age groups.

One of the reasons I have supported this organization so strongly since its inception is that, in my view, it has an enormous opportunity to present the views of senior citizens and to make a great contribution to our national life. We all know about the demographic changes that are taking place in Canada. Increasingly, a larger percentage of Canadian population is made up of seniors. I do not believe that any government or, for that matter, any political party has come to grips with the kinds of policy adjustments that must be made in order to allow our senior citizens to have the opportunity to live the kind of lives they so richly deserve and to continue to contribute to the fabric of this country.

Of course, most of our senior citizens live on fixed incomes. Perhaps their material needs are less, but many of the seniors I know still save and hoard their pension incomes so that they can enjoy outings for a nice dinner, to see a movie, to participate in clubs and that kind of thing. For a great number of obvious reasons, their reliance on services increases in comparison to their expenditures on capital goods.

● (2330)

So they do have a special problem. They have a problem; we have an opportunity; and we ought to get together and make sure that they have the maximum opportunity to make their contribution. I do not think we are doing that and this tax is not doing that. The One Voice People go on to say:

> We have no guarantees that the tax will not go up. In fact, the experience of other countries indicates that it will rise. Many seniors are so close to the edge that this will push them below the poverty line. We question the principle of using a regressive form of taxation to aid in deficit reduction. There are alternatives and we continue the favour the progressive income tax system.

Mrs. Woodsworth of One Voice goes on to focus on a few issues related to the GST that seniors find particularly worrisome, especially in the area of support services. This will interest Senator Molgat.

> As I have mentioned, seniors spend most of their income on the necessities of life. This is mostly because they fall into the lower income categories, yet must purchase goods and services for daily living like most other people.

As we age, our need to consume goods is usually less than that of the young, growing families. We have already bought our stove, our house, our car and our furniture.

Research shows that seniors are heavy users of services.

When the stove breaks down, the house needs a new roof, or we need to replace the brakes in our car, we have to pay for that service.

In addition, those of us who are not as spry as we used to be may have to hire someone to shovel the driveway or cut the lawn. All these services will be taxable now. Seniors do not have a lot of options. We must hire these services or experience a deteriorating quality of life and perhaps increased risk, but certainly increased dependency.

Senator Stanbury: Senator Fairbairn, I should like to ask you a question. You have been speaking about the problems seniors have. I noticed an article in the Edmonton Journal of November 29 that deals with the results of the tax reforms of this government. This gives us the first opportunity to see how the burden falls as a result of the first part of tax reform. The article is under the byline of Norm Ovenden of the Journal's Ottawa Bureau. It reads:

Tory tax reform is helping the rich and hurting the poor, New Democrat MP Ross Harvey charged Wednesday.

Taxation statistics for 1988 show that the three million Canadians earning $15,000 a year or less saw their tax bill increase by an average of $71, or 13 per cent, over 1987 levels, Harvey told the Commons.

In the same year, Canadians earning more than $250,000 enjoyed and average tax savings of $20,597, or a drop of 15 per cent, he told Finance Minister Michael Wilson.

If the first element of tax reform has had that effect on the poor, what is your guesstimate as to the effect of the second element of tax reform?

Senator Fairbairn: In perusing the brief I am reading tonight, clearly this level of tax reform is going to have a frightening effect on the lower level income earners in this country. There is no question about that. When you look at the people who are in that bracket, they are also the people least prepared, for a variety of reasons, to be able to improve their position of advantage. This tax inexorably drags them down.

This brief from One Voice with respect to the position of seniors is very candid. It is talking about the services that, as they age, seniors require, not only to maintain their quality of life, but also to make sure that the situation within their life does not place them at risk. That is basic. As they say:

A 7 per cent increase will make the services very expensive and the decision to purchase them much more difficult. Seniors ask where the money will come from.

Where will it come from if you are on a fixed or minimal income?

Seniors who are ill or increasingly frail need additional services to remain independent.

That is a big issue as the number of seniors dramatically increases and will continue to do so after the year 2000.

The government has said that health care services will not be taxed. We cannot be so sure. The legislation is remarkably vague in this area.

It is just about as vague as it is on what is going to happen to the erosion of credits in the future.

Sometimes the tax imposition is dependent on the nature of the service, sometimes on who provides it or where. For example, some services are not taxed if they are provided by a hospital or charitable organization. Many services that help seniors stay independent in their homes do not fall into this category.

What of the many non-medical services seniors need? The cost of hiring a visiting homemaker who will help with cooking and cleaning—

if you are not able to manage by yourself —or a personal care attendant to help with bathing, or a sitter to watch someone who wanders is already $14 an hour, or over $100 a day. Now it will cost $7 more per day in GST, or an extra $364 over the course of a year for just one day of help per week. You can see that the GST credit to a maximum of $290 for a single senior or $380 for a couple does not looks so generous.

Another example might be a foot care clinic operated by a charitable or hospital organization. That foot care clinic will not have to charge tax on the service, but if there is a commercial firm down the road providing the same service, the charity will have to charge tax.

Obviously to avoid unfair competition.

Who determines how far down the road that business has to be? How many seniors will have to give up their mobility because they cannot afford proper foot care?

On the other side, charitable organizations will have to pay the GST on goods and services they purchase despite the rebate of about half the new tax. This comes at a time when governments at all levels are divesting themselves of their responsibilities to provide services and expecting the voluntary sector to take up the slack. These agencies will see their expenses go up. At the same time, they are experiencing cuts in their grant revenues due to federal government reductions in payments through the Canada Assistance Plan and the Established Program Financing mechanisms. Moreover, it is becoming harder and harder for community social agencies to obtain charitable status from Revenue Canada.

The squeeze seems to be coming from all sides. It may be that the only solution that such organizations can see is to increase their user fees. Seniors, who are already at the limit of their spending power, will not be able to afford the very services that are designed to keep them in their homes.

The result will be premature institutionalization at a cost to the state estimated at between 8 and 20 times the cost of supported community living in independent homes. The GST is a disincentive to community care. Yet, at the same time, nursing homes will be raising their rates because of the GST.

Senator LeBlanc: Shame!

Senator Fairbairn:

Who will absorb these costs? As the Canadian Long-Term Care Association points us, the impact of these policies can only be negative at a time when the demographics of our country indicate the need for more resources for long-term care services.

Honourable senators, we seniors did not set out to become wards of the state. We planned, saved, and did without all our lives in order to enjoy a secure and independent retirement. Inflation, taxes and these other government measures are beating us down. We typically have small, usually non-indexed pensions—if at all.

Our income from savings is now taxable since losing the investment income deduction. Over half of Canadian women over the age of 55 are living below the poverty line.

Senator Stanbury: Isn't that a shame!

Senator Fairbairn:

The partial indexation of the tax system means that taxes go up automatically every year and more and more of those women become taxable. Added to these factors, this tax will be another severe burden.

These are the facts.

I must say, honourable senators, they are not facts we hear very often.

They have been calculated, projected, analyzed and underscored by major social policy groups in the country. They just do not make economic sense. How can the governments justify the outcomes of this squeeze?

I would like to touch very briefly on two other issues. First is the political fairness of the GST to our generation.

Throughout our lives, Canada collected tax revenues through an income-tax oriented system. Revenue from consumption taxes was minimal. While the seniors of today were in the workforce, we paid high income tax. Now that we have retired and live on fixed incomes, the rules are being changed as the system is redirected towards our consumption taxes. Those in the workforce are getting some income tax breaks. We who have already paid generously in the past are being hit with another opportunity to pay generously.

Not only is this unfair,—

Senator Austin: It is outrageous!

Senator Fairbairn:

[Senator Fairbairn.]

—but it also comes at a time in our lives when our financial options are very limited.

The second is a danger we see in the administration of the GST credit. Two weeks ago—

This brief was presented on June 13, so this would be in early June:

—Statistics Canada released preliminary data from its survey of literacy skills used in daily activities. It found that a shocking 64 per cent of older Canadians are unable to cope with most everyday reading material and demands.

Sixty-four per cent!

This means that seniors avoid situations requiring reading. Those who do not file income tax returns because they are poor probably will not apply for the GST credit. The very segment the government is trying to help will not receive it.

This is what we were discussing earlier, Senator Austin. Honourable senators, the One Voice brief concludes:

. . . we urge this committee to reject the goods and services tax in favour of a progressive, fair and equitable tax system.

I do not know how anyone reading or hearing that brief could support the GST as it exists. I wonder if the Minister of Finance has ever read this brief presented by One Voice, because it is an incredibly frank, professional and meaningful account of the damage that this tax will do to the most vulnerable in our society.

Senator Austin: Senator Fairbairn, was that brief presented to the Senate Banking Committee?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, it was.

Senator Austin: And what did we hear in response to that brief from Conservative senators?

Senator Fairbairn: That I do not know. Senator Olson may know. Perhaps I can refresh his memory or maybe he does remember the kind of reception that Mrs. Woodsworth, the President of the One Voice seniors' network received from the committee. I do not know whether Senator Olson has anything to offer at this point. However, I too would hope, Senator Austin—but perhaps not expect—that, at the very least, this brief, which is so persuasive, would have been passed on to the Minister of Finance at that time, particularly in June, when there was lots of time to contemplate amendments without losing face. I use that expression because it seems to me that that is what is going on here. The government does not want to lose face by accepting any amendments at this point. In June, when these people came before the committee with this kind of brief, there was plenty of time, and it is incredible that changes of some sort were not made.

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senator, I am shocked by what you have been telling us, and I am sure that everyone in the chamber is. I have always assumed, perhaps naively, that people who entered public life entered it because of compassion and a desire to improve the lot of their fellow human beings. Now here we have members of a government whose interest seems to be to improve the lot of certain human beings but not to give a care to the lot of the human beings who most seriously need the assistance of government and the rest of us, in a charitable sense. I wonder, is there any evidence that, in the course of the preparation of the GST, the government gave a thought—other than this inadequate credit system that you have already mentioned, with a turn-around at $11,000—to the poor people in our society, or the elderly, many of whom are very poor?

Senator Fairbairn: I certainly have not seen any evidence of that in anything that I have read, Senator Stanbury. In the early part of this afternoon, I was trying to trace, almost from 1984 on, how there have been recurrent changes in the taxation policies of this government, which really has not shown any sensitivity to those whom the changes are hurting, whom they are hitting most. I ask you to cast your mind back to that very lively debate beginning, I believe, in the late fall of 1984, over the proposition for de-indexing seniors' pensions. I can remember the Minister of Finance—the same Minister of Finance who is giving us the GST—saying publicly on television that the seniors in this country were eager to get involved in making their contribution through de-indexation of their pensions.

Senator Stanbury: He certainly found out!

Senator Fairbairn: He cited his mother, I believe.

Senator Austin: Or the Prime Minister's mother.

Senator Fairbairn: Or the Prime Minister's mother, but Michael Wilson has a mother, too, and she apparently told him that she was eager to have her pension de-indexed, and I guess from that he extrapolated that everyone else was, too. Well, did he hear in spades!

As was brought out very poignantly in this brief, the seniors in this country have already made their contribution under the rules of the day when they were working. They paid. They tightened their belts. They fought wars. They went through the Depression.

Senator Stanbury: And now they get clawed back.

Senator Fairbairn: Now they get clawed back and hit with the GST at a time when they are most vulnerable and without options to fight back.

Senator Olson: It is all because of Tory mismanagement.

Senator Fairbairn: There are two statistics that I have been aware of, but on reading them again they just seem incredible. The first is that over half of Canadian women over the age of 55 are living below the poverty line. How can the government contemplate hitting them with this tax? It is similar to the north being averaged out on some model contained inside the Department of Finance that gives no consideration to the individual needs of the Canadian people who are unable to cope with these kinds of economic pressures.

The other statistic here is one that I discussed earlier. Sixty-four per cent of older Canadians are unable to cope with most everyday reading demands. My God, what that does to their situation! I am not meaning just economically, but in terms of adding to the isolation and the loneliness of people of those years as they lose their support structure of families and friends. It is incredible to think that that part of our society would not be given very special consideration by any government. So much for fairness and so much for a non-regressive GST!

When you think about it, the GST is really nothing more, and nothings less, than yet another battle in this government's ideological fight against the concept of fairness in our tax measures and against universality of our social assistance programs. I recall what the Right Honourable John Turner had to say about a year ago in describing the commitment of our party to the concepts of universality and fairness. He spoke during a debate in the House of Commons over the government's clawback of old age pensions and family allowances which, regrettably, went through this house earlier this fall. His speech was recorded in the House of Commons Debates of October 11, 1989, and I quote:

> If there is one characteristic that is Canadian, if there is one quality by which we like to define ourselves, it is the quality of fairness, equal opportunity and equal treatment. We believe that no matter where you come from, where you live, what you earn, who your family is that you have an equal right to the social programs of this country, that all individuals are entitled to the social programs as a right of citizenship. It is part of the social contract in return for a lifetime of contribution to our community.
> We believe that all Canadians deserve that equal and equitable treatment no matter what their social status. Universality means that everyone is treated the same. We do not mean that you don't tax the rich more than the poor. We believe in a progressive income tax where those who have the ability to pay, pay. That is the fault with this goods and services tax. It is regressive.
> We have always believed that if you limit programs and direct them to the poor, if you design them for the poor, if you design them for those at the lower income scales, then those programs inevitably become poor programs. Universality means that the rich man and the poor man wait in the same doctor's office for the same service and are covered in the same way. They mean that regardless of income, regardless of connections, there is equal treatment.
> Universality has been a unifying force in our country. It makes our social programs credible because there is no ghettoizing of the haves and the have-nots, such as the poor get something and the rich don't. Everybody does, subject to an over-all taxation system, but the programs are credible because when they come to all of us then we are all behind them. They are community programs, and that is why Canada has been the most successful country in the world.

> The danger is that once you start tinkering with that principle, once you start undermining the principle of universality, you put everything in question. Who decides who gets what benefits? Where do you draw the line? Who decides which of our citizens need more help than the next one? Once the principle is abandoned and discretion is reintroduced into our social programs, what is next? Medicare? Hospitalization? Free public education?

> Oh, some members may raise their eyebrows, but this is the first government in Canadian history that has ever put a tax on learning, a tax on books. This government is destabilizing and endangering the social contract which is based on trust, legitimate expectation, reliance on the word of our public officers.

Those comments by the Rt. Hon. John Turner were made more than one year ago and certainly gave a very prophetic ring to the nature of the debate on the GST as it moved from the House of Commons and into the Senate, and also the unemployment insurance bill, the clawback, that was moving with it. Mr. Turner and his colleagues did push that clawback bill to the limit but they were defeated through the use of closure in the House.

Senator Olson: There is no democracy left; it is just a dictatorship.

Senator Fairbairn: Closure has subsequently been passed to this chamber, thanks to the Prime Minister's eight new senators. As expected, all the new senators who have come to us in recent weeks have duly voted with the government on the legislation, even though I am not sure if all of them have read the views of Canadians who have written to us or contacted us on so many occasions before those votes were taken earlier this fall.

This afternoon I was asked by Senator Davey whether I thought the government did not understand the views of Canadians or did not care. That is adifficult question to answer, because I do not know how the government could have missed some of the flood of letters and petitions from ordinary Canadians who are opposed to this tax and are demanding that we on this side of the chamber push it to the limit in our attempt to block it. That in itself is an important reason for this debate, for each of us to express in our varying ways what we have heard to underline the strength of pressure on this house from Canadians.

I have a few comments to bring to the attention of senators. Some of those comments are from individuals, and some are from those representing groups. In total they represent the feelings of literally millions of Canadians who are opposed to this tax. These comments come from the hearings of the Senate committee. They are encapsulated comments of witnesses who appeared before the Senate committee and are short and to the point but give an idea of the core of the comments on the GST that brought people to the hearings. I will whip through them as quickly as I can.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

On June 12, 1990, Mr. Cosmo Mannella of the Carpenters' Union stated:

> The Senate has come under considerable attack with respect to its position in holding back and blocking that legislation . . . In this instance, the Senate is providing the only buffer between the people and real democracy. By all indications it would appear that this government has lost the trust and confidence of most of the people in this country. We urge you to fight on and to block this legislation . . .

In Ottawa on June 28, Mr. Jeff Rose, National President of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, stated:

> In Canada the primary check on the majority power of government is the Senate . . . the Senate has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner . . . No democratic system gives total carte blanche to its elected government . . . this government's unprecendented betrayal of the interest of the people throws into question its very right to govern. Without doubt the Senate has a more popular mandate right now than does the Commons. You have the constitutional legitimacy, the parliamentary authority and the democratic responsibility to stop the GST.

In Charlottetown on July 9, Ms. Mary Boyd, Director, Social Action Commission of the Diocese of Charlottetown, appeared before the committee.

Senator Bonnell: A fine lady.

Senator Fairbairn: As a matter of fact, I met her in the early part of this debate.

Senator Bonnell: She was from the Pro-Canada group.

Senator Fairbairn: She is a very fine woman and she told the committee:

> I think every democratic country in the Western World has some kind of a body which serves as a check of the elected majority. In Canada that is the Senate. You are the body of sober second thought, and that is your constitutional right . . . the polls show that the people of Canada are behind the Senate in asking that the goods and services tax be stopped . . . we approve of your stopping this bill. We think you have the constitutional right to do so.

Senator Bonnell: She is right.

Senator Fairbairn: Also in Charlottetown on July 9, Mr. Ted Crocket, President, P.E.I. Council of the Canadian Federation of Labour, stated:

> While you are not elected, the bottom line is that you are part of the process. After all, you were appointed by an elected government that was elected by the people, so while directly you are not elected, you are elected indirectly by the representatives of the people . . . we are here to ask you to take that sober second look at what is involved and what can happen, regardless of what economists and so-called experts have to say. Let us start listening to everyday Canadians.

Again in Charlottetown on July 9, Ms. Barb Boudreau appeared before the committee. Do you know her?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, she is also a good lady.

Senator Fairbairn: Also speaking on behalf of CUPE, she stated:

> . . . the Senate has a responsibility to block the GST . . . Every democratic political system in the world has in place a set of checks and balances which constrain the actions of its elected government, preventing it from abusing its majority.
> In Canada the primary check on the majority power of the government is the Senate . . . the Senate has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner . . . No democratic system gives a total carte blanche to its elected government . . . Since this government has not courage and not willingness to listen to Canadians, it is up to the Senate to act. (Killing the bill) would be an honourable and democratic act.

You were at this meeting in Charlottetown, Senator Bonnell.

Senator Bonnell: I was there. All the witnesses were against this tax except the Mayor of Summerside.

Senator Fairbairn: I guess the Mayor of Summerside is in a very difficult position.

Mr. Leo Cheverie of the PEI Pro-Canada Network stated:

> The Senate has a duty to this pain by stopping the GST . . . the federal government has the confidence of only 15 per cent of Canadians.

That was on July 9. Now it only has 14 per cent.

> . . . the Senate enjoys a much higher percentage of Canadian voter confidence.

In Moncton, New Brunswick, on July 10, Mr. Sandy Beckingham of the Campbellton-Dalhousie District Labour Council, stated:

> . . . the Senate has a purpose. You have been given a mandate and until such time as that mandate is changed or modified, you are in power in the Senate and you must take whatever moves you feel are necessary.

Of course, that was before the influx of the eight new senators.

> If in your opinion you feel that the general public is opposed to the GST, you as a senator have the right—and you are supposed to have the will—to stop it in any way, shape or form within the rules that govern you.

That is a very important point made by Mr. Sandy Beckingham in Moncton, and I am sure he has been watching the proceedings in this place with some dismay as they have developed this fall.

Also in Moncton, Mr. John McEwan of the New Brunswick Federation of Labour stated:

> Finally, the New Brunswick Federation of Labour believes that the Senate, contrary to the spin that is attempted to be put on by Members of Parliament because you are not elected, has a mandate similar to the Supreme Court of Canada, which is also not elected, to protect the citizens of this country from government excesses and abuses. We encourage you to take the necessary steps to avoid citizens of this country having to suffer under a repressive regime which is not people oriented.

Also in Moncton on July 10, Mr. Bernard Richard of the New Brunswick Senior Citizens Federation Inc., stated:

> It is our belief that this Senate committee has the constitutional right and responsibility to reject the proposed goods and services tax. Seniors in New Brunswick feel that you will exercise that right. You have proof that over 80 per cent of all Canadians are not in favour of the GST . . .

In St. John's, Newfoundland, on July 11, Dr. Laurel Doucette, of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of St. John's, stated:

> I believe you do have the moral right and moral duty to (kill the bill) when it is obvious the government is not considering the well-being of the majority of Canadians.

Again in St. John's on July 11, Mr. Larry Brown of the National Union of Provincial Government Employees, stated:

> We recognize that it is the constitutional duty of the Senate to review legislation . . . We do not believe as a general rule that the Senate should use those powers to delay or obstruct the decisions of Parliament. However, we think, given the set of circumstances that we are facing that it would be profoundly democratic for the Senate to delay this legislation . . . Millions of Canadians feel that their wishes are being ignored, and we have even seen the rather odd experience of M.P.s being muzzled if they dare to take a position on behalf of their constituents against the GST. The government has showed no indication whatsoever that it wants to listen to Canadians with regard to this tax, and it has used every means to prevent legitimate discussion on it, so we are glad to see the Senate exercising its power in this case.

July 12th in Halifax. Mr. Jeff Brett, South Shore Labour Council.

> . . . we are in situation in this country where we have a government that is completely out of sync with the wishes of the vast majority of the people. I think you have a moral responsibility as the only recourse left . . . you are the only recourse to preventing what we see will be the disastrous effect of a government that appears not to be listening to certain regions of this country . . .

July 12th, Halifax. Mr. Sid Pobihushchy of the Atlantic Co-op.

> Parliament is charged with a particular mandate by the Constitution—that is, to provide peace, order and good government. We are talking here about good government. That charge in the Canadian Constitution is not merely a charge to the House of Commons or to the Senate, but to Parliament. The House of Commons, as we know, is an integral part of Parliament as is the Senate . . .

We know that in the present case we have a government in place that was elected by something in the order of 43 per cent of the electorate . . . It has a healthy, handsome majority in the House of Commons, a majority that is not a function of the people's choice but a majority as a function of the rules. Those rules also give the Senate an authority to act on behalf of the pursuit of good government, and it uses those rules, whatever they are, however they are designed, in that pursuit; and if the rules permit it, and it is required to stand opposed to a particular piece of legislation, action or policy, it is duty-bound to do that. That is part and parcel of the Canadian democracy. I do not think we have any real serious difficulty with the Senate doing its job. We have difficulty with a Parliament that does not do its job . . .

July 12, again, in Halifax. Mr. Gerald Yetman, of the Canadian Union of Public Employees.

Senator Buchanan, do you know Mr. Yetman?

Senator Buchanan: Yes.

Senator Fairbairn: He said:

Every democratic political system in the world has in place a set of checks and balances which constrain the actions of its elected government, preventing it from abusing its majority . . .

In Canada, the primary check on the majority power of the government is the Senate . . . the Senate has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner.

That is why the Senate must reject the governments goods and services tax.

Again in Halifax, on July 12th. Mr. Lawrence Pitaro, Private Citizen:

Whether the Senate is an elected or unelected body is of little import. What is of great import is that it has it in its power to defeat the GST Bill. By defeating the bill the Senate can show the country and the world that in a democracy the people are sovereign, and in defeating the bill the Senate is merely practising true democracy by reflecting the will of the people; something which Parliament refuses to do.

July 12th, Halifax, Miss Shirley Marryat, Private Citizen:

. . . the Senate has a moral right to stand up for the people of Canada and be counted . . . you have to stop and think about the small people in Canada. We are not rich . . . I think you have a legal and moral right to protect people against the GST . . . if you are honourable people of the level I think you are, you should go along with what the people not only want and expect but what they need to live as real equal Canadians.

July 13th, Halifax. Miss Alexa McDonough, Leader of the Provincial New Democratic Party. It is interesting coming from Miss McDonough as an NDP, and also, as Senator Buchanan indicated, Mr. Yetman has a position as, I think he said, Vice-President of the NDP in Nova Scotia.

Miss McDonough said:

Belief in our country and in our system of government could not be more effectively undermined than by the imposition of such a sweeping new tax in the teeth of overwhelming public opposition . . .

Once the voters come to believe they cannot make a difference, the gates are wide open for ever greater abuse by those who manage to gain power . . .

Honourable Senators, you and your colleagues are the only people left who have the power to stop the GST and thereby force the Government into making other, better tax choice.

There is a real sense that we barely live in a democracy when, despite the fact that it is expressed so overwhelming by people that they are opposed to this, the House of Commons has been unwilling, through the Government of the day, to give even a fair hearing.

. . . the Senate remains the only option to kill this Draconian tax.

July 16th, in Montreal, Mrs. Ruth Rose, Advisory Committee on the Status of Women.

. . . the Government has not permitted the Canadian people to participate in the democratic process. The House of Commons Finance Committee hearings were ridiculously short . . . The Government is not willing to listen to anybody and it is not willing to make any changes to any of its laws. I do not believe it has a mandate from the Canadian people any longer, as the polls indicate.

. . . We would hope that you (the Senate) simply not adopt this bill.

July 18th, Miss Elizabeth Barkley, Ontario Secondary School Teacher's Federation.

It would seem to me that if the Senate were able to block, defeat, kill, or send this bill to the black hole of Calcutta, it would go a long way in showing Canadians that at least one part of our Government listens.

July 18th, Toronto, Mr. Jack Shapiro, Periodical Marketers of Canada.

We are also of the view that it would be quite in order constitutionally and otherwise for the Senate to take into account the sentiments of an overwhelming majority of Canadian people and declare that this legislation is unacceptable as a whole and that it will not receive the assent of the Senate.

July 19th, in Toronto, Miss Donna Peconi of IRATE Citizens of Peterborough.

We realize that you as appointees are being asked to override the elected body. You have alluded to the moral dilemma created by such a request. What you must consider is the dilemma created when there exists a majority in the House of Commons and the House refuses to listen to the majority of its constituents.

In our system of government, the line between democracy and dictatorship would almost be indistinguishable but for the Senate. The buck stops right here.

... The people have never called on you as they are calling on you now. The House of Commons did not have a mandate to introduce, much less pass, Bill C-62 ...

When this bill was introduced, a majority of the Canadian people rose up in vehement opposition. We have not gone away. We do not want it. We do not feel we need it. We have suggested alternatives to it.

July 23rd, in Winnipeg, Ms. Susan Hart-Kubaba of the Manitoba Federation of Labour.

If there is, in fact, a house of sober second thought, we are appealing to you to ensure that this legislation does not pass ... there is a responsibility at this point on the house of sober second thought to put its foot down and say that ... the people will have a chance to have their say and to offer some input ...

July 24th, Winnipeg, Doctor Edward Agnew, Private Citizen.

Government of the people, by the people, for the people, is in jeopardy in this country and this piece of legislation is helping to get rid of it.

In fact, at the present time Canadians are wondering what the democratic process in this country is all about ...

This goods and services tax must be defeated because it is undemocratic legislation ... And you, Senators, are the only people who stand between the democratic process of Canada that I used to know and straight dictatorship.

July 24th, Winnipeg, Mr. Arthur Alan de Jardin, Private Citizen.

There has been a great deal in the newspapers lately about the question: Has the Senate the moral authority to stop the GST? I would suggest that every Senator and the body itself certainly has that authority ...

Senators, it is important that we ... look ... within ourselves and make the kind of decisions that may not stand up in the press, that may not get us a lot of friends,

... but which see us do the right thing. We have to get back to doing what is right, what is correct and what is moral ...

You certainly have the legal authority because you have stopped other bills without legal challenge. You certainly have the Canadian people behind you.

July 25th, in Regina, Mr. Morley Evans, Association of Saskatchewan Taxpayers.

The Senate of Canada was established to provide the country with an institution whose members could bring their experience and wisdom to public policy matters of importance ... The role of the Senate is to endow issues of substance with sober consideration.

... The Senate can forestall the imposition of this very unpopular and extremely unwise tax. By doing so the Senate can best serve Canada and best discharge its duty to all Canadians.

July 25th, Regina, Mr. David Orchard, Citizen concerned about Free Trade.

• (0030)

Many people criticize the Senate as being undemocratic and an old-age-folks' home. The Senate is the one institution that has provided real opposition to Mr. Mulroney and his government ...

... What moral authority does this government have to impose the policies that are universally opposed by the people of this country? Mr. Mulroney stands less than 20 per cent in the polls ... He has no moral authority for the GST.

He went on to say that the Senate, "is the one democratic thread that we have left in the last six years in this country."

July 25, also in Regina, Mr. Murray Carr, private citizen:

In the conduct of our parliamentary affairs, there is the considered fundamental principle of no taxation without representation, but what do we do as citizens when we come to our elected representatives to speak to them and tell them our views only to be told we are stupid and need a grade 5 teacher to teach us the basics? ... I suggest that it is entirely appropriate that the house of sober second thought, the Senate, should, from time to time, reflect on the status of the concept of democracy in Canada and give consideration to the manner in which that concept is or is not made manifest in our community through our democratic institutions.

July 26, Mr. Kevin Avram, Canadian Federation of National and Provincial Taxpayers:

The Senate of Canada was established to provide the country with an institution whose members could bring their experience and wisdom to public policy matters of importance ... The role of the Senate is to endow issues of substance with sober consideration ... The Senate of Canada enjoys a unique position in the country. It can forestall the imposition of this very unpopular and extremely unwise tax. By doing so, the Senate of Canada can best serve Canada and best discharge its duty to all Canadians.

July 26, Edmonton, Ms. Mary Ellen Riemann, private citizen:

I would like to speak from the perspective of all those Canadians who feel helpless and ignored.

I wish to emphasize the very strong link between economic freedom, personal freedom and democracy. We come dangerously close to losing all of these when a government becomes fiscally irresponsible, unaccountable and imposes unreasonable taxes ...

> On behalf of those who are unheard and ignored, and those who are affected the most by the GST, namely our children, the elderly, the poor and the middle class, I call upon you, the Senate of Canada, to use whatever power you have under the Constitution to prevent the implementation of the GST.

July 26, Edmonton, Mr. Michael Marlowe, Alberta Council on Aging, said that the Senate has a most responsible role to play in our democratic system of government, that our Conservative majority in the House of Commons has taken an inflexible position in their zeal to implement the goods and services tax concept. He said that this position is in complete disregard of the wishes of their respective constituencies as set out by the various polls, individual organizations and group representations made to them in opposition to the GST. He went on to say that the people of Canada had lost confidence in our elected representatives due to their failure to keep their commitments, their campaign promises, and their failure to support the views of those who had elected them. He indicated that the Senate had the constitutional power to provide the checks and balances so essential in preserving and making our democratic system work. He encouraged us to play our constitutional and responsible role.

July 26, Edmonton again, Mr. David Fletcher, Edmonton Southeast Progressive Conservative Association.

Senator Steuart: Conservative?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Steuart: Was he against the tax?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes. He was saying to us—

Senator Steuart: He sang?

Senator Fairbairn: No, but we did have a lady who sang at a meeting as well.

Senator Steuart: I have a brother who sang. He sent my uncle up for three years.

Senator Fairbairn: This lady sang a different song, one in opposition to the GST. Mr. David Fletcher did not sing, but he said the following:

> You are all appointed . . . I believe you owe your allegiance not to the party or to the person who nominated you into that position but to the people of Canada, to the regions of this country, so that you can protect the country as a whole. There has to be a check and balance in the system . . . We believe that until all of you are elected you have the right and responsibility to the citizens of this country to stop this nonsense . . .

July 26, again in Edmonton, Mr. Randy Stoddard, private citizen:

> I asked my MP, whom I helped elect, what he thought of the GST. He was against it. The majority of his constituents were against it. However, he went to Ottawa and voted for it because the Progressive Conservative Party demanded that he vote yes or else get booted out of caucus. This scares the hell out of me. Democracy is dying in Canada. Our only hope at this point is that the honourable members of the Senate will listen to the people of Canada and reject this regressive tax.

July 27, Mr. Don Aitken, Alberta Federation of Labour:

> We are asking the Senate to use its powers to kill the GST . . . It has a more popular mandate to act than does the House of Commons. Not only would it be the right decision morally and economically, we believe that the Senate also has the constitutional authority to make this move . . .
> Until its important democratic duties are vested elsewhere, the Senate has a powerful constitutional obligation to ensure that the elected government of the country respects the public will. The government has made it abundantly clear that it will pay no heed to public opinion. Since it has neither the courage nor the respect for the wishes of the people, the Senate must act to delay or defeat the bill.

July 27, Edmonton, Mr. Lucien Royer, Pro Canada Network:

> At what point can a Member of Parliament say, "Well, I'm going to follow the party line and I am not going to listen to my constituents"? When that starts to be a trend right across the country and they start arguing, this is not the nature of our democracy . . . In my view, and in the view of the Pro Canada Network, the House of Commons has abdicated its responsibility. It is not listening and it is not fulfilling its constitutional requirements.

Again in Edmonton, July 27, Mr. Terry Hlady, private citizen. As I recall, Mr. Halady also declared himself to be a very concerned Conservative. He had this to say:

> As a result of these hearings, and as a result of the legislation that is before Canada today, there can be no doubt as to the absolutely critical need for the Senate of Canada, the importance of it to all Canadians and I want to thank you for that . . . You have the joint responsibility for our nation . . . The GST has to be stopped. It is a dangerous piece of legislation.

July 27, Edmonton, Mr. Laurence Decore, Leader of the Liberal Party of Alberta. As I recall, he presented a very good brief. He had this to say:

> You are there because the BNA Act, the Constitution of Canada, says that you have a role as the chamber of sober second thought, which is supposed to be the check and the balance to laws that are wrong, improperly drafted, or that Canadians do not like . . . An overwhelming majority of Albertans are opposed to this tax, and I am the messenger of that feeling to you.

July 30, Yellowknife, Mr. Darm Crook, President, Union of Northern Workers:

> A recent survey . . . found that only 14 per cent of Canadians favour the GST . . . Two-thirds of Canadians are opposed to the tax . . . Canadians do not want the tax and Canadians have not been duped by the massive propaganda efforts of the federal government to convince > Canadians that the GST is in their best interests . . . Ordinary people . . . can only be pushed so far . . . The GST should be flatly refused by the Senate.

August 1, Vancouver, Mr. Ben Wolfe, SCRAP-IT, which is a community organization:

> The Senate of Canada is the safety net in the democratic system . . . Canadians do not want the GST. The government is forcing the people of Canada to accept the GST. Is this democracy? Ninety-five per cent of the people of Canada do not want the GST in any way, shape or form.
> The Senate of Canada has a mandate from the people to reject Bill C-62 . . . The people of Canada have spoken—no GST, senators.

Later on, he said:

> If you kill this legislation . . . The people of Canada would say that the Senate is doing its job by providing the safety net within the parliamentary system to ensure that bills that are against the wishes of the majority of Canadians are not passed.

August 1, Vancouver, Mr. Dominique Roelants, B.C. Council of Federal Ridings, New Democratic Party:

● (0045)

> . . . when the country was founded, the Senate was created as a house of sober second thought. The Senate, therefore, has the constitutional right, and perhaps even the obligation, to stop legislation that is clearly unfair to Canadians.

August 1, Vancouver, Ms. Marian Meagher, B.C. Federation of Labour:

> We scarcely need remind the committee that the federal government had no mandate from Canadians to implement this radical, regressive and unjust tax. The Senate remains for us the primary hope for a check against the abuse of majority power by this present government. You represent the only form of checks and balances available to constrain the abusive actions of an elected government bent on misusing its majority . . . senators have the constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner.
> This legislation does not reflect the will of the vast majority of Canadians. We call on you, the Senate, to reject it . . .

August 1, Vancouver, Ms. Jean Swanson, End Legislated Poverty:

> It is ironic that the appointed Senate is now being more responsive to the concerns of the people than is the elected government . . . Even if the Senate is an appointed body, now is the time for you to stick up for democracy by calling a halt to these Tory policies. We urge you to use all of your power and stop the GST.

August 1, Vancouver, Mr. Ken Novakowski, British Columbia Teachers' Federation:

> . . . I would always have difficulty in terms the Senate's denying, if you will, the right of the elected body to put forward legislation of its choice or decision. However, the circumstances are such that the Canadian population have overwhelmingly expressed their opposition to this measure. Therefore, as the chamber of sober second thought, the Senate has had that historical responsibility to cause those elected representatives to think again about exactly what they are doing.

August 1, Vancouver, Ms. Bernice Kirk, representing CUPE in British Columbia:

> Every democratic political system in the world has in place a set of checks and balances which constrain the actions of its elected government, preventing it from abusing its majority. In Canada, the primary check on the majority power of government is the Senate . . . the Senate has a constitutional responsibility to ensure that the elected government of this country acts in a democratic manner.
> That is why the Senate must reject the government's goods and services tax.

August 2, Vancouver, Mr. Blair Redlin, Coalition Against Free Trade:

> The Senate is the constitutional check on governments which have lost touch with what citizens want.
> If there was ever an issue which cried out for "sober second thought" from the Senate, it is this one. We urge you to do everything in your power to defeat the GST.
> . . . the Senate has the constitutional legitimacy, parliamentary authority and democratic responsibility to do the job.

August 3, Whitehorse, Mr. Larry Widen, Yukon Federation of Labour:

> I would urge the members of the Senate and of this committee to rise above the partisan politics of the situation, not only to defeat and reject the legislation for the GST because the legislation is bad, but also because, during the terms of the current government, the consultative process with the Canadian people in our democratic society has really been interfered with . . . you now have an opportunity to kill this bill and to make it clear that you are doing so because the government of the day must pay more attention to public opinion . . . You now have an opportunity to turn the political decision-making process in this country back around to one of consensus, which is a very honourable and long-standing tradition in the Canadian political system.

Honourable senators, those comments are from witnesses who appeared before the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. They represented all parties, a variety of views from every part of the country, including the north.

Throughout this list of witnesses there were basically two pleas: One is that the Senate has a responsibility and, in this case, perhaps a duty to reject this tax; and the other strain that goes through all of those comments is that only here do the Canadian people feel that they are being listened to, which is a sad commentary on our system.

Personally, I have also received thousands of names on petitions, many of which I have read in this house. I have also collected many letters demanding that this tax be stopped. Honourable senators, I can only assume that you have also received letters, but if not, you will no doubt want to know what some Canadians have been telling us. I have a few that were sent to me that I will read. I could probably go on all night with letters alone, but I will only read a few at this point. We have had an interesting evening with a good exchange among senators, and I perhaps responded too fully to some of the questions.

Senator Perrault: Not at all!

Senator Fairbairn: I have not completed all of my remarks, and I would like to do so, if senators will bear with me for a while. Before I move to the next phase of my speech, I would like to read some of the letters that were sent to me personally. This one comes from a lady in Calgary who wrote to me in June:

> Dear Senator,
> Despite the fact that Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and Finance Minister Michael Wilson say a non-elective Senate cannot hold up a money bill, I find this GST such an objectionable tax I will strongly back the Senate if they veto the bill.
> I wrote my member of Parliament about my concerns—how it represents a direct transfer of the tax burden from business to individual Canadians, but she ignored me, didn't even bother to reply with a form letter like she sent to my husband and daughter who sent pre-printed cards.
> Even at 7 per cent it is still unfair and unequal, a single parent will pay exactly the same tax on any item as a millionaire. Contrary to what Mr. Wilson says about a low income GST rebate, many low income people don't even file income tax returns (they may not have even seen one in their life) so won't get a rebate. Also, despite promises, the MST will not be taken off voluntarily, even with the $19 million "watchdog" department they are setting up. How could this group possibly check every industry in the country and what can it tell us if it is on an industry basis.
> Furthermore, the GST will have an adverse effect on our economy which is already feeling the negative effects of free trade, e.g. companies moving south.
> In this constituency our member of Parliament did not vote as her electorate asked, nor did all the other Progressive Conservatives (except for two Albertans).

I presume this lady means Alex Kindy and David Kilgour. She goes on:

> They had to vote as the Prime Minister wished (a "dictator's move" to my thinking)—all this even with the millions of petitions and letters sent to MPs. Taxation without representation is completely unacceptable in any truly democratic society. We Canadians now have no one else to appeal to. Our members of Parliament didn't listen. The Senate is our last resort and as members of the Canadian Parliament, you must use your wisdom and power to some way undo this frightening tax that has the potential for increasing government's tax revenues to fund this government's increasingly wasteful spending.
> All this money the government is spending to tell us how good this tax is for us is another example of why our deficit is growing so fast. It should have been used to help pay off some of the debt.
> I realize tax reform to replace the present federal sales tax system is necessary but not with GST. After June 23 I have no idea what the shape of the country will be in; it may be more difficult for the Senate to act as Mulroney may decide to fill all vacant Senate seats. However, I feel that the Senate is the only parliamentary body left for the Canadian electorate to appeal for the last chance for a democratic voice. Please kill the GST!
> Sincerely yours,
> Joan M. Sivertsen

She took the trouble to write a handwritten letter—I have never met her—to express these thoughts. When I get a letter like that, I pay attention to it.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Which member of Parliament was she referring to?

Senator Fairbairn: She did not say. It was a female member of Parliament. By the address Senator Hays would know which riding she was in.

Senator Sparrow: How many female members of Parliament are from Alberta?

Senator Fairbairn: I am trying to think of Calgary.

Senator Sparrow: There is Barbara Sparrow.

Senator Fairbairn: That is one, but I would not like to say at this point.

• (0100)

My next letter is dated October 6, 1990, from Tomahawk, Alberta from a Joyce vanden Elst:

> Dear Senator Fairbairn,
> As a Canadian citizen I urge you to stop the tax. Don't be afraid to stand up and say no. This tax is not good for Canada and can only increase the frustration of middle class Canada.
> Say no . . . and represent the majority of Canadians.

I have another handwritten note, and I like this one. It comes from a gentleman at Crystal Glass Auto Glass Distribution Centre in Grande Cache, Alberta. He just dashed off this note on the message paper from his company:

Thank you Joyce for helping to stop G.S.T. Please do anything it takes to stop it.

It is too costly to collect and an administrative nightmare for us businesses.

I will close my glass shop if it passes.

Yours Truly,

Stuart Peake

I have another handwritten letter which does not have an address, but I am wondering, Senator Buchanan, does the name Shirley Kitchen ring a bell with you? No? I seem to remember the name Kitchen was on petitions from Nova Scotia. At any rate, she writes:

Dear Madame:

Having heard you on Question Period—which is a program I did a while ago with Senator Nurgitz—

—I decided to write you, also Senator Nurgitz.

So many people have said they have never written to so many politicians as they have in the past months. We felt compelled to do so because we feel politicians, at all levels, are not listening to us. It is as if we do not exist. We felt it during Meech Lake & now with the G.S.T.

The government through their senate spokesman Senator Murray, would have us believe Canadians are disgusted with the way Liberal Senators are trying to kill the G.S.T. On the contrary, everyone seems to be cheering you on. In fact a recent Halifax, N. S. television poll asked people to call in whether they were for or against what Liberal Senators were doing. The result was 3,393 for & 1,315 against.

Yes, I come from the province whose premier flew the coop, & landed in a loft in the Senate . . . Though I had always been pro Conservative along with most of my relatives, we have washed our hands of them. It began with Meech Lake & the way most politicians used every dirty trick & lies to shove it upon English Canada. We felt every province should be equal, but alas the votes are in Quebec & Ontario. Incidentally, another poll, a month before Meech failed, showed that only 511 were for Meech, while 4,135 were against.

I guess what I am trying to say is that many, many people do not care what method all of you use to try & defeat the G.S.T. It will be devastating to most Canadians. I know it will be to me since my income . . . last year was a few thousand below the poverty level. The year before was even lower & yet thanks to Mr. Wilson & his tax reform I was put back on the income tax roll. That would be fine if people like me thought it would make a difference, but when we see the increase in government spending, & the steady increase in salaries of politicians, all politicians, we grow angry at being told to tighten our belts.

It seems to be time for some sort of watch dog on government spending & taxes. A referendum on certain issues . . . politicians have to start listening to the voice of people.

If Mulroney & his group of lemmings get elected again, Canadians should have their heads examined, & the country should sink below sea level.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn:

Please do not give up on fighting the G.S.T. It is a hated tax, every Conservative I hear it comes up, & the people are angry. We are overtaxed now, & the spending is out of control.

She concludes:

For what it's worth, I no longer want to see P.M.'s from Eastern Canada elected. I do not trust them.

I have an interesting one sent to me in October from a gentleman in Sherwood Park, which is a suburb of Edmonton:

Dear Mrs. Fairbairn:

Re: Your efforts to kill the G.S.T.

Thomas Jefferson, who as you know was the author of the American Declaration of Independence in 1776, devised a coat of arms for himself bearing the inscription "Rebellion to Tyrants is Obedience to God". Hopefully the sentiments expressed by this inscription will lend you and your compatriots in the Senate strength in resisting the criticisms of those who would say that you have no democratic right to do what you are doing.

Hang in there.

Yours truly,

Thomas E. Spratlin

I have another little handwritten one. This comes from Red Deer, Alberta, from Michael Shea:

Keep talking senator. We do not want the G.S.T. shoved down our throats by . . . Brian. Tell Brian—

Well, I will not tell you what he says to tell Brian. At any rate, he concludes his letter saying:

We Will Remember.

This one comes from Lethbridge, Alberta, my home town:

Dear Ms. Fairbairn:

In my opinion, it is the duty of the Senate to safeguard the interests of the Canadian people and I see nothing undemocratic about the Liberal senators' attempts to do just that. The so-called "elected" representatives of the Canadian majority are certainly not representing nor reflecting the wishes of the majority of their constituents. Keep up the good work!

That was from Joyce E. Scott, and she includes a clipping from the Lethbridge Herald which she indicates "says it all". It is entitled "Consumers not dull witted". The column was written in Toronto by Dianne Maley, who is a business columnist syndicated across the country. She writes:

> Tom d'Aquino thinks it is "devastatingly disturbing" that most Canadians do not understand the goods and services tax. Mr. d'Aquino is the president of the Business Council on National Issues, a big business lobby group.
> I'm prepared to overlook Mr. d'Aquino's overstatement, but I can't forgive his implying that we are dull-witted. I think Canadians understand the GST well. That's why so many people are opposed to it.
> The GST may be a replacement tax for the federal government, but for you and me, the taxpayers, it is new. The average Canadian family will be shelling out more than $400 a year in new taxes. If I spent money on the same package of goods and services next year as I did this year, the GST would make me nearly $2,000 poorer. Who needs it?
> Some spending is discretionary. Eating out, visits to the esthetician, for example. But veterinary bills are not. Nor are haircuts.
> Mr. d'Aquino laments that we do not realize the GST will replace the existing tax on manufactured goods, now 13.5 per cent. In my pocket, the GST is not a replacement tax. To reap proportional benefits from the "replacement", I would have to buy a stove, fridge, washer, dryer, dishwasher and perhaps a car.
> After the taxman is through with me, I will not be able to buy these things, even if I needed them. So I have little sympathy for Mr. d'Aquino's hand-wringing before the Senate banking committee last week.
> "The polls continue to show something devastatingly disturbing, and that is that the vast majority of Canadians do no understand that this is a replacement tax," Mr. d'Aquino told the committee.
> "One of the sad commentaries about what is going on in this country is that we are debating, making decisions . . . on the basis of largely misinformed people who do not understand the issues," he said. Baloney. There are many sad commentaries to be made about what is going on in this country, but that is not one of them.
> The GST will hurt me. But that is not the main reason why I resent it. I'm beginning to think it's a bad tax because as well as skewering taxpayers, it will make life miserable for millions of business people, large and small, who have to collect it.
> Businesses will be tangled in red tape. The bureaucracy will have to grow to police the tax, adding to the tax burden. Most of the offenders will be people who are unable to follow its convoluted paths.
> Ottawa does have a problem. The manufacturers' sales tax makes Canadian goods uncompetitive. But then so does the high exchange rate. Other countries have consumption taxes. But are they all so complicated to collect? Finance Minister Michael Wilson wanted the GST to cover everything, food included. Having no exemptions would have made the tax easier to administer. But the public opposed a tax on food.
> How will people respond to the GST? I'm going to spend a lot less money. Call it a consumer's revolt. If we all do this, and if we bring the economy to its knees, so be it. The consumer society was not conceived and propagated with consumers in mind.
> Let Mr. d'Aquino and the BCN sell their goods elsewhere.

I have another letter, this one from people here in Ottawa, Laurèl J. Craib and James W. Jeffcott:

> Dear Senator Fairbairn,
> We are writing to you to voice our support to the Liberal Senators who are in the midst of opposing the Goods and Services Tax.

This was sent to me in mid-October.

● (0115)

> Once and for all, Canadians are being allowed to voice our opinions through you, and we appreciate your efforts enormously.
> While Mr. Mulroney claims that your efforts are "Undemocratic" it is actually his government that is proceeding in an undemocratic fashion; the appointment of the eight additional senators, the fact that 80 per cent of Canadians are strongly opposed to this tax regime, and the fact that the Department of Finance has arbitrarily decided to waste our tax dollars, in its feeble attempt to propagandize this tax with the exorbitant advertising campaign it has now undertaken. His political ploys are not acceptable.
> This tax will hurt our family's financial situation enormously. There must be another solution to Canada's debt that we can accept, but typically the Conservatives have not considered other alternatives. There is one answer Mr. Mulroney should consider—he should call an election and let the people decide the fate of this tax.
> We ask you to keep up your fight against the goods and services tax. You are a necessary voice.

The next letter comes from Edmund and Catherine Wright of Toronto and it states:

> The proposed GST tax is of great concern to us. It would appear to be very unfair, and our accountants have explained to us how difficult it is going to be for our small business. The paperwork for our small retail store will $%not$% be minimal and we feel that, after 25 years, we may not be able to remain in business. There are already enough problems in today's market, without having to figure in another tax as a separate item.
> Everyone in our family, in both a personal and business capacity, is hoping that the Senate will put a stop to a tax in this form. Please do not ignore public opinion on this matter . . . We understand that the Senate is able to vote against this regressive and damaging tax, which we believe is bad for Canada!

The next letter is from Duncan Dee, a student at the University of British Columbia.

Senator Perrault: He is a great young man.

Senator Fairbairn: You know him, Senator Perrault. He states:

> How are you doing? It seems like all our senators must be tired these days given the fact that many of you have probably been in the Senate for hours on end.
> I just wanted to drop you a line to let you know how much support you have across the country. As a university student, I must say that the GST will do irreparable harm to myself and my peers. A 7 per cent increase on the cost of tuition (which is already $1,800 per year at UBC) and the cost of books would greatly discourage many less well-off, yet very qualified young Canadians from attending or continuing with university. The country, in this age of great international competition, certainly cannot afford to lose qualified young people who will eventually enter the workforce.

Next is a fax message from The Mimir Corporation of Edmonton, Alberta. This corporation has had a great deal to do with the fight of the Lubicon Indian band to obtain a reserve from the federal and provincial governments. The fax states:

> The fight you face is not one which any thoughtful person would choose. But neither is it one which any person of quality and substance could duck. From here you're looking fine . . . Give 'em hell.
> Sincerely,

Fred Lennarson

Senator Perrault, the next letter is from the District of Port Hardy on Vancouver Island.

Senator Perrault: Great people up there.

Senator Fairbairn: It is from Phyllis Belaire. Have you ever met her?

Senator Perrault: The name is familiar to me but I do not know her personally.

Senator Fairbairn: The letter states:

> The Municipal Council of the District of Port Hardy unanimously passed a resolution requesting that all senators from British Columbia and Alberta vote against the present goods and services tax legislation now under consideration.
> It was the Council's position that since the majority of Canadians do not wish the goods and services tax legislation to be passed, senators should exercise their voting rights to defeat this proposal.

Phyllis Belaire is the administrator of the District of Port Hardy, and she sent a copy of her letter to Premier Vander Zalm.

The next letter is from Calgary, Alberta and it states:

> Dear Senator Joyce Fairbairn,
> I want to express my appreciation of your wonderful efforts to curb the GST. I am so relieved to know that someone cares about Canada. Now I know that you care about the children of country and the elderly and the poor. It must be very difficult but I am so appreciative that you are trying.
> Your efforts must do much to make the people of Canada realize that there are a few in our elected government who really represent us and care about us.
> Please express my appreciation to each member of (your party). I am trying to write to each one.
>
> Please don't give up.
>
> Gratefully,

C. Adams

I believe Ms. Adams may have written to other senators from my province.

The next letter is a faxed copy of a letter sent to Senator Twinn and it states:

> Dear Sir,
> I am enclosing a copy of Resolution . . . passed by the Atlantic Chiefs of the "All Atlantic Chiefs' Conference" held in Moncton, New Brunswick on October 23rd, 24th, & 25th, 1990.
> We ask you to vote against Bill C-62, the proposed "GOODS AND SERVICES TAX". This tax will have a devastating effect on Aboriginal Peoples from coast to coast.
> We call upon you to represent the interests of Aboriginal Peoples in Canada and exercise your vote accordingly.
>
> Yours in Brotherhood,
>
> Chief Leonard Tomah,
> Atlantic Regional Vice-Chief

Copies of this letter were sent to Senator Len Marchand, Senator Charlie Watt, Senator Joyce Fairbairn and the Assembly of First Nations.

Senators, there are a great number of other letters and, depending on how I get along with the rest of my speech, I might read some more.

Senator Steuart: Any petitions?

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Steuart, my whole desk is filled with petitions. However, the letters are interesting. The ones that I picked out to read are from various parts of the country from people who took the trouble to write a personal letter, not just sign a form. When that happens, we do try to take seriously those expressions of opinion and encouragement. I am sure all senators have received similar letters.

In the next part of my remarks I want to deal with some of the contributions that were made to the committee. Perhaps they are not reflected in total in the minutes of the committee but they were brought forward when the hearings were held in Edmonton for two days in August. We listened to comments from other people across the country, but nowhere is the opposition to this tax stronger than in my own province of Alberta, and for good reason.

Alberta is the only province without a provincial sales tax and the people of Alberta feel particularly angry that this new 7 per cent tax on everything will be imposed on them. As I have mentioned a number of times, along with the provincial governments of British Columbia and Ontario, the provincial government of Alberta is challenging the constitutionality of this new tax. In that challenge I believe that they have the support and the encouragement of almost every single Albertan, save the remaining members of Parliament still sitting as Conservative members from Alberta, and perhaps in their hearts I suspect some of them know that their constituents are right.

Honourable senators will know that two members of the Conservative caucus from Alberta have already paid the price for opposing the GST. Brian Mulroney has kicked them out of the Conservative caucus. If anyone thinks that Alan Kindy from Calgary and David Kilgour from Edmonton represent a small minority of opinion on the GST in Alberta, they have certainly got another think coming. The people of Alberta are so opposed to this tax that it is highly likely that it will cost the Conservative Party its historic hold on that province's electorate. In my travels throughout the summer and during the year, but particularly this past summer when I spent most of the summer travelling to small communities in the southern part of the province, I was told that there is not a safe Tory seat in the Province of Alberta.

Senator Perrault: Nor anywhere in the west. They are all finished in British Columbia.

Senator Fairbairn: Perhaps so. Billions of dollars will be pulled out of the Alberta economy, not only when times are good and oil prices are high, but also in the bad times. Every year relentlessly, year after year, those tax dollars will flow out of the Alberta economy into the coffers of the federal government, just as they will flow out of every other province and the pocketbooks and the bank accounts of every other Canadian.

• (0130)

However, I would like to let the people of Albert speak for themselves through the words they presented to us in some of their briefs. One that I think certainly caught our attention was a presentation from a gentleman representing the Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, Local 54, University of Alberta Hospital. This gentleman, Kishan Sri Thakur, came with some associates who actually took time off without pay in order to make their position known to this Senate Committee. It is a very short brief and I just want to put it on the record tonight.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

We are a labour organization representing 2200 support staff at the University of Alberta Hospitals. Our members are from diverse cultural and ethnic backgrounds; some are single mothers working in the lowest paid occupations within the hospital. Some of the functions we perform are: preparing and serving meals, clerical duties, washing, sorting and supplying line, receiving, storage and issuing of supplies, maintaining the servicing the mechanical systems of the hospitals and working in environmental services. The salary range for our membership is approximately $19,000 to $40,000 per year.

Our concern about the goods and services tax is that it will have a severe and devastating impact on our lives. We are not here to offer a solution to this tax, but to let you know how this tax is going to hurt us.

As working people, we believe we do have the right to have a place to live and to provide food and clothing for our children and ensure that they receive a decent education. These are the basic necessities of life. Should this unfair and unjust tax be allowed to pass through the Senate, we believe we will no longer be able to afford to provide these basic necessities for our families.

Unfortunately, the tax credits the Government proposes will have little or no effect upon our membership. This means that we who are considered to be lower middle income earners will have to continue to carry a bigger share of the tax burden than we do at present. Numerous studies have shown that low and middle income workers spend more of their income on basic necessities than do the rich. We believe it is the poor and not the rich who will be hurt by this regressive tax, which does not discriminate. That is why this bill must not be passed by the Senate.

Since the Conservatives came to power in 1984, we have seen more and more of our earned dollars go toward some kind of taxes. As hospital workers, from March 1984 to March 1990 we have received an average wage of approximately 23%, but at the same time our personal income taxes rose by 34%. This does not include other increases in the cost of living. We are being taxed so much now that what were once viewed by us as necessities are now being seen as luxuries.

We are proud of our social services and security network to which we have proudly contributed, and will continue to contribute, and we are especially proud of our health care system, which is vastly superior to anything found south of the border.

We are also proud of our caring society and the standard of living we have been able to maintain over the years. As the working class, we are always ready and willing to pay our share of taxes to help preserve the social structure, but to foist this unfair tax upon us will destroy our ability to maintain our standard of living. If this bill passes through the Senate, a single mother earning $19,000 per year will pay exactly the same tax on an item as someone who earns $100,000. This is, we believe, in direct contrast to the principle that individuals should be taxed according to their ability to pay. The burden on us of the GST will eventually lead to the destruction of the whole social structure of this country.

Senators, we are appealing to you that you do not kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Therefore, for the sake of our children's and our grandchildren's futures you must kill this unfair, unjust and unreasonable tax in the Senate.

This Government told us that the present manufacturers' sales tax would drop from 13% and that this savings would be passed on to us, the consumers. What guarantee do we have that this will happen? How do you expect us to believe anything this Government said when, nearly two years ago, we were told that more jobs would be created in Canada under the Free Trade Agreement. All we have seen so far are plant closing and layoffs. We, as consumers, will never believe in this Government and we hope you Senators will intervene on our behalf.

The Alberta Federation of Labour also made a presentation. That organization represents some 107,000 members from diverse cultural groups and communities engaged in every conceivable occupation in our Province. While its primary function is to represent those workers, it also strives to represent and intervene on behalf of all working Albertans, whether organized or not, and also to speak for a broader coalition of social justice organizations to which they also belong.

The Federation believes that:

The GST will be the single greatest change to the Canadian taxation system since the introduction of income taxes.

Albertans know that they will pay the price of the GST as workers, consumers and taxpayers.

Federal government advertising to promote the GST presupposes that business will pass forward all of its MST savings to consumers. Very few of our members believe this! They think, instead, that the possibility of 100% pass-through is extremely unlikely.

We strongly expect, instead, that most of the savings from the removal of the hidden tax will find its way into the pockets of business. Mr. Wilson has already admitted that business will not be compelled to reduce their prices, nor could Canadian manufacturers offer any guarantees of price reductions in their testimony before various Parliamentary committees.

The Federation said,

We are already receiving notice of GST base price increase.

This brief was given in August and they said:

Just this week, we were told that travel companies would begin in September to add the GST to any bookings for the new year. In other words they have made firm plans to collect the tax, even before the bill has passed Parliament.

The Federation also said they knew that travel companies were not the only businesses to make such plans:

The final blow to the government's misleading advertising of 1.25 percent GST inflation comes from the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee of the House of Commons. After weeks of public hearings, the Committee concluded that the Government's assumption on MST savings is false. The words of the Committee Chairperson, himself a conservative MP and a strong supporter of the GST, sum up the problem quite accurately:

The Federation then quoted:

The Government is just plain wrong on this one. Based on what we have heard, there is no way all of the savings will be passed on to consumers nor can the government guarantee it.

Not only do Albertans expect much of the savings from the removal of the MST will be pocketed by business; we also expect that the compliance costs to business of collecting the GST, be passed on to consumers in the form of price increases on products and services, will be high. In addition, we believe that most provincial sales and excise taxes are going to piggyback on the GST, so that Canadians will have to pay this tax on top of other taxes. Eventually, we expect, provincial taxes may even be adjusted to reflect the GST's broader base.

We also believe that secondary price pressure will arise in those industries such as rental housing, financial services and many social services that cannot collect the GST from consumers directly, but which will increase prices to their customers to compensate for the GST they must pay on their inputs.

So we face the introduction of the GST, expecting the inflation it causes to be considerably higher than 1.25 percentage points, without organized labour even lifting a finger to protect members' buying power. CUPE researchers, for example, have estimated that if only 50 percent of MST savings are passed on to consumers, the GST's impact on the CPI would be 2.57 percentage points—more than twice the government's estimate. To this, we would add an estimate of the price increases resulting from business compliance costs.

• (0145)

Based on the experience of other countries, we estimate these costs will add 0.26 percentage points to the CPI. This makes a total inflationary impact of 2.83 percent. Combine this with "normal" inflation and the overall 1991 rise in the cost of living can be expected to total at least 8% to 9%, despite Mr. Crow's attempt to throttle the economy in anticipation of the GST-caused inflation. In fact, we expect that inflation could conceivably reach double-digit levels.

The Alberta Federation of Labour then went on to list the reasons why it opposes the GST:

It transfers yet more of the tax burden from the business sector to individual Canadians . . . .

> It is a truly regressive, unethical tax . . . .

The brief went on to say:

> It means that a single parent on welfare will pay as much tax on any item as Peter Pocklington . . . Furthermore, the poor must spend all their limited finances on consumption, whereas the wealthy can reserve a large portion of income for investments, tax shelters, etc.

The third reason the federation opposes the GST is that business is the only sector completely excluded from the tax, as they will get every cent of the GST rebate; the tax will lead to high inflation and economic stagnation. The federation concludes by saying that they will not allow their workers to be the scapegoats. They then went on to say:

> In our view, then, the GST should be scrapped because it is unfair, regressive, inflationary and damaging to our economy. It is being promoted with lavish promises, outright lies, and blatant threats. Our major concern as a Federation is that when inflation in 1991 does jump dramatically as a result of this unjustified and ill-conceived new tax, to be sure that the Mulroney government will not succeed in laying the blame elsewhere.
> We are well aware that, even though the stage has been set for higher prices through the imposition of the GST, Finance Minister Michael Wilson and the Governor of the Bank of Canada have asked working people not to try to make up their lost purchasing power by asking for higher wages. It is no secret that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has recently called upon the Canadian government to set up a restraint program aimed at restraining government spending by imposing wage controls. This, at the same time as John Crowe, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, has received average annual increases of 21%, and deputy ministers have been given salary increases of 31.2% over the past three years, not counting bonuses, compared to the 13.5% rise in the average weekly earnings of Canadians in the same period.
> As a consequence, we are advising our members to bargain for provisions to protect against high inflation during 1991, because we are convinced that Mr. Wilson's forecast of GST-inflation is irresponsible and deliberately misleading. We will not stand idly by while wage controls are imposed on us. We intend to priorize such GST protection as cost-of-living allowances (COLA clauses), wage re-openers, and appropriately-large nominal wage increases for 1991 and beyond . . .
> Neither we nor our members relish the idea of confronting city councils or hospital boards. We are unwilling participants in the industrial strife which is sure to result, and we would much rather see the tax scrapped. However, workers can't be expected to simply roll-over and give up 3 percent or more of their real incomes, because of Mr. Wilson's badly designed and unfair tax.

The Leader of the Liberal Party in Alberta, Laurence Decore, also made a presentation to the committee. Mr. Decore has been doing very well in Alberta of late, and could conceivably be in a position to become the next premier of that province. He noted in his brief to the committee that the Alberta Liberal Party was against the imposition of the federal goods and services tax before revisions and remains against the tax today.

Mr. Decore listed a number of points to indicate why the GST is the wrong tool to achieve the goals behind it which, in fairness, Mr. Decore believes are appropriate goals. He stated that he believes those goals to be deficit reduction, removal of the MST to ensure that Canadian manufacturers can compete more effectively at home and abroad, and improvement in the overall fairness of the tax system. However, he went on to say that the GST is the wrong tool to achieve them, and he listed the reasons. He said that the GST would discriminate against Alberta, would result in an unavoidable short-term loss in economic performance, would be inflationary, would be a regressive and unfair tax, would not address the problem of government spending, and would indirectly tax health and new rental accommodation and directly tax non-educational reading materials. He stated that he believes that goods and services should receive preferential tax treatment. He felt that the GST would be costly to administer, both for the private sector and for the government.

People in this part of the country have to understand the thought processes of western Canadians, and certainly those in Alberta, as they perceive these kinds of policies as coming down from on high, conceived and based on standards that exist primarily in central Canada. Mr. Decore stated that he felt that the federal government is shifting the tax burden away from Ontario and its manufacturing base west to the prairies and, in particular, to Alberta, and because of this, the impact on wealth and income would clearly favour eastern economies while penalizing Alberta. He noted that, although exports out of Canada are unaffected by the GST, transportation of goods and services within Canada will be taxed.

Mr. Decore then went on to say that Alberta is already geographically disadvantaged in terms of competition between goods and services consumed within Canada, and indicated that the GST as applied to transportation would increase their locational disadvantage. This point has been made repeatedly in this place by Senator Olson.

Mr. Decore then went on to say:

> Alberta's domestic competitive position will be hampered by taxing the distance between us and cheap supplies, and by taxing the distance between us and major markets for our commodities.

He stated that he believes that the second item of importance to Alberta is the controversy that still surrounds the transition period between the implementation of this stage of tax reform and renewed economic growth. He had this to say:

> The document tabled by the Honourable Michael Wilson, on December 19, 1989, shows that Stage II will result in an increase in economic activity and employment immediately, and for every year thereafter. The Institute for Policy Analysis—University of Toronto . . . indicates quite the opposite. That is, Stage II results in a drop in real economic activity and employment, versus the base case, beginning immediately and lasting for five years. The Conference Board of Canada has also released a study that contradicts the Federal government claim of immediate economic benefit . . . .It is important to note that none of the studies have allowed anything but a modest wage price response to the initial price impact of the GST, and are thus conservative estimates of the GST impact. It is therefore apparent that there will be an adjustment, which at minimum will last one year . . . and will likely last three or four. This will cause a loss of employment in Alberta of anywhere between five and nineteen thousand jobs.

Alberta continues to struggle out from under the massive income losses caused by low petroleum prices, further employment losses at this point serve only to rub salt in a wound that has not healed. It will take between two hundred and seven hundred million dollars spent in Alberta simply to overcome the employment loss alone, induced by the GST.

Mr. Decore then went on to discuss his points, and he concluded with this comment:

In conclusion, we in the Alberta Liberal Party urge the senate to refuse passage of the GST. We ask that the senate take back to Ottawa our concerns regarding;

—the cost of transition to Alberta

—the inherent bias against Alberta manufacturing

—the exacerbation of Alberta's locational disadvantage

—our concerns over federal government spending

—the discrimination against the economically disadvantaged

—the direct taxation of reading materials, and the indirect taxation of un-insured health services and affordable low cost rental housing.

• (0200)

Earlier, I noted the comments of a gentleman by the name of Terry Hlady who appeared as a private citizen. He was an interesting witness. He presented a number of documents to us that he had been, over the course of a year, sending urgently to Conservative members of Parliament from Alberta—he is a Conservative—urging them to implore the government to have a second look at what it is trying to do with this tax.

Hon. H. A.Olson: I wonder if I could ask Senator Fairbairn a question.

Senator Fairbairn: I would be delighted.

Senator Olson: You have accurately referred to a number of the briefs, and the reasons for them, that were presented to the committee. In those hearings, we listened attentively to the witnesses. On a number of occasions, some Conservative members agreed that there were legitimate grievances in the way Bill C-62 is now written and, therefore, they would support fixing it up. I can see several members across the way who were at those meetings who agreed that those witnesses had legitimately identified an unjust provision in the bill. I remember it happening in the Yukon and in Halifax. We spent hours on the point of regional discrimination in Halifax, and I wonder if you recall the Conservative members of the committee who recognized that a particular clause was unjust, and said that as soon as we began to study the bill clause by clause, said they would fix it.

We have tried to make 10 amendments, and we spent hours imploring members to stand up and do what they said they would do in the committee hearings. So far, we have run up against a stone wall. Why do you think we cannot get them to keep their word from the committee hearings on the floor of the Senate?

Senator Fairbairn: I thank you for that intervention, Senator Olson. It is true. You travelled with the committee from coast to coast, and I was only present briefly. One of the things that impressed me in the hearings I attended, and those I have read about, was that the people who made their presentations to the committee spent a great deal of time and effort sincerely presenting those concerns. I think they expected to be listened to, and I am sure they expected to see some results.

Senator Olson: I think members of the committee sincerely believed that they would see amendments made to Bill C-62. I do not know how close we are to the end of the debate, but none of the Conservative members of the committee have come forward and offered to do what they said they would do. There are some serious injustices in this bill.

Senator Fairbairn: That is true. One of the frustrations put forward by this particular witness, Terry Hlady, was just that. He, as a loyal member of the Conservative Party, had been trying, quietly and behind the scenes, to impress upon his colleagues in that party from Alberta that changes had to be made. I think his last move, out of frustration when he felt he was not getting anywhere, was to make a presentation publicly to our Senate committee. In it he strayed from the political course he followed and, in a covering note to us on that Senate committee, he attached various documents he had already sent to his Conservative colleagues, he said:

Mr. Mulroney has stated that it would be inappropriate for the appointed Senate to interfere with the elected government regarding the GST. The inference is that the elected body more legitimately represents the wishes and intent of the citizens. It is clear to all astute observers that this is not so. Thinking Canadians from all walks of life form a vast majority of citizens who believe strongly that the GST is a bad tax that would severely damage the Canadian economy. If ever in our history there was a time when the people needed, and desperately showed that they needed, the protection of our Senate, it is now in the GST.

As you study these documents you will see how the information used in promoting the GST was either mistaken or deliberately inaccurate. Either case has created valid cause to block this legislation. The Senate exists, and the people have called loudly for it to protect them. The critical need for a Senate is sharply obvious today. Canadians, perhaps more than ever before, recognize the importance of your presence in the national life of our country.

In his documents, he makes a detailed and somewhat emotional plea to his Conservative friends, and one paragraph says:

> As a very worried Conservative, I ask you to seriously concern yourselves with the matters I have written about. If the perceptions are near to being accurate, we must dismantle the GST program. Ideally this would be done in a normal government process. If the cabinet refuses to correct the situation, it would be necessary that caucus oppose the legislation with, if necessary, all MPs opposing the bill in the house. We must demonstrate that the Conservative Party as a body will not accept faulty legislation, even though that legislation was developed by its own people. Failing the above, it is possible that history will record this caucus as the one that presided over the demise of the Conservative Party as a significant instrument in Canadian federal politics.
> Given the current political climate in Canada, I fear I am not being too imaginative. Our party pulled itself up from a very low end to a winning organization in recent years, and perhaps we could do it again. I caution you that it is not easy or always possible to find and organize people with the skill and the spirit to do what our party did in the 1970s and the early 1980s. Our first tenure following 1984 was a good one, but we are in trouble this time around, and the element that had been by far the main part of this trouble is the GST. This element is scheduled to be with us right through until the next election. Consider carefully what it will be like to deal with a charge of either ignorance, or, alternatively, dishonesty by an aggressive opposition in the next election campaign.

This is really a cry from the heart from this concerned Conservative in Alberta who concludes:

> Frankly, I don't think Mike Wilson himself any more believes that the GST is a good idea, but he is stuck with it. Politicians cannot change flawed legislation that they have created because they have to save face. Mike Wilson must be an intelligent man who must surely see the monstrous nature of this tax. He is stuck with it, can't back off and needs our help to shut it down. We have to get our MPs to take it away from him and destroy it before it destroys us.

That, indeed, was a cry from the heart from Mr. Hlady, who, I might say, as our battle continues, has called the office a couple of times to tell us to keep up the fight.

I would like to touch on another short presentation because it presented an interesting view on behalf of farmers. It was presented as an adjunct to another brief. The presenter was Dr. Alfred McGhan. He made a personal presentation at the Edmonton hearings. He says:

> From an individual viewpoint, I would like to indicate some feelings about the effects of the goods and services tax on farmers. The statement by government personnel that the GST is neutral to farmers could not be further from the truth.
> First, the bookwork and accuracy of transactions will lead to many mistakes and delayed verifications. For example, an item requires a number from the manufacturer through to the final purchaser with a description. If one number is wrong, verification for a rebate will not happen until much later in time and will involve a labour expense—and not only to farmers.
> Second when—and not if— a farmer makes mistakes it will be because there will be continually-changing dividing lines for zero ratings on items on which you do not pay the GST, items on which you do pay the GST and can request a rebate, and items on which you do pay the GST and cannot receive a rebate. The dividing lines are not even clearly set out now.
> My main concern about the GST is the control and power, and the ease of misuse of that control and power.
> Setting up a system with civil servants gathering information given by one person reporting on the other, business reporting on business—and it is against the law if you do not—leads to corruption. Whenever a person or group of persons is allowed to control the information gathered it creates a licence for graft, to receive wealth and power through that control.

• (0215)

> In the matter of laws used by the tax department, with the added laws of the . . . GST you and I are at the mercy of civil servants to prove that we are not guilty.

He concludes:

> Control is the key that the federal government is inserting into its proposal of a value-added tax. It sets up a power structure with person reporting against person . . . Being a spy for revenge, suspicion, profit or position can also be used by one against the other with this reporting method.

Honourable senators, a lot has been said about the tourism industry in all parts of Canada, and particularly in the north. The industry in Alberta is no exception. It is the third largest earner of export dollars and generates over $2.5 billion in revenue, 75 per cent of which is spent by Canadians travelling in Alberta. The tourism industry in that province provides 74,000 direct and indirect jobs annually. It is also the world's fastest growing industry, and Alberta's tourism industry faces stiff international competition.

I referred earlier to the fact that, a year ago, we were out there listening to members from the tourism industry complain about the effect that the cuts in Via Rail would have on the future of that industry in the province. The fear with the GST is that Canadians will perceive Alberta as an expensive destination, and more Canadians will travel out of Canada to the U.S. and other competitive destinations as a result of the GST.

Off-shore markets will perceive Canada as an expensive destination in comparison to our competitors. We were given some examples of this, particularly when they are talking about the pull that our mountain parks have on tourists, particularly in the ski season, although it is true in any season. They indicated that ski lift tickets, for example, will increase $2 to $3 as a result of the GST. Accommodation, meals, transportation and entertainment will increase, pricing the Alberta ski industry product well above the American product.

In summary they told us:

> To understand the impact of the GST on Alberta's Tourism industry is to understand the significance of our domestic market and to recognize that Tourism is highly price sensitive. Visitors have a wealth of Tourism products and destinations to choose from; products that are aggressively marketed each day in countless media around the world. The Canadian government must decide whether it wants to encourage and foster our growing Alberta Tourism industry or damage it with the introduction of the GST.

Another brief that I wanted to refer to in part came from the Alberta Association for Continuing Education. This organization is a non-profit one incorporated under the Societies Act in Alberta and has approximately 460 members. Most of them are providers of part-time learning opportunities, both credit and non-credit, for adult Albertans. It exists to promote the concept of life-long learning and to identify, and respond to, the needs and issues of all providers of learning opportunities for part-time adult learners in the Province of Alberta. The brief goes through the association's concerns on the bill at some length, and I will just indicate the conclusions of that brief to honourable senators:

> In review, the problems for implementing the GST on non-credit part-time adult education activities are:
> 1. Increased tuition and administrative costs to adult learners and organizations and institutions offering the courses.
> 2. A widening of the educational gap between the haves and have-nots based on the ability to pay for the increase in tuition fees.
> 3. An undermining of the value of education and learning regardless of its classification of credit or non-credit. In Alberta non-credit educational opportunities do receive public financial support.
> 4. A reduction in course registrations potentially leading to decreased course offerings by Further Education Council members, and potential social problem costs for society when adults are not able to solve problems through learning opportunities due to increased tuition fees.

The brief continues:

> The benefits of not imposing the GST on non-credit adult-education courses are:
> 1. Participation rates will remain high.
> 2. Administrative costs due to collecting and administering the tax will not be passed on to adult learners through tuition fee increases.

As honourable senators must know, many people who become involved in these kinds of courses are people who have slipped through the cracks, who have had a very tough time, and who are in no position to be paying, in some cases, any tuition costs, let alone having those fees increased.

> 3. Lifelong Learning will maintain its status as an important concept and movement for improving self and lifestyle in Alberta and Canada.
> In conclusion, the members of the Alberta Association for Continuing Education encourage you to reconsider the value of non-credit learning activities in our daily lives . . . We ask your assistance in ensuring that the Goods and Services Tax legislation and policy does not become a barrier to adult participation in worthwhile learning activities.
> Learning, in any form, should not become a taxable commodity.

In a speech that I gave earlier in this house, probably in response to the amendment of Senator Waters, I indicated, apart from briefs that we had received in the committee hearings, that the whole issue of the GST has permeated the life of every community in our province already. In my own home town, city council, as it prepares its budgets for the coming year, has just really realized that the GST will add $200,000 to city costs. That is $200,000 that that city had not anticipated it would have to include in its budgeting for the coming year.

Another community in southern Alberta, which Senator Olson would know well, is the town of Claresholm.

Senator Olson: Oh, yes.

Senator Fairbairn: Claresholm has become one of the most active little communities in its opposition to the GST. In fact, its citizens became so enthused about the community involvement that they actually sent—and I believe it has been received—a coffin to Senator Buckwold, as chairman of the committee, and I believe that that coffin contains a number of petitions against the GST. They were doing this as their effort, symbolically, to urge us to give the tax a decent burial. This occurred back in late October. The town council joined the ranks of municipalities opposed to the GST, and the mayor, a gentleman by the name of Ernie Patterson, expressed fears for the future of small businesses in that community. He said:

> The tax will have a negative effect on the smaller municipalities . . . Here, one of our main areas of concern is over utilities and power costs. They've taken a big jump already and we're faced with an extreme problem in our budget to meet these costs . . . Add more tax to it and I don't know what we'll do.

This is a small town we are discussing, so all of the facilities in the community take on perhaps even more importance than they do in cities where there are a variety of alternatives.

Senator Olson: All of the businesses are hurting, too.

Senator Fairbairn: That is right. Mayor Patterson indicates, for example, that maintenance of things such as their arena and their swimming pool will be at risk. He said:

> The town has done reasonably well through this long period of drought and grasshoppers . . . We are a hospital community—a lot of people work there—but we are still very dependent on agriculture and commodities prices are down. We are not booming.

One of the small businessmen in Claresholm who owns the town's new Chicken Delight outlet, which is important in that little town, says that extra costs associated with the new tax will make bearing it even harder.

> "We're scared," says McMahon. "Administrative costs will be so high. Bookkeeping will be a nightmare. Even the manufacturers will have to cover high accounting costs.
> I don't know how we'll handle it yet—probably our regular prices plus seven per cent. If we bury the tax in our prices, we can't compete as well because automatically it looks as though we've upped our prices.

Another small store owner, Norm Elford of Elford's Men's Wear, says that the tax will slow his business and effectively eliminate valued clientele. Apparently some of these communities get a great deal of business from British Columbia, because people come to Alberta in order to make their purchases without sales tax, and Mr. Elford says that people are already saying that they intend to go to the United States to shop because it will still be cheaper for them.

> Just for the administrative costs alone it will cost us. There will be extra hours every month for accounting. If sales drop, we'll have no recourse. You can cut back on stock, but then you have a less attractive business.
> Additional expense will come to merchants through GST on freight costs.

He stated that he has always managed to overcome his freight expenses, but will no longer be able to do so.

> "They say we can claim that cost back, but it still won't help because of the extra administrative costs," Elford says.

Mayor Patterson sums it all up when states:

> As a council we have always tried to be very careful about spending . . . We don't see the federal government making any attempt to contain or stop spending. Since they've been in during the last six years, they've doubled the national debt to $360 billion from $180 billion and all this during a time of great economic boom for most of Canada.
> If I were a small businessman I think I would be tempted to just throw up my hands and say, "That's it, I can't take any more."

Honourable senators, those are some of the views I wished to convey to you because of the fact that they came from our province. Sometimes we do not hear many negative views from the Province of Alberta because all the representatives here in the House of Commons belong to the governing party, and basically I suppose they make their views known in caucus. However, as Senator Olson points out, for the two who spoke out it was disastrous, because they were removed from caucus.

Finally, honourable senators, I wish to touch on some of the alternatives to the GST. As senators know, the government makes the claim that this is the one and only tax that is available in order to carry out its economic agenda. That prompted persons in this country to bring forward other alternatives. It is not the case that no one has a better idea and therefore the government must go along with the GST proposal. I believe that attitude is a cop-out which does a great disservice to many Canadians, particularly those Canadians who have provided dozens of different options.

Many of the people who presented briefs to the committee gave a number of options for the government to chose from. Many of them were probably reflected in some of the amendments that were brought forward in this house in the hope that somehow the government would ameliorate the effect of this tax on certain vulnerable areas of Canada.

One of the first proposals developed in a major way was by one of our colleagues in the House of Commons, Dennis Mills, and what he has called The Single Tax. This proposition has been brought forward in other forms over the years, but Mr. Mills has taken it a bit farther and consolidated it into a book which he hoped would prompt alternate discussion in the country. In Toronto, he appeared before the committee and made a presentation and I thought that tonight I would read a few excerpts.

The fact that it is called the single tax makes everybody think that if it is really that simple, there must be something fundamentally wrong with it, which is often an attitude that is taken in this particular city. Whenever there is a solution that seems to be a "B" follows "A" solution, there is almost a bias against it being any good.

Dennis Mills has taken some knocks about the claim for a viable, valid and simple proposition in his single tax. I thought I would give some of his thoughts about the tax as it developed in his own mind. He talks about being prompted by Brian Mulroney and Michael Wilson who, as he noted, challenged Canadians to come up with a viable alternative to their tax, and he decided to take them at their word. He also noted that important in his considerations were the opinions of some of his colleagues in the House of Commons who prepared a minority report when the House of Commons committee travelled at a very brisk pace over a short period of time. They shut off and insulted many Albertans while in Edmonton when they implied that anyone with a grade 5 education could understand the tax.

Senators may remember that when the Finance committee reported to the House of Commons, there was a minority report from the Liberal Party which recommended that the Conservative goods and services tax proposal be withdrawn and that the federal government immediately begin consultations with Canadians and provincial governments on the creation of fair and integrated reform of the entire tax system. That, says Mr. Mills, is exactly what the single tax proposal is all about. He believes, and his colleagues who helped him with his book passionately believe, that their proposal could revitalize Canada.

He talks about the early stages of his report and how he was determined to find some better tax system that would answer the needs of Canadians and help to steer us towards prosperity without sacrificing the social values that we all agreed were important. His first stop in putting this proposal together was to ask some basic questions, which he did of the Parliamentary Library. These questions were based on criticisms that had been made by constituents and people from other parts of Canada—businessmen, friends and fellow politicians. They wanted to know whether corporations were paying their fair share of the tax burden, whether the rich really were avoiding paying taxes, how badly seniors and low-income earners were being affected, and what options there were for simplying the system. These questions were just the beginning of putting together this proposition.

As time went on, more and more people became committed to finding a solution and joined the Mills' team. It was ultimately this teamwork that produced a viable alternative to the present system, an alternative which also held out the possibility of phasing out the current manufacturers' sales tax and so avoiding the proposed GST.

One of the first people who began as part of the team was a gentleman from the Library of Parliament Research Branch and he provided some answers to Dennis Mills' initial questions which may be of some interest:

> In 1986, there were 32,340 individuals with incomes over $25,000 who paid no taxes.
> Of these, 6,250 had incomes greater than $50,000.
> Those with incomes between $1 and $25,000 paid tax at a rate of 10 per cent of total income but this rate over doubled to become 21.3 per cent of taxable income.
> Those with incomes over $25,000 paid tax on their total income at 21.3 per cent but this only rose about 8 points to become 29.2 per cent of their taxable income.
> Senior citizens earning under $20,000 contributed $567,196,000 to the tax revenues.
> Other statistics on corporate taxes were almost equally disturbing:
> In 1985, firms with assets less than $25,000,000 paid 24.5 per cent of their book profits in tax.
> Firms with assets more than $25,000,000 paid 22.7 per cent of their book profits in tax.
> In 1986, of the 581,307 corporations known to Revenue Canada, 331,114 (53%) paid no tax [6,387 were charities or Crown corporations that are tax-exempt].
> 2,129 firms who paid no tax had assets greater than $25,000,000.

The concept of the single tax really began with two important meetings, and one was with Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute who was extremely helpful but doubtful that the concept would get off the ground. A second person was Peter Pockhington, who proposed a similar system whose basic idea was ten years ahead of its time.

● (0245)

Mr. Mills indicates that a single tax rate was nothing new. That was how the first income tax system was organized. It was only over the years, as the income tax system was used to solve more and more social problems, that the idea of graduated rates was applied with all its flaws and complications. Therefore, perhaps a return to a single rate would provide the basic answer to our present circumstances.

Mr. Mills continues on with a great deal of detail here about how the tax was developed, and some of the particular parts that were of special concern to him. One of those was provisions for seniors. He related that he was personally very concerned about the low income of seniors. In his own riding in Toronto there are over 20,000 seniors, and they were counting on him to keep the trust he had declared for them in the last election.

Therefore he had decided to include in his proosal interest and dividend payments in personal income. This could prove problematic for low income seniors who relied on that form of income. In addition, there were many seniors relying on pensions to which they had contributed, although these contributions had not necessarily been 100 percent tax-deductible. That meant they had already contributed to and paid some taxes on this income. On top of that their income was often less related to inflation than was employment income.

Mr. Mills indicated that one way to avoid seniors having low incomes in the future was to encourage saving for retirement. People who are willing to forego some of their earnings now in order to provide a later income are also a group of taxpayers from whom it is logical to collect a lower proportion of tax than from the average taxpayer.

On looking through this book of Mr. Mill's and his tax proposals, which I do not think would particularly interest honourable senators, but I want to touch on the chapter in which he talks about the advantages of the single tax system. He said:

> The tax return will be much easier for the average taxpayer to complete. Unlike the present system, the Single Tax System would require only a postcard sized tax return with 17 lines for the Personal Compensation Tax form and 11 lines for the Business Tax form. This would be accompanied by a short booklet of two or three pages explaining taxable income and the system of tax credits.
> There would be no pages and pages of explanations and schedules and no complicated calculations. Businesses would have none of the complications of the capital cost allowance schedules.
> Other complexities, such as forward averaging, foreign tax credit equations and dividend tax credits would all be eliminated. There would be no need for special brochures to explain them all.

It would be so simple that children in school could practice filling in both personal and business tax returns in order to learn about taxes.

> A simpler system would obviously reduce the incidence of honest mistakes. There would also be less time wasted in arguments about interpretations of the Tax Act because there would be less elements to interpret. It would also be easier for Revenue Canada employees to understand the system. They are presently expected to give taxpayers advice on their tax returns when the current system often requires a fully qualified tax accountant to interpret it.
> All people and businesses would be treated the same. Everyone would pay the same basic rate but low income taxpayers—especially seniors or those with children—would have less of a burden, more in line with their ability to pay. The system would be truly progressive. The Single Tax system would be much more airtight than the current one and there would be much less likelihood of people or corporations avoiding their fair share. The tax credits that produce the enhanced progressivity would be those of which the vast majority of Canadians would approve: those which support the family, the elderly, the disabled, the prudent saving for retirement and those supporting charitable institutions. All of them would favour the low income taxpayer as much, or more, than the high income earner.
> As all income would be taxed at the same rate—employment earnings, pensions, interest, capital gains and dividends—people would be free to make whatever financial decisions were best for them. Everyone would reap the same reward for working (or investing or saving) harder because everyone would have the same marginal tax rate. The system would demonstrate the equal value given to those who invested directly in Canadian industry and those who worked in it. Those taxpayers who preferred to save, and so indirectly supported corporate or government financing, would receive the same treatment. Canada needs all of these people—workers, investors and savers—and the Single Tax system would reflect this.
> Apart from the fact that individuals would all contribute to the tax burden in line with their ability to pay, the tax burden would also begin to shift back to a more equitable contribution from corporations . . . Book profits would be the same as the tax base and corporate tax avoidance would be greatly reduced. Yet most corporations would be paying a lower rate of tax and should benefit from this.

There would be reduced tax avoidance and evasion under the Mills proposal because, as he says,

> Because most deductions would be eliminated, the potential for tax avoidance by individuals and businesses would virtually disappear. Tax shelters would no longer be available, but as these were most often used by high income earners and they would be paying a lower rate of tax this would ease some of the pain. They might also find that they made more from effective investments, and so both they and Revenue Canada would benefit in the longer term. Business would also lose the ability to defer taxes except for genuine losses.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

There would also be much less incentive for people and businesses to evade taxes. The marginal tax rate would be lower for most people and corporations so they would have less to lose by correctly reporting their income and their credits or deductions. On top of that, the extra staff available for policing the system would be more of a deterrent.

The Single Tax system would be less costly to administer, comply with and enforce. It would also be less costly to the economy and produce at least as much revenue as the present system and still allow many people and corporations to keep more of their earnings. It would also avoid unnecessary government intervention in the economy and encourage growth.

Lower marginal rates and more take home pay would be an incentive to work harder and smarter. The new incentives, plus elimination of avoidance and evasion, would lead to this new tax taking in more revenue—even with its lower rate.

History backs up this assertion. In the 1920s the United States cut top marginal rates by two-thirds and doubled the tax take from the wealthy. Michael Walker, of the Fraser Institute notes that "in 1981 we dropped our marginal rates from 70% to around 50%, and the total amount of taxes collected from top earners actually increased. Not only did that happen here, it also happened in the United States and the United Kingdom."

Less tax and greater investment incentives would be good news for entrepreneurs, because by now we're all aware that the adrenalin in the economic bloodstream is injected by our entrepreneurs—whether immigrant or home-grown. They are the pace-setters, the job creators, the inventors of our future.

The Single Tax ensures that every business and individual will get to keep a much higher percentage of every dollar they earn.

The Single Tax system provides strong incentives for investment. The simplified depreciation allowance and the deductibility of dividends would make for healthy balance sheets and so make it easier to raise capital.

The equal treatment of dividend income and the deductibility of dividends paid to Canadian residents also provides an incentive to individuals to invest in companies. It will also encourage companies to go for equity financing instead of debt. This will not only relieve companies of some of the debt burden but also encourage Canadian ownership of Canadian companies. The lower tax rate will, at the same time, encourage foreign investment.

All this will allow small companies to flourish and become big—an incentive to create Canadian companies that can compete with the world.

> Lower costs, stronger incentives, and more productive capital could be incredibly bullish for the economy. The low single tax rate would send an unmistakable message: Canada is the place to invest.
> The introduction of a single tax system would unleash the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada by eliminating the distortions and disincentives of the current tax system. Government could concentrate on government instead of tinkering with the tax system. It could spend more time on discouraging irresponsible businesses. Canadian industry could concentrate on effective decision-making free of government interference and put its efforts into responsible enterprises that would compete effectively in global markets.
> It could lead to an unprecedented economic boom, as Canadians become encouraged to work to their full potential and corporations rediscovered sound economic principles.

Senator Sparrow: Senator Fairbairn, I have a question. With regard to the standard tax rate, would the rate be the same for individuals and corporations, and what rate is he discussing?

Senator Fairbairn: As a matter of fact, he goes on to say under the heading "Meeting the Mulroney/Wilson Challenge":

> The Single Tax System is currently proposing a tax rate of 25%. In improved economic circumstances, we would hope this would be lower and, in the longer term, it will almost certainly be lower.

Senator Sparrow: With everyone paying 25%, would this continue the trend of a greater collection of wealth in fewer hands, as is at present the case in Canada? The wealth of the nation is now in the hands of 15 families who control 60 per cent of the wealth of the country. Would that tax tend to increase that trend, or does Mr. Mills provide for succession duties and so on?

Senator Fairbairn: I believe that part of the purpose of the tax would be to decrease ownership by so few.

Senator Sparrow: I see.

Senator Fairbairn: Perhaps it would be helpful if I read the portion of his proposal that deals with the transition to the single tax system, which reads:

> A major shift in tax policy, like a major change in anything else in life, gives rise to trepidation and worry. There are often good reasons for such worry, and we would be remiss if we failed to discuss the issues here.
> So we are faced with many questions about what sort of road lies between the status quo and the new tax regime. Will it be a bumpy ride or is there a gentle bridge from here to there?
> The first question, of course is a basic one: Can we get there from here? Are we talking about a change so radical, so fundamental to the manner in which we conduct our affairs, that disruption might be unmanageable, that we would be better to forego the change?

To answer this we need to concentrate on the how rather than the whether—on the hard-nosed assessment of practicalities rather than questions of policy (which we have already discussed earlier).

We also need to structure the analysis to make it more manageable by segregating personal from business taxes.

Effects on Personal Income Taxes

The best way to discuss this is to follow the order of the tax form. The identification section is reassuring in its familiarity and the tax paying unit is still the individual, as at present, although some claims will depend on the income status of other family members as in the current system.

The form then identifies revenues—always a contentious matter. In this area we are proposing some important changes but none of them ought to generate serious difficulties. Perhaps the most important change is that the definition of income is broadened to include 100% of capital gains and 100% of dividend receipts. Overall, this should increase progressivity and there will also be a small long running gain in government revenues. The impact on individual taxpayers will depend on their circumstances, especially their present income and marginal tax rate.

Those people with assets to dispose of must in any case already keep a watch on tax changes as they occur to assess if they have reached the lifetime limit for capital gains exemption and the effects of reaching the top federal tax rate. If this happens the marginal rate for capital gain under the current system would be 21%. Because the marginal rate for this under the Single Tax system would be 25%, these taxpayers would be likely to try and realize the gain before the new tax took effect. There would be a one time distortion resulting from the implementation of the Single Tax.

The most obvious difficulties in transition come from the behaviourial changes of taxpayers who act in anticipation of the new system to their own benefit. This could be dealt with by implementing the system immediately on announcement and/or making the changes retroactive. The second approach can be seen as arbitrary and with good reason. While this approach has been used occasionally in the past, with retroactive budget measures, this runs contrary to the notion of the rule of law. A well-defined set of rules known to all beforehand is a keystone of a democratic society.

Effects on Corporate Taxes

In the corporate world, accounts may be carried over from one fiscal period to the next, so it is here that we expect more transitional problems to arise.

The most obvious accounts which are maintained perpetually are those for capital costs. We have not proposed a complete shift to a simple consumption tax, so investment will not be immediately expensed under the Single Tax. Consequently, a depreciation system must be maintained.

So what of existing pools of undepreciated capital costs? It would be a simple matter, from a legal point of view, to simply disallow them and allow the establishment of new depreciation accounts only for new investments.

We have proposed, for the sake of simplicity, a single depreciation rate of 20% to apply to all classes. This approach denies real differences between different types of investment—and so provides an incentive to invest in long-lived as opposed to short-lived assets.

• (0300)

It may be that a better alternative to changing these incentives might be to allow multiple classes recognizing the differing economic lives of various investments. We may yet find that this sort of complication is a necessary part of the overall policy, since the alternative—expensing all investment—we find to be too radical a change.

There are other aspects of transition which bear on the policy itself, which will have to be addressed in more detail than is possible here. As the legislation takes shape, issues such as accounting for reserves, subsidiaries of internationals and international tax treaties will rear their fearsome heads.

We must not shrink from facing these issues. We cannot walk away just because they are so complex.

His summary says:

The Single Tax System is simpler, fairer and more efficient than the present system. It provides incentives to both low and high income earners to be more productive. It encourages investment and removes distortions in the economy that are caused by ineffective government intervention. It will produce more revenues by removing the potential for tax avoidance and evasion. It will encourage growth in the economy and obviate the need for the Goods and Services Tax. In the longer term it should also help to reduce inflation, interest rates and the deficit.

For individuals the transition period will produce the need for few adjustments. For businesses, this may provide more complications. Accommodations that will ease the transition are possible in cases where demonstrated hardship or unfairness occur.

There are many other parts of this book that would be of interest to senators. Mr. Mills goes back into history to list various other proposals going back to Kenneth Carter and Edgar Benson.

Senator Steuart: I have a question. In that single tax, is his goal to do away immediately or eventually with any kind of a value-added tax or a sales tax at the federal level? As well, with the proposed single tax does he tend to treat all manner of income to the same degree in which Carter suggested "a buck is a buck is a buck"? Capital gains should be taxed and no matter how money is earned there will not be exemptions for this and that. Are those two of the goals in the book?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes, I think in a very simplistic sense they are the goals. I notice that in his chapter 5, which deals with other tax reform proposals, he does go right back to Kenneth Carter and Ed Benson and works up from there.

He would envisage that his kind of a tax would certainly get away from having a value-added tax of any sort, I believe. Mr. Mills also indicated that if there was an interest among honourable senators, he would certainly be prepared to send a copy of his book to each individual senator here so they can read the full account for themselves.

As I say, he has taken a lot of criticism, especially from government and people in the department by saying that the thing will not work or that it will not do the kinds of things that he is states.

I mentioned earlier today that as I was out in Alberta this summer, it was interesting the number of accountants who were calling up or writing and asking how they could get hold of this book by Dennis Mills. I was a little surprised that it had permeated into the reaches of southern Alberta. Then I discovered that the reason it had was that Coopers and Lybrand, a very large firm which sends out a regular tax letter to accounting firms, had devoted an entire issue of their letter to the single tax. They simplified that book down and they dealt with Mr. Mills' proposal, recognizing it had first surfaced in Canada in 1961 in Dr. Kenneth Eaton's essays on taxation; and had been a hot item in the United Kingdom, and so on.

This has been a concept that has been around for a great length of time. The Coopers Lybrand Tax News then had been taken by smaller accounting firms in southern Alberta which had been circulating it widely within the business community. The accountants themselves were so opposed to the Goods and Services Tax that they were seeking out information on the alternatives and had found a great deal that interested them in the single tax proposal.

The other element in which they had expressed a great deal of interest, and which also has attracted attention from the Senate Committee and other people, is the proposal of an alternative that was suggested by Neil Brooks of Osgoode Hall Law School and York University. Last February he published a very detailed proposal for the Institute of Research on Public Policy. I will not read the entire proposal but, because it is short, might just refer to the executive summary. This, too, has been held up as another viable option by economists and people in the accounting business who understand these things. They, in the profession, are seeing viable alternatives which are rejected out of hand by the government.

Senator Steuart: It would appear the government has not looked very far.

Senator Fairbairn: Or that the government did not want to look very far, I think is more the case. I think it is very safe to say that officials within the department of Finance have been flogging the value-added tax on every Finance Minister that has come up the pike, for many, many, many years.

Michael Wilson was the first one to really bite with a high degree of enthusiasm and also convince his cabinet colleagues and his leader that this was the way to go. Certainly it has been a project of the Department of Finance for many, many years and this is the first time they really hit pay dirt.

• (0310)

Just for the record, I will read very quickly the Executive Summary of Mr. Brook's alternative which will give senators an indication of the direction in which it is going.

> The debate about the proposed goods and services tax (GST) has been hampered by a lack of well articulated and quantified alternatives. This paper attempts to remedy this deficiency by comparing the Government's proposed 7 per cent GST with an alternative reform that would involve repealing the manufacturers' sales tax (MST) and collecting most of the lost revenue by simply increasing income tax rates. The paper shows that the alternative approach satisfies the primary goals of the Government's sales tax reform while avoiding the deficiencies of the GST. The overall conclusion is that the proposed alternative, or a refinement of it—

And you will see as one goes through all these different alternatives that none of the people who were proposing them is saying, "This is my idea; not a word can be changed." They are putting forward ideas that would encourage discussion, would encourage innovative minds to see how they could be improved, and this again is not the spirit that has surrounded the whole debate for the last year on the Goods and Services Tax. Again, it has been, "This is the way it is; this is the way it is going to be," with suggestions of some review, in recent weeks, because of the very strong and continuing consistently high level of opposition from Canadians. Only as the agenda of the government has really been interfered with by the pressure of public opinion have we seen some kind of shifting around by the Minister of Finance—mainly by the Prime Minister—the Minister of Finance in fairness to him has not done much shifting. He has been pretty solid on having this tax just the way it is.

In this Brook's summary, clearly he says that;

> The overall conclusion is that the proposed alternative, or a refinement of it, should be seriously considered by the government and debated by the public before proceeding with the GST reform.

> The main elements of the income tax alternative to the GST are:

> —Eliminate the Manufacturers' Sales Tax and the associated Federal Sales Tax Credit.

> —Increase Federal income taxes by increasing the surtax. This would increase the bottom federal tax rate from 17.9 per cent to 20.6 per cent; the middle rate from 27.3 per cent to 31.5 per cent; and the top rate from 30.5 per cent to 35.1 per cent.

> —Increase tobacco, alcohol, and gas excise taxes to maintain prices on these commodities at current levels.

> —Increase government revenues from corporations by $2 billion to recover part of the windfall gain to corporations resulting from repeal of the MST.

The main results of the alternative are:

> —Revenue neutrality is maintained.

Which is a dubious proposition under the GST.

> —Distortions and competitive disadvantages of the existing MST are removed.

> —Administration and compliance costs of federal tax collections are reduced substantially, for both government and business, especially small business.

> —The general sales tax base is left to the provinces.

> —The federal tax system is fairer and more progressive. In particular, under the income tax alternative, the after-tax income of middle-income families, e.g., in the $30,000 to $35,000 income range would be about $270 greater than under the GST reforms, while the after-tax income of families in the over $100,000 income range would decline by about $300. That is to say, under the income tax alternative low-income families would be paying less total federal tax and high-income families would be paying more.

> —Inflation decreases by about 2 percentage points, reducing pressure on interest rates and on government debt servicing costs.

The argument for GST so far is that we have no choice. This study suggests that there are alternatives and there is a choice to be made.

In the Senate report itself, you may recall that it dealt with alternatives, and the first one included higher personal income taxes. It went through in a bit of detail the proposal by Mr. Brooks, and the conclusion of the Senate Committee Report was that while the Brooks' proposal might be technically flawed, the principle of it was sound. To replace the revenue from the federal sales tax and to make the system more progressive, income tax rates might have to increase beyond those estimated by Brooks and low-income credits could be provided.

The primary advantage that the committee saw to raising income tax rates is that these could be made progressive over the entire range of incomes. Sales taxes, it is often argued, are inherently regressive taxes and can only be made more progressive at the lower range of incomes by providing refundable sales tax credits to those who are less well off.

In the disadvantages, one problem with increasing personal income tax rates is that these might encourage higher income tax individuals to emigrate to jurisdictions such as the United States which tax less heavily. However, as was argued to the committee by Professors Jack Mintz and Thomas Wilson who had been doing some work on behalf of the Canadian Tax Foundation, if taxpayers care about their total bill for income and commodity taxes rather than just their marginal income tax rates, it may not matter whether the government replaces the current federal sales tax with another sales tax or with higher income taxes.

The costs imposed by higher taxes must also be weighed against the benefits that accrue to Canadians from public services such as medicare.

● (0320)

The Senate report also dealt with recommendations for changes to Bill C-62. Again, it went into some considerable detail in the summary of those recommendations, which I would also be prepared to read to senators. However, I suspect that they might possibly be prepared to read the summary themselves, because it is fairly lengthy and deals with the various recommendations from all of the witnesses.

As honourable senators are well aware, those on this side of the house presented a total of eight amendments which, while in no way making the GST acceptable to us, at least attempted to alleviate some of the more blatantly unfair provisions and to assist Canadians who are most vulnerable to the proposals set out in Bill C-62. The government, through senators opposite, responded with a very loud and rigid "no" to all of those amendments. As I said at the very beginning of my speech many, many hours ago, it is clear through the votes and through the lack of participation of senators opposite in the debates on those amendments—and I hope that they will enter the debate on third reading, as I know Senator Cogger intends to do—that there is no desire whatever at this point to try to make this a better tax, or at least to reduce some of its more callous and unfair provisions.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Steuart: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Steuart: She has been following this debate very closely and I am sure that as she went across the country with the committee she did the same.

Senator Fairbairn: I did not go completely across the country, senator. I attended the meetings in western Canada.

Senator Steuart: Yes. At any rate, as to the eight amendments we proposed dealing with—for example, the tax on books, the unfair situation in the north, the idea of putting a higher tax on luxury goods so that it would be more progressive rather than regressive—do you recall that there was any commitment on the part of the government to consider those matters? I believe that Prime Minister Mulroney at one time indicated that the government would reconsider the tax on some books, or books, periodicals and magazines.

Was there ever any indication that the government would be prepared to look at the unfair treatment of the North or the subject of any of those amendments that we put forward? They really reflected some of the outstanding complaints the committee heard when it went across Canada. Have you had any indication at any time, from speeches of Michael Wilson or anything you may have read, that the government would consider making any of those amendments down the road a year or two from now?

Senator Fairbairn: The only thing, Senator Steuart, that I am aware of specifically was the recent comment made by the Prime Minister about the book tax. It has been said that the government will review the tax as it emerges in conjunction with any changes in the economy, or whatever, but I think that the Minister of Finance has basically been careful not to say or do anything that would imply a possible watering down of this tax.

As I said before—and I do not agree with him for a minute—the Minister of Finance has not been straightforward in terms of some of the goals that he initially said he had for the tax. But in terms of the actual tax itself he has been fairly rigid, I think, from the start in maintaining that this is the way it is going to be and this is the way it is going to go through.

The Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism), Mr. Hockin, was the one who suggested out west a couple of weeks ago that there were so many complications that the tax itself might not be able to proceed on January 1, that they might have to postpone its implementation. That caused a flurry of consternation on the part of Mr. Wilson, who swiftly jumped into the breach and said that no, the tax was set to go, it was going to go and that was that.

Specifically, the Prime Minister has discussed books. He did so when confronted at a public meeting by a high school student in Burnaby, British Columbia, I believe, who was complaining about the tax on books, including the Bible. The Prime Minister indicated that day that he regretted that the tax was on books and that perhaps it could be reconsidered. But then he returned at the next appearance, perhaps having received a phone call from Ottawa, to say that no, the tax on books was deliberately there and would remain there until after the tax was implemented, that perhaps they would take a look at it then.

As senators are aware, the province of Quebec, which is the only province to decide to harmonize its tax with the federal tax, which means it is prepared to share the same tax base, found itself considering the possibility of a 15 per cent tax on books where there had been no tax before.

• (0330)

The Minister of Finance of Quebec, just a few days ago, indicated, as I understood it, that Quebec would withhold that provision in its own provincial tax for a year. He expressed the hope that in that period of time this action would help force the federal government to get out of the book tax altogether and then, presumably, Quebec would as well.

These many concerns that we have heard and read during the course of our committee hearings and our Senate debate, as you know, were, in the main, also heard during the course of the passage of this bill through the House of Commons. They did not make an impression on the government then, and I have no indication that they have made any more of an impression on the government during our hearings. However, I still, perhaps naively, believe that, regardless of stated positions, there is absolutely no way the government, because of this fantastically high disapproval level which has not just arisen over the year but has been there over the year—it has not changed, except perhaps to increase—will be able, if this tax goes through, to consider it a closed book in the face of that kind of opposition. I suspect that when Canadians find out what how the tax will affect their own day-to-day expenditures, they will be even more disenchanted than they are today.

Senator Steuart: When we were dealing with the co-ops and the unfairness of taxing the co-ops and not taxing the credit unions, the question was raised as to whether the government could produce any figures indicating how much revenue it would raise from the tax on books and from the tax on co-ops. I know that several times Senator MacEachen asked the same question relating to co-ops and that you and Senator Hébert raised the question relating to books.

Obviously you have done a great deal of research. Have you come across any such figures? Has anyone checked, through the telephone numbers the government has supplied for information, as to whether there are any figures whatsoever to indicate exactly what the government expects to gain from this new tax on books and periodicals as well as from the tax on co-ops or from such things as funeral services, which most Canadians find terribly repugnant and unbelievable?

Were you able to find anything at all which would indicate how much money it would be taking in, or how much it would forfeit if it were to remove the tax from some of these things which have proven to be the most objectionable to the Canadian public?

Senator Fairbairn: I have not, Senator Steuart. My research has not been exhaustive. If the government has given any estimate of how much revenue it expects to raise from books and co-ops, I have not seen these figures.

Perhaps Senator Kirby could help us out in that regard.

Senator Kirby: I would be delighted to respond to that point.

The fact is that the government, in the initial material it put out in connection with the GST, put forward a considerable amount of information in which it forecast two things: the relative costs of various items and, in particular, the revenue which would be received from various sectors of the economy.

One of the problems with that data is that a variety of analyses which the committee received, including analyses done by virtually every economic research institute in the country, showed that a great deal of the forecast revenue data supplied by the government was, in fact, not accurate, for several reasons. One reason is that the government's forecasts are based on a series of assumptions which have turned out to be not completely accurate.

One of those assumptions is that the unions will not seek to catch up on the costs associated with the GST. Yet, union leader after union leader who appeared before the committee made it clear that they would try to do that.

A further assumption was that manufacturers would pass on to consumers the full savings from the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax—that is, that the cost of manufactured goods would be reduced by the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax.

A number of witnesses from the manufacturing sector, including Laurent Thibault, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, made it very clear to the committee that this was a false assumption. What will happen is that manufacturers will argue that, while prices set for 1991 will have to reflect, in theory, the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax, a whole variety of other increases will occur so that prices will not decline nearly to the extent expected.

What, in effect, will happen is that inflation will be roughly double what the government has forecast. That is not a Liberal number; that is a number forecast by economic institutes across the country. This, in turn, will put out of whack a whole series of other forecasts of both revenues and costs which the government predicted in its data, because of the interlinking of the inflation figure and the cost and revenue data.

Another indication that the costs forecast by the government at the time the committee held its hearings were wrong is that, even as recently as two weeks ago, the government doubled the size of its forecast of the cost of administering the GST program. Originally, when the committee began its work, the committee was told that the administrative cost would be of the order of $200 million in the first year. The government's current forecast is $475 million. Estimates given to the committee would suggest that the number is, in fact, likely to be higher than that.

Indeed, one of the major reasons that people argue that there is likely to be an increase in the GST rate after it goes into effect is that the costs of collecting the tax are not related to its level. In other words, it costs no more to collect an 8.0 per cent tax than to collect a 7.0 per cent tax. Therefore, the amount which flows to the government's bottom line, by which we mean the ultimate profit the government will make from the tax, which is defined as the amount of revenue raised minus the cost of collecting the tax, is not dependent on the level of the tax because of the administrative mechanism.

So all of the forecasts again received by the committee from independent sources, including international comparisons, would suggest that the tax is likely to rise because of the tremendous temptation related to the fact that the increase does not cost the government any more money in terms of collecting it, and therefore generates a lot more revenue.

[Senator Kirby.]

I guess, for all those reasons, the evidence received by the committee would suggest that there will in fact be substantial differences between the cost which the committee raised, or which the government forecast, and the revenue which the government forecasts it will to collect from the tax.

I think, therefore, in response to the point raised by Senator Steuart, and to a lesser extent in her comments, Senator Fairbairn, one can only anticipate that over time the forecast contained in the government's projections when the bill was introduced last spring, or in fact the spring of this year to be exact, are in fact substantially in error and that the net effect of the GST will be to make it much more costly, and have a much more negative impact on the economy than any of the data which has thus far been suggested by the government.

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you very much, Senator Kirby. That perhaps answers, as I could not, your question, Senator Steuart.

I think one of the frustrations as these various areas were picked out for amendment was that, in a case such as the books, or such as the co-ops, for the type of burden that was going to be placed on people and individuals and groups because of those aspects of the tax, that substantial amounts would not be brought into government coffers.

I can remember the speech that Senator Graham gave during the debate on that amendment, that the whole idea of putting this burden on the co-ops was not really going to bring back to the government such an enormous amount of revenue that it would really justify the deep, deep burden that this was going to place on those people.

I think Senator MacEachen also said the same thing about the book tax. It is an enormous price to pay, well out of the range of what it was going to bring into the government.

If I might, I would just like to touch on the various amendments that were placed before this house by our senators, and also by the Independents, just to remind senators on both sides of what I believe were truly missed opportunities to make improvements to this unpalatable tax. Indeed, had the government settled on one or two or more of these basic amendments, we probably would not be sitting here tonight. However, it would not hurt to remind ourselves of what it was that was turned down, and I would like to spend a few minutes on each of them.

Beginning with the book tax, the purpose of the amendment on books and reading materials, magazines, newspapers, and Bibles, was to zero-rate those commodities in a manner similar to that of the basic groceries. In making the announcement of this particular amendment, which was moved as our first amendment by Senator MacEachen, he indicated that of all the things that are wrong with the GST, surely a tax on reading stands out as the most regressive and offensive cultural and educational measure ever introduced by a government. He indicated that even the Prime Minister seemed to recognize this fact, when, during a recent tour of western Canada, he suggested that Bibles and schoolbooks should not be taxed. Our proposal offered the government an opportunity to make amends for this particular imposition.

It was also noted that the educational services exemption is so narrowly defined in the legislation that it actually undermines the government's stated goals for greater literacy. This has been a particular issue that has been very close to the heart of the Prime Minister, and indeed of Mrs. Mulroney, over the last few years. Ironically, this very piece of legislation, in effect, undermines the goals for reading in Canada for a greater focus on the educational issue in Canada, across the country, and also on international competitiveness through research and development.

The zero-rating of the tax on reading materials has many precedents, as I said earlier in this debate, in Canada. Canada would stand alone as a country which had adopted a value-added tax without exempting books and reading materials, which has been done in every other country that has gone for such tax.

It was noted by Senator MacEachen that the application of the GST to the printed word in Canada would represent a radical departure from existing taxation policy, because this particular area has been exempted since Confederation from sales tax and the manufacturers' sales tax. It was also noted that the current annual federal direct assistance of $18 million to book publishers would need to be raised substantially to offset the impact of the GST.

In our debate on that amendment it was suggested by, I believe, Senator Poitras that the imposition of this tax on books really was not going to prevent people from buying them. I think his thesis was that if it was a good book, people were going to buy it whether it was taxed or not. I recall making the point at the time that that was probably very true except, again, for people who live very much on the margins of our society and for whom increased prices of books might very well tip the balance from something considered more or less a necessity to that of a luxury which they simply could not afford in any great number. This would have in many cases tragic consequences for the promotion of reading, both for adult Canadians and young Canadians who might not have a great many other opportunities. This is also true for senior citizens who, I know, as their other options become reduced, find that books are often among the best friends they have.

The case for amending the bill was presented to the committee on a number of occasions. One in particular, which represented an enormous number of associations and councils within the publishing industry, was made by the Don't Tax Reading Coalition. In particular, they commented on the negative impact of the GST on reading material which would be greater than that for other commodities. They said that because of the traditional exemption from tax at all levels of production, this material currently bears no hidden taxes. Therefore, the maximum impact of the tax and the concomitant price increases would be felt by producers, authors and readers as a result of diminished sales and outputs.

The Canadian government has found in numerous analyses that the book and magazine industries and their Canadian-owned sectors in particular currently operate on minimal profit margins, and many publishers of books and magazines operate at a loss before they receive grants, with hardship most concentrated among the smaller literary or regionally-based companies. So the fragile nature of that business means that many companies will be unable to adjust their margins to maintain sales, and will be unable to pass on the taxes as a price increase to the consumer.

I went into some detail at the time of this amendment on the price increases about what the effect would be on individual publishing firms, to the point that many of those who work on very tight margins will probably have to close up, and sometimes these are very specialized and very special Canadian publishing houses.

The Don't Tax Reading Coalition also noted that fully 75 per cent of all books sold in Canada are imported from another country, primarily the United States. Of those almost half, some $500 million worth, are imported directly by end users as opposed to exclusive Canadian distributors. In addition, literally millions of books are shipped across the border by book clubs, direct marketers, publishers and retailers through the mails or by courier. It is clear that existing mechanisms for collecting taxes would be overburdened by announced plans to exclude books from the current remission orders. As a result, domestically produced books, along with imported books sold through formal Canadian distribution arrangements, would be at a price disadvantage. Consumers in Canada would find it cheaper to purchase books in the United States, thus almost certainly avoiding the GST.

The conclusion by the Don't Tax Reading Coalition is that it is neither practical nor wise to measure the negative impact of the GST on the printed word with a view to considering later removal of the GST. The impact will be severely felt in the short term. Many of our businesses could fall prey to extinction prior to the completion of any damage assessment. The benefits that would accrue to Canada from an immediate signal to Canadians and the world that the principle of tax free reading is sacrosanct would be far greater than the loss of revenue resulting from zero-rating.

This was a message we heard time and time again not just from people in the industry but from people in very different walks of life, with very different objections to the GST. Yet those pleas were denied, and when it came time to vote on the amendment it was voted down. Now our only hope to avoid a tax on reading is that perhaps some senators opposite have a change of heart on the final bill because the only way now to get rid of any of these particular aspects of the tax would be to get rid of the bill.

• (0400)

Again, in the way that has been used for basic groceries, the second amendment which was brought forward by our side was to remove electricity and home heating fuel costs such as oil and natural gas from the items to be sufject to the proposed Goods and Services Tax. I will refer briefly to some of the comments made in the arguments put forward by a number of senators on this side.

If heating and lighting are not basic necessities in a country like Canada, then I do not know what is. Successive federal governments have recognized that fact for electricity has been exempted since the manufacturer's sales tax was introduced early in this century.

In his remarks while introducing this amendment, Senator Hays made a very powerful argument stating that electricity, furnace oil and heating fuel costs would rise by something like 5.7 per cent. He said the difference between 7 per cent and numbers that he had been quoting was the withdrawal of the manufacturer's sales tax.

Again, Senator Hays felt this was one of the taxes that will be incredibly unfair to people on lower and middle incomes. Using census figures, he said it is clearly illustrated that people who earn $10,000 to $15,000 spend 5.6 per cent of their income directly on electricity. People who earn $20,000 to $25,000 spend 3.5 per cent of their income on electricity. For those with an income over $60,000, 1.8 per cent would be for electricity. These figures clearly demonstrate the burden that this part of the tax will place on lower-income individuals.

Speaking on behalf of his constituency in the Yukon, Senator Lucier gave us some startling statistics on the comparative costs of heating homes in Toronto versus the Yukon. He indicated that it would cost some $74.00 per winter month or approximately $410.00 a year to heat a 1,000 square foot home in Toronto. He noted that the GST on that amount is $28.00—not an exorbitant sum. It may be tough on some people in Toronto, perhaps, but it is a sum that could be lived with. He then contrasted this with Dawson City up in the Yukon, in a house which has plastic on the windows, and is insulated; not elaborate, but a liveable house. The fuel bill, which, as I said, would be around $400.00 in Toronto, is $2,700.00 in Dawson City.

Senator Steuart: This would be after the tax?

Senator Fairbairn: No, that is before the tax. Seven per cent of that would mean that the occopant would pay an extra $193.00 if the GST remained on the heating cost of that home. Of course, there are no options up there; no option to convert to natural gas. It cannot be done. Also, the tax credit received in the north is exactly the same credit received by people in the south.

Whereas these costs are obviously incredibly higher, the cost of living is higher, and the whole combination of differences in the north make it very special. In no way can the north really be equated under the same guidelines as southern living. In this particular case of heating costs, it is obvious, because it is colder up there for longer periods of time. Yet, no adjustments have been made for that difference when the government compiled the tax.

Senator Lucier's comments were very useful. Senator Olson, as he has himself noted many times in the past several months, also repeated that the complaint has been laid before the Senate that in almost every aspect the GST is a regionally discriminatory tax.

In the debate on this amendment, Senator Olson said that in terms of heating fuel and electricity, it is probably the worst example of that type of discrimination.

I quote him:

> It is the best example to prove the point that the worst example of discrimination against various regions, because the cost of transportation is such a high percentage of the cost of fuel, I think of fuel oil in particular, but coal would be even worse although not nearly as much coal is used for heating any more.

He noted that it is now the Senate's responsibility to do something about it and he pleaded with the senators opposite to try to understand that fuel oil for heating is as basic a requirement of living in Canada as almost anything else such as basic groceries or certain medical devices, prescription drugs or water. One needs to buy fuel for heating to live in Canada, said Senator Olson, and therefor the tax is regionally discriminating.

The third amendment dealt with removing the tax on co-operatives which, again, are an essential aspect of life in certain parts of this country such as the Atlantic provinces and in the west. The amendment that was put forward was to ensure that the GST, if it ever became law, did not discriminate against the co-operative movement across Canada. It provided that memberships in co-operatives be tax exempt and it would have ensured that the GST does not discriminate against co-operatives because of the way in which they raise share capital.

In doing so, the memberships in co-operatives would be afforded the same tax exempt treatment as memberships in credit unions, Caisses Populaires and the holders of corporate shares. The GST legislation, as it is drafted, tilts the playing field against co-ops and leaves them less co-operative vis-a-vis other businesses. It becomes a tax on economic democracy, more heavily penalizing the regions where the co-operative movement is strong.

A second part of that particular amendment would have provided that only a portion of the direct overhead charge, a single purpose fee designed to allow co-operatives to recover a significant portion of overhead costs, would be subject to the GST. This measure would have ensured fairness for the cooperatives since the overhead costs on zero-rated goods is not taxed for ordinary businesses, and it was noted that without this amendment that the Co-op Atlantic, in testimony before the Senate Banking Committee, said that, had the GST been in force last year, their direct charge consumers would have had to pay $222,000 more in tax than if they had purchased products elsewhere.

● (0410)

The committee itself heard from co-ops about the problems that the GST would generate for their organization, and included in the testimony from Co-Op Atlantic was the statement that the GST as it was now designed would require the payment of the 7 per cent tax on cooperative capital. That kind of tax will not be required on shares in Loblaws or McCains or a host of other firms with whom co-ops have to compete, and this, we estimate, will cost the co-op system a minimum of $400,000 a year. This is in the Atlantic provinces.

Another brief from the other side of the country in Regina from Federated Cooperatives Limited stated their case succinctly, and I quote:

> We strongly disagree with this proposal. First of all, financial services are exempt of GST. "Financial services" are defined as including the issue, allotment, or repayment of a "financial instrument". A "financial instrument" is defined as among other things an "equity security." Co-operative shares have consistently been regarded as equity. First for income tax purposes, co-operative capital is treated like other corporate capital. Second, in accounting practice, co-operative capital is indistinguishable from the capital of other business in the equity section of the balance sheet.

The concerns of these cooperatives again were not successful in our efforts to try and ameliorate some of the objections of the witnesses who had appeared before us. They were voted down.

Our fourth amendment dealt with cost of living adjustments in the GST tax credit and the level of income at which it applies, so that low-income families are given some protection from inflation, and this was a very fundamental attempt at giving help to some of the most vulnerable people in our country that would have provided full indexation of the threshold under which the low-income families can benefit from the maximum amount of GST credits.

As we talked earlier tonight, I believe it was Senator Austin made the point that not only are the credits not fully indexed, but there is no commitment from the government or the Minister of Finance on the actual future of the tax credits at all as they apply under the GST. Our amendment would have tried to bring a sense of security to lower-income families in Canada, a sense of security that had been sought by many witnesses appearing in practically every centre in which the committee had hearings.

Our fifth amendment dealt with fairer transitional relief measures for business and new-home buyers which would have reduced the risk of double taxation in the early stages of the GST.

Again, that would have permitted Canadian consumers to gain from these initiatives as businesses would be unburdened from either double or retroactive taxes in the early stages. Again, this was asked for by many witnesses before the committee. The committee dealt with this proposal at some length in its report, and that, too, was voted down.

The sixth amendment dealt with removing the tax from a wide range of educational services, health care services, and this ludicrous application that it has to the cost of funerals. I suppose, in some cases, measures become remembered for one or two really inexplicable parts, and one of them has to be, in this case, the tax on funerals, and I think another certainly has to be a tax on veterans' wreaths and poppies, which makes no sense. It is hurtful to families and certainly to people who served in our wars, and surely cannot be worth any monetary terms that would justify the kind of unhappiness and grief that it extends to Canadians. That too, of course, was voted down.

The seventh amendment was designed to remove the tax for northeners who already pay double or triple the cost of goods and services in the south.

Now, honourable senators will remember vividly the kind of appeal in persons, and numbers that this chamber had as some 150 mayors and representatives from small Inuit communities in Labrador, in northern Quebec and in the high Arctic really made an unprecedented effort to come down to southern Canada on the day that we were discussing, debating, and also the following day when we voted on this northern amendment. To me, honourable senators, the whole treatment of the North by the GST is another one of those completely inexplicable moves by government that really shows graphically that they have not paid attention in any way, shape or form to a region that is profoundly different in size, in population, in culture, in its weather—totally different from applications of this tax that were based in southern Canada, and then merely imported into the North without any sensitivity for how they would affect that region.

In the course of its hearings, the committee did go to Whitehorse and Yellowknife. I have here one brief which I used in speaking on the northern amendment. This brief does not appear in the record of our committee because it was not presented there. This brief is from Michael Ballantyne, the Minister of Finance in the territorial government. He is an individual experienced in that government over the years.

I should note to senators that when they hear testimony from people in the territorial government in the North, they are not hearing from people who have an axe to grind one way or another with whatever political party happens to be running the government in the south. The Northwest Territories is the only place in Canada where there are no political parties. There is no party politics in the formation of the territorial government. People run as individuals. Governments are formed by a consensual agreement among those elected. The leader of that government is elected or selected a little like a Pope is. The discussions take place in private and whatever politicking is done there is not partisan politicking. It is northern politicking and it makes the way the government runs extremely interesting to watch and compelling to listen to, particularly when the people who speak for the Northwest Territories try to explain to Canadians from the south why their part of the country deserves a special kind of consideration.

I would like to go through Mr. Ballantyne's brief because it says everything, in a very persuasive way, that any of the other witnesses touched upon. All of the witnesses in the North were very interesting and, in fact, emotional in their presentations. I would like to read Mr. Ballantyne's brief because he did not appear before the committee. He spoke to the committee members privately and had lunch with them while they were in the North, so his brief is really not on the record.

Senator Marsden has asked me what they had for lunch. Unfortunately, I was not in Yellowknife, so I do not know. I suspect that they had it in the territorial building. At the time the Senate sent a special task force on Meech Lake to the North, we were received in a similar manner and with great friendship. In that case also, the report they made did articulate a sort of cry for attention and understanding of the north on constitutional issues. If attention had been paid to that cry, as well as to some of the other issues, the outcome of the Meech Lake Accord might have been different. However, they were not given any attention. They were pointedly ignored, as they have been with the GST. It simply does not make any sense for the Minister of Finance to repeat, as he did with our colleague, Jack Anawak from the riding of Nunatsiaq, in the House of Commons, that the North would benefit from the GST to the same degree, on average, as would the south. Clearly, people within the government and within the Department of Finance did not take the time or have the will to make special considerations apparent in their dealing with northern taxation.

With the indulgence of honourable senators, I would like to go through Mr. Ballantyne's brief because it does set out emphatically what this tax will and will not do in northern Canada. This comes from the Minister of Finance of the territorial government. He knows what he is talking about. Again, it is just a tremendous shame that the southerners who created this policy did not take the time or have the interest to listen to Mr. Ballantyne. He makes an effort right in his introduction to be extremely fair. He states:

> While the Government of the Northwest Territories welcomes many of the recently proposed changes to the structure of the GST, it continues not to support the tax in its present form. The GST, in its design, does not recognize special circumstances of the North and it will have a disproportionate impact on the economy and residents of the North. Most national taxation policies affect regions differently, but, in the case of the GST, the differences in the effects on the Northwest Territories will be particularly unfavourable. The GST will have limited benefits for our industries and will increase the already disproportionately high tax burden that the current tax system imposes on our residents.
> One of the key goals of the Government of the Northwest Territories is the achievement of fiscal and economic self-reliance. Increased fiscal self-reliance will benefit all Canadians since it will mean less dependency by the Government of the Northwest Territories on transfer payments from the Government of Canada. Increased economic self-sufficiency will also benefit all Canadians through the emergence of a durable economic base in the North. These long-term goals can be jeopardized by policies that are not sensitive to regional differences. By not recognizing the unique differences of the North, the GST will make it more difficult for the Northwest Territories to become less economically and fiscally dependent on the rest of Canada.

Mr. Ballantyne explains—and again this is unique to the North—the dual economy that exists there.

In the Northwest Territories, there are two co-existing economies. They can be described as the modern economy and the traditional economy.

• (0430)

The "modern" economy is made up of the resource industries, public administration and tourist and other service industries. It prevails in the larger centres of the North and it is market driven.

It is a highly specialized economy relative to other provincial jurisdictions. Goods production is mostly concentrated in primary commodities—especially mining, oil and gas—and construction, which, together, account for about 44 per cent of Gross Domestic Product. There is virtually no manufacturing sector. The service sector contributes to a significant portion of the employment in the Northwest Territories, representing about 82 per cent of the total Northwest Territories employment. This ratio is much higher than that for Canada as a whole where the service sector amounts to about 71 per cent of the total employed labour force.

The other economy is the traditional economy, whose roots in the Northwest Territories extend back hundreds of years. The traditional economy is typically the non-wage economy where production is based on renewable resources and is geared towards subsistence. In this economy, income from transfer payments and other sources of cash are expended almost entirely on basic goods required for subsistence.

Renewable resource industries, such as fishing, hunting and trapping, do not generate substantial output in dollar terms, but they are significant in supporting traditional lifestyles in the Northwest Territories.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

The isolation of the Northwest Territories from major production centres and the absence of a manufacturing sector means that almost all of the goods consumed within the Northwest Territories have to be imported from southern Canada. For businesses this results in very high operating costs. Labour costs are high because it is difficult to attract skilled labour to the north and because living costs are much higher. Other input costs are high because of high transportation costs, particularly in the small communities spread out across the North where there is no year-round road access. Margins applied by wholesalers and retailers must also be higher in the North to meet the overall higher price structure.

Consumers have to pay much higher prices for virtually all of the goods and services they purchase. Latest data indicate that prices for goods and services, excluding shelter, are on average 44 per cent higher in the Northwest Territories than in southern Canada. The situation is more extreme in the far North. While prices in Yellowknife are about 33 per cent higher than in Edmonton, prices in more isolated settlements such as Grise Fiord on Ellesmere Island can average more than 100 per cent higher than in southern Canada.

The GST will therefore result in businesses and consumers in the Northwest Territories paying more tax than other Canadians. Since the Manufacturers' Sales Tax is imposed at the manufacturer or wholesaler level, Northwest Territories residents now pay a similar amount of tax as residents of southern Canada. However, since the GST will be imposed at the retail level, and given the much higher prices for goods and services in the North, the GST will increase the tax burden on Northwest Territories residents relative to the burden borne by other Canadians.

Senator Marsden: Senator Fairbairn, if I could ask you a question? Did you hear today about the brief on the costs of the GST in the North presented by Shelly Martel? I think it had been commissioned by one of the groups of provincial ministers that meet on a regular basis. That report, according to the newspaper accounts, appears to have come out of the same sort of sources that you are quoting in the brief you are reading now. I wonder if you would like to comment on the report received today, especially its timing, and whether you think it is going to have any impact in light of the concerns that the committee heard and the substance of what has come out of that report today? You then might want to go on to speculate as to whether there is a chance that something might change for northerners.

Senator Fairbairn: I happen to have a copy of the article right here and it is, as you say, a very important document. It is almost a pity that it did not come out a little bit sooner.

I was in conversations with some of our colleagues and it was indicated to me that this has been in the works for some three years. All of the provinces who have northern ministers, in addition to the territories themselves, have been very much a part of it. It certainly confirms everything, and perhaps when we have an opportunity to read it even more so, in the evidence which has been placed before us. I would like to think it would have an ultimate effect on the mind and heart of the government.

Senator Perrault: Oh!

Senator Fairbairn: I have a spontaneous reaction from Senator Perrault. I gather it was in the negative and I suppose he is right. However, I cannot help but hope that, if we are unfortunate enough to have this tax go through, the overwhelming evidence which has been presented on the special circumstances of the North and the truly detrimental effects of this tax which will be outlined again in this report—which is not a single area, region or province, but all of the provinces who deal with the North—surely to God this will have some kind of effect towards ameliorating the goods and services tax in that area. That hope may not be realized. However, the evidence is absolutely incontrovertible and we shall see.

I understand Senator Lucier is getting a copy of that report and he probably, when he speaks in this debate, will go into it in some detail, so it will be interesting to hear what he has to say. I am sure it will follow along the lines of what Michael Ballantyne has been outlining for his territory.

● (0440)

He has indicated a very strong opposition to the fact that the North will not share equally in any economic benefit that the removal of the MST and the introduction of the GST may confer on southern Canada.

Senator Marsden: What are they?

Senator Fairbairn: He has even been, I suppose, gentlemanly enough to suggest that indeed there might be economic benefits from the GST in the south. However, he said that the North will not share equally in any benefit that might occur due to the very different nature of the Northwest Territories' economy. He further stated:

> It is a matter of great concern to us since the Northwest Territories economy is very much a developing economy and our non-resource base is fragile.
> Over the long term, some resource industries in the Northwest Territories should benefit from the GST because the cost of their capital inputs may fall. However, it is unlikely that the magnitude of these savings will be significant enough to increase jobs or increase production. There are two main reasons for this. First, for the most part, most capital goods purchased by Northwest Territories firms are already exempt from payment of the Manufacturers' Sales Tax. This results in virtually no tax content in the capital purchases of many of our resource firms and very little subsequent benefit to these firms from the elimination of the Manufacturers' Sales Tax. Second, since resource industries in the North sell at world prices, their selling prices are likely to remain constant. Any fall in input prices will therefore result in increased profits which will likely be exported to southern Canada or the United States, since our major industries are not owned by Northerners.
> In addition, a significant portion of employment in our primary sector is produced by so-called "fly-in, fly-out" workers. These are workers who are flown in from other parts of southern Canada by their companies to work on major projects but who maintain their permanent residence in southern Canada. The net result is that these individuals spend most of their earned income outside the Northwest Territories and also do not pay Northwest Territories income tax. Our latest estimates show that up to 20 per cent of employment income in the Northwest Territories is earned by non-residents. Many of the gains from elimination of the Manufacturers' Sales Tax and any productivity increases that may be reflected in the incomes of these workers would not accrue to the Northwest Territories economy.
> The federal government has forecast that real output in Canada should increase by 1.4 per cent over the next few years as a result of the GST, but that real incomes would increase by only 0.9 per cent. The reason for this gap is that some of the growth in real incomes will accrue to non-residents. The federal government has indicated that it expects the economy of the Northwest Territories to experience similar economic benefits and to grow at about the national average.
> It seems clear that this forecast overstates the overall benefits of the GST on production and income. As mentioned earlier, Northern residents do not own the major industries of the North. Consequently, much of any increased production will accrue to non-Northerners. Although it is impossible to judge with certainty, our analysis shows that the gap between increased production and real income in the North is likely to be much more significant than in the rest of Canada.

The effect of the GST on the service sector is a major issue in the North. Mr. Ballantyne states:

In the public sector, the impact of the GST is expected to be largely neutral, with the exception of our municipalities, schools and hospitals. Muncipalities, schools and hospitals in the North face much higher costs than they would in the South. Although the percentage rebate for all of these entities has not yet been finally set by the federal government, we are concerned that the adjustment to compensate these bodies for the new tax will be too low.

Our privately-owned service sector industries in the north will not benefit from the GST and it is likely that the tax, as in many other regions of Canada, will retard their growth. We are also concerned that the relatively-higher costs of services in the North will weaken any comparative advantage that we may now enjoy.

By far the most important private service industry in the Northwest Territories is the tourism industry.

This was emphasized time and time again by witnesses in Whitehorse, Yukon and in Yellownife, Northwest Territories when our committee travelled to those centres.

Mr. Ballantyne notes that by southern standards his tourist industry is still very small. He goes on to state:

However, it has been maturing rapidly in recent years as its ability to package better trips to our wilderness areas has been improving. The Government of the Northwest Territories wants to ensure that this growth continues.

Tourism is now second only to government in terms of its contribution to employment. According to the Tourism Industry Association of the Northwest Territories, 1989 tourism receipts exceeded $150 million. As well, during the 1986 season, tourism in the Northwest Territories generated 2,800 person-years of employment.

The tourism industry clearly will be hurt by the GST. Already, our costs are much higher than in the south. Indeed, the factor which makes tourism in the North so unique and appealing, the remoteness and isolation of many of our areas, when coupled with short tourist season, also makes it much more expensive. Competition in tourism is growing fiercely as more and more countries and regions vie with each other for the scarce tourist dollars. The GST will result in higher prices for tourists, and could push up prices beyond the level of affordability in target tourist markets. The GST will also impose a large administrative burden on our tourist operators.

As indicated previously, the traditional economy is mainly a cash-based economy geared towards subsistence. Production occurs almost entirely at the household level. By its nature, the traditional economy is very fragile and sensitive to price changes. Consequently, those who do not participate in the market economy will get virtually no benefit as producers but will bear the full burden of the GST as consumers.

Many small traditional businesses, including many hunters and trappers, may find the administrative effort to file tax returns to be too great and may choose instead to be exempt from the tax. They would not be able to claim input tax credits for GST on their inputs and clearly would be worse off.

Consumers, particularly those in remote regions, will experience a disproportionate increase in their cost of living after the GST for two reasons. First, the GST will be applied to transportation costs which will be newly taxed under the GST. Second, high Northern transportation costs will be added to the already higher margins that are applied by retailers in Northern stores.

• (0450)

A study by the Northwest Territories' Department of Transportation, has shown that the combined effect of these two factors creates a significant advantage for consumers to buy goods, particularly high value, durable goods, in the south, and to arrange for separate transportation to northern points. This price advantage for durable goods is clearly indicated in the appendix that is attached to this brief.

Prices for these goods in Edmonton, Winnipeg, and Montreal are compared with prices for the same goods in Yellowknife, Fort Simpson, Baker Lake and Arviat, Aqaluit and Pond Inlet. The prices are then shown for the same goods purchased in the southern cities and transported to the north. A significant price advantage exists for purchasing these items in the south and transporting them north. This price advantage is exacerbated by the GST and will be harmful to northern retailers who will suffer the drop in sales.

The federal government has indicated that transportation costs relating to basic groceries will not be taxed. This is a real sore point in northern Canada because food shipments from the south to individuals in the North will be taxed at 7 per cent.

As Mr. Ballantyne says:

However, transportation costs on virtually everything else bought and sold in the North will be taxed. It is important to realize that the transportation costs to many > remote Northern communities can be extremely high since such items have to be flown in or taken in by sea-lift—

Because of lack of roads. And it is important.

> Lack of competition in the North means that these transportation costs are more likely to be passed on by retailers to ultimate consumers.

> It is unfortunate that the federal government is choosing to implement the GST at this time in Canada's economic cycle. The Canadian economy has been showing severe signs of weakening and unemployment has been rising. Indeed, some economists have been warning of the recession.

I should say, this presentation was given to members of the committee on July 30. It precedes the great number of statistics that have come out in recent days, indicating that we are right into a major recession, which is believed by some to have the potential of being the second worst recession in Canada since the World War II.

Mr. Ballantyne notes that:

> Commodity prices have been falling and are quite weak. All these signs point to the possibility of severe economic dislocations once the GST is introduced.

> In addition, interest rates have been at their highest levels for some months and the Bank of Canada has shown that it intends to keep rates high until it sees a significant moderation in inflation and wage settlements. Higher price levels, which will be brought about by the GST could not come at a worse time since they would result in further damage to our already fragile export-oriented industry. Higher debt costs to our capital-intensive resource industries will also be debilitating.

> Principles of equity would require that northern residents bear a similar tax burden to southern residents with similar real incomes. The tax burden facing Northwest Territories residents is much higher than that facing a resident in southern Canada. This primarily results from the higher incomes that residents in the North must earn in order to compensate for living costs which are significantly higher than anywhere else in Canada. These higher incomes, under our current tax system, result in higher federal income taxes which more than offset any benefit territorial residents may enjoy from the lower nominal territorial income tax. The resulting inequitable treatment of residents in very high cost regions has been demonstrated in a number of articles in professional journals—

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Many of those have been drawn to the attention of senators throughout this debate.

> The difference in purchasing power and the inequitable treatment of higher Northern incomes is partially recognized in the income system by the Northern deduction which was introduced in 1986. This deduction is clearly necessary. However, it suffers from two major deficiencies and only partially compensates for the higher income tax burden facing Northern residents. First, the deduction is calculated after Net Income on the tax form. It is therefore not taken into account in the calculation of the income offset in federal income tested credits and clawbacks. These credits and clawbacks include the child tax credit; the proposed GST tax credit; and the old age security, family allowance and unemployment insurance clawbacks. As a result, Northern residents are treated the same as southern residents and are not compensated for the higher sales tax burden or the lower real value of the income tested credit. Second, the Northern deduction has not been increased since its introduction and it is not indexed to increases in Northern living costs. It was set at its current level of $5,400 in 1986 based on living costs which prevailed since 1982. The deduction has lost 18 per cent of its value since 1986.

> A study by the Northwest Territories Department of Finance has concluded that, even after taking the Northern deduction into account, the tax burden facing territorial residents is still much higher than for southern residents. For example, a territorial family of four earning $45,000 in 1989 would enjoy roughly the same purchasing power as a family of four in Alberta earning $30,000. The southern family faces a total federal and provincial tax bill of about $3,900, or 13 per cent of income, compared to the territorial family which pays total taxes of about $7,800, or 17 per cent of income.

> The tax burden facing the territorial family is therefore 30 per cent higher than that for the Alberta family.

> The GST will increase the tax burden on Northwest Territories residents even more. A study commissioned by the Department of Economic Development and Tourism concluded that since prices of consumer goods and services are higher in the Northwest Territories than in the south, the GST, which is applied at a uniform rate in nominal terms, will impose a higher dollar burden on territorial customers.

The study concludes that the real value of the federal sales tax credit will be 33 per cent lower for a Northwest Territories' family than for a southern Canadian family. It recommends that, in order to treat Northwest Territories residents equitably in comparison with southern families, both the credit values and the thresholds should be indexed to account for the cost of living differences between the two regions.

However, since the nominal value of the proposed credit is the same for individuals in southern and northern Canada, it will not fully compensate residents of the north.

It should be noted that it will not fully compensate residents of the south, either.

The shortfall will be even greater in the more remote communities of the North with higher costs. The Northwest Territories' Government believes that this enhanced credit will still be insufficient to adequately compensate residents of the Northwest Territories. As well, individuals and families whose income disqualifies them from a tax credit will receive no protection from the impact of higher prices as a result of the GST.

Higher price levels in the North require that individuals earn 50 per cent more on average to maintain a similar purchasing power as a similar individual in southern Canada.

We continue to be concerned that municipalities, schools and hospitals will be adversely affected by the GST even after the proposed rebate.

The Minister of Finance has proposed that municipalities, schools and hospitals receive a rebate of a percentage of the GST that they pay, so as to ensure that they bear a similar tax burden after the GST as before implementation. Except for municipalities, this percentage has not yet been set but will be applied uniformly across Canada.

I mentioned earlier that the imposition of the GST on higher Northern prices imposes a disproportionate burden on northern residents relative to residents in the south. For the Northwest Territories' municipalities, schools and hospitals, the change from a tax based on manufacturers' or wholesalers' prices to one based on retail price will cost more and consequently these institutions in the Northwest Territories will not be compensated fully for the extra GST that they will pay.

Because of the isolation of our regions, Northerners use air travel much more than the residents in southern Canada. Indeed, air travel is a necessity in many parts of the Northwest Territories and out of 65 communities, only 16 have year-round road access.

The federal government proposes to make the cost of airline tickets subject to the 7 per cent GST. This would be in addition to the air transportation tax, although this will be reduced slightly for higher priced tickets and for air tickets on larger aircraft.

The study by the Northwest Territories Department of Transportation referred to earlier, suggests that "No other nation in the world with a value added tax possesses the geographic size of Canada and, as a result, transportation does not play the same vital unifying role in these nations as it does in Canada. The application of the GST to the cost of transportation will serve to magnify the distance problem in Canada and exacerbate regional disparities."

Other transportation services are not now taxed under the excise tax. However, for all taxable and exempt goods, the added cost of transportation will be taxed under the GST. Although the transportation component for basic foods such as groceries will not be taxed, many other necessities such as fuel, clothing and construction materials will be taxed and high transportation charges will contribute to a higher tax on these products than at present in the North.

It is common in smaller settlements in the Northwest Territories that do not have grocery stores for residents to order food from Yellowknife or the south and to have it transported to the community. Most such freight charges will be attributable to basic groceries but if paid for by the consumer it appears that they would be taxable.

Indeed that has been confirmed by a number of the airlines who operate into the north.

This comes at a particularly inopportune time since Canada Post has just increased the postage rates under the Northern Air Staging Network. This resulted from a decision by the federal government to phase out the subsidy for this service. This service is heavily used in many of the remote communities in the Northwest Territories and will add to the adverse impact of the GST.

Electricity and heating fuel are two very important commodities for Northern residents and, because of the > climate, northerners use more than residents in the south. Both these utilities are tax exempt but they will be taxed under the GST.

That concludes the brief by Mr. Ballantyne and I thank senators for their indulgence in my reading it in its entirety. As I said before, it was not presented to the committee and so, therefore, is not part of the record. Due to the comprehensive nature of this brief, I will not go into a number of the other very interesting briefs and comments that were made to senators during the committee hearings.

Our eighth and final amendment proposed that the government place a higher tax on luxury items in return for eliminating the tax on books, children's clothes and non-prescription drugs. This particular amendment was voted down on that tumultuous evening of Thursday, November 22nd, as were all of its fellow amendments.

Senators will know that, after a considerable skirmish, two other amendments were offered which also dealt with two substantive parts of the legislation. One of them was from Senator Waters of the Reform Party who urged that the government delay the implementation of the Goods and Services Tax to January 1, 1992. The final amendment was by Senator Lawson, who is an Independent, and his amendment would have guaranteed that all of the excess revenues collected by the Goods and Services Tax would be applied to reduce the public debt of Canada. Honourable senators know that both those amendments also were summarily dismissed.

As I move into the concluding area of this speech, I want to reflect again on the fact that mid-October was a daunting period for economic news, particularly as we heard it at the end of last week. In a very visceral way, I suppose the economic hens came home to roost on how the government has been managing economic policy and setting the stage for this very controversial tax. But more than that, some interesting models and alternatives were brought to light—models that are working in a number of European countries. In the month of October, if we recall, some of the economic news began with a report by the Conference Board of Canada, and this is what the Financial Post had to say about it.

> Ottawa's high interest rate policy has created the first made-in-Canada recession and the Goods and Services Tax will help keep the economy there till spring, warned the Conference Board.

The very next day, on October 10th, the Economic Council of Canada released its annual report casting a highly critical light on the long-standing high interest rate policy of the Bank of Canada—a policy, of course, aided and abetted and supported by this government. The day after that, a panel of three of the most powerful business groups in the country—the Business Council on National Issues, the Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association blasted the government for allowing interest rates to stay so high. The business groups blamed uncontrolled government spending as the rationale for keeping interest rates high and demanded a two-year freeze on government spending.

These again, honourable senators, came from the Business Council on National Issues, the Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association.

The Economic Council, however, came forward with quite a different analysis and prescription, and rather than continuing to flip back and forth between creating jobs and battling inflation, the Council suggested that we should be looking to European models, most notably, Austria, Norway, Sweden and Japan who have managed, during the same period, to contain inflation while keeping unemployment below 4 per cent.

This was recorded in a summary in a Toronto-Star editorial which went on to reiterate the five common threads running through these economies, threads that constitute policy alternatives that this government with its big business preoccupation has really ignored since coming to power in 1984. It might be useful for a moment to have a look at these ideas in the Economic Council's Report. They are not new, but they certainly are revolutionary in contrast to what has been happening in these countries.

First of all, these countries mentioned by the Economic Council have maintained a constant commitment to full employment. This is in contrast to Canada, where the government is committed to jobs if industry demands the workers, as it made clear in its refusal to follow through on the promise for special adjustment assistance in the face of free trade.

For this government, it would appear that jobs are subject to free market forces and come second to fighting inflation and reducing the deficit. The contribution that workers make to the economy by being employed and therefore being able to take an active role is not part of that equation.

Second, as the Economic Council report notes, these countries have established policies such as labour market programs and voluntary income policies—that is, voluntary wage and price controls, worked out on a tripartite basis by government, labour and business—so they can actively pursue full employment. In contrast, in this country we have cut back on training and employment programs by billions of dollars since this government coming into power in 1984. Indeed part of the thrust of the Unemployment Insurance Act amendments was to take a major portion of that money that in the past has been directed towards workers, particularly in parts of Canada where seasonal unemployment puts them at a distinct advantage. This money has been used directly for unemployment insurance purposes, and now will be rolled in to training programs as the federal government itself tries to move out of the unemployment insurance field.

Third, the Economic Council's report tells us that the policies of these countries it has surveyed are not framed unilaterally by government, but rather by a tripartite alliance of government labour and business. The Canadian Labour market productivity centre was set up in the early 1980s by a Liberal government to initiate this kind of activity, but under the Conservatives, virtually nothing has been heard about this group in recent years.

Fourth, in the Economic Council's report, it notes that these countries have set up well structured, centralized labour and management organizations that allow centralized and synchronized wage negotiations. This provides the necessary framework for a voluntary incomes policy, or voluntary wage and price controls as referred to before.

What the Council has done is outline a set of policies that stand in stark contrast to the free market tendencies of this particular government, and indeed others like the United States in recent years and Margaret Thatcher's United Kingdom. Here are alternatives that are working, according to the Council report, in a number of countries at a time when it is clear that the policies being followed here in our country are not working effectively.

● (0520)

The fifth point made by the Council is that labour market programs in these countries are designed and carried out by all of the partners, not just by government, and are geared to regional and community needs. As the Council's report states concisely:

> The Canadian model does not embody any of these characteristics. In contrast, inflation control, along with price stability and deficit reduction, have been pursued at the expense of full employment.
> Moreover, contract negotiation in Canada is not centralized or synchronized and no institutions exist to support the concerted pursuit of full employment. The most basic reason—and this points to another key difference in the Canadian situation, > —is that the tripartite nature of the European model has simply never caught on in this country.

> Such consultation by government as takes place at all is restricted to a limited number of groups and it is often perceived by the participants to be cosmetic. The Canadian practice of enshrouding federal and provincial budgets in secrecy does nothing to promote a collaborative approach.

In this digression, honourable senators, I have tried to suggest that, in addition to the alternatives to the GST that have been suggested, there are also alternatives to the way in which the Canadian economy is being managed—alternatives that other countries have implemented so that they can control inflation and keep employment high.

Carol Goar, who is the National Affairs columnist of the Toronto Star, commented on the Economic Council and its report. She wrote her column in mid-October. I think it might be useful to refer to parts of it. She began by saying that, as a courtesy, the Economic Council of Canada gave its latest annual review, "Transitions for the Nineties", to senior Finance Department officials 15 hours before making it public and they stayed up all night poring over the documents so they could prepare Finance Minister Michael Wilson for the inevitable grilling he would face in the House of Commons. She said, "They needn't have bothered."

Opposition Leader Herb Gray led off by asking Mr. Wilson how he could justify using high interest rates to fight inflation when the Council, a government-appointed agency, had warned that this approach threatens to increase both unemployment and the federal deficit. Mr. Wilson's reply was a classic evasion and one that is used consistently by the government, and that is to ask the Opposition what it has done in the last few years to encourage the government to follow policies that would reduce the fiscal deficit.

It is interesting to note that the further questions asked by Mr. Gray of Mr. Wilson prompted from him a response in reading all of the legislation that was being held up by the Senate at the time, somehow drawing senators into the reason why the government does not have the kind of policies to reduce the fiscal deficit that have been suggested.

As Mr. Gray noted, the Economic Council did not mention the Senate in its report on how this country might be changing its tactics.

The Economic Council, it was felt, had fulfilled its mandate as an independent advisory body by pointing out that the tight money policies of the 1980s are beginning to do more harm than good. It suggested a new direction. I think the Finance Department wished that Judith Maxwell and her council would stop making waves for them. I think the Bank of Canada feels that it should be left alone to manage monetary policy and that the place where the Economic Council should have been listened to eagerly and open-mindedly was the House of Commons.

That did not happen. It is failures such as this, says Carol Goar, that have taught Canadians to treat Parliament with derision and with contempt.

Senator Marsden: On the question of the debt and the deficit, I wonder whether Senator Fairbairn has had a chance to consider Ricardo's problem of the equivalence theorem.

Perhaps I could give Senator Fairbairn a little context for my question, which is slightly complicated. This is from an article in The Economist recently on the question of the impact of government borrowing on economic activity, which, as is pointed out, has been a controversial issue in macroeconomics since the days of Adam Smith. The article goes on to point out that most classic economists believed that public debt is not a good thing until Maynard Keynes, who argued that budget deficits could be used to inject extra purchasing power into the economy and so boost output and jobs.

The article then goes on to point out—and I think this is relevant to what Senator Fairbairn was just discussing—that this economic consensus began to fall apart in the 1970s, but persistently large budget deficits in industrial economies during the past two decades have provoked renewed interest in the theory behind fiscal policy. Today, it states, many Keyne-sians as well as fiscal conservatives accept that large budget deficits may be imprudent. One reason is that governments may be tempted to finance deficits by printing money, thereby fuelling inflation, as Senator Fairbairn has been suggesting to us over the course of the last little while. Inflation is one of the fears that many people have about the impact of this tax. Another is that investment may be crowded out as government borrowing pushes up interest rates.

The real purpose of this argument is to discuss something published by Mr. Robert Barro, who was then at the University of Chicago, who asked the question: "Are government bonds net wealth?" He argued that the case for public borrowing is flawed—not because borrowing is imprudent, but because changes in the size of the budget deficit do not affect economic activity. It makes no difference, he argued, whether government spending was financed by borrowing or by raising taxes. This, of course, comes centrally to the point that Senator Fairbairn has been making for the last little while.

What he was really doing was bringing back to life an idea that David Ricardo had thought of in 1821, although, as The Economist points out, Mr. Barro gave David Ricardo no credit at all. It is really the Ricardian equivalence theorem.

● (0530)

The real question is what people actually think wealth is. It goes on to a very interesting discussion and this is really what my question is. I wonder whether you want to comment on it because I do not think you have touched on it. The question is what people think debt is in terms of its impact on the future, on their children. The concept of inter-generational linkage and debt is discussed here. The question comes down to this.

If you care about future generations and derive pleasure from your children's consumption as well as your own, then you are part of this inter-generational linkage because you think your children will care about their children and so on. If you think that, then you act as if you will live forever. In other words, you take whatever tax credit you get, you invest it, you save it, you do not spend it. So that if the government increases its budget deficit, taxpayers know their children will face higher tax bills, they will therefore aim to leave them bigger legacies. To do that, they save more, so in effect government borrowing is kind of neutral in that system.

However, there are all kinds of exceptions. Some households are childless, some do not care about their children's tax bills, they spend their tax cuts. Some people are not able to leave their children bequests, in fact some leave their children debts. Capital markets are imperfect. Individuals, especially those with no collateral, may not be able to borrow as cheaply as governments. Also, young people borrow against future earnings. They go into detail on this. People do not have perfect foresight and information. Households may discount future taxes at a higher rate than they actually are. Ricardian equivalence assumes that all taxes are lump sum taxes. In practice, most taxes depend upon income for spending so they are a disincentive to economic activity and tax cuts therefore stimulate output and so on.

[Senator Marsden.]

None of this seems to me to have entered very much into the debate which has been carried on in this country about the impact of the deficit and the debt. There is a kind of perceived mythology about the actions of debt. Not to say it is a good thing but it is not being discussed in the context of the range of ideas available to us. I wonder if you have come across any of this kind of material or what you think about it. Where do you think the debate on the deficit is going in relation to this tax?

Senator Fairbairn: Thank you, Senator Marsden, for the question. I think it is very true that we do not have public debate on debt and deficits. We have had very lively public debate on social policy. We are having a lively public debate on this particular aspect of taxation policy, mainly because it is turning our whole tax system on its ear with something new that people genuinely do not want.

One of the things I have noticed in some of the mail I have received and some of the comments that people have made to me in increasing volume in the last couple of years, especially on this tax, is that all of a sudden there is a growing public perception of a looming danger in the high cost of the debt. Strangely, given all the money which has been put unsuccessfully into selling the GST, the government seems to have had some success in raising the public consciousness of both the deficit and the larger question of the public debt. It is growing in the same way as anxiety is growing among Canadians about the environment. There is a growing anxiety about what our children are going to be left with.

Senator Marsden: We are replacing the fear of the cold war with fear of damage to the environment and fear of the debt.

Senator Fairbairn: That may well be, but the fear is nonetheless there. One of the interesting commentaries that many people have made on this tax, and this was borne out by some of the testimony I have heard before the committee and in talking to ordinary people in western Canada where they seem to worry perhaps more about debt and deficits than they do here, was the point of Senator Lawson's amendment. Indeed, Senator Lawson told me he ran into the Prime Minister in the parliamentary restaurant the day of the vote on his amendment and the Prime Minister indicated that he thought the amendment was a pretty good idea. That is, if there was any excess revenue from the goods and services tax it would be directly earmarked for deficit or debt reduction.

A great many people who were concerned about the tax do not like the tax. It impacts negatively on them and all the rest of it, but a number of people have said to me that if they had had a very clear commitment by the government that the multi-billion dollar cash cow, as the GST has popularly come to be known, was going to be used to alleviate the deficit or the debt which would impact more on their children, they might have wanted to hold their nose and swallow the GST. But in the absence of any such commitment they have not been prepared to do so.

However, the preoccupation you have touched upon, I would say, is greater than it has been for a number of years. At least that is the indication I have had. At any rate, the verdict is certainly in on this tax and I think every speaker on this side has underlined that and will continue to do so. No one in this country, for all of the reasons which have been discussed, wants this tax except the Minister of Finance. He says he wants it to reduce the deficit that in large part was created by those same high interest rates which he insists upon maintaining. Big business also wants the tax because they want the deficit reduced and because they see the GST as a relatively painless way to reduce that deficit.

Senator Hays: Senator Fairbairn, if I could ask a question?

• (0540)

In your long speech you have outlined all of the reasons that the goods and services tax is bad and that we should not have it.

At what point in the process did the government go wrong? Here we are at 25 minutes to six on a Wednesday morning for an extraordinary event in an extraordinary time. Where did the government go wrong with the conception of a value-added tax as being something we should have and then having hearings before the Finance Committee, and so on? Where should they have turned back on this? Where should they have realized that this is something which is so against the grain of the Canadian population? Where did they have an opportunity to take another road and, instead of taking it, have us here at an early hour on a Wednesday morning trying to represent the will of the Canadian people, with the other side bound and determined to put this bill through?

In fairness to Senator Kirby earlier, he did give an answer. He said 1988, but he did not elaborate on it.

Senator Fairbairn, could you give us your views on that.

Senator Fairbairn: I am inclined to say that the basic area in which the government went wrong was in coming out of the election of 1988 and making the assumption that it could move ahead with a proposition which it had fully bought privately—and, again, this is a characteristic of the way in which this government operates. It was going to move ahead with it without consulting widely in advance of making that decision. The decision had been made.

Consequently, the public again felt that it had had no part whatsoever in a consultative process and information-sharing process.

Another place where they went wrong was in making the assumption that they did not necessarily have to sit down and hammer the thing out with the provinces, even though, in the minister's white paper, he said that without full provincial participation the tax would be unworkable. If it was the internal conviction that this was required, then—

Senator Balfour: Was that something like the National Energy Program?

Senator Fairbairn: I have a lot of difficulty with the National Energy Program. I have no difficulty in conceding that had there been proper consultation and had there been a wider representation of western views within our own caucus, perhaps the National Energy Program would not have been conceived and carried out in quite the way that it was.

I will say, Senator Balfour, that it had an extraordinary effect on events in Alberta. I believe Senators Olson and Hays will agree that today it is still very much alive in people's minds. It is a symbol which they have not forgotten.

I will suggest to you that what our party has had to contend with in the National Energy Program in Alberta, in a single province, the Conservative Party will have to contend with in a similar fashion, in a very visceral way, with the GST, from one end of the country to the other. People don't forget.

This was a time, you will recall, when a great deal of consulting and negotiating was going on between the federal government and the provinces on a variety of issues. If a real effort had been made to lay the ground-work for the tax, with co-operation from the provinces—and, again, Senator Balfour, there have been some very valid criticisms, not necessarily from people who are closely associated with the Conservative Party but from many Canadians, individuals and groups and regions such as the North, which could have been utilized—in my opinion forging compromises on the tax which would have paved the way for something other than having the provinces taking the federal government to court.

There is no point, I suppose, in talking about "could have beens". But I believe there could have been a much more pointed effort in its political self-interest, if for no other reason, for the federal government to have made a greater effort to give the Canadian people a better understanding of the tax before it was set in concrete, and to have responded to some of the valid concerns and suggestions which have been expressed.

As the Minister of Finance has said, one of the major difficulties facing him in delivering this tax, if the tax passes the Senate, will be how to sort out the provinces. As he has said, it would be unworkable unless he were able to establish that. Maybe he was a betting guy.

The concept should have been laid before them and the need for revenue discussed with them. That should have been done without the idea that they would all, grumbling perhaps and ticked-off in some cases, say, grudgingly, "We will come along and work with you and share the base".

I believe that was a risky assumption for him to have made without creating the groundwork with the provinces. I believe, Senator Hays, that if that had been done, we might not have been here at a quarter to six in the morning today.

Senator Phillips: I have a question for the honourable senator.

She said in her reply to Senator Balfour that she had certain difficulties with the National Energy Program. Perhaps she could tell us about those. Up to now her remarks have not been particularly exhilirating and perhaps we would find that more interesting.

• (0550)

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Phillips, at this point in time, as I indicated to Senator Balfour, yes I did. I think a lot of westerners had problems with it, and basically I am suggesting they were the same problems that you are having, and that your government is having with the GST. There was not consultation. We did not, in fact, have the advantage that you have in your government of having a slew of members from that particular region. We had stalwarts like Senator Olson, who was in a position, practically alone, of trying to talk about why there were difficulties—when he was meeting with the cabinet colleagues—and about not proceeding in the way that it was done. I suggested—and perhaps this could be a subject for an inquiry further down the road—but I suggested that a lack of consultation, a lack of representation, a lack of trying to work more closely—

Senator Olson: It was badly represented.

Senator Fairbairn: That is true.

Senator Frith: That is another big difference. We are representing this thing accurately.

Senator Fairbairn: That is true, Senator Olson, and unfortunately—

Senator Phillips: Am I correct in understanding the Honourable Senator Fairbairn when she says that Senator Olson opposed the National Energy Program? Because I recall he presented it as a wonderful program to this chamber. Am I not correct in that?

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Senator Olson: There is something wrong with your memory. Senator Phillips—

Senator Frith: Senator Olson is up on a question of privilege. You triggered it. You accused him.

Senator Olson: That is misrepresenting the situation. I never came into this chamber and said it was a wonderful program, because from the first time that I came in here I knew that members opposite did not understand it well. Members opposite started misrepresenting it. I had some problems with both of them. Any good comprehensive program that envisages a massive program, usually you have some difficulties with it.

The only point I was making is that some members opposite, and I think probably Senator Phillips was one of them, and Senator Balfour was another of them, they got a few things wrong to start with and they never stopped talking about it, even though we amended and fixed most of it up.

Senator Balfour: And they never will.

Senator Olson: And they never will.

For example, I know that Senator Balfour has mentioned a number of things about the National Energy Program that were never implemented, and still he goes about saying that they were. We realized there were a few things wrong with it very shortly after it was announced on October 30 1980. We did not fix them, so we started right away to make some amendments.

For example, the throughput charge on natural gas that was outlined at 15 cents per MCF to escalate up until it got up to 75 cents per MCF, never happened. Yet you still talk about it.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Balfour: You bet.

Senator Olson: Why? Why do you want to talk about things as if they happened, when they never did happen? I do not understand that kind of reasoning. Of course, I know that you and Premier Lougheed, and a few other people, got the bit in their teeth, started to run with it, and they could not let go. I am not trying today to say that everything was perfect with the NEP. By no means. I tell you this, it never was what the opposition, especially Premier Lougheed of Alberta, said happened. A lot of things that he claimed might have been suggested, and might even have been in the program to start with, but they were never put into operation.

Senator Frith: Hear, Hear!

Senator Olson: You should get that sorted out, because credibility gets awfully bad if you keep saying that things happened that never really happened.

Senator Balfour: I would like to hear you make that speech in Calgary.

Senator Olson: I have. You know there are a few oilmen who are intimately involved in the business. They do not get up and cheer or anything, but they say it is time for a lot of honest talk about what the NEP was. We know that we got beat. Politically it was just an overwhelming victory for then Premier Lougheed. There is no doubt about that. It seems that if the Conservatives can find something that they can win on, even if they are wrong, they keep running with it forever until it is worn right out.

I have a bit of a privilege here because Senator Phillips said that I came here and claimed that it is such a great program. I know there were some things in that program that needed to be done, but I never came along like he said we did. We started to fix it up. This Bill C-62 needs to be fixed.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Senator Olson: I know that some members opposite who were along with us on the committee, admit that, right in those regions where we held the meeting, that, "Oh yes, we are going to fix that."

Senator Fairbairn mentioned earlier in her speech that nobody here from the other side has offered to do some of the repair work that this faulted bill needs. I do not understand that kind of reasoning.

Senator Frith: In fact they give their back of the hand to it.

Senator Olson: "No amendments. We are so smart and so wise, that we go in and we write up a great big bill, 380 pages, not going to change one," that is how wise they are.

They did that with Meech Lake too. It happened in Meech Lake. I bet this: I bet you that every single one of the amendments that we propose will in fact be enacted before 18 months are up. That is why I think—

Senator Frith: Same with Meech Lake.

Senator Olson: Yes, we could have fixed that up too. It was not all bad, but there were a few bad things in it. These people opposite, I do not know where they get this idea that you get all that wisdom, that you can do everything perfectly, and then say, "not one change."

Senator Frith: Another seamless web.

Senator Olson: That is what it is.

That is a little explanation for Senator Phillips so that he will not make that mistake again, I hope.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Senator Fairbairn has already spoken once in the debate. Our rules allow a senator to speak only once, once the previous question has been put. She did not yield the floor to the Honourable Senator Olson and Senator Olson now has the floor. Senator Olson has taken the floor from her and therefore her speeches should be terminated.

Senator Olson: That is wrong.

Senator Frith: Senator Olson got up on a point of privilege, but let us have a nice long debate on Senator Phillips' point of order. Thank you again, senator.

Senator Olson: I said at the beginning that I am getting up on a question of privilege because Senator Phillips was misquoting me. He was making a statement that just simply was not true. There is nothing that is a more solid basis for a question of privilege than that. I would not say that about Senator Balfour, if it was something that I knew was not right and not expect him to get up and object to it, and neither did he.

● (0600)

That is what it was. I am going to make a very extensive speech some day. This is a question of privilege.

Senator Phillips: You are making your speech now.

Senator Olson: If you want to keep it going, it is all right with me.

Senator Frith: Yes, sir. I like Senator Phillips; he is really our helper. Another question, perhaps, Senator?

Senator Phillips: Yes. It is getting very boring.

Senator Olson: I know I am not the only one, either.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Senator Fairbairn: I suppose I would really like to say this is the beginning of my conclusion. I want to make the point that the country has had time to think about the ramifications of this tax. Although the minister and his department have denied those ramifications, I would like to look at how much support this government actually has had for Bill C-62. I have tried to put on the record, as exhaustively as I can, what the Senate Committee hearings on the bill, held across the country, tellingly revealed. The kind of response the Canadian people have given to this legislation. I have to say I am utterly puzzled as to why the government has felt compelled to push ahead so single-mindedly and so bull-headedly without trying to make some of the changes in terms of the GST that were discussed by Senator Olson a minute ago.

One of the things that struck me in early November was the Globe and Mail story about the surveys that were ordered on the GST by the government over the past year. Six surveys. What did the surveys say? I will read the top of the story.

> The federal Finance Department has spent $413,700 in the past year on six public-opinion surveys that told it most Canadians hate the proposed goods and services tax and do not trust the government to spend GST revenue wisely.

Senator Olson: All they needed to do was ask me; I could have told them that.

Senator Frith: They would have saved some money.

Senator Fairbairn: You could have told them that. Clearly all of the witnesses who rallied round to come to these hearings had no difficulty in expressing that view. There was no need to spend almost half a million dollars to conduct surveys to find out what people thought.

Having done it and finding out what people thought, what did they do? They pressed on. They pressed on without adjustment, without compromise or without listening to what the people had to say.

Clearly, as they were doing their own polls, they had to be watching all the other polls that have been coming out right, left and centre, which I would say are pretty depressing news for the federal government. Apart from the trust factor, which they have had a problem with for some time, what has been the major issue that has bothered Canadians as they have responded to these surveys? The major issue has been the GST.

So you have the polls that the government did. You have the Angus Reid poll recently indicating seven in ten oppose the tax. Over and over again you have the provinces fighting the tax on constitutional grounds in the courts. As was mentioned a few minutes ago, as with Meech Lake and Senate Reform, we have a clear example of the failure of this government to develop broad and basic consensus before it acts. That returns to my answer to Senator Hays. This is at the heart of the problem in almost every area that this government is suffering.

Canadians across the nation told the committee in no uncertain terms what is wrong with this tax both in concept and in proposed application. The economic climate in which this tax will be proposed is horrendous.

I begin with a brief reference to the climate in which the government is imposing this tax and the policy alternatives that other countries are utilizing to try to avoid made-at-home recessions. I am not an economist but it does not take a particularly trained eye to see what has been happening to this country's economy.

Since the imposition of the Free Trade Agreement, Canadians have been struggling to adjust to the resulting loss of jobs and the economic activity which this government promised to ease with special adjustment programs.

In spite of all the work of the de Grandpre Commission, in the end it did not provide an adjustment. The Minister of Finance admits what everybody in Canada has known for some time—and what I have quoted at length—that we are into a deep recession just at the point where the government is about to deal the economy another severe blow through the imposition of this tax.

Senator Olson: I guess you cannot believe anything they say.

Senator Fairbairn: In this environment, the GST will kill thousands of small businesses whose activity has already been marginalized by the increased competition of the Free Trade deal and the economic downturn. The additional expense of dealing with the paper burden combined with a 7 per cent price increase, which the market is unlikely to bear, and a 7 per cent rise in overhead to cover all the goods and services needed to operate, will simply put thousands of these small firms out of business. These are the firms that are the big job creators in Canada. These people will be forced either into unemployment or into the underground economy.

The negative and punitive signs of the recession are all around us in the closing-out signs in store windows and the empty stores themselves. The pressures are stifling. Small business people, who have operated profitably for years, are sadly watching that success deteriorate in spite of all their skills in sales and marketing. They are doing things like taking a second mortgage on a house that once was paid off, and wondering how long they are going to keep their store operating.

There is an example I know of here in Ottawa of a booming business in collectibles which has begun to develop an international reputation for quality goods and services. Yet, to cope with the additional burden of this tax, the owner has had to reduce his overhead by moving to cramped and less accessible quarters. He is seriously considering moving a large part of his business to the United States. This is the reality being played out across this country.

The Minister of Finance chides us for excessive rhetoric. Our response is, where in the name of God are you living? Who are you talking to?

Senator Frith: Whom.

Senator Fairbairn: Whom are you talking to? Thank you, Senator Frith. Well, we know who this government has claimed to be: the great champion of entrepeneurialism. Yet it is the large corporations, usually considered the least entrepreneurial and most bureaucratic sector of the business community, for whom the government policies are clearly designed. They are certainly the only organizations equipped to deal with the vagaries of Free Trade and the burden of the GST. They are the only ones with the financial stability and flexibility to ride out these odds. The resulting ripple or cascading effect of this new tax will amount to a major drag on the entire economy just at the point when it is most in need of a boost. And let us remember that this tax does not just apply to the profit sector. This is a government that does not hesitate to tax the full range of voluntary effort, effort on the part of hundreds of thousands of citizens that saves government at every level virtually millions of dollars. This is a government that has no qualms about taxing clothes for children, taxing recreation and community social programs, taxing even fitness. This is a government that does not hesitate to tax the arts and books and reading in a country where Canadian art and culture have had to work so hard for even a modest market share. This is a country where the government is prepared to tax recreation and sports fees set up by amateur sports and recreation associations—except for those involving children under the age of 14, and the mentally or the physically disadvantaged—and at the same time, this is a country where the primary causes of death remain diseases linked to fitness and lifestyle, and health costs that amount to as much as one third of the total provincial budget.

• (0610)

It seems to me, particularly at this hour of the morning, that if the government could have figured out a way to put a tax on breathing they would have done so but, really, they did not have to because the GST amounts to the same thing.

Senator Frith: You are going to be paying taxes every time you breathe.

Senator Fairbairn: That is right.

Non-profit groups will also have to pay GST on all the goods and services they must purchase to run their programs, and in order to receive the concession of a 50 per cent rebate on the GST they pay, they will have to assume the burden of keeping the records and applying for it.

The Senate Committee, as we know, and as I have said in answer to a question, learned that even poppies sold by veterans and the wreaths that we placed at the Cenotaph on Remembrance Day are not exempt from this wretched tax. Indeed one of the veterans organizations sent a letter to the Minister of Finance to draw his attention to that situation.

Honourable senators, I want you to think for a moment of the kinds of benefits that this is producing for the government. We have headlines like, "Prime Minister's Politics of Fear Won't Win Votes," "House of Commons No Longer Democratic;" "Canadians Rejecting the Conservative Party and Its Leader," "Support for the Conservatives Among Decided Voters 14 per cent"—is barely ahead of two regional parties, the western based Reform Party at 11 per cent and the Separatist Bloc Quebequois at 10 per cent."

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Fairbairn: Certainly.

Senator Bosa: What was the date of that poll?

Senator Fairbairn: The date of that poll was in the Toronto Star, November 26, very recent, very up-to-date.

"31 per cent of Canadians say: "Brian Mulroney, the worst PM in years." "Most Canadians disapprove of Tory record, poll shows." "7 out of 10 Canadians could not find anything positive about the Conservative record."

Recently I was involved in commenting on a poll done for the Globe and Mail and the CBC, and it was an extremely distressing poll because the level of disrespect, the level of frustration, the level of anger that has circled around this government also is spilling over in the public mind against politicians and politics generally in Canada.

Senator Bosa: And institutions.

Senator Fairbairn: And our institutions, and the level of disrespect, total lack of respect is absolutely overwhelming.

In this poll, it says:

> About 30 per cent of the population goes out of its way to seek the most negative attributes about politicians, the way they work, the political process, the system as a whole. These are the highly alienated voters, and a good proportion of them have drifted to the Reform Party or the Bloc Quebequois. For these people, 30 per cent of the population, there is almost nothing that works, almost nothing good to say.

We have this kind of data, Senator Bosa.

> 77 per cent of Canadians think that politicians tell the truth only some of the time or hardly ever. 76 per cent think you can trust governments to do what is right only some of the time or hardly ever. 72 per cent—

These are just horrendous numbers.

> —think governments do not care about what people think. 67 per cent think governments are out of touch with the problems that people have to face. 66 per cent think Canada's system of government needs a lot of improvement or a fundamental overhaul. 64 per cent think politicians do not know where the country should be heading or how to get there. 58 per cent think the amount of corruption and conflict of interest has gone up recently, and 55 per cent say their level of respect for our political institutions, like Parliament, has gone down recently.

Senator Bosa: It has never been like that in years.

Senator Fairbairn: I cannot remember anything up in the 70 percentage area, three quarters of our Canadian people have almost reached the point where they do not believe or care to have anything to do with what good people in political life are committing themselves to try to achieve . As I say, the discontent, the frustration and the anger have tarred the whole political process in this country. What we are dealing with here is much more than a debate over whether or not Canadians should pay another 7 per cent for everything they buy. It is much more than a debate simply on economics. It is more than a debate about whether or not one particular political philosophy should prevail over another. It is a debate about how we want to govern ourselves as a free and democratic people. It is a debate which touches the core of what makes us Canadian and it is a debate about what makes us unique among the nations of the world.

● (0620)

Earlier in my comments I spoke about what has been happening in other parts of our world, particularly in eastern Europe—the barriers are coming down. The people are finally getting the opportunity to have their say. And it is not smooth sailing. It is not particularly easy, but at long last it is finally happening. What is happening in this country runs totally in the opposite direction.

Here we have a Prime Minister and a government who have completely and utterly ignored not only the wishes of the vast majority of the Canadian people but also the needs of the Canadian people. It is a government which has relentlessly pursued a radical right-wing economic and social agenda in the face of overwhelming evidence that nobody wants it and nobody needs it. In the process of pursuing that agenda, members of the government have decided among themselves that they and they alone know what is best and that they and they alone are equipped with the knowledge and the skills required for the job at hand.

To believe in your program, honourable senators, is not a sin on the part of any government. But this government has stepped far beyond simply trying to sell its programs, to offer its alternatives to the marketplace of ideas. This government has engaged in unprecedented and outrageous abuses of democracy in recent days in order to fulfil that right-wing agenda. I have outlined some of these in my comments last night and today; I guess that covers it.

The list is long.

The misleading and erroneous statements about what this tax is all about. The deception during the election campaign about how much the tax would be. the deliberate hiding of facts until after the election. The repeated use of closure to get it through the House of Commons. And, in my view, the absolutely reprehensible way in which senators have been treated in this house by being locked out of the chamber during a vote, by seeing the rule of law being completely abandoned in this chamber, by seeing the rule of protection of the rights of each senator, fall in the wake of dictatorial decrees.

The perversion of the whole idea of Senate reform with the appointment, through a rule never used before in our constitutional history, of eight new Conservative senators just to get this tax bill through is entirely wrong. One can go back to the early years of the government to see the same kind of evidence, and one asks: Is this the way we want to govern our country?

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Hébert: No!

Senator Fairbairn: Is this how any country should be governed?

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Hébert: No!

Senator Fairbairn: From on high, in secret, by decree, by executive order?

Senator Frith: No!

Senator Hébert: No!

Senator Fairbairn: Nobody wants that kind of government. Even pseudo-dictatorships simply do not work.

But the greater danger in all of this is that such behaviour harms not only its perpetrators—in this case, the current government—but it also causes people to lose faith in all of their public men and women. It debases the currency of all of us.

Senator Bosa: You are talking about cynicism.

Senator Fairbairn: Cynicism rampant, if one is to read and digest the polls to which I drew your attention a moment ago. It makes Canadians say: "What the hell? Why should we vote?" I have heard them say it. Some will not vote in the next election. Or they will vote and they will say on their ballots, as they spoil them, why they do not want to vote. And why? Because they are saying: "They never listen to anything we say, so why should we vote at all?"

That, honourable senators, is really why I have been standing here for this long time, and why many of my colleagues have done and will do the same thing. That is also why all of us are pleading with honourable Conservative senators opposite: Listen to what the people are saying. Listen to the cries of pain out there. They are all very real. They are coming from hundreds, thousands, millions of Canadians from coast to coast to coast. And those voices are begging all of you to listen. When it comes down to the final line and the final moment, the GST—and, with it, the perception of people in public life governing the country—it is your decision. You can strike a blow for democracy and for the people that we in this house also represent by striking down this tax. You can help all of us regain some of the trust we have all lost in the eyes of Canadians. You can say "no" to the GST.

On behalf of all of my colleagues, I sincerely hope that at least some of you do.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am going to speak principally to the new senators and especially to those from Nova Scotia.

I am sorry, Senator Forrestall, I did not hear your question.

Senator Forrestall: It was not a question. I am looking forward to your speaking to all of us.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for his interest. I hope that I can maintain it. I am also glad to see that Senator Buchanan is here. He, like Senator Forrestall, is a new senator from Nova Scotia.

I am not going to concentrate upon the proposed goods and services tax. I believe, from what I have heard in the speeches delivered from this side of the house and from what I have seen in the faces of honourable senators opposite, that there is a general consensus in this chamber that this country is not now ready for the goods and services tax. The tax itself, the bill itself, is not ready for enactment. It has not been carried to that point where it ought to go into the statute books. And, at the same time, the people of Canada are not ready for this tax. I think there is agreement on that.

But I believe that honourable senators who might wish to vote against this bill are deterred from doing so by various considerations such as the doctrine of responsible government, the notion of an electoral mandate, their concept of the role of the Senate and the like. It is going to be on those things principally that I shall be talking today.

Before I begin I want to say, as Senator Fairbairn said in her concluding remarks, we have been fortunate over the years in this country to have had parliamentary government. We have not had government by decree. Decisions in this country have not been made on high and then promulgated. Decisions have been made in Parliament.

Parliament is an old institution. We know pretty well what it involves. It involves making decisions. Decisions are the product. However, it also involves at least two other things. It involves rules and it involves debate. Decisions made without debate and without rules are not legitimate decisions. It is as simple as that. People are prepared to accept the decisions made as a result of genuine parliamentary activity, but people are not prepared, honourable senators, to accept decisions made when there has been no genuine debate and when the rules which were supposed to have prevailed have been swept aside by acts of outrageous usurpation.

I am going to invite honourable senators who support this bill, Bill C-62, to try to give it some legitimacy, if they are determined that it will be enacted. I do not ask them to filibuster their own bill, but I ask them to listen to the evidence which I will adduce today to support the proposition that they have not engaged in a genuine debate on this bill. I am going to ask them to try to refute the evidence which I will adduce that the rules of this house have been not just flagrantly violated, but have been swept aside.

Senator Frith: Abrogated.

Senator Stewart: Abrogated. So that there has been the rule of the jungle here, the rule of might.

I put it to honourable senators that if this bill becomes law without debate and by the exertion of the raw force of numbers it will not command respect. It will not have the legitimacy that a law, to be law in a democracy, requires.

What we have before us is a motion to cut off debate on Bill C-62. I propose that honourable senators consider the history of that bill before they decide how to vote. Second reading of Bill C-62 was moved by Senator Kelly on May 1, 1990. He spoke for approximately 30 minutes. On May 2, Senator Poitras spoke for about 17 minutes. Then after a total of about five hours of debate, most of which was taken up from the Liberal side of the house, Bill C-62 was sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

On June 27, the government, speaking through Senator Doody, moved that the Senate take a three-month summer holiday. On the very first day we were back in late September the committee chairman sought to present the report of the committee. The Progressive Conservatives conducted a filibuster. The report was presented on September 26. Then Senator Roblin refused leave for consideration of the report later that day. That was his right, I am not objecting.

On October 4, Speaker Charbonneau revealed that he was in collaboration with the government when, contrary to the rules of the Senate, he conducted a vote at a clandestine meeting of some senators, clearly not a sitting of the Senate of Canada, at a time earlier than the hour which he himself had appointed; and behind closed doors. That was not a meeting of the Senate of Canada.

Senator Forrestall: Why do you leave that impression? That is an untruth and you know it.

Senator Stewart: But it is true, Senator Forrestall. It is shown on the record of this house that the Speaker sent a letter saying that he was going to conduct the vote at 5:30. The record shows that at 5:25 he ordered that the doors be locked.

Senator Forrestall: I watched your Whip shoo people away from the door. I am just telling you what I saw and what I know. It may be in conflict with what you choose to put on the record.

Senator Stewart: Senator Forrestall, I know my own experience.

Senator Forrestall: So do I.

Senator Stewart: I speak from my own experience.

Senator Forrestall: So do I.

Senator Stewart: I came over here and found the doors of this Chamber locked.

Senator Forrestall: That is your own experience.

Senator Stewart: I speak always from my own experience unless I have good evidence otherwise. As a senator from Nova Scotia, I came here to what I thought was going to be a division of the Senate conducted at an hour, 5:30 p.m., improperly appointed by Senator Charbonneau. I arrived here from the Victoria Building I found the doors to the chamber locked. So I say that that was a clandestine meeting. It was not a meeting of the Senate of Canada. It was a secret meeting conducted at an hour at which I could not be present.

Senator Phillips: What flight were you taking?

Senator Stewart: I was in my office in the Victoria Building. I guess you were not in your office. You were over here conspiring to conduct a clandestine meeting.

Senator Phillips: How long did you take to get back from the airport?

Senator Stewart: Senator Phillips, you are just making up lies.

● (0640)

Senator Phillips: I am just asking you a question.

Senator Stewart: You are implying something that is utterly untrue.

Senator Forrestall: What do you think you did for about 30 minutes other than imply an untruth?

Senator Stewart: I told you, Senator Forrestall, what I said, and I explained what I said. If you wish to deny the facts as I have asserted them, that is your right.

I told you that I heard that there was to be a vote. I came over here as quickly as I could, and I found the doors locked. It may be that senators closer at hand arrived here and found them open; I don't know about that. I am talking only from my own experience.

I say to you that, as a senator from Nova Scotia, I have a right to be at every division of this house. And my record is good. Even Senator Phillips will concede that.

Senator Phillips: What time did the bells start ringing?

Senator Stewart: Senator Phillips, let me tell you that the previous week the Speaker had also turned off the bells on his own in violation of the rules of this house. How was one then to know what the significance of the bells, or of the silence, was? How was one to know?

I am glad that honourable senators have helped me to elaborate this point. Their interventions have been most constructive.

At 9:30 a.m. on Friday, October 5, at the same sitting, Senator Murray undertook to move that the Senate go to the Orders of the Day and skip to the order relating to Bill C-62. Given his conduct earlier in that same sitting, on the previous evening, Liberal senators were convinced that Senator Charbonneau would receive Senator Murray's motion, even though that motion obviously was out of order. By making noise, they prevented Senator Murray from moving that motion. He tried exactly the same tactic again on Monday, October 15. Again, a violation of the Rules of the Senate was prevented by Liberal senators.

On Thursday, October 18, the Senate agreed to a special order. That order set a limit of three days on the report of the committee on Bill C-62, and it provided for eight amendments to be moved by the Leader of the Opposition. Debate on each amendment was limited to six hours, for a total of 48 hours of debate.

When that phase of the operation was over, on November 2, Senator Kelly moved the third reading of Bill C-62. At that time, he said absolutely nothing.

The first Liberal amendment under the special order was moved on November 5. On that day, Senator Poitras gave us a short version of his stock speech on the relation between the goods and services tax and the reduction of the deficit. However, the star of the day was Senator Chaput-Rolland who told us, at page 3545 of the Debates of the Senate, that, while she knows in her head that it is dangerous to tax books, her faith in her leader overcomes all such obstacles.

On November 6, 1990, the second Liberal amendment was moved. It dealt with the taxation of electricity and heating fuels. Senator Barootes replied in very general terms.

The third Liberal amendment, moved on November 7, dealt with the taxing of co-operatives. Only Senator Simard could find anything to say against that amendment, and honourable senators know that he is ready to speak on any topic. Other Progressive Conservative senators sat in silence.

On the fourth Liberal amendment, moved on November 12, Senator Robertson made a speech. As expected, Senator Simard was on his feet. Other Progressive Conservative senators said nothing.

On the fifth Liberal amendment, moved on November 13, one Progressive Conservative senator, Senator Nurgitz, rose. As he said at page 3744 of the Debates of the Senate, he spoke because his whip, Senator Phillips, had ordered him to find his feet. Senator Murray uttered two short comments.

On the sixth Liberal amendment, moved on November 14, Senator David spoke. He told us that we cannot afford to exempt books, co-operatives or funerals from the tax. His principal message was that the GST will indeed reduce the debt. He recommended cremation because it will reduce the burden of the GST.

On the seventh Liberal amendment, dealing with the application of the tax in the north, moved on November 19, only Senator Cogger could find anything to say against the amendment.

The last Liberal amendment was moved on November 20. On that occasion, we heard briefly from Senator Di Nino.

On Thursday, November 22, Senator Murray tried to prevent an independent senator from getting the floor to move an amendment. As expected, Senator Charbonneau did his best to collaborate with Senator Murray. Liberal senators intervened to prevent an outrage.

By the time the situation created by Senators Murray and Charbonneau had been sorted out, we had reached Monday, November 26. On that day, November 26, Senators Murray and Charbonneau agreed to let Senator Waters speak on the motion for the third reading of Bill C-62. Senator Waters moved an amendment. Senator Phillips could find no Progressive Conservative senator who was ready to speak; consequently, he himself had to speak. To say that he dealt with Senator Waters' amendment would be to strain the truth.

On Wednesday, November 28, Senator Lawson moved an amendment. He asked that Bill C-62 be amended to provide that revenues produced by the goods and services tax in excess of $21 billion would be used to reduce the national debt. This amendment was especially important because it challenged directly the main argument of those who support Bill C-62, namely that the new tax will reduce the annual deficits and, thus, the national debt. Senator Castonguay spoke against that amendment.

Neither the House of Commons nor the Senate, Senator Castonguay told us at page 4000 of the Debates of the Senate, has the right to initiate appropriation. Whether the revenue produced by any tax will be used to reduce the debt is primarily the concern of the present government and future governments. In other words, those, such as Senator Everett, who justify the tax because it will reduce the debt, must trust the present and future governments. But, said Senator Castonguay, nobody should doubt the intentions of the present government. We have the word of the Prime Minister.

Senator Castonguay quoted the following words of the Prime Minister:

> If the GST throws off any more money than anticipated this money will not go to more program spending. If there is a modest or even a large windfall, I will give you the formal undertaking that we will either reduce the rate on the GST or we will take that money and apply it against the deficit.

That formal undertaking should suffice, says Senator Castonguay. But what, in fact, did the Prime Minister say? Did he say that program spending is to be frozen at the 1989 level? If not, his statement is a mere tautology. It is obvious that any revenue, whether above or below the anticipated amount, will be applied against the annual deficit as long as there is a deficit.

● (0650)

Senator Castonguay quoted also a statement made by the Hon. Gilles Loiselle.

> If we have any additional revenue from the GST, well, of course, it will be applied naturally, to the deficit.

What a remarkable revelation! No wonder Senator Castonguay is happy.

On Thursday, November 29 Senator Murray moved the motion now before us, the motion to close off debate on the motion moved by Senator Kelly on November 2.

Over two months have elapsed since we returned from our three-months long holiday, but by far the greatest part of that time, about 85 per cent, has been taken up by efforts to fend off assaults by Senators Charbonneau and Murray on the rights of honourable senators, the rights established by the rules of the Senate.

I have to say, of course, in fairness to the Conservative senators, that the special order which provided for the 10 amendments may have been somewhat unfair to them. If they intended to speak, they had to speak within the next four, five hours because under the special order, they had no notice of the content of the amendment. That situation may have contributed to the paucity of contribution from the government side of the house. Over two months, as I say, have elapsed, and very little has been said except in the last few days, other than what was said away back in May on the general thrust and the implications of Bill C-62.

In his speech on November 28 Senator Castonguay complained that Bill C-62 had not been dealt with expeditiously. What he failed to point out, of course, was that very little time has been spent on the Bill itself. He is an experienced parliamentarian. In all his long career, never did he ever see anything comparable to what happened here on November 22. Let me refresh his memory.

When the result of the division on Senator MacEachen's last amendment had been announced, the Speaker ought to have left the Chair, as it was after 6 o'clock. But he did not leave the Chair. Both Senator Waters and Senator Murray rose to speak. Senator Molgat moved under Rule 26 that Senator Waters be now heard. Speaker Charbonneau refused to receive that motion.

What was done is transparent. Senator Murray wished to prevent Senator Waters from moving an amendment. He also wanted to avoid a vote on Senator Molgat's motion. For the Progressive Conservatives to have been seen to deprive Senator Waters of his undoubted right to speak would not have looked good in Alberta, or indeed anywhere else in Canada. So Senator Charbonneau rushed in to do Senator Murray's dirty work. I would be surprised indeed, if Senator Castonguay did not find that kind of conduct deeply offensive.

Senator Frith: Pardon?

Senator Stewart: Deeply offensive.

We had about five hours of debate on Bill C-62 in May. We had three days in October on the report. Since then, 60 hours have been available for debate on amendments. Now the Government has moved closure.

Most of the senators who support Bill C-62 have had nothing to say. We still hope to hear from those senators who came to the Senate for the announced purpose of pushing through the GST. Why has Senator Eyton remained silent? Why has Senator Keon found nothing whatsoever to say? Will they tell us why they believe the GST will help reduce the deficits? If they do not speak, their motives for coming to the Senate may be misunderstood.

We have new senators from my own province, Nova Scotia. Will they be candid with us? Will they tell us what they think about the GST and its implications for the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland?

Senator Everett has spoken, and that is much to his credit. He has spoken two or three times on Bill C-62. He understands, and he has explained, the relationship between interest rates, the deficit, and inflation. He pronounced in favour of the GST in May, but by November 27 he was having some doubts. He was even considering voting, as he said, for Senator Lawson's amendment. But he got a letter. That letter convinced him that Mr. Wilson and his successors—be they Progressive Conservative, Liberal, or New Democratic Party—will use any extra revenue produced by the GST to reduce the annual deficits. Senator Everett needed that letter badly. Otherwise, he might have had to admit publicly that he had committed himself to this bill far too hastily. I do not believe that Senator Eyton, for example, would have settled for such a letter from an expiring minister.

This closure motion should be defeated. The government is asking all senators to pass Bill C-62 without having heard more than a half-hearted rebuttal of the criticisms launched against the GST. The government is asking us to have implicit faith in the present Prime Minister. By this motion, Senator Murray asks us for an act of faith.

Senator Buchanan denounced Bill C-62 when he was Premier of Nova Scotia. Senator Hatfield must have thoughts which he might share with us. But, no, the Progressive Conservatives' attitude to the task of explaining and defending the goods and services tax is exactly the same as was their attitude to explaining and defending the Meech Lake Accord in this house. Their attitude has been one of impatient indifference. If they were barristers, they would be disbarredfor failure to represent their client.

[Senator Stewart.]

• (0700)

Now they propose to avoid the tiresome work of defending Bill C-62 by imposing closure. In the interest of the country—indeed, in the interest of the Government—they ought to bestir themselves. Nobody asks that they make long speeches. We do not expect them to engage in a filibuster against their own bill. However, at least for appearance sake, they should put up half a dozen able advocates. Otherwise, the record will show them derelict in their duty. It will reveal yet another mistake in the management of this bill in Parliament.

If ever a bill was mismanaged, it is this one, Bill C-62. Here we have what the Government regards as the most important financial bill of the thirty-fourth Parliament. Senator Doody submitted an affidavit, dated November 7, 1990, to the Ontario Court (General Division) in the case between Tapishar Sher Singh and the Government. In the words, of that affidavit, "the Goods and Services Tax legislation, (Bill C-62), is the focal element of the current administration's economic and fiscal plan, . . ." Well then, how did the Government go about securing parliamentary agreement to this measure, a measure which it regards as of paramount importance?

This centrepiece of the new economic and fiscal order in Canada was to become operative on January 1, 1991. The Government put off the introduction of the bill in the House of Commons until January 24, 1990. Closure was used to end the second-reading debate. Closure was applied at the report stage. Closure was applied at the third-reading stage. Trouble in the Senate was expected. The Government decided to roll the dice in October.

In the meantime, an excuse for resort to section 26 of the Constitution Act was devised. A resolution of the differences between the Government and the Senate over Bill C-21 was deliberately avoided. In his affidavit, Senator Doody states that in May, 1990 "the Government motion of concurrence [in the message from the House of Commons on Bill C-21] was debated, adjourned and not resumed until October 19, 1990." Senator Doody forgot to mention that the motion was adjourned by Senator Ottenheimer on May 23 and that it stood in Senator Ottenheimer's name from that day until October 19. He forgot to mention that negotiations to resolve the differences revealed that the Government knew that the message that came to the Senate from the House of Commons was wrong. Senator Doody also forgot to mention that when it appeared that the remaining differences between the two houses could be quickly overcome, the Government refused to continue the discussions. He forgot that he himself moved a three-month holiday on June 27—thus revealing the panting urgency with which the Government longed for the enactment of Bill C-21.

Bill C-28, the claw-back Bill, also was used to justify the use of Section 26 of the Constitution Act. That bill had been reported with amendments to the Senate by the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on May 16, 1990. The next day Senator Murray objected to the amendments on the ground that they raised procedural and constitutional questions. On that day I asked Senator Murray not to delay the bill by a long wrangle over the constitutional powers of the Senate. I said:

> I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate, taking into account the long delays that have taken place with regard to the unemployment insurance bill—delays occasioned primarily by debates, disputes and statements concerning procedural and constitutional questions—would consider the possibility of dealing with the amendments in this case on their merits. That is, to set aside the procedural and constitutional questions on which there is a long tradition of Senate jurisprudence so that the disagreement will not be encumbered by those other questions and a settlement in some form or other can be reached in a reasonable time. I hope the Leader of the Government sees the point I am making. In brief, it is this: Why encumber the government's refusal to accept these amendments by raising procedural and constitutional questions? Why not say, "We just don't like it, and that's it."?

Senator Murray dismissed my suggestion, but I tried to reason with him. I said:

> Senator Murray is undoubtedly right that there are procedural and constitutional questions here. However, I wonder what is to be gained by putting them up front. If the discussion on the merits goes on long enough, then the question of the Senate's right to insist would undoubtedly arise, but perhaps we will never get to that.
> As the honourable senator has said, in the past the House of Commons has asserted that it continues to enjoy certain privileges, but that it has been prepared to waive them. That means that while the two houses may not be able to come to an agreement on these procedural and constitutional questions, nevertheless, accommodation has been possible. It seems to me that that is a line of thought that ought to be explored before we put this bill on the same protracted course that Bill C-21 is on.

But Senator Murray knew better. He was adamant. Bill C-28, he said, had come to Parliament with a royal recommendation. The time had come to settle these constitutional questions once and for all time. Clearly, Senator Murray—perhaps preparing for the day when Canada will have an NDP government—wished to strip the Senate of its right to amend tax bills.

Despite arguments made by Senators Roblin and Beaudoin, the Speaker ruled two of our three amendments in order. Those two amendments were rejected by the Government.

On June 19, Senator Doody moved for a message stating that the Senate did not insist on its amendments. He did not speak in support of his motion. Senator Frith adjourned the debate.

On June 27, without any attempt to have his motion on Bill C-28 dealt with by the Senate, Senator Doody moved for a three-month summer holiday. He saw no urgent need for Bill C-28. None at all! And, of course, there wasn't any urgency. The Government had been operating the clawback every since January first.

During the hearings of the Committee on Banking, Trade, and Commerce on Bill C-62, Senator Murray sent members of his staff across the country—harassing and spinning as they went. He was not taking any chances. Everything possible had to be done to assure that the Liberals voted against the GST.

On September 26, 1990, the committee reported against the passage of the bill. Then Senator Murray got his eight new senators. The eventual enactment of Bill C-62 now seemed assured. It would have taken time, but it would have happened. Two months of debate would have exhausted even this Opposition.

• (0710)

Was there no way to embitter the debate? Was there no way to show the country that the Liberals were opposed to this splendid new tax? Of course, there was. Have the Speaker usurp the power to run the Senate. Hire more advisers to devise outrage after outrage. Bring Flynn back. And so all this was done.

On September 27, Speaker Charbonneau left the Chair and ordered the doors locked although a sitting of the Senate was still in progress.

On October 4, Speaker Charbonneau deliberately arrogated to himself the right to set the time for divisions.

On October 4, Speaker Charbonneau violated the constitution by supplanting the Senate by an irregular meeting.

On October 30, Speaker Charbonneau interrupted a senator then speaking so as to enable Senator Doody to move "that the Orders of the Day be read now."

On November 22, Speaker Charbonneau attempted to let Senator Murray move a closure motion at an hour when the sittings of the Senate are suspended.

On that same day he sought to deprive an independent senator, Senator Waters, of his right to speak on the motion that Bill C-62 be now read a third time.

Real ingenuity, nay paranoid madness, was required to bedevil Bill C-62 as it has been bedevilled by the Government since September 25. And to what end?

—to impose a tax of dubious value

—to gratify the bureaucrats in the Department of Finance

—to drive home to the country the fact that the Liberals oppose the goods and services tax —to show Stephen Lewis, Ed Broadbent, Ian Deans, and the other NDP friends of the Government that Progressive Conservative senators hold that the Senate has no right to amend or defeat tax bills.

The goods and services tax is a bad tax at a bad time. It is a tax which erodes, a tax which destroys the bonds of consent which unite Canadian society.

Senator Castonguay and Senator Chaput-Rolland have told us that they have implicit faith in Mr. Mulroney; he is their leader. But millions of Canadians lack their blessed assurance.

Rightly or wrongly, most Canadians distrust the Mulroney Government.

Why this new tax? Senator Everett believes that it will produce new revenue for the government. He believes also that the additional revenue will be used to reduce the annual deficits. Senator MacEachen told us last Wednesday that Senator Everett's hopes are not supported by the Government's own figures. Ever since last Wednesday, we have waited to hear clarifying words from Senator Kelly. He has said nothing. He remains silent. His silence does nothing to banish uncertainty.

Why this new tax? Is Bill C-62 the means by which the bureaucrats are bringing in the negative income tax which they have advocated for many years? Does Mr. Wilson understand the implications of this bill? Does he see that the sales tax credit can, and probably will, be pushed higher and higher on the eve or on the morn of each successive election?

Why this new tax? Is it intended to invade and occupy the retail tax field, thus preventing sales tax increases by provincial governments?

Are we to have a replay of the debate between the provincial governments and Ottawa that took place in the 1950's over the personal income tax field?

Does the Government intend by this tax to exert new pressure on Canadians to move away from the eastern and northern extremities of the country, where the tax will have the greatest impact?

Why is one absolute necessity, heating fuel, taxed when another, basic food, is exempt?

Will the tax be used in the future as a sumptuary tax to discourage conspicuous consumption—the purchase of luxury automobiles, paintings, jewellery, motor yachts, large sailboats and the like? How delightfully ironic that would be!

Is the tax intended to squeeze money out of Canadians, especially middle-income Canadians, to support costly new tax expenditures, to support lavish by-elections such as the one in Lac-Saint Jean that brought the Hon. Lucien Bouchard into Parliament in June, 1988?

What will be the effect of the sales tax credits on the accuracy of income tax returns?

The questions go on and on. Even if the people of Canada were given reassuring answers to these questions, they would remain hesitant and uncertain. After their experience with this Government's management of the fisheries, its management of interest rates, its management of federal-provincial relations, its implementation of those wonderful programmes promised by the Prime Minister to help Canadians make the adjustments brought on by the Free Trade Agreement, the people doubt the ability of this Government to introduce this tax without disrupting the economy.

Honourable senators, some of the factors which hold a society together are physical: it is far easier to hold together a compact state like Iceland than a far-flung state like Canada. Some factors are economic: it is far easier to hold together a country like the U.S.A., which is largely self-sufficient, than a country like Canada which imports many goods and services, and which, in turn, must export many goods and services. Some factors are national: race, language, and traditions. Some are religious: religion can unify, just as religion, we have seen, can destroy the unity of even a small island state like Sri Lanka.

A society is united by consent—and I stress the word "consent". The members of a society accept a common set of government institutions and a common set of laws. They accept the restrictions imposed by the laws common to the society; they accept taxation burdens; they accept the costs of defending the society against domestic criminals and foreign enemies. In return, they receive many goods and services from the government: protection for their persons and property, public works such as highways and wharves, and law courts to settle civil disputes.

Why do the members of a society consent to continue as members? Why do they consent to obey the laws made by the government and pay the taxes?

• (0720)

One answer is economic: They consent to obey, pay, and serve because if they do not, they will be deprived of access to the means of production. This was manifestly true under the feudal regime. The lord was also the landlord. To refuse to obey the lord was to forfeit access to land.

Another answer is that they consent to obey, pay, and serve because they believe that the ruler, the government, has the right to make laws and to give commands. It is their opinion that the government has authority.

Occasionally we hear Canadian citizens say: "This law is defective. It should be changed. I shall work to have it changed. But until it has been changed, I shall obey it." Ask them why they take this attitude and their reply is: "In this society, we live under a rule of law. Moreover, we have laws which designate those who have the right to make laws. The particular law we are discussing was made by those who, under our Constitution, have the right to make laws. Other men, other women, may be more sensible, more reasonable. But what those more sensible men and women say is not law because they do not have the right to make law. If we allowed every sensible man, every reasonable woman to make law, there would be no common body of law. Predictability is the basis of liberty, and when every Tom, Dick or Harry—or every Jean, Jacques or Guy—presumes to make laws on his own, we have anarchy. You ask why we obey those who have legitimate authority. We answer: To have a rule of law. It is better to heed even badly flawed laws than to live under a tyrant."

But suppose the rightful rulers make bad laws. Suppose the rightful rulers persist stubbornly that their bad laws cannot be changed. In that situation, will the ruler's authority continue? Will public opinion, the lifeblood of legitimate authority, survive in those circumstances, year after year? The answer is that it will not. Gradually, like a snowdrift in the spring, abused authority melts away. The rulers remain the authorities by constitutional law, but no longer will that constitution be acceptable to the people.

The right to rule is a product of public opinion. If the public becomes convinced that the rulers are doing a thoroughly bad job, those rulers no longer will be thought of as rightful. In short, mere right to office, mere title, is not enough. It may suffice in the short run, just as a snowdrift will survive a short thaw. But in the long run, it is gone.

When the members of a society become convinced that the rulers are not ruling in their general interest, they withdraw their consent. They begin to ignore the laws; they begin to do what they themselves think is right. To avoid chaos, they may turn to new leaders.

My point, honourable senators, is that the right of rulers, of governments, is the product of what the members of a society see as their own interest. A government regarded by a large part of the people as bad, a government seen as governing in the interest of a small group—perhaps a trade union elite, perhaps a religious denomination, perhaps a corporate elite—and not in the interest of the people as a whole, soon loses the sceptre of rightful authority.

I want to apply this line of thought to the situation that prevails in Canada at this time. But I want to go back, particularly for the benefit of new senators from the Maritime provinces, to apply it to the circumstances which produced the Constitution under which we now live.

In 1840, two provinces, Upper Canada and Lower Canada, were united. They were given a common Constitution. Canada East retained its own civil law, based on the laws of France. Canada West retained its own civil law, based on English common law. But the united province had a legislature in which each part, Canada East and Canada West, was represented equally in the Legislative Assembly and in the Legislative Council. In 1849, the Province of Canada achieved "Responsible Government." Thereafter, on most matters the Governor would follow the advice of the provincial ministers rather than the instructions of the Colonial Office at London, England.

Soon it was found that the governments produced by the 1840 Constitution were thoroughly unacceptable to an increasingly large number of people in Canada West. Governments with strong support in Canada East supplemented by minority support in Canada West were making laws for the whole province; laws contrary to the wishes of the increasingly large majority in Canada West. Those unpopular laws dealt with education. They dealt with the granting of land. They dealt with taxation. They dealt with the appropriation of money for public purposes.

To make matters worse, the population of Canada West was growing far more rapidly then the population of Canada East. Yet each of the two parts was represented equally in both the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. The result was a demand in Canada West for Representation by Population.

Very soon the political system was paralysed. A solution had to be found for the situation in the Province of Canada.

The eventual remedy was the Confederation plan. That plan involved two main features. The first of these was the division of the Province of Canada into two parts, each with its own local legislature. To each legislature was assigned those matters that were regarded as local. The second was the establishment of a Parliament to make laws dealing with matters of common interest throughout the entire country. Parliament was to have two houses. The people in each province were to be represented in one house in proportion to the population. In the other, each division of the country was to have an equal number of representatives.

Our concern now is not with the division of powers as set forth in sections 91 and 92, but with the Constitution of the Parliament. However, it is worthwhile to recall what Lord Carnarvon said in presenting the British North America bill to the House of Lords.

> The real object we have in view is to give to the central government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the provinces, and at the same time retain for each province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow them, and indeed compel them, to exercise those local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community.

● (0730)

The men who worked out the British North America Act were skillful statesmen. They analyzed the political problems of the province of Canada. They were thoroughly informed about the solutions available for dealing with those problems.

They wished to retain Responsible Government: That is, they wished to retain the system in which the ministers of the executive government could not retain office unless they could get the Crown's supply business done in Parliament. They wished—as a concession to Canada West—also to have representation in one of the houses of Parliament based on population.

At the same time, they saw that Canada East would never agree to such a system. Another principle had to be observed, namely, the federal principle. That principle led to the creation of the Senate. When the House of Commons and the Senate were given their respective powers in the general legislature, those powers were made roughly equal. It was provided that tax bills and appropriation bills must originate in the House of Commons. Thereby respect was paid to the principle that the Crown may not be given revenue without the consent of the taxpayer's elected representatives, and to the well-established practice that neither tax bills nor appropriation bills are dealt with by the House of Commons, even at the first-reading stage, unless the content of those bills first has been given general assent in a committee. Tax bills and appropriation bills were to be founded on the results of the work of the committees of the Commons. Aside from that difference, the powers of the House of Commons and the Senate were to be the same.

But would not this constitutional structure produce stalemate after stalemate? On the one side, there might be a government with a majority in the House of Commons; on the other, a Senate which refused to pass the government's bills. The two principles, Responsible Government and Federalism, each indispensable if the Confederation scheme was to be acceptable, seem incompatible. And they are incompatible if either is pushed to the extreme. The solution is the practical politician. Practical politicians avoid extremes.

It was recognized that the House of Commons would be the engine of the new vehicle. One of the tasks of the Senate would be to prevent legislation harmful to the less populous provinces. The Senate would be the brakes.

Since taxation and appropriation were seen as of the essence and highly controversial, the braking power of the Senate would be the same for such bills as for all other bills.

To assure that the Senate did not try to become a second engine, one pulling in a different direction, it was decided that senators would not be elected; rather, they would be appointed. This would assure, first, that the Senate would not take over from the House of Commons as the house to which the executive government is responsible, and, second, that the brakes would not be applied excessively.

The Senate was also thought of as a defence against too much democracy. It is to be remembered that "democracy" was feared throughout the 19th century. The term "democratic" ceased to be a term of opprobrium only about the time of World War I. However, to protect men of property from democracy was only a subordinate purpose. Primarily, the role of the Senate was to give the federal principle its place in the Parliament of Canada.

Senators from Nova Scotia will have noticed that I have analyzed the federation scheme as a solution for the political problems of the Province of Canada. That, of course, is what it was; a solution for the political problems of one of the British North American provinces. Canada West and Canada East had found the Union of 1840 unworkable. The federation plan was the proposed solution.

The scope of that plan soon was expanded. It came to be thought of as a proposal for the confederation of all the British North American colonies. The term, "confederation" in the late 20th century, as Professor P.B. Waite has written ". . . has the connotation of a weakly centralized federation. That was not, generally speaking, the meaning of the word to Canadians. 'Confederation' meant federation of all the provinces, as opposed to federation of the two sections of Canada. If anything the prefix 'con' seemed to contemporaries to strength the centralist principle rather than to weaken it." This is a quotation from The Life And Times of Confederation, pages 37-8.

It is easy to forget how far removed the Maritime provinces were from the Province of Canada before 1867. Let me quote from Edward Porritt's book, Evolution of the Dominion of Canada, published in 1918. Porritt will be familiar to hon. senators as the author of a far more famous work: The Unreformed House of Commons, a study of the British House of Commons before 1832. This is what he wrote about the Maritimes:

> The interests that the Maritime Provinces then shared with the United Provinces were only those that arose out of the fact that all five provinces were on the same continent, and were under the same crown. Otherwise the United Provinces and the provinces down by the sea stood to each other almost in the relation of foreign states.
> Hostile customs houses guarded their frontiers. Tariffs for protection in the United Provinces, and tariffs for revenue in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland, choked the channels of intercolonial trade. There was no uniformity in banking. There was no common system of weights and measures; and there was no identity of postal service. The currency differed. The sovereign and the American dollar were legal tender in the United Provinces. British and American coins were also current in New Brunswick. In Nova Scotia, Peruvian, Mexican, and Columbian dollars were legal tender; while in Prince Edward Island the complexity of current moneys and of their relative values was even greater.
> In the Galt and Cartier memorial, Bulwer Lytton, the colonial secretary, was reminded of these conditions. He was reminded that each colony was distinct in government, customs, industries, and legislation." pp. 192-3.

The reference to the Galt and Cartier memorial is to a memorandum dated October 23, 1858 to the Colonial Secretary on the need for an urgent solution to the political turmoil in the Province of Canada and on the possibility of the confederation of all the provinces in British North America.

It happened that in the 1860s the Maritime Provinces were seeking a solution to their own difficulties. These difficulties were not political. They were economic. To some extent they flowed from the disruption of trade with the United States caused by the Civil War and the anticipated denunciation by the U.S.A., which was to come at the end of 1864, of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854. They related also to the costs of projected railway construction.

In addition, there was the view of the Colonial Office in London that in an era of free trade "Little England" no longer needed colonial possessions, and indeed was handicapped by colonial dependencies. As if to show that "Little England" could go it alone, in 1865 the British appropriated only 50,000 pounds for the defence of British North America, when 1,000,000 pounds would have been a reasonable estimate. That brings us to the defence question: Would the military forces mobilized in the United States for the Civil War push north? Would they forget to stop as they came home at the end of the Civil War? That danger was aggravated by the St. Alban's affair.

There is a very good description, honourable senators, of the impact on the development of this country of the St. Alban's affair in the book by Professor Waite to which I made earlier reference, at pages 31 and 32. For example:

> . . . on December 16, 1864 the New York Times said . . . . "We were never in better condition for a war with England". General Dixs' orders for the Eastern Department were published: American army commanders were to pursue any other raiders right into Canada, and under no circumstances to surrender them to Canadian authorities but to return them to New York for trial under martial law . . .
> On Decmeber 17 an executive order from the State Department required passports for all British North Americans travelling to the United States.

That was a very heavy burden because in winter, many Canadians could not get out of North America except by travelling down into the United States and out through an American sea port such as Portland or New York. The effects of this, says Professor Waite, were felt from Vancouver Island to the east coast.

The events of 1864, says Professor Waite, sharpened the sense of insecurity in British North Americans. Americans might well "cry havoc and let slip the dogs of war". The huge Union armies and the truculence of the government at Washington were dangers enough, but the basic indefensibility of Canada was even worse.

The zeal of the people in the maritime provinces in the 1860s for Confederation should never be over-estimated. Many young people had made their way to Boston to find employment. The natural lines of trade ran from places such as Yarmouth, Saint John, and Charlottetown to Portland, Boston, New London, and New York.

While it may be difficult for some senators to believe, Canadians were not held in high regard in the maritimes. In an effort to remedy this situation in August 1864, some 100 Canadians made an exploratory social visit to New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Professor Waite of Dalhousie University describes the beneficial effects of this visit for the confederation scheme. What he says is enlightening and should be borne in mind:

> The Canadians had little need of conversion, for they were convinced of the merits of Confederation whether they had seen the Maritime provinces or not, but the Maritimers had developed a considerable suspicion of the Canadians. Canada had a lurid history: rebellions in 1837, the Governor General pelted with rotten eggs in 1849, the Grand Trunk scandals punctuating the 1850's, and the crowning touch, the Canadian treachery after the Intercolonial Railway negotiations of 1862. The history of the past thirty years had shown how untrustworthy, how irresponsible, how impossible, Canadians were. Incapable of running their own Union, bogged down in a welter of debt and bad finance, they were, all too often in the Maritime eyes, bent on relieving themselves of their embarrassments at the expense of others. They were suspect; their good faith was not something that Maritimers were prepared to take for granted. The removal of this miasma of hostility and suspicion was not to be the work of three halcyon weeks in August, 1864. No one reading the Maritime newspapers for the three years after 1864 can escape the conclusion that it continued to exist. But there is no doubt that the manifest goodwill of the Canadians, combined with the warmth of their reception in Saint John and Halifax, produced an atmosphere of geniality that radiated sunlight through the fog and gloom of Canadian-Maritime relations. And, coming as it did two short weeks before the Charlottetown Conference, it achieved its maximum effect at the time when it was most needed.

It is interesting, honourable senators, to notice that even then, 125 years ago, Canadians were bogged down in debt.

What made the Maritimes interested in the Canada scheme was the prospect of a society extending from sea to sea, a free trade market bound together by a railway, with Halifax and Saint John as the eastern terminals of this great continental transportation scheme, and all under the British crown. We never should forget that section 145 of the British North America Act provided for an intercolonial railway. A railway was indispensable if Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were to join in. What other major constitution contains a section providing for a railway?

> 145. Inasmuch as the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have joined in a Declaration that the Construction of the Intercolonial Railway is essential to the Consolidation of the Union of British North America, and to the Assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that Provision should be made for its immediate Construction by the Government of Canada; Therefore, in order to give effect to that Agreement, it shall be the Duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to provide for the Commencement, within Six Months after the Union, of a Railway connecting the River St. Lawrence with the City of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the Construction thereof without Intermission, and the Completion thereof with all practicable speed.

One of the great obstacles to the participation of the maritime provinces was the proposed scheme for financing the projected new British North American society. As commercial provinces, the maritimes relied heavily on indirect taxes—customs and excises—to pay the costs of government. Under the confederation plan the Parliament of Canada was to have exclusively the power to impose indirect taxes. Direct taxes for provincial purposes, as distinct from municipal purposes, were regarded as thoroughly dangerous to the political life of every politician. It was only when a scheme of transfer payments was added to the confederation plan, a scheme of transfer payments designed to compensate the maritimes for the revenues from indirect taxation that they were giving up to the new central government, that confederation with Canada became even considerable in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

The ultimate result was a new society, a confederation called Canada.

• (0750)

It is interesting to notice what happened in the first election after Confederation.

In Ontario the Macdonald government elected 52 members, 30 in opposition.

Senator Frith: Out of how many?

Senator Stewart: Out of 82.

In Quebec, the Macdonald government elected 47, with 17 in opposition. That adds up to only 64. There was one constituency, Kamouraska-Rivière-du-Loup, where the election broke down. I will not go into that. In Nova Scotia, the Macdonald Government elected one out of 19. In other words, 18 were in opposition. In New Brunswick, the Macdonald government elected eight out of 15.

The total popular vote for the government of Canada, the Macdonald government, was 134,269. It sounds like contemporary Scarborough.

Senator Frith: I was going to say that is about the size of it. It is a big riding.

Senator Stewart: The opposition, in all Canada, got 131,-364. The total number of voters was 268,217. There we have the origins of a central part of the constitution of Canada. That constitution assigned legislative rights over matters regarded as local and private to the several provincial legislatures. It assigned rights to the House of Commons. It assigned rights to the Senate.

The new constitution had its critics, chiefly because it was seen as financially unfair to some provincial governments and because free trade with Ontario had the result that Nova Scotia and New Brunswick firms were bought out and closed down by their Ontario competitors. Yet the new Canadian society lived and grew.

It survived the terrible strains of World War I and the strains of World War II. Whether it will survive the strains of the 1990s remains to be seen.

Honourable senators, one of the factors now eroding the basic consensus that holds this country together, one of the factors eroding that basic consent, is Bill C-62.

It would be a great mistake, honourable senators, to see the votes recorded by senators on Bill C-62 as related only to that bill. True, Bill C-62 is a very important bill. Those who want to impose a goods and services tax on the people of Canada want the bill very badly. Those who oppose the bill oppose it strongly. Yet the truth is that our differences over Bill C-62 are also symptomatic. They are symptomatic of far more fundamental disagreements.

We are divided by differences over the role of the Senate as one of the parts of Canada's parliament.

We are divided by differences over the constitutional significance of elections. Those senators who support the government believe that an election victory gives a Prime Minister a mandate for all his measures throughout the following four or five years. Victory in an election, they say, means that a Prime Minister is not to be resisted by either the Senate or his followers in the House of Commons. We, on this side of the house, do not believe that winning at the polls on one day every four or five years ought to have so weighty an effect.

We are divided by our different views on the political consequences of opposing this tax at this time. Some of us think that even if Bill C-62 were flawless, given the state of public opinion produced by what has gone on in Canada during these past few years, the imposition of this tax at this time is an act of political folly. The Progressive Conservative senators disagree. They extol Senator Everett for what he said on October 25, 1990, as recorded in Senate Debates on page 3242. On that occasion Senator Everett told us that he will vote for Bill C-62 because the Goods and Services Tax is a means for reducing the national debt, and that it is not for him to consider the long-term political implications of imposing this tax at this time. In other words, he told us that as a senator he has an obligation to try to make decisions about financial matters, but that he can ignore, indeed he said he should ignore, the health of the polity. I, for one, think that senators ought to look at the health of the polity as well as at the debt.

Honourable senators, we can not ignore the differences that divide us. These differences exist. They are important. They should be discussed.

To say that these differences are only partisan differences is sophistry. Obviously, all Progressive Conservative senators are united and moved by party loyalty. Senator Chaput-Rolland went so far on October 30, as to tell us that her fidelity to Mr. Mulroney must take precedence over her own judgment. Obviously, Liberal senators, too, are influenced by party loyalty, although not, I hope, to the extent of attributing infallibility to their leader. To recognize that there are two major parties in this house is not to say that the positions and arguments of either party necessarily are meaningless. Long ago Plato refuted the sophistry that the fact that physicians accept fees shows that making money is the business of physicians. The differences that divide us in this house are fundamental. We must not ignore them. Perhaps if we discuss them, we can remove a few of them.

Let us look for a moment at the three elements of our parliament. Parliament is a fundamental institution of our Confederation. Do those elements command the respect essential to legitimacy? Do those three elements of parliament have true authority?

Before I go into this, honourable senators, may I say that when I make, as I intend to make, certain critical comments, I want it clear that I am not directing those criticisms exclusively at the present Mulroney government.

• (0800)

The criticisms apply also to the Trudeau regime and to regimes beyond that.

Senator Frith: Beyond in the sense of earlier?

Senator Stewart: Back beyond. I will argue that what we have now is the product of a slow deterioration. The troubles we are having over this particular Bill C-62, in a sense, are symptomatic of fundamental institutional problems in this country.

I want it clearly understood I am not directing these critical remarks at Brian Mulroney or his colleagues exclusively. In a sense, they have been caught up in and are being carried along by the current.

A constitution is a constellation of independent but related powers. The more all power is concentrated in one person the less a regime has a true constitution.

In our constitutional system—constitutional monarchy—we need a head of state who stands apart from the political parties. This is true because the Crown has reserved powers. It is true because no leader of a party—no leader of one party—can represent the whole country.

By our constitution the executive government of Canada is vested in the Queen. The Governor General acts for her. But in fact the Governor General now is appointed by the Prime Minister, just like senators. The head of the government creates the head of state. Mr. Hnatyshan is the third Governor General chosen from party ranks.

Senator Murray: Who were the other two?

Senator Stewart: Yes, I will come to that. I am going to come to that.

Senator Murray: I think there were more than three. Vincent Massey should be added.

Senator Frith: The party ranks.

Senator Stewart: When was he in the House of Commons?

Senator Murray: I thought you said from the party ranks. From the party ranks?

Senator Stewart: Well, all right, yes, I will accept that point.

Senator Murray: Good.

Senator Stewart: There is no doubt that Vincent Massey, at one point in the 1920s, was very close to Mr. King and to the Liberal party in Ontario.

Senator Murray: He was a fund raiser.

Senator Stewart: I believe that maybe right. Senator Murray should also remind the Senate—

Senator Murray: Which is an honourable role.

Senator Stewart: I do not think you should scoff at that at all, Senator Murray. You should also remind the House, Senator Murray, of the relation that existed between Mr. King and Mr. Massey twenty years later at the end of the Second World War. I am sure you remember, from your reading of Mr. King's diaries, that wonderful description of Mr. Massey asking Mr. King to come to his room in—was it the Dorchester?—to see his new medal and ribbon. King says that Massey had it draped over the back of a chair. "He led me in and there we stood as he displayed it; nay, as he worshipped it." Mr. King, whatever his views on Mr. Massey back when he was a Liberal fund raiser, as you say, Senator Murray—I am glad we did not use Mr. Mulroney's term, "Bag man".

Senator Roblin: Mr. Mulroney did not admit that.

Senator Stewart: By 1945 it would hardly be said that they were political buddies.

Let me read two or three paragraphs which appeared in the May 1990 issue of The Idler. They reveal how the relationship between head of state and head of government has been turned upside down. Senator Murray will be pleased at the first reference.

> His (Trudeau's) surprise nomination of Schreyer was a typically vain and capricious act calculated to display his will and power. It made the Governor General obviously Trudeau's creature. Trudeau exploited his advantage by showing public disdain for Schreyer. At a notorious dinner with the premiers in 1980 he snapped at Schreyer to hurry up the meal and ostentiously walked out before the end.
> Disdain for Schreyer was a common sentiment. The youngest Governor General since Lansdowne, Schreyer was already languishing as leader of the opposition in Manitoba. Partianship was not a major issue on his appointment, as he came from provincial politics and the "third party", but Schreyer did not give up on active politics and seemed to be looking for trouble during Clark's minority government and Trudeau's constitution push of 1981.

I am sure that when Senator Murray speaks, he can give us some delicious details about those transactions. Then we have this from The Idler on Schreyer's successor:

> Despite ill health Jeanne Sauvé was happier in her public role. But despite her insulation in three and a half years as speaker, her seven years as a Liberal minister, and her husband's four, put an end to any inhibition about appointing party politicians, as Hnatyshyn's appointment proves. She settled too comfortably into her fancied role as head of state. She connived at a practice of substituting a toast to herself for a toast to the Queen. A vigorous reorganization of Rideau Hall led to closing its ground to the public. She would refer to the Queen as "Elizabeth". Presumably she considered her as an equal, as one head of state to another.
> Mulroney's juvenile extreme of the politician's craving for publicity and centre stage led to a clash with Sauvé over the Shamrock Summit of March, 1985. He tricked her into giving up the Citadel and not showing up to greet the visiting American head of state, claiming that it would be a working visit. He then played host to Reagan at a largely public summit.

And now we have the Rt. Hon. Ramon Hnatyshyn—

With Hnatyshyn, the only insulation from partisan politics is his defeat in the last general election. No doubt he and Mulroney will discuss politics freely but Mulroney can hardly feel any deference for someone he made both Minister of Justice and Governor General.

Honourable senators, we all remember the address Mr. Mulroney delivered in this chamber on January 29, 1990. It was a mixture of funeral eulogy and political nomination speech. Mr. Mulroney recommended his new creation like a proud cook. Even he saw how comical it was. "Sounds good to me", he quipped at the end.

The relationship now prevailing between the head of state and the head of the government is far from what our system of constitutional monarchy requires.

We have a House of Commons which now sits less than 30 hours a week, and in which closure and the allotment of time are used regularly to cut off debate.

In 1969, when the allotment of time rule was being adopted, the editors of the Globe and Mail cautioned the nation against closure.

One of the essential purposes of an opposition is, in matters of great importance, to act as a brake on the Government. It should be able to hold up the processing of any piece of legislation long enough for the country to become acquainted with it and express its views.

Without this braking power to discipline it, a majority government can limit real challenge by the people to once in five years. Too much can be forgotten in five years, particularly if a government has taken steps to ensure that controversial legislation is not impressed upon the public mind.

This is the principle—the safeguarding of the public's right to know—that has so far prevented Canadian governments from limiting debate in Parliament except by use of closure.

Honourable senators, I note here that the reference to closure refers to a specific standing order, the standing order adopted by the House of Commons in 1913 and not to the allocation of time rule. I know that journalists find it very difficult to distinguish between the two. Indeed, the Globe and Mail thinks that there is no real difference.

● (0810)

I continue:

The principle has, of course, been abused by opposition; but that does not invalidate it. An argument can be made for a more flexible means of closure, but no form of closure should be adopted that would make it easy for a government to shut up its critics.

The proposed standing order 16-A, which was bitterly opposed last December—-

That was December of 1968.

[Senator Stewart.]

—-and which the Government eventually relinquished, would have been just such an improper form of closure (and let us be done with describing any form of limiting debate as anything but closure, for that is what it is.)

I'm sorry, Senator Frith. I said July 1969, I should have said June 23, 1969.

Senator Frith: What is the significance of that?

Stewart Stewart: Well, you asked when this was published. It was written when the allocation of time rule was being added to the standing orders of the House of Commons, and this is what the Globe and Mail said at that time slightly over 20 years ago.

Senator Murray: Donald MacDonald was the author of the rule.

Senator Stewart: No, that is not accurate, Senator Murray. I know who wrote the rule.

Senator Murray: He was the author.

Senator Stewart: There were two people who were principally concerned in the writing of the rule. I was one of them and Gordon Dubrois, First Clerk Assistant of the House of Commons, was the other.

Senator Murray: I see. Mr. MacDonald was the Government House Leader.

Senator Stewart: Mr. MacDonald was the president of the Privy Council. He was the one who carried them in the House. Yes, that is right.

Senator Doody: Now we know.

Senator Stewart: I thought the editorial writer of the Globe and Mail simply did not understand the problems of the House at the time. I am quite prepared to defend the allocation of time rules in the House. I have no problem about that. But I have to say this, honourable senators, that perhaps the Globe and Mail was more insightful than were people like Stanley Knowles, Gerald Baldwin, Donald MacDonald at the time, because what those members of the House of Commons had in mind was a specific problem, especially at the committee stage in the whole House and at the report stage. Closure can always be used easily on second or third reading, but the new problem was that the committee of the whole House often would get bogged down on the first two or three clauses of a Bill; then everybody would lose patience, and all the remaining clauses would go through without any attention. At the same time the House of Commons was activating the report stage. The rules there are different from here. At the report stage members of the House of Commones now can move amendments. It was thought by people like Stanley Knowles, Gerald Baldwin, and Mr. Stanfield that there should be some way to establish something like a railway timetable to assure that all available time was not expanded on the first one or two amendments at the report stage. That was the intention. It is quite true that it has not worked out that way. The Globe and Mail in a sense was abler to look ahead.

Senator Frith: More prescient.

Senator Stewart: Prescient, that is the word. The editor of the Globe and Mail was more prescient. The rule has come to be used, not as was intended, but indeed as a form of simple closure.

On November 8, 1990—of this year—Senator Robertson undertook to show that closure and time allocation have been used more sparingly by the Mulroney government than by the Trudeau government. Let me attempt to give a wider and therefore more accurate picture.

The closure rule—that in simple closure—was put into the Standing Orders of the House of Commons in 1913 by the Borden Government. Incidentally the motion that a specific member we now heard was used on that occasion to prevent Sir Wilfred Laurier from speaking before the previous question was moved.

> That new rule was used 16 times before 1964. It was used once in 1964, by the Pearson Government.

That was to terminate the flag debate.

> It was used three times by the Trudeau Government. In other words, in the 71 years between 1913 and 1984 the closure rule was used a total of 20 times. The Mulroney Government has used the closure rule 17 times in 6 years. Let us now turn to time allocation, the new order added to the standing orders of the House of Commons in 1969.

Time allocation motions were adopted 40 times in the 1969-84 period when the Liberals formed the Government—40 times in 15 years. Time allocation motions have been adopted 26 times in 6 years by the Mulroney Government.

In 15 years the Trudeau Liberals used those two procedures—closure and time allocation—a total of 43 times. In 6 years the Progressive Conservatives have used them a total of 43 times.

Debate in the House of Commons—over the years, not just in the last 6 years—has lost importance. The question period has become the one big act at a sitting of the House. The Government refuses to heed argument. It pushes its bills through.

As testimony supporting the view that the importance of the House of Commons has declined I quote from a former Member of the House of Commons. On November 18, 1976 Professor John Meisel, of Queen's University, had stated that: "We [Canadians] are eminently governable but not really overloaded but we do have some problems."

● (0820)

In contrast, The Economist, on November 5, 1977, had described Great Britain as a kind of dictatorship. The Economist's critique was concerned ". . . less with the jaded cries for electoral reform as such than with the undignified, inefficient, undemocratic and, above all, unparliamentary government that is Britain's lot today." Having set Meisel's view over against that of The Economist our Member of Parliament, the Honourable Robert L. Stanfield, stated:

> I must say immediately that the savage attack of The Economist on the Mother of Parliaments would seem far from inappropriate if made, with some changes of emphasis and some modifications, on the Parliament and government of Canada. I have great respect for Professor Meisel, but I find it hard to believe he is writing about the Parliament I have been working in for the last ten years and the governments I have been watching for many more years. In my opinion we no longer have parliamentary responsible government in Ottawa.

Later in that address, Mr. Stanfield said:

> Frankly, I do not know how the House of Commons can be restored to effective supervision of the government, how we can restore government really responsible to Parliament, except by cutting back on the role of the government and thereby making it possible for Parliament to cope. I am not one of those who glorifies the Parliament of past generations. Except on great occasions, I suspect the House of Commons was usually a pedestrian place, but it did not much matter, because government was not so involved in the lives of Canadians; and the House of Commons could bring government into line when it wished to do so because it could delay the passage of Estimates as long as it liked.
> Under current conditions, there is no way of getting back that unlimited power to delay Estimates. No government would agree to that. The government does not have enough parliamentary time now to get its legislation passed. But even if—and this is a basic point—Parliament somehow regained its old power to control the purse, it could not effectively control the manifold operations of the contemporary government in Ottawa. The Cabinet cannot exercise such control. How could the members of the House of Commons?
> The frustrations of Members of Parliament are increased by federal-provincial deals, agreements and resulting legislation which confront Parliament as faits accomplis. There may be no way to avoid this in contemporary Canada, but federal-provincial arrangements have significantly reduced the role of Parliament.

Mr. Stanfield was speaking in Victoria in 1978 at a conference on the legislative process in Canada.

Another participant at that conference, Mr. Geoffrey Stevens, made reference to a book which I had written. He quoted me as follows:

> They, the opposition, strive to wear the ministers down by attrition. In this attitude they are almost certain to be supported by the newsmen, who feel deprived when there are no parliamentary skirmishes to report.

Then he quotes me again:

> The House of Commons is the ordinary scene of the battle. It is the great public stage at the centre of the national amphitheatre.

Then we have Stevens himself:

> Leaving aside the skirmishes of the Question Period, the trouble with John Stewart's statement is that it is very > rarely borne out in practice. The pipeline debate of the 1950s and the flag debate of the 1960s stand out because they were atypical. Great debates rarely occur in Parliament. Witness the 1974 debate over wage and price controls, or the debate since November 15, 1976, over the future of the Canadian federation. Both debates were waged or are being waged outside Parliament and the legislative process.

> Parliament no longer—if it ever did—exerts a major influence on public policy. Parliament does not control government expenditures. Parliament's role as a legislative body is limited to ratifying legislation and occasionally amending it, usually in minor ways. Parliament is confronted with decisions made elsewhere by: (a) the cabinet, (b) an increasingly powerful civil service, and (c) the institution of the federal-provincial conference. It is no wonder members of Parliament feel frustrated. It is no wonder that the press looks elsewhere.

Well, so much for the House of Commons. Let us turn to our own house. We know that we have vast powers under the Constitution Act. Nowadays we attract attention and gain some support from time to time when we resist unpopular bills. But our authority is small. That is not primarily because senators are appointed. Canadians have great respect for judges even though judges are appointed. In contrast, the man in the street ordinarily sees the Senate as useless. It is seen as a quiet retreat for defunct politicians, party functionaries, some corporate barons and perhaps a union man or two. A few others are tossed in from time to time—perhaps a university president, perhaps a woman active in voluntary societies, and so on—in an attempt to create the illusion that this is a prestige body. It is not the composition of the Senate that offends; rather, it is the view that it is merely a quiet retreat—a pleasant club for elderly ladies and gentlemen. We are regarded as loafers, well-paid loafers.

That perception is inaccurate; many senators work very hard. Yet we had better recognize that it is the perception held by many Canadians. It is a perception deeply rooted in history.

I commend to honourable senators the little book on the evolution of Canada from which I quoted earlier, the book written by Edward Porritt. I want to quote again from that book.

Senator Frith: What is the title of it, again?

Senator Stewart: It is The Evolution of the Dominion of Canada, published in 1918 by the World Publishing Company in New York. Mr. Porritt was the author of the famous book on the unreformed House of Commons.

Senator Frith: What was his discipline?

Senator Stewart: He was a newsman—a very able newsman. I think he probably would have been hired by the Globe and Mail at a certain period when that was a great newspaper. Mr. Porritt was an Englishman, by the way. He had the advantage, not of being an Englishman, but of being an outsider. This is what he said about the Senate:

[Senator Stewart.]

> It is a modern claim for the House of Lords that it acts as a revising chamber. The same is made for the Senate of Ottawa. To what extent the Senate acts as a revising chamber can, to some degree, be judged from the report of its work from 1867 to 1913. It amended 1,246 of the 7,871 bills it received from the House of Commons, or 21.5 per cent.

It rejected 113 bills or 2 per cent. Of course, the thrust of Porritt's argument is that the Senate was doing virtually nothing.

● (0830)

> As furnishing a basis for the claim that the senate is of value as a revising body these figures covering a period of forty-six years are of only limited service. They cannot be taken at their face value. They cannot be accepted as a measure of the service of the senate as an independent and impartial chamber of review, because since 1874—

That is when the Mackenzie government supplanted the first Macdonald government—> —and especially since 1896—

—when Sir Wilfrid Laurier first assumed office—

> —it has been well known that the vigilance of the senate in amending or rejecting bills depends on conditions which should have no influence with a really independent or impartial chamber of revision.

Porritt goes on to argue that senators are positioned so that they can do a good revising job. He says:

> The position of senator is a highly privileged one. He is free from individual claims by constituents on his time and energy during the parliamentary session. He takes no part in elections. Political propaganda has never made any large demands on his time. A senator is free constitutionally to play a bold, strong, and independent part in the political life of the Dominion. But privilege and freedom have been of no avail. Senators, as members of one division of Parliament, have never played a prominent part, to say nothing of a bold or strong part, in Dominion politics.

This is all very good stuff but I will forego most of it.

Senator Corbin: Senator Stewart, of the 113 bills rejected by the Senate during that period, were any of them, shall I say, of relative importance to the government of the day? What was the nature of the bills rejected by the Senate, if that is relevant to the debate?

Senator Stewart: That is a good question. I have not done an analysis of those bills, but I think what Mr. Porritt says in another connection will help you.

He says that during the years 1896 to 1901, during which the Liberal government was confronted with a hostile majority in the Senate, the Senate rejected four or five government bills. One was a measure for extending the inter-colonial railway, a government undertaking, from Lévis to Montréal. Another bill, rejected in 1897, would have authorized the construction of a government railway from the Stikine River to Teslin Lake, a railway designed to form part of the rail and water route to Dawson City.

I am sure that Senator Lucier would say that the railway to Dawson City was of great importance. Certainly, I believe we would all agree that the railway from Lévis to Montreal in that period would be regarded as a matter of fundamental importance. It would be part of the inter-colonial railway system to which reference is made in Section 146 of the British North America Act.

> The Senate between 1911 and 1916, when a Conservative government was faced with a Liberal majority, rejected six or seven bills, or so amended bills as to make them unacceptable to the house of commons and the government. One of these measures was a bill passed by the house of commons in 1912—

I would have said 1913 but I may be wrong—

> —under which Canada was to provide three battleships as an addition to the British navy. A second bill, also in 1912, was for the creation of a permanent tariff commission; and a third, passed by the house in 1914, was to provide for increases in the salaries of railway mail clerks.

Now here this, honourable senators:

> With harmonious majorities in the senate and house of commons, government bills are never rejected, or even amended in any way that is unacceptable to the government. At these times there is not a more docile second chamber in the English-speaking world than the senate at Ottawa.
>
> At these times its sittings for public business are not continuous from day to day like the sittings of the house of commons. Sittings seldom extend beyond the dinner hour; for almost the sole business of the senate as regards government bills is to say ditto to the house of commons. Only a new government, which is temporarily without a majority in the senate, need fear the power that the senate can exercise as a chamber of revision.

Porritt says, in his last paragraph on the Senate, that the Senate—

> . . . .chiefly by its failure to realize the professed expectations of the Fathers of Confederation, by its failure to make a benificent impression on politics in Canada, or at any time in its fifty years' existence to convince the people of Canada that it was of any possible public usefulness, is, from the standpoint of students of the working of parliamentary institutions, the most interesting second chamber in the English-speaking world. It is especially so, when it is kept in mind that it represents the fourth attempt since 1791 to establish a second chamber, modeled after the house of lords, in the portion of the British empire that is now comprised in the Dominion of Canada.

So there we have an objective observer's view on the third part of the Parliament of Canada, the view of Edward Porritt published in 1918. He would have recognized the Senate as described in a much later book entitled The Parliament of Canada. This book is used in university after university from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The author is Professor C.E.S. Franks of Queens.

French says:

> The Senate rarely sits more than three days a week, whereas the Commons sits for five. Its sittings are brief, its holidays long, although its committees often work during holidays. Some senators attend only rarely. Senators usually have none of the arduous constituency chores of MPs, although Liberal senators from the west in recent years have had to perform this sort of work to make up for the lack of party regional representation in the Commons. Senators enjoy the use of the parliamentary library, restaurant and other facilities on Parliament Hill. In short, the Senate is a comfortable, easy-going, and rewarding club to belong to.

Senator Haidasz: Who said that?

Senator Stewart: Professor C.E.S. Franks of Queens University.

Senator Haidasz: He was never here, I think.

Senator Stewart: He has observed the Senate again and again.

Senator Haidasz: From the galleries or from reading the newspapers?

Senator Stewart: Many times from the gallery.

Senator Haidasz: How can he talk like that?

Senator Stewart: That is what he says.

Senator Haidasz: Only a man with experience in the Senate can write like that.

Senator Stewart: You mean a man with experience in the Senate would write like that?

Senator Haidasz: No, I mean could pontificate like this man is pontificating.

• (0840)

Senator Stewart: My aim, honourable senator, is not to annoy you but to inform you. This is the view that is conveyed to the people of Canada by highly prestigious authorities.

Senator Haidasz: Theoreticians: not political scientists.

Senator Stewart: I am not interested in that, senator. What I am interested in is the impact that this kind of representation can have on the authority of this institution. I believe that this kind of teaching—and whether it is right or wrong may be a matter of dispute—goes a long way to explain the reputation that this place, shall I say, enjoys.

Senator Bosa: Or suffers.

Senator Stewart: Suffers. I accept the correction.

I intended to quote more from Franks —

Senator Doody: Don't. You might provoke Senator Haidasz.

Senator Stewart: If I did, some of my colleagues might become apoplectic.

Frank sums up as follows:

> The activities of the Senate in its investigative studies and in its revision of legislation are a useful complement to the work of the House of Commons. In both of these spheres of activity the experience and competence of the senators and the freedom they enjoy from the partisan and other pressures of the Commons add a valuable dimension to their work.

Perhaps, Senator Haidasz, he had you in mind.

> The Senate has been criticized for being a lobby within government for big business, but it would be more accurate to describe it as a defender of the rights of property, a function which it was intended to perform by the fathers of confederation. Nevertheless, in other areas where it was expected to be useful, especially in defending the interests of the provinces and regions, minorities, and human rights, its record has not been impressive. It is difficult to disagree with Dawson's long-standing conclusion: 'It would be idle to deny that the Senate has not fulfilled the hopes of its founders; and it is well also to remember that the hopes of its founders were not excessively high.'

Senator Haidasz: May I ask Senator Stewart just when what he is reading was written and published?

Senator Stewart: It was written, I would say, four or five years ago. I was about to say three years, but time slips away faster than we sometimes think. I remember writing a review of the book about four or five years ago.

I believe that Senator Corbin has been reading the book lately. Perhaps, when he has finished reading his copy, he will make it available to you, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Corbin: Senator Stewart, I was looking under my desk for that very copy. I believe I brought it back to my office and, if Senator Haidasz is interested, I will be glad to lend it to him. I choked on it.

Senator Haidasz: I really question where I am, after hearing the comments which Senator Stewart has just read.

Senator Corbin: I will send for the book immediately, and you can peruse it at your convenience.

Senator Stewart: Dr. Haidasz, I am not bringing these comments to your attention to trouble you, although there is some gratification in that, I admit.

A great deal of the weight of public business is coming upon the Senate. The question is: Can our institutions bear the weight of this legislation? I don't know whether you were here earlier when I described the way the head of the government now creates the head of the state. I don't know whether you were here earlier when I read Mr. Stanfield's comments on what has happened to the House of Commons. I am now examining some outsiders' views of the Senate, outsiders who look at the patient with an objective eye. It may be wrong, it may be a faulty diagnosis, but this is at least their diagnosis.

Back in 1985, when the retirement age of senators was being set at 75, Mr. Stanley Knowles stated the New Democratic Party case against the Senate. He did so in the House of Commons on April 26 of that year, at pages 412-3 of the House of Commons Debates.

He stated:

> Perhaps because in the United Kingdom the House of Lords cannot finally veto legislation but can only delay its passage, or perhaps from the fact that in the United States the veto of the President can be overridden by a two-thirds vote of the two houses of Congress—whatever the origin—there is a notion held generally in Canada that the Senate can only go so far, that it can only turn down legislation once, twice or three times, or something like that.

However, the constitutional position is that the Senate could block a measure passed by the House, year after year, to the end of time. I know this has never happened. I know that the number of times the Senate has vetoed something passed in the House of Commons has been very limited. The outstanding example is the first old age pensions Act back in 1926, and two or three matters in the years from 1957 to 1963. I know the Senate does not do this very often, but it has, as a constitutional entitlement, the right to say no to what the people's elected representatives have decided. In terms of political theory, in terms of democratic practice, I think this is wrong, and that we should be taking a serious look at the position of a non-elected body in our parliamentary institutions.

Having said all that and having later said that he knew that there are some fine ladies and gentlemen in the Senate, Knowles stated:

> —[the fact of the matter is] that they are not elected by the people of Canada and I do not think they should have the role in our parliamentary institution that is accorded them by our constitution—and I believe that is the change we ought to be making, namely the abolition of the Senate itself.

Senator Haidasz: I have a question for Senator Stewart. What did Stanley Knowles think at that time of the Mother of Parliament and the great role that the House of Lords plays in the British Parliament? Did this great parliamentarian ever ask for the abolition of the House of Lords in the Mother of Parliament?

Senator Stewart: I am not in a position to give direct evidence on that. However, I believe there is some indirect evidence.

We have to remember that in 1911 the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed the Parliament Act. We also have to remember that the Attlee government in 1947 initiated a bill, under the terms of the Parliament Act, 1911, to reduce the period that the House of Lords can delay a bill from two years to one. The Attlee government wanted to reduce the powers of the House of Lords so as to be able to go ahead with the nationalization of the iron and steel industry.

● (0850)

Consequently, by the middle 1960s, the threat that the House of Lords posed to socialism was not as great as it had been earlier. Certainly it would not be as great a threat as the Senate of Canada.

We always have to remember, Senator Haidasz, that when many writers, whether they are university professors or journalists, deal with the Senate in Canada, they write from a New Democratic Party viewpoint. They want to reduce the powers of the Senate so as to ensure that when the great day comes when there is a New Democratic Party government in this country, the Senate will not be able to amend or defeat what are called "money bills". That view has been fundamental to political discussion in Canada in recent times.

Senator Corbin: Senator Stewart, would you allow a further question on this very topic that you are dealing with?

I do not know to what extent you are a Churchillian, that is to what extent you have read the speeches of Sir Winston Churchill when he sat in the British House of Commons, and his many other writings. He made a speech at Huddersfield on October 15, 1951. I am quoting from a small pocketbook, a Signet Key Book which I purchased some 30 years ago for 50 cents. It is entitled, The Eloquence of Winston Churchill, edited by F.B. Czarnomski. In that speech at Huddersfield on October 15, 1951, Sir Winston Churchill said:

> The concentration of all power over the daily lives of ordinary men and women in what is called" the State," exercised by what is virtually single-chamber government, is a reactionary step contrary to the whole trend of British history and to the message we have given to the world.

Are those not wonderful words?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator Corbin, I agree that they are. I wonder if we could remember them for a later point in my comments, because they will be highly pertinent when I come to talk about what Lord Hailsham has called "elective dictatorship". I referred earlier to Mr. Stanfield's reference to an article in The Economist. That article in the Economist was prompted, I believe, by an address given by His Lordship, an address in which he described the British government as an "elective dictatorship". I want to return to that and to quote His Lordship. At that point, if I remember, I will say something about what Sir Winston Churchill has said.

I want, at this point, to turn to another authority, one greatly admired by senators opposite. On April 27, 1965, Mr. Douglas Fisher made a slashing attack on certain Senate appointments made by Mr. Pearson. He then went on to make comments about the Senate. These appear in the House of Commons Debates, page 640. I quote:

> Obviously, we have in the Senate a constellation of major business and economic figures which, because of the nature of the private corporation legislation that may be introduced in this particular House, may go through the House or may originate in the Senate, gives these people, a great deal of power. As a matter of fact, an appointment to the Senate is almost a guarantee of nice, fat appointments to directorships of various Canadian corporation, so you can have some kind of leverage. In making that point, Mr. Chairman, I indicate just some of the difficulties in connection with the Senate which do exist.

I find it discouraging, honourable senators, to see how closely the views on the Senate shared by Mr. Mulroney, Mr. Harvie Andre and Mr. Otto Jelinek, parallel those of the old CCF and the modern New Democrats. Senators, we have it from the best authorities, we are all defunct. We are a useless lot.

It is revealing also to see how closely Progressive Conservative senators follow the NDP in their views of the role of the Senate in legislation; at the very most, only a modicum of sober second thought, from time to time, but never, never an important amendment to a tax bill or an appropriation bill. The thought that the Senate might actually defeat a "money bill"—that term, "money bill" they utter as if they were speaking of something holy—causes Progressive Conservative senators to blanch in horror.

It is revealing to see how both the Conservative senators and the New Democratic Party agree on the importance of the pre-study of bills as practised before 1984. Both think that the pre-study was very important, but for diametrically opposite reasons.

Senator Molson sighs for pre-study; it was a truly splendid practice. On October 4, 1990, he lamented that it no longer is used. On Thursday, October 25, he extolled the merits of prestudy. It enabled the Senate, he told us, to improve bills. He said:

> This report distressed me because, in my humble opinion, the Senate did not do its duty. As I mentioned on October 4, the practice of "pre-study" which we call the "Hayden Formula" gave this chamber enough time to study legislation and deal with it in a more thorough way than was ever possible before. Those of us who have been here for a length of time can remember how often we would receive legislation just before an adjournment or a parliamentary recess with the request or instruction to pass the legislation within a matter of days, or sometimes even hours. By introducing study of the subject matter of legislation in one of our committees as soon as it was introduced in the House of Commons usually gave us the time we needed to deal competently with any complex matter.

That is from our own Debates at page 3250.

Senator Molson was back on "pre-study" on November 7, 1990. Because Bill C-62 had not been pre-studied, he found himself bound to vote for the unamended bill.

Senator Murray too has always been a keen advocate of pre-study. Beginning on February 20, 1985 he has told us again and again that pre-study is the way the modern Senate should do its legislative work.

Senator Murray: We will be getting back to it.

• (0900)

Senator Stewart: You are committing the government to reinstate the practice of pre-study in the Senate?

Senator Murray: Definitely. I think I will have a lot of support—perhaps silent, but support—on that side.

Senator Stewart: That is a most interesting forecast.

Senator Frith: You have done a little study, have you? A little sondage.

Senator Stewart: Let me say something about pre-study because, in view of Senator Murray's commitment, it obviously is a highly pertinent topic. First, a word in the defense of pre-study. We all know that clots of bills come to us late in the spring, and sometimes just before Christmas. The ministers are frantic in their haste: their bills ought to be passed by the Senate in a couple of days, certainly in time for Royal Assent and adjournment on the Friday before the holiday adjournment. One way to accommodate the ministers is to begin to study their bills shortly after the bills have started to make their way forward in the House of Commons. But what happens? First, some senators, those with muscle, bring their influence to bear on the ministers. They exercise clandestine power so that bills are amended at the committee stage in the House of Commons. Second, when the bill finally comes to the Senate, there is nothing much left to be done on a bill; the bill passes quickly; and the view is confirmed that the Senate is an old-folks club, agile only at rubber-stamping. If the Senate is to gain respect, senators must work hard and in public.

The pre-study of bills by Senate committees is recommended honestly by certain Senators as a way to expedite the work of Parliament. But some of those who have examined the working of the Senate contend that, in fact, pre-study served a far more sinister purpose. The argument is that one of our committees—Banking, Trade and Commerce—over the years served as a business lobby; that senators used pre-study by that committee to reshape bills to accommodate business interests.

It appears that this argument was initiated in the Globe and Mail on July 8, 1964. I have here a long quotation from that day's issue of the paper, but I will read only a few paragraphs.

> The public, which is perhaps more simple and direct in its thought process than some senators, is likely to be disturbed by what has been happening in the Senate Banking and Commerce Committee.
> To put it simply and directly, what has been happening is this: the Committee has been processing private legislation designed to create a number of new banks and mortgage companies. Some of the Senators on the Committee are directors of existing banks to which the new banks would be rivals. Or they are directors of the parent companies of the new mortgage companies. Or they are both.

I see there are some names here. I do not wish to read them; I will skip that paragraph.

> The Banking Committee then proceeded to approve the legislation permitting the establishment of the new mortgage companies, which could benefit the companies of which some of the members are directors, but found it necessary to delay the legislation permitting the establishment of the new banks, which would compete with the banks of which some of them are directors.

The Senators gave reasons for what they did, and what they did may have been right. The trouble is that it does not look right.

Senator Hayden defended his action and the action of other director-senators. It would be quite improper as well as illegal, he acknowledged, for a Senator "to vote upon any question in which he has any pecuniary interest whatsoever, not held in common with the rest of the Canadian subjects of the Crown".

This, to the simple and direct minds of those other Canadian subjects, would seem to prevent director-senators of companies interested in establishing new mortgage companies from voting on the subject. Directors get paid.

Senator Hayden's defense of this kind of voting was a little complicated, but he was entirely simple and direct on the matter of Senators who were bank directors voting on banking issues. It would be wrong for a Senator to legislate for his own bank, he explained, but right for him to legislate for the rivals of his bank.

We can look for a vast torrent of explanations from the red chamber to prove that these senatorial activities are all right and proper. But the explanations won't wash. The position of our legislators is like the position of our courts; not only must justice be done but it must be seen to be done: not only must legislators avoid conflicts of interest, they must be seen to avoid them.

It is doubtful if directors of banks, mortgage companies, trust companies or any sort of financial institution should sit on the Banking Committee, especially at this time, when the committee will be considering the report of the Porter Royal Commission on Banking and Finance, which could affect all their companies. Their special knowledge of such affairs would not be lost if the Committee were composed entirely of lay Senators; they could always be called, or requested to appear, as expert witnesses.

It is certain that no Senator who has a personal interest, either direct or indirect, in an issue before the Committee should take part in judging that issue. However pure his heart may be, he is still creating in the public mind the suspicion of a conflict of interest. The only course open to him, if he respects the body of which he is a Member and the country it serves, is that taken by Senator Crerar—to declare his interest and withdraw.

An Hon. Senator: Who signed that editorial?

Senator Stewart: That was not an editorial; I believe that was written by Mr. Bruce West. Senator Doyle, I am sure, remembers it because there was also an editorial which made the argument as that expressed in Mr. West's piece. I think I see Senator Doyle nodding.

An Hon. Senator: So Senator Doyle wrote it?

Senator Stewart: No, I do not say that. Perhaps he does not remember it.

The criticism expressed in the Globe and Mail in 1964 has become an article of academic faith in Canada. That criticism is stated and documented by Dr. Colin Campbell in his book: The Canadian Senate: A Lobby from Within published by Macmillan of Canada in 1978. Campbell depicted pre-study as a form of covert lobbying.

Presumably some senators will say that Dr. Campbell got it all wrong: that again and again, Ministers of Finance, advised by the bureaucrats—men who know the real world of the economy only vicariously through university lectures—bring forth unrealistic bills, and that Canada has been well-served by the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Certainly, in the case of Bill C-62 that would be the view of many on this side of the house.

Yet Campbell's view is shared by many in the public. His view helps explain the scorn with which we are dismissed by professors, students, and, of course, by the N.D.P.

Senator Frith: And partly by the government.

Senator Stewart: Many members of the public believe that the Senate is not just an innocent cosy club, but that it is a cosy club which operates chiefly, although not exclusively, to protect business interests. That is one of the reasons why many demand that the Senate be abolished.

I have here an excerpt from Dr. Colin Campbell's book. I will read a few paragraphs; he says this:

> By looking into the Senate at work on business review, one looks right into the heart of Canadian liberal democracy. Here the business community applies subtle and not-so-subtle pressure for adaptations of government legislation to fit their viewpoint. Senators play crucial roles in the process. In a very real sense they are the lobby from within. They bargain and negotiate on business's behalf for amendments which are essential for a favourable financial and commercial climate. When the government refuses to accommodate certain business claims, senators can convey to business the "necessity" of the government policy.

Another paragraph reads as follows:

> The Senate's Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee conducts most business review. Headed by Senator Salter Hayden (a top corporation lawyer and businessman), the committee gained attention in 1961 when it aimed a vigorous attack on the Customs Tariffs and Bank of Canada bills.

● (0910)

Then he goes on to mention its work—I guess he would say its distorting work—in 1964 on the Companies Bill. He mentions its work in 1964 when it pigeonholed three bills which granted charters for three banks: a Bank of Western Canada, a Laurentide Bank and a Bank of British Columbia. In 1968 its proposed amendments to the Hazardous Products Bill passed the Senate but were so extensive that the bill as a whole died in the House of Commons. Later in 1969, according to Dr. Campbell, the committee had further success in protecting the interests of the business community with the Investment Companiess Bill. He says:

> We see here how pressure subtly and cleverly applied in the right places helps advance the interests of the business community. First, individuals make their interests known to the civil servants who draft the legislation. Then they take their case to the House of Commons committee. If they do not get a favourable response there, they then try to convince the Senate's Banking Committee that their views are reasonable and deserve support. If they succeed here, Senator Hayden and some of his colleagues confer with and court the approval of the civil servant in charge of the legislation. If they win him over, most likely the Cabinet Minister to whom the civil servant reports will likewise give his assent to the amendment, and it will probably pass the Senate without offending the government.

Campbell goes on to talk about how Mr. Turner bent to the will of the committee in 1973 on the income tax legislation, and then he proceeds on to discuss the effective work done by the committee on improving—of course, "improving" is always the word—the bill restricting foreign investment. Again, he gives a summary statement.

> By studying bills before they reach the Upper House, the committee has kept a sharp eye on bills which affect business. This has been its greatest influence. Perhaps even more than the members of the Commons Finance Committee, the Senate Banking Committeemen, through astute use of expertise and privileges, have learned the art of political bargaining and are accomplished at negotiating with government representatives to gain their ends.

Dr. Campbell does not restrict his admiration to Banking Trade & Commerce Committee. He goes on to say:

> Competing with the Banking Committee in recent years for some of its work has been the Senate National Finance Committee. Douglas Everett, its chairman since 1970, has directed much of the committee's energies to business review.

And Campbell concludes:

> This chapter has focused on the privileged position of senators as legislators. Many are endowed with high standing within two crucial elite groups in Canada, the political and the business communities.

His conclusion is that because of the sinister work done in pre-study by the Senate Committee on Banking Trade and Commerce, the Senate as a whole deserves to be abolished.

I mentioned this book by Dr. Campbell when I spoke here on November 7th. At that time, prompted by a question asked by Senator Finlay MacDonald, I told honourable senators, even if Campbell were completely wrong, what he has written is being taught to young Canadians across this country. Since then I have checked a couple of the most widely used university textbooks. For example, the Canadian Legislative System by Robert J. Jackson and Michael M. Atkinson says:

> "The formal limits on the power of the Senate sometimes creates the misleading impression that the Senate is entirely excluded from important legislative matters. On the contrary, a small portion of the Senate's membership is actively engaged in challenging, delaying and amending any government legislation which may be detrimental to major business and financial concerns. In a critical analysis of the Senate, Colin Campbell has argued that these "business reviewers" enjoy the indulgence and encouragement of the Government and the advantage of a specific mission in their work. Employing the Hayden formula and the Senate's Banking Trade & Commerce Committee, this group has anticipated changes in government policy by studying bills introduced in the Commons and launching the equivalent of preempted strikes. Their narrow constituency and the absence of publicity accompanying their work has given business reviewers a formidable role in the legislative system.

I checked two other books, perhaps even more widely used than that one, and the same story is carried.

Let me now present the verdict pronounced on the Senate by John Turner some 30 years ago. Turner had written an impressive honours essay on the Senate when he was an under-graduate of the University of British Columbia. A copy of that essay is available in the Library of Parliament. In 1960 he contributed a carefully considered piece to a volume entitled, Canadian Issues: Essays in Honour of Henry F. Angus. In his very first paragraph Turner says:

> "It is probably fair to say that most Canadians who are aware of the subject feel that the Senate has outlived its usefulness and has become a superfluous appendix to the political system. Indeed the prestige and authority of the Senate has probably fallen to its lowest level in Canadian history.

In his second paragraph Mr. Turner says:

> Today the debates in the Senate are so dull, dreary, futile that the press rarely thinks it worthwhile to give them any coverage. Even more symptomatic of its decay is the political fact that recent governments of the day seem to have abandoned and ignored it. The Senate has become an object of ridicule. Cynics call it the most exclusive club in the country, a haven of old men, retired politicians, and contributors to party funds.

Turner then goes on to quote with evident approval the analysis of the legislative tasks of the Senate made by Arthur Meighen back in 1937. According to Mr. Meighen the House of Commons has its proper function within Parliament, and so does the Senate. He quotes what Meighen thought was the proper legislative function of the Senate. Turner then comments:

> Unfortunately, the legislative record of the Senate during the past twenty-five years has not fulfilled these hopes; it has been far from impressive.

[Senator Stewart.]

● (0920)

> Except for a brief interlude of Conservative administration in the early 1930's and for the immediate post-war period, the chamber scarcely justified the outlay of expenditure for its upkeep. The Senate has been neither a workshop nor a theatre.

His final paragraph bespeaks deep frustration:

> "Now, finally, the conundrum can be stated. The Senate, in terms of current facts, no longer plays a useful part in the government of Canada. Its historical purposes have been lost. It no longer operates (albeit through forces beyond the control of its own members) as a restraining influence on legislation. Its initial historical function, that of representing and protecting the rights and interests of the provinces, was never discharged; and it is scarcely equipped with the necessary mandate for that role today. Consequently, the argument for its abolition is difficult to resist. However, the attainment of this goal or, indeed, of any appreciable reform, would require an amendment to the B.N.A. Act which is constitutionally beyond the scope of the federal government alone. The better view is that the unanimous consent of the provinces is required and, certainly, in view of the expressed attitude of nine of the ten provincial governments on the subject, practical politics would dictate that such consent must be sought and obtained. Yet the current climate of provincial sensitivity (limited by no means to Quebec alone) would indicate that, notwithstanding the experience of almost a hundred years, which should demonstrate that the provinces have never depended upon the Senate for help in their wars against successive federal ministries, provincial authorities would look askance at any attempt to abridge whatever constitutional rights are consecrated to the provinces in the institution of the Senate. Political bodies are notoriously long in dying; in a federal state they live well past the age of usefulness.

Mr. Turner was writing in 1960. Obviously, he was not in a position to comment on the effects of "pre-study". Whether, as a result of his experience in ministerial office, he found the pre-study of his bills helpful or not, I do not know.

Donald Shell, of the University of Bristol, is the author of the most recent scholarly study of the British second chamber. In that book, entitled, The House of Lords, he comments on the Senate. Based on the pre-1984 situation, he had this to say at pages 3 to 4:

> The Canadian Senate represents the provinces in a formal sense, but unevenly, with twenty-four members from both of the largest provinces and six from each of the five smallest. In its activity, however, the Canadian Senate does not defend provincial interests; but neither has it any real political role: rather, it has become a very quiescent, if not moribund, body.

All this—the general view that as a legislative body the Senate was useless or even a disutility — helps explain what has happened in the Senate since 1984.

Since 1984 an effort has been made by Liberal Senators to see if the Senate possibly can be revived. We saw an opportunity after 1984, an opportunity that would not be as readily available if the Liberals had been in office. We believed that, contrary to what Prime Minister Mulroney has said repeatedly, Canada needs a bicameral Parliament, and that the only way to save the Senate from abolition is to be visibly active and to get rid of that highly-suspect practice, pre-study. Now, in 1990, the Senate, never held in high regard, has been packed in an unprecedented way for the specific purpose of passing a bad bill at a bad time.

This very morning, honourable senators, we heard the Honourable Senator Murray, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, tell us that pre-study is going to be revived: pre-study, that practice which has given the Senate of Canada a very bad name in the institutions which shape the minds of influential young Canadians.

Honourable senators, when he derides the Senate, the Prime Minister says that an active Senate is contrary to responsible government. When he says that, he is not breaking new ground. The ultimate attack on the Senate always has been that the Senate is antithetical to responsible government. That is the attack the CCF made on the Senate in 1933.

The New Democratic Party had—and it still has—a powerful hostility to the Senate. It imported that hostility into Canada from Great Britain where for generations the Labour Party saw the House of Lords as an illegitimate conservative obstacle to the achievement of socialism. The NDP believed that, like the House of Lords in Great Britain, the Senate, composed of non-elected Liberals and Tories, would use its vast constitutional powers to veto the socialist measures of a democratically elected NDP government. The fact that they could decry the Senate as the pinnacle of old-line party patronage was exploited to the full by the NDP, but that charge was always of secondary importance. It was the constitutional powers of the Senate that the New Democratic Party feared. The denunciation of the Senate as patronage writ large served chiefly to rob the Senate of legitimacy.

Over the years many Liberals and Progressive Conservatives saw no real value in the Senate. Out of office, they demanded radical Senate reform. In office, they held their noses and made appointments.

"But", says the Prime Minister, "all those institutions—the Governor General, the Senate, the House of Commons—are as naught before me. In Canada we have 'responsible government'. I won the election of November 21, 1988. That means that I have a mandate." The Prime Minister talks much about his mandate.

Let us see what all this talk about a mandate and about responsible government means in 1990.

In the United Kingdom between 1715 and 1832 the King never lost an election—1741 may be an exception. Given the small number of persons eligible to vote and the large number of pocket boroughs, those men in whom the King had confidence and selected as his ministers were always able to win the elections. The Reform Act of 1832 changed all that. No longer could the outcome of elections be determined by the government. The result was a highly independent House of Commons. It was a house in which many members regarded every vote as a free vote.

● (0930)

In the three or four decades after 1832 the ministries depended for their survival on the collective will of those highly independent members. No ministry that could not get its supply bills past the House of Commons without major amendments could continue in office. Consequently, ministry after ministry courted the House of Commons. Before 1832 ministers had been responsible to the king. After 1832 they became responsible to the House of Commons.

The heyday of simple responsible government—meaning that the ministers were responsible to independent-minded members of the House of Commons—lasted no more than forty years in the United Kingdom.

After the Second and Third Reform Acts political parties of the modern type were organized. The party leaders began to engage in nation-wide campaigns. Increasingly the electors voted for party candidates. They voted for men committed to support a party platform, and for the party leader, the chief advocate of that platform.

The importance of the change after the Second and Third Reform Act is suggested by the horrified outcries of statesmen of the old Responsible Government school. In 1868 Lord Derby complained about the "balderdash and braggadocio" in which Gladstone had engaged in his "stumping tour." In 1874 Selborne complained that Gladstone had delivered a popular budget as an election address. The Midlothian campaign of 1879 was seen as disastrous; it was, Selborne said, "a precedent tending in its results to the degradation of British politics, by bringing in a system of perpetual canvass, and removing the political centre of gravity from Parliament to the platform". In the 1890s Lord Rosebery dared to address a popular meeting on a policy not previously discussed with the Queen. She was not pleased. Clearly, the old order—the classical version of Responsible Government—was passing away.

The result, of course, was a major change in how the system worked. To remain in office a ministry still required the support of the House of Commons. But most members no longer did much thinking for themselves. Power shifted back to party leaders. The main difference between the modern system and the pre-1832 system is that the Sovereign's confidence in his or her ministers no longer is decisive. What is decisive now is the electorate. In the eighteenth century a prime minister had to woo the king. Now a prime minister has to woo the people. But there is a second major difference. While the king could fire a prime minister at any time—true, it very rarely happened after 1783—the people get only one chance every four or five years. For about 12 hours every four or five years their support counts. It is not even a window. It is a mere loophole.

Nevertheless, honourable senators, the system still is called Responsible Government.

In British North America the introduction of Responsible Government had an important additional facet. The introduction of Responsible Government meant that the ministers ceased to be responsible to London and became responsible to the colonial assemblies.

The struggle for Responsible Government in British North America goes back to the decades before 1850. What was the proper role of the Governor in a colony? That was the question. Was he to act as an agent of the government at Westminster—an agent either fully instructed or an agent with wide discretionary power, but in either case, an Imperial agent? Yes, said Metcalfe, the governor was an Imperial agent.

Metcalfe refused to heed the advice of his Canadian ministers. He was having no nonsense. I quote:

> If you mean that the governor is to have no exercise of his own judgment in the administration of the government, and is to be a mere tool in the hands of the council, I totally disagree with you. That is a condition to which I never can submit, and which her majesty's government, in my opinion, can never sanction. If you mean that every word and deed of the governor is to be previously submitted for the advice of the council, then you propose what, besides being unnecessary, is utterly impossible, consistent with the due despatch of business.

So spoke Governor Metcalfe.

The alternative was that in most matters—the great exceptions were trade and foreign affairs—the governor would act in conformity with the advice of those who enjoyed the confidence of a majority in the colonial assembly.

When responsible government was achieved in the British North American colonies at mid-century the imperial leash was slipped as far as matters internal to the colonies were concerned.

As I have said, the practice of responsible government has undergone major changes since the middle of the 19th century. Once it meant that the executive government, the ministry, depended precariously on the support of a majority in the assembly. The horse, the assembly, pulled the cart. No longer is that true. Except when no party has a majority, the ministerial cart now pushes the legislative horse. The practice behind the theory has changed. The relationship has been reversed. Prime Ministers now insist, of course, that their supply bills must pass without reductions; a little minor tinkering may be suffered. They insist that their tax bills be left intact. Indeed, sometimes they insist that any amendment to any bill, any amendment not acceptable to the government, raises a question of confidence. In that way they keep the backbenchers in line.

And, of course, Responsible Government as it now works conforms to the bureaucrat's vision of paradise. He exercises power without accountability. He operates behind a screen. Always soothing his minister—"Yes, Minister; Yes, yes, of course, Minister"—he takes him by the hand. If anything goes wrong, it is the minister who is responsible. But, clearly, that means nothing because the Prime Minister casts the protective cloak of collective responsibility over the minister's head. If you doubt what I say, have a chat with Senator Pitfield. Because of party discipline, the members of a Prime Minister's party follow their leader. They are, as they say in the elegant language of the House of Commons, "trained seals". A member who persists in thinking for himself is out on his ear. He is stripped of his committee places, even of his place in interparliamentary organizations. If you doubt what I say, ask Pat Nowlan, who until Thursday, November 1, 1990 was the Co-chair of the Canada-U.S. Interparliamentary Group.

As a Member of Parliament from Nova Scotia and the son of a famous father, Pat Nowlan's treatment attracts attention in that province. The Chronicle-Herald, November 5, 1990, records his fate. Nowlan had done the unthinkable; he had shown independence.

● (0940)

> When Parliament resumed its sitting this fall, Nowlan had been relegated to the ranks of the independents.
>
> The Conservatives have already taken steps to make sure he will not be re-elected chairman of the high-profile Commons' transport committee.
> But they heightened the dump-Pat campaign by removing his control of the Canada-U.S. Group.
>
> Conservative whip Jim Hawkes first quietly cajoled Pat to quit the post. When he refused, the Tories passed a motion declaring the post vacant.
>
> The committee is headed by a senator and an MP who are chosen every second year. Ironically, it was the time to pick a new co-chairman from the Senate side this year, but the Tories dumped Pat as well. The new Senate co-chair is Alberta Senator Staff Barootes.

It is true, of course, honourable senators, that some Prime Ministers are more patient than others.

Responsible government still means that the executive government is coupled to the assembly. But now the executive government controls the assembly. One cannot even run for re-election as a Liberal, as a Progressive Conservative or as a New Democratic Party candidate without the signature of the party leader on one's papers.

In Canada nowadays only minority governments live precariously. We all know that. Let me quote briefly from the Honourable Thomas Hockin. This article written by him was published in 1979 in the Journal of Canadian Studies. At page 13, he states:

> It is now, of course trite but nonetheless instructive, to note that in the 112 years since 1867, all but one change of the Canadian government (apart from those caused by retirement, death or ill-health of the Prime Minister) have occurred not because of a parliamentary reversal but because of a vote in a general election against the government. This century-long reality can be praised as a triumph for democracy insofar as it signifies the direct influence of the people on government. In other words, no > longer is the electorate separated by a governor, an executive council, and a legislative council from directly dismissing a government from office. One must be clear though about the limits this change really implies. It would be inaccurate and confusing to say that this advance in democracy has meant increased and continued parliamentary control of government activity, policy and administration. The advance of democracy is on a different level altogether. The words of A.H. Birch (speaking of Britain) are appropriate for Canada. What has developed

> > . . . is not so much a form of Parliamentary control of the executive as a form of voter's control, exercised through Parliamentary elections. And since elections take place infrequently it is not clear that the word 'control' is appropriate.

So there we have it. Responsible government now means little after the ballots have been counted and a majority government has been formed.

"That's all true," you may say to me, "but, Stewart, you've forgotten the second aspect of responsible government, the really important aspect. It is in that second aspect that the true substance of modern responsible government resides. A Prime Minister has a mandate from the people. It is only right that the backbenchers should follow him like the Hussars and Lancers of the Light Brigade at Balaclava."

So we come to the doctrine of the mandate. Prime Minister Mulroney dotes upon his mandate; he coos over it constantly. He was given a mandate in 1984, he reminds Canadians. He is now halfway through his second mandate, the 1988 mandate.

What is a mandate? In Great Britain they talk about policy mandates. They mean that a party has put a policy explicilty before the people in an election. If successful, the party then has a mandate to carry out that policy.

But that is not what Prime Minister Mulroney means by his mandate. He means something far grander. He means that, as a result of having an election, he is free to do whatever he wishes for the next four or five years. He is even free to do things he promised not to do before the election. For a Prime Minister with a mandate the word "sacred" is meaningless. His mandate makes him omnipotent. He alone is the prophet.

Prime Minister Mulroney concedes that he is not infallible. If he goes astray, he will suffer the consequences at the next election, or so this branch of the journalists' theory of responsible government holds. But is that true of Prime Ministers in the real world?

Mr. King resigned as Prime Minister a few months before the 1949 election. Mr. Pearson resigned as Prime Minister almost immediately before the 1968 election. Mr. Trudeau resigned as Prime Minister shortly before the 1984 election. In such cases, what does the retrospective judgment of the electorate mean? Precisely nothing.

And let us not forget the rapid turnover of the House of Commons. Many members—on the average about 30 per cent—choose not to run again. They are gone. In that situation, even senators begin to appear responsible. At least, many of them can still be found on Parliament Hill.

So far I have said nothing about the role of political parties in responsible government. True, many members of Parliament do not run again and cannot be held responsible. True, Prime Ministers drop out and cannot be held responsible. But the political parties, you may say, carry on election after election. Without the political parties, Viscount Samuel once commented, the House of Commons would be merely "a fortuitous collection of atoms." It is the party which provides the continuity essential to ministerial responsibility.

Surely this reliance on party continuity is to strain the concept of ministerial responsibility beyond the breaking point. Party positions change. Party memberships change. If continuity is essential to responsibility, where is continuity to be found?

What Prime Minister Mulroney believes, and preaches, is the popular civic textbook version: the Prime Minister is responsible to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons is responsible to the people. But reality has moved on. Once successful in gaining election, a Prime Minister controls the House of Commons and Parliament rules the people.

Understandably, Prime Minister Mulroney has no use for the Senate as a legislative body. It has no place in Parliament. It is a potential rival. The Senate may have its uses, but not as an active part of the legislature. When one hears Prime Minister Mulroney talk about responsible government, one is led to think of Caesaristic dictatorship. Without a single formal change in the republican constitution of Rome, Caesar took dictatorial power unto himself.

Conservative senators may applaud the Prime Minister's constitutional doctrine. Would they applaud so enthusiastically if that same doctrine were preached by Jean Chrétien or Audrey McLaughlin?

• (0950)

Just the other day Mr. Mulroney spoke about beginning the second half of his current mandate. If he meant simply that enough Progressive Conservatives were elected to the House of Commons on November 21, 1988, to enable himself and his cabinet colleagues to continue as ministers of the Crown for up to five years, nobody could complain. If he meant that the result of the election enabled him to continue as the chief minister of the executive government—I emphasize "executive"—nobody would object. But that is not what he means.

Nor does he mean that he explained his plans to the people before the elections and consequently gained their support for those plans. He follows the John Crosbie strategy. We all remember John Crosbie, how in 1979 he said:

> "If we had told the people our plans, they never would have elected us". In other words, if we had sought a mandate for our program, the people would have refused to give us a mandate.

In 1983 Mr. Mulroney dismissed the idea of a free trade agreement with the United States. After the election—after he got what he calls his mandate—he proceeded to negotiate a free trade agreement with the United States. When Liberal senators argued for an election on the agreement, we were denounced by the government for failing to repeat his mandate.

What the Prime Minister means, what he believes, is that in 1984 and 1988 he was given a mandate to make any change he wants to make in the laws and policies of this country. He means that the people gave him a legislative carte blanche. He means that those who voted Progressive Conservative in 1988 were giving their authorization to the Meech Lake Accord. He means that those who voted Progressive Conservative in 1988 were mandating the changes in the Unemployment Insurance system—even although the senior minister in Atlantic Canada, John Crosbie, promised that the Unemployment Insurance system would not be altered. On October 14, 1988 the Honourable John Crosbie stated:

> We will be looking at UI in a couple of years, presumably to see what improvements can be made or whatever. But there are no changes planned for UI.

Mulroney means that those senior citizens who voted Progressive Conservative in 1988 voted for a reduction in their old-age pensions. They voted for Wilson's claw. He means that those who voted Progressive Conservative in 1988 voted for this tax on goods and services.

The Progressive Conservative Briefing Book on Bill C-62 explains that the people of Canada gave the Mulroney Government a mandate to impose the goods and services tax. I quote from that book:

> Question: Why not have a referendum on the GST and let the people decide?
>
> Answer: The people did decide. In the last election Canadians gave the government a mandate to reform the sales tax system. The government's intentions have always been clear and up front. A White paper in June 1987 set out plans to replace the existing federal sales tax. On the day the 1988 election was called the Prime Minister said tax reform would be part of the campaign. In the televised debate just before the last election, the Prime Minister said clearly that the existing federal sales tax would be changed.
>
> Question: The government says it wants to get on with its agenda. So why has it bogged down in a fight about the GST?
> Answer: This is not about the GST. It's about un-elected Liberal Senators denying the elected government its right to govern.

Now let us turn to the pages of the Globe and Mail for an accurate account of how the Mulroney Government sought a mandate to bring in the goods and services tax. Let us see what kind of mandate for the GST Mr. Mulroney sought from the electorate. I am referring to a commentary written by Linda McQuaig, published on October 17, 1990.

> One of the most misleading statements coming out of Ottawa these days is the contention of Brian Mulroney's government that the goods and services tax was part of its 1988 election platform.
>
> The government is advancing this theory now, of course, in an effort to suggest that it was elected with a mandate to impose the GST. Even if the electorate is now overwhelmingly opposed to it, the theory goes, the public elected the government knowing full well of—even presumably endorsing—the GST.
> This is a considerable distortion of what happened. It is true that the government had indicated in vague terms in its 1987 tax-reform documents its intention to replace the Manufacturers Sales Tax with a new sales tax. But the government went mum on the subject during the 1988 campaign. This silence was with good reason.
>
> The new tax was going to benefit only a small segment of the population—primarily manufacturers, who had long disliked the existing sales tax and would enjoy a much lighter burden under the GST. Indeed, some $4-billion of the sales-tax burden was to be transferred from the corporate sector to the household sector.
> So the government saw no particular advantage in mentioning the new tax to the general public during the election campaign. It was bound to raise suspicions that the tax would be used to soak additional revenues out of the public for the ongoing war against the deficit.
> For the Tories, there was no advantage in turning the GST into an election issue. Everybody who would like the new tax—manufacturers, business economists, tax experts—already knew about it. The rest were better kept in the dark.

The commentary goes on and on, and honourable senators are probably quite familiar with it already.

The Prime Minister believes that to win an election is to gain a mandate for any laws and policies he happens to want. I do not know from what ideologist the Prime Minister learned this strange and dangerous theory. He seems to think that he is the sole voice of the people; that he is their prophet. To resist his bills is to resist the will of the people.

The idea of an electoral mandate is relatively new. It came to the fore in the United Kingdom in the nineteenth century.

Honourable senators, it is obvious that the Senate is not the House of Lords. The British second chamber is an old bottle, an old bottle filled with both old wine and new wine. Some peerages come down by inheritance from great 18th Century landowners. Other peers inherit their places from men who were successful in manufacturing and commerce in the late nineteenth century. Nowadays the House of Lords is recruited from many different sources. Perhaps one might say that it embodies the principles of inheritance and merit.

In contrast, the Senate of Canada was created primarily to embody the federal principle. It was included in the Parliament as a House in which each of the less populous divisions of the country would have a role in legislation equal to that of Ontario.

Although these two upper houses are very different, as I have said, there is something to be gained by looking at the British experience.

I say that because it may well be that our own consideration of Bill C-62 will prompt us to ponder how this chamber should be changed. I have no doubt but that it will prompt others to ask what should be the future of the Senate. Consequently, it is worthwhile looking at the British experience.

In 1860 the House of Lords rejected Mr. Gladstone's bill to repeal the duties on paper. The Lords had not rejected a tax bill for many years. That date is significant for Canadians. It shows that the authors of the British North America Act, 1867, were fully aware of the possibility of a head-on conflict between the House of Commons and the Senate on tax and appropriation bills. Yet they made the Senate's powers virtually the same as those of the House of Commons. The British were anxious to increase the Prime Minister's power somewhat, but the Canadians resisted. They knew that politics is the art of the possible. They knew what was possible in the British North American provinces. They knew that without giving the Senate virtually equal power in all legislative matters, confederation would never be achieved. Most reluctantly the Canadians agreed to the inclusion of clause 26 in the bill—to permit a Prime Minister to make minor additions to the Senate—but only if the Governor General and the Queen, advised by Her British ministers, thought this necessary to break a major legislative deadlock.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Stewart a question on this point about section 26 of the British North America Act? Senator Steward, you stated a few moments ago that the appointment of these so-called eight divisional senators in Canada is to be made only if there is an impasse between the House of Commons and the Senate. To my knowledge, from what I see, we have not had a problem yet with the House of Commons. We are still studying the bill. We have not sent the bill back with amendments.

Just what kind of impasse has occurred in the eyes of the Prime Minister or in the eyes of any of his advisors or lawyers or perhaps any judges who have pronounced themselves on this matter?

Senator Stewart: Senator Haidasz, it would be impossible to say that there was an impasse of the kind contemplated when the British North America Act was made. References are made by speakers such as Sir John A. Macdonald to the parliamentary impasse in Great Britain over the first reform act in 1832. The reform bill had been passed by the House of Commons; it was rejected by the House of Lords. There was an election. The bill was passed again by the House of Commons and it was about to be defeated a second time in the House of Lords. At that point, the King agreed that, if the impasse could not be overcome otherwise, he would create a sufficient number of new peers to assure the passage of the bill. That was the kind of impasse they had in mind.

In the situation which prevailed in Canada in 1990, we had one bill, Bill C-21, which stood on the Order Paper in the name of Senator Ottenheimer from May 23 until October 19. Discussions were initiated. Senator MacEachen has told us about those discussions. He has offered to put the letters on the table. The government walked away, not because the negotiations appeared likely to fail but because it was clear that they would be successful. Bill C-21 was needed for the contrived log-jam. Then with regard to Bill C-28, the clawback bill, it was obvious that there was no urgency because the government was doing what they would never think of doing in Great Britain. They were collecting the clawback money from January 1. The government was quite prepared to have the Senate adjourned for a three month holiday.

When we focus directly on Bill C-62, we see that it went forward swimmingly at second reading. It took only five hours of debate; there was an affirmative vote of the Senate.

The New Democratic Party keeps insisting that the Liberals are really in favour of the goods and services tax, and their evidence is that the bill passed second reading. It was only very late in the summer that the Liberal members of the committee saw that the bill was irreparable and decided to recommend that it should not go forward. Even if the Senate had voted to accept the report of the committee, this would not have constituted a legislative log-jam. It would have been open to the government to terminate this session of Parliament, bring on a new session, and put the bill through the House of Commons again very quickly. They used closure repeatedly in the House of Commons the first time; they could have used closure with greater justification the second time. They could have had the bill over here and said, "Yes, you have told us that this is a bad bill, but the House of Commons has spoken again."

Now, that would not parallel exactly what would be required in Great Britain under the Parliament Act. That act would have required the delay of a full year. But at least there would have been a record of a vote in the Senate against the GST. At the moment there has not been a single decision of the Senate against the bill. There was anticipation of a negative decision. There is not a single decision in which the Senate turned down the GST bill exactly as it came to us from the House of Commons.

● (1000)

The rejection of Gladstone's bill in 1860 started a fifty-year war between the House of Commons and the House of Lords. On one side were the Liberals pressing for reform—reform of education, reform of the ecclesiastic establishments in Ireland and Wales, reform of the suffrage, and of course home rule for Ireland. On the other side was the Tories, determined to conserve the old order in church and state. That war between the two houses of Parliament reached its climax in 1910 and 1911.

In 1911 the new King, George V, agreed to create a sufficient number of new peers to assure that the House of Lords would pass the Parliament bill. An election had been fought on the legislative powers of the House of Lords. The Liberals continued in office; the Conservatives had not gained a majority. The Liberals believe that they had a mandate from the people for the Parliament bill. But, still, the Tory Lords refused to pass the bill. They passed it only when King George agreed that he would create enough new peers to swamp them.

Honourable senators will be interested in what happened in the United Kingdom in 1911 for two reasons. First, there was a possibility that the Liberal government would be given a majority in the House of Lords by new creations—the sort of thing we saw in Canada in 1990. Second, the outcome—the Parliament Act, 1911—reduced the powers of the upper house.

We have had discussions in Canada concerning reducing the power of the Senate. Honourable senators will recall that in 1985 Mr. Crosbie developed a resolution on a model of the Parliament Act, 1911.

I should like to quote the account given by Sir William Anson of what happened in 1910 and 1911. I will be quoting from his book entitled The Law and Custom of Parliament. It will be noted that Sir William, who published his account in 1911, thought that the Liberal government had not acted with full constitutional propriety. He said:

> In 1909 the House of Lords declined to pass the Finance Bill of the year on the ground that it embodied principles of taxation so novel in character as to need the express approval of the electors before passing into law. Parliament was dissolved. At the general election which took place in January, 1910, the Government lost more than 100 seats, and the two great parties were left almost on an equality of numbers; but Mr. Asquith, supported by the votes of the Nationalist and Labour groups, could command a majority of 120.
> The House of Lords accepted the verdict of the general election and passed the Finance Bill; nevertheless the Government introduced resolutions, subsequently embodied in the Parliament Bill, with a view to the curtailment of the powers of the Second Chamber. These resolutions were carried in April, 1910, after a discussion which lasted for eleven days of Parliamentary time, and the Parliament Bill of 1910 was introduced and read a first time without discussion.
> The death of King Edward VII, and the Conference in which the leaders of the two parties endeavoured to come to terms on the constitutional questions in issue prevented further discussion until November.
> The Conference broke up without result, and as those who took part in it were bound to secrecy, we have no knowledge of the concessions which either party was prepared to make, nor of the point at which negotiation became useless. What happened afterwards we learn from Mr. Asquith, speaking in the House of Commons on the 7th of August, 1911.
> On the 15th November, 1910, the Cabinet advised the King to dissolve a Parliament which was not a year old, and which never had the opportunity of discussing the Parliament Bill. But at the same time they asked for a promise that

> "in the event of their policy being approved by an adequate majority in the new House of Commons, His Majesty would be ready to exercise his constitutional power, which may involve the prerogative of creating peers, if needed to secure that effect shall be given to the desire of the Government."

They further advised

> "that no communication of the intention of the Crown should be made public unless and until the actual occasion should arise."

At this point I interrupt Anson to say that Asquith seems to have made a mistake in his account of the King's promise. The Cabinet Minute laid before the King on November 15, 1910 did not ask the King to create peers to ensure that "the desire of the government" be given effect provided the government had won re-election; rather, it asked the King to create peers "to give effect to the decision of the country." In other words, the government could have new peers only after having won an explicit mandate from the country on the Parliament bill. Later, Mr. Asquith's speech in the Debates was corrected to conform to the Cabinet Minute.

On April 26, 1990—the Speaker of our House of Commons, the Hon. John Fraser, in his encyclic address to the House and the nation spoke with warm admiration for the Parliament Act, 1911. What does that act provide?

Under that act, any "money bill" may be presented for Royal Assent even if it has not passed the House of Lords, provided that the Lords have had the bill for at least one month. Any other bill may be presented for Royal Assent without passing the House of Lords provided that the bill has passed the House of Commons a second time in a second session, and that a specified time has elapsed between the first second reading and the second third reading in the Commons. In 1911 the delay was set at two years. In 1949 the Labour Party used the Parliament Act, 1911 to amend the Parliament Act. They amended it so that the Lords may delay a bill only one year.

The term "money bill" is defined by the Parliament Act. A "money bill" may contain no clause relating to a matter other than appropriation, taxation, borrowing, loans and the management of public money all strictly defined. Most of the bills that are described here in Ottawa as "money bills" would not be "money bills" at Westminster.

Honourable senators will have noticed that the Cabinet minute laid before the King asked him to promise to create enough peers "to give effect to the decision of the country." The Liberal government was to have an explicit mandate for the Parliament bill before the King would act.

That brings us to the British—or should I say "the British conservative" doctrine of the mandate. Away back in 1869 Lord Salisbury told the House of Lords that it was not the function of Their Lordships' House to be a mere echo of the House of Commons.

> The object of the existence of a second House of Parliament is to supply the omissions and correct the defects which arise in the proceedings of the first.

It is said, he commented, that the House of Commons represents the will of the nation.

> In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the House of Commons is theoretically the representative of the nation, but is so only in theory. The constitutional theory has no corresponding basis in fact, because in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the nation, as a whole, takes no interest in our politics.

In those indifferent cases, the 99 on which the House of Commons could not be said to have a mandate, he saw no reason for admitting that the Commons spoke for the nation any better than the Lords. In the remaining one case the situation was quite different. In those special cases, the one case in a hundred:

> . . . the nation must be called into council and must decide the policy of the Government. It may be that the House of Commons in determining the opinion of the nation is wrong; and if there are grounds for entertaining that belief . . . it is the duty of this House to insist that the nation should be consulted, and that one House without the support of the nation shall not be allowed to domineer over the other. We must decide whether the House of Commons does or does not represent the full, the deliberate, the sustained convictions of the body of the nation.

When it was clear that the House of Commons and the nation were at one, then, said his Lordship, ". . . the vocation of this House has passed away."

● (1015)

Here we are reminded of what John A. Macdonald said on February 6, 1865:

> "It [the Senate] must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill-considered legislation which may come from that body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people." Parliamentary Debates on the subject of Confederation, p. 36.

The doctrine of the mandate was restated in 1964 by another Lord Salisbury. He had served as the Leader of the Conservatives in the Lords during the period of the Labour government between 1945 and 1951. Describing the position of his party during the period of the Attlee government, Lord Salisbury said:

> . . . our broad guiding rule [was] that what had been on the Labour Party programme at the preceding General Election should be regarded as having been approved by the British people. Therefore we passed all the nationalisation bills, although we cordially disliked them, on the second reading and did our best to improve them and make them more workable on Committee stage. When however measures were introduced which had not been in the Labour Party manifesto at the preceding election, we reserved full liberty of action.

That is from the House of Lords Debates, November 4, 1964, at page 504.

In the debate in 1975 on whether to insist on their amendments to the Trade Union and Labour Relations (Amendment) Bill, Lord Carrington, known personally to several honourable senators opposite, dealt with the questioned how far it was right for the House of Lords to use its powers to delay under the Parliament Act, 1911, as amended in 1949. This is what he said:

> In our system we have hitherto taken the view that the will of the elected House must in the end prevail, but that there should be a second House which has the opportunity—in rare cases, perhaps—to enforce a delay in which there can be reassessment by Government, by parties and by the people of this country of the rights or wrongs of an issue. If now we decide to use that very limited power, we are not thwarting the will of the people for, in so far as it is represented by the House of Commons, it will and must prevail in a comparatively short time. We shall be using those powers for the purpose for which they were given to us—that is, as an opportunity for further consultation, for second thoughts before this legislation inevitably reaches the Statute Book and because we did not want the Second Chamber to be associated with what the Government are doing.

That is from the House of Lords Debates, November 22, 1975, at page 505.

Given the political composition of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom, the doctrine of the mandate has tended to be thought of as a conservative doctrine—a doctrine intended to stop a willful, impetuous Prime Minister—perhaps a Conservative Prime Minister, but far more probably a Labour Prime Minister—from having his or her own way unimpeded. How appropriate that doctrine is for Great Britain is not suitable for me to say.

Surely, however, it is of some relevance to this house. We know that the Senate was created as a brake on a Government supported by the majority in a house elected on the basis of representation by population. Without the Senate there would have been no Canada. The Senate was given a braking power over all the different kinds of bills—over taxation, appropriation and all the rest. The Senate was made appointive, not elective, so that senators would not be overly aggressive in applying the brakes.

An electoral mandate—using the term "mandate" as it is used in Great Britain—requires that a proposal—a plank—be clearly stated and thoroughly discussed with the electorate.

For example, in 1988 the Prime Minister of Canada was given a mandate for the Free Trade Agreement with the U.S.A. The Liberal-dominated Senate respected his mandate. Let me read what I said on December 30, 1988, in reporting the Free Trade Agreement bill to the Senate from the Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs. I stated at that time that the committee had been mindful of several points; these I enumerated. The first point related to the mandate. I quote:

> . . . on November 21, 1988, the people of Canada elected a House of Commons in which the majority favoured the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement. Bill C-2 is virtually the same as Bill C-130, which was passed by the House of Commons on August 31, 1988, in the Thirty-Third Parliament. Moreover, the committee received Bill C-2 only on Tuesday, December 27, while the implementation date under the agreement is January 1, 1989. Those facts pointed to the conclusion that the committee should not propose amendments to the bill, even though some members of the committee believe that, on the merits, major amendments are highly desirable.

Later, I said:

> Honourable senators, this is a unanimous report. As the record shows, some members did not participate in the vote to carry the clauses of the bill. In the third paragraph on the first page of the report, which begins with the words, "From the testimony heard", the committee provides a summary of its views on each of the five specific matters to which I have already referred. Honourable senators will notice that the views set forth in that one paragraph are attributed only to a majority of the members of the Committee.

There, honourable senators, we have a pretty good example of the application of the policy mandate doctrine by the Canadian Senate. However, the Prime Minister's view of his mandate, the mandate gained on September 4, 1984, and the mandate gained on November 21, 1988, is far more inclusive. He holds, as we have seen, the view that the people gave him a mandate to do whatever he thinks best. Nobody, certainly not the Senate, should resist him. As recently as November 5, 1990, he pronounced his understanding of his constitutional position clearly on a television hotline show. The Toronto Star quotes him:

> We're elected for four or five years. If at the end of that time you disagree with what we've done, the beauty of the British Parliamentary system is that you get a chance to throw the politicians out.

So there we have it. Once in power, a Prime Minister is virtually omnipotent. Nothing can be done to deter him. There is, perhaps, punishment, but it comes so far after the fact as to not be a remedy.

Let us suppose that in Canada we had a constitutional amendment comparable to the Parliament Act as it now stands; would Prime Minister Mulroney accept the delays on bills the Senate could impose under the terms of such a suspensive veto? Certainly, he would not. I want to return to this point later on.

For the benefit of new senators, and I am glad to see them here, let me now review relations between the Mulroney government and the Senate since 1984, with particular attention to financial bills.

Senator Simard: Please spare us.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Stewart: Sorry, I did not hear your question?

Senator Corbin: Senator Stewart, may I ask a question? You did not hear Senator Simard, but he said, "Please spare us". I guess he did not want you to read that quotation. However, I have a quotation here from Sir Winston Churchill which is extracted from that same pocketbook I alluded to earlier, The Eloquence of Winston Churchill, when he spoke in the British House of Commons on October 18, 1948. You will note, Senator Stewart, that this extract from one of the Commons' Speeches of Sir Winston is highly pertinent to the point you are currently making in your speech.

> The attitude and function of a Second Chamber in any land is essentially one of safeguarding and delaying violent or subversive measures which may endanger the long-gathered heritage of the whole people, without the gravity and significance of the issues involved being fairly and intelligibly placed before them.

Would you not think that this quote applies squarely to the GST and the manoeuvres of the government to force this down the public's gullets?

Senator Stewart: Thank you, Senator Corbin, for your question. I said earlier that I think this is a bad bill and a bad time, and I put special emphasis on the latter part of my statement. I do believe it is a bad bill, but I think a more important reason for not voting for it is that this is a bad time for it. I think that given the poor health of our polity—and I am going to come to that later on—it is dangerous to attempt this surgical operation now. It may be that we are going to have to have a serious tax operation. But, this is not the time. The patient should be allowed to put on some weight.

There are times when one should move and there are times when one should not move. Any experienced politician would agree to that. However, what very often happens—and it is not a characteristic of one government—once it gets a roll on, its own momentum tends to carry it forward. One of the advantages of having a second house which is prepared to put the brakes on is precisely to prompt a government to consider whether pushing ahead is worth the inevitable costs. I think that that is the thrust of Sir Winston's argument.

Honourable senators, I want to, as I said, review the relations between the Mulroney government and the Senate since 1984, particularly for the benefit of new senators. Those new senators arrived here at a juncture when all attention is focused on Bill C-62. Bill C-62 is, in a sense, just one care in this railway train and we have to look at the bill in context.

● (1030)

Honourable senators will remember that Edward Porritt, in his book, Evolution of the Dominion of Canada: Its Government and Its Politics, back in 1918 commented that relations between the government and the Senate always are far more harmonious after an election in which a party long in power loses office. He commended the way the Senate sprang to life at such times; otherwise it was a tedious place. That was true in 1896 and in 1911. It was to be true in 1926, 1935, and again in 1958. Given that fact, it would have been surprising if the symbiotic relationship between the government and the Senate had continued after September 4, 1984. We can all agree on that.

Probably, also, we can agree that the business of the Senate is conducted by the political parties. History has shown that when every member of an assembly is his own party, the result is instability, even chaos. In addition, there is the question of commitment or motivation. An announcement of independence may well be an announcement of retirement from work. During the past few weeks a series of amendments to Bill C-62 have been proposed. It is interesting to count up the voting behaviour of our six independent senators. Two of them voted 19 times; 1 senator voted 3 times; 2 of the independents voted twice; 1 voted once; and there is 1 senator who could not manage to get to Ottawa to vote even once. Compare that with the record of the Progressive Conservative Party or the record of the Liberal Party. We all agree that business is normally conducted here primarily on a party basis, yet it is a fact that relations between the parties since 1984 have been far more adversarial, even hostile, than any of us would have predicted. It is fair to ask why.

One obvious reason is that, for one reason or another, from the very beginning the Mulroney government fell under the spell of Ronald Reagan. Consequently, it adopted policies which, willy-nilly, will bind Canada economically and politically to the United States. Many Canadians opposed those policies. Liberal senators gave expression to that public opposition. We found that Brian Mulroney as Prime Minister was all too ready to sing for those who controlled Ronald Reagan's White House.

A second reason has been the Prime Minister's failure to make adequate provision for government leadership in the Senate. I say this to some extent in defense of Senator Murray. From the beginning the Prime Minister saw the Senate as a patronage club—a Liberal patronage club; a Progressive Conservative patronage club. It was to be treated condescendingly, with mingled humour and contempt, even when it cooperated with him. When it failed to do his bidding, he lashed out in language that would have caused a Billingsgate fishwife to blush.

For the first little while after 1984, Senator Roblin, who is here today, led the government in the Senate. He showed the skills of an experienced legislator. Yet I think he had a rough time, not so much with the Senate as with uncomprehending Cabinet colleagues. Then came Senator Murray, a diligent man, a man with all the virtues of the true bureaucrat. He is a competent man, but he is a man who trusts his own opinions and only his own opinions. He is a man who is impatient with debate. I do not think that he understands that, in a democracy, it is not enough to produce a good bill, even a perfect bill, but that strong opposition often is necessary in the process of generating consent. Nor does he understand that the process of generating consent is often slow and tedious. He was busy, very busy, with important administrative work away from the Senate; consequently, the Senate was left for weeks without ministerial leadership.

I think that relations between the government and the Senate would have been far smoother if the Prime Minister had appointed a second senator to the Cabinet, a senator to serve full-time as Government Leader in the Senate. Half a dozen names spring immediately to my mind.

Senator Corbin: Name them?

Senator Stewart: I am sure everybody has his own list.

Senator Corbin: Senator Doody. He is my favourite.

Senator Lucier: He is everyone's favourite.

Senator Stewart: There is Senator Roblin, Senator Bélisle and a lot of people who could have done it. But it was not done. The Prime Minister permitted himself to be controlled by his old prejudices against the Senate. They are not unique to him, I can assure you.

A third reason for a highly adversarial relationship has been a basic disagreement over the role of the Senate in the Parliament of Canada. Before 1984, except for the Diefenbaker period—six years—and the Clark episode—nine months—the Liberals had formed the government ever since 1935. They had formed the government 42 of the 49 years before September 4, 1984. Perhaps, understandably, the Senate had become a rather supine body. That was certainly the popular impression. People asked: "Does the Senate still exist? If so, why?"

The question in 1984 was: Had the constitutional role of the Senate been defined, fixed, determined, during those long years since 1935. The question was: Had those years worked a permanent change in the Constitution of Canada's Parliament? The Progressive Conservatives said, "Yes, the role of the Senate was settled during those years. The Constitution has undergone a kind of amendment by convention." The Liberal senators disagreed. They said, "No, the Constitution of Parliament remains unaltered until changed by a formal constitutional amendment."

During the disagreement over Bill C-11, the Borrowing Authority Bill, in the winter of 1985, Senator Murray instructed senators on their role. He gave them the benefit of his carefully considered opinion. This he did on February 20, 1985 and his statement is to be found in the Debates of the Senate at page 557.

He said that senators have only one legitimate role in legislation: the pre-study of bills. He said that they should confine themselves to pre-study and that if they did not do so, the final solution, soon, would be their fate. Aside from back door amendments—deals between the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the relevant minister—Senator Murray argued that the Senate had no legitimate part to play in the enactment of laws.

He expressed himself with characteristic candour and finesse when he said:

> Finally, I wish to say a word about what this exercise is doing to the Senate, to the role of the Senate and the future of this chamber. While much criticism can be made of it, and some quite far-reaching reforms have been advocated by senators themselves, I believe the Senate has usually done useful work with respect to legislation, to policy, and to government spending and borrowing programs.

Senators are familiar with the device of pre-study by which we have an opportunity to suggest to ministers and to the government amendments that should be made in the legislation before it comes to us officially and formally. Senators are also aware that from time to time we take it upon ourselves to pass a bill about which we have some doubt, or about which we have reservations as to the process or principles involved. We pass a bill and we attach a narrative or commentary stating what we consider to be the proper course, and telling the government that we consider that changes should be made to the procedure in the future.

All of these devices are used by the Senate precisely for the purpose of avoiding confrontation between this chamber and the elected house. These devices that have been used have been helpful and constructive; they have contributed to the legislative process, to policy development, and to the welfare of this country. But it seems to me that the conduct of Liberal Party senators on this bill indicates that in the present Parliament they have decided to take the path of confrontation. They have decided to abandon the path of moral suasion vis-a-vis the government and the House of Commons. They have opted instead for the confrontational approach. I say that if they think they are going to repeat this performance on future bills coming before this body, they are signing their own death warrant—

Some Hon. Senators: No, no.

An Hon. Senator: And yours.

Senator Murray: And mine, but more important than that, the Senate, because I tell honourable senators that we have a Prime Minister and a government that has (a) an overwhelming mandate in the House of Commons; (b) overwhelming popular support still in the country, as evidenced by every poll that he has taken since the election—

Senator Roblin: You are in third place now.

● (1045)

Senator Murray: —and the people have had an opportunity to judge the conduct by the government of the nation's affairs; and (c) I suggest, on the basis of last week's meeting in Regina, that there is now a climate of federal-provincial relations that would enable the government, if it were faced with systematic obstruction by the Senate, to get whatever provincial consent is required to take whatever measure of reform, up to and including abolition, that I thought was necessary under the circumstances. I believe it is important for honourable senators to bear that in mind, particularly those honourable senators who value the work that this Senate and its committees have done over the years and who have themselves, in the past, made a useful contribution to that process.

So there we have Senator Murray's ultimatum: our way or you are out.

Senator Frith: Up to and including abolition.

Senator Corbin: Senator Stewart, I should like to clarify one statement that you made in the course of your remarks a few minutes ago. I am not sure if this was a direct quote from Senator Murray or if it was an ad lib comment on your part. I believe I have the words correctly written down. You said, "The final solution would soon be their fate." Was that something you said or was that a quote from Senator Murray? If it was a quote from Senator Murray, I wonder what he meant by "final solution".

Those are rather shocking words in this day and age. They have a very definite sense going back to World War II and the period prior to that. Is that not a gross and indecent exaggeration in the circumstances?

Senator Stewart: The words were mine. They are used as a gloss for the quotation I was just about to give from Senator Murray, where he talked about abolition, which I suppose is the final solution.

Senator Corbin: His final solution?

Senator Stewart: That is what he talked about.

Senator Simard: Carry on, Senator Stewart.

Senator Corbin: It is nice to know that the government senators are listening to the debate, even though they are not participating. The very essence of Parliament is to have an exchange of views in debate, but at least they are listening.

Senator Stewart, you should be very careful in your choice of words. When I hear a term such as "final solution", I spring to life because that brings back bad memories.

Senator Stewart: Senator Corbin, would you prefer the KGB term "termination"?

Senator Corbin: What exactly do you mean by those words?

Senator Stewart: I will use Senator Murray's own terms: "abolition, termination, conclusion".

Senator Haidasz: Dissolution.

Senator Corbin: Do you mean putting the padlock on the doors?

Senator Stewart: I suspect it is rather more than that.

Senator Corbin: Speaker Charbonneau did put the key in the lock. Is that the sort of solution you are proposing?

Senator Stewart: I believe that Senator Murray had something far more dramatic than that in mind. The statement I referred to was made by Senator Murray before he became Leader of the Government in the Senate. On June 30, 1986 Senator Murray become Leader of the Government in the Senate. It cannot be said that he was either slow nor less than generous in enlightening the Senate on its proper role.

On June 26, 1986 the House of Commons passed Bill C-67, to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act. That bill had been introduced in the House of Commons a full year earlier on June 27, 1985. Second reading was on September 23, 1985. The committee reported on January 29, 1986. The report stage was completed on June 17, 1986. In other words, the bill was before the House of Commons for almost a full year. Clearly, it was not a top priority bill!

However, late in June of 1986 the bill suddenly became extremely important. The Solicitor General vibrated with urgency. According to him, only one thing was sure:

> . . . every further day of delay jeopardizes innocent people. When we continue to talk, it is their safety that is at risk.

That is taken from the House of Commons Debates, page 14647, June 18, 1986. The lives of Canadian women and children were in great danger.

Bill C-67 came to the Senate on June 27. It had been pre-studied. The government insisted that pre-study meant it should be rubber-stamped that very day. The Liberals refused to yield to "summer closure". The House of Commons adjourned for a long summer holiday.

On June 30 Senator Murray took over as Leader of the Government in the Senate. He had us back here on July 2, but he refused to give any assurance that if the bill was passed, with or without amendment, the House of Commons would be brought back for Royal Assent. Nevertheless, we were told repeatedly that unless the bill was passed by the Senate without amendment the people of Canada would be in grave peril. The Solicitor General went public:

> Every further day of delay jeopardizes innocent law-abiding citizens and Canadians across the country

That is taken from The Citizen of July 3, 1986.

It was in these circumstances that Senator Murray undertook to have a quiet, parental talk with senators on how they should do their work. At page 2810, leaving little doubt, he said:

> In modern times we have tried to influence the course of legislation and the course of public policy not by exercising to the full our theoretical Constitutional powers but by way of quiet diplomacy and by way of persuasion. It will be clear to my honourable friends opposite that in this case — and I am not really discussing the merits of the arguments put forward so passionately and eloquently by Senator Hastings — it is very clearly going to take a little longer to persuade, if they are going to persuade, the government and the other place as to what they regard as the wisdom of their position on this matter.
> It has been a very, very, long time since the Senate has attempted to exercise its full theoretical Constitutional powers on a matter of legislation, and I would hope that honourable senators would reflect over the lunch hour, and when my friends are meeting in caucus, on the modern role of the Senate, which is one, as I said, of quiet diplomacy. It is one of persuasion rather than resort to the majority in the Senate when the elected majority in the other place, after reflection, has taken a different position.

Later that day at page 2815 he drove home his point with authority. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, before the committee votes on this amendment, there are some things that I believe I should say to you as the Leader of the Government in this place. It has been a very long time since the Senate has taken the initiative to amend in any substantial way any important government bill coming to us from the House of Commons. The last occasion of that kind that I can recall took place during the days of the Diefenbaker government when a customs and excise bill was amended by the Liberal majority in the Senate. The fate of the customs and excise bill was that when it returned to the government, the government chose not to proceed to re-introduce it as amended into the House of Commons. It chose not to do so, I surmise, precisely in order to avoid a confrontation between the two houses of Parliament, the majority in the House of Commons having passed the bill some time previously. I do not know, none of us knows what will happen to this bill if the Senate takes it upon itself to amend it, although I must say that I suspect that it will have the same fate as the customs and excise bill. I think we have to ask ourselves at what risk we may be taking this quite unusual step. If we pass an amendment to this bill, what are the implications?
> First, there is at least a potential danger to the public safety. I am not familiar, nor do I believe that many senators, with the individual cases of inmates that will come up in the next little while for release in the absence of this new law.

For greater certainty, he resorted at pages 2816 and 2817 to repetition:

> Honourable senators, as I say, I believe that substantively we are running some risk only to our own reputation in putting the government and the other place in the position where this bill will not have been passed by Parliament before the summer adjournment. I also ask you, honourable senators, to consider and reflect on what it does to the Senate if we take this unusual step of amending a government bill that has come to us from the House of Commons. As I have said, it has been some considerable time since the Senate has done that. There is no question about its constitutional powers; they are there. However, it has been more than 40 years, I believe, since the Senate has defeated a bill.
> As I said this morning, that is not the way we have proceeded in this place in modern times. We have not proceeded by way of bringing in important amendments to government bills from the House of Commons. We have not proceeded by way of defeating bills; we have relied on quiet diplomacy and on persuasion.

Then, just in case some senator might have lingering doubts about the direction of his thought, Senator Murray, at page 2818, summed up and said:

> I ask honourable senators, before they vote in this committee on this amendment, to respect the limitations that we have placed on ourselves as a legislative body in modern times. Honourable senators know what I mean. I ask honourable senators to stay on the path of moderation, conciliation, quiet diplomacy, persuasion and of common sense in the Senate's relations with the members of the other chamber, and with the majority of the members of the other chamber. I ask honourable senators to stay on the path that has been so productive in the past for the political and legislative process of this country. I ask honourable senators not to put the Senate in the position of appearing to be casual about matters where there is a potential danger to public safety.
> Senator Frith: The government will be in that position, not the Senate.
>
> Senator Murray: I ask honourable senators, finally, not to run the risk of an unnecessary confrontation with the members of the elected House of Commons. I ask honourable senators to defeat this amendment.

The new government leader knew the proper role of the Senate. His way was the right way. He intended to make his way prevail.

Last Wednesday Senator Castonguay did not neglect to blame the Liberals for the Meech Lake fiasco. The failure of Meech Lake, he said—and this may be found in the Debates at page 4002—was engineered by the federal Liberals. Well, let me tell Senator Castonguay something. The Meech Lake Accord failed because the terms of the accord were defective, as the Charest Committee found unanimously. The Meech Lake Accord failed because the accord was pushed through the House of Commons and through several provincial legislatures by a process Canadians found unacceptable. It may be tolerable for the first ministers to make seamless-web deals over federal-provincial fiscal arrangements and the like, and then to put them into law by exerting party discipline. But when that approach—what has been called by some the responsible government approach, but what more properly could be called the autocratic government approach—is applied to constitutional reform, many Canadians find the process illegitimate. Senator Castonguay comes from Quebec. Perhaps, therefore, it is understandable that he should view the accord and its failure chiefly from a Quebec viewpoint. But let me tell him that even if there had been nothing in the accord about Quebec as a distinct society, the accord was on rough seas in Nova Scotia. The most commonly heard objections had nothing to do with the distinct society clause. The objections heard there related to the fisheries jurisdiction question and to the provisions concerning new shared-cost programs.

● (1100)

A third reason for the failure of the accord was the Progressive Conservative attitude that the accord was, as they said, "a done deal"—a deal not to be explained or even seriously defended. Let Senator Castonguay examine the work of the Senate on the Accord. He will see immediately what I mean.

[Senator Stewart.]

In June, 1987, Senator Murray held—and this is found in the Debates at page 1200—that the Senate ought not to be so bold as to presume to make its own examination of the Meech Lake Accord. But we were recalcitrant. The accord was sent to the Committee of the Whole Senate.

Many important, thoughtful witnesses appeared before the Senate to help us study the implications of the accord. Senator Murray and his senatorial colleagues virtually opted out. They declined to ask witnesses favouring the accord to appear here. They absented themselves or sat sullenly silent as the witnesses testified. The Meech Lake Accord was a "done deal." When Mr. Trudeau appeared on March 30, 1988, only Senators Tremblay and Ottenheimer deigned to speak to him. When Mr. A.W. Johnson appeared on March 16, 1988, he was virtually ignored by Progressive Conservative senators. When the excellent witnesses from the Canadian Nurses Association appeared, they, too, got the silent treatment. The accord was just perfect. It was so perfect that even to discuss and question—indeed, even to defend—its ramifications would have been sacriligious. Senator Murray and his allies were the advocates—the silent advocates—for the Meech Lake Accord. It was an astonishing performance, one that a party led in the Senate by Senator Castonguay would never have thought of putting on.

In October 1987, Senator Murray—and this is found in the Debates on pages 2060 to 2062—dismissed the use of "free conferences" as a means of reconciling the views of the Senate and the House of Commons. Free conferences, he told us, are a nineteenth-century procedure. They have been left behind in the dust of history. Nevertheless, as late as 1906 the House of Commons had made provision for the first time for free conferences. Yet Senator Murray dismisses free conferences as a nineteenth-century procedure. Why? Because they pre-suppose that the Senate has some legitimacy as a legislative body. Again he repeated his recommendation for quiet lobbying. We heard his declaration here this very day that, now that the Progressive Conservatives have a majority in the Senate, the quiet lobbying known as pre-study is to be reinstated.

On June 29, 1987, when Bill C-19, the motor vehicle transport bill was at the second reading stage, a revealing discussion of the implications of pre-study took place. Bill C-19 had come up from the House of Commons on June 25. Both Senator Doody and Senator Finlay MacDonald took the position that, because the Senate had not pre-studied Bill C-19—which was accompanied by Bill C-18, another transport bill—it ought not to be sent to a committee after second reading. In other words: "pre-study or no study!" That was the choice with which Senator Murray confronted the Senate.

The following exchange, which can be found in the Debates at page 1484, took place:

> Senator Frith: Perhaps Senator MacDonald still does not understand the implication of what he said. The two things we have put together now is: It is too bad we did not have the chance to hear these comments on a pre-study of this bill. Then, when I asked him if he is going to move that the bill be referred to the committee for study, as is usual after second reading, he said, no, that he is not going to.

I take it his position is that because we did not pre-study the bill, it would not go to the committee now for study.

Senator MacDonald: My position, Senator Frith, is quite clear. I consider that this bill has received an enormous amount of attention by the Transport Committee in the other house.

Senator Frith: So, we should not bother with it now.

Senator MacDonald: They have travelled the country extensively. All the provinces have been involved. Amendments have been considered. Hundreds of witnesses have been heard.

I have acquainted myself as best I can with the bill, and I am quite confident that it is a good bill. I have no intention of referring it to committee. However, be my guest.

Senator MacDonald argued that it was a new policy for committees to stand idle when they could be pre-studying bills. To this Senator Frith—at page 1485—replied:

Senator MacDonald is talking about a so-called new policy in which we do not always pre-study a bill simply because there is a request for such a pre-study.

Senator MacDonald: Right!

Senator Frith: What is new is to suggest that it is normal for us to pre-study a bill. The normal legislative process is for a bill starting in the House of Commons to be studied in the House of Commons, according to their rules, to come here, to be given first reading, to be given second reading, on the basis of principle, and then to be referred to a committee for study. That is the usual process; that is not new. So there is nothing new about saying that committees should not automatically pre-study. But there is certainly something brand new in the suggestion that if they did not then the mover of the bill will not send it to the committee, and the committees will be told, "Sorry, you had your chance to pre-study." Well, pre-study is an exceptional and special procedure.

And so it goes, on and on. Senator Doody entered the discussion, as did Senator Frith again. The government eventually refused to move that Bill C-18 be sent to a committee after second reading. The same was true in the case of Bill C-19. In other words, because there had been no pre-study they were prepared to refuse to move the bill forward for the next stage of the legislative process.

We know what went on. Senator Murray had managed to convince the new chairman of the Committee on Transport and Communications. One can imagine the conversation that took place. "I tell you, Finlay, pre-study really works. By a little quiet lobbying we get all the improvements we want. Then we rubber-stamp a big batch of bills on the very last day. After that it is Royal Assent and we're away to Ingonish, Chester, Bayfield, or wherever. It's just a grand system, I tell you. It never interrupts our summer holidays." But what Senator Murray was very careful not to tell Senator Macdonald is that the quiet, down-the-back corridor-lobbying has a chance of working only if the right to amend bills remains alive. Give up the right to amend bills and ministers and bureaucrats will give senators the back of their hands.

On September 9, 1988, Senator Murray gave what may be regarded as the definitive account of the relationship of the Senate to the House of Commons. At page 4352—and I delete certain interruptions—he said:

What I have been trying to explain to my friends opposite over the past few days and, indeed, throughout the life of the present Parliament is that the modern convention governing the conduct of this appointed body are that we debate . . . we deliberate and we draw the attention of the other place—and I suppose indirectly of the Canadian public, while we are not representative of them—to any imperfections we believe exist in the bill, and then we accede to the wishes of the elected representatives of the people . . .

There is a proper role for this body, even as it exists. That role has evolved in modern times. I ask honourable senators only to respect and to honour that role for an appointed body in Canadian parliamentary democracy in modern times.

On September 15, 1988, during the debate on Bill C-130 to implement the Free Trade Agreement, Senator Murray argued that the agreement ought not to be exposed to the people in an election. He said: "Honourable senators, the present disagreement between us about the role of the Senate is fundamental and sooner or later will have to be resolved or there will be a crisis in this country." That is found in the Debates at page 4443. Again and again Senator Murray quailed at the thought of controversy and confrontation.

He then proceeded to tell us once again—truly we were a slow lot—the proper role of the Senate: Senators should busy themselves in pre-study. He then explained the origin of pre-study.

● (1115)

Then, on legislation, they struck a compromise, and the compromise was the technique to pre-study, which has now been abandoned for purely partisan reasons by my friends opposite. It was the Hayden formula. It bears the name of one of our most illustrious former senators.

Senator Frith: That was not the Hayden formula.

Senator Murray: It was a matter of detailed pre-study of legislation and what I have called in this House, on previous occasions, quiet diplomacy on the part of the Senate. That process persuaded numerous ministers of the Crown to make many changes, improvements and amendments to bills before they left the House of Commons.

Now, I say to the Senate that that process of pre-study effected far more changes, far more improvements, in public policy and in legislation than the confrontational and partisan attitude of the present Liberal majority in this chamber.

There we have it. I speak largely to the new senators when I say that there was a fundamental difference as to what the proper role of the Senate in legislation is. As Senator Murray believed, as he still believes and as he said here this morning, the proper role of the Senate is pre-study. A bill is introduced in the House of Commons. The bill, notwithstanding that it has not formally come to us, is sent to a committee where a pre-study is made. We slip down the back corridor. We talk to the minister. We hope that the minister will accept an amendment or two. Some of the descriptions of these seances between ministers and Senator Hayden are really quite hilarious. Senator Hayden was quite ready to use the constitutional powers of the Senate to get his way. He would say something to the effect, "If you do not, Mr. Minister, make the amendment, then I doubt very much that the bill will ever be reported out of my committee." I remember the Honourable Don Macdonald turning all hot and red-faced from what one might call a parliamentary ultimatum delivered by Senator Hayden.

That is one approach. But that has not been an approach that has recommended itself since 1984 to Liberal senators. My view, and one which is shared by many Liberal senators, is that if we are going to participate in the legislative process, and if we are going to amend bills, then we have to do it up front. We have to be prepared to carry our amendments down the front corridor and hope that they will recommend themselves to the people in the other place.

The pre-study technique tends to convert the Senate into a lobby. Once we become a lobby we are open to the accusation that we are a lobby for special interests. The specific allegation has been that the Senate, through its Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, became a lobby for business interests, primarily financial interests.

Honourable senators, I do not think that that is an accusation under which we can survive. If that accusation is going to be purveyed to the country, as it has been in textbook after textbook after textbook, then it would be better that this place were abolished.

There is a very fundamental difference between Senator Murray and many Liberal senators as to the role of the Senate in legislation. That difference is one of the subterranean differences which underlie our differences with regard to Bill C-62. The pressure has been all building up, honourable senators, and now it erupts over Bill C-62.

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator allow a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator Grafstein.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Stewart has raised an important point of public and parliamentary policy. That is to say, the difference between efficiency and effectiveness, on the one hand, through the legislative process of the Senate utilizing the Hayden pre-study approach and, on the other hand, public credibility. I am not sure honourable senators would agree with your conclusion that would lead one to accept one position or the other and that, if one does not follow the open legislative process, it will ultimately lead to the abolition of the Senate. I am not sure the Canadian public would necessarily agree with the inexorable conclusion you have drawn.

I am more interested in the proposition that the Senate should not be a place where special interests—and of course it depends on how one defines "special interests"—should be able to have a thoughtful place to determine views, or to have them put forward. Since being appointed to the Senate I have found that if you examine the legislative process in the other place it has been marked by carelessness, arbitrariness and, rarely, thoughtfulness. It has been not only instigated by narrow partisanship, but even the more thoughtful members in the other place, of which there are many, have been swept up in the argument made my Senator Molson, that narrow partisanship defeats good law. That is the argument that is being made for effectiveness and efficiency on this side, as opposed to the transparency for public credibility on the other side.

What I am most interested in is the role of the parliamentary process itself. One can argue with various philosophies as they apply to the parliamentary process. However, my deeper concern, and I suppose it is the same for many honourable senators as we have sat here lo these many days, is what in fact is the appropriate role of the parliamentary process? Is it to flush laws through, as we have seen, without examining the cost of those laws? In this way the public understands that laws are being passed, but that there is a cost attached to every law that is passed. Is it that laws should only be passed if there is wide acceptability of those laws? Is it that laws should only be passed if they are laws that can be respected or, at least, understood?

Honourable senators, I am more interested in the deeper question. What is the purpose of the parliamentary process? Are we wasting our time here? Are we doing things that we think are inefficient or ineffective? I know that frustration is very deep in this House on all sides. That is so since many of us come here with the great expectation, one which I think is honourable, that we are going to make a meaningful contribution to public life through the public process. Yet, somehow, we have to take that lofty ambition, that all senators share, and cram it into the narrow crevice called the legislative process. Somehow, our laudable ambitions are so diluted that at the end of the tunnel we have lost our original goals. I think it was Bismarck who once said that laws are like sausages, they should not be examined while they are being made. That is somewhat like Senator Molson's position. He says that it is better to do all this in the back room, privately, quietly and out of the glare of publicity without embarrassing—and this I think is his major argument—the elected side and causing them have to lose face. We end up with this curious premise that we all know that laws should be improved, yet we cannot improve those laws because the proponents of those laws might lose face in the democratic process. This, it seems to me, is a perversion of the democratic process.

There is a philosophic point that has eluded me since I have become a member of this place. It is how to balance, on the one hand, a strong partisan and political view which is not shared by members opposite with, on the other hand, those laws which members opposite feel as strongly about as I in that they need renovation and improvement.

I would be very interested to hear from Senator Stewart, not so much about the narrow differences that divide this House in terms of the legislative process—and they may not be so narrow—but about the philosophic difference. With which philosophical approach should we arm ourselves if we wish to promote what we consider to be the public interest? I find that in this place more often than not the public interest gets lost, lost not just on this side of the house but on both sides. I am not suggesting that there is fault on either side but that in the process we lose sight of why we are here. An argument has been made by some great American thinkers that there is only one way to have a truly democratic process. It is not neat; it is messy, careless and negligent. However, the only way a democratic process can be shaped is through conflicting with and contesting different views.

For example take the current leadership in China. There is a deep philosophic difference between the so-called economic reformers and the Maoists. The Maoists say that the only way life can improve is through struggle and conflict. The reformers say that the only way progress can be made is by quiet, thoughtful and careful accommodation. That particular philosophic debate, under different circumstances, pervades this place.

Honourable senators, the one thing we do know is that today the public is fed up with politicians of all stripes. There is absolutely no question that people are turning away from politics. There is absolutely no question that in my mind people no longer respect political institutions or authority. What rather bothers me is when, over and over again, members opposite use what Freud says was a very nasty piece of public psychology. It is to transfer or project all the ills of a society on to somebody else, rarely accepting for themselves that responsibility.

The one issue that has bothered me more than anything else since I came to this place is how politicians of all stripes, and in particular this government, tend to blame all the ills of society on the predecessor government. For example, Mr. Trudeau is alive and well in this place because almost weekly we hear members opposite condemn Mr. Trudeau for all the terrible things he has done to our to society. I thought he did a few good things, but six-and-a-half years or seven years later, it is still Mr. Trudeau who seems to be nagging at the innards of members opposite and who is being blamed for all the economic ills we face, as if the Conservatives have had no responsibility in between and were not elected through two elections.

• (1130)

Just yesterday, or the day before, we had the Prime Minister of the country blaming Mr. Chrétien for the constitutional ills of the country. Therefore, honourable senators, I would be interested in Senator Stewart addressing the philosophic issue of the very role of the Senate and its processes.

Senator Stewart: Senator Grafstein, it is a most interesting question. I doubt, however, that I can give a satisfactory answer in the short time that is available to me.

Senator David: How long do you have?

Senator Stewart: I do not have any holiday reservations. However, let me say a couple of things. I understand the kind of frustration that members of the House of Commons feel. They arrive in the House of Commons and they think of themselves as legislators, but very soon they are told by their party Whip that they also serve who only stand and vote.

Senator Turner: Whips are terrible.

Senator Stewart: Senator Turner, who now speaks in confession, just said that Whips are terrible.

Senator Fairbairn: He ought to know.

Senator Stewart: One of the things that causes frustration, I suspect, is the fact that the first time members of the other place have a real opportunity to get into a bill is at the committee stage, which comes after second reading. By the time a bill has passed the second-reading stage, the government has nailed its flag to the mast and very often the opposition has done exactly the same thing. I think this insistence on having second reading on government bills before the bill can be studied in a committee of the House of Commons is a big mistake.

The tradition of having a second reading before committee consideration goes back a long, long way. Its purpose was to have the house decide whether a bill was one on which the house wished to invest the time and energy of its members. This procedure was developed in a period when most public bills were private members' public bills and the House, in a sense, had to separate the sheep from the goats. Nowadays, as we all know, most public bills are government bills. They are all to be taken seriously. That sorting out by vote at second reading is no longer necessary.

Ministers would be much more ready to hear the views of backbenchers if the government had not, as I said, already nailed its flag to the mast. Mind you, the bureaucrats might not like this change. Many bills are the dream children of bureaucrats. They say to unsuspecting ministers, "Mr. Minister, if you really want to make an impact on the future of this country, take this bill."

Senator Fairbairn: Like the GST.

Senator Stewart: I do not know about the GST, but that could well be the case. So the poor minister takes the bill. The government is committed to it on second reading, then it goes to committee and the troubles are discovered. Therefore, I have no hope, given the power of the unelected bureaucrats around Ottawa—and their power is nothing new—that a suggestion for a change in the legislative process that would make their bills more vulnerable to the views of ministers and backbenchers will ever be accepted. Bureaucrats will fight that to the very last.

That is one way, however, in which an improvement could be made. But I want to come back to the point with which Senator Grafstein started. I do not think there is any question, Senator Grafstein, but that interests have a right to be heard on bills which are to affect them. It is true, and we have to concede, that the big and the well-organized find it easier to make their interests known. Nevertheless, that is not a bar against being heard. It is true that interests ought to be heard in public by parliamentarians acting officially and that there ought to be a public record. When a committee such as Banking, Trade and Commerce decides that the bill should be amended, the amendment should be done in a formal way and the amendment should go down to the House of Commons by the front corridor.

There are real dangers in reverting to pre-study. What happens is that someone is appointed to the Senate who, let us say, is a great authority on banking and finance. I believe it is fair to assume that he or she is not going to seek a place on the fisheries committee. Banking, Trade and Commerce will be the natural place for such a person, no question about that. It is beneficial to the country that the expertise of such a person should be drawn upon, but it must be drawn upon in public. Otherwise, perfectly innocent people, the members of the committee, will be accused of exercising secret power. Perhaps sometimes they will, even if unwittingly.

When Senator Murray said with high glee here this morning, "The once and future pre-study is with us again", I must say I found the porspect depressing. I do hope that he will reconsider.

Honourable senators, I mentioned tht the adversarial relationship between the government and the Senate, which has prevailed since 1984, has been even more fundamental than the adversarial relationship which historians tell us happened after 1896, 1911, and so on. Let me set out another cause. This cause is the Mulroney government's casual attitude towards parliamentary control of public money.

We believe that the Mulroney government showed little respect for the principles of constitutional government and little regard for constitutional principles deeply rooted in history. New senators will find as they review the record that this is the field on which the hottest battles of the past six years have been fought.

It all began with Bill C-11 in 1985. On December 21, 1984, the House of Commons passed Bill C-11, an act to provide borrowing authority. The bill comprised two parts. One sought borrowing authority to borrow $7.3 billion in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, but authority to borrow $2 billion of that total could carry over into the 1985-86 fiscal year. In other words the authority to borrow $2 billion would not lapse on March 31, 1985. Part II of the bill sought authority to borrow $12 billion in the next fiscal year, the year to begin six months later on April 1, 1985. It sought authority to borrow $6 billion in the next fiscal year, beginning April 12, 1985

[Senator Stewart.]

In order to get away in good time for the Christmas holidays, the parties in the House of Commons made a deal to pass Bill C-11 quickly. They agreed to an order moved by the government house leader, the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, relating to the treatment of the bill in their own House. That agreement was made on December 21, 1984. It provided that one member from each party would be permitted to speak for 20 minutes and that no other members would be permitted to speak longer than 10 minutes. It provided that no later than 3.55 o'clock p.m. that day, the bill, through a motion for second reading and reference to Committee of the Whole, could be deemed to have been adopted. They were not even going to bother to vote on it. The house would then immediately proceed to consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole.

They agreed by that special order, that during consideration of the bill, a minister of the Crown would move a certain amendment. All that appears in the Commons Debates at page 1448. Having given the bill such hasty treatment, the House of Commons whipped it through and then, with effusive expressions of great joy and good will, the members departed for their Christmas holidays.

The Progressive Conservative view of the proper reaction of Parliament to bills such as Bill C-11 had been pronounced by the Honourable Michael Wilson on July 20, 1982, when the house was dealing with a Liberal borrowing authority bill. He said:

> There is a well established principle that Parliament only provides sufficient borrowing authority to a government to allow it to finance its operations within the current fiscal year.

That is in the Commons Debates at page 19513.

● (1145)

What was Mr. Wilson denouncing in 1982? He was denouncing the provision in Bill C-125 then before Parliament, that part of the borrowing authority would not lapse on March 31, 1983.

The Right Honourable Joe Clark moved to amend the motion for the second reading of Bill C-125. He asked the House of Commons to resolve that:

> —this House holds the opinion that the granting of an authority for the borrowing of a sum greater than that amount which is required to meet the government's needs to the end of the current fiscal year is objectionable in principle—

That can be found at page 19456 of the Debates of the House of Commons.

Apply that principle to Bill C-11.

Senator Frith: This is the "Wilson principle".

Senator Stewart: If we apply the "Wilson principle" or the "Progressive Conservative principle", as enunciated by both Mr. Wilson and by Mr. Clark, to Bill C-11, and you will find that neither part—neither Part I, by reason of the non-lapsing provision, nor Part II, which was all for the next fiscal year—is acceptable. Both Part I and Part II of Bill C-11 offended against the "Progressive Conservative principle".

Of course, the high principle Mr. Wilson had solemnly proclaimed in 1982 was completely forgotten by him in 1984 and in 1985.

When Bill C-11 came to this house in January of 1985, Liberal senators raised no objection against Part I. Although that part contained a non-lapsing provision, they did not object. Part I, they said, could pass immediately. However, they contended that it would be constitutionally improper to authorize borrowing for the fiscal year beginning on April 1 before the government had presented its spending plans for 1985-86. They proposed that the problem could be solved without any difficulty by simply splitting the bill. Part I would then be passed forthwith. Part II, everybody anticipated, would pass without delay just as soon as the 1985-86 Estimates had been presented to Parliament. It would pass weeks before April 1.

This sensible proposal was rejected out of hand by the government. Why? To accept the proposal would be to admit that, in the case of money bills, the Senate has a right to do anything other than to rubber stamp them. The Mulroney government refused to do what the Trudeau government had done with a similar two-part borrowing authority bill in 1978-79. The Mulroney government refused to split the bill. The Senate had no right even to propose such a step.

That was the New Democratic Party position. That was the Prime Minister's position. On February 13, 1985, he wrote to the Leader of the Opposition as follows:

> It is clear that the Senate is approaching Bill C-11, an Act to provide Borrowing Authority, in a manner which is wholly unacceptable.
> The issue is not only that the Senate is obstructing the government's debt management programme to the detriment of Canadian taxpayers. The most important principle is that the Senate, a non-elected body, is subverting an Order of the House of Commons, which was agreed to by all parties. And finally, the action in the Senate directly contradicts the position you expressed as follows:
>
> > I said this morning to the members of the media that I recognize the primacy of the elected House of Commons over the Senate. That is my position, it has always been my position and the right honourable gentleman knows it.

Mr. Mulroney's letter then continues as follows:

> Bill C-11 was sent to the Senate on December 21, 1984, and has been before the National Finance Committee of that House since January 23, 1985, for an unprecedented number of hearings.
> The Liberal members of the Senate have voted down the motion to report and pass the Bill unamended.

After referring to the financial consequences of not having Part I passed immediately, Mr. Mulroney wrote:

> But let me return to my principal point. The Senate, a non-elected body, is thwarting the will of the House of Commons. This Bill was not forced through the House by the use of our majority. It passed following an all-party agreement that had passed the scrutiny and approval of your Caucus.

Mr. Mulroney argued that the fact that Part I of Bill C-11 had not been passed was costing the public millions of dollars. Let me again quote from his letter:

> The financial implications for Canadians are serious. The existing Borrowing Authority is now used up. This has generated uncertainty in the capital markets which is not at all helpful in view of the current weakness in the Canadian dollar. You, as a former Prime Minister, and former Finance Minister, should have a clear understanding of the impact that this delay has on the financial market.

He then goes on to spell out the millions of dollars that were being lost by reason of the fact that the bill had not been passed by the Senate immediately.

The interesting thing, honourable senators, is that the Liberal-dominated Senate was quite prepared to pass Part I of the bill immediately. It was quite prepared to pass Part II of the bill just as soon as the Estimates had been tabled, assuming, of course, there was nothing quite unexpected in the Estimates. However, so adamant was the Prime Minister against the notion of even a suggestion from the Liberal senators that the bill should be divided—so closed was his mind to such a suggestion—that he said that the principle that the Senate may not touch such a bill was so sacred that the government was quite prepared to let the Canadian taxpayers lose millions of dollars.

I believe, Senator Poitras, what was talked about was $15 million, $16 million or $17 million.

When Mr. Wilson came over to talk to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, he had forgotten all about the principles that earlier had been so important. He was white with righteous indignation. He came to the committee like a prophet of old to denounce senators for their great wickedness.

Did the Senate have any right to refuse to vote borrowing authority for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1985 until after the spending estimates for that fiscal year had been tabled on February 26, 1985? Senator Eugene Forsey, a man whom Prime Minister Mulroney loves to quote, thought that the Senate's position was correct. The following is what Senator Forsey wrote to the Globe and Mail on March 13, 1985:

> Amid all the tumult and shouting over the Senate's action on the borrowing bill, it may not be out of place to take notice of a few simple facts.
>
> Did the Senate throw out the bill? It did not. Did it pass an amendment which the House of Commons would not accept? It did not. Was it ready to pass the part of the bill which dealt with the present fiscal year? It was.
> What did it do? It insisted on the centuries-old principle that the Crown does not get money until it has told > Parliament how it intends to spend it. The Senate insisted on getting information to which the country was entitled. The House of Commons having failed to insist on that information, the Senate had to insist on Parliament's, and the country's right to have it.

> Having got the information, the Senate passed the bill.

One result of the battle over the Borrowing Authority Bill was to reveal that Prime Minister Mulroney and his followers had come very close to adopting the old CCF-NDP position on the Senate. Perhaps we could call it the "Progressive-Socialist" position. If senators doubt what I say, they should look at an exchange which took place in the House of Commons on February 25, 1985. There the Honourable Edward Broadbent referred to Bill C-11. He asked the Deputy Prime Minister the question:

> He is aware that the Senate is blocking passage of a Bill that has already been passed by the House of Commons. Considering that this action, by an undemocratic body that is responsible to no one, is costing Canadians millions of dollars, will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us what the Government plans to do about this deplorable situation?

After an intervention by the Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister, the Honourable Erik Nielsen replied:

> It seems to me that the Leader of the New Democratic Party makes a good point. Perhaps the Senate would be fulfilling a far more fruitful role if it examined and acted upon the report of the Senate Committee on Reform rather than holding up the legislation as the Senate is doing now on the borrowing measure passed by this House.

Mr. Broadbent then proceeded to ask if the government was considering the abolition of ". . . this happy hunting home for former Liberal hacks".

Senator Roblin: Oh, that is a bit steep.

Senator Stewart: We then have a comment by the Government House Leader, one Ray Hnatyshyn, who said:

> . . . once in awhile we very much appreciate suggestions made by members of the New Democratic Party.

That is the present Governor General's view of the Senate.

Honourable senators, I could document the coincidence between the views of the New Democratic Party and the present government in the House of Commons at considerable length.

Senator Corbin: Why don't you?

Senator Stewart: I think that for the benefit of honourable senators opposite, who are displaying such keen interest in this matter it is probably sufficient to have given them, as I have, the page references in the Hansard of the House of Commons. I know now there will be a great rush on the books in the library.

As I said, one result of the battle over the Borrowing Authority Bill in 1985 was to show that the New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservatives are agreed in believing that the Senate has no role with regard to bills such as the borrowing authority bill; only the House of Commons is legitimate.

• (1200)

From this they drew rather different conclusions about the future of the Senate. The NDP, always fearful of what the Senate might do to socialist legislation, cried "Abolish the Senate. It's simply a patronage club. As members of the New Democratic Party we always decry patronage." That was Mr. Brodbent's stand while he was in the House of Commons.

Senator Fairbairn: I should like to ask Senator Stewart a question. Those are very interesting quotes that you are reading at the moment. They are quotes that all of us were familiar with at the time and, indeed, over a great period of years.

Could you tell us how you can justify the outstanding shift that has taken place in the New Democratic Party, as expressed in a quote that I read last night from Alexa McDonough, the Leader of the New Democratic Party in Nova Scotia, about their new-found support and zeal for the actions of the Senate as it has been fighting against the GST? There is an about face in the comments that you were reading about the abolition and what we are not permitted to do vis-a-vis the borrowing authority. Suddenly, we have a major tax that is overturning the whole system in the country and some of our strongest allies across the country are the New Democratic Party.

Senator Stewart: Thank you, honourable senator. The reaction of the Liberal senators to Bill C-62 since we returned at the end of the summer has been of some embarrassment to the New Democratic Party. They love to recall the fact that the bill passed the Liberal-dominated Senate at second reading with no trouble at all.

On the other hand, they say that they themselves are against Bill C-62, which presumably would lead them to ask Liberal senators to redouble their efforts to defeat the bill. It is fair to say that, for a time, members of the New Democratic Party felt that the Liberal opposition to this bill was a faked opposition. However, I have not heard that lately. I think they now believe, as we do, that this is a bad bill at a bad time. I do not know that any of the federal NDP members, such as Nelson Riis, would admit that, but I think that Alexa McDonough believes that.

Politicians live on hope. Since the Ontario election, the federal New Democratic Party has been swallowing hope by the gallon. They imagine that they are going to win the next federal election. It may be that some of them want Bill C-62 to pass because it will raise lots of new revenue. Mr. Wilson, of course, will no longer be minister, but his milk cow will be there.

Senator Simard: Are you going to appoint the next Minister of Finance?

Senator Stewart: Mr. Wilson will not be Minister of Finance.

Senator Simard: Will you be making the appointment?

Senator Stewart: No. Presumably the Leader of the New Democratic Party will appoint the Minister of Finance in a New Democratic Government. I am sure she would want to consult with you.

Senator Simard: Oh, come on!

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard did not have his shredded wheat this morning.

Senator Stewart: Senator Simard, don't you know that you are under strict instructions from Senator Murray to keep your trap shut? He will come in here and something unpleasant will happen to you if you are not careful.

Senator Frith: When the cat is away the mouse will play.

Senator Simard: Be careful now. There has been a change.

Senator Stewart: You are trying to terrorize me.

Senator Simard: That is right, all of you.

Senator Stewart: If the New Democratic Party forms the government, the milk cow will rpoduce buckets of rich milk for the most wonderful new socialist schemes. Senator Eyton will be just delighted.

Bill C-11 served to establish a pattern followed again and again during the years after 1985.

The first feature of that pattern is insistence by the government that the Senate may not amend tax or appropriation bills.

The second feature is a billingsgate attack by Prime Minister Mulroney on senators.

The third is hectoring admonition by Senator Murray: "Senators, behave yourselves. Be a discreet lobby. Avoid confrontation. Quail at the thought of Big Brian; otherwise he will swat you." Senator Murray gave the Senate the benefit of his considered opinion on February 20, 1985. For him the choice was simple: either Senators should limit their efforts to the pre-study of bills or prepare to be swatted out of existence.

I turn now, honourable senators, to a more recent episode, namely the reaction of the government to the protest by the Senate against the dangerous misuse of Governor General's Special Warrants in 1989. For the benefit of new senators, let me explain what special warrants are all about.

The revenue yielded by all taxes are deposited in the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That is required by the Constitution Act, 1867, in section 102. Then there are certain sections that authorize specified payments from the fund, such as the payment of the salary of the Governor General. Then we have the following general rule:

> 106. Subject to the several Payments by this Act charged on the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the same shall be appropriated by the Parliament of Canada for the Public Service.

That constitutional provision has been made more specific by section 26 of the Financial Administration Act.

> 26. Subject to the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, no payments shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund without the authority of Parliament.

The effect of these laws is that no money, except for the stated exceptions—such as the Governor General's salary—may be withdrawn from the Consolidated Revenue Fund except by parliamentary appropriation. By statute Parliament authorizes payments from the fund in specified amounts for specified purposes. Obviously, sometimes the amounts are defined not in dollars and cents but as the sums produced by prescribed calculations. That would be true, for example, with regard to the payments for old age security.

In the Constitution Act, 1867, we find two sections—section 53 and section 54—which are of great importance. Honourable senators new to this place will soon discover that these sections of the act are the most frequently cited in this house. Section 53 says:

> 53. Bills for appropriating any part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Section 54 says:

> 54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

There, then, we have the basic process by which payments from the Consolidated Revenue Fund are authorized.

First, a specific payment for a specified purpose is recommended to the House of Commons by the Governor General. In other words, there must be what is called a "Royal Recommendation."

Second, votes or clauses that appropriate money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund cannot originate in the Senate.

Third, no payment may be made from the Fund without the approval of Parliament—approval by the House of Commons, the Senate and the Queen.

In practice, Parliament ordinarily makes appropriations in two ways. For some payments authorization is given for more than one year, perhaps permanently. These are standing appropriations. They are described as "statutory."

For other payments authorization is given for only one fiscal year. If the government wishes to continue the payments, new authorization by Parliament must be sought. Estimates broken down into votes are sent by the Governor General to the House of Commons. After study in committee, all the votes in a set of Estimates approved by the House are gathered into a bill called a supply bill or an appropriation bill. It is with this latter type of bill—those bills that, when passed by the House of Commons and the Senate, allow the government to meet its annual expenses—that we are now concerned.

● (1215)

The voting of supply is fundamental to our Constitution. In Canada, unlike the United Kingdom, the main tax laws do not expire on prescribed dates. They continue in effect, and the revenues flow into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. As far as taxation is concerned, a government can get on without calling Parliament into session month after month, year after year. Nor does there have to be in Canada an annual provision for the army. In the United Kingdom it is illegal for the government to maintain a standing army in times of peace. The army is legalized for only five years at a time by the Army Act, and that act requires confirmation every year by an order of both the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

Thus the British Parliament keeps a very short leash on the executive government. In Canada, however, Parliament retains control of governments only by voting supply—that is, by appropriating money on an annual basis. The need for the government to come to Parliament for supply is fundamental to our Constitution; indeed, it would be hard to find a more basic principle of our Constitution. No government may make payments from the Consolidated Revenue Fund without the authority of Parliament.

But what happens if a payment is required while Parliament is not in session?

To meet the need for certain kinds of payments without specific prior authorization by Parliament, the votes of the Treasury Board include a vote for contingencies. That is Vote 5. The amount provided by Vote 5 in 1988-89 was $360 million.

Parliament has also provided for payments from the Consolidated Revenue Fund by special warrants signed by the Governor General. The basic provision now found in the Financial Administration Act goes back to 1867. It is interesting to note that in those days sessions of Parliament were short. In other words, during most of the year Parliament was not available to appropriate money. Honourable senators may be interested to know that in 1869 the session of the House of Commons comprised only 49 sittings; in 1870, 62 sittings; in 1871, 43 sittings; and in 1872, 46 sittings. Clearly, it was impossible to anticipate all the expenditure requirements for a full fiscal year. A government building might burn down. A lighthouse might be blown away. There might be an invasion. Remember that in those days there was great fear—and there was foundation for it—that the Fenians would come pouring across the border. In my part of the country we still can see swords used when men were training to fend off the Fenians in the 1860s.

Against the prospect of a sudden need for money, provision was made for the Governor General to sign special warrants that would permit the legal removal of money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund. That provision is now to be found in the Financial Administration Act.

When the Financial Administration Act was being modernized in 1952, it was provided that special warrants could be used even although Parliament was not between sessions. In other words, special warrants could be used even if Parliament had only been adjourned. A clause was added which provided that for the purposes of this section "Parliament shall be deemed to be not in session when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the accident happened or the other matter arose." The reason why the provision fpr Special Warrants, which would normally have applied only during prorogation—that is, between sessions—was extended to include periods when Parliament is adjourned, arose from the practice adopted during World War II. When the work planned for a session had been completed, Parliament was not prorogued; rather it simply adjourned. Thus it was readily available if, in the special circumstances of the great war, the government needed to have Parliament back. That is why this provision was included in the Financial Administration Act, namely, to make an adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the date the accident happened or the other matter arose, equivalent to a prorogation of Parliament.

In 1958 certain other changes were made in the act. Those changes again were intended to remove some of the archaic language. With those changes—some made in 1951, some made in 1958—we now have this section in the Financial Administration Act in its present form. I will now put this section before honourable senators. It is section 30(1). It states:

> Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made, the Governor in Council, upon the report of the Minister that there is no appropriation for the payment and the report of the appropriate Minister that the payment is urgently required for the public good, may, by order, direct the preparation of a special warrant to be signed by the Governor General authorizing the payment to be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.
> (2) A special warrant issued pursuant to this section shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed to be an appropriation for the fiscal year in which the warrant is issued.
>
> (3) Every warrant issued under this section shall be published in the Canada Gazette within 30 days after it is issued, and a statement showing all warrants issued under this section and the amounts of those warrants shall be laid by the President of the Treasury Board before the House of Commons within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session of Parliament.
>
> (4) Where a special warrant has been issued pursuant to this section, the amounts appropriated thereby shall be deemed to be included in and not to be in addition to the amounts appropriated by the Act of Parliament enacted next thereafter for granting to Her Majesty sums of money to defray expenses of the public service for a fiscal year.
> (5) For the purposes of this section, Parliament shall be deemed to be not in session when it is under adjournment sine die or to a day more than two weeks after the day the Governor in Council made the order directing the preparation of the special warrant.

How had special warrants been used before 1989? As I said earlier, they had been used, first, to make urgently required emergency payments when Parliament was not in session—that is, payments for which no appropriation had been made; and, second, to carry a government through the period when the House of Commons could not be called into session during and immediately after an election. Special warrants never had been used to enable a government to pay its ordinary bills between sessions of Parliament.

No longer can that be said. The Mulroney government used special warrants in 1989 to violate the basic principle of responsible government. Let me recount the facts very briefly. They are not in dispute.

Senator Simard: Not again.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard, is that an echo?

Senator Simard: That is an old story.

Senator Cools: No.

Senator Simard: I suppose you can do or say anything.

Senator Stewart: I can well understand why Senator Simard is so interested. He is a man deeply learned in financial matters. He is also very interested in the sound constitutional governent.

Senator Cools: Whatever gave you that impression?

Senator Stewart: I do not think any honourable senator would question either of those propositions. Senator Simard has gone over this material so frequently that—

Senator Simard: We do not have to go over it again.

Senator Stewart: That is right. But, Senator Simard, be generous, please. We have new senators here. As you will recall, when I started my brief remarks earlier today I said that I would be addressing chiefly the new senators, because I recognized that a senator such as yourself—

Senator Simard: You are discriminating against us.

Senator Stewart: No; there is no question of discrimination. It is simply the fact that we have new senators here who are not familiar with the background of the crisis that confronts us over Bill C-62.

Senator Simard: But you had that background.

Senator Stewart: I am trying to do my bit. I hope that you will not be so lazy as not to do yours.

Senator Simard: Carry on, then.

Senator Stewart: After the election of November 21, 1988, the government met in Parliament on December 12. On December 16, the government tabled Supplementary Estimates B for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1989. On December 28, 1988, the government adjourned the House of Commons to March 6, 1989, without having made the slightest effort to have the moneys sought in those estimates appropriated by Parliament. Then on February 28, the government had Parliament prorogued. The government needed vast sums of money. It had decided that it could take it from the Consolidated Revenue Fund without ever coming to Parliament.

How did it get those billions of dollars? First, it used up all the money available in Treasury Board Vote 5, the contingency vote.

• (1230)

Then it began to use special warrants under section 30 of the Financial Administration Act. Billions and billions were taken in that way. The government had found that it really had no need for Parliament. Indeed, life was far simpler if Parliament was not in session.

When asked if there was any limit on the amount the government could take from the Consolidated Revenue Fund by special warrants, the President of the Treasury Board, the Honourable Robert de Cotret, replied in the negative. There was, there is, no limit whatsoever. That reply appears in the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance of May 3, 1989, at page 17.

Senator Cools: I think I asked that question, did I not, Senator Stewart?

Senator Stewart: You certainly did, Senator.

When he was asked if every payment for which parliamentary appropriation normally is sought through estimates is a payment "urgently required for the public good", that is, is a payment that can be made by special warrant, his reply was again in the affirmative. At that point, to assure absolute certainty as to the government's position, questions were asked about particular payments that had been made by special warrant. One payment had been made for a survey of the shrubs at 24 Sussex Drive. That transaction had been described by the Prime Minister himself as "stupid." Nevertheless, his ministers certified that that payment was "urgently required for the public good", and so advised the Governor General.

The position of the Progressive Conservatives is that every payment a government proposes to make is a payment "urgently required for the public good" and thus can be made by special warrant.

Both Mr. de Cotret and Senator Murray were anxious to insist that special warrants cannot be used if Parliament is sitting. That explained why the government had Parliament, which was to have come back on March 6, prorogued on February 28. If Parliament had come back, the billions could not have been taken by special warrants.

The government's position is clear: "Provided we keep Parliament from sitting, we can spend any amount for any purpose we like".

Mr. Robert de Cotret was reminded that the Prime Minister need not have Parliament sit more than one day a year. The Constitution Act, 1982 states:

> 5. There shall be a sitting of Parliament and each legislature at least once every twelve months.

That provision replaced section 20 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

Ultimately, as I have said, in Canada the only practical requirement for sessions longer than one day is the government's need for supply. But the Mulroney government's position is that it can take all the money it needs by special warrants. It does not need supply voted by Parliament. Mr. de Cotret was asked if it is the view of the Mulroney government that it would be legal for it to carry on month after month, year after year, without ever coming to Parliament for supply. His reply was that such a course of action would be legal. His reply is to be found in the Proceedings of the National Finance Committee at page l:25.

So there we have it. The Mulroney government holds that it has the right to use special warrants to withdraw money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund for any purpose that ordinarily would be provided for by a vote in an Appropriation Act. The only restriction is that it must not make the mistake of having Parliament in session. That position was stubbornly defended in the Senate by Senator Murray on Tuesday, May 16, 1989.

After the whole matter of the use of special warrants in 1990 had been explored, Senator Eugene Forsey—the man who Mr. Mulroney loves to quote—was asked what remedy he was recommending. He replied:

> I think I am simply recommending that if ever there was a case for sober second thought this is it. If ever there was a case where the rights of the people have been inadequately defended by the House of Commons, where they ought to have been defended strenuously in the first place, and where it is necessary for the Senate to step in and fill the void, this is it.
> I tried to make it clear that in my judgment this bill should be rejected. The government should then bring in another bill with a clause retroactively deeming the action which was taken to have been legal, but not laying it down that this goes for the rest of time.

This is a quotation from the minutes of the National Finance Committee, May 5, 1989 pp. 3:42-43.

Subsequently, the Senate itself amended the bill so as to provide that the payments made by special warrants in 1990 were to be deemed to have been legal. The government would not even hear that proposal. What they had done was already entirely legal and constitutional. They wished to keep open the possibility of doing the same thing at some time in the future.

It was not argued by the government that 1989 was a special case because of the election. There had been a session of Parliament after the election. What was done in 1989 can be done to evade the need for an appropriation act later this year. It can be done to evade the requirement of an appropriation act based on the 1991-92 estimates.

We have heard a great deal about responsible government from Prime Minister Mulroney and Senator Murray in the past few weeks. Where was responsible government in 1989?

What makes a government responsible to Parliament is Parliament's exclusive control over the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The revenues flow in month after month regardless of whether or not Parliament is in session. The ordinary statute law can be left unamended for years. The one leash tying the ministers and the bureaucrats to Parliament is their need to come to Parliament for supply. In 1989 that leash was slipped. A precedent was established. Hereafter any government—a Progressive Conservative government, a Liberal government, an NDP government—can carry on month after month, year after year, meeting Parliament for only one sitting a year. That is how seriously Prime Minister Mulroney and Senator Murray take responsible government. Is it any wonder that in 1990 nobody believes their professions of undying love for the principles of responsible government?

The new senators will find it interesting to see which of their colleagues voted against the basic principle of responsible government on May 17, 1989. Their names are recorded in the Debates of the Senate for that day, at page 246.

Honourable senators, and here I speak principally to the new senators, we have a cause for the unusually adversarial relationships in this House since 1984, namely, that we on this side feel that the present government has not been attentive to fundamental principles of the Constitution with regard to the management of money. If you go back and survey the history of these six years what you will see is that the stubborn attitude of Mr. Wilson on the borrowing authority bill of 1985 opened the way for many of the difficulties which followed.

A fifth cause of the adversarial relationship has been the government's reliance on section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to reject Senate amendments even when those amendments did not make appropriations.

As honourable senators will remember, under section 53 of the Constitution Act, 1867 all bills for imposing taxes and for appropriating public revenue must originate in the House of Commons. Another section, section 54, makes it illegal for the House of Commons to pass any bill that appropriates public money unless the appropriation has been recommended to that House by a Message from the Governor General. Many bills containing one or more appropriation clauses originate in the House of Commons at every session—and some of these bills are amended in the Senate. Those amendments are constitutional provided they do not change the purpose or increase the amount. Let me give examples. My examples are drawn from the second session of the thirty-third Parliament, September 30, 1986 to September 30, 1988.

Bill C-18, the National Transportation bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation. It was amended by the Senate. Those amendments were concurred in by the House of Commons.

Bill C-55, the Immigration Act amendment bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation. It was amended by the Senate. Certain amendments were concurred in by the House of Commons.

Bill C-74, the Canadian Environmental Protection bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation. Senate amendments were concurred in by the House of Commons.

Bill C-77, the Emergencies bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation; yet, the House of Commons concurred in a Senate amendment.

Bill C-105, the Railway Safety bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation; yet, the House of Commons concurred in a Senate amendment.

Bill C-137, the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation; yet, the House of Commons concurred in a Senate amendment.

Bill C-147, the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development bill, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation; yet, the House of Commons concurred in Senate amendments.

But what happened in the case of Bill C-103, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency bill? That bill, too, was accompanied by a Royal Recommendation. The bill was designed to produce two distinct acts of Parliament. One of these is the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act. The second is the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation Act. The bill was read a second time here in the Senate on May 31, 1988. Immediately it became clear that Part I of Bill C-103 could pass very quickly. In contrast, there were problems with Part II. To prevent unnecessary delay to Part I, the Senate divided the bill and passed Part I, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency Act. The Mulroney Government rejected that move. As always, it was "our way or no way".

● (1245)

Why did they reject the division of the bill? Not because the subject matter of the two parts were so closely interrelated that to divide them would have had a distorting effect. In fact, the National Finance Committee found it very easy to divide the bill. No Progressive Conservative senator objected on the basis that the two parts were siamese twins. Their only objection was that the bill was a "money bill" and, therefore, was inviolable by the Senate.

They rejected the division on the ground that the bill had been accompanied by a Royal Recommendation. The bill was one, whole, and indivisible. It was a seamless web. Speaker Fraser did not reach that conclusion. It was simply an assertion made by the government.

On July 19, 1988, the Senate received a message asserting that by dividing Bill C-103, the Senate had altered the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of the grants of aid and supplies set out in a bill as recommended by the Governor General.

Senator Murray himself told us that because there had been a Royal Recommendation, the bill was a "money bill". It was specifically an appropriation bill. Senator Murray, however, was unable to point to a single clause in Bill C-103 that appropriated money, and he was not alone.

On July 27, 1988, the Comptroller General of Canada came before the National Finance Committee. He, too, was unable to point to a single clause that appropriated money. Senator Murray defended in this house the message from the House of Commons on simple faith. He had been told that there had been a Royal Recommendation; therefore, he believed that Bill C-103 was a bill that appropriated money.

All that aside, as we have seen from the numerous examples I have cited, the mere fact that a bill contains one clause or more that appropriates money does not mean that the bill cannot be amended. Bills accompanied by a Royal Recommendation can be amended—many such bills have been amended in the present Parliament—provided that the amendment does not change the purpose or increase the amount of the appropriation.

In sum, the government's reaction was a flat denial of the right of the Senate to divide Bill C-103. It simply used the fact that there had been a Royal Recommendation as specious justification for its reaction, a reaction it could not justify on any other grounds.

Senator Grafstein: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: Dredger, following Blackstone's thesis of constitutional responsibility with respect to upper chambers, argued that the upper chamber, the House of Lords, had only the power to either vote up or vote down a measure when it related to taxation or money, that in effect the upper chamber—I am dealing with the notion now, not the practice—was not responsible for democratic will and could only curb the democratic will by voting a tax measure up or down. It could not fiddle with it by amending it or increasing it or reducing it.

Dredger seems to follow that notion in his analysis of the powers of the Senate, the Canadian Senate, and he seems to argue from the same notional basis.

We have heard three arguments from the other side, Senator Stewart, each of which seem to be distinctly at odds with one another. One argument is that since we are not democratically elected, we have no power at all to deal with a money bill. That is notion number one. That notion is shared by many on the opposite side, if you listen not to their speeches but to their comments.

The second notion is that we have the right to amend money bills if we do it in pre-study when there is concurrence in advance of the bill itself. That seems to be the second notion.

The third notion is the one that is rarely argued here and that is that we have merely the power to either vote up or vote down a bill. I think it is an important constitutional issue, and you have touched on it, because obviously the practice here and the practice in the United Kingdom is somewhat different from the constitutional notion.

Therefore, I am interested, first of all, in your view of what the appropriate philosophic notion should be that will energize our activities here, on the one hand, and, secondly, what in fact has been the practice?

Senator Stewart: That is a very important question and I propose to speak to it sometime later this day. However, let me say now, just to whet your appetite, that earlier in these remarks I mentioned two points; one was that in 1860 the House of Lords turned back Mr. Gladstone's repeal of the duties on paper. They had not done anything like that for years. It is important to remember that historical fact. Indeed, I think there is reference to it in the constitutional debates in Canada. It means that the Fathers of Confederation, certainly the law officers, the people at the Colonial Office in London, were familiar with the problem of the powers of the House of Lords. Nevertheless, when they drafted the British North America bill, they did not distinguish, except by the provisions set forth in Section 54—

Senator Cools: Fifty-three and fifty-four.

Senator Stewart: Yes. They did not diminish the powers of the Senate. They did not make them smaller than those of the House of Commons except that those bills cannot be dealt with by the Senate until they have passed the House of Commons. So I think that fact immediately puts us on a different constitutional footing from that which prevailed in the United Kingdom. That is a point which is important to remember.

The second point, of course, is that whereas the House of Lords can be regarded as a hereditary or meritorious second chamber, the Senate of Canada introduces into the Constitution of Canada the federative principle. We have to remember that Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, would never have entered into Confederation in 1867 if all the power to deal with taxation and appropriation was going to be lodged in the House of Commons, which it was assumed at that time would be dominated by Ontario. We have to remember how strong that assumption was because during the previous two generations, the population of Upper Canada had increased very rapidly and it was assumed that that was going to go on. It was assumed that with representation by population, Ontario would become increasingly powerful in the House of Commons.

It is fair to say, and it is quite understandable why, there is so little discussion in those confederation debates about limits on the powers of the Senate with regard to taxation and appropriation. People from Nova Scotia simply would never have given up—

Senator Simard: How do you know that?

Senator Corbin: It is in the record.

Senator Simard: Your two premises are wrong and vague.

Senator Austin: Senator Simard, you have to rise if you are going to obey the rules.

Senator Frith: You should listen to the whole speech, not parts.

Senator Cools: I think Senator Simard should talk less and read more.

Senator Stewart: He should listen to his leader who told him to keep his trap shut.

Senator Frith: If you are not good we will tell him when he comes in.

Senator Simard: How do you conclude that Nova Scotia would not have accepted the Senate?

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Stewart: Senator Murray gave you your instructions and if you are not good when he comes in I will tell him—

Senator Cools: I think you both should stand in the corner.

Senator Stewart: You will be taken to the shed. You will get your come-uppance then.

Senator Simard: I can't take any more.

Senator Stewart: And if that does not suffice to make you a good boy, I will tell the people in Canso that you forgot the promise you made to them.

Senator Simard: Were you there in 1867?

Senator Stewart: I heard what you said in Canso.

Senator Simard: That's all you are telling us, you were there?

Senator Stewart: The people of Canso will not be sending you any Christmas cards this year. You let them down.

Senator Simard: I will be back again.

Senator Cools: Senator Simard, I know that Senator Stewart is right because I was there in Canso and I heard you, too.

Senator Doody: You are speaking in debate?

Senator Corbin: There is broccoli soup for Senator Simard today.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the government's reaction was a flat denial of the right of the Senate to divide Bill C-103. There was a Royal Recommendation; therefore, the bill was inviolable. Subsequently the National Finance Committee conducted a study of the use of Royal Recommendations. Earlier this year, on February 13, 1990, the committee presented its report to the Senate. Senators such as Senator Beaudoin and Senator Bolduc made important contributions to the work of that committee.

That report shows that Royal Recommendations are now so general and indirect as to be virtually meaningless. They do not specify either the purpose for which money is sought or the amount.

Senator Castonguay, you simply would not believe it. They are so vague that it is questionable whether they qualify as the recommendations required by Section 53.

The report showed that sometimes clauses that appropriate money cannot be detected even though every clause has been read and reread carefully. The truth of this proposition was shown when the Foreign Affairs Committee was dealing in 1989 with Bill C-10. That bill had been accompanied by a Royal Recommendation, and properly so; yet the reason was completely obscure.

Those of you interested in constitutional matters will be appalled. It shows that the government now relies on the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel of the House of Commons to advise the Governor General to recommend bills thought by the Law Clerk to require a recommendation. This is what constitutional monarchy has come to in Canada: The Governor General gets his advice from a clerk of the House of Commons, not from a minister of the Crown.

• (1300)

Senator Cools: Shame!

Senator Stewart: The report showed, also, that the Law Clerk decides whether or not to seek a Royal Recommendation on the basis of what he thinks the current Speaker of the House of Commons will regard as a "money bill." There we have it. The Mulroney government asserts that the Senate may not touch a bill introduced with a Royal Recommendation, and it is left to the Law Clerk of the House of Commons to guess whether or not a bill requires a Royal Recommendation.

As I said, the only sections of the Constitution Act, 1867 dealing with money votes are Sections 53 and 54. Those sections do not even use the vague term, "money bills." They refer to "tax bills" and "appropriation bills."

But Senator Murray, Senator Roblin and Senator Flynn know better what a "money bill" is. A money bill, as Senator Flynn told us on July 26, 1988—this can be found in Debates of the Senate, page 4117—is any bill that has "financial implications." Let me quote his very words:

> In this country, I believe I can safely say that we have always defined a money bill as a bill that has financial implications. A bill to levy taxes has always been considered a money bill. A bill that authorizes expenditures, even if those expenditures must be more specifically authorized in an appropriation bill, has always been considered a money bill.

It's wounderfully simple. Any bill that has "financial implications" is covered by Sections 53 and 54. Forget the words of the Constitution. Flynn knew what the authors were trying to say better than they did. Any bill that has "financial implications" may not be changed by the Senate. On the basis of that view, we should be asking that our pay be reduced by at least 50 per cent. How many bills come to us that do not have "financial implications?"

Obviously, the Hon. Harvie Andre at one time thought that Senator Flynn was the ultimate authority on Canada's constitution. He adopted Senator Flynn's argument when dealing, on March 12, 1990, with the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Bill.

Speaking against the Senate amendments to that bill, he quoted Sections 53 and 54, and then proceeded to pronounce the amendments unconstitutional. He ignored the ruling made by Speaker Charbonneau on February 20, 1990, that the amendments sent to the House of Commons did not violate those sections. Mr. Andre said that, properly read, those sections meant that it is for the House of Commons and only the House of Commons to deal with bills that impose taxes and bills that appropriate money.

However, midway through that famous speech, the speech of March 12, Mr. Andre shifted his ground. Perhaps Flynn had not got it quite right after all. He said that yes, it is true that ". . . the Senate can, legally, perhaps, defeat, delay or amend downward a supply appropriation bill. But it never has." Mr. Andre continued, saying that never before now had it changed a bill that appropriated money ". . . in defiance of the terms of a Royal Recommendation . . ."

Honourable senators, what were those terms, those decisive terms, which restrict the Senate? I shall read them for the benefit of new senators. They are as follows:

> Her Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "An Act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and the Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act.

Honourable senators, referring specifically to Bill C-21, the Unemployment Insurance Bill, I ask: What amounts were recommended and for what purposes? Where in the bill are the appropriation clauses, the clauses that may not be amended? Neither the House of Commons nor the Senate was told. Indeed, the responsible ministers did not know.

When Bill C-21 was being studied by the Special Senate Committee, the witnesses from the department were asked what clauses of the bill were appropriation clauses. Listen to this Senator Oliver. The reply is incredible. The carefully prepared written reply was:

> Officials in the Legislation Section of the Department of Justice advised that this is a determination made by the law officers of Parliament. However, the Department of Justice has prepared an Aide-mémoire for its drafters (enclosed) indicating some of the relevant criteria, as the Privy Council office sometimes seeks advice on such matters. In the case of Bill C-21, no formal analysis was done either by the CEIC or the Department of Justice.

There we have it. The bill seemed to deal with payments, so it was given the halo of a Royal Recommendation. Once the Royal Recommendation had been bestowed, Bill C-21 was a "money bill."

Because Royal Recommendations are now hopelessly vague, ministers such as Mr. Andre and Senator Murray feel free to argue that any amendment they do not like violates the Royal Recommendation. That happened in the case of Bill C-103 and in the case of Bill C-21. In the case of those bills, much of the delay resulted from the government's insistence that the Senate may not amend bills brought in with a Royal Recommendation. In neither case could the minister specify the protected clauses. The messages from the House of Commons—that is, from the government—were either false, or foolish, or both. There were substantive disputes over Bill C-103 and Bill C-21, but the main cause of trouble was a disagreement over the implications of Royal Recommendations.

There has been another cause for the difficult relations that have prevailed since 1984. I will put this in the softest language possible. This cause, the sixth cause, has been the terrorist mentality of the Mulroney government. I think I can support that language. "Do as I demand or accept full responsibility for all the consequences." That has been their oft-repeated threat. I do not rank it as a major cause, but I believe it has served to aggravate the relationship between the government and the Senate. Frequently, it has slowed down the passage of bills. Always it has helped to create rancour. The terrorist's stock line is: "If you don't do as I demand, I'll blow up the plane and any deaths will be your fault." The Mulroney line has been: "Do as we demand; otherwise the people of Canada will suffer, and only you will be to blame."

Honourable senators will remember how that tactic was used by the Prime Minister in 1985 when the Borrowing Authority Bill was under consideration. "We will never agree to divide a bill at the request of the Senate regardless of how convincing the arguments for the division may be. If the Senate does not pass the undivided bill when we say, 'pass it', the result will be a loss of $15 million or more, and the entire responsibility will rest on the Senate." That was the burden of Mr. Mulroney's letter to Mr. Turner.

In the case of Bill C-67, the gate-ing bill—

Senator Lefebvre: Would the honourable senator accept a question? I have been listening to his speech while I have been in the chamber and also from my office. Senator Stewart has put on record many examples of the Tories' disregard for Parliament, whether it is in its rules of order, precedents or procedures.

Senator Stewart has also explained their cavalier attitude when it comes to constitutional aspects of the way we expect our country to be governed.

He also put on the record earlier today that, even after six years of Tory mandates and so-called "administration" with a very large majority in the House of Commons, Prime Minister Mulroney and all his supporters try to absolve themselves of any blame when this country is being devastated by their policies. From one end of the country to the other people are complaining and yet the Tories still try to put the blame on a former Liberal administration.

Is this just further proof of the incompetence of the Tories when they do reach government; or is it just a complete misunderstanding by the Tory government of the way Canadians expect their country to be governed?

Senator Roblin: You may answer both questions.

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Stewart has done much research in this field and I am sure all of my colleagues in the chamber would appreciate his thoughts. I am sure his response will be read by all of our colleagues who do not happen to be in the house at this moment or who are unable to hear him from their offices.

I know that Senator Stewart has written many articles and books on Parliament and how it should operate. Senator Stewart is recognized as one of the experts in this field in Canada. I am sure all Canadians who will hear the sound of his voice or who will be reading Hansard will be impressed by what he has to say.

Senator Stewart: I will shortly be accused of trying to get a free translation, and we don't want that.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Roblin: Who wrote that question?

Senator Stewart: It is true that we have heard the Mulroney government try to absolve itself by referring to the situation which prevailed prior to 1984. I don't know why it does that. One explanation may be—and I mean this quite seriously—that the Progressive Conservative Party was out of office too long, and when you are in the back seat for a very long time you get a distorted notion about what it is like to be driving the vehicle. Suddenly, when you are put behind the wheel, it all comes as a bit of a shock and it is very easy, I suspect, to slip into the excuse: "Well, we inherited a very faulty vehicle."

I think there is another explanation and I hope to be able to have time to touch on it more extensively later today.

Senator Lefebvre: We have lots of time.

Senator Stewart: I appreciate your patience.

I think Mr. Wilson has had a very hard time dealing with the Prime Minister in financial matters. Back in 1979 and in 1980, Mr. Wilson was constantly talking about the deficit, so I am sure that when he became the Minister of Finance after the election of September 4, 1984, he hoped that the government would single-mindedly go after the deficit as its priority concern. As I hope to show, the government refused to do that. It put off making a massive attack on the deficit in order to do other things such as the Free Trade Agreement and the Meech Lake Accord.

• (1315)

Consequently the need for an excuse is very real. Here we are in 1990, six years after the present government took power, and it has not done what Mr. Wilson said in 1980 ought to be done at that time. In circumstances such as that, people tend to blame others and to make excuses.

Honourable senators, I have given an example of what I call terrorist mentality by referring to the fact that, with regard to the borrowing authority bill, the Prime Minister said that they will never agree to divide that bill, even though the result is a loss of millions of dollars, and the fault is that of the Senate.

I should like to deal with the gate-ing bill, where the same tactic was used. As I mentioned earlier , that bill had languished in the House of Commons for one full year before it came to the Senate. When it appeared that the Senate would not pass the bill in a few hours, the government suddenly discovered that the people of Canada were in grave danger. The Prime Minister uttered his warning, "We have criminals that will be out on the street when they ought to be in jail, and that's the responsibility of those in the Senate who took this irresponsible action." The bill had come to us late in June, and he said that on July 5. Senator Murray, too, was solemn with concern. He, too, held before the Senate the grave danger to the public. His comments appear in the Senate Debates at page 2816.

When the Senate amended the Appropriation Act in 1989 to provide that the expenditures made by special warrants earlier that year should be deemed to have been legal, the government, predictably, contrived a threat to the public. Rather than accept the Appropriation Act with a clause stating that the payment made by special warrants were to be deemed to be legal, the government cut off payments normally made on behalf of veterans. This is what Mr. Robert de Cotret told the National Finance Committee:

> The fact is that we do not have authority to spend and so everything must be frozen.
> As you can imagine, Mr. Chairman, there are some rather serious consequences to that, and I would like to tell you about them. For example, there are health care programs for veterans. Under those programs, we normally pay very quickly for the costs incurred for drugs and other related costs in that health care program. We must not stop those payments. Another program affected is the adjustment assistance program.

Even the RCMP were to go without their pay. The army was to be disbanded. Civil servants were to be out on the street penniless. And it would all be the fault of the Senate, who held up the Appropriation Bill. How many weeks was it? For eight days! Under the Parliament Act of 1911 in Great Britain we would have had 30 days. Just think of it.

Senator Doyle: Shocking.

Senator Stewart: What they did is shocking. Senator Doyle is quite right.

On May 16, 1989, Senator Murray told the Senate that all payments—grants, contributions, and other transfer payments—were to stop as of 12:01 on May 16, 1989. He added that this applied to senators' pay. Now the terrorist is getting deadly serious. He said, ". . . just in the event that any honourable senators are concerned. Perhaps that is what took up so much time in their (the Liberal) caucus this morning." That quotation is to be found in the Senate Debates at page 219. In other words, "give us what we demand, otherwise . . ." That is the typical terrorist tactic.

And now, in 1990 the old dog is up to his old tricks. Unless the Senate passes Bill C-62, many Canadians will be deprived of the GST tax credit during the pre-Christmas spending spree. On November 6, 1990 the Honourable Michael Wilson urged the Leader of the Opposition to encourage ". . . his friends down the hall in the Senate to pass the GST so we could get on with the payment of some $600 million to low income Canadians to help them purchase things during the pre-Christmas period." That statement appears in the House of Commons Debates at page 15204. There is the threat.

Senator Stanbury: Senator Stewart, would you accept a question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, indeed.

Senator Stanbury: Could you speculate as to the source of the funds that would be distributed in such a manner? Would they be funds which are raised by way of income tax, excise duties, or taken out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund? What would be the source of those funds if the GST is not in effect at that time?

Senator Stewart: The money would have to come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. Of course, it would not be attributable to any specific tax or impost. It would have to come out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund from money, perhaps borrowed oney, already there.

Senator van Roggen: I have a supplementary question, Senator Stewart. That $600 million is not in the budget. Presumably there would be an immediate increase to the deficit projections that we have at the moment.

Senator Stewart: I understand your point, Senator van Roggen. It is a very interesting one.

I should like to finish this point. To leave no doubt about the way this terrorist tactic has been used, let us turn to yet another authoritative voice. On November 8, 1990, the Honourable Otto Jelinek took up the cry. He said, "If it (the GST) is not passed by the end of November then the mailing out of those cheques (cheques for $600 million) must be delayed."

This government has nothing to learn from Saddam Hussein insofar as terrorist tactics are concerned.

Senator Cools: Absolutely. That is right.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not say that this has been a major cause of acrimony, but I do say that it certainly has not served to ease relations between the Liberal-dominated Senate and the government. If experienced politicians, such as Senator Roblin, had been masterminding affairs, this kind of gratuitous aggravation would not have been taken place.

It is against this background—and I say this to the new senators—that we place Bill C-62. I now come to point that I referred to earlier when I was answering Senator Grafstein's question. There is no question but that the Honourable Michael Wilson wanted the first priority of the government after 1984 to be the control of the deficit. However, the Prime Minister had other plans.

He yielded to the entreaties of the Council on Business Issues. They wanted to rationalize their North American operations, so they urged him to negotiate a Free Trade Agreement with the United States. Their obedient servant went off to Washington. Old Jonathan saw him coming and took him in. Above all, the Americans wanted secure access to Canadian natural gas, petroleum and electricity.

Senator Molgat: And water.

Senator Stewart: To get the Free Trade Agreement, Mulroney gave them what they wanted. To make the Americans glow with happiness, Mr. Mulroney threw in large sectors of Canadian agriculture.

The Honourable Sinclair Stevens, as reported in The Sunday Star of December 2, 1990 has said that he is convinced that Mulroney made a secret "gentlemen's agreement" to boost the value of the Canadian dollar as part of the price paid for the Free Trade Agreement. If that is true—

Senator Barootes: It is not. It has been denied by the Ambassador to the United States; it has been denied by our trade officials, but carry on.

Senator Stewart: I am glad that Senator Barootes put on the record that it has been denied.

Senator Barootes: I like your caveat, "if that is true," and it is not. Carry on.

Senator Stewart: If Senator Barootes is not good, I will tell him what province he comes from according to the Chronicle Herald.

Senator Lucier: Silence on the other side.

Senator Stewart: If that is true—I take my cue from Senator Barootes—and if there is a "gentlemen's agreement", the argument that the goods and services tax is necessary to reduce high interest rates intended to make Canadian bonds and bills attractive to foreign lenders probably is false.

The result of the Free Trade Agreement, as we all know, was a major political controversy in Canada. A situation was created in which any new and unpopular tax was virtually unthinkable. So what did the Prime Minister do? To help smooth the waters for the Free Trade Agreement and to prepare his friends for the 1988 election, he had Mr. Wilson limit his pre-election changes in taxation to amendments to the Income Tax Act.

Once the 1988 election had been won, the government began its policy revolution in earnest. On June 6, 1989, the Honourable Barbara MacDougall moved second reading of Bill C-21, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act and Employment and Immigration Department and Commission Act. At page 2675 of the House of Commons Debates, she stated:

> We did not expect any or all of these initiatives to be popular with everyone. In many ways, they redefine roles and responsibilities and they challenge vested interests. But we know that our approach works and we have the record to prove it.
> Since we came to office in 1984, our philosophy as a Government has recognized that the private sector is the key to the future success of the Canadian workforce and the Canadian economy. Privatization, deregulation, tax reform and free trade are all parts of the same agenda for revitalizating the Canadian economy to meet the requirements of increased globalization of markets and rapid technological change.

So there we have it: an agenda for a new economic and social order. In June 1989, the true meaning of Mandate '88 was revealed to Canadians. Now those who had voted Progressive Conservative on November 21, 1988, finally knew what they had voted for.

But did the Prime Minister give Mr. Wilson an unobstructed run? Of course not. He had yet another agenda, not the Free Trade Agreement, of course, but now the Meech Lake Accord.

In 1983, Mr. Mulroney set about the destruction of the Liberal monopoly on political support in Quebec—a perfectly legitimate objective. He fed and fostered separatists, hoping to use them for his purpose—that is, to carry into the Progressive Party all the debris of the Union Nationale, all the Parti Quebecois, all the remnants of Le Ralliement des Créditistes. He wooed them fervently. He secured some of them as Progressive Conservative candidates. First he sent Lucien Bouchard to Paris as Canada's Ambassador. Then he brought him into the House of Commons in a by-election—at great cost to the taxpayers of Canada—and made him a senior minister in his government.

At the same time he boldly tackled the Quebec problem. He would do what Trudeau had failed to do in 1980-82.

At a meeting at Meech Lake on April 30, 1987, the Prime Minsiter wove a seamless web. The Province of Quebec was to be given the juridical status of a distinct society; the spending power of the Parliament of Canada was to be restrained; the Senate was to be made a body representing provincial governments; and the question of fisheries jurisdiction was to be on the permanent agenda of future conferences.

It was a seamless web, a delicate and precious web. Any considerable change would break the accord achieved in those magic moments by the lake. As reported to the Senate on March 31, 1988, the ministers stated that: "If there is an egregious error, and only if there is an egregious error, would we be prepared, as first ministers, to reopen the accord."

A joint committee of this house and the House of Commons was set up. Obedient to the command of the Prime Minister, the majority of the committee recommended to both houses that the accord be adopted without the slightest alteration. It was simply perfect.

The Liberal members of the joint committee disagreed. They argued for amendments. Yet the House of Commons approved the Accord on October 26, 1987.

The Senate referred the accord to a Committee of the Whole in the Senate. Many distinguished witnesses were heard. On May 25, 1988, the Senate approved the accord with amendments.

On June 22, 1988, the House of Commons adopted the accord a second time, thus overriding the Senate amendments.

As the months passed, it became evident that the legislatures of two provinces—New Brunswick and Manitoba—were unlikely to approve the accord as it stood.

Confronted by this situation, the Prime Minister had an all-party committee of the House of Commons appointed on March 30, 1990, to consider the possibility that the adoption of a companion resolution would enable all the provincial legislatures to approve the accord. That committee, the Charest committee, made its report, a unanimous report, on May 17, 1990. Its recommendations, it is interesting to note, were similar in substance to those made by the Senate on May 25, 1988—almost one year earlier.

But once again the Prime Minister insisted that the seamless web must not be changed.

In the week of May 17 Senator Murray was in Winnipeg storming at Premier Filmon.

On June 22, 1990, Senator Murray was busy on television trying to shift the blame for the failure of the accord to the Premier of Newfoundland.

The accord failed. To its architects it seemed just perfect: it floated nicely in the lake. But once it was taken out to sea, it foundered. Why? As the Charest committee reported, the accord could not stand on its own. It was incomplete.

In addition, the whole process by which it had been put together and then submitted to the legislatures was ill-conceived.

It was put together quietly by federal and provincial ministers and bureaucrats—no one will object to that approach. It was approved in camera by first ministers. Again, I, for one, do not object.

But then the members of the House of Commons and all the provincial legislatures were told: "It's a seamless web. It's so intricate that any considerable change would cause the whole web to unravel." Premier after premier followed the Prime Minister in ramming the accord through their legislatures. Gradually, the people of many provinces became suspicious. Even those who knew little about the accord's provisions came to believe that the accord was bad. They came to question the process known as "responsible government" as practised in the House of Commons and in the provincial legislatures.

At this point let me refer to an address given by Professor Donald V. Smiley to a conference on the need for reform in the legislative process in Canada, held at the University of Victoria in 1978. The late, lamented Professor Smiley of York University was truly a great scholar. He starts off with a very apt story.

> My colleague, John Gellner, tells a story about a young American legal officer who was sent to a Third World country to instruct its army on court-martial procedures. The day he arrived a soldier was brought before a military tribunal and within the space of a few minutes summarily convicted and executed. The American was, of course, properly shocked and set out to instruct his hosts so that in the future they might do better. When the next court-martial was held it seemed that the lessons had been well learned. In fact, the process dragged on for several weeks with the most fastidious concern by all with the intricacies of procedure. However, there seemed to be no progress in reaching a verdict and the American officer finally suggested to the chairman of the tribunal that this lack of progress was in danger of becoming "cruel and unusual punishment" of the accused. The reply was not reassuring, "Oh, you don't need to worry about him—we shot him the first day."
> It would belabour the obvious to connect Gellner's antecdote with the subject of this paper. Like the second court-martial board, the characteristic role of the Parliament of Canada and of the provincial legislatures federal-provincial relations is to discuss actions which have already been taken. I have little hope that this situation can be changed in any significant way without a radical restructuring of our political institutions.

Professor Smiley then went on to focus on federal-provincial fiscal relations. He quotes Thomas Courchene whom he calls, "perhaps the most informed academic analyst of Canadian public finance." This is what Courchene had had to say about Parliament's role:

> The entire negotiation process with respect to the new fiscal arrangements essentially bypassed the Parliament of Canada. It is true that the Fiscal Arrangements Act is an act of Parliament. But our federal representatives were effectively presented with a fait accompli, hammered out between representatives of Ottawa and the ten provincial governments. The bulk of the Commons debate on the bill was directed toward sorting out the precise details of its various provisions. There was no debate in the traditional sense of the term . . . Public opinion was not brought to bear on the new arrangements. This is in marked contrast to the information that has been available in the print and electronic media relating to the upcoming revision of the new Bank Act, for example. Yet the Bank Act revision pales in consequence with renegotiating the financial basis of the federation in terms of the impact on the Canada of tomorrow.

What, you ask, has all that to do with the Meech Lake Accord? The same process was applied in the case of the Meech Lake Accord as was applied in the case of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act. The deal was worked out and then it was rammed thorugh the House of Commons and most of the legislatures.

The people of Canada may be prepared to accept that kind of procedure when governments are dealing with federal-provincial arrangements. These matters do not excite the ordinary man in the street very much. But that is not true in all cases. What the Meech Lake Accord taught us—and it is a lesson that we will have to bear in mind—is that the man in the street is not prepared to accept the "shoot him first and convict him later" attitude with regard to constitutional matters. They might have been prepared to do that when the Constitution involved only federal-provincial powers, but now that the Constitution of Canada involves a Bill of Rights and matters of that kind, the old approach of executive federalism simply will not do.

That was pointed out to the Senate very early—early enough for remedial action to have been taken. It was pointed out to us by Professor Allan Cairns of the University of British Columbia. On that occasion he said that there is real danger that the application of the federal-provincial fiscal arrangement approach to constitutional amendments will produce a wave of constitutional anger. As it turned out, Professor Cairns was right, that "constitutional anger" smouldered for months. It was not all directed at Prime Minister Mulroney; it was directed at the premiers of those provinces where the Meech Lake Accord was pushed through the legislature by party discipline.

Senator LeBlanc: They have been defeated in most of them.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps not in most of them. The Conservative government in Nova Scotia has not yet gone down. However, I am told that the outcome of the recent election in Ontario had a great deal to do with the way so-called responsible government was used to ram through the Meech Lake Accord.

We now live in the aftermath of the Meech Lake Accord. Meech Lake discord is everywhere—in Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and Alberta. Everywhere the politicians are paying, not so much for what they tried to do, as for how they tried to do it.

Senator Grafstein: Senators opposite have vigorously objected not vocally, but spiritually, to your conclusion as a senator from Nova Scotia that the Liberal government in Ontario went down to defeat in large part as a result of its policies and practices with respect to the Meech Lake proposals. Perhaps you might for a moment or two, before you race on to your more important points, pause to give us some substantiation concerning the very profound cause of the Liberal defeat.

Having said that, I think I should add one fact, just to make it more difficult for you, Senator Stewart. All three political parties in the last provincial election—and I want to put the issue as fairly as I can—seemed at their heads, if not at their body politic, to support the Meech Lake Accord. Therefore, how can you expect Conservative senators opposite who are now tending to agree with me—and I want to put the argument as strongly as I can from the position of those who disagree with this point—to hold the same point of view? By way of aside, I do not agree with the arguments I am making at this point in time. I tend to agree with your conclusions. However, I am more interested in hearing from you as an astute observer outside the province of Ontario about what evidence you have to support your contention that the Meech Lake Accord destroyed the leadership and the government of a Liberal party.

Senator Stewart: Senator Grafstein, I do not remember the exact words I used. If I said that was the sole cause of the defeat of the Peterson government, then, of course, I went too far.

Senator Cools: You did not say it was the sole cause.

Senator Stewart: I did not think I did.

Senator Grafstein: Before you go on, the reason I am raising these issues is because senators opposite are most anxious to engage in this debate.

Senator Stanbury: But their leader will not let them.

Senator Frith: They have been telling us for two months that they want to participate in this debate.

Senator Grafstein: I cannot say what is in the hearts and minds of those who do not want to debate. I think that when they do raise a point, and there is a point of contention on this side, that we can be their surrogates and, at least, put the argument in a fair way. I only say that, and I note again for the purposes of the record, that they were vigorously agreeing with your moderation of the position that it was the sole cause. I assume that it was a material and significant cause of the defeat of the provincial government of Ontario. Is that correct?

Senator LeBlanc: Before Senator Stewart answers, may I ask a question? Senator Grafstein used a political science approach which I find questionable. He said that all three party leaders supported a position. That is a nice theory of political scientists, most of whom have never darkened the corridors of the electoral process. I suspect that the people are much wiser than political scientists. They focus on which party forms the government. They hold it responsible for its attitudes and its actions. In fact, the opposition position on this or that issue may make a very marginal impact on the results of an election campaign. I also think that most people vote to get rid of a government and not to elect another party. However, that is another question.

Senator Stewart said something about Ontario. Ontario is not the only case, if that is to be debated. There is Manitoba to be considered. Mr. Pawley signed the agreement. He was eventually removed from office. Senator Hatfield is witness to the changing moods of a population. Certainly in New Brunswick there was a different mood as between those who were on side and those who were opposed. In fact, I remember that because I was in New Brunswick at the time that Mr. McKenna made it very clear that he had some very serious problems with Meech Lake. In fact, his position afterward showed that.

In Newfoundland Mr. Peckford was eventually replaced, and I suspect for a number of reasons, one being his approach to the fishery. Certainly, Mr. Wells did not leave any doubt what his position on Meech Lake would be. These examples seem to support Senator Stewart's approach to the question. However, I take serious issue with the idea that because three parties on the federal scene at the time of Meech Lake agreed generally on the position, the people should have followed them.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I have the floor, and I do not want—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart: I do not want us to have a debate in the Senate. Senator Murray would be displeased. Senator Murray does not want a debate in this place, Senator Grafstein.

Senator Grafstein: Senator Stewart, this is an important issue. I think students of history in the future will be looking at some of these debates. Perhaps of all the many speeches of the grand speeches which are going to be made, your speech will be at the higher level of concentration for historians in the future. I think it is important that we pause for a moment to deal with this rather important point.

I have not put the proposition as fairly as I could for the opposite side.

Senator Frith: Your question you mean.

Senator Grafstein: I am coming to my question in a moment.

Senator Frith: Remember you are on a question.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that. This is a question. If I can, I want to propel the question forward by giving the other side of the issue as presented in my own question. Senators opposite have attributed this case to all parties. We now hear that that is not really a fair way of putting the position. The government of Ontario was defeated primarily because that was the target.

Perhaps I can ask Senator Stewart whether or not what happened in Ontario, from my perspective, happened in other regions of the country, and in particular what happened here on this issue. I think what happened is the following. Each federal party was deeply divided on the Meech Lake—

Senator Barootes: Is this your speech on third reading?

Senator Grafstein: No, it is not. I am asking a question.

Senator Barootes: Excuse me, I thought it was your speech.

Senator Grafstein: I am trying to give a preamble to the question I am about to ask of Senator Stewart.

That reflection of the deep division was mirrored in the province of Ontario. Each of the three parties, separate from their leadership, was deeply divided on this issue.

Senator Stewart: Senator Grafstein, I appreciate what you are saying, and I assume that you are going to speak later in this debate.

Senator Grafstein: I hope to.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps you would like to return to that point at that time.

Senator Grafstein: I would like your view as to whether or not it is fair to conclude that the Meech Lake Accord was one of the material causes as opposed to just a cause of the defeat of the Liberal government.

Senator Barootes: Why don't you two girls gossip outside.

Senator Stewart: I have been proposing that for some time, and we may do that over the weekend.

Let me say to extricate myself from this situation that the evidence I have is almost entirely anecdotal. I have various pieces of anecdotal evidence, but I will share one with honourable senators. Approximately two weeks before polling date I was told that the man who was doing the polling for the Liberals found that there was a bitter reaction against the Liberal government of Ontario because of the Meech Lake Accord. I was told that Liberal canvassers were going to doors and were receiving the following reaction: "Oh, Mr. Peterson wants some help, does he? He wants some support, does he? Why does he not call his friends Brian and Robert?" That is just a small anecdote but it came from a very well informed source.

I must confess that that helped to shape my own judgment as to what happened. Whether it is true or not, Senator Grafstein, nobody will ever know.

However, I think it is fair to say that we now live in the aftermath of the Meech Lake Accord, certainly in Quebec and in Nova Scotia, as well as in Ontario, I assume. Everywhere, as I have said, the politicians are paying, not so much for what they tried to do, as for how they tried to do it.

Normally, the people is content to let the captain, the officers, and the crew navigate and run the ship of state. But they do not want to be carried to strange, new destinations without their representatives having had a genuine opportunity to evaluate those destinations. That was not true in the House of Commons, and it was certainly not true in the legislative assembly of Nova Scotia.

The bonds of consent that held Canada together were seriously chaffed and strained by the whole Meech Lake episode.

It was into the political atmosphere created by the Free Trade Agreement and the Meech Lake Accord, together with the other radical economic and social changes announced by the Hon. Barbara MacDougall, that Bill C-62 was launched. The time could not have been worse. The aspects of tax reform, attractive to some taxpayers, had been stripped away before the election. Only the bitter aspects of tax reform—the GST—remained. This bitter bill was put through the House of Commons by closure at a time when the people were not ready for yet another assault on the bonds of consent.

● (1400)

On Thursday, October 25, 1990, Senator Everett told us that he has no obligation to consider the political consequences of the enactment of Bill C-62. According to him, all that is important to him as a senator are the financial and economic implications of the tax. With great respect, I say to him that he has a responsibility to widen his focus. Civil society comprises both the economy and the polity. The security of property, honourable senators, the credit of our currency, the health of the whole productive and distributive system, all these depend on the strength of the polity.

No senator can close his eyes to the impact of a measure on the future of the polity. Even if Bill C-62 were an entirely good bill, given the state of our society, pounded by the Free Trade Agreement, the Meech Lake Accord, the current state of the economy, and the uncertainties created by globalization, this is not the time to introduce a complex tax on goods and services.

I said at the beginning of these remarks that I intended to address chiefly the new senators and especially the new senators from Nova Scotia.

Senator Barootes: Wait until we call them in.

Senator Stewart: I beg your pardon?

Senator Barootes: Do you want to wait until tomorrow and we will call them in?

Senator Stewart: Are you proposing the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Barootes: No, I am proposing you reduce your volume.

Senator Simard: You should break all the records, Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart: I think we understand the circumstances. We have a long debate going on here and I am not offended by the fact that Senator Buchanan is not in his seat, Senator Barootes. I am not offended by the fact that Senator Forestall is not here. I think it is quite understandable. However, I hope they will read the record of this day. Certainly, the people back in Nova Scotia will. As I speak here today, there are senators in the chamber who are firmly convinced that the goods and services tax will be disastrous for the people whom they represent. Yet they voted for the goods and services tax on Thursday, October 25 and they have voted against every amendment. They have voted to tax books, to tax heating fuel, to tax co-operatives, to tax funeral services. They have voted against the progressive taxation of luxury automobiles. From where I stand, the most prominent of those Tory senators, those who are convinced that the GST is a bad tax, is Senator John Buchanan. We know where he stands on the merits of the GST. The people of Nova Scotia know where he stands on the merits of the GST: he has been frank with them and has told them over and over again where he stands. I will quote to you what he has said, not everything, but a few representative remarks. I quote from the Nova Scotia Hansard of April 25, 1989:

> We do have some serious concerns about a "new federal sales tax". Our concerns are, of course, that a lot of that tax may be on commodities which at present are not taxed."

and again:

> We certainly are prepared to oppose as much as we possibly can..a movement into a shared jurisdiction with the provinces on those items that are at present not taxed here, and certainly on items that are taxed here.

Again:

> . . . we oppose the federal sales tax.

Again:

> . . . it is an intrusion into a matter that has been, historically, provincial.

Speaking in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, as reported in the New Glasgow Evening News on August 11, 1989:

> We certainly aren't in favour of the tax; we're opposed to it.

Then he went to Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, where he spoke on October 20, 1989, as reported in The Chronicle-Herald:

> . . . the Mulroney government faces the prospect of a damaged Atlantic Canadian economy.
>
> The premier, in an interview, said he is concerned about economic trends in the region.
>
> "I'd have to be living up on the moon not to be concerned, because I am concerned," Mr. Buchanan said Thursday following a cabinet meeting in Yarmouth.

[Senator Barootes.]

> "I'm concerned not so much with the political ramifications here as I am with the economy of this part of Canada."

The report continues:

> Mr. Buchanan said it is important that he and other Atlantic ministers voice their opposition to the goods and services tax and Via Rail cutbacks during the first ministers conference in November.

And he went on, and on, and on. He said:

> "It's a consumer's tax which will hurt the economy."
> "It will . . . fire up the flames of inflation . . . and impede economic development and therefore hurt and reduce provincial revenues; and that will hurt services."

When they go to the polls in the next general election, the people of Nova Scotia will be guided by the views of Senator Buchanan—not by his votes on the GST. That the views of the Government of Nova Scotia on the goods and services tax did not change when Premier Buchanan was transfigured into Senator Buchanan was shown on Monday, October 22, 1990 when the Hon. Ken Streatch, Minister of Small Business Development, took up the Buchanan theme.

I quote from The Chronicle-Herald of October 23, 1990:

> The Mulroney government's imposition of the Goods and Services Tax against the will of the people is dead wrong and Nova Scotia's economy is already being damaged by it, the province's minister of Small Business development said Monday.

And now a direct quote:

> "It is creating fear and uncertainty in the small business community which will only result in confusion among business people and confusion among consumers."
> Mr Streatch said Ottawa "should forget about the GST . . .

And then on November 6, 1990, the Hon. Greg Kerr said that the GST will create higher inflation in Atlantic Canada than in the rest of Canada. He predictrf 7 per cent inflation in the four Atlantic provinces in 1991. Now a direct quotation by Mr. Kerr:

> Most provinces are saying (inflation) will be higher than what the feds say . . . and we have the impression that the impact will be more negative in the Atlantic.

Yet Senator Buchanan voted on October 25, 1990, for the GST. He voted against every amendment. How was that possible? His explanation, I suspect, is that even though Bill C-62 is an atrociously bad bill, since it is a "money bill", he and the other Tory senators from Nova Scotia have no choice but to vote for the bill.

That is what I call the "NDP position" on the powers of the Senate. It is precisely the argument that would be made by Audrey MacLaughlin, Nelson Riis, et al, if they were to form a government. It is precisely the argument they would make if they sent up to the Senate a bill to double corporate income taxes. I can hear them now: "This is a money bill. Senators may not amend or defeat a money bill. Senator Murray said so."

That position, the NDP position, has been the position of the Tories in the House of Commons since 1984. Even the present Speaker of the House of Commons undertook to read the Senate a lecture along those lines on April 22, 1990. We, on this side, have consistently defended the constitutional rights of the Senate. We have argued that the view set forth in the Ross Report (1917) was and remains substantially correct. New senators, of course, will very soon become familiar with the Ross Report.

R.A. Mackay in his distinguished work, The Unreformed Senate of Canada, made a comment on the Ross Report and I shall limit myself to reading some of his conclusions from pages 109 and 110.

> The initiation of legislation in the Senate has increased considerably in the past quarter century. Virtually all private bills are now introduced there and more non-controversial government measures than in earlier years thereby substantially relieving an overburdened House of Commons. Many bills, of course, must be introduced in the Commons and it is appropriate that bills implementing party programs should also be introduced there.

Second:

> The Senate is virtually indispensable as a revising chamber for legislation coming up from the Commons.

Now, listen to this:

> The Senate's right to amend money bills seems to be firmly based on the British North America Act and, in any case, the Senate over the years has made good its claim to do so. In this respect its powers exceed those of the House of Lords. The Senate, however, does not claim the right to increase an expenditure or a tax or impost or change the incidence of a tax or impost.

> No government, however large its majority, how overwhelming may have been the defeat of its opponents, has an unlimited mandate. A check upon "the never ending audacity of elected persons" as Walt Whitman put it, is a sound requirement of democracy.

A most extreme attack on the Senate's powers has been made by our colleague, Senator Beaudoin. I want to say something now about Senator Beaudoin's interpretation of the Senate's constitutional powers. Again and again—on December 19, 1989, on February 14, 1990, on March 20, 1990, on April 11, 1990 and on May 23, 1990—he has given us his views. On his analysis the Senate has only an advisory role. Its role is really the "lobby from within" role advocated by Senator Murray. There is, he concedes, a legal view which attributes great powers to the Senate, but he argues that that view must be wrong. Senator Beaudoin believes that the paramount principle of our constitution is responsible government; every section of the Constitution Act, 1867, must be read so as to conform to that principle. A party leader who has a majority in the House of Commons is not to be gainsaid. The Governor General and the Queen are to heed his advice as command. The Senate is never to restrain him.

To make the rule of the Senate conform to his theory, he gives us a revised version of confederation. The truth, he says, is that the Senate was intended only as a second chamber, the secondary chamber in a bicameral legislature. It was to be a kind of legislative saucer. Here I refer to an early 19th century American who said:

> Of course I believe in a second house. We need a second house just as I need a saucer to cool my tea.

• (1415)

According to Senator Beaudoin, the Senate was intended to be comparable to the upper houses—the "legislative councils"—which once existed in Nova Scotia, Quebec etc. Those houses were supposed to give fatherly advice to the popular assemblies. The members were to be older and richer, and they were to be sober and sedate.

On April 11, 1990—Debates of the Senate, page 1496—Senator Beaudoin objected to my contention that one of the chief purposes for which the Senate was created was a federal purpose, to be a brake on the power of the most populous province. On that day we were dealing with the report of the National Finance Committee on Royal Recommendations. Senator Beaudoin said:

> We cannot agree to allow the use of new precedents like those invoked during the past few weeks in the Senate to alter the basic principle of our Constitution which is responsible government, meaning that the government receives a mandate from our elected representatives to control its financial policy.

Later, he said:

> I agree Canada is a federal State, and I agree England is a centralized country. But this distinction only applies to the sharing of jurisdiction between two levels of government. It does not apply to the relationship between elected representatives and the House of Lords in England or between elected representatives in the House of Commons in this country and the Senate.
> Canada's history proves it. We have had a Senate since the beginning of Confederation. In Quebec, we had a legislative council until 1968. Five provinces have had an upper house. All were abolished except for the one in Ottawa.
>
> This proves one thing: Canada and England differ in the sense that here we have shared jurisdictions, while there are none in England. However, as concerns the relationship between the two Chambers, in Canada or in the United Kingdom, the same principles apply. There are two Chambers in Ottawa. There were, at one time, two chambers in five provinces out of ten.
> So it is not a problem with federalism. The problem relates to bicameralism, as they say in political science, where we have two chambers.

Senator Beaudoin's view has the charm of audacious novelty. He reveals that neither John A. Macdonald nor George Brown really understood the Confederation plan.

He reveals that Senator Arthur Meighen was in his cups when, in 1937, Meighen said:

> Our Maritime Provinces declined to enter Confederation if the control of Canada's parliament was to be wholly in the hands of a majority, because under those circumstances they felt their views would be swept out of effect by the larger populations of our mid-continent areas. Lower Canada also insisted on the territorial principle, and that principle is still the basis of the Senate's composition.

Honourable senators, we do not have to go so far afield to get a sound interpretation. On May 13, 1987, Senator Duff Roblin, told us that the Senate has a federal function. I would recommend that all honourable senators take up the Hansard of that day, May 13, 1987, and they will find a carefully considered examination of the Senate of Canada. It will promote thought. I do want to quote his words and I am glad he is here although I am sorry to embarrass him because I know he is a modest man. He said:

> While representation by population is the first principle of democracy and it is embodied in the House of Commons, representation by regional or provincial representation is the first principle of federalism and is represented and embodied in the Senate!

In that address Senator Roblin sought to refute the idea that we can rely on representation by population. He went on to tell us that he favoured an elected Senate and he told us of the electoral scheme which he thought should be adopted. He also told us that the powers of the Senate should be left exactly as they are now except with regard to appropriation bills, strictly defined. The only change in the powers of the Senate Senator Roblin advocated was that the Senate's powers on appropriation bills, what we call "supply bills," would be reduced.

I conclude from all this—

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, may I just draw my honourable friend's attention to the fact that, while he was kind enough to quote some of my speech, there is a thought in there that I think is important in connection with powers with which he did not deal. Perhaps I may briefly allude to it and say that one of the problems that concerned me when I wrote that speech was how to resolve differences of opinion between the two houses. I proposed a certain formula for doing that, but I think I made it clear in my speech that I was by no means satisfied that it was the right formula.

Senator Stewart: I am sorry, I did not catch your last comment.

Senator Roblin: I proposed a certain formula for resolving differences, but I think I also made it clear that I had some doubts that that was the best formula and that that subject was open in my mind.

[Senator Stewart.]

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for his comment. I did not intend to give a full summary of what I think is a very important speech.

Senator Roblin: I only raise the point because Senator Stewart talked about the powers of the Senate. The powers of the Senate on the question of resolving deadlocks is fundamental to any question of Senate reform.

Senator Stewart: In any case, Senator Roblin, my point was that, unlike Senator Beaudoin, you feel that the Senate has a place in the Parliament of Canada because it embodies the federal principle. That was the purpose of my reference to your address.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, on a question of privilege, would Senator Stewart repeat what he just said about me? I believe he said that I declared the Senate has no role in the federal state of Canada. I never said that.

Senator Stewart: I did not intend to summarize or gloss over Senator Beaudoin's speech. I simply quoted what he said.

Senator Beaudoin: Do not summarize too much.

Senator Stewart: I simply quoted what the honourable gentleman said and I would be quite happy to give him the page reference.

Senator Bosa: Quote it again.

Senator Molgat: Quote it again.

Senator Stewart: Other senators, on both sides of the house, want to speak on this debate. I will be more than happy to give Senator Beaudoin the page reference from which I quoted.

Senator Beaudoin: I am just asking you about the summary that you gave. You declared, "Senator Beaudoin said that the Senate has no role in the federation of Canada." I never said that.

Senator Stewart: Senator Beaudoin, will you please—

Senator Beaudoin: I have always said that the Senate represents the regions. In 1867 we had a Senate based on three regions and since 1915 it has been based on four regions. That is obviously at the core of Canadian federalism and that is exactly what I said.

Senator Stewart: It would appear, Senator Beaudoin, that obviously something has gone wrong in the recording of the Debates.

Senator Beaudoin: Or in the report.

Senator Stewart: I would ask Senator Beaudoin to look at what was recorded in the Debates when he was commenting on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on Royal Recommendations. The page reference I have here is page 1496. You will see several paragraphs there. I would apologize to honourable senators for repeating it.

Senator Bosa: Oh, do it.

Senator Stewart: It states:

> I agree Canada is a federal State, and I agree England is a centralized country. But this distinction only applies to the sharing of jurisdiction between two levels of government. It does not apply to the relationship between elected representatives and the House of Lords in England or between elected representatives in the House of Commons in this country and the Senate.
> Canada's history proves it.

Then Senator Beaudoin seems to argue that the Senate was a descendant of the old legislative councils and did not take on a federal complexion in 1867. The final paragraph I have here— perhaps Senator Beaudoin withdrew or modified it later—states:

> So it is not a problem with federalism. The problem relates to bicameralism, as they say in political science, where we have two chambers.

Senator Beaudoin: May I answer that?

Of course it is a problem of bicameralism. We have two houses here in this country as they have in Great Britain. I was talking about the question of the money bill theory; and the money bill theory is a question between the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England and between the House of Commons and the Senate in this country. It is a question of the rapport between the two houses. This has nothing to do with federalism as such. Federalism is a division of power between the central authority and the provinces or the state. This is what federalism is about.

But we were not talking about that. We were talking about the theory of money bills. The relationship between the House of Commons and the Senate and the relationship between the House of Commons and the House of Lords in England is a question of bicameralism; it is not a question of federalism. Of course, that is the case because Great Britain is not a federal state.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart: Here again, honourable senators, I am afraid that debate is likely to break out.

Senator Simard: Perhaps he can help you write your speech.

Senator Stewart: I think we could start by saying that we both agree that both Canada and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland have bicameral parliaments. We agree on that.

Senator Beaudoin: Yes.

Senator Stewart: Where we seem to part company—at least when I look at what Senator Beaudoin said at an earlier date—relates to the function of the second chamber.

As I read his remarks, Senator Beaudoin says that the Senate of Canada is comparable to the legislative council of the province of Canada or the legislative council in Nova Scotia, or the legislative council in Prince Edward Island. It descended from them.

Senator Beaudoin: I never said that, but that is beside the point because the Senate of Canada was created by the British North America Act of 1867. What existed before is quite another thing.

Senator Simard: You better change subjects. Go back to Meech Lake.

Senator Stewart: Well let me ask Senator Beaudoin a question: He said in his speech that federalism does not apply in the relationship between the House of Commons of this country and the Senate. Then he says:

• (1430)

> Canada's history proves it. We have had a Senate since the beginning of Confederation. In Quebec, we had a legislative council until 1968. Five provinces have had an upper house. All were abolished except for the one in Ottawa.
>
> This proves one thing: Canada and England differ in the sense that here we have shared jurisdictions . . .

I think you mean in 1991 and 1992,

> . . . while there are none in England. However, as concerns the relationship between the two Chambers, in Canada or in the United Kingdom, these same principles apply. There are two Chambers in Ottawa. There were, at one time, two chambers in five provinces out of ten.

When you say there was at one time two chambers in five provinces out of ten, that leads me to believe that you are suggesting that the Senate of Canada did not have a federal function and that it was comparable to the legislative councils which existed before 1867 and which existed in some provinces after 1867.

Senator Beaudoin: I said that Quebec had a Legislative Council until 1968. After Confederation, five provinces had an upper house. Those upper houses were abolished.

I did not make a comparison between the provincial upper houses and the Senate. The Senate, obviously, has a very particular role in this country. According to Macdonald and Cartier, the Senate was created to represent the regions. There were three regions at the time of Macdonald and Cartier: The Maritimes, Quebec and Ontario. The three regions were equal.

In 1915 a fourth region was added. We have a Senate of regions. We do not have a Senate of provinces, according to the British North America Act.

Senator Frith: Yet, we are all provincial senators.

Senator Beaudoin: I do not deny that. The Senate is divided into four regions. Newfoundland and the Territories have a special status.

The relationship between an upper house and a lower house in England and in Canada, as such, is not a problem of federalism. It is a problem of bicameralism. The fact is that England is a unitary state and Canada is a federal state. That is all I have said. There is nothing criminal in that.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to intervene for a moment. It seems to me there is a gap in the logic that Senator Beaudoin has delivered. How can you talk about Canada being a country of four regions? Premier W. C.

Bennett never accepted that attitude and his successors in British Columbia have agreed with him. How can you put forward the idea that Canada is a country of four regions, those regions being represented here in the Senate? If everything else is true, those senators represent their regions within the federal context in this chamber. This is different, Senator Stewart, from the bicameral system in the United Kingdom, where there is no regional aspect to their presence.

Senator Stewart: Clearly Senator Beaudoin feels that the record of his speech is not accurate. I invite him to correct it in his own time.

Senator Beaudoin: I should like to read section 22 of the British North America Act. It says:

> In relation to the constitution of the Senate Canada shall be deemed to consist of four divisions.

Senator Stewart: There is no problem with that.

Senator Beaudoin: That is all I have to say. It is not I who am saying that; it is the constitution which says that.

Senator Stewart: You are saying that we do not have senators from provinces, but senators from regions.

As I understood Senator Beaudoin, before this new revelation, the Senate was intended to be a second chamber comparable to the House of Lords. Federalism was a matter of the division of legislative jurisdiction between the provincial legislatures on the one hand and the Parliament of Canada on the other hand.

Senator Beaudoin tells us that it is now an established convention of our Constitution that the Senate never uses its undoubted legal powers. Responsible government—the executive government depending on the support of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons depending on the support of the people—as now practised in Canada is so flawless a system of government that there is very little for the Senate to do. Responsible government as practised in Canada assures that in the long haul, if not the short, the ministers do what the people want them to do. The expression "responsible government" has been adopted by Senator Beaudoin as a mantra. But utter those words and all the rest of the Constitution shrinks in importance, even the statutory texts.

Before we agree with Senator Beaudoin, perhaps we should ask him a few questions.

Who selects party leaders—potential Prime Ministers—in Canada? Not the people; not even the parliamentary party; not the elected representatives of the people, as Mr. Diefenbaker and Mr. Clark learned. Win a convention of the kind suitable for selecting a presidential candidate in the U.S. and you are well on your way to control over both the executive and the legislative branches.

Who can dislodge a party leader in Canada? Not the elected representatives of the people. As long as a leader can avoid a bad convention he's in as long as he likes. Mrs. Thatcher must look with envy at the security of tenure enjoyed by a Canadian party leader.

[Senator Austin.]

Let me read a comment on how a Canadian political leader holds his party in thrall. The author, Duncan Fraser, now retired as a professor at Acadia University, for years was a principal advisor to Senator Buchanan. A wise Prime Minister would have had him summoned to this house.

Professor Fraser's comment appeared in The Chronicle Herald on December 1, 1990.

> As the events in Britain over the last three weeks have shown the British Tories can act pretty briskly when the occasion demands.

He goes on to describe the political situation in Great Britain. Then he says:

> Since 1975 the leadership of the Conservative Party has been decided by the sitting Tory MPs. It needed only a crisis of confidence or a challenge to the leadership for the MPs to act. The opportunity Conservative Members of Parliament needed came when Michael Heseltine challenged the vulnerable Prime Minister.

He goes on:

> What is perhaps instructive for Canadians is the speed with which all of this took place. The continuity of government was maintained without any interruption and there was no 'lame duck' period. The decision on Conservative party leadership rests with Members of Parliament who are assumed to be well informed on electoral prospects in their constituencies, have taken the measure of the various candidates from close up and are not afraid to dump a leader when needed.
>
> British MPs therefore have a position of power over the party leader which is lacking in Canadian practice. The process also ensures that party leaders are chosen from the elected House of Commons. All of this means that in Britain the MPs purge the Tory leader; the leader does not purge the party.
> This, as well as the absence of leadership convention flimflam and delegate rigging, is something for Canadians to think about.

Honourable senators, perhaps I should mention that Acadia University is in what once was a safe Tory constituency—the constituency represented by George Nowlan until 1965, and then by Pat Nowlan, who has now been purged from the party his father helped rebuild.

Think of the grip a Canadian party leader has on his party. Can a Progressive Conservative member, a Liberal member or an NDP member duly selected by a nominating convention in his or her own constituency run for re-election to the House of Commons as the party candidate without the signed approval of the leader? No, and the financial consequences are heavy. Mr. Patrick Nowlan is a witness to this point. Suppose a general election had taken place on September 4 or November 21, 1990. Mr. Crétien, although not himself a member of the House of Commons, would have been able to reject sitting members as Liberal candidates in that election. Incredible.

How many Prime Ministers who began with majority support in the House of Commons have been compelled to go to the country by reason of lack of confidence? None.

How many Prime Ministers come to office, not because the people want to give them a positive mandate, but because the voters decide that it is time for a change? Who knows? Probably most.

How many Prime Ministers remain in office, not because the people support their policies enthusiastically, but because the other parties are disorganized and too poor to hire good advertisement firms?

What will be the impact of negative campaigning? Devastating, we are told.

Party leaders in Great Britain, as Mrs. Thatcher knows, have nothing like the power over the elected representatives of the people held and enjoyed by party leaders in Canada. Yet, even in Great Britain the complaint is heard that responsible government has been perverted into "an elective dictatorship". Perhaps the most notable statement of this viewpoint was made by Lord Hailsham. He argued that the House of Commons is dominated increasingly by the government, that the government is increasingly controlled by the cabinet, and that the cabinet is increasingly controlled by a few members. The result, he said, is an all-powerful cabinet introducing into Parliament measures which Parliament can not challenge or even consider effectively. Let me quote from his BBC address of 1986 entitled, "Elective Dictatorship." This is what His Lordship said:

> So, the sovereignty of Parliament has increasingly become, in practice, the sovereignty of the Commons, and the sovereignty of the Commons has increasingly become the sovereignty of the government, which, in addition to its influence in Parliament, controls the party whips, the party machine and the Civil Service. This means that what has always been an elective dictatorship in theory, but one in which the component parts operated in practice to control one another, has become a machine in which one of those parts has come to exercise a predominant influence over the rest.

And that is England, where the Tory MPs create their leaders and pull them down!

• (1445)

Senator van Roggen: Would you accept a short question?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator van Roggen.

Senator van Roggen: On that very point that you are making, do you recall the author of the statement that it took the Parliament at Westminster 500 years to wrest absolute power away from the kings and only 100 years to give it back to prime ministers?

Senator Stewart: No. I am sorry, I cannot answer that question. I fail the exam.

Senator Frith: I wish I could, also!

Senator Stewart: I shall try to work harder in the future.

Senator Cools: I think it was Lord Acton.

Senator Stewart: Lord Acton? Yes, it sounds like Lord Acton.

Senator van Roggen: I remember it vividly.

Senator Stewart: Lord Acton would have written that about 120 years ago. Think what he would say now!

What do elections mean? What kind of democratic mandate is conferred when party leaders hide their plans from the people until after the election? Back in the 1930s Ignazio Silone wrote a book entitled: "The School For Dictators". I remember two of his precepts. First, attribute all power and wisdom to the people. Second, establish yourself as the one and only person on whom the people have conferred their mandate. Thus Salone's dictator is the supreme democrat.

Surely, honourable senators, the time has come when we must re-examine the conventional wisdom, the textbook analysis of our political system. It is not enough to talk carelessly about "mandates" and "responsible government". Words, as Thomas Hobbes said, are ". . . wise men,s counters, they do but reckon by them; but they are the money of fools, . . ."

What is responsible government, correctly understood? It is a way of placing the person of the sovereign, most of the time, above and beyond the battle of the interests within the polity. It is an arrangement by which the executive and the legislature are joined—thus, a responsible government system differs from the American system. It is an arrangement for ensuring that ultimately the legislature can bend the executive to its will. It is just plain wrong to say that responsible government requires that both Houses of Parliament must pass any bill the Prime Minister wants. Responsible government does not require democracy—think of mineteenth-century England when responsible government was created. Nor does democracy require responsible government—think of the American Republic.

Having assured us that responsible government, as understood by Prime Minister Mulroney, is working wonderfully well—so well that there is little or nothing for the Senate to do—Senator Beaudoin tells us that he favours an elected Senate. Why? Why any Senate? Especially why an elected Senate, which undoubtedly would be more confident and active than an appointed Senate?

Senator Beaudoin puts great emphasis upon constitutional conventions. That is a familiar concept, especially in the United Kingdom. Much of the English constitution is usage and practice. There is no series of great constitutional statutes there comparable to our Constitution Act, 1867.

There have been several famous discussions of the conventions of the Constitution, for example, by John Stuart Mill, A.V. Dicey and Sir William Anson.

Senator Beaudoin makes much of conventions. He tells us that it is a convention of the Canadian Constitution that the Senate never uses its prescribed powers in a way that frustrates for long a government with a majority in the House of Commons. We ought not, for example, to have precipitated an election on the Free Trade Agreement.

Senator Beaudoin's theory has the beauty of simplicity. For him, responsible government, as he understands it, is the cardinal doctrine of his political faith. Those words, "responsible government", have become his mantra. I must confess that I am far more skeptical than Senator Beaudoin in constitutional matters.

First, does responsible government require that all legislative power be concentrated in the House of Commons, a house elected on the basis of representation by population? Is it not true, as Senator Roblin said on May 13, 1987, that Canada needs a Constitution which embodies the federative principle? Second, does responsible government require that the executive government succeed in having all its measures enacted by Parliament? If it does, given the way we select party leaders, responsible government has been transformed into what Lord Hailsham has called "elective dictatorship."

Senator Beaudoin is so committed to the doctrine of responsible government as he understands it that, as we have seen, he seems to find himself obliged to argue that the Senate does not and never did embody the federal principle.

What is a constitutional convention? For example, does the elapse of many years when a prescribed right is not exercised expunge that right? "Yes" says Beaudoin, in the case of free conferences." "No", says Beaudoin, "in the case of voting by the Speaker of the Senate. "No, absolutely not," says Beaudoin, in the case of section 26. "Yes", says Beaudoin, in the case of Senate amendments to government bills.

Does the age-old constitutional convention that public money is not to be spent without express appropriation by Parliament mean that it is unconstitutional for the government to use special warrants so as to overcome the need to meet Parliament? "No, of course not," says Senator Beaudoin. On May 17, 1989, he stood in this chamber to confirm, by his vote, the right of the government to spend an unlimited sum of money for any purpose thought urgent for the public good—for example, the famous shrub survey by the government—provided only that the government makes sure Parliament is not in session.

In one instance—the powers of the Senate, prescribed by the Constitution Act—convention renders the statutory constitution mute. In another instance—special warrants—the prima facie meaning of a statute sets aside an age-old constitutional convention. It is truly bewildering, especially when we remember that in these matters Senator Beaudoin exerts himself to be exact.

Senator Frith: Did you say "exort"?

Senator Stewart: No, "exert". I said "exerts himself to be exact."

If some consistency could be found in his arguments from convention, it would be far easier to understand the properties essential to a convention.

Naturally, all senators from Nova Scotia want to vote against the GST. But, misled by Senator Beaudoin and the NDP, they may think that the Senate has no right to amend or defeat money bills. Beaudoin and the NDP are wrong.

[Senator Stewart.]

Obviously, there is a difference of opinion between Senator Beaudoin and me over the purpose behind the creation of the Senate—at least I thought there was until earlier today. I ally myself with Senator Roblin.

But let us set that disagreement aside for a moment.

Senator Beaudoin: Could I say something for the purpose of the record?

Senator Stewart: Yes.

Senator Beaudoin: I have never said—never, never—

Senator Stewart: Never?

Senator Beaudoin: —that this house cannot set aside a bill from the House of Commons. I have never said that. I made a long speech on the conventions of the Constitution. You would find it greatly interesting, sir, if you read the patriation case of the Supreme Court of Canada. The nine justices of the Supreme Court state therein what the convention of the Constitution is. Obviously, you do not know.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Hastings: Tell us about a conference.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Beaudoin for conceding the argument. He is obviously angry. There is an old adage that tells you what that means.

Senator Simard: That is pretty weak on your part, though.

Senator Stanbury: At least it is polite.

Senator Stewart: We can set that disagreement aside for a moment. I must tell Senator Beaudoin that I was reading the English version of what he said. It well may be that the English version does not capture the nuances of his statement. But let us set that disagreement aside.

Senator Beaudoin: It is not a question of language, sir. It is a question of comprehension.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stanbury: Whose comprehension?

Senator Stewart: Well, senator—

Senator Beaudoin: You can read it in French, if you want.

Senaator Stewart: Your speech is on the record.

Senator Beaudoin: Of course it is.

Senator Stewart: I am quite prepared to leave the dispute to the verdict of other readers.

Senator Simard: At least Senator Thériault can do much better than you are doing now.

Senator Stewart: And I look forward avidly to your speech, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: I think Senator Thériault should be next.

Senator Stewart: I look forward to your speech. But, of course, Senator Murray has you muzzled. I can see the gag even from here.

Senator Barootes: Could we take the rest of your speech as read?

An Hon. Senator: Before you put your foot in it again.

Senator Stewart: No, Senator Barootes. I want to give you plenty to rebut when you get up to speak. I look forward to your rebuttal. In fact, I sigh for it. Will you be speaking today or tomorrow?

Senator Stanbury: Senator Barootes is speaking for about 20 hours.

Senator Stewart: Let us accept for a moment—

Senator Simard: No, never!

Senator Stewart: I was going to say, let us accept for a moment Senator Beaudoin's contention, but you, Senator Simard, do not wish to do that, and I understand why.

Let us suppose that our differences over the legislative role of the Senate are simply the standard differences which beset bicameralism. Indeed, let me go a second mile toward accepting Senator Beaudoin's downgrading of the Senate. Let me accept the view of the present Speaker of the House of Commons that Canada's Constitution ought to be amended along the lines followed by the British when they enacted the Parliament Act, 1911. As amended by the Atlee Labour Government in 1949, the Parliament Act allows the House of Lords to delay a money bill for one month. It allows the House of Lords to delay any other bill for one year. If passed a second time by the House of Commons in a new session of Parliament—that is, if passed at all stages in the House of Commons a second time and in a second session—a bill that has not passed the House of Lords may be presented for Royal Assent, if at least one year has elapsed since the bill was first given second reading in the House of Commons. Bills that authorize borrowing, and which do nothing else, are money bills. Bills that impose taxes, and which do nothing else, are money bills. Bills that appropriate public money, and which do nothing else, are money bills. There go most of our one-dollar items.

● (1500)

How would the Parliament Act have worked in Canada during the past six years?

The Briefing Book to which faithful Progressive Conservatives turn as to a catechism for answers on the perils to which Bill C-62 as exposed in the Senate poses the question: "Why has the government stacked the Senate by appointing eight new Senators?" The reply of the orthodox faithful is supposed to be: "The Liberal senators have consistently obstructed legislative proposals in the Senate after they have been passed by the House of Commons." Then they are supposed to say: "This is contrary to our system of government in which responsibility rests with elected representatives in the Commons." Yet another enlightening comment is: "The government was obliged to overcome the obstructionism of the Liberal Senate majority and defend our system of responsible government." Those are crushing words.

Senator Grafstein: Who said that?

Senator Stewart: These words are from the Progressive Conservative Briefing Book on Bill C-62.

The question to be asked is: Are these words true? Under the Parliament Act we would have had to deal with appropriation bills within one month. It is really shocking how they would have rushed us. Honourable senators, I have had a list made of all the appropriation bills enacted by Parliament since the present government took office. If honourable senators will agree to have this table printed. I will refer to only a few examples.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of table see Appendix, p. 4533)

Senator Stewart: I will start with the first two or three and then skip to another group of two or three.

The first I wish to refer to is Bill C-16, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1984-85. First reading in the Senate was on December 11, 1984. The date the bill was passed was December 13, 1984.

Then there is Bill C-34, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1984-85, which came to us on March 26. The date it was passed was March 27.

Another one was the interim supply bill which also came on March 26 and which was passed on March 27.

The big appropriation bill for 1985-86 based on the main estimates came to us on June 17. It was passed on June 20.

Bill C-29, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1986-87 came to us on December 16 and was passed on December 18. Appropriation Act No. 4, 1987-88 came to us on March 22 and was passed on March 26.

Let me see if I can find one that took a very long time. Bill C-120, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1988-89, came to us on March 29, and was passed the same day.

Bill C-14, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1989-90, was given first reading in the Senate on May 9, 1989. Honourable senators will recall that this is the bill that was delayed so long by the Senate that the government cut off payments for veterans' health services. It ordered that the RCMP were not to get their cheques. The government uttered the threat that civil servants were to be penniless upon the streets while the army was to go unpaid. The bill came to us on May 9, 1989 and was finally passed by the Senate on May 17. Under the Parliament Act, 1911, that act for which the Progressive Conservative government over and over again has cried, we would not have had eight days; rather, we would have had over 28 days. Yet, this is the government which complains that its bills are being held up. It does not know what it is talking about.

What about that famous borrowing authority bill in 1985? What about the ACOA bill in 1988? What about Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance bill in 1990? Let us look at the legislative history of these bills.

The second reading of Bill C-11, the borrowing authority bill, was moved in the Senate on January 22, 1985. The government, as I said earlier, refused the offer to have Part I of the bill enacted immediately. The government held up that part of the bill, and the House of Commons took a holiday from February 15 to February 25. The Estimates were tabled on February 26. On February 27 the Senate gave third reading to Bill C-11. Under the terms of the Parliament Act, the government could have had Royal Ascent to Bill C-11 four or five days earlier, provided of course that the House of Commons had not been on holiday.

The second occasion when the Senate unconscionably caused the government great grief by delaying a bill took place in 1986. Bill C-67, a bill to amend the Parole Act, the so-called gate-ing bill, was moved for second reading on July 2, 1986. Honourable senators will know that it did not receive third reading until July 24, 1986—fully 22 days later. Honourable senators will also remember the outcry raised by Mr. Mulroney and his ministers. Imagine the language they would have had to invent—since their vocabularies would have been completely exhausted—if the bill had been held up a year as the Parliament Act would have allowed.

In 1987, Bill C-18, dealing with the deregulation of trucking, was one of the bills which the Senate delayed unconscionably. According to Senator Doody, as stated in his affidavit of November 7, 1990, the affidavit to which I referred earlier today, that bill was read here on June 22. It, too, was ready for Royal Assent on August 11, 1987. Under the Parliament Act the Senate could have had a full year to deal with it. Of course, in order to overcome the Senate's suspensive veto, it would have had to go through the House of Commons at all three stages again, and in a new session of Parliament.

Similarly, Bill C-19 was read in the Senate on June 22. It was ready for Royal Assent on August 11. Yet, Senator Doody complained in his affidavit about delay.

The Senate was much denounced because it moved slowly on Bill C-22 to amend the Patent Act. Senator Doody cites it in his affidavit as yet another item of evidence showing the snail's pace of business in the Senate. Second reading of that bill was moved in the Senate on May 12, 1987. It was ready for Royal Assent on November 19, 1987, well within the time set by the Parliament Act, and without a second passage in a new session.

Bill C-55 to amend the Immigration Act moved through the Senate well within the time limits of the Parliament Act. Second reading was moved on October 22, 1987, and the bill was ready for Royal Assent on July 21, 1988.

Even Bill C-84, another bill to amend the Immigration Act, moved through the Senate within the time limit set by the Parliament Act. Second reading was moved on September 15, 1987, and the bill was ready for Royal Assent on July 21, 1988.

The Senate was berated in rough language by the government for holding up Bill C-103, the bill to establish the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Not even the Comptroller General could find a single clause in the bill that appropriated money. Under the Parliament Act, the Senate would have had a year to deal with Bill C-103. Second reading was moved on May 18, 1988, and the bill was ready for Royal Assent three months later on August 18, 1988.

[Senator Stewart.]

When government spokesmen complain about legislative delays in the Senate and lament that Canada has nothing like the Parliament Act, they reveal that they simply do not know what they are talking about.

The Mulroney government was aghast at the way the Senate held up Bill C-14, an appropriation bill asking for over $33 billion in the spring of 1989. As I said earlier, that bill cleared the Senate in eight days.

Given the alacrity with which the Senate has dealt with House of Commons bills, perhaps it is not surprising that the government expected Bill C-21, Bill C-28 and Bill C-62 to be passed in a few weeks.

Second reading of Bill C-21 was moved on November 9, 1989. In January, 1990 the government began collecting the higher premiums from employers and employees authorized by the bill even though the bill had not become law. From May 23, 1990, onward the bill was stood day after day, week after week, not by a Liberal senator, but by Senator Ottenheimer. The negotiations to which Senator MacEachen made reference in his speech to this House on October 22, 1990 revealed that the bill could have been passed as early as June. Even taking into account the delay slyly contrived by the government, the bill was ready for Royal Assent on October 28, 1990, well within the one-year limit in the Parliament Act.

The second reading of Bill C-28, Wilson's claw, was moved on December 21, 1989. Even though this bill probably would qualify as a money bill under the Parliament Act, there was no great urgency because the government acted as if the bill were always law, something that would never happen nowadays in the United Kingdom. Month after month, without any authorization by Parliament, the government took money from the people of Canada. The bill could have been given Royal Assent by the end of June, but the government did not want to have the way cleared for Royal Assent. It needed Bill C-28 for its legislative logjam. The bill was ready for Royal Assent on October 18.

The second reading of Bill C-62 was moved on May 1, 1990 in this House. It is questionable that Bill C-62 passes the tests for a money bill under the Parliament Act. I say that, because to qualify as a money bill a bill must contain no administrative provisions. The provisions for the government machinery to collect the tax cannot be in the bill if it is to qualify as a money bill, according to the rulings of the Speaker of the House of Commons at Westminster. At Westminster finance bill after finance bill is disqualified as not being a money bill for the purposes of the Parliament Act. Honourable senators, the conclusion to which I am driven is that if a constitutional amendment along the lines of the Parliament Act were to be made in Canada, the result in almost every case would be, not the more rapid progress of government bills but instead far slower action in the Senate.

● (1515)

We deal with most appropriation bills in a few hours, at the most a few days. Under the Parliament Act, that happy dawn, we will have a whole month for "money bills". When have we held a bill for a year? The Parliament Act will make that the approved course of action for every highly unpopular measure, for every measure such as Bill C-22, the bill to amend the Patent Act.

Honourable senators, I have spoken for some time and I now want to yield the floor to any senator opposite who wishes to participate in the debate. As I said at the beginning, I wanted today to address particularly the senators from Nova Scotia, especially the new senators from Nova Scotia. I wanted to make various points to them.

I wanted to say that this is a bad tax for the people that the senators from Nova Scotia represent. Senators from Alberta, from the North and, indeed, senators from all parts of Canada have said it is a bad bill for those parts of Canada as well. But putting that aside, if this tax is a good tax for anybody, if this shift from a manufacturers' tax is a good tax for anybody, it is good for the manufacturers in the golden triangle, especially the internationals and the multinationals.

Those of us who live in Nova Scotia, out on the rim of the saucer, the rim that dries up first, will be hard hit by this tax. Earlier today I drew attention to section 146 of the British North America Act where in elegant prayerbook language we have provision for an intercolonial railway. We counted on that intercolonial railway to make us part of a great British North American free trade area. Well, it did not work out that way and now we have a Free Trade Agreement with the United States, which I hope will be beneficial to certain parts of the country. Certainly, the argument can be made that it will be beneficial to places around Lake Ontario. It probably will promote economic activity in what used to be called The Empire of the St. Lawrence and in the North American Heartland. This is the area in which there are people who will be favoured by this bill, Bill C-62. This is pre-eminently the manufacturing area of Canada. The taxes coming off the products of these people is being shifted to the consumers all across Canada. This is a tax that is not good for most of the people in Nova Scotia.

Then there is a second question: Will it reduce the debt? We are told that it will. Will it? Those who say that it will reduce the annual deficit, and thus the debt, are telling us that there will be new revenue, but they are also implying something else. They are telling us that there will be no new program expenditures, because no matter how much new revenue there is, if there are new program expenditures which are of equal value, there will be no new money to reduce the deficit. The deficit will remain the same in any year and there will be no new money to pay down the debt.

We have had no assurances with regard to new expenditures. Read what the Prime Minister said. Read that wonderful letter that Senator Everett received. Of course, any new money will go to reduce the deficit! Revenue from every tax goes to reduce the deficit. If there are new expenditures, where will they be made? I have a shrewd guess that what we are likely to see is certain corporate tax cuts and certain new tax expenditures. They will be advantageous to the manufacturers who operate in the golden triangle. The argument will be made that if these people are going to be successful in the new North American free trade area they have to have a level playing field. If that does not work, the argument will be made that globalization is upon us and that they need all the help the Treasury can deliver.

Then there is a third argument. It will be said that given responsible government and the government's mandate, senators from Nova Scotia have no choice as to how to vote on Bill C-62. I have invited honourable senators today to look behind those words to discover their real meaning. Words can be very deceptive. They are, as Thomas Hobbes said, the money of fools.

Responsible government, yes, but let us remember that responsible government means only that the executive government is responsible to the House of Commons. Let us not confuse responsible government and democracy. Indeed, in the 19th century when responsible government was introduced, there was no democratic suffrage. That term "responsible government" has a very specific meaning. But now, as I said earlier, it is being used as a mantra. It does not mean legislative control by a person selected at a convention in Winnipeg or in Calgary over both the legislative and executive branches.

Then there is the mandate. Yes, the Prime Minister can get a mandate from the electorate to head up the executive government and, yes, the Prime Minister can get a mandate from the people if an explicit policy question is addressed to them. Beyond that the word "mandate" is a trap for fools.

Honourable senators from Nova Scotia will have to watch out for another misleading proposition. It will be said, "To defeat Bill 62 is inconsistent with the role of the Senate. The Senate should not defeat or even openly amend bills from the other place. The Senate should follow Senator Murray's doctrine of pre-study." I dealt with that earlier, repeating, as Senator Roblin says, ad nauseam quotations from Senator Murray. Our sole is not pre-study. That is not an approach that we ought to adopt again, given the devastating and valid criticism of it.

I ask the question, "Does the Senate pass the bicameralism test?" Federalism aside, I have applied the test of the Parliament Act and I defy any senator to show that, with the exception of one or two bills—the borrowing authority bill, on which we were over, I think, by five days, and Bill C-28, which made no difference because the government was already clawing—that act woul dhav ehelped the government. I invite honourable senators to show how the Parliament Act of 1911 would have reduced the actual, as distinct from the legal, powers of the Senate.

This, as I say, honourable senators, is a bad time for a bad bill. We have had the Free Trade Agreement. On that the government received a mandate, no question about that. But the Free Trade Agreement taxed the health of the body politic. We then had the Meech Lake Accord where we had an example of executive federalism applied in an area to which it was most inappropriate. We had "elective dictatorship" applied to ram the record through not only the House of Commons but the legislatures of several provinces. But, of course, that was "responsible government"!

Even if this were not so bad a bill, this is not the time when we can impose this bill upon the body politic of Canada. The bonds of consent which are essential to any government are severely strained. I realize, of course, that bureaucrats are not concerned by these factors. They love to have their way. They get their head like a team of horses and there is no stopping them. However, wise politicians realize that politics is the art of the possible. That proposition is as true now as it was 2,400 years ago.

I appeal to all honourable senators on both sides of this chamber to be good politicians. I appeal to them to protect the health of the Canadian body politic. I appeal to them to vote against this tax.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, if any senators on the other side wish to participate inthe debate, I will be happy to yield the floor.

Honourable senators, I know that my rising to my feet heralds in the moment you have all been waiting for with bated breath for several days. Before I start my remarks I do want to compliment Senator Stewart because, apart from the length of his address—and I regret that I only heard that part of it since arriving here after 11 o'clock this morning—it is not often that you hear an address of that length containing so much meat, so much substance, so much good judgment and so much research. I congratulate him on the quality of the speech he has just made.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator van Roggen: I wish I could assure you that you will receive the same quality from me, but I am afraid you will not, although I may try for the same length.

Senator Lucier: You may surprise us.

Senator van Roggen: Length is one thing; quality is another.

Honourable senators, so much has been said on this subject.

Senator Simard: Enough.

Senator Frith: Not yet.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Simard said that enough has been said, but many of us would be delighted to hear from any of you on that side some defences to this very poorly conceived, poorly timed piece of legislation.

Senator Stanbury: There are none.

Senator van Roggen: Among the remarks and positions that have been taken by various people in support of the concept of a VAT-type tax in Canada, many are agreed that it would be an improvement on the manufacturers' sales tax we have, but they tend to neglect the point that all those other industrialized countries where you have a VAT tax—being most of Europe where it works perfectly well—are unitary states.

Over a year ago I remember some friends of mine in Vancouver saying, "Surely, George, you are in favour of a VAT tax," to which I replied, "Yes, if Mulroney were not such a stubborn mule and such a poor politician, he would probably be moving forward with public support on this matter." What he would first need to do is recognize the fact that Canada is a federal state and not a unitary state. He would also have to recognize that this is the first time in history that an attempt has been made to impose a VAT-type on a federal state. I understand that Germany is a federal state in a technical sense but not so far as a VAT tax is concerned. Mr. Mulroney would have to recognize that we cannot simply bring in a federal sales tax in Canada and lump it in on top of all the provincial sales taxes, particularly in view of the fact that they range from zero to 14 per cent. But what is the attitude? The attitude is that they won't agree. "We will do it anyway. It doesn't matter how clumsy or how impossible it is, it will simply be done."

I understand that at some point the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, did have a meeting with the provincial finance ministers asking them to go along and harmonize their tax with the federal tax and they, quite predictably, said no. I do not blame that on Mr. Wilson, but anybody with an ounce of political sense should have known they would say no.

What about a different scenario? What about the Prime Minister understanding something of Canada; understanding we are a federal state; and understanding that you cannot intelligently introduce this sort of tax in two layers? He could have called the provincial premiers to an open, televised, dominion-provincial first ministers' conference where the public of Canada could hear the arguments put forward by the federal government, saying, "In light of the new free trade agreement with the United States we must get rid of our manufacturers' sales tax for the benefit of our exporters and our manufacturing competitors around the world. To do this we need a substitute tax, and this is the one used in other industrial countries in the world with whom we compete. I want you to come and join us in a harmonization of provincial and federal sales taxes with a division of the proceeds of this tax between the two levels of government." All of the provincial premiers might have said no. Yet, if they had said no, the people of Canada would have had an idea of where the problem lay and you and the Prime Minister would have been in a position to at least have some public support in this clumsy effort of laying one tax on another. Alternatively, he could have said, "Well, we tried and we were unable to do this because of the provinces. We will have a fresh look at transfer payments." There are ways to do things and there are ways not to do things and I can assure you that you sure figured out the way not to do things.

We have all also heard about the degree to which this tax, particularly when it was first introduced at 9 per cent, was going to be a real cash cow. Various estimates were given as to the extra billions that it was going to provide to the government over and above the proceeds of the tax that it was intended to supersede. I will not at this moment get into the absolute nonsense of saying in one breath that it is revenue neutral and in the next breath that it is going to pay down the deficit. Of all the political stupidities, again that has to be one of them.

The average man I have spoken to on the street in recent years has to be concerned about the level of debt in this country. He is concerned about the deficit and the capital carrying charges on this debt, which keep our interest rates so high and our dollar up. People have said to me, "Why won't the government agree that any extra money it receives from this tax will be allocated specifically to the debt. Why is it not stipulated that this will be the case?" That was the thrust of Senator Lawson's amendment. No, honourable senators, we do not even have that. They are too greedy when they look at this extra money. Dear knows what programs they might spend that money on.

I have, framed on the wall of my office—and it has been there since the first weeks I came to the Senate just as a reminder to me and to friends who might come in for a drink—a quotation of Adam Smith's. It says:

> It is the highest impertinence and presumption in Kings and Ministers to pretend to watch over the economy of private people and to restrain their expense . . . they are themselves always and without any exception the greatest spendthrifts in the society.

That is the kings and ministers. It goes on as follows:

> Let them look well after their own expenses and they may safely trust private people with theirs. If their own extravagance does not ruin the State that of their subjects never will.

That was written in 1776 and it is something we should well pay attention to today in all parties, in all parts of Canada and at all levels of government.

Honourable senators, with these preliminary observations I would like to refer to some of the briefs I have received. Many of you will have received similar briefs and you may or may not have taken the time to read them. I trust that the briefs I have chosen will not be the ones that other speakers have already referred to. Of course, I have not been in the chamber every hour of the last several days.

One brief in particular, which was handed to me a few weeks ago by my doctor, who asked me if I would see that it got into the record, is from the President of the Canadian Medical Association on the effect of the application of this tax on doctors.

It is fine for the government to make a big fellow of itself and to say to the public, "Oh, this tax does not apply to doctors' bills and medical expenses." That sounds marvellous. It is quite appropriate that a tax of this nature should not fall on these types of fees and costs. But, from this material, let us see what will happen in practice. This is typical of the many hundreds of thousands of—I won't say "anomalies" of this bill because a lot of bills have anomalies, but I think it is a typical example of why the bill must be defeated and must be reworked before it is imposed on the Canadian public.

The heading of this particular brief indicates that the GST will cost—not the public who are exempt by government decree so as to make big fellows of themselves—the doctors themselves $100 million per year. The brief states:

> "Surely this is the most unfair tax ever levied against any segment of Canadian society. Doctors are to have the costs of their medical practice taxed, and to accept a significant reduction in income, so that patients can receive the doctors' services GST tax-free," was how the CMA described the proposed legislation on the Goods and Services tax to the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.
> Under the proposed Bill C-62, the services of physicians are to be tax exempt. We will not be required to collect the 7% GST from patients or provincial/ territorial health care insurance programs for medically necessary services.
> As a result, unlike business operations or other self-employed professionals such as lawyers, physicians will not be eligible for tax credits for the GST we pay on goods and services bought for our practice.

Honourable senators, while the lawyer, whose clients are not exempt from the GST, has to pay the tax, he, therefore, has a tax payment against which he can apply for a tax credit for the costs of the goods and services he requires to operate his business. However, in the case of a doctor, as he pays no tax on the services to his patients, he has no tax paid on which to apply for a credit for all the goods and services he requires for the operation of his practice. Therefore, there will be a net thievery out of the doctors' pockets of, by their estimate, $100 million per year.

Senator Hastings: Will they recover that?

Senator van Roggen: They cannot recover it. It does not come back. So much for the fairness of this tax.

The brief goes on:

> Secondly, provincial governments have indicated they will not increase medicare benefit schedules to reimburse physicians for GST-caused increases in costs of practice.

Senator Stanbury: I wonder if Senator van Roggen has thought, or if the government may have thought, of what effect this injustice will have on the negotiations that provincial governments will now have with the doctors for setting future schedules. It is difficult for me to believe that that will not be a factor in those discussions.

Senator van Roggen: It will be a factor. The degree to which the provincial governments agree to compensate the doctors under the health scheme for that will, of course, be a shift from the doctors of some of that $100 million to the provincial governments and which the provincial governments, of course, will never receive back from the federal government.

• (1545)

My concern, however, is that nearly all provincial governments are in quite desperate states of deficit financing and in some cases are refusing to negotiate with the doctors regarding their fees. I am concerned that this will add to the problem. Far from the provincial governments absorbing this, they are likely to hang tough, and we are going to start down a road in Canada of seeing an attrition of the doctors who will stay in this country. However, I do not want to deal with the medical health system at the moment. There are problems there which could be the subject of another debate.

The letter from the President of the Canadian Medical Association continues:

> Lastly, physicians, unlike other health care professionals, are prohibited by the Canada Health Act and/or related provincial law from passing on the increased costs by "extra billing" patients.
>
> I urge you to read the following document with care. I draw four things in particular to your attention:
>
> The questionable GST status of CMPA membership fees;

I will come to that a little later.

> The marked increase (400 %) in GST, where the practice is conducted in association with a management company;

That is an appalling aspect of this problem which I am putting before you. I will come back to that in a moment.

> The major variation in GST impact according to type of practice and discipline concerned;
>
> The marked increase in GST impact where federal and provincial sales taxes are combined into a national sales tax.
> Note: As forecast in the CMA brief, a national sales tax of 14% will be in effect in Quebec by 1992. Other provinces are expected to follow the Quebec example.
> The CMA has had extensive consultations with the ministers and senior officials of the Department of Finance and National Revenue over several months. In addition to the lobbying conducted by CMA officers and staff, we have, for the first time, retained the services of a professional lobbyist.
>
> The Department of Finance acknowledges that there are "special problems" related to the application of the GST to physicians.

Senator Frith: That is rather euphemistic.

Senator van Roggen: They acknowledge there are $100 million worth of special problems, but they do not do anything about them.

[Senator Stanbury.]

The letter continues:

> The CMA has had extensive input in proposing National Revenue regulations regarding GST exempt medical devices.
>
> Bill C-62 was amended whereby (Section 10) services ordered by physicians but provided by others (for example, the staff of clinic management companies) may be made tax exempt.

That is a benefit to the patient, of course. It continues:

> We have had considerable input into several National Revenue documents such as the GST Guide for Medical Services, which we will receive in the near future.
>
> But we have not yet succeeded in obtaining the necessary changes in the law, the regulations or government policies to ensure that physicians are treated equitably and fairly. In particular we seek your help to realize three objectives.
> 1. That CMA membership fees are made tax exempt.
> 2. That expensive high-tech medical equipment (such as that used in diagnostic imaging X-rays, ultrasound, etc.), therapy (laser equipment for cataract surgery, etc) and private laboratory medicine be declared GST exempt.

At the moment these things are to be taxed. The physician pays the tax and cannot pass it on to the patient. It continues:

> 3. That, because of the unique situation under the proposed law, physicians be granted an annual (rebate or income tax deduction) that would place them in the same tax position under the GST as under the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax.
> The CMA is not seeking special tax exemptions for physicians; we simply request that we be treated fairly, on a basis equitable to that of other self-employed professions.

Some of the criteria for this tax were that it would be revenue-neutral, visible and fair. I think those have all been forgotten. It goes on to say:

> We need your help.
>
> Please, read this material carefully.
>
> Write, supporting the views and recommendations of your professional association or express your own views to . . .

This is a letter to members of the profession from the president.

I will read the attached brief and comment upon it. It says:

> On behalf of the Canadian Medical Association (CMA) and our 4,500 members, I thank you for this opportunity to present the major concerns of physicians . . .

Senator Barootes: Is the figure of 4,500 correct?

Senator van Roggen: It says here 4,501.

Senator Barootes: CMA membership is approximately 45,000.

Senator van Roggen: This must be a misprint. Thank you, Senator Barootes. With that emendation, it says:

> On behalf of the Canadian Medical Association (CMA) and our 45,000 members, I thank you for this opportunity to present the major concerns of physicians for this proposed legislation.

The estimates of this cost to the doctors of Canada is $100 million; what would the total intake be under this tax if this same type of unfairness were applied across the board to all members of society?

I was wondering how many doctors per thousand people there were in Canada. With 45,000 members, I would say there is one doctor for every 500 or 600 people in Canada. That would be about one-fifth of one percent of the population of the country. One-fifth of one percent of the country is being unfairly taxed to the tune of $100 million. If you multiply that by the total population, you come up with a figure of $50 billion.

Senator Barootes: I suppose that if ordinary citizens earned as much in their year at work as physicians, your figures would be accurate.

Senator van Roggen: Yes.

Senator Barootes: Unfortunately they do not.

Senator van Roggen: We all know that doctors are well paid but I do not think they are overpaid for the work they do. The doctors who saved my life in Vancouver are not overpaid.

Senator Barootes: There could be some argument about that.

Senator van Roggen: Before the next several hours are over, Senator Barootes, there may be several of you wishing that they had not been so successful. This brief goes on to say:

> The CMA has and continues to strongly support the goals of tax reform and the government's efforts to simplify the tax system, to make it more equitable and fair, and to improve Canada's ability to compete in international markets.

They are not alone in that. Many briefs contain that same statement. It continues:

> To improve the standard of living, including the health status of the population—all laudable goals—the association unequivocally supports the premise that reducing poverty, and public education, are the most important requirements to improving the health of Canadians.
> I regret to tell you that for the vast majority of physicians the proposed GST is far from fair or equitable. We seek your help and advice to meet those criteria.
>
> Physicians in private practice are self-employed professionals but they practise their profession within the context of a small, or not so small, business. We have rent to pay, a staff payroll to meet, equipment and supplies to buy, and professional and other services that must be retained.
> As with small businesses, and professions, many of these goods and services will be subject to GST. But we will not be treated the same way under this legislation.
>
> The services of physicians are to be GST exempt. Thus, unlike other professionals like lawyers . . .

and chartered accountants and others,

> . . . we will not be allowed to claim tax credits for the 7 % GST tax paid on goods and services purchased.
>
> Provincial governments have indicated that they will not increase payment levels to pay the increased cost of practice.
>
> Finally, unlike other self-employed health care professionals, physicians are prohibited from increasing their fee schedule or to "extra bill" by the Canada Health Act and/or provincial laws.

So they cannot pick this up directly from their patients.

> We understand the federal governments need to avoid a tax on the services of physicians that would be described as a tax on the sick. We also recognize the problems that would be created by the fact that the vast majority of those services are paid for by the health insurance programs of provincial governments.
> While we did not seek GST tax exempt status on our services we understand why the Government of Canada made that decision.

Of course, it is not only of benefit to the patients, but to the individual provincial governments who pay almost all the bills in Canada under our various systems.

> However, from the physician's perspective, GST becomes one of the most unfair, inequitable taxes ever levied against any segment of society.

Senator Stanbury: Senator van Roggen, I would like you to comment on an article in The Medical Post of October 30, 1990. It is written by Ken Pole. It is regarding Dr. Stan Wilbee, who is a Conservative Member of Parliament in the House of Commons. Dr. Wilbee wrote this letter, and it reads:

> As one of three government members who are medical doctors, I have been pushing for changes that would place physicians in either a zero-rated status or allow them to pass on the tax and claim the tax inputs. I urge other doctors to phone, come or write or visit their government MPs to let them know their concerns because time is getting short.

Perhaps not short enough for the people on the other side of this house.

> In an interview a few days later in his second-floor Confederation Building office on Parliament Hill, framed by west coast art on the wall behind him the 58 year old MD MP explained that his concern about GST and other government initiatives has forced him to question his own status as a Progressive Conservative. However, little more than two years into what could be a five-year term in Ottawa, he confesses uncertainly.

● (1600)

> "I took a look at what we were doing and began to question my position in the party," he recalled. He was at home at the time, contemplating the September 24 beginning of the fall sitting of the House of Commons and the possibility of quitting to sit as an independent. So he faxed off a letter to Prime Minister Mulroney late on Friday, September 14.

Mulroney phoned him at noon the following Sunday, inviting him to 24 Sussex Drive for a private meeting a week later, the day before the Commons returned from its 14-week summer break. It lasted about an hour.

"He didn't twist my arm or try to browbeat me," Dr. Wilbee said. There was what he calls a "frank" exchange of views and his attitude now is wait-and-see.

That doesn't mean he's about to lie down and let the GST steamroller the medical profession. Far from it, given his conviction that the profession's apparent complacency reflects the fact that most doctors are still unaware of how they'll be affected by the 7% retail- level GST that's supposed to kick in Jan. 1 as a replacement for a manufacturing-level sales tax averaging 13.5%.

"From personal experience, it's sort of the last thing you think of doing: phoning your mayor or MLA or member of Parliament," he said. "You sort of have the idea that you've elected these guys to look after your welfare. Then you're kind of surprised when things come to pass that are not favourable to us. I just don't think that the average physician is aware of how it's going to affect them personally. Perhaps it hasn't been written up in the journals enough.

"I've seen a couple of articles in The Medical Post and there's been one in the Canadian Medical Association Journal, but . . ." His voice tapered off for a few moments before he agreed that GST coverage may just have been lost in the welter of material that accumulates on many doctors' desks and bedside tables only to be tossed out eventually, unread.

Yes, the Canadian Medical Association (CMA) has presented briefs to the Commons and Senate committees that worked on the GST Bill C-62, which has been stalled by an unprecedented type of procedural blockage in the Senate.

That is an interesting description. He goes on to say:

"You feel that the CMA is protecting you—but there's only a certain amount they can do."

He professed surprise at what he feels is the lack of "proactive" effort of the CMA in that there have been no representations to individual MD-MPs. "Maybe they don't bother us, figuring that we're onside and they want to expend their efforts elsewhere.

They could look at a couple of MDs in this house, I would think—at least two, three or four. He goes on to state:

"Maybe they don't bother us, figuring that we're onside and they want to expend their efforts elsewhere. But, again, they may have the misconception that MPs read all those reports they have made to the finance committee and that the MPs are aware of their position. Two hundred and fifty briefs are presented to a committee."

[Senator Stanbury.]

He then goes on about letters. He states:

The tenor of the letters is critical. "In British Columbia, they're feeling the squeeze with the provincial government putting a ceiling on their incomes or being very tough in negotiations," Dr. Wilbee said. He said a former partner's expenses had risen by $11,000 while his annual gross income was up $8,000. "So he's $3,000 behind. If you add another $2,000 GST on that, it's going to make a serious dent in his disposable income."

However, there's still a feeling, notwithstanding the CMA's lobbying and committee appearances, that physicians are fat-cats who don't need the breaks a lot of other professions get. Dr. Wilbee has been told that Don Blenkarn, a government backbencher from the Toronto-area riding of Mississauga, is openly dismissive of physicians' complaints. "It's sort of the regular reaction that doctors get from politicians: 'You're high earners so what are you grumbling about?'"

As it stands today, the draft GST provides for a range of exemptions at the consumer end of the medical train. Asked whether he felt there is room for more, Dr. Wilbee said his basic view is that the GST should be applied right across the board, but at a lower rate, possibly in the 5-5.5% range.

"Forget all the exemptions and just pass everything along to the consumer. It simplifies it and you get away from all these things. Once you start exempting, there's always progression: 'Well, if you exempt that, are you going to exempt this?'"

Is there any possibility that Dr. Wilbee will be able to persuade the government caucus of the merits of his arguments for GST amendments at this stage? Or does he intend a rearguard action that would see the GST legislation amended after it's in effect?

"I had a meeting with (Finance Minister) Mike Wilson last Wednesday," he replied. "I asked him whether there could be changes in the GST—

And this is an important question. He goes on to state:

—to improve the law, to make it fairer to physicians. He said he'd certainly consider it, except for the problem in the Senate. He's afraid to touch anything in the bill because of the difficulty in getting it through as it is."

On the other hand, Wilson evidently is willing to hear proposals that could be incorporated in the next federal budget, which probably will be tabled in February. "He said they would 'consider' changes, which to me is unfortunate," Dr. Wilbee said. "It would be much 'nicer' to have the best bill possible now, but because of the problems in the Senate, it makes that pretty well impossible."

Dr. Wilbee has tried to bring pressure to bear in caucus but so far without much success. He didn't say it, but most backbenchers are unwilling to knock their own leadership too vigorously; that's not the route to cabinet or other special assignments.

"Two weeks ago, we had a special caucus with (Revenue Minister) Otto Jelinek on the GST," Dr. Wilbee said. "I got good support from my fellow MPs."

The response also was fairly supportive when be brought it up at an earlier national caucus. "This is why I'm sort of appealing here to physicians not to take it for granted that your MPs know you're at risk. Many of the MPs weren't surprised to hear it, and they weren't all at caucus."

Although it might seem an obvious thing to ask, there hasn't been any suggestion in caucus that as a physician, Dr. Wilbee is acting ouf of self-interest.

"During the election campaign, one of the questions that I was asked was, "Are you going there to protect the medical profession or to represent the citizens of Delta?" There's a lot of MDs who are residents of Delta and I think I have as much responsibility to protect them against something that will treat them unfairly. If it was looking for a special break for physicians, it would be a different thing. I'm not looking for a special dispensation; I'm just saying that physicians shouldn't have to eat the tax unlike other professions such as law, accounting or architecture."

Senator Barootes: Is that the question?

Senator Stanbury: Yes, that is the question.

Senator Hastings: That was a Conservative member of Parliament.

Senator Barootes: What is the question?

Senator Stanbury: How might that be dealt with by our Speaker?

Senator van Roggen: Senator Stanbury, thank you for that interesting quotation from one of Senator Barootes' confréres not only in the practice of medicine but also in the Conservative caucus.

Many points were made in that article and in your question. I do not know if I made sufficient notes to deal with them all, but I will comment on a few of them.

I wish to comment on Blenkarn's statement, if not direct attitude, that "they are fat cats anyway, so why should they have special consideration?" First, they are no fatter than the lawyers, accountants, senior civil servants and all other sorts of people at that income range in our society, yet they are being given a special penalty. It is not a question that they are not getting a special privilege because they are fat cats. They are objecting because a special impost is being imposed on them that has not been imposed on other professions and other people in a similar income bracket or elsewhere. If you come down to that simple word of fairness, you have to dismiss Mr. Blenkarn's statement as being out of hand.

I gather from his meeting with Mr. Wilson, where he asked for some relief from this particular problem, that he—like he always does and like they all do over there—immediately blamed the Liberals in the Senate. The Liberals in the Senate are apparently responsible for every known thing that is wrong in this country, according to the government. But there is absolutely not one single thing that the Liberals in the Senate are doing that would prevent the government from making—and I understand the difficulty in amending the bill at this late juncture—specific undertakings that in subsequent legislation or regulations they will amend inequities of this nature. Not one single thing has been done. It has been done many times before, though.

I remember endless occasions when we were in power that we were criticized for not amending legislation and sending it back to the House of Commons because there was a Liberal government there, and so on. But at least we went so far as to get a minister of the Crown to appear before the committee concerned and to receive specific undertakings from him on the record that such and such would be changed in the next session of Parliament or the next amendment of the legislation. There is absolutely nothing preventing that being done at this time. We did that regularly.

The doctor was complaining that his confréres in his profession were not inundating their MPs and lobbying as hard as they should. To me this is quite understandable. I find that doctors and other professionals are less knowledgeable of the political process than you might expect. You see the opposite type of thing with lawyers. They would all be up here in droves because they know where to push the buttons. But doctors, God bless them, are busy trying to worry about and treat their patients. Nearly all the doctors that I know are badly overworked. I would not say that they are underpaid, but they are not overpaid. Their mind-set goes to the patient that they must see on Saturday or Sunday—if they are on duty on a weekend—or the operation that they must perform on Monday morning at 8 o'clock, and they must be careful not to have a hangover when they do it. That is where their mind-set is, not having to deal with inequities like those in this legislation. So much for their being a little non-political in dealing with a thing of this sort.

• (1615)

I dealt with the question of their being fat cats, of Blenkarn's statement and of Wilson blaming the Liberals in the Senate for not being able to deal with this. It is like the tax applying to books and periodicals. The Prime Minister himself has half suggested that he hopes something can be done about this. I saw him on television saying words to that effect. What he said was anything but specific. I am quite prepared to be fair and acknowledge in December that you cannot amend this bill without it going back to the House of Commons. That would be a difficult thing to do if you were sitting on the government side.

However, there is nothing to preclude firm undertakings on some adjustments to problems with this legislation that have now been made so demonstrably clear across the country. The government should give firm undertakings that these matters will be dealt with forthwith, if the bill is passed. I do not say that would be sufficient to make it good legislation under the circumstances, but it would be a beginning to some demonstration that the government has some idea that 80 per cent of the people are opposed to this tax and for good reason. I have been dealing with 45,000 doctors who have one of those very good reasons. They are not irresponsible or greedy people.

Senator David: May I interrupt you for a moment, Senator van Roggen, to ask you a question? Since you have received this letter from one of your doctor friends there has been a new regulation arrived at between the CMA and the government concerning private laboratories for blood tests and x-rays. When you say that nothing has been done, I would like to point out that there are new rules concerning at least these two items.

Senator van Roggen: I cannot see how that is a concession by the government which addresses itself to the problem with which I am dealing. The physician is not paying sales tax on the blood test of a patient. If he is, one would wonder that it would be taxed in the first place. I am talking about him paying sales tax on the bandages he buys from suppliers and on the equipment in his office. I am talking about the x-ray machines that he purchases, not an x-ray performed by an outside laboratory which is, of course, exempt, as it should be. If it was not in the first place then it must be an oversight.

Senator David: A doctor pays federal taxes on much of the furniture that he has to buy to equip his office. As you know, all the equipment for a doctor's office is tax deductible from personal income. When all that is calculated and when we take into account the GST increase of $100 million which has been proposed by the Canadian Medical Association, that represents an average of $2,000 in expenses in a doctor's office. Assuming that a doctor's income bracket is not far from the highest bracket, it will cost a doctor approximately $1,000 more per year. As honourable senators know, the medical profession ranks in the first three highest in terms of any profession in Canada.

Senator Grafstein: Because I think it is relevant to Senator David's point, do you intend to deal with the impact of the GST on hospitals?

Senator van Roggen: The particular brief I have been referring to does not deal with hospitals, although I may touch on that matter in my remarks.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps I could raise that question because I think it is relevant. Yesterday I met quite by accident with the senior doctor at the Toronto General Hospital, the largest hospital in Toronto. Yesterday morning, quite by happenstance, he had attended a briefing of senior administrators and senior medical staff concerning the impact of the GST on the Toronto General Hospital. He has undertaken to send to me a copy of the memorandum which the administrators circulated to their senior staff members so that they can fully understand the impact as it applies to hospitals.

This man is not a partisan person. He is one of the top medical men in the world. He is an American who has chosen to come to Canada to perform miraculous operations. He is quite a moderate man in his political views. As best I understand it, he has no political affiliation.

Senator Barootes: He also has no vote.

Senator Grafstein: I believe he does have a vote.

Senator Barootes: Not if he is not a Canadian.

Senator Grafstein: He was not born in Canada. He is an American who has chosen to live in Canada. I am not sure whether he votes or not. He has certainly committed himself to the welfare of Canada. He could work outside Canada at many times the salary he makes. He teaches and performs operations on a regular basis.

I wanted numbers. What he told me is that not only will there be additional costs to the Toronto General Hospital to administer the GST regime, but the cost impact, aside from the administrative impact and the time of doctors, administrators and additional staff, will cost more than $1 million, or 1.18 per cent of their administrative budget. He said to me yesterday that they will not know how they can get that million dollars since in Ontario they are faced with a tremendous budgetary restraint on their costs. They certainly cannot get anything close to the rate of inflation. All of a sudden, another million dollars is going to come right out of the Toronto General Hospital's budget. His concern is that it will more seriously curtail the operations and the medical services of the hospital.

I wonder, Senator van Roggen, if that information is available to you. I hope in the course of the comments I make later on in this debate that I will have that material available in detail to present to senators opposite. I wonder if there was any reference to that information in the CMA brief.

Senator van Roggen: No, I do not have any details on that. When you get them I would be most grateful if you would send a copy to me so that I can give them to my wife who was only a few months ago elected Chairman of the Board of the B.C. Cancer Agency, which is the principal cancer hospital in British Columbia. It is a very substantial operation with a $100 million budget. I know it will be impacted. She has already expressed concerns to me in that regard. However, I have not yet heard any specific figures.

Returning to Senator David's question, of course doctors in paying sales tax on equipment and supplies are having the benefit of any reduction in costs because of the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax, but so is the lawyer, the chartered accountant and the small shopkeeper. I am not talking about it being unfair that he, the physician, should have to pay that tax at the level. Of course he should pay the tax at that level. What I say is totally unfair is that because the government makes a big fellow of itself by exempting the patients, the physician has no way of claiming a rebate when everybody else can claim one. Everybody else has the same income tax benefits and deductibility as does he. It is that a special case is being made of doctors so as to penalize them under this legislation. That is the point I am trying to make.

Therefore, it is another example of the unfairness of this tax when we come down to its actual application. I will continue on with the brief from which I was reading:

> These figures are based on the largest in-depth study of costs of medical practice ever conducted in Canada. The study was conducted by the accounting firm Peat Marwick and Thorne of Toronto.

So this $100 million figure is not a shot in the dark.

> We are pleased to have Mr. Reiner Beltzner, who was a principal in that study and who provided this projected data, to answer any questions you may have on the methodology or results of the study. Over 800 Ontario physicians from all medical disciplines and all parts of the province were involved.
> I want to stress that the figures quoted are the minimal figures for the impact of GST on the clinical practice of physicians.

Honourable senators will be astonished when I come to the different impacts between a single practising physician and a group of physicians in a medical clinic practising together.

> The figures may be slightly higher than for all Canadian physicians but the difference will be minimal. Numerous studies in the field of medical economics indicate that Ontario data is generally only marginally above the average for the country as a whole.
> Lastly, we are informed that the Department of Finance has been studying this specific subject with a more extensive national sample and more current data.
>
> We are sure that the result of that study is available to this committee and will confirm the general thrust of what we will present.
>
> For a family physician in solo practice the GST will increase the costs of practice, after reducing the impact of the existing federal sales tax by $1,596.
> The Department of Finance is questioning whether the Canadian Medical Protective Association, a non-profit medical mutual defence union, which provides professional liability for over 90 % of Canadian physicians, will qualify, as a non-profit body, to provide GST exempt membership.

Imagine even questioning such a possibility. We all know, and thank heaven they are not as high in Canada as the United States, of the absolutely ridiculous personal liability insurance costs of American doctors. They are increasing on Canadian doctors at a steady rate. Should they have to pay GST on those premiums and not have any recovery? That is just an aside. At least the Department is looking at that.

● (1630)

> Should such a ruling be reached, the family physician who does not practice obstetrics, anesthesia or surgery, will have an additional $74 in GST to pay . . . I repeat, this is the minimum figure; for most it will be higher.
> For a specialist in internal medicine, GST will add $2,093 to the costs of practice . . . .For orthopedic surgeons the figure is $2,901, and for ophthalmologists $2,913. For obstetricians and gynacologists who do not deliver babies . . . GST will raise the costs of practice by $2,846. If they deliver babies, it will go up to $3,147.

These figures will increase significantly if the physician is in a clinic or group practice that is operated in conjunction with a management company. The major reason for this increase is that with a management company, the salaries of nurses, clerical staff and so on, that compose 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the cost of practice are subject to the GST.

That 40 per cent or 50 per cent strikes home to me, as a practising lawyer once upon a time, because that is about the cost of overhead in the average law firm where your rent, your bookkeepers, and other things, take about 50 per cent off the top of what you charge the client per hour before you are able to put any money in your pocket to share with income tax people.

Therefore, doctors who are unfortunate enough to be practising in a management company, either with or without others, are going to be paying this GST on their nurses' salaries and other major expenses as opposed to just the bandages, and they still cannot get a rebate. What is the point in the government taking the position that because they do not pay any tax, they therefore are not entitled to a rebate?

Senator David: I think, senator, that it is much more complex than what you are saying because very often the management company is owned by doctors themselves, so they are paying their rent to a management company of which they are the owners. This was a very good scheme for taxation in the past and, of course, there will be a new adaptation because of the GST. However, I do not believe that because this was part of the practice when they are practising in a group, they will not change the type of management company they have and I do not think the GST will be so awful for them. At the present time it is very advantageous for them.

Senator Grafstein: What about the hospitals? What about the hospitals?

Senator David: I am not speaking of hospitals. I am speaking of a private clinic where the management company is usually owned by the doctors who are renting services for tax purposes.

Senator Grafstein: Or their wives.

Senator van Roggen: Well, senator, in answer to your observation—and it was more than a question—that they will have to rearrange their affairs as a result of this, it has surely not become a crime yet in Canada to rearrange your affairs so as to optimize the situation you have under any tax regime, whether income tax or otherwise. This is just another burden cast upon them by the GST.

Senator Simard: Who is going to pay taxes if the doctors are not going to pay?

Senator van Roggen: I am not suggesting that doctors not pay any tax. Don't be—well, I won't use the word that almost slipped past my lips. I am talking about an unfair additional burden being put on one segment of society, not placed on others. I am not talking at all about their not paying any taxes. Do not talk such rubbish, senator.

Senator Simard: You are fighting for exemptions for everybody so who is going to pay taxes?

Senator van Roggen: This is not an exemption I am asking for.

Senator Simard: You are. You are.

Senator van Roggen: It is the repair of an absolutely unconscionable special impost on one small group.

Senator Buckwold: Will the senator take a question?

Senator Simard: Here is an expert.

Senator Buckwold: Doctor Buckwold, if you don't mind. I wonder whether you could compare the situation you are pointing out to other practitioners of health services who are able to pass on by higher fees the impact of this tax? If I could explain that just a little bit so you know what I am talking about and in order to answer, if you did not see me this morning it is because I was at the dentist, and I spoke to the dentist about—

Senator Barootes: He only froze one side of your jaw, unfortunately.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, that is why it is going to be a short speech. It is better than having one side of your brain frozen, which has happened to you in the last while.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: I at least will recover. The problem really is that the government is saying there is no tax on health but because doctors are limited in their ability to collect fees by the provincial plan in which they are involved, an additional amount to cover that increased overhead, which will be placed on medical doctors because of the GST, can only be recovered by higher payments from the provincial plan.

Senator Simard: Or bigger volume.

Senator Buckwold: That is another side to this story. Let us leave out the bigger volume. If you want to work harder, you are entitled to earn more. To get back to my friendly dentist—he should take it a little easier—I asked him how he was going to handle his additional cost and his answer was, "My fees will go up". There is no tax charged at the bottom of his bill, medical and professional services for fillings, plus tax." That is not allowed; it is not legal. The price per filling will go up, and that is fine except that the government has misled people.

Senator van Roggen: It is an invisible tax.

Senator Buckwold: No, it is saying there is no tax on health. The fact is that fees will go up. This is what I want you to comment on. The same is true for all other practitioners who have a direct payment system. We have been unable to convince the department or medical friends who are on the committee that doctors, because of the very nature of their payment process, are the ones who will have to absorb that tax, because most provincial plans have told the doctors they will not recognize this as an additional cost of carrying on their practice.

So I wanted you, senator, to try to relate that to other professions, not just directly to doctors. There are ancillary health services, for example, psychiatric nursing and a wide variety of services, and private ambulances.

I just wonder whether you might elaborate a little on why it is that the medical profession is carrying the brunt and why in fact the government has misled the public in saying there is no tax on health?

Senator van Roggen: Thank you, Senator Buckwold. I think the answer is straightforward and that is that almost without exception doctors are paid by provincial plans, and provincial governments have stated they will not reimburse them for this extra cost, that it is a federal government problem and should be dealt with by the federal government. That applies not only to dentists but to any other people delivering health related services where they are billing the client directly and can hide the cost in their bill as opposed to those who are servicing the patient but billing the government. That is basically where the break comes.

Senator Buckwold mentioned ambulances. The next brief I have concerns ambulances, and I will come to that in due course.

If I might digress, because we do not want to get too serious in this business, Senator Barootes was regretting that you had only half your jaw frozen this morning, but you very quickly said it was better than having half your brain frozen and you went on to say that at least you would be feeling better in the morning. It reminded me of that marvellous story of Winston Churchill being at a dinner, I think, sitting next to Lady Astor, where she said to him at some point late in the meal, "Winston, you are drunk," whereupon he turned to her and said, "And, Nancy, you are ugly. The only difference is that I'll be sober in the morning and you will still be ugly". Senator Buckwold's jaw will be unfrozen in the morning.

Coming back to my remarks, I am sorry to take so long. I thought this brief would go rather quickly, but I am being asked so many interesting questions that I keep losing my place.

Senator Simard: Are you going to start defending accountants pretty soon?

Senator van Roggen: Pardon me, senator?

Senator Simard: Are you going to attack the accountants or defend them? You are trying to be the lawyer for and the defender of dentists and doctors. Whose turn will it be next? Will it be the poor accountant or the lawyer?

Senator van Roggen: I have no objection to the way lawyers and accountants are treated.

Senator Simard: If they pay their fair share?

Senator Frith: Both government leaders are away and the cat is beginning to play again.

Senator Simard: You had a special interest in doctors and dentists, I understand.

Senator van Roggen: It is unfortunate, senator, that you are so dense that you cannot understand the difference between the position of a doctor under this tax and a lawyer, because if I have not already made it self-evident, it is obvious that I need to spend a little more time until I do make it clear, even to you.

The next item here is that for the specialist in internal medicine the GST bill will be $4,534. This keeps going up a little bit. For the family physician it will be $5,471, and for the pediatrician it will be $5,286. Senator Barootes will correct me if I pronounce this incorrectly, for the otolaryngologist, or ear, nose and throat specialist, $8,358, and they cannot make a claim back against any tax as can other professions or businessmen.

For obstetricians, $9,040. This is when you are working in a management company. The cost of GST will be about four times as high in group practice as it will be for those in solo practice, yet surely group practice is not something to be discouraged. I find group clinics are often most effective in providing service to the patient where he does not have to go from doctor to doctor.

The brief states:

● (1645)

> We are concerned that GST will force many of our members to leave group and clinic practices.

This is the rationalization to which you referred, Senator David, but is that the desirable result of this tax, that doctors should have to break up clinics where they provide all services to their patients as opposed to patients having to go from door to door?

Senator David: Again, you are simplifying things. It is even more complex in reality. You have a group practice but if it is a professional group and they share all the expenses and all the revenues, they will encounter the problems of a solo practice. If it is a group practice which employs a management group then your statistical data are quite correct. There is nothing simple in medicine.

Senator van Roggen: No, there is nothing simple in this world. There is nothing simple in this tax either although it is purported to be so simple. If lawyers were being treated in the same way—and I don't want to hear any untoward remarks as a result of this statement—they would all have to break up their firms and go and practice by themselves.

Senator Steuart: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: And make an honest living.

Senator van Roggen: I thought I would get a reaction from someone.

Senator Frith: You only asked that there be unseemly reaction.

Senator van Roggen: I just finished by saying that the cost of the GST will be about four times as high in group practice as it will be for those in solo practice.

The brief states:

> We are concerned that GST will force many of our members to leave group and clinic practices that are very common in Ontario and western Canada. They are cost effective and contribute to high quality health care.

Honourable senators, it says here that they are cost effective and give high quality health care which is what I, as a layman, surmised just a few minutes ago. The brief goes on to state:

> For the benefit of the chairman, I am, of course, referring to such institutes—

And perhaps Senator Grafstein may know of these institutes, or Senator Barootes may, because obviously this comment was made in specific reference to his being on the committee.

> —I am referring to such institutions as the Baltzan and the Medical and Dental clinics in Saskatoon.

I am sure you will agree that it would be a shame if they had to be broken up to save the unfair application of this tax.

Senator Buckwold: Good Tories too!

Senator van Roggen: That would make it even worse.

Senator Frith: That is a contradiction in terms, "Good Tories."

Senator van Roggen: Poor, poor Tories.

Senator Simard: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: Just like "a good Liberal" is a redundancy?

Senator Simard: Have some good manners.

Senator Frith: Can't you take a joke, for goodness' sake? Look at Kelly, he knows a joke when he hears one.

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Can't I tease you?

Senator Hastings: They are all cackling away. The boss is away.

Senator Simard: Davey, when are you going to be speaking?

Senator Steuart: On my birthday, January 26.

Senator Hastings: This must be happy hour.

Senator Frith: Drop by for the happy hour at the Senate.

Senator van Roggen: The next paragraph of this brief, which gets more interesting as it goes along, states:

> The impact of GST on the so-called high tech, high cost of practice medical disciplines is much greater. I refer to areas like radiology and pathologists in private laboratory medicine. In these disciplines, costs of practice can run as high as 75 to 80%.
> They are almost always run in conjunction with a management or a service corporation, involving the ownership or leasing of very expensive equipment, large facilities and staff and, therefore, subject to GST. Unfortunately, the OMA study did not include sufficient numbers to be statistically valid, but Peat, Marwick and Thorne and the OMA have provided us with the impact of GST on a typical radiology practice. GST costs to the solo radiologist, $5,327; for those in a group or clinic practice $15,134.

So we are getting well beyond the nice little suggestion that it is only a couple of thousand bucks and they are highly paid, and so what. The brief goes on:

> In many cases, the clinics or laboratories in question operate in support of, but in a manner of speaking, in financial competition with the laboratories operated by the provincial governments. Those clinics will, of course, be zero rated for GST. In the same way such clinics are in competition with the hospitals. The hospitals will receive an 83% rebate on the GST taxes they pay.

I do not know if that is a partial answer to Senator Grafstein's question. In this brief there is reference to the fact that the hospitals will not be able to apply for a full refund of GST but they will be able to apply for an 83 per cent refund.

Senator Grafstein: As I understand the argument made by the people in charge of the hospital, the net number after all the deductions that will impact the bottom line of the Toronto General Hospital is in excess of $1 million. The number they gave me as a percentage is 1.8 per cent of their budget, which is $1 million, which meant that they ha to cut back. That's after all the various calculations. They suggested that the problem was not only unduly complex, but it would take the time of senior doctors as well as administrators to make these calculations and deal with these policies.

Senator Frith: Ask a question.

Senator Grafstein: The question really is related to—

Senator Simard: That was a speech.

Senator Grafstein: The question obviously is: I take it that there is a discriminatory impact that applies not only to doctors who are practicing alone and doctors who are practicing in groups, but also to the public sector, which is to the hospitals. That appears to be their conclusion after the advice of their experts.

Senator van Roggen: This is a very cursory observation that there was a cost to hospitals but it is a small fraction of the cost to doctors. Hospitals get an 83 per cent rebate and doctors get zero. The brief goes on to state:

> Again, extra-billing is not allowed and there is no indication that provincial governments are prepared to increase payment levels to compensate for the increased costs.
> It is important to recognize that an integrated federal/provincial sales tax, that is foreshadowed in the recent Canada-Quebec announcement, will make the situation even worse.

I might, in parenthesis, say here that it is obvious to myself as one observer that what the government is gambling on, if it can somehow jam this bill through, is that before the next election rolls around other provinces will have been forced to come in to a harmonization program which will make the whole thing a little more palatable. Insofar as this particular example is concerned, it apparently will make it even worse.

[Senator van Roggen.]

The brief goes on to state:

> Mr. Chairman, we are physicians, not experts in taxes or the law. We do not seek—

And, Senator Simard, here is the point.

> We do not seek any special tax break for our members but simply to be treated fairly and equitably and the same as other professions and segments of society.

They are not asking for any special breaks; they are asking to be treated like other people. It goes on to state:

> In a manner of speaking we ask for a level GST playing field.
>
> Toward that end, we are asking you to consider the following recommendations.
>
> The government is negotiating GST rebates to ensure that municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals do not bear an increased tax burden. This is the socalled "MUSH" program.
> Hospitals are to receive an 83% rebate; legal aid societies have been offered a rebate and there is even a 25 per cent rebate on new housing.
>
> We submit that basic fairness should cause the government to quantify an annual rebate available to medical practitioners that would leave doctors in the same position under the GST as under the existing MST system.

All they are asking for is some reasonableness. The brief goes on:

> As an alternative, we submit the government should consider creating a special deduction for income tax purposes that would reflect the amount of GST to be carried by doctors due to tax-exempt status.

Either one—they are being very flexible, unlike the government. It goes on to state:

> Such an income tax amendment would limit the need for amendments to the GST legislation and regulations, simplify the administration and reduce administrative costs.
>
> We have stressed the major financial impact of the GST on physicians like radiologists and pathologists with high costs of practice because of the purchase or lease of expensive equipment.
> As you are aware, medical devices are to be GST exempt. We have been pleased to cooperate with the Department of National Revenue to produce a more comprehensive list of devices that should be tax exempt.

Honourable senators, there is a chart in the middle of the page here which I might just read. It is, "GST Impact, Group Medical Practice, which I have argued, and which this brief maintains, is a benefit to the public at large in terms of the medical services they receive. The estimated total increase per doctor for internal medicine is $4,534; for general practice, $5,471; paediatrics, $5,286; otolaryngology, $8,358; and obstetrics and gynaecology, $9,040.

There is now reference to the impact on clinical groups. They go on to recommend that the schedule of tax-free medical devices should be expanded to include certain expensive medical equipment. They have pointed out the importance of CMPA membership dues being declared tax-exempt.

Senator David: That is the protective association.

Senator van Roggen: Is that for the insurance?

Senator David: Yes.

Senator van Roggen: The brief states:

> We have pointed out the importance of CMPA membership dues being declared tax exempt.

That, I assume, senator is a form of insurance for protection for doctors such as lawyers have in group liability insurance. They state:

> There has been some question with respect to whether the CMPA will qualify to grant GST-exempt membership or protection under the terms of Bill C-62.

I find it difficult that there would be any argument. I think it should be routine since it is obviously a cost of doing business. The brief goes on to state:

> Although membership in this association is not mandatory, it provides professional liability protection. Such malpractice protection, although not in statute, is a de facto necessity for the medical practitioner. Hospitals increasingly insist on professional liability protection before they grant admitting privileges to physicians.

As a patient I would like to think that my doctor had such protection. The brief goes on:

> Proof of CMPA membership, or having commercial medical malpractice insurance, is a statutory requirement in Quebec. It is important for the government to recognize that failure to accord tax-exempt status to the CMPA will enhance interprovincial distortions. As an extension of their medicare benefit schedule agreements, provincial and territorial governments provide special funds to reimburse the physician for rising CMPA membership fees, made necessary by the current medico-legal situation. The level of reimbursement varies from province to province and from one medical discipline to another

• (1700)

> The CMA therefore recommends that the Government of Canada grant tax exempt status to the "supplies" by the Canadian Medical Protective Association as a non-profit association or in a manner consistent with analogous financial services by explicitly including CMPA as a supply within the terms of clause 1 of Part VII, which states:
>
> A supply of a financial service that is not included in Part IX of Schedule VI.

That is the recommendation.

> ... We are concerned that some aspects of the GST legislation will have a negative impact and increase health care costs, which is a subject of major concern for every provincial and territorial government—indeed, all Canadians. For example, we recommend that the Senate consider the impact of the GST on private nursing homes and the community support programs that are so important in de-institutionalizing of health care. The community support programs are essential in allowing as many patients as possible to remain at home for as long as possible. The result is more appropriate, more human and often results in better care for the elderly rather than warehousing them in institutions. It is also less expensive. Applying GST to those services ...

And this is getting to Senator Buckwold's question of a few moments ago.

> ... appears to be working against the policy of every provincial and territorial health department in the country, and for that matter Health and Welfare Canada.

We are trying to get these people out of the warehouses and into private facilities. There is going to be a 7 per cent penalty for making such a move. That seems to me to be most unfortunate.

> We recommend that the GST status of community support programs be reconsidered.
> With the same objective of avoiding GST serving as an incentive to increased health care costs, we recommend that the Senate give second thought to the 7 per cent GST to be charged on over-the-counter drugs. These are drugs that people can buy without a prescription.
> Drugs obtained with a doctor's prescription are exempt from the GST. Indeed, they will be zero-taxed rated, which means that GST will not be charged at any level in their manufacturing or sale. Aetylsalicylic acid, or aspirin, is an example of how the GST tax will increase health care cost. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians are taking enteric coded aspirin to prevent heart attack or strokes. For many it is a wise move that may or may not have been advised by their physicians. If an Ontario patient buys 100 tablets as an over-the-counter drug, it costs about $6 plus $.42 for GST; but if they are bought on a prescription from the physician, the cost will be $11, or $4.58.

In other words, the prescription aspirin is going to cost the tax payer another $4.58 per one hundred. The patient will be inclined to seek the prescription from the physician in order to save the 42 cents that he would pay by buying them across the counter. This is where you get into the most incredible complexities in this bill.

> People with voluntary drug insurance plans, or those over 65, now see the doctor to get a prescription for aspirin. The reason for that is that the drug will then be free, or at least heavily subsidized. The patient saves money, but the cost of health care goes up for the drug and possibly for a visit to the doctor's office.
> The GST will be an incentive to reduce the practice of self-medication for minor illnesses and to obtain over-the-counter drugs by prescription. Both practices, motivated by GST, will increase health care costs.

> We recommend that the federal government re-examine its proposals to charge a GST on over-the-counter drugs and suggest that tax-free status be extended to this category of drugs.

Honourable senators, if Senator Buckwold were here, I am sure he would be able to confirm that literally hundreds of groups in Canada have discovered similar anomalies in this legislation. One of the glaring anomalies is doctors being severely and unfairly penalized so they are on a different playing field entirely than are other professionals, other small businessmen and even others in the same income category.

The health care system is impacted adversely and there is an incentive to increase health costs by people increasing the use of prescription drugs for as opposed to non-prescription drugs.

While dealing with the aspect of the health care system, I should like to put on the record two letters from chartered accountants who were retained to prepare a short brief on behalf of the ambulance industry. There are two letters, both addressed to the Minister of Finance. The first letter, dated October 31, 1990, is from Saskatchewan. Senator Barootes, you must be very popular among medical services there. The letter reads:

> RE: GST Implications for the Ambulance Industry
> Recently, on behalf of the Saskatchewan Ambulance Association, we have had an opportunity to review the GST legislation as it pertains to providers of ambulance service in Saskatchewan. This review has involved discussions with officials from Customs & Excise at the local level (Saskatoon) and with individuals from the Department of Finance in Ottawa. In summary, we have concluded the following with respect to the GST and its applications for ambulance operators in Canada.
> Firstly, the supply provided is tax exempt.

That is exactly like medical and dental services to the patient. It is tax exempt to the patient also in the case of ambulance operators, which makes the government look like a big fellow.

> Secondly, providers of ambulance service will have to pay the GST on its supplies, services and equipment used in the provision of ambulance services. Our understanding, currently, is that the GST paid on inputs will be 7%. But, certain providers of ambulance services, such as Ontario and British Columbia (provincial agencies) may be classified as zero rated. Therefore, they will not pay any GST on their inputs.

The inputs are the cost of the ambulance, equipment in the ambulances and, I have no doubt, even the gasoline that goes into the ambulances.

> Thirdly, if the provider of the ambulance service is a hospital, it appears that the hospital will qualify for a GST rebate for approximately 83%.

The hospital will get 17 per cent less back than the ambulance that is operated by the provincial government.

[Senator van Roggen.]

> If the ambulance provider is a municipal organization, it appears that it will be eligible for a rebate of approximately 57% of the GST.

If you are a municipality you get only half of it back.

> Last, but not least, if the ambulance provider is a privately held corporation, the ambulance operator will be eligible for no rebates on the GST.

Here we have a Conservative government dedicated to the principles of free enterprise in Canada, penalizing the free enterprisers and benefiting the social operations in those provinces that have socialist ambulance facilities. I suppose after the next election in Saskatchewan they may be socialized as well.

Senator Barootes: Does that mean British Columbia and Ontario in the past have been socialist governments? Is that your interpretation as far as ambulance service is concerned?

Senator van Roggen: I have always maintained that it is most unfortunate to have different tax regimes for government-owned corporation as opposed to privately owned corporations. If the government is going to be in business, at least it should pay tax, like anyone else. Then there would be a better ability to access the efficiency of their operations. The letter continues:

> As can be seen from the above, ambulance services provide a tax exempt supply. All users of ambulance service are treated equally and fairly. On the other hand, the providers of ambulance services are not treated equally and fairly. The refunds/rebates of GST range from 0-100%.

It depends in which category you fall. This is a simple thing to correct or at least agree to correct.

> One of the main cornerstones of the new GST legislation is to create a playing field that is level where all players are treated equally and fairly.

That is made as a categorical statement. It would seem to me that it is anything but, but I know that is what the government has claimed.

> This goal has not been achieved with respect to the providers of ambulance services in Canada. Therefore, we are requesting that your officials review this problem.
> With respect to the probable solution, we regret we can be no more specific than to offer the following recommendation:
>
> Under the new GST legislation, we, the Saskatchewan Ambulance Association, expect all providers of ambulance services in Saskatchewan and Canada to be treated the same.

There is a follow-up letter on November 19 to the Hon. Michael Wilson, Minister of Finance, from the chartered accountants on behalf of the ambulance operators in Saskatchewan. It reads:

> Further to our letter of October 31, 1990, we have received indications from the Department of Finance in Ottawa that the GST legislation will create a great inequity amongst ambulance operators in Canada.

The Saskatchewan Ambulance Association is very disappointed that the GST legislation will allow refunds/rebates of GST to ambulance operators on input costs to range for 0-100%. The ambulance operators who must absorb a portion of all of the GST on inputs will have no choice but to pass on this additional cost to the patients. Therefore, the GST will increase the cost of health care in the ambulance industry. It should be noted that the increase in the cost of health care in the ambulance industry will not be spread evenly on all the users of ambulance services as certain ambulance services will not be paying any GST.

If we allow the legislation to remain as it is written today, then we have to live with the following anomalies which are created by the GST legislation:

(a) users of ambulance services are not treated equally and fairly across Canada;

(b) providers of ambulance services are not treated equally and fairly across Canada;

(c) The cost of health care in the ambulance industry will increase as a direct result of ambulance services having to absorb all or a portion of the GST on their inputs.

In order to remove the above anomalies within the GST legislation, we propose that the Department of Finance put forward an amendment to the GST legislation that would essentially remove the effect of GST from the ambulance industry. The amendment would effectively consider all ambulance operators in Canada to be zero rated. Then they would not pay any GST on their inputs nor charge any GST on their services.

It is a very simple thing to do, to treat the private ambulance operator in Saskatchewan the same as the government-operated service in Ontario. Why should they be different? I need not repeat my remarks of a few minutes ago that of all parties in Canada, you surely should be the first to endeavour to do that. The letter goest on to state:

● (1715)

We have written to all of the Members of Parliament in regards to this matter and we have asked for their understanding and the support of yourself and the Department of Finance to introduce an amendment to the GST legislation to eliminate the above anomalies which will be created by the GST legislation.

Your attention to the above matter is greatly appreciated and we would be pleased to discuss this matter further with your officials. Thank you for your prompt consideration.

Honourable senators, if we were to be so successful in the Senate as to defeat this legislation or to delay it for one year, perhaps that particular anomaly and injustice could be sorted out along with the other more serious problems that I have already dealt with in the medical profession generally.

Hon Gildas L. Molgat: Are you now leaving the question of health care?

Senator van Roggen: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Before you do, I wonder if you would comment on another aspect of it? Unfortunately I was not here for your whole speech, so if I am covering ground that you have covered, I will desist. This is with regard to volunteer fundraising for hospitals. Was that covered?

Senator van Roggen: No.

Senator Molgat: Then I should like you to comment on a newspaper clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of October 21, 1990. The headline is: "Volunteer fundraisers to pay GST." The article states:

Money raised for life-saving hospital equipment in Manitoba will end up in federal coffers when the proposed goods and services tax comes into effect, volunteer fundraisers learned yesterday.

"Our members think it's unfair. We are buying equipment the government doesn't have to pay for," Pat Helms, President of the Manitoba Health-Care Auxiliaries Association, said yesterday.

Helms said that the proposed 7 per cent GST will apply to all funds above $30,000 raised by volunteers through bake sales, bingos and teas. She said about half of the 64 groups in the association raised more than $30,000 last year.

"One auxiliary, the Children's Hospital Book Mart, raised about $170,000 in 1989," Helms said. "If it raises the same amount in 1991, it will pay $9,800 in GST. When the government cuts back on hospitals, they come back to us and say 'we need this and that'" she said in an interview during the association's annual meeting yesterday. "What equipment would the government have without us? Where would they be?"

Helms said the association raised more than $1.6 million for equipment in Manitoba last year. "The tax will prompt her members to work harder to raise more money," she said. "We're fighters; we're going to pull together and fight this as a team."

Dr. Gulzar Cheema, Maples Liberal MLA and his party's health critic, said a tax on volunteer groups flys in the face of federal Finance Minister Michael Wilson's promise that health would be exempt from the GST.

"It's a clear case of one of the cracks in the system," Cheema said. "It means people are being taxed for their free labour, and that they will be forced to do the work of a tax collector, which the average person isn't supposed to do. They're working for free for the government and then getting penalized."

Helms said that the Manitoba association, as well as the national association of auxiliaries, has written to the House of Commons and the Senate to protest the tax on volunteer work. She said they have not received an answer. Her group has unsuccessfully studied the GST > legislation to find a loophole for volunteer groups, she said.

> The Manitoba Health-Care Auxiliaries Association donated $1,685,908 to hospitals and other medical institutions last year, Helms said. It also gave institutions money collected from previous years, donating $2,629,841 in all, she said.

This, it seems to me, is another cost on the health care system and a cost to volunteer groups who, instead of being discouraged, should be encouraged to be doing more because this is money that the government does not have to put up. Did you consider this in your analysis of the health system?

Senator van Roggen: I did not, Senator Molgat, and this is the first time it has been brought to my attention. I apologize in that another senator was speaking to me just as you started your question and I missed the beginning of it. Did I understand you correctly to say that the direct GST will be imposed on the money raised by these volunteers or by the equipment purchased with the money they raise?

Senator Molgat: What they say—and I am quoting from the newspaper—is:

> Helms said the proposed 7 per cent GST will apply to all funds above $30,000 raised by volunteers through bake sales, bingos and teas.

It seems preposterous to me, but because you studied the matter I thought you might have an answer.

Senator van Roggen: That is so preposterous I cann't believe it. Perhaps someone on the government side could enlighten us on that. To give this ridiculous tax the benefit of the doubt, if the tax were levied on the equipment that the volunteer money was used to purchase, that would be one thing, but it is bad enough when a government announces that their health care is exempt and then, as I dealt with at length this morning, they impose it on all the input charges and then ask the individual physicians and others to swallow, in the case of doctors, $100 million, and in the case of these volunteers, their tax, and then pretend to the public that health care is not being taxed. Health care is being taxed at the full rate. It is just that you are not able to get a rebate.

Senator Simard: You should make all these people exempt. More exemptions. That's good. Keep it up!

Senator van Roggen: What I will try to do—or perhaps you will have time to do it—is find out if, as this article suggests, the GST applies directly on money raised by volunteer groups.

We do not want to be too personal in these debates, but I think of a project my wife was involved in last year which raised $100,000 for a specific piece of equipment for the cancer control agency of British Columbia, which you say would now be taxed.

Senator Molgat: That is what this article says.

Hon. Paul David: May I give an answer to this?

Senator van Roggen: Yes.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator David: If it is for a piece of equipment, usually the fundraisers give a cheque to the hospital for, let us say, $100,000. The hospital then purchases the equipment with that $100,000 and it is tax free.

Senator van Roggen: Up to 83 per cent in the case of hospitals.

Senator David: Yes, because the 83 per cent figure is the difference between what they were paying before on the federal sales tax and what they will have to pay now. The difference was 7 per cent. That is why they now have a rebate of 83 per cent. So it is exactly what the situation was with the federal sales tax.

Senator van Roggen: As an aside, I would be interested to know why municipalities only get a 57 per cent rebate, but that is another story.

Senator Barootes: Municipalities are talking about roads, sewers, and other infrastructures, not hospitals.

Senator Stanbury: What about ambulances?

Senator van Roggen: Senator Molgat, the distinction I make is where that tax applies. In any event, your point is very well taken.

Honourable senators, as I have kept you so far for a couple of hours, I thought before going on to the next brief I have I might lighten up your day. I don't want to go too far into this because I don't want to be accused of conducting my debate in a manner irrelevant to the subject, but politics is all part of what we are discussing here. The other day I was reading a delightful book by Morris K. Udall entitled, "Too Funny to be the President". There is a reference here that someone might use, but I would not suggest it applies to any particular senator opposite. It is Golda Meir's adominition at one time, "Don't be humble, you're not that great." We all know the one about Winston Churchill and Clement Atlee, that Atlee was a modest man but that was all right because he had much to be modest about.

Morris Udall then gets into self-deprecating jokes. He starts out this section of the book by saying:

> Nobody likes a smug politician. Jimmy Carter sometimes made the mistake of aiming his best zingers at the press—"I'm not going to say anything terribly important tonight, so you can all put away your crayons"— rather than at himself. Carter failed to understand the first rule of political humour. By contrast, Ronald Reagan is a master of the self-deprecating joke. With volumes of anecdotes about his age and selective memory, he can get a laugh out of any crowd. My experience has been that putting myself down—humility is attractive—is the best kind of humour: it creates empathy, humanizes any message, and puts people at ease.

That is why all of us in this house love Senator Barootes, as we do. Mr. Udall goes on to state:

> Self-deprecating jokes have the added benefit of innoculating one against egomania. Whenever my ego threatens to get overblown, I puncture it with a story from the early stages of my 1976 presidential campaign, such as this one: I was in New Hampshire, thousands of miles from home, with my car stuck in the snow. My advance woman urged me to shake a few hands in a nearby barbershop. I stuck my head in the door and blurted, "Mo Udall, I'm running for president!" The barber replied, "Yeah, I know. We were just laughing about that this morning."

In the same vein, if the press or your opponents are telling a joke on you, the best thing to do is to appropriate it and tell it on yourself. A couple of years ago, George Bush attended a spate of funerals for foreign dignitaries. People soon began describing his motto as "You die, we fly." Instead of getting huffy, Bush appropriated the joke, told it on himself wherever he went and invariably got an appreciative laugh.

Self-effacing humor can also be the best way for a politician to deal with any delicate subject. One respected member of the House is gay, and occasionally he'd be asked, "Congressman, are you still a practicing homosexual?" His stock response is, "Practising? No, I don't need to practise—I've been doing this for a long time."

• (1730)

The next section is on sexist jokes which are taboo. I have ticked off some which might interest honourable senators, but I will leave that for later.

Coming back to the subject at hand, I wish to refer to a brief which is a supplement to a brief on sales tax reform in Canada by Robert M. Clark. He is professor emeritus of the Department of Economics at the University of British Columbia. He is a man quite well known in B.C. and Vancouver circles in particular. I wish to take the liberty to place this brief on the record for him. In his introduction he states:

In a letter dated May 24, 1990 to my colleague Professor Sam Ho, the former Head of the Department of Economics at the University of British Columbia, Mr. Timothy Ross Wilson, Clerk of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce raised several questions about the goods and services tax. The Committee is interested in obtaining answers to these questions from academic economists specializing in public finance. A copy of this letter was forwarded to me in early June.

I am one of these economists and am pleased to have an opportunity to reply to these questions. I obtained a B. Com. and honours economics B.A. at the University of British Columbia and A.M. and Ph.D. in economics at Harvard, specializing in public finance. From the fall of 1946 to 1985 I had the stimulating pleasure of teaching in this field in the Department of Economics at the University of British Columbia.

Last September I sent a copy of my lengthy brief on sales tax reform to Mr. Timothy Ross Wilson, and to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance. Mrs. Francine St. Jean in the Senate Committee's office confirmed to me on June 6, 1990 that a copy of this brief is in the office.

I understand that you wish to have all briefs in your hands by June 29th. In the time available I cannot both answer the questions you have raised and thoroughly revise my brief in the light of the changes in the proposed legislation up to the date it received third reading in the House of Commons on April 10, 1990.

In this supplement to my brief I intend to:

a) Answer some of the questions you raised.

b) Emphasize a few specific recommendations.

Before answering your specific questions, I want to emphasize a few points.

1.In the context of substantial annual federal deficits for the last twelve years, it is highly desirable to reduce substantially the annual federal deficit in each of the next several years.

On a national accounts basis, which is a broader and therefore better basis of comparison, the annual federal deficit has been reduced from $31.7 billion in 1985 to $23.6 in 1989. But even with this reduction, the national debt and interest charges on it have continued to climb at a faster rate than the income of the country. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1990, the federal government spent nearly $40 billion on interest and other debt charges. This was the equivalent of about $1,500 for every Canadian.

2.I believe that the onus is on those who oppose the proposed goods and services tax to show what measures they would take so that the federal deficit as a per cent of the country's income will be reduced greatly in each of the next few years.

3.In reading the House of Commons debates in recent years, I am struck by the preponderance of emphasis of individual MPs on the need for the government to spend more. Examples include spending more on protecting the environment, on daycare centres, on help to farmers and fishermen, on health services for people with AIDS, and on research and job retraining. How can these demands be reconciled with concern about reducing the federal recurring deficits?

Part of the answer has been in reducing the rate of growth of total federal expenditures. From 1985 to 1989 federal spending as a per cent of the gross national product has been reduced each year, from 24.0 to 21.6 per cent.

4.But most of the reduction in the unacceptably high deficits has been accomplished by increasing taxes, especially the personal income tax.

The share of total federal tax revenues from this tax has increased from 40.4 per cent in 1978 to an all time high of 49 per cent in 1989.

Most provincial governments in the 1980s have also raised their rates of personal income tax as a per cent of the basic federal tax as the following data indicate. These figures exclude Quebec, because the government of that province collects its own provincial personal income. For residents of Quebec with an assessed income of $40,000 or more, the rates of the provincial income tax are appreciably higher than the corresponding rates in Ontario or British Columbia.

What follows in the brief is a table setting out the provincial personal income tax rate as a per cent of the basic federal income tax and the change in rate between 1988 and 1989. For the province of Newfoundland the personal income tax rate went up from 58 per cent in 1980 to 61 per cent in 1989. For Prince Edward Island the figure went from 51.1 percent in 1980 to 57 per cent in 1989. For Nova Scotia the figures went from 52.5 per cent to 56.5 per cent for the same period of time. In the province of New Brunswick the figure went from 52.4 per cent to 60 per cent. For the province of Ontario the figure went from 44 per cent to 52 per cent, while for Manitoba it went from 54 per cent to 52 per cent. The province of Saskatchewan went from 53 per cent down to 50 per cent. In Alberta the figure went from 38.5 per cent to 46.5 per cent, while in British Columbia it went from 44 per cent to 51.5 per cent.

5.The following table compares the extent of reliance on the personal income tax for governments at all levels in the Group of Seven Nations and the average for 22 countries that are members of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development in 1977 and 1987, the latest year for which data are available.

Two standards of comparison are used. The first is revenue from the personal income tax as a per cent of total taxation. The second is the personal income revenue as a per cent of gross domestic product.

What follows in the brief is a table which represents taxes on personal income as a per cent of total taxation and of gross domestic product for 1977 and 1987, and changes in these percentages for the Group of Seven Nations and 22 member countries of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. There are figures for revenue from the personal income tax as a per cent of total taxation for the years 1977 and 1987.

Canada went from 32.6 per cent in 1977 to 38.7 per cent in 1987. The figure for the United States went from 33 per cent to 36.2 per cent. The OECD average went from 31.6 per cent in 1977 to 30.7 per cent in 1987. Germany went from 31.1 per cent in 1977 down to 29. per cent in 1987. In the United Kingdom, under Margaret Thatcher, who is greatly admired by senators opposite but who is not often emulated by them, the figure went from 35.1 per cent in 1977 to 26.6 in 1987. The figure for Italy was 22.2 per cent in 1977 and 24 per cent in 1987. Japan went from 22.2 per cent in 1977 to 24 per cent in 1987. Even though the figure for Japan went up slightly it is still vastly below the figure for Canada. France went from 13.2 per cent down to 12.7 per cent. The next column is entitled "Revenue From the Personal Income Tax as a Per cent of GDP" for the same countries. In Canada, personal income tax rose as a percentage of the gross domestic product from 10.4 per cent to 13.4 per cent. The United States stayed almost the same, 10.1 per cent to 10.9 per cent. The OECD average went up a fraction of 1 per cent from 11.4 per cent to 12 per cent. Germany went down from 11.8 per cent to 10 per cent. The United Kingdom went down from 12.3 per cent to 10 per cent. Italy, up from 6.2 per cent to 9.5 per cent. Japan, up from 5 per cent to 7.3 per cent. France, marginally up, from 5.2 per cent to 5.3 per cent.

• (1745)

I am not saying they do not have other forms of revenue from some of those other countries, but it is interesting to see some of the most successful, dynamic economies in the world, with revenue from the income of personal tax either going down or being at levels half of ours.

One of the chief conclusions to be drawn from this table is that in 1987 Canada relied on the personal income tax as a per cent of total taxation to a greater extent than the other six nations of the Group of Seven, or the average of the 22 OECD countries. Among the Group of Seven, the range of reliance on this tax ranged from 12.7 per cent in France to 38.7 per cent in Canada.

The average for the 22 OECD nations was 30.7 per cent. These are indeed substantial differences. Over this decade, Canada increased its reliance on the personal income tax as a percentage of total tax revenue more than the average of the OECD nations, or any of the other countries of the Group of Seven, except Italy. Reliance on this tax as a percentage of the total taxation was reduced for the average of the OECD nations from France, Germany and especially the United Kingdom.

In 1987 the personal income tax absorbed a higher percentage of the gross domestic product in Canada than in any of the other countries of the Group of Seven or in the average of the 22 OECD countries. The percentage for Canada was 13.4 per cent as compared to 10.9 per cent in the United States and Germany, 10 per cent in the United Kingdom and 7.3 per cent in Japan.

Most critics of the goods and services tax argue that we should rely even more in future on the personal income tax than we do now. I ask you to consider whether it is wise in an era of inevitably increasing worldwide competition to put more emphasis on this tax when we already are relying more heavily on it than our chief competing nations.

In 1989 the Minister of Finance estimated that in the fiscal year 1991-92, the present federal sales tax and a few small excise taxes would produce almost $19 billion in revenue. I think that is a pretty reasonably accepted figure that a lot of us have heard in recent months—$18 billion, $19 billion, $20 billion at the most. The proposed new tax, after allowing for the refundable sales tax credit and the rebate for buyers of new homes, was expected to yield $20.8 billion. Please keep these figures in mind as we consider alternatives to the present tax and the proposed tax.

With respect to proposals for greater reliance on the personal income tax, I shall comment on three proposals for abolishing the present federal sales tax, scrapping the goods and services tax, and replacing them largely or entirely by increasing the personal income tax.

The least convincing of these three proposals is to get the necessary revenue to replace any sales tax by increasing the personal income tax solely on the wealthy. Who are they? How many of them are there? In 1987, the latest year for which data is available, the Department of National Revenue reported that 229,000 individuals filed an income tax return in which they reported a net income of $80,000 or more. They constituted 1 per cent of individuals filing an income tax for that year. Their total taxable income was $24 million, or 11 per cent of the total taxable income reported by all income tax filers.

I often think that it is appropriate, honourable senators, when we are debating subjects such as the one we are debating today, or any other matter of public import in the country, to keep in mind that we, almost without exception because of our Senate income, quite apart from any other income we may have, large or small, and members of the civil service from the level of Assistant Deputy Minister or greater, every member of the House of Commons, every lawyer, every doctor, chartered accountant, businessmen, executives, and so on, all sit within only 1 per cent of the taxpayers of Canada who file tax returns. There are 99 per cent of the population out there who work on an income on a different plane from those of us here and those I have mentioned, among others.

Suppose that the federal government had levied in that year an additional 4 per cent tax on their net income in excess of $80,000. Suppose further that all the provincial governments had modestly foregone any claim to a comparable income tax increase. Lastly, suppose that the total taxable income reported by these individuals remained unchanged, notwithstanding the increased rate of tax. Under these favourable circumstances regarding the yield of the tax, the federal government would have obtained an increase in revenues of about $256 million in 1987.

For the year 1989-90 I estimate, using the same somewhat unrealistic assumptions, that an additional 4 per cent tax on all individuals with a net income of $80,000 or more would have been about $350 million. From this data I conclude that even punitive increases in the personal income tax on upper income households would not produce even one fifth of the $19 billion from present sales tax nor the $20 billion revenue from the proposed goods and services tax.

The second proposal is the single tax proposal from Dennis Mills, the member of parliament for the Toronto constituency of Broadview-Greenwood. The following summary of his ideas is taken from his book The Single Tax published in 1990.

> (a) The current personal and corporation income taxes would be replaced by a single tax system with two tax forms—a personal compensation tax and a business income tax. These taxes would be fully integrated. All income would be classified as either business income or personal compensation and would be taxed accordingly at the same federal rate of 25 per cent.
> (b) The personal compensation tax would be designed to tax all income from wages, salaries, pensions, dividends, interest and capital gains. One hundred per cent of net capital gains would be subject to tax. All other forms of income are taxed as business income.
> (c) All deductions and credits for individuals would be eliminated except:
>
> (i) a basic personal income tax credit of $2,800 and $3,400 for a disabled person;
> (ii) a spousal tax credit of $1,200 less 25 per cent of a spouse's income over $9,600;
>
> (iii) a tax credit for persons aged 65 and over;
> (iv) an income insurance credit of 25 per cent of total individual contributions to the Canada Pension Plan, the Quebec Pension Plan and Unemployment Insurance;
>
> (v) an RRSP contribution tax credit of 25 per cent of contributions up to a maximum of $1,875;

• (1800)

> (vi) a charitable donations tax credit of 25 per cent up to a maximum of 1 per cent of total net income; and
> (vii) a refundable child tax credit of $1,200 less 25 per cent of earnings over $9,600 for each child under age 18.
> (d) Businesses would be allowed the same credit for charitable contributions as individuals, namely 25 per cent of contributions up to a maximum of 1 per cent of total net income.
>
> (e) Any business losses could be carried forward indefinitely.
>
> (f) On this point I quote directly:
>
> All businesses, big or small, would be treated the same. Conglomerates, shopkeepers, tradesman, landlords, doctors—would fill out a form with no more than 11 lines. There would be no tricky calculations or need for tax advisors, because all the intricate stuff—interest deductions, investment tax credits and the complicated capital cost allowance schedules—would be gone.
> (g) We have proposed, for the sake of simplicity, a single depreciation rate of 20 per cent to apply to all classes [of depreciable assets] . . .
>
> It may be that a better alternative to changing these incentives might be to allow multiple classes recognizing the differing economic lives of various investments.
>
> (h) In response to a question why the proposed single tax would not tax income from abroad, Mr. Mills wrote:
> Income earned aboard is taxed in the country where it is earned. If it is then double taxed in Canada, by agreement with other countries, it has foreign tax credits applied in Canada. This is just an added complication that is unnecessary.

Mr. Mills is confident that his proposed single tax would be revenue neutral in replacing both the present personal and corporation income taxes. He claims that his forecasts are on the cautious side, because he has made no allowance for —revenue from a resurfacing underground economy, and —revenue from increases in productivity.

He writes:

The introduction of a single tax system would unleash the entrepreneurial spirit in Canada by eliminating the distortions and disincentives of the current tax system. Government could concentrate on government instead of tinkering with the tax system. It could spend more time on discouraging irresponsible businesses . . .

It could lead to an unprecedented economic boom, as . . . corporations rediscovered sound economic principles.

Mr. Mills recognizes defects in the present federal sales tax:

It is certainly true that the MST needs replacing. It handicaps Canadian manufacturers trying to compete in international markets. It is also an indirect tax that is hidden from the consumer.

One of the virtues of the GST was that it was to be visible, but that got lost in the shuffle somewhere. The document continues:

Mr. Mills is so confident that the proposed single tax would provide such a stimulus to economic growth in Canada that

. . . MST could be phased out in no longer than 3 years.

This means that the basic reason for introducing the GST would no longer exist.

I admire the idealism that pervades this book, and have no doubt that a great simplification of the personal and corporation income taxes would lead to a significant increase in the personal incomes of the Canadians. But I do not accept his goal of eliminating any general federal sales tax on personal consumption. My reasons will be given hereafter for favouring such a tax as a supplement to the personal income tax, which hopefully will long continue as the major source of revenue for the federal government.

The political difficulties of achieving some of the simplifications Mr. Mills advocates are formidable. I offer a few illustrations.

In 1987 the average rate of federal personal income tax did not reach 20 per cent until a taxpayer had a net income of $40,000. It did not exceed 25 per cent until a net income of $90,000 was obtained. To be sure, the concept of taxable income in 1987 under the Income Tax Act was different in numerous respects from what is proposed by Mr. Mills. For example, under the Income Tax Act, individuals are allowed to claim deductions for medical and dental expenses in excess of 3 per cent of net income. Individuals also are permitted to deduct within specified limits contributions they make to pension plans. It is unconvincing to me for Mr. Mills to favour allowing individuals to obtain a tax credit for contributions to RRSPs, while refusing to allow them similar credits for contributions to a pension plan for employees.

I admire the robust idealism that leads Mr. Mills to advocate taxing all corporations at the same rate. For the calendar year 1990 the rate of federal corporation income tax ranged from 12.84 per cent for Canadian controlled private corporations on their first $200,000 of net business income up to 28.84 per cent on larger businesses not engaged in manufacturing and processing. There are far more businesses in the lower rate category than in the top rate category. I do not believe that such discrimination is equitable. But a proposal introduced in the House of Commons to nearly double the rate of tax on small businesses while lowering slightly the rate of big businesses would lead the political parties in the House of Commons to vie with each other in extolling the virtues of small businesses, and to favour a continuation of the heavy discrimination against big business.

(3) A sophisticated study of an alternative to the goods and services tax was published in February 1990 by the Institute for Research on Public Policy. The author of this study, Searching For An Alternative To The GST, is Neil Brooks, a member of the Osgoode Hall Law School of York University.

Professor Brooks begins with the statement,

It is widely agreed that the MST is beyond repair and should be repealed.

He analyzes and rejects the arguments for a general sales tax such as the goods and services tax. His constructive proposals for replacing this tax include the following.

(i) By scrapping plans for any goods and services tax this will save the cost of providing a refundable sales tax credit to households below stipulated levels of income and the cost of a tax rebate to most purchasers of new homes.

He might, under "(i)" have added the cost of sales tax credits and refunds generally from all forms of business paid at the taxable level which is where the thousands and thousands of new civil servants would come in, I assume. He continues as follows:

(ii) Increase revenue from the corporation income tax by $2 billion. This, he claims, is justified because the abolition of the sales tax at the manufacturers' level will provide windfall gains to corporations. This saving could be achieved partly by abolishing the lower corporation tax rate for manufacturing and processing. Further savings could be achieved by abolishing some corporation tax incentives, by increasing the tax on large corporations or by a minimum tax on corporations.

A minimum tax on corporations is something that has been promised by this government but which has not yet been introduced. He then goes on as follows:

> (iii) Increase excise taxes on alcohohlic beverages, tobacco products and gasoline, so that the tax on these products would not be reduced as a consequence of abolishing the present federal sales tax. He estimates that $2.3 billion could be obtained by this means.
> (iv) With the abolition of the present sales tax, the government sector which currently pays about $2.8 billion a year in sales tax on its purchases would need that much less in revenue.
>
> (v) After all these and a few other minor changes are made, he concludes that it would only be necessary to raise $10.5 billion in 1991 to keep the system revenue neutral.
>
> The 3 per cent additional surtax on high incomes would be replaced by a general surtax of 21 per cent. The effect of doing this would be to increase the bottom federal income tax rate by 2.7 percentage points, the middle tax rate by 4.2 percentage points, and the top federal tax rate by 4.6 percentage points.
>
> On the simplifying assumption that the average basic provincial income tax rate is 55 per cent of the federal tax, and ignoring special federal and provincial surtaxes, the income tax rates in 1991 would be:
> Federal, up to $27,500, 20.6 per cent; federal plus provincial, 30.4 per cent; $27,500 to $55,000, 31.5 per cent to 46.5 per cent; $55,000 and over, 35 per cent and, including the provincial, 52 per cent.

Comments

If the present federal sales tax discriminates against Canadian manufacturers in comparison with foreign manufacturers, as it certainly does, . . . why should the removal of this discrimination justify an increase in tax on Canadian manufacturers on the grounds that they will be making windfall profits?

Neither here nor elsewhere in this study does he make any specific recommendations for reducing the annual federal deficits. This is an objective to which the goods and services tax could make a useful contribution.

Professor Brooks then proceeds to consider the arguments for replacing the federal sales tax at the manufacturers' level by a goods and services tax. Like a lawyer arguing a case for his client, the personal income tax, before a jury, he concedes no significant merit to any of the arguments of his opponent, the goods and services tax.

Let us consider each of the arguments on behalf of taxing personal consumption on which he comments.

(i) To Rebalance The Government's Revenue Sources. He acknowledges that Canada collects substantially more in its taxes on personal income than most OECD countries, but relies less heavily on social security contributions. He adds:

> . . . United States with whose retailers Canadian retailers must now compete, places very little reliance on general sales tax . . . most of the OECD countries that collect more revenue than Canada from regressive consumption taxes also collect some amount of revenue from various forms of wealth taxes that fall exclusively on the very rich. Canada is one of only two OECD countries that does not have a general tax on wealth or wealth transfers.

Comments

In 1987 governments in Canada obtained revenue from general consumption taxes equal to 4.9 per cent of gross domestic product as compared with 6.4 per cent as the average figure for OECD countries. Local governments in Canada were more dependent upon property taxes than local governments in most OECD countries. The result was that in 1987 all taxes on property, including inheritance taxes and annual wealth taxes accounted for 9.2 per cent of tax revenue in Canada, as compared with 5.5 per cent for the average of 23 OECD nations.

If the revenue and the personal income tax were increased by $10.5 billion in 1991, the proportion of federal tax revenue from this source would increase substantially. This would create an even greater gap than already exists between the burden imposed by the personal income tax in Canada and the burden of this tax in the other countries with which we compete directly. I regard Professor Brooks' dismissal of concern over this issue as unconvincing.

(ii) To Increase the Fairness of the Tax System. He writes:

> It is commonly asserted that taxes on consumption are unfair: because consumption as a fraction of income declines as income increases, low income individuals necessarily pay a large percentage of their income in such a tax than high-income individuals. However, a number of commentators, economists in particular, have suggested that a tax on consumption is in fact fairer than a tax on income.

As a public finance economist, I am not arguing for the broad proposition that it is fairer to tax people on the value of the goods and services they use up in the economy than on the value of what they contribute to the economy. As I shall elaborate later, I am arguing that when governments at all levels in Canada are spending over 40 per cent of the gross domestic product—as they have every year from 1980 onwards, it is appropriate to supplement the personal income tax as the main source of federal government revenue with a broadly based tax on personal consumption.

I am not advancing this argument on the ground that saving has a moral superiority over wanting to consume one's resources currently. He goes on to argue that this particular moral argument seems to depend upon a notion that a consumer is using up something. But contrary to the implication in the argument, when one consumes goods and services nothing is of course "taken out" of the economy. The goods and services may be gone, but the price of the goods is now in somebody else's hands . . . saving is not more virtuous than consuming. Consumption is not a claim on community resources.

Comment

This is a confused argument.

I would certainly agree with that.

The typical act of consumption does involve the using up of goods or services or both. This is true whether we are considering the consumption of a hamburger at McDonald's, or of a hospital service provided in a public hospital.

On the subject of equity, Professor Brooks also comments:

The government in supporting the GST has added a twist to this argument by suggesting it is fairer to tax consumption because people have a choice as to whether they will save or consume and thus pay the tax. But for low- or even most middle-income people, the option of saving from income is meaningless. They must consume all of their income simply to survive at an adequate standard of living.

Comment

Professor Brooks overstates his case. Take a household of average income and number of members. In most cases they do have a choice to decide whether to replace their aged television set this year or to wait until next year. According to a Statistics Canada market research study published in 1990, 78.4 per cent of Canadian households had one or more automobiles in 1988. They too typically have such an option. One of the significant advantages of having a general consumption tax as a supplement to the personal income tax is that it gives a majority of consumers more choices as to when to spend income than if the government relied almost exclusively on the personal income tax.

(iii) To Improve Incentives to Work

● (1810)

Again it goes back to the professor, whom he quotes. It states:

He writes:

A shift to consumption taxes, which will allow for a fall in income taxation, will lead to an increase in work effort, it is sometimes argued . . . This agrument . . . assumes that tax rates have some effect on the incentive to work. Theoretically, workers who suffer a lower tax rate might either work less since they need less income to maintain their existing standard of living, or they might work harder since they are able to earn more after-tax income for each hour worked. The empirical studies that have been done to date are of little assistance in determining which of these offsetting . . . effects . . . predominate.

But even aside from this contentious issue, generally, unless workers suffer from some form of fiscal illusion when such a tax mix change is made, shifting the tax burden from income to consumption should have no effect on work incentives . . . workers are left in the same after-tax position whether a tax is collected on their earnings or the goods and services they consume; therefore it is difficult to see why their work habits would change in response to such a shift. Moreover, some . . . argue that since the general consumption tax does not have an effect upon income that is saved currently, it is therefore economically equivalent to a tax on wages alone.

Comment

I do not believe that it is fair or accurate to say that a person is suffering from a fiscal illusion if she or he decides to do more paid work after her or his marginal tax rate is reduced, knowing that there has been an offsetting increase in the rate of general sales tax. There are numerous factors that enter into such decisions, of which changes in taxes are only one. While I would predict with confidence that the effects on work effort would be positive if the top combined federal and provincial income tax rate exceeded 60 per cent, I cannot be equally confident of such a prediction if the top combined marginal rate were appreciably lower.

The unqualified argument mentioned by Professor Brooks that a general tax on consumption is economically equivalent to a tax on wages seems to me unconvincing. A general consumption tax is paid from dividends, interest, or pensions in the same way as this tax is paid by individuals whose sole source of income is a wage or salary.

(iv) To improve Incentives to Save

I quote from his study on this topic:

One of the primary arguments that the government has advanced for the goods and services tax is that as a tax on consumption instead of income it will lead to a higher level of private savings, and thus a higher level of capital formation . . . and ultimately a higher standard of living for all Canadians . . . every link in the chain in the argument . . . is open to serious question.

First, there is little evidence that savings are too low in Canada . . .

Second, even if the social judgment were made that private savings should be increased, it is unlikely that relieving more of the return to savings from tax would have that effect.

Third, even if a tax mix change in favour of consumption increased personal savings somewhat, the effect of total savings in the economy would be trivial since personal savings are only a small percentage of total savings.

Comments

I ask you to consider the following evidence in the belief that there are legitimate reasons to be concerned about the rate of personal saving in Canada. First, there are the following data from Statistics Canada showing the percentge of personal disposable income in Canada saved from 1979 to 1989.

In 1979, there was 12.9 per cent personal savings of disposable income in Canada. In 1980, 13.3 per cent; 1981, 15.0 per cent; 1982, 17.8 per cent; 1983, 14.6 per cent; 1984, 14.8 per cent; and then in the Tory years of 1985, 13.1 per cent; 1986, 10.4 per cent; 1987, 9.6 per cent; 1988, 9.2 per cent; and 1989, 10.2 per cent.

He goes on to say:

> It is remarkable that in 1982, the first year since 1954 when the Canadian gross national expenditures in constant prices actually declined, personal saving as a per cent of disposable income reached a post war peak. The above evidence suggests that consumers in fact exercise more discretion regarding their spending than his arguments imply.
> How in fact do rates of saving in Canada compare with those in other countries? Before presenting some data, I want to make the distinction between gross and net saving in a country. Any nation needs to generate within its boundaries or to borrow abroad enough capital to cover depreciation and depletion of buildings, machinery, furniture, equipment, and natural resources which get used up. Savings in addition to this are required in order to increase the amount of its capital. Such savings are net savings. With this distinction in mind, I believe that it is net savings rather than gross savings which is the more relevant concept for our international comparisons.

There follows here Table 2, which represents the net savings as a per cent of gross national product from 1971 to 1987 in selected OECD countries. These are the net savings as a per cent of GNP. The first column represents 1971 to 1980; the next column represents the figures for 1981 to 1987; and the last column represents 1987 figures and is higher than the actual average for the decade.

In Switzerland these net savings were 19.4 per cent in 1971 to 1980, rising to 20.2 per cent in the last decade and 22.9 per cent—very high—in 1987.

Japan, we all know, has had high savings rates. They are concerned about them going down now. They think that they have concerns, but we have concerns also. The amount was 24.6 per cent in the 1971 to 1980 period, 20.2 per cent in the last decade, and 21.3 per cent last year.

The Federal Republic of Germany has had quite high savings rates—but not compared to the first two countries. It was 14.3 per cent in the 1971-80 period, 10.71 per cent in the last decade, and 13.0 per cent in the year 1987.

Canada has quite a good record in the decade from 1971 to 1980, being 13.3 per cent. It is about half that of Japan, but still not that far off Germany. However, it is down in the last decade to a 9.4 per cent average. In 1987, unlike the others, which have all come up, we have continued a downward slide and are down to 8.5 per cent. That is to say, instead of being on a par with Germany, as we were in the 1971 decade, we are now down to only 60 per cent of Germany.

The average of 21 OECD countries was 13.5 per cent in the 1971-1980 decade, falling badly to 8.7 per cent in 1981-1987, and to 8.5 per cent in 1987. Italy is 12.1 per cent in the 1971-1980 decade, while the figure is reduce to 7.5 per cent in the 1981-1987 decade.

Honourable senators, my deputy leader advised me earlier that he might want to interrupt me a couple of minutes before six o'clock. It is now that time.

THE SENATE

MISS JOANNE WILKINSON, CHIEF PAGE—RESIGNATION—FELICITATIONS ON NEW CAREER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have spoken to the leadership about mentioning to you some good news and some bad news. I will start with the bad news.

The bad news is that our Chief Page, Joanne Wilkinson, will be leaving us unexpectedly soon, that is, earlier than she expected. She will possibly be on a night shift again, but I think that this is the last opportunity to say something during the day. That is the bad news.

The good news is why she is leaving.

Senator Doody: She is tired of the night shift!

Senator Frith: It is interesting that you mention that because, apparently, although I do not think she relishes the night shift, she specifically mentioned to me that she wanted us all to understand that her leaving has nothing to do with present circumstances.

I suppose all honourable senators know that graduate students naturally look forward to their graduation and an application to obtain a job in the field of work for which they have been preparing. Joanne apparently has such talents. Thus, she decided when she heard that there was a possibility in the office of the Secretary of State for a job for which she would be prepared when she graduates that she would try for it, just on speculation. She did not really expect to succeed at this stage, but applied as a sort of warm-up for the interview she hoped to have when she graduated.

I now quote from her letter to Colonel Doré, our Gentlemen Usher of the Black Rod, in which she states:

> I have been offered a term position as a writer with the Secretary of State. Given that writing is a key component of the course of study that I have been following, I feel that I cannot turn it down.

Again, we have an example of how lucky we are to have an opportunity to associate with such wonderful young people who make our time in the Senate so much more pleasant and with whom our relationships have always been warm and very familial.

We have really spawned a remarkable alumnae of Pages, an alumnae of which we can all be proud.

Joanne, félicitations, bonne carrière. Good luck. We will miss you.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take the opportunity to join Senator Frith on behalf of our group to say how pleased we were to have met you, Joanne, and how kind, generous and courteous you have been to us. We wish you very much success in your new career.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now past 6 o'clock. I shall leave the Chair, to return at 8 o'clock.

The Senate adjourned until 8 p.m.

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, at five o'clock this afternoon I said that I might be forgiven if I interrupted the tedium of my remarks by referring to one or two anecdotes from this great book I was recently reading by Morris K. Udall entitled Too Funny To Be President, which many people thought that he should be at one point. As I did not get around to doing that at six o'clock as I had intended because of a tribute, perhaps I might take a five-minute diversion before getting into heavy statistics or any of the other briefs I want to deal with in the next while.

The next paragraph in the book is entitled:

> Sexist Jokes Are Taboo, Too
> Women voters provided the margin of victory in half a dozen Senate races in 1986; they are the reason the Democrats control the Senate today. Obviously, no politician can afford to offend his female constituents with blatantly sexist jokes. Being of an older, less enlightened generation, it's sometimes hard for me to tell whether a joke is sexist or not. But many jokes men tell clearly are. Here's an example of the kind of joke that is now taboo: At the unveiling of a statue honoring Jake Potofsky of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, an attractive, well-endowed woman rushed up to Potofsky and said, "Oh, Mr. Potofsky, I've come a hundred miles to see your bust unveiled.
> "Madam," replied Jake, a male chauvinist if there ever was one, "Believe me, I'd gladly do the same for you."

Udall gives other examples of sexist jokes and when he states:

> Of course, not all sexual jokes are sexist; there are some you can tell that won't get you branded as an M.C.P. Secretary of the Treasury. Jim Baker stole the show at the Gridiron one year with this entry:
> "I had a terrible dream last night: I dreamed that the three most powerful Americans—the President, the Speaker of the House, and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve—suddenly passed away. All three appeared in St. Peter's waiting room.
>
> "A voice came over the intercom telling the president to go to Room One. He went inside and found himself with a huge gorilla. The voice then said, 'Ronald Reagan, you have sinned, and you must spend eternity with this gorilla.'
>
> "The voice over the intercom then sent Tip O'Neill to Room Two, where the Speaker found a mad dog. 'Mr. Speaker,' the voice on the intercom said, 'you have sinned and must spend eternity with this mad dog.'
>
> "Then the voice sent Paul Volcker to Room Three. He went in, and to his surprise he found himself with Bo Derek. Then the voice came over the intercom and said, 'Bo Derek, you have sinned . . . '"

Anyone who knows Mr. Volcker would enjoy that story.

There are also anecdotes on aging and death, but I want to jump ahead to an anecdote on an old senator in the U.S. Senate who was interviewed by a reporter who asked: "Well, sir, I guess you've seen a lot of changes in your time in Washington." The old senator replied: "Yes, son, I have. And I have been against every damned one of them."

"The trouble with our time," said one old senator to another, "is that the future is not what it used to be."

I have one more and then I will get down to business. I do not know if Senator Marchand is around, but I rather enjoyed this one:

> A candidate was visiting the Indian reservation, seeking votes, and was given permission to speak before the tribe.
>
> "If elected," he cried, "I'll get schools and hospitals for the Indians."
>
> "Goomwah!" shouted the crowd.
>
> "You'll get gas heat in every teepee."
>
> Again the crowd shouted, "Goomwah!"
>
> After the speech, the chief said to him, "You're a good friend of the Indians. Please come into the corral so we can present you with a fine pony. But be careful and don't step in the goomwah.

Enough of that frivolity.

We hear much about all the benefits we will get from the removal of the manufacturers' sales tax which will sift through and make a terrific difference to us all in savings. I have a list here of some of the savings with the removal of the MST. For example, on a kitchen stove there will be a saving of $1.69. For a clothes dryer that costs $530, the saving will be $6.96. On an electric dishwasher the saving will be $9.19, and on a refrigerator the saving will be $12. I thought to myself that was fine, but how often does the average working-class family buy a new stove, clothes dryer or refrigerator? Of course, the answer is perhaps one of those items every couple of years, so there will be a marvelous saving, perhaps once in two years, of $9.19.

However, on the other side of this flip sheet there is a list of things on which GST will be paid directly. For example, on a monthly power bill the GST will be $5.61. That is not paid every couple of years but every month relentlessly, year in and year out. That would make up for ten refrigerators in pretty short order. On 100 litres of heating oil, the GST will be $1.98. There will be GST on weekly subscriptions to magazines of approximately $3.00.

Therefore, on those major manufactured items where there are perceived savings working through the system, it will not be noticeable to the average working family, whereas the immediate impact on the family budget, day after day and month after month, on things that must be consumed, such as heating fuel, will far outstrip those savings. I will not read the detail of those lists into the record.

One brief landed on my desk which I thought I should deal with. It consists of only a couple of pages. As soon as I tell honourable senators opposite that it is a brief presented by James R. McLachlan, Leader of the Yukon Liberal Party, they will say, "So what!" New senators on the Conservative side may not be aware that I lived in the Yukon for seven or eight years and practiced law in partnership with Erik Nielsen. The firm name was van Roggen and Nielsen. As one can imagine, it has been a major chore during the last 20 or 30 years to live down the fact in the Liberal Party that I was once a partner of Erik Nielsen.

Senator Frith: And he has had the same problem.

Senator van Roggen: He has had the same problem, but mine was a little greater than his.

This short brief particularly caught my eye when I saw it was from the Yukon where I had lived for so many years. I know the subject of the exceptional impact of the GST on the Northwest Territories has already been dealt with, but Mr. McLachlan makes one or two points that could well be read into the record. He said:

> First of all I want to thank you for taking the time to visit Whitehorse—and of course Yellowknife earlier in the week. I understand it was difficult to schedule these trips—but reason prevailed and you're here now to hear the concerns of northerners in this part of Canada.
> Many of the arguments that you will hear in Whitehorse today are those that you have heard many times before in your cross-country tour of the past month. I do not wish to re-hash a lot of those. However, I do wish to emphasize one very important point and offer a suggestion I think will be an improvement in another area.
> The Goods and Services Tax, at least as it is to be presently applied, is simply an UNFAIR tax in the way that it attacks the end price of the product. Because of our location in Canada's north we are particularly susceptible to the cost of moving a specific product from point of manufacture (or point of distribution in the case of an import) to the store itself. The cost of moving a specific product—the freight—is subject to the GST. The farther a particular item must travel the worse the tax bite becomes.
> To illustrate let me take you through the case of a pair of shoes from point of manufacture to the point of sale in Yukon. A pair of shoes manufactured in the Province of Quebec for $25 may hit the retail shelf in Toronto or Montreal for $45. For argument's sake let us establish a freight cost of $2 to get those shoes to the eastern markets. They are now worth $47 plus the GST on the product itself AND the $2 freight. Toronto and Montreal however are a long way from Whitehorse.
> Those shoes must now get to Edmonton or Vancouver which are our next mostly likely points of distribution for this area. The freight cost isn't anything like $2 per pair. Its risen to $4 per pair to cover the longer haul to those two provincial capitals—again subject to GST.
> But Edmonton and Vancouver are still 1300 and 2000 miles from the Yukon border—and a lot of that journey over a pretty formidable highway. The cost is now $6 per pair plus a little bit of GST. You've now satisfied the Whitehorse market but what about rural Yukon—the voice of which I'm certainly representing here today.
> Well you've got to load those shoes back on another truck, run up some more miles, another freight bill and of course some more 7% solution. If that community in Yukon is Old Crow you've just made the whole exercise that much worse again because everything has to be flown in—as are so many of the communities in the N.W.T., a fact of life I would imagine that you heard plenty of about when you were in Yellowknife earlier this week.
> The figures here are not 100% accurate for freight. It probably won't cost $6 per pair to ship to Whitehorse if you use a case lot shipment. They are slightly exaggerated and rounded off—but only for the point of emphasis—the emphasis of driving home a point that the farther away you live in this country from established markets and manufacturing centres the more you're going to pay.
>
> The new GST just makes this discrepancy all that more accentuated. One wonders what Michael Wilson was thinking about when he determined that freight should be subject to GST—perhaps he thinks Canada stops at the border of his Toronto riding.
> It is a very big country and it costs a lot to move product from one end of the country to another—we've always been stuck with that fact of life. The added tax now just hurts that much more and the wisdom of which will leave people scratching their heads a lot over the next six months.
> The second point that I would like to make is this: If there is to be a GST—that is Parliament has passed it through all its hurdles and the Senate has passed it—although somewhat grudgingly—then the timeframe for its implementation is completely wrong. It couldn't possibly be slated to go into effect at a worse time. This is because the majority of Canada's small businesses are working night and day during November and December on their Christmas sales. A large number of Canada's small businesses will do 40% of their annual sales volume in the final two months of the year. The last thing on their mind is implementing the most drastic change in Canada's taxation system in the last quarter century on New Year's Day. It's simply not in the cards. Although our > bureaucrats will wail at my suggestion of a delay by saying they've been doing their job faithfully by urging small business to register and familiarize themselves with procedure I say to them, "Get real, people. It's simply not going to fall into place as easily as you would like it to." I simply cannot see the toll free lines and the Department of Finance staying open extended hours during the Christmas week to answer everyone's last minute queries as they scramble to meet a deadline imposed upon them by a government about to administer a heavy new tax burden.

● (2015)

There are several points that he makes here: the timing, the unreality of the civil servants. The recent figures show that still almost half of small businesses have not yet registered. I was told the other day that one of the toll free lines in British Columbia has been closed down because the clerks manning it could not answer the questions, and they were embarrassing the government.

He goes on to say,

> I believe that the start of the new tax should not be until April 1, 1991. This gives small business an additional three months to prepare themselves at a time of year when it is not too hectic.
> Anybody who knows anything about government budgeting would realize that the April 1 date is a much more realistic date for revenue collection. It ties very nicely with existing budget dates. And it would certainly ease some of the burden on small business. Gentlemen, thank you for this opportunity . . . .

I remember what it was like. It is a long time since I lived in the Yukon, but the problems were not dissimilar then. I am speaking now of the early 1950's when we used to present brief after brief to the Federal Government about the cost of living there, the cost of freight and the fact that a progressive income tax, when applied in the Yukon, was totally unfair to the people living there, because the rate went up progressively, which all of us favour in normal circumstances. However, the people in the Yukon were caught with incomes half as high again as people in southern Canada, and therefore, had higher taxes but not a higher standard of living.

We had obviously slightly more sympathetic ears in those days, because while we got the usual arguments back from the civil services as to where they had to draw the line, what was done was that the territorial income tax level, equivalent to the provincial income tax level, was kept considerably below that of provinces such as British Columbia. Therefore the actual tax paid was more in line with that paid by the "outsiders", and indeed compensation was made for the higher rate paid on the higher cost of living.

There are no such ameliorations being suggested or applied at all in so far as the GST is concerned. The tax will have an enormous impact up there, where the majority of people spend quite literally all of their income in trying to meet the extraordinarily high cost of living in that area.

There is another small group that is affected adversely by this tax. I was taken by a brief that came across my desk from the Guide Outfitters Association of British Columbia. That is a pretty small group of individuals, and yet they were sufficiently concerned with the impact on them of this tax that they prepared a short but interesting and thoughtful brief, which they went to the trouble of having printed. I think that brief should be in the record.

Senator Marsden: They also appeared before the committee.

Senator van Roggen: Yes, they appeared before the committee. When I say the record, I am referring to the Debates of the Senate.

I might say there is no conflict of interest, since I am not related to him in any way and have no interest in his business, but I know one of these guides, one of the members of this organization. He is a young man who, a few years ago, started an outfitting camp up the coast of British Columbia, which was a great success. His clientele all are fly fishermen, and use barbless hooks—in other words everything is put back in the water. There is no degradation of the environment of any nature whatsoever. His business encompasses helicopter fishing into the mountains and the lakes, sea fishing for salmon, and trout fishing in the streams. He is booked up fully several seasons in advance almost exclusively by wealthy American corporations and individuals who go up there for a unique experience, and bring a lot of money into Canada. That redresses, to a small degree, the unfavourable balance of trade that we have in tourism in the world, as you well know.

Just reading from the brief:

> The following submission on the GST is made on behalf of the Guides and Outfitters Association of British Columbia (GOABC). It requests that the services of guide-outfitters, when consumed by non (Canadian)—residents be recognized as an export service, and zero rated accordingly. The basis for this position is firstly the damaging industry impacts that imposition of the GST would have, and secondly the administrative feasibility of zero-rating the service in question. This brief outlines the background and the basis for this position.

I think this is very important, honourable senators. It has become popular to say everybody wants an exemption, everybody wants favouritism, everybody wants to be especially left out. These men and women are thoughtful enough to come forward with a proposal that does not say, "We just want out. We want to be exempt. We should not pay 7 percent like everybody else on what we consume. We should not pay 7 percent like everybody else on our groceries that we purchase from day to day." They have very thoughtfully singled out the actual fee paid out by the foreigner, usually Americans who come into Canada, and they are comparing that to any other export we might make in this country, which of course is not subject to the impact of the GST.

I think it is a very thoughtful dividing line that they are using, to ask for their exemption, not on the day to day things that they purchase like all of us do, and would have to pay the

GST on, but on the substantial fees that the foreign guests they entertain pay to them, which can be likened very easily to a simple export of a few carloads of lumber or potash, or whatever.

Industry Profile

In addition to its significant economic contribution to outlying communities, the licensed guide outfitting industry plays a very important and often unacknowledged wilderness preservation role. For example, in British Columbia, guide outfitters have been instrumental in the establishment and support of numerous wildlife areas and wildlife preserve associations, such as the Spatzizi Wilderness Park, the Foundation for the Conservation of Wild Sheep, and many others. Such activities are to the collective benefit of all Canadians.

Senator Marsden: Excuse me Senator, what is the name of that park, can you spell it?

Senator van Roggen: Spatzizi.

Senator Marsden: I have never heard it before.

Senator van Roggen: I have not heard it before, either. Being from British Columbia, I should know about Spatzizi, but I am afraid I do not.

This is a very small industry, but some of the figures they quote are quite remarkable.

The industry in British Columbia had an estimated $22.1 million in revenues in 1988, 89% of which was from hunting operations, and ll% from non-hunting operations. While small in absolute terms, the industry plays a vital role in maintaining the economic viability of numerous outlying small communities. An estimated 1,740 direct jobs and $8.4 million in wage income was generated by the industry in 1988. The industry is especially significant to the economies of smaller, remote communities, both in terms of employment provided and services used, for example air charter operations.

Product Profile

The hunting product provided by guide outfitters comes in the form of a package, i.e. including food, accommodation, transport, and guiding services. The product is provided on a one-to-one basis and is readily segmented. The great majority of clients (96% in the case of the hunting product, and 83% in the case of the non-hunting product) are non-Canadian, and the industry product is very price sensitive, and very competitive internationally. (i.e. with increasing competition from places such as Russia, and Africa, and from the U.S.A.).

And more recently, as we all know, from Eastern Europe.

For this reason, and the general substitutability of the tourism product, the pass through of any portion of the GST would have a very serious effect. Unfortunately, because of the very low margins prevalent in the industry, operators are in no position to absorb the tax and will be forced to pass it on. Furthermore, since inputs into the industry did not bear any Manufacturers Sales Tax the net new tax burden would be the full 7%.

In other words, here is another case like that of the doctors, where there is no tax charged to the client against which a rebate can be claimed.

Impact and Recommendations

Because of the product's price sensitivity and the option open to customers of avoiding the tax altogether, the imposition of the GST would result in a serious decline in business for guide outfitters. This decline would not involve a short term adjustment but would be permanent. Not only would the damage be greatest in areas of Canada where alternate economic opportunities are most limited, but the net result would be less not more government tax revenue. The industry's existing expansion potential would also be choked off. This effect would be experienced not just in B.C. but across Canada and the guide outfitters in other provinces and territories support dthe GOABC on this issue.

• (2030)

Given the severity of the impact, the fact that exemption for exports is a basic principle, and that the services of guide outfitters are provided in a manner that facilitates special administrative provisions (ie provided in discrete, separable packages to non-residents), the GOABC's basic position is that zero rating should apply. This is the only option that will permit the industry to continue along its existing development path. The partial rebates provided for (in recognition of the special circumstances that apply to the tourism sector), such as for goods removed from the country and for accommodation, are either inapplicable or unworkable in the context of guide outfitting operations. As a possible second best alternative to zero rating the option of a full rebate provision, applicable to the full value of product package is also suggested.

Guide Outfitters and the GST

This presentation is being made on behalf of the Guide Outfitters Association of British Columbia (GOABC). The association was formed in 1965, and currently represents 180 licensed professional guide outfitters in the province of British Columbia. The Association is supported solely by membership dues and maintains a membership office in 100 Mile House, B.C. This submission presents a profile of the industry, assesses the likely impact of passage of the GST on the industry, and outlines the Association's recommendations with respect to the GST.

The Guide Outfitting Industry in B.C. has existed since the 1800's and has been subject to regulation since 1948. Guide outfitters are governed by the provincial Wildlife Act, and operate in guiding territories for which guide outfitters certificates are issued by the Wildlife Branch of the Ministry of the Environment. These certificates give the guide outfitters the exclusive right to guide hunters, both resident and non-resident, within the area for which the certificate is held. As of 1988, the number of licensed guide outfitters in the province was estimated at 278, 180 of whom were members of GOABC. This system of regulation ensures that the province's wildlife resource is utilized in a regulated way, sensitive to the long term management needs of the wilderness resource. Broadly similar systems of regulation are in place in other provinces and the territories.

Guide outfitters are required to ensure that each client is properly licensed to hunt in the province and to pay royalties to the Crown. In addition they are required to report annually on the number of clients served and harvest taken. For wildlife management purposes, in the case of sensitive species, the Wildlife Branch may set quotas limiting the number of animals of the particular species that can be taken by the outfitter's clients each year. A detailed allocation agreement between the GOABC and the British Columbia Wildlife Federation, representing the resident hunters of the province, defines the process through which such decisions are made. Guide outfitters have played a pivotal role in creating and maintaining many of the province's wilderness areas. Mount Assinniboine Provincial Park, the Purcell Conservancy, Spatzizi Wilderness Park in the Height of the Rockies are examples of wilderness areas created in part through the efforts of guide outfitters. In 1988, guide outfitters and other local groups set up a Wilderness Defense Fund to ensure the proper protection and management of the Purcell Conservancy and surrounding area. Several guide outfitters in the East Kootenay made financial and time contributions to the protection of the Height of the Rockies area, even though their territories were not located there.

Most of the rest of the brief is an amplification of the executive summary which I read at the beginning. However, it gives an idea of the problem that exists in a very small industry that is found in many provinces, that of the impact of the GST when dealing almost exclusively with large fees paid by American and Japanese hunters and fishermen coming into the country. They are simply asking that consideration be given to treating those fees as an export commodity.

I have a brief here that I read with great interest at the time, and I had thought that I might deal with it tonight. However, since Senator Olson is in the house and since he has not spoken yet, I think I will leave it. The brief is by the Western Canadian Wheat Growers' Association, and he will be much better able than I to deal with questions relating to their problems, which are great. So I shall pass that one on.

I have now a brief presented to the committee by Mr. Mel Hurtig in July. That brief was of sufficient interest to the Globe and Mail that it wrote three articles based on it. Heaven knows, the Globe and Mail is not a very harsh critic of the government and, basically speaking, supports the GST. However, it still thought this brief worthy of three articles in its paper. Some of the statistical information in the early part of the brief should be put on record.

[Senator van Roggen.]

A lot has been said in the last number of weeks in the debate on this subject of the tendency of this government to slowly transfer taxes from the rich to the poor, and from the corporate sector to the individual sector. I think many of you who know me would think of me as someone who is not adverse to giving the best possible competitive advantage to our corporate sector, but I do not think it is necessary that this be done at the expense of shifting the tax burden of this country from the rich to the poor as dramatically as has been done in the last five or six years by this government. Nor am I someone who could be described in the best of circumstances as a fan of Mr. Hurtig. In fact, I was so critical of him in a speech I made at one time that he issued a writ against me. That does not restrain me from reading part of his brief; the first portion containing the statistical information. He says in his introduction:

> The Canadian tax system has been characterized by enormous tax concessions for giant corporations, conglomerates and wealthy individuals.
> Huge, very profitable and powerful banks, trust companies, insurance companies, petroleum companies and mining companies have been paying remarkable low real rates of taxation on real profits, rates of tax well below that of average Canadian individuals, families, and well below the rates of most small and medium-size Canadian businesses.
>
> The Mulroney government "tax reform" has increased the tax burden for the overwhelming majority of individual Canadians and their families and decreased it for the very wealthy.
> At the same time effective corporate tax increases for the largest, most profitable corporations have been modest and the government's own projections on corporate tax revenue for 1992 show small increases.
>
> The result is a shocking concentration of wealth and power in Canada and an excessive tax burden for the overwhelming majority of Canadians.
> All of the following Canadian statistics come from Statistics Canada, the Department of Finance, the Department of Revenue or the Bank of Canada. International statistics are from the OECD, the I.M.F. or the U.S. Department of Commerce.

There are a number of charts here. I shall try to interpret them without asking that they be included in the written record for today.

The first charts deals with the seven largest chartered banks in Canada and their profits and taxes. When I first glanced at this chart, I thought, "Oh well, so they haven't paid any taxes recently because of their enormous write-downs on their bad Third World loans", but then I looked at the dates Mr. Hurtig was using. They are all prior to any of these enormous write-downs that the banks have taken recently on Third World loans. The profits quoted, I assume, are also after provisioning for bad debt.

This is the aggregate of the seven largest Canadian banks. In 1981, the aggregate profit was $916 million, federal income taxes paid by all seven, $8 million—0.87 per cent. In 1982, their profits were $951 million, federal income taxes paid, $7 million. In 1983, aggregate profits, $1.6 billion, taxes paid $40 million. In 1984, aggregate profits of $1.865 billion and taxes paid, $17 million. The highest ratepayer got to 2.44 per cent and dropped off again in 1984 to 0.91 per cent. Perhaps they had started provisioning by then.

Therefore, from 1981 to 1984 inclusive, Canada's seven largest banks made profits of $5.3 billion and paid federal taxes on these profits at the rate of 1.34 per cent. From 1980 to 1987, inclusive, Canada's banks made profits of over $7.64 billion and paid federal taxes at the rate of 2.48 per cent. Mr. Hurtig went on to say:

> These figures can only be described as appalling.
>
> It is completely beyond comprehension that any government, any elected officials, or any senior civil servants could have allowed such a situation to occur.
>
> Few Canadians are aware of these figures. Few taxpaying Canadians could comprehend how such a travesty could have been allowed.
> It is safe to say that the vast majority of bank tellers in Canada, including the lowest paid, paid a far higher rate of tax throughout the entire decade of the 1980s, than the bank that he or she worked for.
>
> The low effective rate of tax paid by banks, trust companies, insurance companies—in fact the entire financial sector—should be a scandal. But few Canadians know of it. The financial press in Canada does not tend to dwell on such matters. This Senate committee should not issue its report without providing Canadians with the following information:

● (2045)

> Total bank profits for the 1980s.
>
> Total taxes paid on these profits.
>
> The effective tax rate represented by the above.
>
> The Committee should supply the same information for trust companies, insurance companies and real estate companies.
>
> From 1980 to 1984 life insurance companies in Canada made total profits of $3.076 billion, and paid federal income taxes at the rate of 4.3%.
> From 1981 to 1984 seven large trust companies in Canada made profits of $775 million and paid federal income taxes at the rate of 7.6%.
> In addition, this committee should report to the people of Canada the true effective tax rate paid during the 1980s by the mining industry the oil and gas industry, and other key areas of the Canadian economy that have been paying low effective tax rates.

As an aside, while reading these figures I was thinking of the low rate of taxes paid by the financial institutions. At least mining companies and oil and gas companies have the claim that they should be able to write off, for tax purposes, their ore reserves in the ground or their oil and gas as a diminishing resource, as it is used up, as a depletion allowance or what have you. It would be interesting to know if those depletion allowances were deducted before these profit figures were pulled together, although I think they would have been under normal accounting circumstances. However, I do not know where such a depletion allowance fits into the financial institutions.

Mr. Hurtig goes on to say that:

> The metal mining industry made profits of $2.365 billion in 1986 and 1987 and paid federal and provincial income taxes at a total combined rate of only 7.7%.

He gives similar figures for the petroleum industry. In the next paragraph he says that:

> During these same two years, the financial sector, including banks, trust companies and insurance companies made profits of over $54.88 billion and paid taxes at the rate of only 11.2%.
>
> No decision about the implementation of a regressive, unfair, costly, and inflationary GST should be taken before the public has had a proper opportunity to examine the details of effective corporate tax rates during the decade of the 1980s.
> Since it is clear that the House of Commons will not produce and publicize such information, and that the business press has failed to do so on its own accord, this committee can serve a most valuable public purpose by providing this important information to Canadians. I would go beyond that and say that this committee has an obligation to the people of Canada to provide such information.

He goes on to ask:

> . . . .how could we have developed a tax system where banks can make billions of dollars in profits and pay a tax rate of 1% or 2%.
> And how can it be that after "tax reform" the present situation still remains grossly unfair to average Canadian taxpayers?

Then there is a graph with respect to percentages of total taxes collected starting in 1950. Individual income tax by individual Canadians contributed approximately 50 per cent of the total taxes collected by the federal government, rising over the last 40 years, to 88.1 per cent last year; whereas the corporate income tax has gone down, as I read the chart, from almost 50 per cent to 11.9 per cent. I do not think most Canadians have fully focused on this enormous shift in the tax burden in Canada over the last number of years.

Mr. Hurtig then states in his brief what is evident in his chart, namely:

> In 1950 corporations and individuals each paid about half of the income tax collected in Canada.

Forty years later, it has shifted to 90 per cent being paid by the individual and approximately 10 per cent being paid by the corporations.

There is then a chart on the major components of federal government revenue. The source is Statistics Canada. The changes are not as dramatic, but it does show indirect taxes dramatically rising in the last 20 years from 5 per cent to 25 per cent, while direct and business taxes, taken together because of the lower rate for corporations, remained more or less steady; so that the indirect taxes—hidden taxes, as we refer to them—have increased dramatically and, of course, are less visible to the individual Canadian.

He then has a chart showing corporate profits before taxes. Corporate profits before taxes in 1986 were $45 billion, rising to $56 billion in 1987, to $62 billion in 1988, and to $60 billion in 1989. So between 1986 and 1989 corporate profits increased by one third, but what happened to corporate taxes? We go over the page and find that the combined federal and provincial direct taxes from corporations, as a percentage of corporation profits—this is when profits rose dramatically—were 32 per cent in 1986, falling to 26 per cent in 1987, to 25 per cent in 1988, and to about 24 per cent in 1989. I am trying to read this as best I can. So corporate taxes in these years declined by some 20 per cent, while profits increased by 34 per cent.

It is rather difficult to understand how, during this period of tax reform of Mr. Wilson's in the last three or four years since he has been in office, corporate profits have dramatically risen coming out of the previous recession, while the tax collected from the same corporations has gone down by some 20 per cent. Again, the total revenue has gone up. Again, there is a shift of the tax burden to individual Canadians.

As far as the federal government is concerned—in case you want to lay the blame on the provincial government because the last chart showed combined figures—the next page has a chart of federal government direct corporate taxes with the provincial share taken out. Here is a look at the same trend but only as it relates to the federal government. Corporations paid an effective federal tax rate of 22.6 per cent in 1986, declining to 17.7 per cent in 1989 after tax reform. So while the federal government was facing all-time record deficits and corporate profits were increasing substantially, corporate direct tax payments to the federal government fell by 22 per cent. The next page sets forth the same statistical evidence in the form of a bar graph.

Mr. Hurtig then deals with provincial government direct taxes from corporations as a percentage of their profits. If the tax rate from corporations was not going to the federal government, perhaps the aggressive provinces were moving into the gap. Hardly. Exactly the same phenomenon was taking place at the provincial level; effective corporate taxes were being reduced there as well.

On the next page you see a bar graph taken over a four-year period, from 1986 to 1989 inclusive, showing personal income tax paid to both the federal and provincial governments rising from $85 billion to $95 billion to $107 billion to $112 billion. There was a steady increase of almost 25 per cent. At the same time, the bar graph shows corporate taxes during those same four years going from 14.4 to 15 to 16 and down to 15.3—almost level throughout the same four-year period.

[Senator van Roggen.]

Then we come to the subject of subsidies. Some will quickly point out that, while corporate tax rates in Japan, for instance, are much higher than in Canada and elsewhere, our major market is the United States and that we must be competitive, corporate tax rates in the United States are not that much higher than Canada's. They are higher, but the level of subsidy and assistance that goes to American corporations is nothing compared to what goes to Canadian corporations. Here we have a graph showing before-tax profits at $57 billion, federal and provincial income taxes of $12.66 billion, and government subsidies of $8.43 billion. So the net income tax, less the subsidies, is 7.4 per cent or $4.23 billion.

A moment ago, I commented on the fact that Japan paid higher corporate taxes. Here is a graph on exactly that point. This graph shows Canada's corporate tax rate relative to some of our trading partners: 8 per cent in Canada; 8.1 per cent in the U.S.; 10.6 per cent in the U.K.; 22.9 per cent in Japan. So the corporations in Japan contributed almost three times as much, as a percentage of total taxes, than did corporations in Canada, and yet those corporations in Japan compete rather well in the global market, as we all know.

We then have some statistics from the OECD, which show taxes on corporations as a percentage of total government principal tax revenue, and these figures are very close to the figures I gave you in the previous chart: 8.2 per cent in Canada; 8.5 per cent in the U.S.; 9.8 per cent in the U.K.; 23 per cent in Japan.

Mr. Hurtig then has a chart on the percentage of taxes on income, profits and capital gains paid by corporations for Canada and its main trading partners. The figures for the United Kingdom are after Margaret Thatcher had slashed taxes very dramatically, as you know, from a previous brief I dealt with earlier today. On this chart, Canada is at 16.9 per cent; the United States at 18.3 per cent; the U.K. at 28.6 per cent; Japan at 48.8 per cent.

Next we go to the top central government corporate tax rates for 1989. The graph does not make clear whether or not any allowance is made for provincial taxes. As the other countries shown, are unitary states, except for the United States, I do not know if that comparison, while unfavourable to Canada, can really be fair, so I will not touch on that.

Then we come back to personal income tax as a percentage of total tax receipts: France—and I do not know where they get all their revenue from, but they are very low—in the area of 12 per cent; Japan, approaching 25 per cent; Italy, just over 25 per cent; U.K., 26 or 27 per cent; Germany, 28 per cent; U.S.A., about 35 per cent; and Canada, getting close to 40 per cent, the highest of them all. Canada is the lowest in corporate tax rates and the highest in personal income tax rates—again most of that shift having taken place in the last four years of so-called tax reform in Canada.

It would be different if this all resulted in making our corporations more competitive, but it is being done at the same time that interest rates are being kept abnormally high, resulting in a high dollar and the further result that our exports are suffering. So, certainly, you cannot use the argument that there has been any benefit on the corporate side, from a productivity point of view, from these low corporate taxes. In the service sector, they are so low as to be almost meaningless.

Next, we have a graph showing taxes on personal income as a percentage of GDP. Well, that is much the same graph in a different form as the one before: personal income taxes in Japan at 7.3 per cent, rising to 10 in the U.K., 11 in the U.S. and 13.4 in Canada.

The next graph shows taxes on personal income as a percentage of total taxes, for Canada and its main trading partners, according to the OECD figures: Japan at 24 per cent; U.K. at 26 per cent; U.S. at 36 per cent; and rising in Canada to 38.7 per cent. In every case, Canada is the highest on the personal tax level.

Again, OECD figures, total government principal taxes on individuals as a percentage of total tax revenue: France, the lowest, going on a steady incline on a bar graph to Japan at 23 per cent, Germany and the U.K. at 28 per cent, Italy at 30 per cent and up to Canada at 39.1—rather interesting statistics.

We now come to indirect taxes, these famous hidden taxes which will now be exacerbated further by the GST, which was once to be visible but which will now be invisible. The graph shows indirect taxes as a percentage of total government tax revenue: Canada in 1988 was 38 per cent, as opposed to 32 per cent in France, 29 per cent in Germany, 26 per cent in Japan, 26 per cent in Italy and 24 per cent in the U.S. Canada is almost half as much again as in the U.S.

The next chart is combined revenue from net wealth taxes on individuals and capital transfer taxes, 1985. These were taxes we either do not have or have very little of in Canada. I am surprised myself at reading the number of other countries that have net wealth taxes and/or capital transfer taxes. They produce not a large percentage of their tax revenue, but in the case of Japan, it is over one per cent and moves on a sliding downward scale for Greece, Netherlands, Denmark, France, Portugal, U.S., Sweden and the U.K. Even the U.S. is up there at .8 per cent of their total revenue. Sweden is just below the U.S. The U.K. is next, and then Norway, Belgium, Austria, Finland, Spain, Germany at about 4 per cent, Ireland, Italy, New Zealand and then Canada at half of one per cent. So we certainly do not make up for any of the excessive taxes on individuals and hidden taxes by taxing capital or capital transfers in any form, as do our trading partners, almost without exception.

The subject of the brief then switches to corporate concentration in Canada, a subject which I think has to be of concern to any thinking Canadian. I know that the argument on the one side is that even the largest corporation in Canada, which might appear to be a monopoly insofar as our marketplace is concerned, is still comparatively small insofar as the globalized market is concerned. A company that monopolized 100 per cent of the Canadian market in a given product line would still be smaller than a company that had only 10 or 11 per cent of the total market in the United States in the same product line.

That is something that I have never complained about specifically, although I have always maintained that, if you had a free trade agreement with the United States, this monopoly concentration in a given product line would not be of concern because the control would come through the free trade mechanism. However, I also have felt—and I might point out to honourable senators that this is spelled out in the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on free trade in 1982—that upon entering into a free trade agreement with the United States, we should have drastically amended, if not abolished, the combines legislation in Canada because Canadian companies subjected to free competition from American companies of a larger size should be free to amalgamate and combine in any form that they wished, so as to be as competitive as they possibly could be in the Canadian context. Nothing has been done by this government in that respect, that I know of, since the implementation of the Free Trade Agreement.

However, this particular part of this brief does not deal with the size or concentration or monopoly position of an individual Canadian company in an individual product line, such as a mining company, whether it be Noranda or Falconbridge having an abnormally high percentage of a given product line in nickel or aluminum products, or what have you. I do not think that is of any concern to the author of this brief, nor to myself. What he is talking about here are these huge family agglomerations where the largest Canadian companies become—courtesy of Senator Eyton and others—simply a cog in a financial empire, more interested in spinning money back and forth than in building wealth-producing companies. Perhaps I should not have said "more interested"; that may be unkind or unfair, but one suspects it is often the result.

This chart points out that 25 enterprises in Canada control 1,116 corporations and own 41 per cent of all assets. Whether that means all assets on the Toronto Stock Exchange or all assets in Canada in total, I cannot tell you. The top 1/100th of 1 per cent of all enterprises control 55 per cent of all assets. I am assuming that that now means all assets of the country. Over half owned by the top 1/100th of 1 per cent of all enterprises! The top 1 per cent of all enterprises control 86 per cent of all assets and make 75 per cent of all profits. Put another way, 99 per cent of all corporate enterprises own 14 per cent of the assets and make only 25 per cent of the profits. This is not an area that I have made a study of, but I think it is reaching proportions which are unique in the world.

Honourable senators should note that the text goes on to point out that these are the figures for 1987, before many of the huge, front-page mergers of 1988 and 1989.

• (2115)

In the interests of time, I will move ahead on some of these charts which are difficult to read into the record without having them published.

Next is an OECD chart which lists total tax receipts as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product. Mr. Hurtig then asks,

> Are Canadians Overtaxed?
> We continually hear from right-wing "think tanks" such as the Fraser Institute and the C.D. Howe Institute . . . .that we Canadians are overtaxed.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association tells us the same thing, as do most business groups. Of course, so does the financial press. This graph lists Canada paying total tax receipts below those of the majority of EEC countries in Europe, ahead only of Spain, Australia, Japan and the U.S., but I do not have a clear understanding of whether or not there was a distinction made for provincial taxation, and so I have difficulty with the chart.

The brief then lists government social expenditures as a percentage of GDP for 1989, and we sit pretty well in the middle of some 20 countries mentioned. The brief then addresses social programs and social spending and that is another subject which is probably better dealt with in a different debate on a different day.

With that, honourable senators, I will leave that particular brief and move on to the nine o'clock reading from Mr. Morris K. Udall.

Senator Steuart: Which Udall would this be?

Senator van Roggen: Moe Udall. Honourable senators who were with the Canada-U.S. Inter-Parliamentary Group in Phoenix, Arizona four or five years ago will remember that he was invited to dinner with us one night. I must say, he was an awfully funny fellow. One chapter in his book is on "Aging and Death", and that will be of interest to all members of this chamber. He states:

> An old man was interviewed by a newspaper reporter on his one hundredth birthday. "To what do you attribute your longevity?" asked the reporter.
>
> The centenarian thought for a moment and began ticking off items on his fingers: "I never smoked, I never drank liquor, I never overate, and I always rise at six in the morning."
> "I have an uncle who did all those same things, yet he only lived to be sixty," the reporter said. "How do you account for that?"
>
> "Well," said the old man, "he just didn't keep it up long enough."
> Following a long and eloquent sermon on the importance of fellowship and getting along with one's neighbors, the preacher asked the congregation, "Is there anyone present who has led such a life that he does not now have any enemies?"
> An old man stood up and said, "Right here, parson."
> "Congratulations," said the preacher. "Please tell the congregation how you did it."
>
> The old man looked around the room, winked, and said, "I outlived the bastards!"
>
> Every losing politician should heed the words of an old hillbilly often quoted by former vice president Alben Barkley. Uncle Zeke was renowned for his wisdom. When asked why he was so wise, he said, "Waal, I've got good judgment. Good judgment comes from experience; and experience . . . waal, that comes from bad judgment."
>
> Senator Theodore Green, who served in the Senate until his nineties, always carried a little black date book. At one Washington party a lady saw the senator put on his spectacles and begin to study the little black book.
>
> "Senator, can I help you find something?" she asked.
>
> "No, this is only my engagement book," the senator said.
>
> "Oh, I imagine you are trying to see which party you are attending tomorrow?"
> "No," the senator replied, "I am trying to find out where I am tonight."

That reminds me of a true story about that great Canadian, Stephen Leacock. I have not told this story for ten years, and I may have forgotten it. However, it was something to do with him being on a train and losing his ticket. The conductor admonished him not to worry about his ticket, that they could trust him since they knew him very well, and that the CPR certainly could give him credit and he could purchase his ticket another time. He said, "That's not the problem, son. I am trying to remember where I am going."

This anecdote in Mr. Udall's book reminds me of a story of my grandmother's:

> At an Arizona-Arizona State football game there wasn't a ticket available for weeks. On the 45-yard line a fan sat with an empty seat next to him. A spectator asked the man if he knew who owned the seat. "Yes, I do," the fan replied sadly.
> "Then why isn't it being used on the day of the biggest game of the year?", the spectator asked.
>
> Mournfully, the man said, "Well, my wife and I have season tickets and we always come together. But last Friday she died."
>
> "Oh, I'm sorry to hear that," the spectator said. "But why didn't you give her ticket to one of your children?"
> "Oh, I couldn't do that. They're all at the funeral."

My grandmother was a Scottish Presbyterian from your part of the world, Senator Murray, from PEI and Pictou County. She told the story of the Scots lady down in those parts who admonished her husband, who had never go along with her mother. She said, "Jock, there's just one thing I want you to promise me, and that is that on the day of my funeral you ride with Mother in the carriage." He said, "Aye, Maggie, that I'll promise ye, but it will spoil the day for me."

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, listening to Senator van Roggen reminded me of Mr. Spicer going around the country and solving all the problems of the nation by telling stories and listening to jokes in Tuktoyaktuk and in other places, and by doing so knowing exactly what the people are thinking we should have in Canada. Today, with Senator van Roggen's stories, I wonder how they relate to the goods and services tax that we are about to debate here. I have been waiting since September to hear the "Great Debate", because many times I have heard different senators say, "Let's get to the debate on the bill. Never mind all these problems and procrastinations, let's debate the bill." I have waited and waited for senators on the government side to rise and tell us some of the good points of the bill, and after waiting and waiting I finally have to rise to tell them what I think are some of the good points of the bill. Apparently members on the government side do not know any good points in the bill to persuade me to vote for it. I am one of those senators who would like to be able to vote for the bill because Summerside, Prince Edward Island, will get all these offices and all these jobs. Probably half the fellows from the CBC who were fired today will come to Prince Edward Island and we will have an influx of people looking for jobs when the GST passes.

Since I seem not to be able to get anyone on the government side to elaborate on the good points of the bill after waiting for this debate, I thought I would say a few good words on behalf of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, give them some moral support, and show them that someone did have some thoughts on Bill C-62.

It is clearly an understatement to say that the proposed goods and services tax as embodied in Bill C-62 is an unpopular and controversial tax. Indeed, the tax is so unpopular that it prompted the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to recommend that it be killed. The Senate rejected that proposal. Subsequently, members on this side of the chamber, Liberals as well as the Independents, proposed a number of amendments that we thought would improve the bill and those were also rejected. It is useful then to recall at this time just what we have learned about the tax and to recount how Canadians feel about it.

When the government introduced its tax reform white paper in 1987, it promised taxes which would be fair and equitable, visible and supportive of the economy. The goods and services tax has been touted as a tax which meets all of these criteria, but from the evidence of Canadians it failed to pass the test.

Of course, it must be acknowledged that the current manufacturers' sales tax is flawed. Most of the 370 witnesses heard during the Senate Banking committee's cross-country meetings agreed with this assessment. But only 32 expressed outright unreserved support for Bill C-62, while another 30 were reported to support the bill with some changes. On the other hand, 210 witnesses expressed outright opposition to the goods and services tax. An indication of the great number of technical problems with the goods and services tax was that 159 witnesses asked for changes in the proposal. The members on this side of the house have no difficulty in agreeing with the Government that the manufacturer's sales tax is bad, and indeed in need of reform. We, the majority of the Canadians, do not agree that the goods and services tax is the answer.

• (2130)

Although we were aware that a majority of Canadians opposed the goods and services tax, it was startling just how broad and deep this opposition was. In every city across Canada where the committee held hearings, groups, organizations, labour unions and concerned citizens appeared and expressed their fierce opposition to the goods and services tax. An indication of the depth of opposition to the GST was the fact that 132 witnesses asked the Senate to overrule the House of Commons and reject Bill C-62 completely.

The goods and services tax cannot be defended by simply stating that the manufacturer's sales tax is flawed. The goods and services tax must garner support on its own merits. This has not been done. The debate in the Senate today is not to change our stand or opposition to the goods and services tax.

What have we learned about the bill?

We have learned that the goods and services tax is an unfair tax. Most importantly and more important than the technical flaws in the bill is the matter of fairness. Any tax that is going to raise $18.5 billion per year and constitute a major part of the Federal Tax arsenal must meet some basic elements of fairness. The GST, another VAT-type tax, is not generally viewed as meeting those basic requirements. It is a regressive tax; lower income individuals spend a greater share of income on consumption and therefore are obliged to pay a greater proportion of their income on sales tax. To make it more acceptable, the Federal Government is including a system of enhanced refundable tax credits as part of the GST package. Many studies of consumption taxes have shown such credits to be an effective and efficient way of relieving lower-income households of the burden of a consumption tax. But if the basic structure of the tax is going to be determined by the tax credits, they must continue to be effective. Instead the provisions of the bill ensure that only temporarily would they do the job which they are meant to do.

The credits, and the income threshold after which they declined, are only indexed to take account of inflation in excess of 3%. Thus, the real value of the credits would decline over time and an increasing number of individuals and families would have their benefits reduced. Eventually, even the very poor would not be protected from the extra cost imposed by the GST. Indeed, after only five years, some families could lose up to $300 of the real value of their credits, which amounts to one-half of the maximum value of credits for which their are eligible.

In the past, the government has made statements about adjusting the sales tax credits and income thresholds over time. Indeed the debate of this chamber on the amendment to provide full indexing heard just such claims as well as the arguments that the federal sales tax credit has been increased at rates in excess of the rate of inflation and in excess of that needed to compensate for higher tax rates. However, we are not in a position to evaluate the government's intentions. We can only judge the GST on the basis of the legislation which is before the Senate today, and clearly Bill C-62 does not provide for full indexation of the refundable sales tax credits and income thresholds. If the government is going to do what it says it is going to do, full indexation will, in fact, cost nothing. Why cannot such a basic guarantee be given to the poorest of families who will rely heavily on these credits if the GST comes into being?

But what is particularly ironic is the fact that some of the stronger supporters of the bill have criticized this lack of full indexation. Professor Robert Clark of the University of British Columbia, the Economic Council of Canada, and the Conference Board of Canada all felt that the system of credits is vital to alleviating some of the regressive effects of the GST. Because of this importance, the real value of the credits must be protected. Another strong supporter of the GST, Mr. Wolfe Goodman, stated that a lack of full indexation would ". . . be grossly unfair to the poorest and the most vulnerable people in our community."

This is not the only problem with the GST. The $100 single adult credit is not fully obtainable unless the individual's income exceeds $11,169. We are told that this credit is designed to reach the working poor, but must it also deny the very poor who are in the most dire need of assistance? Also if Quebec continues to treat the refundable sales tax credit as income for purposes of determining social assistance, the GST tax credit would merely offset social assistance benefits to the poor of that province.

The GST credits completely fail to take into account the high cost of living in Canada's remote regions. The GST would apply on the final price of goods and services inclusive of transportation costs, which are a significant component in the price of goods and services offered in the north. Although the average Whitehorse family would pay about $400 more GST than the average Canadian family, this is not reflected in the value of the credit. We also know that the cost of living in Yellowknife is 40% higher than in southern Canada, with outlying settlements even more expensive. Thus, not only are the credits too small, but the income threshold of $24,800 at which the GST credits start to be reduced will not reflect the same standard of living in the North as in southern Canada.

The Government of Yukon made the following point before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when it was holding hearings in Whitehorse.

However, the new goods and services tax, as proposed, is particularly unfavourable to the Yukon and to other northern areas of Canada. What we are particularly concerned about is a national tax rate of 7 per cent. In fact, a national rate of any per cent will be inequitable for the Yukon, because most of our commodities are, in fact, transported into the Yukon and and therefore our residents will end up paying more taxes than the Canadian residents in the south. Therefore, we would prefer if there was some kind of relief built into the tax in the form of, perhaps, a lower rate of 5 per cent or something like that for the North and the remote areas, in order to offset the additional cost.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Another area that is inequitable is the credits that will be provided under the bill. The cost of living in the North is already high, and with the increased cost caused by the GST we will not receive the same benefits for those tax credits as will the residents of the south.

The other area of concern to us in the north is the threshold at which GST credit is phased out. Again, because of the high cost of living in the north, our salaries and wages are naturally higher than wages in the south. In fact, they are generally in the range of between 20 per cent and 25 per cent higher. Therefore the definition of a low-income Canadians in the Yukon or indeed in the Northwest Territories or any high cost centre in the country, is not the same as that of low income Canadians in Ontario, Quebec, Manitoba or Saskatchewan.

• (2145)

The system of credits is not the only means by which the government has promised the people that the adverse consequences of the GST would be mitigated. Some products are to be zero-rated while others are tax-exempt. The government, for example, has made much of the fact that residential rents are tax-exempt. This exemption serves to conceal the GST paid on inputs, but it certainly does not eliminate the tax. This is particularly ironic because the FST is being discarded because of its invisibility.

The price of exempt items, such as residential rents, would go up as a result of the GST. In the case of new rental accommodation, the increase can be substantial. The Fair Rental Policy Organization of Ontario has claimed that average rents in Ontario would increase by 2 per cent on account of the GST. Rents in new buildings would increase by about $50 a month. It is true that provinces such as Ontario have strict rent controls, but if these costs cannot be passed on explicitly via higher rents, they will be passed on in other ways—through lower maintenance, less frequent repairs or direct charges for other services.

Many Canadians find it difficult to purchase their own homes. The government has reassured Canadians that the affordability of housing will not be much affected by the GST. Evidence is quite to the contrary. Land will now be taxed for the first time under the GST. It constitutes a large part of the price of housing in high-cost housing markets. In these areas, such as Toronto, Vancouver and the Golden Horseshoe areas of southern Ontario, new home prices could increase by 3 per cent, substantially higher than the figures cited by the federal government. In Ontario, this amounts to a $10,000 increase in the price of a home. Even though the sale of used housing is free of tax, that market should also see price increases as a result of the GST. Since used housing is a substitute for new housing, an increase in the price of the latter should drive up the price of the former. A more direct effect is due to the fact that soft costs—that is, realtors' fees, legal fees and so on—will now be subjected to the GST. A 7 per cent tax on these costs could increase the price of a home by 0.5 per cent.

Although the GST does not tax basic groceries, it is quite misleading to think that it does not tax food. According to the Canadian Restaurant and Food Association, 40 per cent of the householder's food dollar is spent in eating establishments. When we add to this the food items which are not basic groceries, either by the nature of the items or by the size of the packaging, the notion that food is not taxed proves to be totally incorrect.

Although there would be a GST rebate of 2.5 per cent on purchases of newly-constructed houses valued up to $350,000, declining on prices above that level, there is no similar rebate offered on new rental accommodations. The Senate Banking Committee heard that the cost of new rental accommodations would increase by 7 per cent. On average, the GST would raise residential rents by 2 per cent in Ontario, and even older buildings will be subject to the tax on many inputs. Similarly, the committee was told that the GST could raise the price of a monthly rental by from $27 to $56 in Vancouver. Low-income individuals can ill afford such rate hikes, particularly in tight rental markets such as Ontario where almost one half of the tenants with incomes below $25,000 already pay 30 per cent of their income in rent. It seems extraordinary that in introducing Bill C-62 the government failed to address adequately a problem as fundamental to a sales tax as the issue of regressivity. It is unfair to lower-income families and it is unfair to those living in high-cost parts of the country.

We have also learned that the tax is too complex. The goods and services tax is not only unfair, it is extremely complex. A multi-staged sales tax such as the GST is regressive with respect to compliance by business. A British study found that the cost of complying with a VAT tax is 40 times higher for small businesses as a proportion of sales than for a large firm. Businesses making only taxable sales must account for the tax paid on purchases and the tax owed on sales. However, the complexity increases as the number of zero-rated and tax-exempt items are added to the system. The evidence from a book by Professor John Whalley and Deborah Fretz, indicates:

> . . . the particular form of VAT that Canada proposes to introduce is, by international standards, surprisingly complex. It also has a relatively narrow base and, if European experience is anything to go by, further complications may yet develop, including multiple rates.

The complexity of the tax is most evident for small retailers selling food products. The definition of basic groceries is replete with anomalies. It will be up to the retailer to ensure that the tax applies correctly. Large retailers who have computerized check-out scanners can program their computers to distinguish between taxable and tax-free products, but for smaller retailers these distinctions must be made by the cashier.

Suppliers of exempt and non-exempt goods and services must appropriate their inputs so as to claim input tax credits only on purchases used to produce taxable supplies. This poses particular administrative difficulties for those who supply both types of goods, such as financial institutions, education institutions, charities, non-profit organizations and landlords whose complexes include both long-term residential and commercial supplies. Under any value-added style tax, the compliance cost for small business is already substantial, but the government has magnified this beyond tolerance by proposing to introduce the goods and services tax without folding it and the provincial sales tax into a single national tax regime. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has said that the two-tiered approach is unworkable and has been adamant that the GST not proceed without the cooperation of the provinces. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business told the committee that what this government is proposing is the absolute worst sales tax in the world, that it is the worst system that man could possibly devise. The Saint John Board of Trade indicated that small business would face an administrative nightmare; yet the federal government has decided to proceed with this tax anyway.

Most provinces intend to apply the provincial sales tax on top of the GST rather than in parallel. If the goods and services tax is to be visible, cash registers must be equipped to separate out the GST component from the subtotal before the provincial sales tax is applied. Unfortunately, most cash registers simply cannot handle the job and consumers would see a single compound rate consisting of both the GST and the provincial sales tax added on top. This is especially ironic considering that visibility was supposed to be one of the major benefits of this goods and services tax. It now appears that visibility has been sacrificed, and the best the government can do in that regard is to require vendors to hang a sign stating that the price has GST included.

The recent agreement by Quebec to harmonize its provincial sales tax with the GST, although a step in the right direction, is considerably short of a national consensus. Even then the agreement was reached at the cost of the resignation of Quebec's Minister of Revenue. The premiers of the other nine provinces stated in a joint communique, released at the premiers' conference on August 13 and 14, that they find the goods and services tax unacceptable and believe that it should not proceed. The recently elected premier of Ontario, the Honourable Bob Rae, has publicly vowed to fight the GST. What is also ironic is the fact that Quebec has agreed to harmonize with the federal government, yet has now stated that it will employ a tax base that differs from the federal system with the removal of the tax on books. This is not a good sign.

The Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development recently commented on the proposed goods and services tax. That organization concluded that the lack of federal-provincial harmonization is the most serious shortcoming of this new tax, leading to needlessly higher administration and compliance costs. These costs also rise by the failure to tax basic groceries.

Complexity of compliance is harmful to the economy. Resources must be spent in an activity that adds nothing to the goods and services people wish to consume. This complexity is often reflected in the higher administration costs to the government, which must hire an additional 4000 people and spend an extra $380 million to collect the same amount of money. This makes no sense at all.

While the government has argued that the goods and services tax is a replacement tax, this is clearly not the case. According to the evidence of the Chief Statistician of Canada, 60 per cent of personal expenditures are on services. Even when expenditures on exempt services, such as rent, are excluded from the tax base, a substantial portion of consumer expenditures will be directly burdened by a sales tax for the first time. Significantly, the Canadian Advertising Foundation agreed that the goods and services tax is not simply a replacement tax for the existing manufacturers' sales tax. The Standards Division of the Foundation ruled that government radio advertising stating that the goods and services tax is not an additional tax was deceptive because the goods and services tax is applied on a much broader base than the manufacturers' sales tax, including such services as restaurant meals and haircuts. The Better Business Bureaus of Vancouver and Toronto labelled the government's advertising as offensive and misleading.

We also learned that the goods and services tax harms our economy. Of all the tax alternatives, none is as damaging to the tourism industry as the goods and services tax. It would encourage Canadians to vacation abroad and discourage foreigners from coming here. This industry generates $24 billion per year in revenue and employs 1.2 million people. Tourism has the potential of being a major growth industry in Canada, yet the evidence indicates that the tourist industry is already suffering from a declining number of foreign visitors, and the GST will only exaggerate the problem.

Bill C-62 would provide some relief in the form of rebates to foreign travellers for tax paid on accommodations and goods purchased and taken out of the country. However, this would not alleviate the problem because of the minimum $20 rebate amount and because the large portion of expenditures tourists make are on services and other items that do not qualify for the rebate. Also, the tourist rebates would do nothing to encourage Canadians to remain at home rather than to travel abroad.

With the United States border within several hours for the vast majority of Canadians, the goods and services tax is one more reason to vacation south of the border.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bonnell, would you allow a question?

Senator Bonnell: Yes.

Senator Corbin: You are talking about travel to the U.S. border and points beyond. As a Prince Edward Islander you would travel from your home to the ferry at Borden, buy your ticket and have a half-hour crossing. Then you would have to drive across New Brunswick to St. Stephen to Calais, Maine or you can go up through Fredericton and hit the border at Vanceborough or go further still to Woodstock to Houlton. How long would it take you to get there, and would it be worth the time and expense? Of course, once at the border you are not in a shopping centre. I suppose your first point would be Bangor, Maine, Freeport or down to perhaps Portland. Would the trip be worth your trouble?

Senator Bonnell: The only answer I can give you, Senator Corbin, is that not too many Prince Edward Islanders want to leave home to go anywhere. It is the garden province, the best tourist area in the country, it is the birthplace of the nation, it has more beaches than the state of California, it has the warmest salt water north of Florida, so who would want to leave to go to the United States, which is not as good a country as Canada?

But you will have to pay a sales tax on everything you do. Even crossing on the ferry you will have to pay a 7 per cent tax. You will have to pay 7 per cent on gas. If you eat in New Brunswick on your way you will have to pay a 7 per cent tax, along with its provincial sales tax. Then once you hit the American border, you can get your gas for one quarter of what you would pay for it in Canada and on which there is no sales tax. So with a few dollars across the border, we could travel farther, buy more and pay no tax on our accommodation. If a tourist comes to Prince Edward Island, he will have to pay a provincial sales tax of 10 per cent on his bed, along with the 7 per cent GST.

Because of the fact that our province is so beautiful, none of our islanders would leave. It would take us an hour to get across Prince Edward Island. We would have to wait an hour at the ferry because we do not have a fixed link. It would take another hour to cross on the ferry, another hour to get Moncton, another hour to get to Sussex, perhaps an hour to get to St. Stephen, and then from St. Stephen we are into Calais, Maine. There is not much there so we would probably have to go to Bangor, which would take us another hour and a half. Once we go that far we may as well go all the way down to Boston where all our relatives are and then come back. It would take us quite a few hours to get there, and we would be paying an extra 7 per cent tax all the way there and all the way back. We would finally decide we were broke before we started and we would not go anywhere. It is a sad situation.

Senator Murray, can you do something about this? Can you at least give us the fixed link so we will not have to wait the hour or two?

Senator Murray: Another miracle! You are in favour of it! You have finally declared you are in favour of it.

Senator Bonnell: I asked if you could give us the fixed link.

Senator Murray: Make sure that is in Hansard.

Senator Bonnell: That will be in Hansard, don't you worry. We on this side do not fool around with Hansard and change the words or change the actions. We leave it as it is.

Senator Corbin: Senator Bonnell, if you eventually get that fixed link, regardless of the nature of the link—whether it be a bridge or combination bridge-tunnel—people going to the island and islanders would have to pay a toll for the use of that facility which would also be taxed under the current rules. What are your views on that?

Senator Bonnell: If the truth was known, back in 1867 when this great country was put together, and even when the Fathers of Confederation met in Charlottetown in 1864, the Prince Edward Island delegation wanted Upper and Lower Canadians to get together there to put the package together. We did not join then. We waited until 1873 so we could get promised continuous communication with the mainland.

Senator Murray: The disagreement with the Senate kept you out.

Senator Bonnell: The Senate as well. We wanted to make sure we had four seats in the Senate, and we wanted to make sure we had a chamber of sober second thought.

Senator Murray: You wanted the 3-E Senate.

Senator Bonnell: We wanted what kind of a Senate?

Senator Murray: You wanted a 2-E Senate.

Senator Bonnell: 2-D?

Senator Murray: E. You wanted the same number of senators for every province.

Senator Bonnell: I think we should have that. We should have an elected Senate, an equal Senate and an effective Senate. If we had four representatives for Prince Edward Island and for all the other provinces, think of the money we could save! We could lower the goods and services tax and have better representation across this country. Four men like myself from each province would be great.

Senator Murray: Perhaps some women to!

Senator Bonnell: Four women would be good, too!

Senator Perrault: That is a marvellous speech!

Senator Corbin: Would you still retain the provision for eight additional senators in the Constitution?

• (2215)

Senator Bonnell: No. I think if we had four from each province, there would be no call for the divisional senators because we would get along so well. We would all be thinking of our regions and our provinces and we would be showing some strength to the lower house so that they would not dare confront us with this type of legislation when 85 per cent of the people of Canada are against it. That would not happen if we had a strong, elected upper house with four representatives from each province—or even ten from each province, if they want to give some more of their friends a job.

Anyway, back to the fixed link. If we get a fixed link or a causeway or a tunnel, I am afraid they will put a tax on transportation across it. I am afraid they would make us pay, and our travel across to the mainland should be free. On the Trans-Canada Highway, you can go from Nova Scotia to New Brunswick and it does not cost you five cents. You can go from New Brunswick to Quebec and it does not cost you five cents. However, to come to Prince Edward Island, we will be penalized because we will have to pay a tax to come to our beautiful province, or if we wish to leave and go and see what the rest of Canada is doing, we will have to pay a tax again to take the ferry to get across to the other provinces. We were promised in Confederation that we would have continuous service to the mainland, and Canadians should not have to pay five cents to come to Prince Edward Island to see our culture and our people.

Senator Corbin: Speaking of your people, have they found the Malpeque Bell yet?

Senator Bonnell: Well, I will tell you about the Acadians and Malpeque. Some years ago, the bell in Malpeque disappeared and they lost it for years, but they found it not too many years ago in an Acadian museum. There was the bell, and the Acadians said it was their bell, it was an historical bell that they wanted and that it should belong to the Acadians and should be in their museum. The next thing you know, the church down there said no, that it was their bell, and they took it out of the museum and put it back in the church. The other day, it disappeared again from the church and they cannot find the bell. Some people think they are building a new Acadian museum and the bell is in the foundation now and so the Acadians have the bell forever. Where the bell is, we do not know. We have the RCMP looking for the bell, the Acadians looking for the bell, and the United Church of Canada looking for the bell, but the bell has not been found. Perhaps some day that bell will tell the real history of the early settlers in North America.

Senator Corbin: If they find it, this government will probably tax it. Be careful!

Senator Bonnell: Yes, there will probably be a tax on it as well. Anyway, I was speaking about the goods and services tax. Thank you for your question and thank you for having such an interest in Prince Edward Island and our transportation problem. If you could get some of the Trans-Canada Highway up through New Brunswick fixed so that we could come to your province and travel on better roads, we would be much happier. I hope that the federal government will help you with that project so that all of us in Atlantic Canada who have to travel through New Brunswick to get to Upper Canada will have an easier time. I am sure that even Senator Buchanan from Nova Scotia would like to see a good highway through New Brunswick. He would like to see the Trans-Canada Highway widened out so that we could have at least four lanes that would help out our trucks and transportation because the rails are gone and now we have to put everything on the road. We have these big 18-wheelers and they are destroying the roads of New Brunswick, and all of Canada should be paying its share because all of Canada uses those roads. Even people from Cape Breton travel those roads through New Brunswick. We need a better highway system.

Senator Graham: And all the people trying to get to Cape Breton use those roads.

Senator Bonnell: Even people from the Yukon or British Columbia have to travel on the roads to get into New Brunswick. We Prince Edward Islanders are apparently special; we have to pay for a ferry to get to the island.

Senator Corbin: You will still pay the GST on the Wood Island Ferry, though.

Senator Bonnell: Yes. Many of our islanders go down to Cape Breton in the fall of the year when the leaves are turning to see the beautiful hills and valleys and lakes along the great Cabot Trail.

Senator Corbin: Don't forget the fog!

Senator Bonnell: Yes, we should not forget the fog.

Senator Corbin: That is one thing they have in Cape Breton that this government will not be able to tax.

Senator Bonnell: I am sure they will try. As I was saying, the United States border is only several hours' drive for the vast majority of Canadians, whether they live in New Brunswick, Ontario or British Columbia, and the goods and services tax is one more reason to vacation south of the border.

The problem of cross-border shopping in the United States has already reached serious proportions for some Canadian border communities. The GST can only increase the relative attractiveness of United States shopping. When surveyed, 47 per cent of Canadians indicated they will vacation in the United States rather than in Canada, according to the Conference Board of Canada Tourism Research Institute. The number of Canadians taking their holidays within Canada has been consistently declining for the last decade, with the United States being the prime beneficiary. This sort of economic environment, with the perception of the high Canadian dollar and the fact that travel will become more expensive after the goods and services tax comes in in 1991, will only further encourage that trend to travel and holiday in the United States. Foreign travel receipts represent a valuable Canadian export worth approximately $7.2 billion to the Canadian economy in 1989. Taxing exports is simply the wrong route to take. Furthermore, it runs contrary to one of the government's stated reasons for introducing the goods and services tax, which is to relieve the tax burden on Canadian exports.

We should not ignore the regional impact of a deteriorating tourist industry. For the outlying regions of Canada, which do not have an industrial base and are unlikely to have a strong industrial base for some time to come, tourism is very important for their economies and is, in fact, one of the few realistic alternatives to an economy heavily dependent on natural resources.

A major preoccupation of economic policy concerns the control of inflation. We are paying a high price for this policy, in terms of higher interest rates and their effect on the economy. Yet, the federal government is intent on introducing a tax which will, in all likelihood, increase the rate of inflation.

The first reason it would raise prices is that provision has not been made to remove the existing manufacturers' sales tax from all products. Representatives from groups across the country said this. For example, the government's 8.1 per cent rebate for FST paid on existing inventories is completely inadequate compensation for firms which are holding goods on which they paid tax at the rate of 13.5 per cent. In this regard, automotive parts dealers, building supply dealers, importers and manufacturers of toiletries, cosmetics and fragrances all pointed out the inadequacy of the FST rebates. Firms are expected to pass along the supposed savings from the removal of the FST, but this is impossible where the old tax remains embedded in its inventories.

It is also ironic that the GST is touted as a tax which removes relative price distortions in the economy. Yet, the manufacturers' sales tax inventory rebate is applied in a haphazard manner, giving too little to some and possibly too much to others. During the transition, this is probably the most important source of distortions that many sectors can expect to face. Contrary to the intent of the GST, relative price distortions will not be corrected.

The government is spending $19 million on a Consumer Information Office, the CIO, to monitor price changes as a result of the GST. The House of Commons committee which studied the organization heard that, in most cases, it is impossible to determine the amount of FST embedded in the price of a product. The Consumer Information Office recently released its first publication on the expected price changes from the GST. However, the Retail Council of Canada believes that the booklet could mislead the public because it sets up benchmarks that are not part of the real world in which retailers operate.

The government has announced that the introduction of the GST will result in a one-time price increase of 1.25 per cent. Aside from the dubious belief that all of the manufacturers' sales tax savings will be passed along to consumers, the government's price estimate assumes that workers would not respond to any price increases brought about by the introduction of the goods and services tax. This is definitely not the story that was heard coast-to-coast from union representatives. The unions have said repeatedly that their wage demands will reflect the expected price increase from the GST, which is substantially above that presented by the government. Thus, the government seems to want to introduce a tax which would lead to higher wage demands, unemployment and possibly labour strife.

The information that has been made available so far indicates that the government's price estimates are simply not tenable. On balance, it is much more likely that the initial price impact will be higher than the government's 1.25 per cent estimate, and wage demands are likely to extend this in subsequent periods and boost the underlying inflation rate.

This does not bode well for monetary policy. The Governor of the Bank of Canada has said that the bank's monetary policy will respond to any increase in inflation. We should be deeply concerned that the Bank of Canada's response to the GST could raise interest rates or halt the recent economic trend and help push this country into a serious recession, and probably a depression.

● (2230)

When the government was first considering the introduction of a new sales tax, economic propects looked very rosy and the economy has generally performed well since then. But unforeseen events have adversely affected the economy. Interest rates are far higher than was expected back in 1987 and the Bank of Canada has remained steadfast in its fight against inflation via a tight monetary policy. The resulting high interest rates have had the effect of slowing down the economy which had started to weaken in early 1990. The rise in oil prices due to the crisis in the Middle East has proven to be just the catalyst to bring on this recession and perhaps depression.

Introducing the GST at this time, when interest rates are still high and the economy is in recession, brings with it a set of adverse economic effects that a more opportune introductory date would avoid. Therefore, we should have voted for Senator Waters' amendment to postpone the GST until next year. The change in tax regimes imposes adjustment costs on the economy reflected in a jump in prices, lower growth and higher unemployment. These costs are temporary in nature and will be imposed on the economy no matter when the GST is introduced. But it appears to be particularly counterproductive to impose those costs on the economy at a time when we might be heading into a recession. Exacerbating an economic downturn is not usually considered good economic policy.

We have also learned that the GST represents a tax-grab rather than tax reform. If left in place, the manufacturers' sales tax could generate $18.5 billion in 1991. The government is proposing to generate approximately the same amount of money in 1991 via the goods and services tax. But in addition to this revenue, it would impose an additional $380 million in administrative costs. This money must come from somewhere and it will come from taxpayers. But it will impose a higher burden of compliance on business, especially small business. These costs must be paid somehow and they are likely to be paid by consumers.

In the first few years the goods and services tax will cause economic dislocation. Sectors, such as services, hit with the sales tax for the first time will suffer, while the overall reduction in consumer purchasing power will slow down the economy and cause unemployment.

Why go through all of this if the tax is to be revenue neutral? The answer that it generates $9 billion in added output is not sufficient, in light of the major economic dislocations involved. Furthermore, it is the elimination of the manufacturers' sales tax which would generate the output gain, not the introduction of the GST.

More than likely, according to many observers, the government is going through this exercise to introduce a tax which could significantly boost future revenues. The international experience in this regard is not reassuring. Value-added tax rates in the rest of the world have not only been introduced at higher levels than in Canada, they have grown substantially. With about one-half of the Canadian GDP already going through one form of government or another it is not comforting to be presented with a new tax that can only be referred to as a "cash cow". In this regard, it is useful to repeat the words of Thomas Jefferson which were quoted by a representative of Saskatchewan Sports Inc. when appearing before the Senate Banking committee, and I quote:

> I place economy among the most important virtues and public debt as the greatest of dangers to be feared. To preserve our independence we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our choice between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude. If we run into such debts we must be taxed in our meat and drink, in our necessities and in our comforts, in our labours and in our amusements.

Many Canadians do not think the goods and services tax is fair. Also, it is not clear that it is efficient. Our tax structure must be competitive with that of our major trading partner, the United States. The United States does not have this kind of a tax and has deliberately rejected it in the past. Moreover, Americans do not face the same high level of taxation that Canadians face. If the GST promises ever higher taxation, our competitiveness will further erode.

Nine out of ten provincial governments oppose the move by the Government of Canada into retail sales taxes. In New Brunswick the provincial Minister of Finance told the Senate Banking committee:

> The goods and services tax represents a massive federal invasion of the sales tax field, which until recently was exclusively a provincial domain. If the federal government decides to use the goods and services tax to reduce its deficit it will do so on the backs of the provinces by raising its initial 7 per cent rate and crowding the provinces out of this very important revenue source. This could result in a reduced ability to deliver provincial services or increased reliance on other taxes, such as higher personal and corporate taxes.

The Minister of Finance of the Province of British Columbia stated:

> The provinces are being put in a vice. We are being squeezed on the revenue side by the GST's intrusion into our tax field and on the expenditure side by the offloading of program costs.

So you see the situation whereby the federal government is usurping a tax field that has always belonged to the provinces and, at the same time, reducing the grants for education, health and other equalization payments to the provinces and putting the provinces in a real squeeze. I understand that the Province of British Columbia is taking the federal government to court to see if the federal government really has the right to intrude into the provincial sales tax field within the provinces.

Senator Steuart: I wonder if Senator Bonnell could answer a question. You have mentioned the problems the provinces will face with cuts to transfer payments for basic services. You mentioned it, others have mentioned it, and witnesses who appeared before the committee as it travelled across the country dwelt very seriously on the blow this will be to the tourist industry, which is already suffering because of the difference in prices between Canada and the United States. You also mentioned the inflationary trend that this will cause, coupled with higher oil prices and cutbacks in services. At the same time, your province has been promised some jobs. In fact, every province will get some jobs out of this tax. There will be tax collectors and tax examiners in every province in Canada. Space has been rented in Regina and Saskatoon, and a tremendous amount of space in Vancouver and Winnipeg. Therefore, every province will have new employees to check on the tax, catch people, or collect the tax and, in fairness, teach people how to implement the tax.

Have you any idea of the number of jobs Prince Edward Island will receive from the location of the—I do not think it is the headquarters—but fairly significant offices—at least they were made to sound significant? Have you any idea how this will counterbalance the number of jobs that will be lost because of inflation, because of the blow to business generally, the cutbacks in small business, and the tourist trade, which is most important of all? Will it balance out so that Prince Edward Island is a net gainer in employment, or will the extra jobs not even offset the number that will be lost because of the detrimental effect that this tax will have?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senator, Prince Edward Island will certainly not be a net gainer. Prince Edward Island will lose 1,200 jobs from the Summerside base alone. The government is now promising that the GST will provide 400 jobs to replace that, but the 1,200 jobs have been taken away so one can see the benefit there. Prince Edward Islanders are fed up with promises. We were promised 1,000 jobs in a Litton plant.

Senator Steuart: What type of plant?

Senator Bonnell: It is an armament plant. They were getting ready for war even then. When the election was over and we did not vote the way we should have voted, according to the government, we lost the Litton plant.

Ever since Confederation we have been promised a causeway. Every election we are promised causeway, but it never seems to come. A week before the election Mr. McInnes came from Halifax and promised that we were going to get a fixed link. A few days after the election Mr. McInnes and Mr. MacMillan from Prince Edward Island said that there would be no fixed link, there had to be an environmental study. In a year's time, there will be another report just in time for the next election. In fact, we have been promised it for so long that we call them the "party of the cause wait-a-while". We even had them build a strip of land, and they came out with a bulldozer and dumped the fill for the causeway and that strip of land is still there going nowhere.

● (2245)

Senator Corbin: That is on the New Brunswick side.

Senator Bonnell: On the New Brunswick side, that is right. And so we get fat with promises but we never seem to get anything. We have to depend on our potatoes and our fish and tourist industry. Where the potatoes are concerned, we have McCains now, and the K.C. Irving people are coming down, but in order to get them down there it is going to cost Prince Edward Islanders about $15 million to put in a treatment plant for them; to make sure the environment is protected, so the taxpayers of Prince Edward Island will be out $15 million.

Senator Lewis: Treatment plant for potatoes?

[Senator Steuart.]

Senator Bonnell: Treatment plants so the offal from the potatoes will not pollute the environment. We must not pollute our streams any more, we must not pollute our air any more, we must not pollute the soil any more, and yet we must have jobs. It seems to me whatever job you get you are going to affect something in the environment, so the whole thing has got to the point that we in Prince Edward Island are just going to sit there and think about our history—think about things and hope that somebody will come to visit us from the rest of Canada and leave us a few dollars.

Senator Corbin: And the sea is eating the island away.

Senator Bonnell: And the sea is eating us away. The island is getting smaller, and the people are getting discouraged, and we have no jobs. We have the highest unemployment next to Newfoundland, the lowest income in Canada next to Newfoundland, and we just cannot live on promises, and that is all we seem to get. But it is a beautiful spot, a wonderful quality of life, beautiful air, pure water. Clean seas, green grass. All the things that are worth having, and beautiful golf courses. Lovely trout fishing, but our economy is dependent on equalization from the federal Government, and they are cutting back on that.

Our educational system is going down because we cannot afford the taxation. And the federal Government is cutting back on our payments. Our health care system is cut back, we cannot afford any of the major medical advances.

We cannot get heart surgeons to come to Prince Edward Island, we have to send patients off to Ontario or Quebec or New Brunswick or Nova Scotia.

We have beautiful weather, and more senior citizens than any other part of Canada. People live longer in Prince Edward Island than anywhere else in the world. If you come there you will live to be an old man.

We had Senator Forestall come over there, he was tempted to stay but he loved his place so well on Parliament Hill that he gave us up to come back here.

Doctors cannot make a living there. They have to come back here to Ottawa to get in the Senate, put a little extra income into their pocket because people live so long and they do so well with that beautiful environment. Somehow or other I got off my course.

Senator Steuart: Well you certainly answered my question, I think.

Senator Bonnell: It is a beautiful place. The Lucy Maud Montgomery home is the place where Anne of Green Gables is. It is the beautiful north shore, one of the greatest national parks in all of Canada.

Senator Buchanan: Great provincial cottage.

Senator Bonnell: Great provincial cottage, which belonged to/shared by the federal government and the provincial government, and all you good Conservative senators on that side of the house should come down for a week, speak to your leader, as there is a cottage there by the beach at Cavendish, which you can have for a week. But every second week the province wants it. So you can only have it every second week. Senator Phillips cannot get it, because he is an Islander. He has a beautiful home there by the sea, so why take a week when he can take a whole year there?

Tuna fishing, the greatest tuna in the world. Biggest tuna in Canada. Governor General Michener, I have told you before, gave us a trophy for the largest tuna caught in Canadian waters. There is a Grey Cup but there is the Michener Cup as well. And the Michener Cup has come to Prince Edward Island, except one year it went to Nova Scotia. One of our tuna was going south for the winter and he got caught in Nova Scotia in the fall and consequently they got the trophy down there for that one year.

Senator Lewis: Don't you have some kind of a trophy called the Bonnell Trophy for golf?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, but if you go to any of the golf courses in Prince Edward Island, if you go to one of the greatest onesdown in Brudsnell, P.E.I. if you ever go there you will find the third hole is called Lake Bonnell, called after that great Bonnell who was a promoter of tourism at that time. And the people of the province gave him a hard time, they said there were ecological biomes getting loose in that agricultural soil, and instead of promoting agriculture they were promoting tourism.

Also if you go to the west end of the Island you will find a place called Mill River, you will also find up there Bonnell's high-chair. Senator Phillips plays there almost every Sunday in the summertime, another beautiful spot. Many of you senators should come down and see some of those beautiful tourist attractions, you would never forget your colleague and friend from the Senate, Bonnell, because his name will be there.

I used to tell the Premier years ago, I used to have him cut the ribbon while I was laying the cornerstones.

Senator Comeau: Also Meech Lake.

Senator Bonnell: Well, we could have had Meech Lake if you had come down to Charlottetown, and met in the Federation Chamber where the Fathers met in 1867. They promised to come there with the Premiers.

Senator Buchanan: We were going to come down.

Senator Bonnell: I know. Mr. Prime Minister would not come, but consequently he lost Meech Lake. But he could have saved Meech Lake right there in Charlottetown where the Fathers met, because the table is still there.

You know, this is a great nation, this nation of Canada, one of the greatest nations in the world. And there is no monument to any colonels or brigadiers, all there is to show the birthplace of this nation is a table where they just sat down in Charlottetown and built this great big land, so that table is still there. The same chairs are still there where the Fathers sat and you people from other parts of Canada, Saskatchewan, Newfoundland or Northwest Territories or even Quebec should come down and visit those historical things, and have yourself a good summer on our Island beaches.

Senator Buchanan: We had a pretty good Premiers' Conference in that neighbourhood.

Senator Bonnell: Sure, a Premiers' Conference, but you probably would never have had the privilege of sitting around that table if it had not have been for the fact that you were a premier. But I would like to have all the Senators come in, have them sit there, let them have their picture taken, take it home to their grandchildren and say, "look, that is where the Fathers of Confederation sat—there is Sir John A. MacDonald's seat." Just think of the history you could make, and there is no tax for sitting in those seats. The chairs would be taxed if you bought a new one, I can tell you that.

Senator Corbin: On a number of occasions this evening, you have extended an invitation to honourable senators to visit the Island and to spend some vacation time on the Island. I should inform you that I have vacationed on the Island on a number of occasions with my family in recent years, and I have enjoyed the Island tremendously. I only regret that it does not have 12 months of summer, because I would like to spend more time there throughout the year.

But I will tell you what happened: One year we rented a cottage, and at the end of our stay we paid by cheque. We enjoyed it so much that the next year we rented the same cottage from the same people, and when we arrived they said that they had forgotten to charge us the provincial tax the previous year, and I said, "Well, OK, we will consider it." She was not suggesting I reimburse her for the provincial tax she had to pay, but what she forgot to charge me for.

Now if I go down there this summer maybe she will find she forgot again to charge me the provincial tax, and on top of that, I suppose there would be a federal sales tax.

Senator Bonnell: No, this bill will not pass, I do not think.

Senator Corbin: It won't?

Senator Bonnell: I hope not. You are going to vote against it, are you not?

Senator Corbin: I will, but if by chance or by force the bill does go through?

Senator Bonnell: I think after my speech tonight the senators opposite will realize the folly of their ways.

Senator Corbin: If the bill does go through, here is the question, Senator Bonnell. If the bill goes through and you rent a cottage on the Island and the owners of the cottage under provincial law have to charge you provincial sales tax, now they will also have to charge the GST. Now if they forget to get you to pay, or to charge you with the GST, they will have to pay out of their own pockets, won't they? You pay the rent for the cottage, you pay the provincial tax, but they forgot the GST—which is a big nuisance as far as they are concerned—and you go home, you leave the Island and you take the ferry and you go home. You go back to New Brunswick, you go back to Quebec, Ottawa or whatever.

At one point government auditors will come around and check the record books and say, "Oh, oh, you Mr. or Mrs. so and so, you did not collect the GST on the rent for your cottage. You owe us the GST."

Who will have to pay in that instance? Will it be the owner of the cottage or the customer who rented the cottage that summer. What methods will the federal government use to collect that unpaid GST.

I would like you to think about that and give me the benefit of your comments. You know, the GST being a nuisance tax and nothing else.

Senator Bonnell: Well, senator, the only thing I can tell you is, as I understand this GST, that the Government is hiring thousands of policemen, tax policemen, to go around and check those poor tourist operators, those small businesses, to make sure that they get every single solitary cent that is owed to the federal government. And if, perchance, that poor little lady in Prince Edward Island who gave you the cottage, and she forgot—most Islanders have good memories but that lady did not—if she did not collect the tax, she would have had to pay it out of her own pocket.

The poor little lady, she will probably have to sell some of her vegetables, some of her potatoes, or perhaps even a pumpkin in the back yard in order to collect the few dollars. Maybe even the hen's eggs, she will have to save the eggs and collect them to pay the tax to that police taxman who comes around and checks her books.

Also the provincial government has another taxman going around and she will have to sell something else to pay him. But the only thing I can tell you is, you should remind that poor forgetful lady that you know, because you are here, and you knew that some of your friends put that tax into effect. You should tell her, "I'm sorry, I had nothing to do with it myself, but some of my colleagues did and I owe you this money, so you won't forget." So you should remember that.

But I am thinking after tonight many of our colleagues will realize the folly of their ways. They will think of that poor little lady in Prince Edward Island with the little cottage, and they will say no to the GST.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacDonald: That is going to be the headquarters for all the spies.

Senator Bonnell: I would not be surprised. Senator MacDonald says that all of those inspectors are spies, and they are all coming to spy on people. I did not realize it was going to be that way, but since he is on the government's side he knows, I guess that is right. Anyway, I will go back and read what Thomas Jefferson said. These words, as I said before, were quoted by the Saskatchewan Sport Inc. You got me off my course, so I think I should read it over. He said:

● (2300)

> I place economy among the most important virtues and public debt as the greatest of dangers to be feared. To preserve our independence we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our choice between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude. If we run into such debt we must be taxed in our meat and drink, in our necessities and in our comforts, in our labours and in our amusements.

[Senator Corbin.]

And I repeat, many Canadians do not think that the GST is fair. Also, it is not clear that it is efficient. Our tax structure must be competitive with that of our major trading partner, the United States. The United States does not have any kind of VAT, and it has deliberately rejected it in the past. Moreover, Americans probably do not face the same high level of taxation that Canadians face. If the GST promises even higher taxation, our competitiveness will further erode.

I have said that nine of the provinces oppose the tax, and I told you that a minister from B.C. had stated that the provinces would be put in a vice, that they were being squeezed on the revenue side with the GST intrusion and on the expenditure side by the offloading of program costs. That is about where I was when I was so rudely interrupted.

Senator Steuart: Now we will get some new stuff.

Senator Bonnell: The introduction of a federal sales tax extending to the retail level, although within the constitutional authority of the federal government, represents an unwanted intrusion into what has traditionally been a tax field occupied by the provinces. This is likely to have long-term implications for the ability of the provinces to raise revenue by this means.

This is a lovely way to spend and evening, among friends.

We have learned that increased reliance on sales tax is not the best alternative. This tax represents a fundamental change in direction for taxation in this country. Aside from the issue of whether the GST is revenue-neutral or budget-neutral at the outset, in virtually every other country, the introduction of a VAT-style tax has resulted in a greater reliance on sales tax as a revenue source.

Some examples of VAT-rate increases in other countries after the introduction include Austria, where the tax started out at 8 per cent and went up to 20 per cent; Denmark, where it started at 10 per cent and has gone up to 22 per cent; France, where it started at 13.6 per cent and is now up to 18.6 per cent; Germany, where it started at 10 per cent and is now at 14 per cent. In Italy it started at 12 per cent and it is now at 18 per cent. the Netherlands started with the a VAT of 12 per cent, and it is now at 20 per cent. In Sweden, they started with 11 per cent, and it is now 23.44 per cent.

Senator Perrault: May I ask the honourable senator a question? Does he have a list of nations where the VAT, the GST or whatever it is, referred to in these other jurisdictions, has been noticeably reduced?

Senator Bonnell: I could not find in my research any country where the tax has been reduced. Canada is the only nation that I could find that will have a double taxation with the GST and provincial sales taxes. Here the provinces will have their sales tax, and the federal government will have a sales tax superimposed on their tax.

Senator Perrault: How many countries have two levels of government levying a tax of this kind at the retail level? Is Canada the only country in the world in this situation?

Senator Bonnell: I do not know. There are so many countries that I did not check. However, in my research I could not find another country with a double-tax system similar to what we will have in Canada.

Senator Perrault: That is absolutely shocking.

Senator Bonnell: For example, Germany does not have a provincial sales tax and a federal sales tax on top of it, if you understand what I am saying.

Senator Perrault: I do perfectly. We seem to be the only country in the world to have that kind of tax.

Senator Bonnell: It is the only one that I could find. There may be a similar situation elsewhere, but most countries in South America do not have it, and those in Africa do not have it. I do not know where you could find a federated state in which both the federation and the provinces have such a tax.

Senator Phillips: Anyway it was not in the speech that they gave you.

Senator Bonnell: No, it wasn't in the speech.

Senator Perrault: And all the provinces oppose this tax.

Senator Bonnell: I understand that one province intends to go along with it and that the other nine are opposed. Three provinces are going to court to show that the government does not have the jurisdiction.

Senator Comeau: P.E.I. is the next to join.

Senator Bonnell: Is that correct?

We have learned that increased reliance on the sales tax is not the best alternative. This tax represents a fundamental change in direction for taxation in this country. Aside from the issue of whether the GST is revenue-neutral or budget-neutral at the outset, in virtually every other country introducing a VAT it has resulted in greater reliance on sales tax as a revenue source. I have told you how these other countries have increased. There is no reason to believe that the experience in Canada will unfold any differently.

Indeed, it is probably fair to say that the main reason the federal government is so eager to replace the MST with this new tax is because the government has raised the manufacturers' sales tax as high as it can. When they came to power it was at 9 per cent and gradually, through four different raises, they got to 13.5 per cent. They feel that they cannot raise it any higher because manufacturers and big business in this country will not allow it. Consequently they are going to transfer the burden to the consumer, the poor, the disabled, single parents, welfare recipients, children, and old age pensioners.

Senator Corbin: And the dead!

Senator Bonnell: And even the dead, as well as veterans and people who buy books and provide sports training for their children. Anyway, it is coming off the MST and it is certainly going on the consumer and the poor people of Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and all of Canada. They will be paying a greater percentage of their income on this tax than those who are rich.

Witness after witness told the Senate Banking Committee that on equity grounds increased reliance on sales tax was the wrong direction for Canada's tax policy to take at this time. Anti-poverty organizations, senior citizens' groups, unions and concerned individuals all recommended that the government abandon the GST proposal and address its budget requirements to other tax and expenditure measures. The United Seniors Group of Ontario made the following point with respect to the consumption tax:

> The GST does not make sense in a progressive country. A dollar means something different to a person who has only $2 than it does to a person who has $1,000. For the most part seniors do not have that many dollars. It is unfair to hit them with a consumption tax that further restricts their buying power. Why should the extra dollars of the wealthy, those they use for investment and those they inherit from wealthy relatives, be protected from taxation while the entire population is being asked to give up 7 per cent of their spending dollars? It is backward.

Fundamental questions about the GST remain. For instance, does the government really need to levy its own sales tax? Could the federal government vacate the sales tax field and raise income taxes instead? If some form of national consumption tax is desired, must it take the form of a European-style, credit-invoice, value-added tax with the associated paperwork burden that requires tracking every transaction in the economy The government has completely bypassed any public debate on these questions in its haste to introduce the GST.

The other fundamental question which has not been answered is whether the federal government can reduce its spending sufficiently to obviate the need for a new tax. According to Mississauga Citizens Against the Tax:

> The alternative to the GST, which we have a responsibility to lay out, is to reduce wasteful and unnecessary government expenditures. Canadians are not at all convinced that the government has made any serious effort to reduce its expenditures . . . .
> We need a serious review of all government departments and agencies to see if they are fulfilling their mandate and whether their mandate is even necessary in this day and age.

We have learned that the tax is flawed.

Senator Perrault: That is an understatement.

Senator Bonnell: It certainly is. This piece of legislation is fraught with inequities and technical problems. I will list only a small sample of some of these problems. It is clear that the parents of the tax and the drafters of the bill failed to address these problems adequately. We talk about basic groceries. The government predicted the problems that the bill would cause in its treatment of basic groceries when it said in its August, 1989 technical paper, "No matter how lines are drawn, the great variety of food products makes it virtually impossible to remove every anomaly." There is no doubt that anomalies are left in the bill. Numerous examples exist of food and beverage products that face different GST treatment, even though they are competing products. Soft drinks are taxed while mineral water and coffee are not. chocolate bars are taxed while chocolate-covered cookies are not. Salted nuts are taxed while unsalted nuts are not. Unflavoured milk is always tax-free, whereas chocolate milk is taxed and so on.

• (2315)

Senator Perrault: Is caviar going to be taxed, senator?

Senator Bonnell: Caviar is not going to be taxed, no. Don't forget that is a rich man's dinner, while the chocolate milk the kids drink will be taxed.

Senator Petten: Chocolate milk is going to be taxed?

Senator Bonnell: Chocolate milk, yes. Caviar is a tax-free item for the rich people, but the poor children of the country, those in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, will pay tax on their chocolate milk. Many children cannot drink milk unless there is chocolate or something sweet in it. That is the way it is.

Senator MacDonald: Do you still need a doctor's prescription to buy booze in P.E.I.?

Senator Bonnell: I can tell you about that, too. Many years ago we had the Women's Temperance League. In order to get a bottle of alcohol or beer you had to get a doctor's prescription. If you got half, you got a "due bill". The due bill looked very much like the coal slips you used to get when you weighed the coal that you needed in those days for the furnace. Many people would come in with their coal slip, tell them that it was a due bill and that they would like to get their half pint of rum. But at election time it was always free. You used to be able to get it without a doctor's prescription at election time.

Senator MacDonald: Shocking!

Senator Perrault: Absolutely shocking!

Senator Bonnell: It was shocking. Some of these people from Nova Scotia would try to buy the votes of our poor people, and they would always bring good rum. Many of our Liberal friends turned Tory in order to get a drink of that good rum. Anyway, we changed that. We had what was known as the "Cullen Amendment". Mr. Cullen, who has a milk plant in Prince Edward Island called "Purity Dairy", was a minister of the Crown at that time. He put through an amendment that you would not need a prescription any more, but you would get four quarts of liquor a month. We had a governor, but he vetoed the bill. His name was Lepage. He refused to give that bill Royal Assent. We had temperance for some time after that, then the government of the day changed the governor. The next governor, Mr. Bernard, put it through. From then on you did not need a prescription to get your liquor in Prince Edward Island.

Senator MacDonald: When was that?

Senator Bonnell: That was in approximately 1947, after the war.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Lewis: Were you a medical practitioner then?

Senator Bonnell: I was a student in Halifax, Nova Scotia, not too far from my friend Senator MacDonald, trying to get an education at that great university of the Maritimes called Dalhousie—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: —which has excellent students. We even beat Saint F.X. in most things in those days. Saint F.X. has had some distinguished citizens pass through its doors, and if you go to that university, you are sure to get a job in this country.

Senator Perrault: Another good university!

Senator Ottenheimer: I would like to point out to the honourable senator that the governor who refused the Royal Assent was the uncle of the senator who is now in the chair.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

An Hon. Senator: Shocking!

Senator Bonnell: I did not know that. Thank you for informing me of that. If that is the case, it is nice to know that he has Prince Edward Island roots, and I hope I have persuaded him to vote against the GST. We had another Speaker there who was going to vote for it all along because he was the government appointee, but I know that this man who has relatives in Prince Edward Island will realize, after listening to me tonight, that this is a bad tax and should not pass at this time.

Senator Perrault: At a bad time!

Senator Bonnell: Back to the GST.

Senator Steuart: We were doing much better without it!

Senator Bonnell: Senator MacDonald wanted to know about the prescriptions from the doctors before the war, and I did not want him to leave here uninformed about the history of that great day in Prince Edward Island, which was the last province in Canada to have the temperance. We are temporate in all things in Prince Edward Island—liquor, politics, religion, what we eat, what we say and everything else. That is why my speech tonight is not dynamic or drastic. Rather, I am trying to get under the skin of members opposite so you will realize the dangers of this tax.

Senator Perrault: It is a very thoughtful speech.

Senator Bonnell: I notice that my good friend and colleague, Senator Phillips, never left his chair tonight. He listened to every word that eastern Prince Edward Island tells the west. He knows that good messages come to the west from the east.

Senator Petten: And you meet in the middle.

Senator Phillips: I prefer a western wind.

Senator Bonnell: You have the great west winds up there. Anyway, the goods and services tax was supposed to eliminate relative price distortions. Yet in the area of food products, it introduces a new set of distortions.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: The tax therefore fails to meet the requirements that the government has set out for it.

Senator Phillips: You read that page five minutes ago.

Senator Bonnell: I did not think you were listening.

Senator Perrault: It takes a great deal of repetition to make our facts understood.

Senator Bonnell: Mainly, economic decisions should be based on the relative merits of competing products, not on the basis of differential tax treatment of these products.

The tax, as written, is also inconsistent with the government's inherent principles regarding the definiton of grocery. The government has decided not to tax basic, essential and unprepared foods purchased for consumption at home. Thus, as a general rule, family-sized quantities are not taxed. In some situations producers provide pre-packaged amounts of family-sized quantities, whereas, in other situations, consumers pick and choose for themselves the combinations and quantities desired. The former are tax-free while the latter are taxed, yet, in principle, both should receive the same treatment.

Finally, the definition of "basic grocery" attempts to distinguish between good and bad food, necessary and unnecessary food. It is for this reason that snack foods are taxed, whereas goods used to prepare a hearty meal are not taxed. It is also for this reason that foods purchased for preparation at home are now tax-free, whereas foods purchased in restaurants or take-out establishments are taxed.

But where does this leave luxury foods, which are not necessary and might be construed as a rich man's frivolities? Well it might be difficult and again anomalous to treat caviar and smoked salmon different from other grocery products. It indicates how full of holes the government's definition of a basic grocery really is. After all, the decision to zero-rate these products was based on a desire to ameliorate the effect of the GST on lower income families. But these families are more likely to buy a hamburger at McDonald's and pay the goods and services tax than they are to buy some caviar and pay no tax.

I have a lot to get through yet, senators, but I am starting to get hoarse. I do not know whether I should stretch my vocal cords or rest.

Senator Phillips: Go an another hour!

Senator Cochrane: At least!

Senator Bonnell: You must be enjoying it.

The GST and the non-profit sector. Bill C-62 adversely affects the non-profit sector in many ways. Some examples stand out. It has been learned that a non-profit woodworking business in Prince Edward Island employing handicapped individuals would be subject to the GST on its sales. The committee also heard from the Royal Canadian Legion about the taxation of Remembrance Day wreaths. Both of these are instances of socially desirable activities which could be harmed by the GST.

The amateur sports community has a number of serious concerns with the GST. First, many amateur sports associations would not qualify for the 50 per cent rebate of GST on inputs, either because they are not national organizations or because they do not receive at least 40 per cent of their funding from government. We believe that it is totally unfair to penalize some sport organizations purely because their mandate is not national in scope. Further, it is inconsistent of the government to simultaneously urge non-profit organizations to reduce their reliance on government spending, only to penalize these bodies by disqualifying them for the 50 per cent GST rebate because their private funding levels are too high.

Another question about this tax is its application with respect to fees paid on sports programs directed toward children over the age of 14. What is the rationale here? Are programs aimed at youth in the crucial 15- to 18-year old bracket less important than those designated for youngsters? After all, these are some of the most difficult years for teenagers; and the ability to participate in organized activities can be crucial to becoming responsible adults, yet the bill discriminates against this age group.

But what is truly oppressive about the GST in this sector is the way in which it will impose an onerous administrative burden on these organizations. While all taxpaying firms and organizations will face an increased administrative burden as a result of the GST, charities and non-charities and non-profit organizations are especially vulnerable. Many produce both tax exempt and taxable goods for sale and would need to differentiate their costs and sales between the two types of activities in order to claim the 50 per cent rebate and input tax creditors as well as collecting and remitting taxes. This would represent a formidable task for business, but for those charities and non-profit organizations that must rely on volunteers, it is oppressive.

Public sector bodies have been classified into a group known as the MUSH sector—that is, the municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals. This group has a number of problems with the GST. First, the tax rebate percentages offered are based on the average amount of sales tax currently paid by each of these sectors. At best, this provides only rough estimates since some organizations pay more sales tax than the average, while others pay less. Furthermore, on a cashflow basis, the new system imposes a heavy cost on the MUSH sector. Organizations must finance the extra GST liability between the time it is paid and the time they receive their rebate.

• (2330)

The Canadian Hospital Association calculated the effect on cash flow could amount to $95 million per year for that sector. Organizations in the MUSH sector are also extremely concerned about the administrative complexity of this tax. The Federation of Prince Edward Island Municipalities told the committee that small municipalities simply cannot cope with the GST. The committee was informed by representatives from the Canadian Hospital Association that they could not be ready for a January 1991 implementation date because of the time necessary to introduce a new administrative system. Municipalities also suggested that the January 1991 implementation date was too soon.

Municipalities are facing increased labour costs due to the GST. Representatives from the City of Toronto and the City of Edmonton testified that GST protection is a major negotiating item with their unions. Municipalities have questions about the taxability of para-municipal organizations such as non-profit housing corporations.

Moreover, the City of Edmonton operates a number of commercial enterprises, such as telephone and power companies, which would be subject to the tax. These services would be subject to GST although there are really no competing private-sector counterparts. Alderman Ron Hayter of the City of Edmonton told the committee that the government's assertion that the tax bill of municipalities would not rise because of the GST was false. He stated:

> However, in Edmonton's case the commitment of Mr. Wilson will not be honoured. In fact, unless the terms of reference are altered the impact on the City of Edmonton will be significant, adding more than $20 million in additional tax per year to the backs of citizens of our city.

The GST would also have a damaging effect on companies carrying on business with municipalities, because services provided in-house would not be taxable while contracting out would be subject to the GST. This would have the effect of distorting the relative merits of public-sector and private-sector productions, something that the GST is not supposed to do.

Cooperatives. Cooperative businesses play an import role in the commercial activity of the prairies and Atlantic Canada. The GST would penalize these cooperatives in three ways: it would levy a tax on their share capital, since the issue of shares in cooperatives is considered a taxable membership fee; it penalizes those cooperatives that recoup their costs through taxable direct charges to their customers rather than by marking up non-taxable items such as food; and third, because of the layered structure of the co-ops, these businesses would have to account for GST at several levels of their organization. This will place an unnecessary and unfair administrative burden on co-ops, compared with their competitors. This point was made quite convincingly by Federated Cooperatives Limited of Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, whose spokesman told us:

> The government proposes to treat shares issued by Cooperatives in the same manner as shares issued by a golf club or curling club. In other words, such shares would be subject to GST in the same manner as membership fees.
> We strongly disagree with this proposal. First of all, financial services are exempt of GST. "Financial services" are defined as including the issue, allotment, or repayment of a "financial instrument". A "financial instrument" is defined as among other things an "equity security".
> Cooperative shares have consistently been regarded as equity. First, for income tax purposes, cooperative capital is treated like other corporate capital. Second, in accounting practice, cooperative capital is indistinguishable from the capital of other business in the equity section of the balance sheet. Third, a statute of Canada, the Canadian Cooperative Associations Act, defines a co-op share in the manner of a financial instrument. Therefore, from an accounting and income tax perspective and indeed from a legal perspective cooperative shares are an "equity security".

This application of the GST to cooperatives is unacceptable. These organizations provide a valuable service in this country and should be encouraged rather than discriminated against. It is unfortunate that the Senate could not see fit to remedy this problem by accepting one of the amendments proposed here last week.

Health care. Health care provided in health care facilities or by recognized health care practitioners would be exempt from the GST. However, Bill C-62 would discriminate among health care institutions and between practitioners. For example, long-term care facilities operated by the public sector would receive the same 83 per cent rebate that the hospitals will receive while others operated on a non-profit basis would receive the same 50 per cent rebate that is given to charities. Those long-term care facilities operated for profit would not be eligible for any rebate on the tax paid on their purchases.

We now know that a number of important health care practitioners' services would be taxable under the GST. The list includes psychoanalytic psychotherapists for children, massage therapists, dieticians, social workers, veterinarians and Christian Scientists. Exclusion of these practitioners from the list of exempt health care services contradicts the government's assertion that health care will not be taxed by the GST.

As physicians are exempt under the GST, they would have to pay tax on their own purchases but would not be permitted to charge tax on their sales. According to evidence from the Canadian Medical Association, the provinces have indicated that they will not permit doctors to raise fees to compensate for their increase in costs. In effect, physicians are being asked to bear the cost of the GST and to accept lower incomes.

It is important to recognize that the exemption of health care services from the GST does not mean that these services will not bear tax. The purchases made by health care providers are taxable and their costs would rise accordingly, with the exception of health care facilities, which would receive a rebate.

Funeral services. The Funeral Service Association of Canada told the Senate Banking Committee:

> We believe that every Canadian has a right to a burial or a cremation according to the rites and practices of his or her religion and cultural heritage, and that Canadians find it offensive for the Government to tax those services.

Three days before they were due to begin collecting the GST, the Ontario Funeral Service Association indicated that they were still unclear on the rules affecting the taxation of pre-paid funerals. The fact that this organization was unable to obtain a consistent answer from Revenue Canada is indicative of the confusion faced by businesses when the government has not made the necessary preparations.

Education. While witnesses from the educational sector were opposed in principle to the GST, they also made a number of specific criticisms of the tax. A recurring comment was made on the unfairness of taxing some courses simply because they do not count toward a diploma or degree. The Canadian Federation of Students noted that textbooks and other educational materials purchased separately by students would be taxable. The GST would also pose a major administrative problem for educational institutions, which would need to apportion their costs according to taxable and non-taxable courses. We now know from the Canadian Association of University Teachers that the GST might be applied to research grants provided to universities.

All of the available evidence indicates that, contrary to the impression being given by the government, educational studies would be subject to the GST. Tuition fees for most non-credit courses and payments for textbooks and other necessary learning materials purchased by students would be taxable. The Alberta Association for Continuing Education, in particular, strongly disagreed with the government's view that education would not be taxed. They stated:

> We have seen one advertisement that has been running which suggests that the GST will have no impact whatsoever on education. That is a blatantly false statement from our perspective. We would certainly appreciate it if the advertising in support of the GST being purchased by the federal government was more accurate.

Insurance. The impact of the GST on the property and casualty insurance industry demonstrates not only a major flaw in the legislation but also an example of one arm of the government working in opposition to another. The federal government has a regulatory mechanism in place to ensure the solvency of this sector, yet the workings of the GST could actually threaten that solvency.

The property and casualty insurance industry would have significant problems under the GST. The industry would be required to settle claims after January 1, 1991, on which they would have to pay GST but which are funded by lower premiums collected prior to the GST implementation date. Since the industry is an exempt financial service, these extra costs cannot be recovered by claiming input tax credits. The GST would reduce capital and reserves in this industry by $350 million but the inequity can only be appreciated by focusing upon single companies. For instance, the GST would cost the Laurentian Pacific Insurance Company a total of $1.571 million—more than the company earned in 1988 and 1989 combined. This is another clear problem with the legislation as drafted—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: —that could have been rectified had one of our amendments been accepted.

Taxation of reading materials. The taxation of books and reading materials is a step backwards—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: —in promoting literacy and would place an unnecessary burden on students who must purchase their own textbooks.

Senator Perrault: It is just wrong, as is taxing bibles.

Senator Bonnell: First year students at the University of Toronto, for example, must budget $700 for textbooks. A representative of the University of Toronto Press stated that professors would respond to the GST by reducing the number of textbooks on required reading lists. This is further evidence that education would be taxed under the GST. Finally, it is worth noting that taxing reading runs counter to the Carter Commission report, which recommended that newspapers, magazines and books should not be subject to a retail sales tax.

• (2345)

It is particularly ironic that books will be taxed under the GST while the government is attempting to fight illiteracy. According to the "Don't Tax Reading Coalition":

> Where would the fight against illiteracy be without the printed word? Why fight at all if books, those vessels carrying writers' words to thirsty minds, are snatched and cracked? Is not a tax on reading a most regressive kind of tax? For who most needs these books but the poor, the undereducated, the immigrant of language strange, those least able to afford the gift of print needed most.

The GST has been promoted by the government as a means of drawing business participants out of the underground economy. This, according to the government, would result in a tax system which is fairer because tax evasion is reduced. It would also increase total government revenues. The underground economy is supposed to be reduced because of the desire on the part of businesses to claim the input tax credit. In fact, the GST will do little to reduce the size of the underground economy.

It is a matter of simple common sense to realize that taxes do not pull participants out of the underground economy, they push them into it. A tax which has the prospects of increasing rapidly over time will not reduce the underground economy, it will increase it. It is simple-minded to suggest that in order to be eligible for the GST input tax credit a businessman will subject himself to personal income tax, corporate income tax and a host of other taxes associated with registration with Revenue Canada.

A firm operating in the underground economy can be thought of as an exempt firm. Whether the government grants this exemption, for example, small firms, doctors, residential landlords, or a firm takes it upon itself to be exempt, that is, participate in the black market, the advantage or disadvantages of exempt status are the same. A business would rather be exempt when selling to households while a firm would rather be non-exempt when selling to other non-exempt businesses. A taxable business must raise its prices by 7 per cent, despite the fact that it receives input tax credits whereas an exempt business raises prices by less than 7 per cent because the value added of the business is not subject to tax. Moreover, an exempt firm, legitimate or otherwise, bears no compliance costs. While a business selling to other non-exempt businesses is worse off if operating in the black market, a business selling to households loses nothing and is better off financially by operating in the black market.

It is true that black market firms will have no advantage when selling to registered business, but this is not their traditional market. They sell to households and no incentive is provided to encourage them to register. But the policies of the government have actually increased the scope for profitable underground participation. Smaller firms have been offered a quick method of accounting. If they take this choice they need not apply for input tax credits except for major capital purchases. Thus they lose nothing by purchasing services from a participant in the underground economy. Not only can the household receive lower cost services when dealing with a participant in the underground economy, so can a small business.

The government is rejecting the manufacturers' sales tax because it is an invisible tax. On the other hand, the GST is supposed to be a visible tax. The government has had to soften its original claims of visibility. Today, all that can be guaranteed is that retailers must post signs informing their customers of the existence of the GST.

Some retailers, such as Sears, have stated publicly that they will present GST exclusive prices and add the tax at the cash register. Other retailers, such as Woolworth's, have stated that they will include the GST in their posted prices. Customers will now find it difficult to do comparison shopping. They must not only make sure that different retailers are, in fact, selling goods of similiar quality and size, but they must now be sure that retailers are quoting prices on the same basis. Governments like to say, "an informed consumer is a good consumer." The danger is that the lack of consistency in the pricing of retail products could lead to confused consumers.

Visibility is also diminished when the GST exempts certain products from the tax. Exemption does not remove the tax, it only hides it. The effective tax rate can vary from one supplier to another, if there are different degrees of self-supply with respect to services needed to produce their final product.

Thus, tenants will not know how much tax they pay on their monthly rent. Households will not know how much tax they pay on day care services or dental services. A student paying tuition for a degree-granting course, or purchasing a meal plan, will pay some GST but will not know the extent because of the exempt status.

Exempt status under the GST will subject a product to the same visibility problems that now plague the manufacturers' sales tax.

So far the government's strategy in promoting the GST has relied solely on comparing it with the manufacturers' sales tax. However, no matter how damaging the manufacturers' sales tax, this does not lead inevitably to the conclusion that the GST is the best alternative. Only a rigorous comparison to the GST and the other alternatives can determine that. Unfortunately, the government has failed to produce any studies which show conclusively, or otherwise, that GST is the best alternative to the FST.

The government has tried everything in its power to get this bill passed, despite the fact that the majority of Canadians do not want it, and despite the fact that the evidence now clearly shows this to be a bad tax. Despite all that Canadians have learned, some have learned little indeed.

Honourable senators, before I start the next part of my speech which could perhaps take me until tomorrow morning, my voice has left me. With those few remarks, I will leave this to another debate at another time. I wish that all of you will try to understand what I told you tonight and vote against this tax and not burden the taxpayers of Canada with this regressive tax at a bad time. Senator Buchanan and Senator Hatfield were provincial premiers and both know how this will usurp provincial powers.

Senator Perrault: He attacked it and said what a rotten tax it was.

Senator Bonnell: I know it will be difficult for some people to vote against the tax because they have been put here specifically to vote for the tax.

Senator Perrault: Hired guns!

Senator Bonnell: I would like to suggest that they go for a walk the day that the tax is being passed and let it fail.

Since it is now after 12 o'clock and is now December 6, one year ago today 14 university students were massacred in Montreal. I would like to remind honourable senators that this is the day we want to remember those students who lost their lives at the university in the great city of Montreal and hope that gun control will come in soon.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like it noted in the record that it is now midnight in the night from Wednesday to Thursday and I dedicate this part of my speech to the 86 per cent of my fellow Canadians who have been turned off by Prime Minister Mulroney. Since the other 14 per cent are also worthy Canadians, I dedicate this speech to them in the hopes that they too will be turned off by Prime Minister Mulroney.

I am going to outline the plan of my speech, because I see that there is a plan in what the government has been doing. It is a very old plan. In many ways, it is not so much something that Conservatives sit down and work out. It is something that is part of conservative thinking, and some conservative thinking is imprinted in all of us.

When conservatives talk of change, what they mean is let us change what we are now doing and return to mythical better old times. Lucretius quoting Epicurus said that in the good old days we were small, brutish, frightened and living in caverns. But in conservative thinking, there has always been some ideal old times in which those who have made it were no longer contested. But they are contested. Every now and then non-conservatives push humanity a little forward. Now and then conservatives come back with a counter-revolution and try to push things back to where they were. We are in one of those phases. They pick usually a "nouveau riche", a parvenu to lead them and do the dirty work for them in order to go back to the time when people touched their forelocks to them, accepted their lowly condition and accepted that the masters are masters and it should be like that. There are good people who have this idea.

I was listening with some sorrow to the speech of Senator Molson where the spirit was coming forth, is it not a pity that people will not leave things as they are, accept circumstances and not challenge everyone? I do not think that Senator Molson was saying that in the sense of "let me be what I am, let me enjoy what I have." But it is the conservative feeling and it is a very old tendency in human beings to become conservatives as soon as they reach a certain level of possessions and they enjoy them. They do not want any challenge to their very own.

On another occasion in this chamber I spoke of Bertram Russell stating that the whole of philosophy has been debated since the 6th century B.C. when it was first written as to whether collective rights or individual freedoms should prevail. Bertram Russell stated that the history of mankind shows man oscillating between ossification through too much discipline and anarchy through too much individual freedom. I would allow myself to disagree with this very great philosopher by pointing out that the essential conservative wants the ossification of everybody else through too much discipline so that he can exercise unlimited individual freedom and unlimited individual power in his field.

I see this pattern in what the government is doing. This is one of the counter-revolutionary psyches. We have got to go back, privatize and take away from people all those little bits of safety that make life tolerable. We have to have them frightened again, brutish and small, and in the caves. I will develop this theme further and give historical examples starting from earliest times with fairly complete analyses of what must be conservative heaven, the world of the Brahman in India where they have convinced people for millennia that the one fatal sin is to try ao rise above your station and challenge those who have, if you are a have-not. But in the meantime I would like to start on the GST itself.

We have been told that it is necessary to have the GST in order to reduce the deficit. The other evening I explained—you can find it in the record, and if you want the figures from Statistics Canada, the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament will show them to you—that if, in its first five years, the administration of Mr. Mulroney had kept its rates of interest at the same level as those of the United States, and its revenue from tax on the profits of corporations at the same level as those of the United States, the national debt at the end of December 1985 would have been $85 billion less than it actually was. This is simple arithmetic.

Why was it not done? Well, because those who have money like high interest rates. They make money out of it. And, of course, the Conservative Party is dominated by the corporate sector, and the corporate sector always screams that it is being taxed more heavily than in the U.S. when the facts show it is not. The way to find that out is not by looking at nominal rates of taxational corporate profits, but it is to look at what proportion of the gross domestic product corporate profits are before taxes, what proportion of the gross domestic product they are after taxes, subtract the second figure from the first, divide the result by the first and that gives you the percentage of corporate profits that are taxed away.

In the first five years of the Mulroney administration the Canadian corporate profits have been taxed from 4 to 10 per cent less than in the United States. If Canada were a banana republic, in danger of having civil war, if it lacked the resources, if it lacked food, if it lacked water, if it lacked space, if it were threatened by external invasion, I could see that one might assume that investors would be afraid of investing in Canada. But as Finance Minister Wilson said to the Wall Street Journal, "This is a country that has everything that one could dream of. It has resources, it has money, it has food, water, land, space. It does not have a threat of invasion. It is a good place in which to invest, in which to park your money."

Space is important because it means space for bringing in immigrants. So we could have had, as we have had many times in the past, interest rates at the same level as in the United States, and taxes on corporate profits at the same rate as in the United States. We would then not only have had a lesser national debt of $85 billion in December 1985, but thanks to lower interest rates during those five years Canadian businesses would have been able to grow more and reduce unemployment levels so that we would not enter this recession with unemployment above 8 per cent. But, again, you cannot expect a counter-revolutionary Conservative government to think in that way.

The other day at the External Affairs Committee, and thanks to an initiative by my honourable colleague, Senator Ottenheimer, we had lunch with Mr. Georgi Arbatov of the Soviet Union. He is a member of the Supreme Soviet, chairman of one its important committees, and chairman of the Canada-Soviet Friendship Association. He is high up in the Kremlin. Many of us have met him in previous years. It was absolutely fascinating to meet him this time and it gave me great pleasure to see how accurately he was using the word "conservative" to describe the Brezhnev-Stalin type of Communist, the people who have arrived, who have possession of all the goods on this earth and don't want anybody to challenge them, a true conservative spirit. By the way, Milovan Djilas, one of the great idealists of the post-Second World War communist revolution, and a friend of Tito of Yugoslavia, wrote a bitter book called, precisely, The New Class. If one reads it, and reads the development of other classes in other countries in other times, one is struck by the similarity of how it does not matter what ideology it is, once a group of people get their fingers into the pie they become conservative like everybody else. Above all, all they want is to have all the burdens on someone else and to have all the privileges and all the fun themselves. The conservative spirit.

So we have had an attack on the social safety net. We are not here to talk of disentanglement. We are going to allow the health service to be split up among the provinces, and put the health of the people of British Columbia in the tender care of Mr. Vander Zalm, who has said that the regions of British Columbia should have levels of health service commensurate with the resources of that region. This is Mr. Vander Zalm, who objected to any money being spent on feeding poor children in schools, and who said, "If the parents of these children showed more responsibility, the state would not have to help the children." Well, okay, so we have irresponsible parents, and unfortunately they have produced children and they are neglecting them. According to conservative thought, conservative philosophy, what does it matter? The fault is with the parents and, of course, with the children, because what we are facing here is something that has always been believed by Conservatives, that they have it by the will of God. Dieu et mon droit. They were put in the position in which they were because they have some special worth and value in the eye of the Almighty, and therefore they deserve to be rich, to be comfortable, to be cossetted, to be unchallenged, and the poor in all their generations are poor because they have not the grace of God and therefore deserve whatever happens to them, and their misery must be visited unto their children.

So we are going to disentangle the health service. Canadians across this land are not going to have the same level of service as they move from province to province. That will be one less thing that unites us.

There was a dream, a Liberal dream introduced through the equalization payments, to guarantee all members of this great nation an equal minimum level of services so that they could move from province to province—otherwise, what does it mean to have one country if you can't move?—and be able to have a certain minimum of services wherever they are as a right because they are Canadians. This has been attacked. Health services, according to the polls, is the one thing that Canadians most like and they will smite this government, or try to, before those services are destroyed. I see the destruction of the country going on at such a pace that I wonder if in the next two years the Tories will not be able to dismantle everything.

They are dismantling the CBC. I was looking at television earlier and a person was saying, "What is going to give us our Canadian news, our Canadian identity now." They no longer have a station in Windsor. In Saskatoon they will have American news, mainly, or the network news. The local people of Canada will be unrepresented in the Canadian network. Why? Well, because they don't matter as much as dollars. They don't matter as much as their availability of Challenger planes for ministers, as chiefs of staff with salaries double what we get here in the Senate. Maybe they don't talk back as much as we do; maybe they should, to earn their keep.

They have dismantled VIA Rail. They have privatized Air Canada, and now that they have privatized it we are being told by Air Canada that it might not be able to survive the competition of the open skies with the United States. The United States airlines are not going to be interested in servicing small Canadian communities, because there are not enough passengers, or they will stretch safety, but that doesn't matter, the almighty dollar matters, the bank balance, in Switzerland preferably, matters.

The GST shifts the burden of the tax, that is undoubted, from the manufacturers to the consumers. It shifts the burden of the tax from the very rich to the less rich. This is the pattern of the whole tax reform carried out by this government.

There used to be only a hundred people with incomes of over $250 thousand who paid no tax at all. In the latest figures released by the Minister of Revenue, there are now 250 such people, and the tax on the very rich has gone down as a proportion of their earnings. The tax on the others has gone up. These are the Tories. And, it is part and parcel of the pattern of the GST.

I said there were ways of saving money by pursuing a different interest rate policy, and by having the same taxation on corporate profits as in the United States. That is not the only alternative, as I will say later. No, they went and picked the GST and of the various forms of consumer taxes they could have picked, they picked one that has been tried and found to be not very good in Europe. It has been studied and we know that it does not work, this type of tax. We know that it is too complicated, as you will see shortly. The administration of this tax is going to be 40 times more costly for a small business than it will be for a big business. Again, it is part of the pattern to help your large corporate friends. They can take you on trips. They can guarantee your rich directorships when you are thrown out by the people. By then you have delivered the country to them and therefore they will reward you.

● (0015)

I would like to read a few extracts from a publication called VAT and Small Business, European Experience and Implications for North America. It is written by Graham Bannock and it was published by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and by the National Federation of Independent Business Research and Education Foundation. They have studied this tax and its applications in Europe. They say, in giving a summary of their conclusions:

> Although the introduction of VAT need not, in itself, result in higher taxes, those OECD countries with it have much higher tax ratios than those without it. Once the elaborate infrastructure has been laid down, few governments have been able to resist the temptation to increase the rate of VAT.
> In theory, VAT introduces a minimum of distortion into the pattern of consumer spending and the structure of production, and does not spill over into costs. In practice, it is far from economically neutral in most countries.

> Where levied at a uniform rate, VAT inevitably bears more heavily upon the poor than upon the more affluent. This regressivity can be offset by the use of multiple rates and exemptions but only at the cost of increasing the compliance burden and economic distortions.
> VAT is a complicated tax but its advantages over a sales tax really boil down to a certain administrative neatness for government and a plausible, but as yet undemonstrated, claim to a higher degree of security against evasion and fraud.

I shall come back with another publication describing fraud. I will give you two examples immediately, because I know you are dying to hear them, of the sort of fraud that occurs. These are Canadian examples and were told to me by two people involved in them, both being lawyers. One of them was the lawyer for a car dealership that owed him $20,000. The lawyer and the car dealer agreed that instead of the lawyer receiving $20,000, he would be given a $20,000 car—that was the value to the dealer—for $4,000, on the grounds that it was wrecked. The dealer would declare that the car fell off a ramp and was wrecked and he would write it off. So the lawyer received $16,000 on which he paid no tax, and the dealer had a $16,000 write-off.

The other lawyer was just setting up and, in view of the GST, he agreed with a client to have the client provide office space for him and he would provide legal services for the client. It was a straight barter arrangement, no GST. There will be millions of these situations. The underground economy in Italy has been stimulated by the GST until somewhere around 35 per cent of the economy is now underground. France is not far behind, despite draconian penalties for those who get caught. This publication goes on:

> The price for these advantages, which would probably only be relevant if it were intended to levy the tax at rates approaching the average 20 per cent level in Europe, is the imposition of a new and heavy compliance burden upon business and particularly upon small business, as well as a significant increase in the size and cost of the tax administration machinery of government.
> A great deal of mythology has grown up around VAT. It is not evasion-proof, nor is its impact free from economic distortions. The distortions arise not in theory but in the translation of the concept into practical reality. Most governments either exempt some goods and services from the tax or use multiple rates to soften the impact of VAT on low income groups. The tax is also very difficult to apply at all in some sectors, such as banking, for technical reasons. Other modifications are invariably necessary to lessen the compliance burden on very small firms and firms in certain sectors such as retailing, or to reduce evasion. When all this has been done, VAT has no clear cut advantage over a well-designed sales tax except (possibly) in terms of enforcement at high rates of tax, as already mentioned.

Another reason, we are told, that the GST should be brought in is because of its superiority to the sales tax. Most of the works on a sales tax compared to a GST in the European experience show that there isn't such an advantage. So if there isn't such advantage, what is the advantage? The advantage is that it shifts the tax burden from the rich to the poor. It shifts the administrative burden from the rich to the poor. At least the administrative burden for the rich is lightened and for the poor it is made heavier, but then the Conservatives do not care about the poor and the small.

> For some large businesses in Europe, the interest earned on [GST] revenues before they need to be paid over to the authorities far outweighs the cost of collecting and administering the tax.

This is a back-door payment to big business by this government. The article continues:

> In other words, they actually profit from [GST]. For UK small firms, net compliance costs (the value of time spent on VAT administration after allowing for cash flow benefits, if any . . . .are quite significant in terms of the competitiveness of the business and its profitability . . . .
>
> One of the most striking features of the international economic scene during the past two hundred years or so, in addition to the spectacular growth in wealth and international trade, has been the increase in the role of government in economic affairs. The share of the Gross Domestic Product accruing to employees of central and local government: (but not including state industries) in Britain more than quadrupled from 3.0 per cent in 1907 to 12.9 per cent in 1973. Because of the growth of transfer payments (employment benefit and social security payments), the overall share of Government in national expenditure is much larger. In Britain, it increased from 12 per cent of the Gross National Product in 1790 to 53 per cent in 1982. If we take Britain as an example, government expenditure has risen everywhere and now accounts for between one quarter to one half of the GDP in all the advanced countries.

This, of course, is what the Conservatives object to.

> The upward pressure on government expenditure has not been matched by as strong a pressure to keep taxes down. As a result, tax revenues as a percentage of national incomes have increased roughly in line with government expenditures . . . . What has happened is that as countries have grown richer, governments have taken a larger share of the total. This relationship is not, however, a very close one; most of the richer European countries have a higher tax ratio (averaging 40 per cent) than might be predicted from the general relationship between income and the tax-take, while North America, Japan and a few other countries . . . .have lower tax ratios . . . .

The reason for this high tax ratio is what Canadians like and what they have wanted to have, which is a safety net, and especially medicare, which is the jewel in the crown of our social safety net and which will now be attacked through this device of disentanglement.

> [GST] is a tax on final consumption which is collected at every stage of production and distribution rather than at the retail stage alone as with the sales taxes that are familiar in North America. [GST] is levied on the difference between the sales of each firm and its purchases, that is, on the value it adds to these purchases. Traders who are registered for the GST are entitled to credit the tax they pay on their inputs against the tax they collect on their outputs and remit only the difference to the tax authorities. (If the input tax is greater than the output tax, they receive a refund).
> Since traders do not bear the tax on their inputs and charge the output tax on their sales to their customers, the formal incidence of the tax largely falls on the consumer. The effective incidence may be shared, however, by other stages in the chain of production and distribution. For example, the imposition of VAT, may stimulate shifts in the pattern of consumption away from taxed goods and towards untaxed goods. Producers and retailers may attempt to arrest these shifts by reducing margins which may force some out of business. The incidence of taxation is a complex subject, and whilst most economists would agree that VAT is fully shifted forward to the consumer in the long term, it is possible that business bears some of it in the short term.

Let me give an example that I heard about earlier today. it involves a physiotherapist in Montreal. She has an establishment and several employees. She is closing down because she says the 15 per cent tax will so reduce the number of customers she will have that it will not be worthwhile for her to have that business. She will operate in customers' homes strictly for cash. So, in effect, we are pushing a citizen into illegality and tax evasion through tax.

● (0030)

> This is especially likely to be the case when the tax is not applied uniformly on all consumer spending. In a recent Forum of Private Business survey, 93 per cent of small businesses claimed to pass on the whole of [GST] to their customers.

We are speaking of Britain.

> Although [GST] is described as a multi-stage tax, these considerations indicate that it is only really the collection which is multi-stage. As we shall see, a main purpose of the additional complexity of the multi-stage collection over a single stage retail sales tax is to make evasion of the tax more difficult, although there are other advantages. To understand fully how [GST] works and its appeal to economists and governments, it is necessary first to understand the relationship between value-added and national output and expenditure . . . .
> Tax liability in the [GST] adopted in Europe and under consideration in North American, however, is assessed by a third alternative: the invoice method. What this means is that each firm invoices its customer for the value of its sale to that customer plus VAT (output tax) and receives an immediate credit against the amount of VAT it is due to pay to the government for the VAT paid on its own purchases (input tax). At the end of the accounting period. (which may be monthly, quarterly or even annually . . . .) it pays the difference between the output tax and the input tax, if positive, or applies for a refund if its output tax is less than its input tax.

That is, the tax that it has paid to its supplier.

> Since value added is defined as the difference between purchase and sales, then the same rate of value added tax applied to purchases and sales will, if credits are given for the tax on purchases, yield the same net tax as if the same rate were applied to value added.
> In fact, the VAT system in practice does not tax the true value actually added in any period at a particular rate, not only because depreciation is not allowed for but only because the tax has to be paid even if the producers are taking a heavy loss and not adding value at all. Moreover, since, in practice, input tax is not reclaimable on all inputs, value added is not accurately calculated by the invoice method.

So we have the proposition of a defective tax. The more we go on looking at it, the more we will see the tax with which we end up as having one and only one advantage, which is the advantages it gives to the very rich.

> It should be pointed out that the remittances of tax to the tax authorities . . . will only all be made in any single tax accounting period if all the transactions take place within that period. In practice, the retailer will purchase the canned fruit from the manufacturer sometime before he sells it to the consumer and he will pay for the goods some time after he receives them. The manufacturer will be liable to remit the VAT on his sale to the tax office when it becomes due, whether the retailer has paid him or not, but he will also be able to deduct his input tax from his output tax whether he has paid his supplier, the primary producer, or not. As we shall show later, these features of [GST] mean that the collection and remittance of the tax benefits the cash flow of some registered traders and has a negative impact for others. The precise cash flow impact of VAT on any individual trader will depend upon the frequency with which he has to make returns to the tax authorities, their timing in relation to the collection period to which they relate, and the length of the credit periods he gives to his customers and receives from his suppliers. The cash flow impact will also crucially depend upon the rate of tax charged on inputs which, for reasons to be explained later, in practice will necessarily be the same as the rate on outputs . . . .
> Disadvantages of VAT
> It is, of course, widely recognised that, like all taxes, [GST] does present problems to both the taxpayer and the tax authorities. The most common objection to the > introduction of a [GST] is that a broadly based tax on consumers' expenditure will bear disproportionately heavily on those with lower incomes. That is to say, it is regressive with respect to income.

>
> Since people with high incomes on average spend a smaller proportion of their income (they save more either before or after income tax) then a given rate of [GST] on total consumer spending will tax a higher proportion of income of the poor than of the rich.
>
> It is because of concern about regressivity that most VAT systems charge lower or zero rates of tax on expenditure on basic necessities such as food and housing.

As you can see, we tax housing here.

> Some countries have more than two [GST] rates; Three European countries have four. Of 32 countries with [GST], only nine had a single rate system in 1984, but none of these actually levied their single rate on all consumer expenditure.
>
> The items which are VAT exempt because they present intractable problems to the designers of [GST] systems account for a relatively small proportion of consumers expenditure—perhaps around 10 per cent on average in EEC countries. Items of expenditure, lower rated or exempt to offset regressivity, however, typically account for a somewhat greater proportion of consumer expenditure, usually nearer 30 per cent. Together, these special categories, however, are so important that all the theoretical advantages of the [GST] in terms of neutrality towards production and consumption and its clear superiority over single stage wholesale or retail taxes go out of the window.
> It is easy to understand why this should be so for neutrality of consumption since different rates of tax clearly distort consumer choice and the operation of market forces. The effects if differential rates on production, however, are more complicated. A producer who does not charge VAT on his output of exempted goods but is allowed credit for his inputs, for example, is receiving a subsidy from taxpayers while other producers that are not entitled either to charge [GST] or reclaim it are paying a tax which is intended to apply only to final consumers. In a few cases, exempt (as distinct from zero-rated) exporters will be paying a tax in this way upon their exports . . . .

We are not supposed to be paying a tax on our exports, but we will be.

> There is, however, an even more intractable shortcoming of VAT and that is that it imposes heavy compliance costs upon small firms and requires on entirely new and expensive administrative machine in government.
> The acquisition of the necessary knowledge and machinery to impose, record and remit the tax are largely a fixed cost, and it inevitably follows that there are economies of scale in tax compliance as in other spheres of business-government relations. Because the administrative resources of small businesses are limited, the burden tends to fall to a significant extent upon the proprietor whose time is the most precious resource in most small firms. Small businesses are also unable to spread the cost of in-house professional advisors over a wide range of activities and their data processing activities are computerised to a lesser extent. All this means that the compliance costs of taxation and [GST] in particular are highly regressive with respect to size of firm. [GST] is also expensive to collect from small firms so that government administrative costs as well as business compliance costs are relatively higher for small firms.
> . . . other indirect taxes are also regressive by size of firm, but because VAT involves the participation of all businesses, not just retailers as with a sales tax or manufacturers and importers as with a wholesale tax, and because it requires records of inputs as well as outputs, the total social costs and distortions of a VAT system are very much greater at the national level than with, say, a retail sales tax. For the same reason, the costs of administering [GST] for government are also absolutely much greater than for other indirect taxes: More returns have to be processed, refunds have to be made as well as remittances received, and the major system of local offices staffed to audit traders' records and deal with queries as well as to perform the other functions of tax administration is necessary . . . .
> There are also major start-up costs for a VAT system both for government and taxpayer and . . . .troublesome, though containable, transitional micro-economic problems to do with the level of investment and inflation.

I am skipping a few pages because—

Senator Hébert: Oh!

Senator Gigantès: I have lots of other material. Don't worry. This briefcase is full of material, and so is this one. But this book is now getting into figures and graphs.

Senator Forrestall: You will come back to that on Monday?

Senator Gigantès: And Tuesday and Wednesday.

> A number of econometric studies have been carried out . . . .and although we have not reviewed them in detail—

Because I have skipped some of them.

> —the general conclusion seems to be that VAT has been only mildly inflationary, particularly through its subsequent effects upon the wage price spiral in some countries. These studies lend little support to the view that VAT contributed to the upsurge of inflation in the 70's . . . .However, it does make the inflationary effects of a GST in this about twice what the government predicts it will be.

Therefore, when we are told that inflation under 5 per cent necessitates interest rates that kill farmers and small businesses and makes the purchase of homes by young people getting married impossible, imagine the outcry if inflation increases another couple of points, which would help this government's rich friends to make even more money with higher interest rates.

● (0045)

> The government's tax administration or collection costs are only part of the total social cost of operating the tax system—

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, would you allow a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Corbin: You are talking about the cost of the GST. I just happened to read The Yukon News of November 28, 1990, and in there is an ad entitled "GST Workshops" and I should like to read from that ad before I put my specific question to you. It says:

> 3 hours of practical GST information for the approximate cost of 1/2 hour of a chartered accountant's hourly billing rate!!
>
> It is only a matter of time before the Goods and Service Tax becomes an integral part of your business. As a business operator it is important to ensure that you have taken all actions possible to prepare for it. You must ensure you understand how GST works and properly administer it to your benefit.
>
> These workshops will review how GST works and offer you many practical planning tip for implementation of GST in your business. The master agenda for these sector specific workshops is as follows:
>
> Introduction to GST Structure & Process
>
> How GST impacts on businesses
>
> How to set up your accounting records
>
> Forms, deadlines and filing alternatives
>
> General points and practical planning tips
>
> Question and answer exchange
>
> Sector specific issues plus dates & times outlined on the mini-agendas below
> All workshops are being presented at the Gold Rush Inn - Town Hall Room

Then the mini-agendas follow. Under the title of "GST for Retail/Service Business Operators" they have:

> Pricing concerns
>
> Documentation Concerns
>
> Accounting for GST
> Transition Rules
>
> Planning Objectives
> Date: December 12, 1990 Time: 7-10 pm

Another agenda is entitled "GST and Charities/Non-Profit Organizations":

> Definitions
>
> Present rules
>
> Proposed operations rules
>
> Proposed rebate rules
>
> Planning for GST Implementation
> Date: December 18, 1990 Time: 7-10 pm

Another agenda is entitled "GST for Tourism & Transportation Operators". You can imagine, Senator Gigantès, that that would be a big item up in the Yukon. This agenda reads:

> Tourist rebates
>
> Qualification and administration
>
> Assignment to third parties
>
> Allocation to qualifying activities
>
> Transitional Issue
> Deposits/prepayments
> Travel over year-end
> Timing of services rendered
>
> Other Issues
> Date: December 17, 1990 Time: 7-10 pm

The final mini-agenda in this ad, entitled "Last Minute GST Workshop (Subject to Demand)", reads as follows:

> This workshop is for those that have left GST preparation until the last minute. It will offer many useful last minute planning tips to prepare for GST. It will follow the master agenda above followed by a question and answer session from participants.
> Date: December 27, 1990 Time: 1-4 pm

In other words, that will take place between Christmas and New Year's Day.

> These GST Workshops are being presented by MacKay & Partners - Chartered Accountants

Can you guess what the admission fee is?

Senator Gigantès: A thousand dollars?

Senator Corbin: No, no. It is $60 per person, but then there is a 10 per cent discount for multiple registrations, and it says that group rates are available upon request. The ad continues:

> For more information or to pre-register please contact:

Then it gives the names and the phone number 668-4030. Then it says:

> . . . or visit our office at 2090A 2nd Avenue, Whitehorse.

Then it gives the postal code, and in very, very small print, right at the bottom, it says that these events are co-sponsored by the Federal Business Development Bank, MacKay & Partners and the Whitehorse Chamber of Commerce.

My question to you is: Should not a universal tax be so simple that you do not need to have to pay to have it explained to you by chartered accountants? Does not this ad say exactly the opposite, that it is impossible for the common person to make any sense of it unless you have recourse to top professional advice? Such is the nature of the GST. In my view, it will create absolute chaos if it ever goes through, and I would like your reflections and comments on that.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, senator. Of course it will create chaos, but not for large corporations because they will be able to use their computers, and they will be able to afford this firm of MacKay & Partners.

[Translation]

. . . but little ones . . . You see the guide who is looking after tourists in the Yukon and trying to help them catch some fish. Every time the tourist catches a fish, the guide takes his booklet out and "inputs". . .

Senator Corbin: What does the guide "input"? What tax will he levy on the tourist? This is all very complicated.

Senator Gigantès: But, as you will see, I have evidence from thousands of individuals and associations, and I will read it to you later on; they will be fully in agreement with you.

I would like to make another remark. It is that, fortunately, this is only December 7 and we might make some arrangements to enable some of our colleagues to reach an agreement with them, to cross to the opposite side and teach these people for free. Since they are Conservatives, and claim that they understand this, they could perform a charitable act and help the people of Yukon to figure out this damn tax, instead of seeing our colleagues sleeping in their seats!

This is very disconcerting, even gruesome, since . . . I am sure that this also happens to us. If we were asleep, it would be the same thing. When we fall asleep like that in our seats, we look like our future death mask, just like in a museum where you can see Napoleon's death mask or somebody else's.

Mr. Beaulieu, do wake up! It's enough to send me into a depression to see you like this. He does not hear me. Wake him up!

[English]

Could you wake Senator Hatfield? I really feel I am calming him too much. Look at him.

In any event, we were saying that

> The government's tax administration or collection costs are only part of the total social cost of operating the tax system however, and are in fact for [GST], only a small part of those total costs. First of all, Value added taxes, as we have shown, are not neutral. They alter relative prices and by doing so distort the structure of production and consumption in ways which will reduce welfare (in the technical economic sense of the word)—

"Welfare" meaning the maximum amount of satisfaction, goods, services, whatever, that you acquire for a given input. It does not mean the kind of welfare you provide for poor people.

There are also other ways in which value added taxes reduce welfare, for example, by discouraging firms to grow beyond the threshold. VAT may also stimulate tax evasion.

If you have a little firm below a certain level, say, $30,000, it will pay a general 5 per cent and will not have to do the paperwork. However, if you run a small firm, you might decide it is not worth it to grow to, say, $40,000 or $50,000 if you have to do the paperwork, so you lower your sights. You do not hire more people. There may be opportunities for growth, but because the headaches are so great, you will not do it.

As Senator Corbin was pointing out, in most countries, unfortunately, the bureaucracy runs mad. There is a little phrase we put in each bill we pass which enables the minister to make the appropriate regulations for the administration of the tax. That is a licence to kill for the bureaucracy. They generally look upon this as a way to complicate the life of a taxpayer, as a way to establish themselves in their jobs. They have developed a kind of jargon in which they speak to one another and that only they understand. It is quite hermetic; most people do not understand it. I am humiliated each year when I have to go to a tax accountant and have my taxes done, but I do not understand the English or the French of the tax forms.

We may end up with something like a single tax, as Dennis Mills proposes because, whatever its disadvantages or advantages, people are just too exasperated from having to read bureaucratic prose. That is why, when our colleagues across the way read speeches prepared for them by the Department of Finance or whatever other department, they do not sound like themselves at all. One meets them outside and listens to them discoursing eloquently, as I am sure Senator Castonguay is doing now. I do not know if he is flirting with Senator Lavoie-Roux, but I am sure he sounds a hell of a lot more amusing now than he does when he reads a speech written for him by the Department of Finance. That is true for any politician.

It must have been mortifying for Senator Hatfield, when he was premier of New Brunswick, to find suddenly a text of leaden prose dumped on his desk, knowing that he would have to change it, rewrite it, improvise something or throw it away if he wanted to be at all understood. Of course, it is useful if you do not want to be understood, and as this government mires itself increasingly in the dislike of the people, I suspect it will be resorting more often to bureaucratic prose so that it can do things without people understanding what it is doing. I suppose if you have to, you have to.

> Finally, as shown, VAT tends to work against the progressiveness built into the rest of the tax system and may promote inequality. We do not attempt to measure social costs which, though they are very important, are common to a greater or lesser extent to all forms of indirect taxation and are difficult, if not impossible, to quantify.

> What probably is most important, although there have been few attempts to measure them, are the costs incurred by businesses in collecting the tax . . . .

> These compliance costs are large in aggregate and much larger than the government's administration costs and moreover, they introduce further distortions into the structure of production. Compliance costs consist mainly of the value of the time spent on keeping records, making tax returns and other matters solely for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the tax authorities . . . .

In other words, this tax will turn a lot of honest Canadian businessmen—at least I assume they are honest if they do not vote Tory—into unpaid public servants.

• (0100)

On the one hand the Tories are complaining that there are too many public servants and suddenly they are creating many more.

> There may also be other costs, (stationery, telephone calls and possibly capital costs for equipment) . . . .

> . . . the Bath centre arranged for the mailing of 10,000 postal questionaires to a stratified random sample drawn, with the cooperation of the authorities, from the VAT register. In addition to classification data on size and type of registration, questions were asked about the time spent on VAT, numbers of invoices processed, terms of credit, the nature of any benefits gained from complying with VAT regulations, source of advice and visits from VAT officials . . . . Data was made available from Customs and Excise . . .

We call it Revenue Canada.

> . . . to allow the re-weighting of the response by size and sector to ensure that the results were representative of the population of registered traders as a whole.

This is normal procedure for sampling.

Senator Cogger: What are you reading?

Senator Gigantès: The title of the publication is VAT and Small Business: European Experience and Implication for North America. It is an excellent study. I highly recommend it.

Senator Cogger: By whom?

Senator Gigantès: It is by Graham Bannock and published by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and National Federation of Independent Business Research and Educational Foundation. I will spare you all the footnotes. When they are here I don't read them. What would I say, "Superscript, parentheses, close the parentheses, superscript, return to the normal size"? I will spare you all this. It is a very well researched book and I highly recommend it. It shoots down all the rationale for the GST. All the good things it is supposed to do the book says it does not. The same amount of money could be collected with a simpler tax. The conclusion, which we will reach eventually, is that it is advantageous to big business but not to small business.

Senator Cogger: Have you checked whether reading someone else's book qualifies for your Guinness record? I thought you were supposed to deliver a speech.

Senator Gigantès: If you wish a learned speech, I have to cite authorities.

Senator Cogger: I am only asking the question, because if the Guinness Book of Records should ask any one of us to be a witness, I would like to know. I read somewhere that you intended to get into the Guinness Book of Records for making the longest speech.

Senator Corbin: That is a question you ask after 20 hours of speaking, not at this stage. Hold your horses.

Senator Cogger: If you wish to address me, senator, please return to your seat.

I wish to make a small correction. Before Senator Bonnell left the chamber he pointed out that today was the first anniversary of the tragedy at the Institut polytechnique. I wish to point out to honourable senators that in the Debates of the Senate for November 6, Hon. Royce Frith rose on a question of privilege—it seems that he jumped the gun by a month—and stated:

> I would not like this day to pass without some reference on the Senate record to the horrors that took place one year ago at the Institut polytechnique de Montréal.

I wish to pass on that point of correction. I may not be present when Senator Frith returns to the chamber, or I may be dead of boredom by then. I will count on one of you gentlemen to point it out to him. It was obviously a genuine mistake.

Senator Hébert: You have to survive until the vote.

Senator Cogger: We all know that Senator Frith never makes a mistake, so probably it is the record that is wrong. I will ask the Table Officers to make proper amends.

Senator Bosa: What page were you quoting from?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Cogger: Page 3548 of the Debates. I believe that Senator Bonnell is correct, and that today is indeed the anniversary.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, on a point of order I would like to apologize to my colleagues opposite for speaking to Senator Cogger out of my place in the Senate. I promise not to do it again.

Senator Cogger, if you are to die of boredom, do it before January 1, otherwise you will have to pay a tax on your funeral.

Senator Stewart: According to Senator David, the correct thing is to arrange for cremation. The GST will not be very high in that case.

Senator Cogger: I want to know in my heart of hearts, and perhaps Senator Gigantès can answer if he puts himself in my shoes.

Senator Gigantès: I don't think I can fit my feet in your shoes.

Senator Cogger: If I receive a call from the Guinness Book of Records and I am asked if I was present in the Senate, I can say that I was here, if not mentally, because it was difficult, I was there at least physically. If I am asked if I was a witness to this forever speech, I will have to say I don't know if I could call it a speech, that it was more of a reading. When I was at the Séminaire de Québec and the priests were upset with us, they made us sit at our desks and they would read like this forever, but they didn't claim they should get into the Guinness Book of Records. Anyway, I don't want to jeopardize your record, senator.

Senator Gigantès: I am not sure what the purpose of your question is. What do you want from me? What are you asking me?

Senator Cogger: I would like you to recommend what I should answer the Guinness Book of Records, that I was here but that you read? I believe I read in The Gazette that you intended to read a speech. Now, do you call reading material a speech?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Cogger, when your clients ask you for advice, do you charge them?

Senator Cogger: Pardon me?

Senator Gigantès: You are a lawyer. When your clients ask you for advice, do you charge them?

Senator Cogger: Most of the time.

Senator Gigantès: You have just asked for advice and I charge, too. We will discuss the price afterwards, and then when we agree I will tell you the answer to your question.

Senator Cogger: I normally give the advice and then send the bill.

Senator Gigantès: I am not too sure that you would pay me.

Senator Bosa: You quoted Senator Frith from page 3548 of Hansard and the terrible thing that happened at the Institut polytechnique de Montréal one year ago today.

Senator Cogger: Yes.

Senator Bosa: I don't see the pertinence of this intervention.

Senator Cogger: I wanted to correct the record, because Senator Bonnell drew our attention to the first anniversary. I only wanted to point out that in his speediness to get on the record a month ago, evidently by mistake—he is never wrong—Senator Frith stated:

> I would not like this day to pass without some reference on the Senate record to the horrors that took place one year ago at the Institut polytechnique de Montréal.

I have a lot of respect for my colleagues opposite, and I am quite prepared to pay my respects, but make up your mind. That tragedy certainly does not have two anniversaries back to back in two months.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Cogger, I would be most grateful if you would drop this point. This truly is not a point of fun and games. Talk about anything else, criticize me, attack me, anything you like. The memory of that horrible incident is not something you should be bringing out here in order to complain about Senator Frith. This is a day on which we should show respect or silence.

I don't think you can say that I could give you advice standing in your shoes. What size shoes do you wear?

Senator Cogger: Eight and a half B.

Senator Gigantès: My shoes are ten and a half Triple E. What can I do? I am know as "Big Foot". I don't think we can make a deal on the price.

In any event, I was reading for the Senate Debates and the edification of senators opposite. I did not at any time see any of those publications inscribed in "The Guinness Book of Records". This is the record of the Senate, and there are many previous examples of senators having read excerpts from various books in order to instruct their colleagues. I even read excerpts from mine. I have a couple of books here that I could read and perhaps get some free translation. If you care to challenge me on that, I could start that again.

We were talking about compliance costs. Compliance costs are large in aggregate and much larger than the government's administration costs and moreoever introduce further distortions into the structure of production. Compliance costs consist mainly of the value of the time spent on keeping records, making tax returns and other matters.

Senator Hébert: The Conservative Whip is calling his colleagues back to order. They are not supposed to disrupt you. Senator Cogger is not listening to his Whip.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Cogger, if anyone asks you about my speech, you may say that, despite many interruptions, I kept my good temper and continued reading instructive material to my colleagues in the Senate.

I was talking about the study that was done by the Bath Centre in Britain and I described how they worked at making the sample valid. The respondents were asked to value the time spent on compliance with Britain's GST and to record the related paid out costs such as fees paid for professional accountants of the kind that Senator Corbin was mentioning in the advertisement in that great publication the Yukon News. By the way, the government could close it down, too, as it closed down regional stations of the CBC.

Total compliance costs for all registered traders amounted to 9.3 per cent of GST. That is the cost that the traders have to absorb, over 4.5 times the administration costs from the government. So not only is the GST 7 per cent, but there is a compliance cost of 9.3 per cent which no doubt the traders will pass on.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Gigantès, it has been well advertised that you intend to speak for some time. Since I will only be here until 7 a.m., and because some of us are very interested, I was wondering if you would give us an indiction of the alternatives to the value added or consumption tax, whatever you want to call it, that you intend to expound?

• (0115)

Senator Molgat thrilled us by telling us about the Dennis Mills—Pocklington theory about a flat tax, which I am very interested in. Senator Marsden also said you had 11 alternatives to the consumption tax.

[Senator Gigantès.]

I have never heard anybody seriously suggesting an alternative, but you, Senator Gigantès, are capable of suggesting an alternative. I was wondering if you could do that before 7 a.m. or, if not, tell us approximately when in the course of your discourse you might do that so we could then fill the chamber and have questions to put to you.

Senator Gigantès: Next Tuesday, sir.

Senator MacDonald: You won't be speaking next Tuesday.

Senator Gigantès: I will be speaking next Tuesday.

Senator MacDonald: Again?

Senator Gigantès: Continuously, breaking for whatever breaks forced upon me by the wisdom of our fellow senators.

Senator MacDonald: Do we have to wait until Tuesday to hear this?

Senator Gigantès: Well, I have already given a little hint of what I would do to Senator David. Change your corporate profit tax and your interest rates so that they are equal, and interest rates so that they equal those of the United States, and in the last five years you would have reduced the national debt collectively by $85 billion. There are others, and I want you to be here on Tuesday with bated breath.

Now if you are good, if you are really good, I promise I will give you the text even before it is printed in Hansard. Is this too magnanimous?

My fellow senator says I should give you the text even before it appears in Hansard. I have it right here. I promise you, this is it, and when the time comes—Tory Blue—when the time comes you will get it all. I will keep nothing back, I promise you. I will reveal all the titillating details.

Senator MacDonald: I hope the question is not impudent: Are you a member of the Chrétien Task Force set up to determine alternatives, or is this your own idea, or does it have any kind of a sanction?

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me, have I given the impression in this chamber that I take orders from anyone? That I am the kind of person like one of our colleagues who said she disagreed thoroughly, but she would vote the way the Prime Minister wanted her to, not I, sir.

If Mr. Chrétien is in agreement with my ideas, so much the better. If he is not, I will still vote for him. following the example of Madame Chaput-Rolland. What can I say? He has not heard them yet. I mean this is a surprise for all of them.

Senator Hatfield: You cannot vote for him, you do not live in New Brunswick.

Senator Gigantès: Well, I will vote for his party. I might move to New Brunswick to vote for him. If you do not want me,l you are going to interdict New Brunswick to me senator, how cruel. I mean I am having a difficult time with New Brunswick. I am sure Senator Corbin would welcome me there. Senator Simard—I must say I made a facetious remark about a town in New Brunswick and he was absolutely furious. He spoke for several hours attacking me, even though I was apologizing. I apologized, and he objected to my having given the impression that I did not like a particular New Brunswick town. I did, I just pointed out that I suffered food poisoning there, and I will not mention the town.

I may have suffered the food poisoning in an adjacent province, I will not say which, before I got to New Brunswick. Senator MacDonald, are there any further clarifications that you are seeking from me? May I resume?

Senator MacDonald: I think Senator Cochrane has a question.

Senator Cogger: No, you may not address this side of the chamber.

Senator Gigantès: I was talking to my senator.

Senator Cogger: You were speaking to Senator Cochrane.

Senator Gigantès: No, I was not speaking to Senator Cochrane. He was speaking to me.

Senator Cogger: Anyway do not talk to me, you have to be there.

Senator Corbin: I can talk to you from my seat. Not on my feat.

Senator Cogger: Well, that is a new Corbin Rule.

Senator Corbin: Well, that is the thrust of the debate. You can do that from anyplace.

Senator MacDonald: Anyway, let's get back, Senator Gigantès, I admire your courage to be a one man non-team player vis-à-vis your own views.

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me, sir, you just said I am a one man non-team player vis-à-vis my own views. Are you suggesting I am fighting myself somehow? That is what you seem to be saying. I am prepared to do that for your entertainment.

Senator MacDonald: Well, ever since last week when this poll came out, I have been fascinated that while 73 per cent disapproved of the GST, 64 per cent believe that Chrétien will flipflop on the GST. So I would think that any suggestions that you have would be very welcome at this time by Mr. Chrétien and his task force on alternatives, because the poll goes on, and we have to accept the polls in this chamber because we have been referring to them.

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely.

Senator MacDonald: We either believe them or we do not believe them. It is the benchmark from which we all start.

Almost two-thirds, 64 per cent believe the Liberals would leave the unpopular 7 per cent tax unchanged, if they won the election. The same poll, The Toronto Star—CTV News Poll. That is why alternatives to the consumption tax, the GST, become such an important part of this debate, which, of course, we know is a filibuster. But there are some very, very good suggestions that have come forward. I wish they had come forward before our Banking Committee, and that that committee had taken its job seriously, and had suggested, as had been the custom, various changes that might have been accepted in the course of committee hearings. This has been the tradition of the Senate.

So that is why alternatives to the consumption tax will be the major contributions you could make to this chamber, and if you say you are going to do it Tuesday, I will be here Tuesday.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. It is not at all surprising that after six years of Mr. Mulroney, the public does not believe any politician and expects that all politicians flipflop, I mean flipflops like a fish fresh out of water on the deck of a schooner.

Yours is a Prime Minister who said, shaking Mr. Clark's hand, that he was right behind him all the way. He was keeping the other hand behind his back with a stiletto in it, which, as some members opposite who are now looking away, know very well was being sharpened to be placed right between the shoulder blades of Mr. Clark, and was.

He also said during his 1983 leadership race that a free trade agreement with the United States was something he would never, ever, ever accept. It would mean the destruction of Canada. He accepted it.

In 1982 he fully approved of the Constitution as it was passed then and praised it in a very wholesome fashion. Afterwards, to get Separatist votes, and to get the Parti Québeçois help in the election, he started changing the vocabulary and calling it the 1982 betrayal.

Well, of course, the public is skeptical. What Mr. Chrétien said was that he will abolish the GST, that he is putting together a committee to study a reform of the tax system, the tax system as a whole, mainly because the good citizenry finds loopholes, and after a while they start distorting the economy to take advantage of loopholes they perceive in the tax system.

It must then be amended, of necessity. The time has come, especially after several years of Tory rule, that the tax system has to be overhauled, because the number of loopholes for Tory friends are so enormous. If those kind of loopholes were put in the drift nets that the Japanese use, we would not be destroying the fish in the sea because we would not be able to catch any of them.

So, Mr. Chrétien said that he will put together a task force to study the tax system. he has not chosen it yet. I do not know if he will put me on this task force. If he tried to do so I would refuse, and I would refuse because I think my duty is to be here and instruct you, sir, as I will do Tuesday morning, and try to get into Senator Cogger's shoes, in order to answer the numerous and frequent phone calls he receives from the Guinness Book of Records for the same reason.

All these things will keep me far too occupied, also reading my books so as to get free translations fraudently, as some of your colleagues say. I am much too busy a man, and I have my dog to play with too, so no I will not—I am terrible in teamwork, in committee work, as everybody over here will tell you. I am an absolutely insufferable colleague. So you cannot see me in a task force. I am a loner. All my life I was a loner, possibly because most other people would not have anything to do with me. I am resigned to it. I finally ended up in the Senate!

I was told when I was a little child at school, because I was not taking life seriously, I would never amount to anything, and now how right they were. Here I am a senator alongside you.

Now we were saying that compliance costs amounted ti 9.3 per cent. In other words, the businesses in Britain in this study found that it cost them 9.3 per cent of the tax to comply, on average.

Now this includes the low compliance cost to big businesses and the much higher compliance cost to small businesses. What do you think the businesses do with those compliance costs? They certainly do not absorb them. They pass them on. This is one of the secret ways in which prices are increased by this so called visible tax.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Much as been claimed about evasion. I have other texts on it. It is very difficult to remember all these findings by heart, Senator Cogger. After all, we are reaching the age where Alzheimer's is our middle name. I could not possibly remember all my photostats plus all that is in this book on value-added tax, so you will forgive me if I read from them. They are studies carried out on how much a tax operates in other countries.

Senator Cogger: Great speech but no record.

Senator Gigantès: I am not trying to break a record. I am trying to contribute to the legislative process of this country.

Senator Cogger: Senator Gigantès, do you know why we keep interrupting you? It is because we made a decision in caucus, after your grand announcement, that whatever happened we would not try to prolong anything. You walked in here determined to bore everyone to death for the next 20 to 25 hours. I could be up on my feet fighting or teasing you or whatever, and it would not change a thing. If you are surprised or concerned that you are not being taken seriously, then remember that anyone who walks into any room saying, "Gentlemen, I shall now speak for the next 20 hours", cannot be expected to be taken seriously. The exercise does not make for convincing debate or anything of the sort. It is a silly, stupid exercise simply to get into a book of records. So keep on going.

Senator Haidasz: That was not very kind, Senator Cogger.

Senator Hébert: Senator Gigantès, perhaps you could explain to Senator Cogger that filibustering is part of parliamentary system and tradition. Perhaps you could help him to understand.

Senator Gigantès: Sir John A. MacDonald was a great filibusterer. So was John George Diefenbaker. As for being taken seriously, it depends on who it is. The young who know me take me seriously, and they like me. That matters. Small children like me, generally. My dog takes me seriously and I find that more important. He is a very intelligent animal.

Senator Adams: Did you have to pay GST to get him?

Senator Gigantès: I did not pay GST on him because I bought him before the GST. However, I have had him snipped, because if he had any puppies I would have to sell them and pay the GST, and I am damned if I will allow my dog's gonads to contribute to the maladministration of this country.

Senator Cogger: See what I mean, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: It is amusing.

Senator Cogger: Hardly convincing or to be taken seriously.

Senator Gigantès: So much of the claimed superiority of VAT or GST over sales taxes and other taxes depends upon the assertions that it is more evasion proof. The extent of which the GST is evaded in those countries which operate the tax is difficult to substantiate, but before looking at the evidence available, let us examine the logic of the assertion that it cannot be evaded.

Earlier I gave the examples of two lawyers I know who are already evading it. Lawyers, of course, are specialists in tax evasion and make a great amount of money out of it. They call it "tax avoidance".

Senator Haidasz: Tax avoidance is illegal.

Senator Gigantès: Avoidance is legal; evasion is illegal. The line between the two is truly mathematical: it has no dimensions.

Senator Haidasz: It is invisible.

Senator Gigantès: It is geometrical and it is visible in the eye of a good tax lawyer.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: I do not understand what you are telling me.

Senator De Bané: He is explaining that the line is very thin.

Senator Corbin: It is a sequence of points.

Senator Gigantès: No, it is not a sequence of points. Not at all. In geometry, it is not a sequence of points. Even according to Einstein or contemporary geometricians, a line cannot be regarded as a sequence of points. It is a non-dimensional line between two points. You would drive Euclid to despair. I beg you! I can tell you that Einstein would take out his violin and would start playing mazurkas. Yes, Dr. Haidasz? I would like you to explain this to me, Senator.

Senator De Bané: But I'd like to put the following question to you. You say that the difference between tax evasion and tax planning is a matter of order of magnitude. Wouldn't you say that morality comes into play, in that . . .

Senator Gigantès: The Conservatives don't have any, that's why I didn't refer to a concept they wouldn't understand. Our colleagues' opposite may honour morality and proclaim their attachment to it but they do not practise it, particularly their prime minister.

I'll do a bit of simultaneous translation. Senator Simard is not present but there are other francophones. I'll give a little demonstration, if that's agreeable. I'll do a sight translation of an English text I have here, just for a change. French is such a beautiful language.

When it's claimed that the GST administers itself, it is normally meant that the retailer will make sure he obtains the appropriate document from his supplier so that he can deduct the tax paid to the supplier. Likewise there will be the same incentive for the supplier to obtain the appropriate document from his customer so that he too can claim a tax credit from the government.

Theoretically, then, the GST system reduces evasion in two ways. First of all, the tendency to underdeclare income is reduced because of the fear that suppliers may reveal the quantity of supplies delivered; the tax man would then be interested in finding out details, such as whetherr the supplies are part of inventory or whether they have been sold and for how much.

The other deterrent to evasion is that hiding income requires much more effort, since one has to persuade suppliers, that is, the people you buy from, to cheat also. However, if there is no cross-checking, a multistage system does not the change the existing incentive for those who think that if they succeed in hiding a part of their purchases, they'll also be able to hide a part of their sales, and thus avoid tax. Not a only a GST-style tax, but also less income tax, since they'll be declaring a smaller income.

A retailer who sells an item to a customer for a price including tax and who does not register this sale will be able to keep for himself an amount in excess of the tax on his inputs. Therefore if he lies to the tax authorities, he stands to profit. Hence the temptation for him to make such proposals to his suppliers, explaining that they can also benefit, and the effect would be to create a large underground market. That is what happened in several European countries; I mentioned that in Italy it amounted to between 35 and 40% and the Italian GST only amplified the phenomenon.

So the amount of purchases would be underdeclared and sales would be made mainly to private individuals, as for example a plumber. It would be to his advantage to buy his supplies retail, like a ordinary customer, pay the GST on the purchase but not charge it to the customer and keep the difference for himself. There would be a strong temptation to avoid registration and hide the true level of one's sales, thus encouraging the development of a black economy.

[Senator Gigantès.]

[English]

If he is concealing his sales for GSt registration purposes, he is more likely to escape detection if he underdeclares or does not declare his income at all for income tax purposes. I come back to the incident of the physiotherapist that I talked about earlier . . .

[Translation]

After closing his business, he would then supply physiotherapy services in the home of his customers. He will be paid cash and will not declare his income. He will charge the customers less than if they went to a business registered for the GST. In this way he can keep his money for himself, claiming that he has no income and in this way avoid paying income tax as well. That's the sort of thing that GST has given rise to in other countries.

• (0145)

[English]

Since marginal income tax rates in Europe will on average be 30 per cent or more and the GST 20 per cent, the benefits of evasion are high. In this way GST has probably done much to stimulate the growth of the black economy which is causing concern to authorities in all European countries.

[Translation]

That is what they want to encourage here. In fact, the idea of a black market economy is in keeping with conservative philosophy; you do not pay income tax, that is quite a conservative attitude.

Senator Corbin: Who is going to profit from this?

Senator Gigantès: Are you talking about the water I am drinking or the text I was reading?

Senator Corbin: Who will benefit from tax evasion?

Senator Gigantès: Well, just about everyone will benefit from that except consumers, employees, and people like you and me who cannot take advantage of such things. But entrepreneurs will certainly resort to to it and they will push a lot of clients into a type of illegality. One of our colleagues was telling us that he has a contractor who says: "If you pay me by cheque, it is $30 an hour, if you pay me cash, it is $20". This type of thing is going to become much more widespread and that is bad for the moral tone of society generally. A lot of people are going to be corrupted by that.

As I was saying earlier, I only referred to the mathematical dimensions of the definition of a line because the moral dimension is something which escapes Conservatives.

Senator De Bané: On that same topic, do you know the sophist philosopher who said that when you shoot an arrow at a moving object, it will never reach it because as the arrow moves forward, the object is also moving ahead, of course. So, for every unit of time, the distance will decrease, but the arrow will never be able to reach its target completely, and that is the line that Paul Valéry was referring to in one of his poems when he said: Achilles was running but going nowhere . . . and in this way he would never reach the far horizon.

Senator Gigantès: That is a beautiful line from Valéry, who was in fact a great poet, whom I admire a great deal, but as for his worth as a mathematician, allow me to . . .

[English]

> If any benefits do result from the incentives for customers to obtain receipts with purchases, they are restricted to transactions between registered traders.

[Translation]

That is a very important sentence. Only GST registered suppliers, and the government is complaining that more than half have not registered, will have an incentive to obey the law and not find ways around it.

[English]

Those supplying directly to the public—

[Translation]

. . . because the public cannot claim a GST rebate, and so does not have to provide any documents. At the final point of sale, the public does not necessarily have to provide any documents to the government, because it will foot the bill at the end of the line.

[English]

> Those supplying directly to the public have no more reason to issue an invoice or receipt than they would under a sales tax.

[Translation]

There is no advantage to this. A GST does not promote morality in society any more than a retail sales tax would.

[English]

> Where the authorities have reason to suspect fraud by a retailer, they can check with his supplier to compare the retailer's purchases with his sales—if he is purchasing more than he is selling then there is evidence of fraud if his stock position is inconsistent with his declared sales. If the supplier is in collusion with the seller then the fraud will only be detected by carrying out further inquiries . . . checks with suppliers, when there is doubt about the sales of a retailer, is a routine feature of the administration of sales taxes in the United States. The strength of the [GST] system is that it allows routine computer checks to be carried out of the ratio of input taxes to output taxes, which can pinpoint cases where these ratios are out of line and where there is a possibility of fraud. What it does not do is allow the detection of fraud itself; this can only be done by a physical audit.

Which, in effect is what happens with retail taxes. So there will be no way to detect fraud. The same administrative costs will have to be incurred as with the GST.

> Automatic detection would only be possible if each trader recorded every purchase and sale on his return with the [GST] number of his supplier so that the computer could cross-check that the claims tallied with one another. For obvious reasons the returns made to the tax authorities are not made in that detail and the more complex the structure of multiple rates and exemptions, the greater the normal range of variations in ratios will be and the less reliable guide they will give to the existence of fraud.
> Another claim made for the strength of the [GST] system's defences against fraud over a sales tax is that, because collection of the tax is multi-stage, then only part of the proceeds of the tax is lost if it is evaded at any point in the system. This is, of course, true but the corollary is that there are many more points in the economy at which scope for fraud exists.

The distinction made in the previous paragraph was that the computer may indicate a possibility of fraud, but you cannot take a possibility of fraud to court. A physical investigation will be required, which will incur heavier compliance costs than exist in the retail sales tax system.

Senator De Bané: You know, Canada's entire tax collection system is based on the voluntary compliance of its citizens. In fact, government only audits about 2% of taxpayers, precisely because 98% of Canadians do comply with our current system. It is based, then, on the principle of voluntary compliance. While I have the floor, perhaps I could answer my colleague Senator Corbin's question on the line. It was indeed the philosopher Zeno of Elea, a disciple of Parmenides, who attempted to prove the impossibility of movement through a series of paradoxes that have remained famous, the most famous of them being that of the arrow that never reaches its target, moving in a straight line.

According to this philosopher, to reach a point, a moving object must first of all cover half of the distance which separates it from that point, and before that, half of that half, and so on ad infinitum. Of course, I understand full well that our colleague, Senator Gigantès, said that that was a famous sophism, but now the sophistry comes mostly from the other side!

Senator Gigantès: You flatter them! Come now, our dear colleagues opposite are not capable of sophistry! They know how to make money! That is very simple. This is one of the problems of government when Conservatives, among whom businessmen are the majority, take power. The problem a businessman has to grapple with is quite simple: He must sell his wares for more than he pays for them. He has to deal with related matters, personnel and what have you, he has to buy supplies, but whatever he does, he must make a profit on his sales.

Senator Castonguay: Do you really believe that businessmen are nothing but salesmen? Are you not forgetting about manufacturers? Those who make things? Do you not think that these same businessmen are the ones who produce things and contribute to creating wealth in a country? You seem to have an extremely negative view of businesspeople, one which always surprises me.

Senator Gigantès: It surprises businessmen, I agree. There certainly are businessmen who add value to the materials they purchase. They try to sell the processed raw material that they purchased, with a markup that accounts for the value they have added through the manufacturing process and their profit margin.

Senator Castonguay: They are the ones who create wealth.

Senator Gigantès: What I am saying is that for an industrialist, the problem is a difficult one. I admire them. I admire people who can make money a great deal, because I have never managed to make any. But making money is much less difficult than the political problems a prime minister faces. You can find nearly optimal solutions to the problems a businessman faces, but you can never find optimal solutions in politics.

In politics, you have to try to find a compromise. That is what democracy is about. All compromises are imperfect. Allow me to use an example I often resort to, that of selling gas to power automobiles. Retailers who have gas pumps want to sell as much as possible. Ecologists would like them to sell none at all. And so the government has to find a policy that satisfies the ecologists somewhat and that also suits the gas retailers to a certain extent. Both of these groups are going to think that the policy falls short of the mark, but will probably feel that it is not wretched enough to cause a revolution.

Thus, politicians and businessmen have completely different perspectives. The businessmen finds logical, linear solutions that lead to certain results. He has a car to produce, for instance. The government has to come up with a multidimensonal concatenation of compromises. That is the truth, and it is very difficult to do, much more difficult than producing a Toyota and creating a distribution and sales network. That is very impressive, but much less difficult than the work a statesman such as yourself, a former statesman, has to accomplish.

> Another claim for the strength of the VAT system is the GST system's defences against fraud over a sales tax is that, because collection of the tax is multi-stage, then only part of the proceeds of the tax is lost if it is evaded at any point in the system. This is, of course, true but the corollary is that there are many more points in the economy at which corporate fraud exists. In a minor way it becomes easier for registered traders and their staff to acquire goods and services for personal consumption free of tax than under a retail tax system. More important, because registered traders reclaim input taxes under VAT, there is benefit to be gained from false invoices covering fictitious purchases which, if supported by fictitious invoices for zero-rated sales (especially exports of invisible services to associated overseas companies) are less likely to arouse suspicion under routine computer ratio checks.

That is an important sentence again.

Are you receiving me well, senator?

Senator Corbin: Senator MacDonald?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator MacDonald: Senator Gigantès, I hate to return to this subject but I am confused. I asked you a question earlier and you said you would give us the answer on Tuesday. My calculation shows that you will have been speaking for over 34 hours at that stage.

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator MacDonald: Surely, your resources on that side are not so impoverished that you would occupy 34 hours of your colleagues' time.

Senator Gigantès: Just wait until you see what others do after me.

Senator MacDonald: Well, I will come back to this again because, you see, if I thought you had the alternative I might seriously change my mind. I should like to quote from The Edmonton Journal of November 1:

> The Liberals could easily change the name of the consumption tax, tinker with the rate, and keep their promise to axe the GST — but the net effect would be the same.
>
> If Chretien is going to earn belief from Canadians, he'll have to outline what taxation measures he has in mind.
>
> It's not good enough to appoint a committee to look at the options. He should know the broad outline of his tax policy before a committee gets down to the details.
> Chretien is no political beginner—he is a former finance minister, a veteran of half a dozen cabinets. Does he favor a progressive income tax? Will he do away with consumption taxes altogether? Will he take the advice of international economists and come up with a sales tax that taxes food? Canadians deserve the know the answers if they are to trust the Liberals with their votes.

On your shoulders, Senator Gigantès, lies a heavy responsibility to answer, presumably on behalf of your party, if you are going to occupy 34 hours of their time.

Senator Gigantès: I was thinking of 44, actually.

Senator MacDonald: If Tuesday is to be the time, we wait with bated breath for the answer.

Senator Gigantès: Senator, I read that article in The Edmonton Journal. It was in the Quorum. I wrote a letter to them, and I have it in my computer so I could give you the full text, but if I remember rightly, I said that it really is a little premature to ask us to decide right now what fiscal remedies we have to apply to the damage that the Tories are continuing to do to the economy. There are constitutional developments. Provinces are asking for disentanglements. They are asking for the right to collect all their taxes and do all their expenditures. The free trade deal with Mexico might affect what we are doing. The authority of the federal government might be further diminished. Yet you expect Mr. Chrétien to guess at the dreadful, noxious effects of Tory mismanagement between now and the election and predict immediately what taxes will be necessary to repair the damage to the Constitution, to our trade position, to the loss of manufacturing jobs, to the change in the distribution of fiscal resources as between the federal and provincial governments that will be pertaining at the time that we take over. If, of course, Mr. Chrétien did so immediately, naturally, a Southam paper like The Edmonton Journal would immediately say, "He is frivolous. He does not know what the situation will be like, and here he is now telling us in advance what he will do when he does not know what situation he will face." Now, this kind of baloney is suitable for your prime minister, but I would not like a Liberal prime minister to be that fraudulent.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Gigantès, please. Not baloney. He was equivocal before he became the leader, while he was campaigning and after he became the leader. The conversion came only a few weeks ago. It was amazing. He could not even get the words out. He said, "I have always been opposed to it," meaning the GST, "and I will be opposed to it always." It reminds me of a song: I will be so-and-so always. It seem unequivocal. So what have we got, Senator Gigantès? Have we got "Son of GST"? "Daughter of GST"? "Cousin of GST"? "Return of GST"? That is all we want to know.

Senator Gigantès: You want to know? I will tell you. One of the problems that people who are unfamiliar with such matters have in understanding Mr. Chrétien, and a problem that the Tories have and that the press has after so many years of Tory dishonesty, is that they have difficulty understanding an honest man. What Mr. Chrétien was saying is that there is a consumption tax now, called the manufacturers' sales tax. There has been this consumption tax for a long time. It collects about $18 billion. You are changing it into a GST. So, to be very clear as to the GST-type of consumption tax: "No, never. I'll kill it. Period."

Will there be a consumption tax, as there is now, or a federal sales tax or manufacturers' tax? The answer to that is that there will be a reform of the whole tax system, and we will see what place in that reformed tax system, designed to repair the damage we will inherit, a consumption tax will have.

However, it will not be a multi-stage goods and services tax such as this nightmare you have designed where stockbrokers' caviar is not taxed but a pregnant Canadian woman's four ounces of yogurt is; where hot popcorn is taxed but is not when it is cooled; where raspberries off my raspberry bush are not taxed but the raspberry bush is; and similar idiocies. I don't know what happened to you guys. Why did you do this? Wait until I start telling you all of the defects of the tax, because I am going to read them all one by one. I have 44 hours to fill. By the time I finish with all this, you will see why Mr. Chrétien is perfectly right. He is not an idiot. He is not going to have the same sort of tax.

What you are playing with here is fair game. After all, we are in politics. You are trying to confuse the issue. You ask if there will be a consumption tax. Well, there is a consumption tax now. However, will there be a GST? The answer to that is, categorically, no. Will there be a consumption tax as the one now? Probably not. There will probably be a consumption tax which will not penalize our exports, and that does not mean it has to be a GST-type.

Senator Corbin: That is your view.

Senator Gigantès: That is my view.

Senator MacDonald: The GST is a consumption tax.

Senator Gigantès: The MST is a consumption tax, too. Who do you think pays it? Do you not think it is passed on to the consumers, the people who buy things?

Senator MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: If you do not like to get into the minutia and detail of the tax system and try to understand it, Senator MacDonald, why are you picking on me? I love this sort of stuff. I bathe in the obscene Byzantinology of tax. I adore it.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Gigantès, you have answered my question. I simply wanted the assurance that we would not be denied your alternative on Tuesday, and you have answered the question. I hope that the popcorn and the raspberries will sustain you during the next 34 or 38 hours.

Senator Gigantès: I will not take either popcorn or raspberries. They both have too much roughage. Moreover, raspberries are diuretic. So I will take neither. In fact, when anybody has asked me, I have always said I will take pasta, which is a complex carbohydrate and is very good for you.

Senator Cogger: Who cares?

Senator Gigantès: Well, in case you ever want to filibuster, or if you have to defend yourself in court and you have to make a long speech, I advise you to take that kind of stuff.

Senator Cogger: Senator, thank you for proving my point. I said you were embarked on a silly, stupid exercise, wasting time; and the more you go at it, the more you prove it. Back to your diet!

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon?

Senator Cogger: Are you going to entertain us some more with your diet?

Senator Gigantès: Of course, I will do my very best. We have 41 hours and 48 minutes to go, together. Let us go through this together. If you relax and try to enjoy it, it will be a little less painful. If you find this so very disagreeable, I recommend that you ask one of the pages to go to my drugstore and buy those nice little devices called ear plugs. There is a nurse on duty, and she could give you some cotton wool, or you could take some of this blotting paper and chew it until it becomes rather mushy and put one in each ear. Two little red things there would be very nice. It is all the fashion these days to have earrings, and you would not even have to pierce your ears. You could use your ear hole.

Senator Cochrane: Come on!

Senator Corbin: Patience.

Senator Gigantès: I like her. She is a good person.

Senator Cogger: Don't be sexist now!

Senator Gigantès: What is sexist about liking somebody and expressing admiration for her work as a senator? She has been an excellent senator. It is one of the very strangest things about Mr. Mulroney; he has appointed some very good senators.

Senator Cogger: Thank you.

Senator Gigantès: It is awful that they have to be used in the terrible way in which they are being used, because they are good people. However, if one accepts to sail in a ship—

Senator Cogger: Do you want to know how you guys are being used? I will quote a little from the December 10 issue of Maclean's. Here is what the head of Environics Research has to say about Liberal senators. It ties in with a point that Senator MacDonald was referring to.

> And when public attention turned in September to the government's widely disliked GST legislation, Chrétien refused to say whether he would abolish the tax if he were elected.
> Finally, on Oct. 28, Chrétien said that he would do so. But a survey published on Nov. 27 by Toronto-based Environics Research Group found that fully 64 per cent of those polled said that they did not believe him. More telling, however, was that over half of those who described themselves as Liberal supporters told the polling company that they did not believe their own leader. Said Environics vice-president Donna Dasko: "There is a much higher degree of cynicism about the Liberals, despite the fight by Liberal senators against the GST. That should be a source of concern."

● (0215)

That is how your own supporters view your current role. In this article by Kaye Fulton it is stated that after six years out of power the Liberals are still having trouble adjusting to the harsh realities of Opposition.

Senator Gigantès: It is an experience you will have soon yourselves and you will find it is hard to adjust to the harsh realities of Opposition. There are some among you who are making this adjustment right now and they are not finding it very agreeable. Yes, we are having a hard time adjusting to the harsh realities of Opposition, especially when we have to stand over here and watch your Prime Minister destroy the country. If you want me to enumerate how he has done it, I will do so.

He has destroyed the country. Who speaks for Canada? Not Mr. Mulroney. He is not trusted in English Canada to defend federalism because they know he is a prisoner of the separatists in his caucus. In the next two years the fate of Canada may be decided and the Prime Minister will not be there because he will not be trusted in English Canada; even if he tries to defend federalism, which he has done in the last couple of weeks, he will no longer be believed. He is at 6 per cent in Alberta, and for good reason. He is the man who hailed the Constitution of 1982 and to get votes called it a betrayal. He is the man who used the drug patent bill as a device to get votes and thereby attacked federalism by saying that those who opposed the drug bill opposed it in order to harm Quebec. During the debate on the Free Trade Agreement he said exactly the same thing, that people who opposed it opposed it in order to stop l'épanouissement du Québec. This man has done so much damage to Canadian federalism that it may be impossible to repair. After six years with him, everybody, Liberal supporters included, cannot possibly believe a politician. If a federal Prime Minister can sink so low as to betray his major trust of defending the federation, anything can happen. It is like someone taking Holy Orders and then debauching his congregation. That is what happened with your Prime Minister. I have much more to say about it.

Senator Bosa: Say it.

Senator Gigantès: Not now. I want to go on with the GST debate.

Senator Bosa: I wonder if I could ask Senator Cogger a question.

Senator Gigantès: No, you must ask me a question. I have the floor.

Senator Bosa: It is probably true that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition finds it difficult to adjust to becoming members of the Opposition when they have been in government for such a long time. Is it not equally true that the Conservative government finds it difficult to be in government because they have been in opposition for such a long time and are finding it difficult to adjust to the new situation?

Senator Gigantès: That is like telling a child who has been starved during an illness not to eat too fast. They rush and grab everything they can as fast as they can and make as many of their friends as rich as they can as quickly as possible and then get indigestion. You are correct, it is difficult for them.

Now, can we return to the GST, or would you rather I spoke on another subject? I am ever ready to oblige; you pick the subject and I will talk. I thought we were here to discuss this detestable, stupid tax.

Senator Stewart: They want you to talk to the point about the Prime Minister until it is clear.

Senator Gigantès: They want me to?

Senator Stewart: Yes, Senator Cogger is urging you on.

Senator Gigantès: I will bind this speech very luxuriously and send it to the Prime Minister as a souvenir of how I feel about him.

Senator Cogger: It is just a compendium of everyone else's work, because you are just incapable of an original thought. We have not heard one out of your mouth tonight.

Senator Gigantès: According to Bertrand Russell there has not been any original thoughts since Plato, so I stand in good company. Philosophy is a footnote to Plato, and since Bertrand Russell considers that everything is included in philosophy one way or another, I have to bow to his dictum. He was a very great mind.

Senator Stewart: That is unfair to Senator Cogger. He has a fresh thought every day.

Senator Gigantès: He does?

Senator Stewart: Yes, a fresh one every day and sometimes a notion at noon.

Senator Gigantès: We must furnish him with a refrigerator so they do not turn bad.

> It seems to be the general experience that losses of revenue are relatively greater in small firms than in large, among service industries more than other sectors, and more in retailing than in manufacturing. Revenue authorities are understandably reticent about the methods of evasion used, particularly the more sophisticated devices. The French authorities however state that of detectable fraud, 43 per cent is accounted for by the omission of taxable transactions, 11 per cent by irregular deductions of input tax, 10 per cent by false exports . . .

By the way, false exports are clearly in the domain of large corporations because small corporations are not in the export business. In an earlier paragraph we saw that registered traders can claim that they have received or sold services for export to affiliated companies abroad. Only large corporations have affiliates, so this is a very good tax.

> A government report on tax fraud in The Netherlands Sijbren Cnossen in Aaron (1981) revealed . . .

The authors are Sijbren, Cnossen and the editor of the work in which they appeared is called Aaron. That is the fellow who adored the Golden Calf. I have told you my story, have I not, Senator Cogger, about how one can tell a Tory from a Liberal from a Socialist? One shows them greed and the Tory falls on his knees and says, "The Golden Calf of Aaron" and worships it. The Socialist does a nervous fandangle trying to stamp greed out and says, "The snake in Paradise". The Liberal looks at it and says, "What an interesting beast of burden, let us harness it." Aaron is the fellow with the Golden Calf while Moses was up there taking dictation from the Lord.

This famous tax report stated, and for VAT read GST:

> . . . although VAT fraud was slightly more frequent at the retail stage than at other stages of production . . . Forty-four per cent of all reassessments "for tax evasion involved deliberately incorrect applications of the law, such as rules regarding deductions for prior stage taxes. Sixteen per cent had tried to postpone payments improperly. Thirty—eight per cent had failed to enter sales in their books or had kept incomplete accounts. Seven out of ten violations were committed by former offenders, perhaps because the penalties for violation tend to be rather low.
> The principal instrument of enforcement is the audit visit . . . one of the disadvantages of [the GST] is that it requires giving power to large additional numbers of officials to enter virtually all significant business premises in the country.

A new tax police.

> In the U.K. [GST] officials have the right to gain access to business premises at any reasonable time and without search warrant although, except in some cases where fraud is suspected, appointments are made in advance.

In other words, people can come in and search.

> When in the premises these officials have the right to examine all [GST] bookkeeping records and any correspondence or material relating to specific transactions.
> Since delay in making [GST] returns can be a useful source of finance for businesses, penalties are necessary for late returns as well as for failure to keep proper records or for fraudent returns. Penalities for late returns are generally imposed administratively in the EEC countries usually as percentage of the tax due, although those for other offenses are left to the judicial system.

So we are going to overtax our judicial system. It is already overtaxed and we are going to pile on the agony.

> There has been a distinct tendency for administrative powers and penalities to be increased over time.
> In some countries, the methods used to enforce [GST] compliance go far beyond audits on business premises. In several countries, inspections of goods in warehouses are regularly carried out and vehicles transporting goods are required to carry documents listing the buyers and sellers of the goods carried, with their [GST] registration numbers. In Italy, since 1980 hotels and restaurants must issue [GST] receipts, a copy of which by law must be taken off the premises by the customer who may be asked to produce it in the street.

Already there are 4,000 or 5,000 more employees of Revenue Canada for tax collection. Recently the government has come back with supplementary Estimates to have still more employees. This is just the beginning. They have not got into chasing tax evaders. It is my turn to be political, they will probably be checking on Liberals more than on others.

> The UK Forum of Private Business carries out regular surveys . . . amongst its members and asks "Which act has the most adverse affect on your business?" and "Which act would you like to see changed? As to the first of these questions, [GST] came top of the list on every occasion in surveys carried out between March 1979 and March 1982, with the percentage mentions running from 35 per cent to 57 per cent. In six out of the seven surveys in which these questions were included, [GST] also came top of the list as the Act which respondents would most like to see changed. In both cases, the trend it mentions has been broadly upwards over the period of 1979/1982 . . . even though the UK abolished multiple positive rates of [GST] within the period.

• (0230)

> Similar results were obtained in a more recent independent survey carried out for the UK Department of Industry. Professor Bryan Carsberg carried out a survey of small firms and their auditors for the UK Institute of Chartered Accountants in 1984. He found that small business proprietors ranked [GST] well above all other administrative requirements in terms of the cost, time and effort involved, including tax administration for employees, the preparation of annual accounts and social > security administration. The auditors took a similar view and ranked VAT above the annual accounts and the provision of information for banks.

So we are going to persecute our business people. Those who voted Conservative, we might say, deserve to be persecuted, but I am a Liberal and I do not have that kind of nasty attitude to human beings. I think they made an error and they should be forgiven. But now they are going to be persecuted with an administrative straightjacket, with a tax which copies the British one and for which, of all the various tax forms, applying such a tax is the most administratively cumbersome. We have to go and imitate what was the worst.

So let us look a little at what happens when you run a small business and you have to face the GST.

> The process starts with the routine bookkeeping and sales administration of the firm. Most small businesses, whether registered for [GST] or not, will keep a record of major purchases with a file of purchase invoices. The purchase ledger or cash book will need an extra column for [the GST] however, and if the proprietor wishes to reclaim all the input taxes he pays, he will need to ensure that every entry is supported by an invoice or tax receipt giving the [GST] number of his suppliers. Credit card counterfoils and till receipts will not be sufficient for this purpose unless they bear the [GST] number and, where appropriate, the rate of [GST] charged. . . . in entering the input [GST] in the ledger, he or his bookkeeper will need to distinguish between disallowed input taxes, including items for personal consumption (which may require an additional calculation if they are part only of the total of the voucher) if additional work is to be avoided when the [GST] is totalled for the purposes of the regular return. For sales, the firm will need to ensure that [GST] is charged at the appropriate rate.

You know, we have zero-rated, we have exemptions, and that all the necessary information, date of supply, GST number, name and address of customer is on the invoice.

> The amount and the [GST] charged will also need to be entered separately in the books so that output tax can be totalled for the return to the tax authorities. Note that the tax to be paid is not just the [GST] rate times sales because the tax is expressed on the net price. A 10 percent [GST] is 9.09 per cent of the tax inclusive price, and this calculation will need to be made frequently for both purchases and sales where the tax is not shown separately on receipts. For cash sales, a retailer may have to write out by hand a special tax invoice on a pre-printed form if requested. The more invoices a firm issues or receives, and the more complex the [GST] rate structure, the greater the administrative burden will be.

You see, this is one of the reasons why I am reading this material. I have never run a retail store, I am happy to say. I have been fortunate. I much admire those that have the courage to have to undertake such an operation. It is risky; it is hard work. However, they are valuable members of the community. So unless I looked at some authorities, like the one I am citing, I could not possibly know what a retailer would have to face in dealing with the GST. I am wondering how many of our colleagues opposite have been retailers. I am not sure any of them have. Senator Cogger, for instance, is a lawyer. I am sure he has not run a retail business. He does not know anything about the problems of a retailer, as I did not until I read this book.

[Senator Gigantès.]

I am not at all sure about Senator Tremblay. He is not here but he will be able to read the record. He has been a great public servant. He has not run a retail shop. He would not know a retail shop if he fell down in it. I do not know about Senator Hatfield either. He was a distinguished Premier, a great statesman, a great Canadian. All of us admire and like him. I am not sure he ever ran a retail store. Did you, Sir? He will not answer. So I will never know if he ran a retail store or not, but I have some friends in New Brunswick and they will give me the information.

We cannot possibly judge the GST without hearing what it does to the people who are going to have to administer it at their own costs—and enormous administrative costs are being put on all small business people by this tax because of its complexity.

As you will see later, because I will refresh your memories as to what he said, one of our witnesses told us that he would kill for the New Zealand type of GST, where it is quite simple. At the end of the reporting period, you say, "I sold $100,000 worth of goods; the tax on those is $7,000. I want $90,000 worth of supplies, the tax on those is $6,300; $7,000 minus $6,300—I owe you $700." Simple. No, we had to go and imitate the British System, with an invoice on every transaction and multiple entries in the ledger and, therefore, an enormous new burden costing 9.3 percent—and that is if we look at businesses alone.

I will continue with the description of what happens to business people in handling the GST.

> At the end of the month or longer period, depending upon the regulations, the firm will have to make a return showing its input tax, output tax and net tax payable or repayable. At its simplest, this may be a one-page form with just a few boxes to insert the numbers, and at its most complex it may be a forbidding document of several pages. . . . the complex french form . . . fills three pages and 78 lines although every line clearly is not applicable to every trade. Complexity in the return is largely a function of the regulations—the more rates and special rules there are governing payments, the longer the form will need to be.

And of course because this government, which was supposed to be the great reconciliator, and would get all provincial governments working happily in conjunction and with perfect love with the federal government—everybody falling into everybody else's arms at every step; not a single bad political thought in anybody's mind; not one instance of Ottawa-bashing in any provincial capital; just a total love fest. That is what it was going to be.

I mean Gary Filmon was going to walk around all the time with a halo around his head and no problems at all. Grant Devine would not argue one bit about the Rafferty Dam. Nothing but sweetness and light everywhere.

They were not even able to agree with the provinces on coordinating the sales tax. So the poor unfortunate retailer has to know whether an item is taxed at the federal level, and also taxed or not taxed at the provincial level. What is the provincial rate, and what is the difference? They are not the same for all sales. What is the federal level? Is it zero-rated or isn't it? This complicates things very much more, and to resolve his problem he has to have an invoice on each item showing all these things and then they must be entered into a ledger, both for each thing he buys and each thing he sells. Terrific!

So if you are a rich firm and you can computerize all this, it is not too bad. But if you are a small firm, and you cannot afford complex machinery, you are cooked. It costs you a lot more.

One of the things we on this side are doing is expressing the indignation and the protest of all these good people who are going to have their lives more complicated and more expensive because of a badly designed tax.

Senator MacDonald, who has now left, was asking why we didn't propose amendments. How many times in the past six years have we been told by the Tory government that we had no business proposing amendments? Who were we? As Senator Stewart was pointing out, it started out with the Tory government saying, "We want you to allow us to borrow money for the project, for which we have already given you Estimates, to complete the program for this year. But we also want you to allow us to borrow a huge sum for next year, and we will not tell you what we are going to spend it on. Now, you go to your bank manager and ask for money and say, "I will not tell you what I am going to spend it on," and see what happens.

No parliament of the British persuasion has ever approved government borrowing before the Estimates are presented. The Estimates in this case were printed. They were printed, and I can reveal the name of the person who told me. It was Michel Pelletier. I can reveal his name now because he is dead. He died of cancer some weeks ago. He was an employee of the Queen's Printer, we were old friends and he was telling me, before all this trouble started about the Estimates, how terribly busy they were because they had had to print Estimates and then, in the usual procedure, these were packed and labelled and whatever. There they were, sitting there ready to go—and I knew this. Then later, Mrs. Flora MacDonald let the cat slip out of the bag and proved that yes, indeed, this was so. You had the Tory government saying, "No, we won't tell you what the Estimates are. You have to approve money or borrowing for us sight unseen." This is the same government that says, "Give us suggestions; we will listen."

Pat Nowlan was talking recently of the overweening pride of the Prime Minister. If his mirror showed him with bags under his eyes, he would smash it. He probably has an opaque one that does not show the truth. This Prime Minister and this government are so brim-full of unjustified pride. It is a collection of incompetent, strutting, nonentities. I am sorry that the Leader of the Government is not here so that I could say things about him. As soon as he appears, I shall do so.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, you need not worry about the absence of the government leader. They have people here taking copious notes of your pronouncements. He will be given a report when he wakes up sometime this morning.

Apropos of what you have just been saying, I would like to quote to you a citation from Sir Winston Churchill, which he pronounced in the British House of Commons on June 2, 1908. It is taken from a little book called The Eloquence of Winston Churchill. I quoted from it a number of times yesterday and I intend to quote from it again in the course of this debate. He had this to say about public funds:

> The great principle which this House ought to guard and cherish is that, when the tax collector comes to the private citizen and takes from him of his wealth for the service of the public, the whole of that money taken shall go for the purposes for which it is intended, and that no private interests, however powerfully they may be organized and however eloquently advocated, shall thrust their dirty fingers into the pie and take the profit for themselves.

Would you please comment on that citation from Sir Winston Churchill in the context of what you have just said?

Senator Gigantès: Sir Winston was one of the great men of this century—and probably of many centuries. He cared deeply for the state in which he lived and for humanity. He was a Conservative in the good sense, and there are some. Let us not forget that it was he who appointed Lord Beverage to produce the Beverage Report, which is at the root of the Keynesian social security system that is employed there and here in Canada. He had a concern for ordinary people. He fought alongside them and he was not a first-generation nouveau riche upstart. He was somebody from a tradition that cared. He was, of course, terribly strict about propriety and honesty in government and absolutely implacable about rooting out the kind of petty dishonesty we have seen from members of the caucus of the other side who have been convicted for their acts.

Of course, I excused Senator David for daring to accuse me falsely of fraud the other day, because what could he do? He has not been in politics for very long. He came to the Senate and sat in the Tory caucus and probably rubbed elbows with some of those convicted felons and therefore judged others by those standards. Winston Churchill was not like that. Neither were the Labour people who followed him. Clement Attlee threw out one of his ministers because the minister accepted a special price for a suit; one suit. The fellow lost his portfolio, had to resign his seat and was banished from the house for something that would probably amount to $200 today. Of course, that is unheard of among those convicted felons.

One of the problems this government has had is that many of the people they have had elected were doing in public office things that appear fairly reasonable and common in business. If you are in business and you know that a deal is cooking somewhere that involves the purchase of land, you will rush out and buy that land. Then you make a killing by selling it, and you are considered a smart businessman in doing so. If you are a minister of the Crown and you do that, it is at least sleazy, if not criminal.

Winston Churchill was not sleazy, as your quotation shows, Senator Corbin. When he said that, he was a very young man. He had just returned from the Boer War where he had so distinguished himself with his spectacular escape after having been captured.

Senator Corbin, have you read the three-volume Churchill biography?

Senator Corbin: No, I have not.

Senator Gigantès: You should; it makes wonderful reading.

Senator Corbin: I will look into it. I believe you may have missed the purport of the quotation, however. I was referring to the Estimates and the destined allocations. Governments do not get their Estimates approved by the house unless the allocations are openly laid out on the Table. That, I believe, is the thrust of Sir Winston's comments, and that is what you were alluding to in your speech before you switched to another angle.

Senator Gigantès: I was trying to entertain, since Senator Cogger feels that we should all know this technical stuff about the GST. I admit that the tax side of economics is dull. Students are driven to despair by it. So I thought I would try to make things a little more interesting for him, and that is why my mind wandered a bit. But what can one do?

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, do you not think that the most grievous sin of this government, this executive, is the use of their majority? They feel that they can damned well do anything regardless of the traditions of Parliament, of the rules and of the way of doing business. They think they are modern and contemporary in their attitude and that because they have a crushing majority they can run over Parliament and play with it like a toy to get what they want at any cost. Is that not their most grievous sin?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, that is their most grievous sin, but it is not a sin that should surprise us. Most nations along the Mediterranean, and probably other nations, say that when a fish goes rotten it smells from the head. We have a Prime Minister who is exactly as you have described him. He has the illusion of grandeur and he is petty. He is the captain. While in the British navy during World War II, my ship visited New York. A lady asked the skipper of my ship whether the ships of the British navy were insured. The skipper said, "No, Madam; we courtmarshall the captain." Quite properly, the British think that anything that goes wrong in a ship is the fault of the captain. He sets the tone of how the ship operates.

Mr. Mulroney has set the tone for this government. Here is a man who had eight provinces with two opposition parties supporting him on the Meech Lake Accord, and he blew it. What does he do? He blames someone else. He could not possibly admit that it was his fault. Instead, it is Jean Chretien's fault. Who was running things? Mulroney. What did he do to foresee difficulties? I have said this before, but it bears repeating. An army lieutenant would be demoted to the ranks if he was in charge of a military operation and he did not have a plan for a second attack if his first one was repulsed; if he didn't have alternative routes for retreat, for getting at things such as ammunition supplies, for getting food and drink; if he didn't know help would come and if he did not understand the enemy's position.

Mr. Mulroney was guilty of every single one of those errors in preparing for the Meech Lake Accord. As I was saying to Senator Castonguay before, because Mr. Mulroney is a labour negotiator, he thought that he could put the premiers in a smoke-filled room, get them dizzy with fatigue, then soon things would happen. Why? Because this was the beautiful boy from Ireland himself, as his mirror tells him every day.

Did he not foresee that Mr. Trudeau would object? It was perfectly natural that Trudeau would object. Did he not foresee that all kinds of constitutional experts would object, that in English Canada there were people who have the stupid mentality of the Canadian Airlines Pilots Association, which they displayed in 1976 when they were objecting to French being used in the air? Did he not foresee that? Did he not foresee that governments might change? Did he not take care to make provision for those things to happen? No, he did not. In consequence, he blew it. He now blames Jean Chretien. Who was in command? Who was the Prime Minister? He also blames the 1982 Constitution. In this he picks up the vocabulary of the separatists. He says that the amending formula is terrible—for two years it is terrible; for one year it is terrible; and so say the separatists.

I would like to tell you a little secret. Those particular provisions of the Constitution were written by the "gang of eight" and signed by Mr. Levesque. He liked them. Of course, they never intended using them. In other words, Mr. Mulroney was done in by his allies, the separatists.

I would like to read you something. If you have your Constitutions, please bring them out, and you will see the resemblance, if you do not trust me.

This is a news release dated April 16, 1981.

> Ottawa—Premiers from eight Canadian provinces today signed a new and historic Canadian patriation plan—

This is what they wanted the patriation plan to be.

> —including an amending formula for the Constitution.
>
> Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Saskatchewan were signatories to the "Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan."

It calls for patriation of the Constitution and, as part of the patriation plan, acceptance of an amending formula that would ensure all future amendments are made in Canada.

Before I continue with the reading of this, I would like to look at the logic of what happened in 1982, what happened at Meech Lake, and what is happening now. What was the problem? What is still the problem? The provinces, Quebec in particular, wanted a distribution of powers. Supposing you agreed with the distribution of powers. Before you could proceed you would have to have had the Constitution back here; otherwise it would involve running to the British and asking them to please do this and please do that, and we still had a bitter memory of Lord Haldane keeping a piece of Labrador because he had financial interests then. The Privy Council in Britain was not immune to such things.

So we had to patriate the Constitution. We had to have an amending formula that did not require unanimity because if you have unanimity, things being what they are, you are going to get into the bind of being blackmailed, and "I will not agree to this unless I am given that." Then, you would also have to have a provision allowing you to make changes affecting only one province, and this is special for Quebec. So Mr. Trudeau, who knew his business, did just that.

Once you have all these things, once you have the Constitution here, once you have an amending formula that is less than unanimous, you can negotiate a redistribution of powers and those steps are necessary. Now, what happens? Mr. Trudeau was proposing certain things. The Liberal Senate blocked one of his proposals when he wanted to change the Constitution without consulting the provinces. Of course, this is conveniently buried by the separatists and their Tory allies, and yet of all the things blocked by the Senate that was the most major. It was a Liberal majority in the Senate blocking the apple of the eye of the Liberal Prime Ministers' legislative program.

In June 1978 the Liberals in the Senate told Mr. Trudeau, "This will not pass," and being an intelligent man, tough but intelligent, he retreated. The negotiations started and there was the "gang of eight." Mr. Trudeau only had Bill Davis and the Hon. Richard Hatfield on his side. Everybody else was aligned against him and they prepared their own constitutional proposals. I will be delighted to read them to you. They said:

In the Constitutional Accord the signing provinces agree to:

—patriate rapidly the Constitution of Canada;

That is what Trudeau wanted to make.

—adopt a new amending formula for the Canadian Constitution;

—enter into intensive constitutional negotiations during a three-year period based on the new amending formula; and

—discontinue all court action on this matter.

They were suing Mr. Trudeau.

The Canadian patriation plan is conditional upon the Government of Canada withdrawing the proposed joint address on the Constitution.

Under the Canadian patriation plan the United Kingdom Parliament would end its trusteeship over the British North America Act without damaging its historically fine relationship with Canada.

This is the "gang of eight." And Mr. Lévesque and Claude Morin were architects and drafters of this principle. Then, they say:

The new amending formula combines flexibility and stability; this is a principal feature of the Accord.

Under the formula, all amendments to the Constitution must have approval of the Canadian Parliament, except those related to the internal constitution of a province.

If you read the 1982 Constitution, you will find that that is exactly what it is. All amendments to the Consitution must have apaproval of the Canadian Parliament, except those related to the internal constitution of a province.

Most amendments would require legislative approval of two-thirds of the provinces.

That is what the 1982 Constitution has. What I am about to prove is that Mr. Trudeau was so accommodating that he accepted the proposals. These are the Lévesque proposals that he accepted, "the betrayal" that Mr. Mulroney talks about.

Most amendments would require legislative approval of two-thirds of the provinces (seven) representing at least 50 per cent of the population of the ten provinces.

Exactly what the new Constitution says.

This establishes legal equality amongst all provinces.

This establishes legal equality among all the provinces, and Mr. Lévesque was asked why had he abandoned special status distinct society, and he said it is best that we consider all of us equal.

When an amendment diminishes a province's rights, privileges or powers, an individual province may choose to retain these rights, privileges and powers by obtaining the approval of a majority vote of the total number of members of its legislature; and such a province would then receive adequate financial compensation.

This was restricted by Trudeau, and he gave such full compensation to Quebec on cultural and language matters only.

For a limited number of important matters including those relating to the Crown, parliamentary representation, language—

That is Article 23, Canada clause, formulated by Lévesque. Trudeau took it from Lévesque. He used Lévesque's clause in the language.

—and the composition of the Supreme Court, the consent of all provincial legislatures would be required.

This is exactly what the 1982 Constitution says.

This amending formula is demonstrably preferable for all Canadians to that proposed by the federal government because it:

—recognizes the equality of provinces within Canada.

This is drafted by Claude Morin and Réné Lévesque.

—avoids the need for a referendum—

This is a key provision, avoids the need for a referendum.

—to choose an amending formula or as a method of amending the Constitution.

Mr. Trudeau wanted that very much and the provincial premiers did not, because it meant that the provincial premiers might be disavowed by this population referendum. After all, it happened in Quebec and it could have happened in Manitoba, and Sterling Lyon could have had egg on his face. It could have happened in Saskatchewan. It could have happened anywhere.

The amending formula:

removes the absolute veto power that the federal government proposes to give the Senate over constitutional reform, including Senate reform.

The Constitution removes our absolute veto power. We are restricted to six months. Mr. Trudeau put that in the Constitution, as the "gang of eight" wanted.

The premiers agreed that together with the federal government an agenda for constitutional change could be immediately drawn up.

● (0310)

The eight premiers pointed out that their agreement on the Canadian Constitution shows clearly and positively that significant constitutional progress is possible when all parties approach the issue with sincerity and goodwill.

The premiers are prepared to go forward with this plan . . .

By working together, federal and provincial governments now had an opportunity to make a modern, made-in-Canada Constitution.

Details of the accord and the amending formula are sent simultaneously to the Prime Minister and the premiers of Ontario and New Brunswick for their active consideration.

I am sure that the then Premier Hatfield received them.

The eight premiers are now waiting for the Prime Minister to call a constitutional conference.

That is the press release. Now we have a constitutional accord, a Canadian patriation plan. This is the actual text which they were describing in their press release, and I would ask honourable senator to be patient with me because of all the whereas's.

WHEREAS Canada is a mature and independent country with a federal system of government,

AND WHEREAS the Parliament of the United Kingdom has retained, at the request of the Parliament of Canada and with the approval of the Provinces, residual power to amend certain parts of the British North America Acts upon receiving a proper request from Canada,

AND WHEREAS it is fitting and proper for the Constitution of Canada to be amendable in all respects by action taken wholly within Canada,

AND WHEREAS the full exercise of the sovereignty of Canada requires a Canadian amending procedure in keeping with the federal nature of Canada,

NOW THEREFORE, the Governments subscribing to this Accord agree as follows:

1.To patriate the Constitution of Canada by taking the necessary steps through the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the Provinces;

2.To accept, as part of patriation, the amending formula attached to this Accord as the formula for making all future amendments to the Constitution of Canada;

3.To embark upon an intensive three-year period of constitutional renewal based on the new amending formula and without delay to determine an agenda following acceptance of the Accord; and

4.To discontinue court proceedings now pending in Canada relative to the proposed Joint Address on the Constitution now before Parliament.

The Canadian Patriation Plan is conditional upon the Government of Canada withdrawing the proposed Joint Address on the Constitution now before Parliament and subscribing to this Accord.

The Provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario are invited to sign this Accord.

Dated at Ottawa this 16th day of April, 1981.

It was signed by Peter Lougheed, Premier of Alberta; William R. Bennett, Premier of British Columbia; Sterling R. Lyon, Premier of Manitoba Brian A. Peckford, Premier of Newfoundland; John M. Buchanan, Premier of Nova Scotia; J. Angus MacLean, Premier of Prince Edward Island; René Lévesque, Premier of Quebec, and Allan E. Blakeney, Premier of Saskatchewan. It was signed on behalf of the Government of New Brunswick by Richard Hatfield, and the Government of Ontario by William Davis. There was also room to indicate acceptance by Pierre E. Trudeau, Prime Minister, on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Here is the text of the amending formula written by the "gang of eight," and therefore with the full agreement of Mr. Lévesque.

It is an historic document because all the blame that is being put on Mr. Trudeau for his "betrayal" of 1982 is being put on a constitutional Accord written, in effect, by Mr. Lévesque. But naturally, his government, which is rewriting history all the time, and the separatists, who are rewriting history all the time, do not believe in telling the truth.

Senator Hébert: May I ask a question of the honourable senator?

[Translation]

As a matter of fact, I was aware of this document but this is the first time I have heard the text, and I wonder if, during this whole debate about the Meech Lake Accord, it was alluded to even once in Quebec. I do not remenber ever having heard the great promoters and supporters of the Meech Lake Accord, among whom Senator Castonguay, who is in this Chamber tonight, refer to this document to tell us that the official version of the Pequists is not the real truth.

Senator Gigantès: I think Senator Castonguay could provide the answer to this question, but I am quite sure that the Quebec media did not want these facts to be known, because I provided them with this information and they did not want to publish it.

Senator Hébert: You mean La Presse, Le Devoir . . .

Senator Gigantès: Yes, La Presse, Le Devoir and others.

Senator Corbin: When?

Senator Gigantès: During the Meech Lake debate. Of course, since Mr. Mulroney had been taken hostage by the Separatists in his caucus, he could only talk of the betrayal of 1982, when everything points to the fact that it was not at all a betrayal, it was a document signed by Mr. Lévesque that became the Constitution of Canada. Where is the betrayal? About Mr. Lévesque, it is clear that only one of two things can be said: either he wanted to sign this text, and he wanted it to be approved but his party prevented him from doing so, or it was part of his tactics to fight Mr. Trudeau. I will come to the "night of the long knives", because it is also very interesting.

This document bears on that, as you will soon see, if you have some patience. So, this text of the "gang of eight", as they called themselves . . .

[English]

> The amending formula which is part of the Canadian patriation plan agreed to by eight governments in Ottawa on April 16, 1981, is the result of intensive discussions among the governments of Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Saskatchewan.
>
> In developing the formula, several important principles were recognized.
> 1. All amendments to the Constitution of Canada, except those related to the internal constitution of the provinces, require the agreement of the Parliament of Canada.
> 2. Any formula must recognize the constitutional equality of provinces as equal partners in Confederation.

Mr. Lévesque was recognized in that Quebec was "une province comme les autres." He signed this document and then the Péquistes blamed others for not recognizing Quebec as une province comme les autres, when the founder of the PQ movement signed this.

> 3. Any amending formula must protect the diversity of Canada.
> 4. Any constitutional amendment taking away an existing provincial area of jurisdiction or proprietary right should not be imposed on any province not desiring it.

That is related to the Constitution.

> 5. Any amending formula must strike a balance between stability and flexibility.
>
> 6. Some amendments are of such fundamental importance to the country that all eleven governments must agree.
>
> During discussions, it was recognized that more than one method of amending the Constitution would be necessary. Accordingly, this formula contains different methods depending on the nature of the amendment.
>
> The eleven sections described as "Part A—Amending Formula for the Constitution of Canada" are designed to contain a full and complete procedure for the future amendment of the Constitution of Canada in all respects.

• (0320)

> The provisions contained in Part A would replace both the limited amending formulas now contained in subsections 91(1) and 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act as well as the United Kingdom Parliament's residual responsibility for amending certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution.
> This amending formula would apply not only to the B.N.A. Act, 1867 and to amendments made to it since that date, but also to the other parts of the Constitution of Canada, including the constitutional statutes and Orders-in-Council which relate to the entry into Canada of particular provinces, for example, The Manitoba Act, 1870, the Terms of Union admitting British Columbia in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873, The Alberta Act, 1905, the Saskatchewan Act, 1905, and the Terms of Union with Newfoundland, 1949.
>
> This amending formula is clearly preferable to the one proposed by the federal government for a number of reasons:
> (1) it recognizes the constitutional equality of each of Canada's provinces;

This is a document signed by René Lévesque.

> (2) it gives the Senate only a suspensive, rather than an absolute, veto over constitutional amendment.
>
> (3) it omits the referendum provision—

[Translation]

Mr. Castonguay, please pay attention to this sentence.

[English]

> (3) it omits the referendum provision opposed by many as being inappropriate to the Canadian federal system.

[Translation]

Which means that the "gang of eight" absolutely did not want any referendum, according to the document that they signed and that Mr. Lévesque signed. As you will see, this explains the "night of the long knives".

[English]

Let me refer now to the Constitution Act, 1867 to 1982, Department of Justice, consolidated as of January 1, 1986. You will see that what the "gang of eight" proposed, with the participation and the signature of Mr. Lévesque, was taken by Mr. Trudeau and put in the Constitution. That is the betrayal of 1982.

> (1) Amendments to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by:
>
> (a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and
> (b) resolutions of the Legislative Assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the latest decennial census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all of the provinces.

It is in the Constitution, 1982.

> (2) Any amendment made under subsection (1) derogating from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the Legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a vote of a majority of the Members of each of the Senate, of the House of Commons and of the requisite number of Legislative Assemblies.

It is in the Constitution, 1982.

> (3) Any amendment made under subsection (1) derogating from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights, or any other rights or privileges of the Legislature or government of a Province shall not have effect in any province whose Legislative Assembly has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of the Members prior to the issue of the proclamation, provided, however, that Legislative Assembly, by resolution supported by a majority of the Members, may subsequently withdraw its dissent and approve an amendment. This is in the Constitution. Please note that a legislative assembly, according to the proposal made by Mr. Lévesque and the "gang of eight," had the right to change its mind. Mr. Lévesque put it in there for his own use, of course.
> (1) No proclamation shall issue under section 1 before the expiry of one year from the date of the passage of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure unless the legislative assembly of every province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

That is in the 1982 Constitution.

> (2) No proclamation shall issue under section 1 after the expiry of three years from the date of the passage of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure.

This is what Mr. Lévesque wanted. This was put in the Constitution, and this is what the Péquistes and the federal Prime Minister call the 1982 betrayal. I repeat:

> No proclamation shall issue under section 1 after the expiry of three years . . .

[Senator Gigantès.]

The three-year limit that was so much bitched about during the Meech Lake debatee was put in there by René Lévesque and signed by him.

> (3) Subject to this section, the Government of Canada shall advise the Governor General to issue a proclamation forthwith upon the passage of the requisite resolutions. In the event that the province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation.

That is in the Constitution only in respect of language and cultural matters for Quebec; not for other provinces and not for all matters.

A change affecting the powers of a particular province cannot be made without that province's agreement, according to this document. That is in the Constitution, too.

According to the 1982 Constitution, which followed the proposal by the "gang of eight" almost word for word, the federal government cannot grab away the powers of a province.

> Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, of the provinces, including any alteration to boundaries between provinces or the use of the English or the French language within that province may be made only by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the Legislative Assembly of every province to which the amendment applies.

That is in the Constitution.

Mr. Trudeau's betrayal of 1982 was written by René Lévesque. Of course, that is a piece of history that has to be brushed under the carpet for the electoral purposes of Brian Mulroney during the process of destroying the country.

> An amendment may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, after the expiration of those one hundred and eighty days, the House of Commons again passed the resolution . . . .

That is in the 1982 Constitution.

The 1982 betrayal of Quebec by Trudeau was written by René Lévesque. Mr. Mulroney knew it, because he had commented on Mr. Trudeau's admirable flexibility in accepting the suggestion of the provincial premiers. Unless he is suffering from Alzheimer's disease, he has no excuse for later calling what he found so flexible and so good a betrayal, just to retain the support of the separatists in his province.

> (1) The procedures for amendment may be initiated by the Senate, by the House of Commons, or by the Legislative Assembly of a province.

That is in the Constitution, word for word. This is the 1982 Constitution written by René Lévesque.

(2) A resolution authorizing an amendment may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation.

The withdrawal of a resolution by some other provinces caused great indignation in Quebec. Quebec put that clause in there so that René Lévesque could sign it and then go back and retract it if he had to, for political reasons.

● (0330)

(3) A resolution of dissent may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of a proclamation.

Subject to sections 9 and 10, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

That is in the Constitution.

Subject to section 9, the Legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Legislative Assemblies of all of the provinces:

(a) the office of the Queen, of the Governor General or of the Lieutenant Governor;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing the province at the time this provision comes into force;

That is in the 1982 Constitution.

(c) the use of the English or French language except with respect to section 4;

(d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada;

(e) an amendment to any of the provisions of this Part.

Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 1 (1) of this Part and sections 1 (2) and 1 (3) shall not apply:

(a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons;

That is in the Constitution of 1982.

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selection of members thereto;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) the Supreme Court of Canada, except with respect to clause (d) of section 9.

(e) the extension of existing provinces into the Territories;

(f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces;

(g) an amendment to any of the provisions of Part B.

A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada—

So every one of the provisions of the Constitution of Canada of 1982 that Mr. Mulroney is bitching about, was suggested by René Levesque in a document signed by René Levesque and seven other premiers, one of whom now sits in this chamber.

Mr. Mulroney said that he approved of Mr. Trudeau's flexibility in accepting what the premiers were proposing and in accepting proposals that he, Mr. Trudeau, did not particularly like.

Mr. Mulroney, when it suited him in the process of cheap electioneering, which is now destroying the country, called this document, the Constitution of Canada, a betrayal of Quebec, adopting therefore, the very false vocabulary of the separatists in Quebec, because it is false on their part to say that the 1982 Constitution was a betrayal of Quebec, when it was written by René Levesque.

Those who argued during the Meech Lake debate, and did not bring this out, were sweeping history under the rug. I do not think they have the right to do that. You can not play with the fate of a country this way.

I will have this photostated and send a copy to Senator Castonguay so he can read it.

Senator Corbin: Would you make a copy available for the Hansard reporters?

Senator Gigantès: I will also make a copy available for the reporters. This is an historic document and it is necessary to consider it. Did you have a question to ask?

Senator Corbin: No, I was just a little worried about the document.

Senator Gigantès: Don't worry, I won't lose it.

Senator Stewart: May I ask the honourable senator, what is the provenance of this document? Is this a public document?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, it is a public document. I got it from the Library of Parliament.

Senator Stewart: Would you be prepared to lay it upon the table of this house?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, certainly. Unfortunately, it has been scribbled upon by me. But I will lay it on the table.

Senator Corbin: If you are going to be speaking tomorrow and next week, you could get another copy and table it then.

Senator Gigantès: I would like a Page please to copy this document for me.

Senator Corbin: Will Senator Cogger do?

Senator Gigantès: No, he won't. He doesn't wear the right uniform and he is not young enough.

Senator Corbin: Senator Cogger is calling René Levesque's document dirty words. Well, I have heard it all. Shame on him.

Senator Gigantès: We were saying earlier when I was rudely interrupted—

Senator Cogger: By Senator Stewart.

Senator Gigantès: No, Senator Stewart is never rude to a fellow Liberal. I know he drags on my sleeve because he is afraid of what I might do next, but he is a serious man and I am not. I have never taken myself seriously.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps I should rise on a point of privilege?

Senator Gigantès: I did not say you take yourself seriously, sir. I said you are a serious man. You are. You are a great authority, admirable, with a sense of fun.

Now, we were talking about all the—

[Translation]

Senator Castonguay: Senator Gigantès, you referred to democracy, to freedom of speech and to the need to maintain some decorum in this chamber.

Senator Gigantès: Did I say that?

Senator Castonguay: I have often heard you talk about democracy and of respecting institutions. Do you not think that having food in a chamber such as this is a complete lack of decorum?

Senator Hébert: This is very serious.

Senator Castonguay: Yes, it is serious.

Senator Hébert: It's much more serious than flouting the rules, like your Speaker. You are ridiculous. Sit down. What you are doing is ridiculous.

Senator Castonguay: Don't you think that going to to such length to claim that the Speaker flouted the rules is not more serious?

Senator Hébert: What you say is absolutely not true. You stand up with your regal air to complain that someone who has been speaking for hours is eating a small slice of orange to freshen his lips. Senator, you are ridiculous!

Senator Castonguay: I would rather have regal airs that look like a buffoon.

Senator Hébert: He would rather have regal airs. You can keep them, I would rather look like a buffoon, at least it makes people laugh.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Castonguay, why don't you stand up in indignation when one of your colleagues listens to rock music on the radio? He has a walkman . . .

Senator Hébert: Are we allowed to listen to the radio, here?

Senator Castonguay: He does not disturb anyone and you do not know what he is listening to. He may be using an amplifier better to hear the words of the senator.

Senator Gigantès: And my tangerine distrubs you?

Senator Castonguay: It does not disturb me, it flouts the decorum of this house.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Gigantès: My God, people who flout decorum? Did I do that because I put a slice of tangerine in my mouth? Food is a sacred trust! Have you turned into a brahman when you became President of a corporation? Brahmans have these terrible rules about food, by which you can only eat somethings with the third finger of the left hand while not using the second finger of the right hand. I seem to have offended brahman Castonguay with my slice of tangerine! I am going to toast one of those slices and send it to you. If you want the whole tangerine, I can also give it to you, I won't be offended. Why would drinking water, which is also putting something in one's mouth, be appropriate but not eating a slice of tangerine? Should we use our mouth only to speak? Are we not allowed to put anything in it, even water? Is that what you are saying? Are we allowed to breathe?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Senator Gigantès . . .

Senator Gigantès: I did not address you, senator. You want to have a go at me, go ahead, but you may not come out unscathed? I have a temper and I do not respect those who do not respect me. I do not take myself seriously but I am a fighter. Do you want to fight me? Go ahead!

Senator Lavoie-Roux: I respect people who deserve it!

Senator Corbin: Could I add something on Senator Castonguay's question of privilege? I believe that he has nothing to win, and that nobody has anything to win, in this kind of debate. There is no need for him or for anybody else from that side of the House to remind us of the rules of decorum.

I have seen some very unusual things these past few days. I could mention them to you. I could name names of men and women from that side of the Senate who violated the rules of decorum. If you want to play this game, you will not play alone. I think we would be better off listening to Senator Gigantès. If you do not want to listen to him, it's your business. You can continue drafting your letters, your memorandums and everything else.

It happens very often that people eat sweets, as I am doing now. People do this here every day. The other day, one of your colleagues even tried to give us some pink pills, God knows why. By God, we do not have anything to learn from you! If you want to carry one, I am to give names of people from your side who did all manner of things.

Senator Hébert: Is it proper to read a newspaper?

Senator Corbin: It is also a lack of decorum but nobody mentions it. We have a Speaker of the Senate who reads the Quorum everyday in the chair. I have seen him do it. From where I sit, I can see everything he does up there. He does that everyday, from the first papge to the last. This is the kind of Speaker we have and nothing should astonish us. However, nobody has anything to win in playing this kind of game. Senator Gigantès, I fully recognize your right to put into your mouth . . .

Senator Haidasz: Senator Lavoie-Roux is eating something!

Senator Corbin: I said what I had to say.

Senator Haidasz: She is hiding her mouth.

Senator Corbin: Salivating is forbidden is forbidden. Go ahead, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: What do you want me to do? Shall we carry on? Am I allowed to drink a drop of water, your Grace? You know, when one is always referred to as an institution . . . A reporter called me and asked me: "Do you disagree with Senator Castonguay?" I answered: "Unfortunately, yes, I disagree with Senator Castonguay". Then, and that is strange coming from a reporter, he told me: "But he is an institution!" So, I told him: "Listen, he is not dead yet, do not refer to him as an institution. He is a living person, nice and everything, but not an institution". Now, we know that he is also "your Grace", he is not an institution!

If I ask your authorization everytime I want to drink a drop of water, will that satisfy him?

[English]

There are several other elements in the burden of VAT administration which have not yet been described in this paper. The first of these are errors, queries and disputes. As a general rule, in a small firm only the proprietor and the bookkeeper will understand the GST, but on occasion they may get things wrong, as will customers and other employees.

> Failure to specify that a price quotation to an exempt trader does not include [GST] will result in a query and possibly the loss of a sale when an invoice is issued. Incorrect rates may be applied—this is very common under multiple rate systems—and in some cases the distinctions between manufactured and non-manufactured foods, repairs and new construction, new and used goods and other borderline cases will require arcane knowledge of the regulations. (For example, frozen yoghurt and a hot sandwich may be subject to [GST]; fresh yoghurt and a cold sandwich may not be subject to [GST].

He is speaking of the British example. Here we have the yoghurt and caviar and hot popcorn that is taxed; and the cold popcorn that is not taxed. I wonder who thought of that one. Can you imagine?

[Translation]

Could you imagine someone having this strange idea to tax popcorn when it is but not when it gets cold.

Senator Corbin: Probably a civil servant committee meeting during the weekend in a hotel room at Montebello.

Senator Gigantès: I wonder if they were eating small pieces of tangerine?

Senator Corbin: Not this kind of bureaucrats, Sir. They probably decided it during a cocktail party.

Senator Gigantès: Do you think they were respectable?

Senator Corbin: I don't know, I was not there.

Senator Gigantès: You were not? Don't you think we could ask the government leader in the Senate to inform us about this crazy idea? Don't you think he should explain to us why they passed such strange measures, leading Canadians to violate the law without knowing it?

Senator Hébert: No. Instead, we should return the bill to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee so we could ask this kind of question.

Senator Gigantès: We already asked those questions.

Senator Corbin: And you didn'tget any answer?

Senator Gigantès: Not at all.

Senator Corbin: Unbelievable.

[English]

Senator Gigantès:

> Other instances which create difficulties include the distinction between the purchase of a good or service when acting as a principal or as an agent (VAT will be liable in the former but not in the latter case), the supply of a service from overseas by telephone or other electronic means and its supply in person, trading between exempt and non-exempt organizations under common ownership and the special [GST] documentation requirement for exports and imports.

In Germany, the GST is applied to sales to East Germany that in other respects would be treated as exports.

> Secondly, dealing with the audits themselves is another element in the [GST] burden.

For small firms, an audit would be relatively infrequent; perhaps once every few years.

> An audit will inevitably take up some of the proprietor's or bookkeeper's time, and, to the innocent and guilty alike, will create some anxiety. [The GST] is a self-assessed tax where the rules are so complex that in many cases the GST inspector will need to seek higher authority for his interpretations, but where the small firm will pay a penalty, even if only in underpaid tax, if it gets it wrong.

[Translation]

May I put some Lipsyl on my lips without flouting decorum?

[English]

Senator Forrestall: Get off it, will you? You are being childish.

Senator Gigantès: Oh. So, it was not childish to talk about my little piece of tangerine, but it is childish to—

Senator Forrestall: You be your own judge with respect to decorum and order.

Senator Gigantès: What are you eating right now, sir? There should be some attempt at decorum. Senator Forrestall is eating. This is terrible. Senator Castonguay, I appeal to you. I appeal to you to tell Senator Forrestall to stop eating.

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux, please. One of your colleagues, Senator Forrestall, is flouting decorum. Do something about it! This is not respectable!

[English]

I was not quite able to understand everything Senator Forrestall was saying because his mouth was full. Speech becomes indistinct when one speaks with one's mouth full.

Anxiety about such matters is part of the psychic cost of GST which is not measurable but is nonetheless real. Studies have pointed out that income tax officials are normally happy and indeed prefer to deal with the taxpayer's accountant. With the GST, the professional adviser cannot stand between the tax authorities and his client in the same way; although he may, of course, be present at audits where advance warning is given. There is also an obvious difference between the position of a senior employee in a large firm dealing with GST authorities and the proprietor of a small business whose personal pocket is at stake.

Another area of difficulty for some traders is partial exemption. Firms, some of whose output is exempt and some of whose output is taxable, including zero-rated items, are not allowed to claim tax back on all their inputs, only on those that contributed to taxable outputs. Tax experts all agree that apportionment of input tax between taxable and exempt outputs is the worst aspect of GST administration, leading to many disputes between traders and authorities. Other areas of difficulty exist, too. Sale or returned items may be treated in a special way. Bad debts need to be written off if permitted.

Finally, there is the whole question of GST policy for the proprietors of small firms and, for that matter, the finance directors of large firms, to worry about. In all firms, completion of GST returns is not necessarily a simple matter of routine; it requires the attention of a senior person, and in a small firm this is normally the proprietor. Since the date of the return is fixed and penalties for late returns significant, the proprietor needs to ensure that he has the necessary cash available on the appropriate date. As we have shown, however, the maximization of the cash flow benefit, or the minimization of the disbenefit, requires conscious management decision.

[Translation]

I must interrupt my speech because I forgot to make the connection between "the gang of eight" and "the night of the long knives". I sent a copy of the document to Senator Castonguay and he will see that repeatedly, the eight Premiers insisted there should not be a referendum. For them, it was all important not to have a referendum. I believe Premier Hatfield too was against the referendum because, what does a referendum do? It takes the decision power away from the provincial Premier and in a referendum in which the federal government takes charge, the provincial Premier is in danger of being overwhelmed.

It is not a risk the Premiers wanted to run and it is also a matter of principle. Mr. Lyon was very keen on that and for him an elected government is an elected government, we have parliamentary democracy, not a referendum or judicial democracy, so a referendum was out of place.

[Senator Gigantès.]

It was essential for the other members of "the gang of eight" not to have a referendum. Now, in the morning preceding "the night of the long knives", Mr. Trudeau said at a certain point: "If we can't agree on all this, let's have a referendum". Mr. Lévesque replied: "Ok, let's have a referendum". Then Mr. Trudeau adjourned the meeting to get everything prepared. So, Mr. Lévesque betrayed his collegues. He was the first one to stab his collegues in the back and betray them because he accepted what they absolutely did not want him to accept and what he had promised with his signature not to accept.

"Éviter d'avoir recours à un référendum pour choisir la formule d'amendement." He signed he did not want a referendum, then he stabbed his colleagues in the back and accused them afterwards of stabbing him. He was the one who started it.

Senator Kinsella: Senator Gigantès, what is the connection between our debate on Bill C-62 and the last bit of information you provided us with? I am trying to follow that.

Senator Gigantès: The connection I established right at the beginning is that the GST is part of—I would not call it a conspiracy, because it does not have to be a formal conspiracy—a general and regular Tory revolution in most countries, and we are having one right now, which tries to chip away at the progression of the privileges of the less rich and make the lot of the rich easier.

Various senators get up, Senator Cogger for instance, and Senator MacDonald, and say that Mr. Chrétien is incredible. I pointed out that after six years of government by Mr. Mulroney there is no doubt no one can believe any politician any longer. I pointed out one of the many lies of Mr. Mulroney—I pointed to others, too—which was that he approved Mr. Trudeau's flexibility in 1982 in taking the proposals of the "gang of eight," you remember that is what they called themselves—and putting them in the Constitution. He said what a wonderful thing Mr. Trudeau did and what a great Constitution it was and he was all for it.

Now, for cheap, sleazy electoral purposes he calls it a betrayal. He uses the vocabulary of the separatists. For six years he has used the vocabulary of the separatists. So that separatists in Quebec can say: "You see, even the federal Prime Minister is in agreement with us."

I am saying that he has destroyed the country. He no longer has any credibility in English Canada because English Canadians know he is a prisoner of the separatists in his caucus.

What I am worried about is not the next election, because I am not sure we will have the time for an election. What I am worried about is what happens in the next three years. Who speaks for Canada in the next three years? I do not think Mr. Mulroney is credible as a voice for Canada after his silence for six years. Nobody trusts him any more.

We are going to have Quebec making a decision in which the debate is governed by the Quebec media who have adopted, for example, this vocabulary of betrayal. I demonstrated that by putting this document on the record, signed by Mr.

Lévesque, signed by seven of the "gang of eight" premiers, that the Constitution of 1982, which has always been called a betrayal by the French media, was in effect something proposed by Mr. Lévesque himself. Mr. Mulroney knew that and congratulated Mr. Trudeau on his flexibility but later, for electoral purposes, changed his tune and called it a betrayal.

I was answering some of your colleagues who got up and expressed their views on issues of the credibility of political leaders and so on. I was explaining why this lack of credibility exists, which, of course, is mostly, if not all, due to Mr. Mulroney. Senator Murray takes a fair share of that blame, too, but I prefer to put it all on Mr. Mulroney on the grounds of what I learned in the British Navy, that it is the captain who is at fault if anything goes wrong. Or, to use an expression of Greek fishermen, the fish starts to rot from the head.

If you want me to continue on this subject some more, I will be much obliged. It is one of my favourite subjects.

Like all other economists, I find tax literature dreadfully dull, but it is a tax bill we are dealing with and I have to explain why I think it is bad and why I am trying to kill it.

It should be added, say the authors of this document, that what we have been describing here are the ongoing costs of the GST administration. When a small trader first registers for GST, and the vast majority of the new registrations are small firms, he will have to invest a considerable amount of time in understanding the GST system. Then, in training his staff, if appropriate, to maintain the new records and apply the tax, as a start he will need to read the various books the government produces. Incidentally, one of the complaints of people is that these various books which have been produced are always being changed. At this moment the government says it is going to apply the GST on January 1, yet it is already starting to send amendments to the poor traders. There is reference to "document XYZ, amendment number 1." A week later there is amendment number two, three, four, or whatever. You are driving these people crazy. There are a considerable number of official GST leaflets and publications. I do not know how many there are, but certainly there are a lot, and, into the bargain, a regular publication you are sending out all the time. These publications are, to say the least, not easily understood. Some questions will probably have to be put to the GST office, which means costs.

• (0400)

All registered traders will bear the compliance costs of the GST though not all will enjoy the cash flow benefits. Only the big companies will. As far as compliance costs are concerned, these may be expected to decline in relation to turnover. The larger the firm, the greater the scope for the use of specialist staff whose costs can be spread over a large volume of sales. In a small firm, the proprietor has to do much of the work and the cost of his time is normally greater than for specialist staff. The larger the firm, the greater the scope for computers, programmed point of sale registers, etc. The number of invoices to be dealt with will not rise in proportion to size. Large firms are likely to buy in bulk and often to sell in larger quantities than small firms. The survey that we talked about earlier found in fact that compliance costs fell sharply with the size of the firm. In fact, compliance costs are 40 times higher as a proportion of turnover for the smallest category of firms as for the largest. A firm of the size of Mr. Castonguay's has compliance costs that are 40 times smaller in terms of turnover than they would be for a small firm which, of course, is another explanation why this particular form of consumption tax was chosen. Not only does it shift the actual burden of the tax from manufacturers, that is its principal supporters, the B.C.I. guys, supporters of the Mulroney government, but the compliance costs, the actual administration costs are much cheaper for the big firms than for the small firms. Even there the small people are penalized and the big supporters of the Mulroney government are given advantages.

This is one of the main reasons I have for opposing the GST. Just one of the main reasons! It is administered for the owners, it is inefficient, it hits the wrong people, it is regressive and it benefits the large firms and the very rich. But they have so many other benefits, do they also have to have this one?

I remember the story about Lord Thompson, the father of the present Lord Thompson of Fleet, and his great joy every time he found a penny on the pavement. Despite his considerable bulk, he would bend down and pick it up, and this made his day. This made his day.

Senator Corbin: And he put it in his pocket.

Senator Gigantès: And he put it in his pocket.

Senator Corbin: He did not give it to a beggar.

Senator Gigantès: No, he did not give it to a beggar, and you do not get rich unless you understand the value of every penny, and I feel, Senator Hébert, that you never understood the value of every penny.

Senator Hébert: No, I am poor for the rest of my life.

Senator Gigantès: I bought a piece of land from a very rich man to build my house, and I offered $3,000 less than he was asking for it through a real estate agent, and he called me personally. He said, "It is my price or nothing. I know that you do not have money. I am very rich. I do not have to bargain." I said, "Just to make me look good in the eyes of my wife, would you reduce your price by $500?" He said, "Would you, if you were me?" I said, "Yes." He said, "That is why you are poor; that is why I am rich. My price or nothing." I paid his price.

Senator Corbin: You did?

Senator Gigantès: It was a good piece of land and I wanted it.

They have these dreams that they will collect a lot of extra tax, not from their friends, but from everybody else, so the GST is a good method of fighting against tax evasion. There have been important studies done on this, by the International Monetary Fund, for instance. Senator Cogger will say, why do I read things during my speech. I think it is because, probably, he prefers the things I say about his friend, the Prime Minister, to what the tax people say, but I cannot speak about the Prime Minister all the time. That, too, gets tedious to me.

The International Monetary Fund looked into the GST, the Value Added Tax, and so on about enforcement and the capacity to catch tax evaders, and the book is called, Value Added Tax, International Practice and Problems by Alan A. Tait of the International Monetary Fund, published in 1988 in Washington, a pretty recent publication, and Alan Tait is Deputy Director of the Fiscal Affairs Department of the International Monetary Fund, and it is a pretty serious organization. It has enough clout to make countries change their policies, even important countries. He has published widely on tax policy and works on the possibilities and problems of Value Added Taxes in over a dozen countries. In Europe, America and Asia, 46 countries now use the VAT, and at least five are considering introducing it now. This is another of their arguments, that because many countries use it so should we. It reminds me of classrooms without walls. Many years ago when I first arrived in Canada, the Americans were using classrooms without walls. So we should use classrooms without walls! And there was an epidemic of schools with classrooms without walls where you mixed first-graders with sixth-graders and whatever, and we got into that epidemic about eight years after the Americans had abandoned the system because it did not work. Everybody, we are told, has adopted the value-added tax, so we should adopt it, too. It is a very good tax. One of the things it does is catch tax evaders.

• (0410)

Here is what the International Monetary Fund has found out, and this was published in 1988. In a previous chapter, the discussion is about frustration and annoyance with the compliance costs. I was reading about those things earlier.

> Frustration, including annoyance with the compliance costs, may tempt a trader to evade the [GST]. Straightforward greed may also tempt him.

I use the masculine pronoun, which is considered sexist. It is not my fault; that is the way the book which I am citing is written. I am rather glad that crooks are referred to in the masculine gender and not the feminine.

> All commentators describe the theoretical self-checking mechanism of [GST] and all go on to elaborate how this does not work . . . Only Korea has tried formally to cross-match sales and purchase invoices.

Of course, their compliance is a little better.

> The Korean study shows that for the two years 1980 and 1981, the largest penalties were associated with invoices for [GST] liability or credit and that delayed submissions of invoices were twice as costly as nonissuance and non-submission. These results suggest that better collection and enforcement to trace deliberate fake invoices were important. It is also interesting to note that nonregistration continued to be a major problem in Korea four years into the [GST].

We are talking now about a country whose police don't joke. That applies to tax authorities, too. You register or they kneecap you.

[Senator Gigantès.]

> Like other taxes, the [GST] is evaded;

We have been told that this is a tax that is not evaded. Here is the International Monetary Fund, studying all of these countries and saying that yes, the GST is evaded.

> like other taxes that are basically self-assessment systems, the [GST] requires a firm enforcement system with known and applied penalties, cumulating in (although rarely used), criminal prosecution. Deterrents should exist that increase the risk of underreporting commensurate with the degree of flagrancy and revenue involved.

What is described here is really the building up of a considerable tax police force in order to make sure that this tax is not evaded.

> A taxable person who underreports is, in effect, stealing. He is misusing funds that have been paid by his customers and that belong to the government. For a penalty to improve tax compliance, it must reflect the gravity of the offence and not merely increase the risk for underreporting by more than the cost of borrowing funds (such as interest).

In the previous document I was reading, it was pointed out that the computer might give you some hint that there may be fraud, because a particular trader seems to be selling less or more than he has reported buying. So something might be going wrong. However, a court case cannot be made out of a suspicion. One is going to have to discover evidence, tangible evidence, to bring to court. What we are talking about is a serious effort if you want to avoid tax evasion.

Moreover, if you want a tax not to be evaded, > all taxpayers must be seen to be treated equally. If an enforcement program is consistently directed only at a particular group or class of taxpayer, usually one producing a high yield per audit, that group will eventually lose faith in the fairness of the system and its levels of compliance will be vitiated. Other classes or groups to which little investigation has been devoted will tend to comply less since the risk of detection will be seen to be small.

>
> Some countries have tried to co-opt the taxpayer's own interests to declare his [GST] liability. In Turkey and Bolivia, the trader's [GST] liability is allowed as an offset against a gross income tax. In the Turkish case, the amount allowed to be offset diminishes as income increases so that the concession can be considered progressive but, nevertheless, is still expensive in revenue forgone.
> Of course, public attitudes towards taxation in general, and [GST] in particular, are important. A United Kingdom survey showed that 70 per cent of the sample did not consider it "morally wrong" to pay a trader in cash who volunteered not to charge [GST], and 65 per cent appeared to consider it acceptable behaviour to take cash for work performed to evade [GST] or income tax.

I think I had better repeat this.

> A United Kingdom survey showed that 70 per cent of the sample did not consider it "morally wrong" to pay a trader in cash who volunteered not to charge [GST], and 65 per cent appeared to consider it acceptable behaviour to take cash for work performed to evade [GST] or income tax.

Senator Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: The quotation he just read reminds me of a passage in The Wealth of a Nation. Adam Smith, advocating free trade, both domestic free trade and international free trade, said that the intervention of the government to impose customs duties almost inevitably prompts people who believe in the natural system—that was the term Mr. Smith used to describe a free market—to undertake to evade that tax. Indeed, they felt that evasion of the tax, which was an intervention by the government into the free market economy, was not only economically advantageous to them but was their duty. They were in a sense liberating the providential order of the free market from the intrusion of government. Indeed, I think it fair to say it was the attitude of so-called free traders who felt customs duties were an improper intrusion into the marketplace that led Mr. Smith to develop the economic theory set forth in The Wealth of Nations. He was dealing, it is true, specifically with customs duties.

● (0420)

I wonder, senator, if the same kind of result may take place regarding the GST. In other words, it may well be that people who believe in a free market will say that this kind of tax is an improper intrusion into the providential order of the free market and consequently may decide that not only may they morally evade the tax, but, indeed, since this kind of tax is quite improper as being in contravention of the natural system of the market, it is their duty to evade it.

I wonder if that kind of thinking is likely to be persuasive, common or perhaps really quite extraordinary. Have you read anything in the literature that would bear upon this point?

Senator Gigantès: Thank you for your question, Senator Steward. It does seem that evasion of the GST-type tax around the world is quite prevalent. I just read to you this passage which says: "Seventy per cent of the sample did not consider it morally wrong to pay a trader in cash who volunteered not to charge GST, and 65 per cent appeared to consider it acceptable behaviour to take cash for work performed to evade GST or income tax." This is a survey in Britain which has a form of GST most like the one being proposed here.

Senator Kinsella: How large was the sample and which value-added tax system were the respondents to that questionnaire or survey living under, senator?

Senator Gigantès: This is a U.K. survey that he is quoting. The footnote says it is a survey by The Times of London, on October 28, 1985. How good the survey was, how well chosen the sample, it does not say, but generally The Times does serious work on such things. It hires reputable houses.

You were asking, Senator Stewart, whether people consider that tax is an intrusion on their right to make money. I wonder if you would distinguish between reluctance, annoyance, at having some of their money taken away by the system, or are you talking of such a theoretical addiction to the free market system that they think breaking the law is justified? I am not sure which of the two you are asking.

Senator Stewart: Well, Senator Gigantès, as I recall, smuggling was very common in Scotland in the early part of the 18th century. As a result of the union of the kingdoms in 1707, Scotland came under the English trade laws. That in itself was enough to make many good people break those laws.

If I recall correctly, Sir Walter Scott, in one of his novels, has an elder of the church, the Presbyterian Church whose vocation was to be a smuggler. That man believed that he was doing God's work by smuggling, not only because he was breaking an English law but because he was defending God's providential order, which was the natural economic order.

Undoubtedly, cynics will say that he just wanted to make a lot of money, but I do not think we can dismiss this kind of attitude by that kind of cynical reaction. I believe there are many people, and in my own part of the world I could name some very good people, who take the view that if they want to enter a barter arrangement or a contractual arrangement, without any documentation, of course, with their neighbours for the sale of pulpwood or firewood or lobsters, any such commodity, and avoid the intrusive hand of big government, it is not only economically advantageous but indeed it is almost their duty to do so because they feel they are allowing the market to operate without the distortion of governmental intrusion.

I think we have here a kind of mix of both. There undoubtedly is the kind of motivation which you tend to emphasize, namely the desire to make money, but I think we have to accept the fact that there are many people who engage in relatively simple commercial transactions who feel that once you start imposing taxes on phases of these commercial transactions you are distorting the relationship and that this is immoral.

Therefore, I am protesting somewhat about the quickness with which you dismiss the viewpoint which underlies a great deal of Adam Smith's economic doctrine as simply related to making money. There is an assumption of a providential order here upon which governments ought not to intervene. Of course, the worst intervention Adam Smith mentions, and I ask you to tell us about this, was mercantile legislation which was always, he insisted, prompted by the merchant class who influenced the politicians to set up some sort of protective arrangement for their own narrow benefit rather than allowing the free market to operate so that people could make the best deals and thus achieve natural prices for their commodities.

I ask you to apply that kind of thinking. Is that kind of thinking likely to operate in the late 20th century or have we become so accustomed to the intrusive arm of government that belief in a natural market is no longer operative?

● (0430)

Senator Gigantès: Far be it from me to discount at all the great Scottish ability to find electoral justification for breaking the law.

Also, there is something about invaders and foreign occupiers involved there, and Scotland did not view the English with great friendship at all times. The English did things which justified the Scots during their occupation.

I come from a country that had similar experiences. We were occupied by the Turks for a very long time. The Turks did not believe that being a public servant was a noble enough occupation. They believed that they should be farmers or soldiers.

Senator De Bané: They probably brought in the GST.

Senator Gigantès: No, they had a head tax, where they literally cut off your head if you didn't pay.

The public service of the Turkish Empire was almost entirely Greek. Sometimes, when I find Greek public servants behaving in a manner that makes ours appear models of sweetness and light and co-operativeness, I say, "Please, the Turkish occupation is over. You no longer have to sabotage the state as you did under the Turks. Couldn't you please be reasonable?"

The habit persisted in Greece. There was a village on the island of Cephalonia, which I come from, called Delenata. The Greek gendarmerie stopped trying to force the inhabitants of this village to pay tax on cigarette paper. The village did not want to pay tax on cigarettes. They rolled their own. The government got fed up with that and put a tax on cigarette paper, which the people felt was unfair. But the village of Delenata went further and systematically killed every revenuer who stepped into the village.

I believe there were some similar acts committed in Scotland.

I am not too sure where I can draw the line—and maybe it is a fault of my perception—between finding an intellectual justification for disobeying a bad law and disobeying a bad law in order to make money. The Greek fighters against the Turks called themselves the kleftes which means "thieves". They stole from the Turks, and it was considered a noble act. It was intellectualized as being a proper thing to do because they were fighting a horrid foreign occupier who, moreover, had a different religion from theirs.

My great grandfather was the last in the family to be a pirate. All those before him were pirates. They intellectualized their activities in that they went to sea and raided Turkish merchant vessels, so it was an act of national liberation. They collected money.

I am quite prepared to accept, since it is Adam Smith who says it, that the Scots have a particular perspective on things. They do, generally, don't they?

[Senator Stewart.]

You are trying to draw me into admitting that the good Presbyterian cleric was breaking the law and smuggling in order to teach a moral lesson or to fight for a moral cause, not to increase the wealth of his family. Maybe he was; maybe he wasn't. I don't know.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps, Senator Gigantès, it is a case of two horses teamed up and moving in the same direction. Why do you assume that a man who is trying to make some money to maintain his family is not doing the Lord's work?

If we go back to the history of the doctrine of free trade, which is very different, of course, from mere "free enterprise" which often means "free monopoly" the assumption is that if you allow natural market forces to operate unimpeded it will not only be advantageous to the individuals involved, but will also be collectively advantageous. I believe that is the assumption that underlies the GATT.

I do not know how we can say that the only motivation or, indeed, the leading motivation for a move toward a more efficient economic order is the desire of people to make money. It may well be that the motivation is highly charitable. It may well be that, if we improve the international economic order, it will have highly beneficial effects for people living in Third World countries. Of course, we would have to take it seriously and inflict upon ourselves the consequences of the removal of protectionist barriers. Nevertheless, the result would be beneficial to people in Third World countries who are able to produce commodities of comparable quality at cheaper prices.

I do not know that we have to say that, simply because something is economically advantageous, it has nothing whatsoever to do with more charitable motives.

Let me bring you back to the point of my original question.

The government is proposing to impose a tax on goods and services in Canada. I raised the question of people seeking to avoid customs duties because they believe that those customs duties are contrary to the free market philosophy. The question I ask you is this: Is it conceivable that there will be people in considerable numbers who, by reason of the nature of their enterprises, will have a possibility of avoiding the tax and who will feel that it is morally proper—almost their moral duty—to do so because this is an improper invasion by the government into the natural economic order? That is the question I ask.

Senator Gigantès: It is a very interesting point. We have had such movements in North America, general anti-tax movements. Whether they will do it out of intellectual conviction or whether they will dress up the tax evasion in intellectual clothes is something I do not know. I humbly submit that you do not, either.

Perhaps the survey which is cited in this book should have asked: What are your motives for thinking so? But it did not.

● (0440)

Besides, most surveys that deal with motives, turn out to be very difficult to set up. The question is always in some way a leading question, depending on who the person is. I mean a particular question may not be a leading question for one individual but may be a leading question for another individual. Serious surveys try to avoid motivational questions. So what we have here is a survey that indicates 70 per cent thought it was not morally wrong to pay a tradesman in cash, or to volunteer not to charge GST. Sixty-five per cent appear to consider it acceptable to take cash for work to evade GST or income tax.

Are they doing this because they want the free market system? If they are, how far are they going to carry it out? Are they going to pay no tax?

Even Adam Smith said something—

Senator Stewart: —certain public works.

Senator Gigantès: Certain public works. And you cannot do those without tax.

So, who decides how much must be done through tax?

Senator Stewart: While we are talking of Adam Smith, may I ask you this question: Of course it is true, as you say Senator Gigantès, that Adam Smith says there are certain functions which ought to be provided by the government. He then raises the question of how revenue is to be obtained by the government so as to be able to pay for these services.

In his discussion of taxes, if I recall correctly, Smith emphatically condemns taxes on "the necessities of life." His argument, if I recall correctly, is that a tax on the necessities of life always has one of two effects and perhaps both.

First, it depresses the living conditions of the honest, the industrious labouring poor. Alternatively, it has the effect of increasing the price of the commodity produced, which will have a deleterious effect upon consumption within the kingdom and on the export of goods and products from the kingdom to foreign markets.

Consequently, he argues in favour of a consumption tax, but it is to be a heavy tax on luxury goods. As I recall—

Senator Gigantès: Caviar.

Senator Stewart: He does not specify caviar, but I was speculating the other evening that Mr. Smith would know how to vote on the amendment to impose a heavy tax on the big cars, which burn up so much gasoline, and which take so much space on our streets, and so on. He would have known very well, because that amendment was perfectly consistent with his economic theory and his desire to suppress conspicuous consumption, which of course flies in the face of sound economic thought.

I ask you this question: Assuming that, as you say, there has to be revenue for the state to provide certain services, should we not take a sound a laissez-faire attitude towards these matters? Should we not begin by imposing a very heavy tax so that those who use these luxuries, who drive around in these vast automobiles, will have the advantage of advertising to all and sundry how very wealthy they are, because everybody will know that the vehicle cost not $50,000, but perhaps $120,000? The modern example is Singapore, where you have to pay several thousand dollars simply to get a licence to put an automobile on the road. Consequently, owning an automobile has become a status symbol so that people compete avidly in order to drive around in an automobile.

If we have to have a tax on consumption goods and services, ought not that tax, following Adam Smith's line of thought, to start on luxury consumption goods at a very, very high level, and is it not in fact a damaging intervention, as Mr. Smith argues, to impose that tax upon the necessities of life? As I said, a tax on necessities depresses the conditions of the industrious labouring poor, or alternatively, by raising labour costs raises the price of commodities, which must have an effect on the balance of trade.

Senator Gigantès: I do not think that anybody has sufficiently studied what impact a heavy tax on luxuries would have in this country. I think that is one of the things that Mr. Chrétien's committee on taxation should study. Certainly those who can afford to pay $100,000 for a car can pay $200,000 for a car. Generally you do not even consider a $100,000 car unless you are very rich or very foolish. Those who are foolish enough to buy a car they cannot afford, well they should learn a lesson; the bank will teach them the lesson after a time. But those who have a lot of money, like some of our colleagues who drive Jaguars, they can pay twice the price for one of those Jaguars and not even know it.

Senator Stewart: It is even better. It is a more conspicuous consumption.

Senator Gigantès: Well, it depends which generation they are. If they are first generation rich like Mr. Mulroney, they want to go ahead and do conspicuous consumption. If they are third generation rich, then they have learned to be a little more discreet about it, and they go around with battered hats on Sundays, and scuffed shoes.

Senator Stewart: What you say, senator, reminds me of an experience I once had. I will ask you if you have ever had an experience like this?

I was at a party in White Plains, New York. Mr. Rockefeller was one of the other guests. We were looking at his automobile, which was a rather shaggy old Cadillac. Someone said, "I would have thought that Mr. Rockefeller would have had a better car". The chauffeur leaned back in great dignity and said, "Mr. Rockefeller does not need to have a flashy car." I wonder if you have ever had an experience like that?

Senator Gigantès: This is common in Britain. It is almost a joke. The British upper class on Sundays does not shave and wears tweed jackets with holes in the elbows.

Senator Corbin: Like some Canadian senators I know. I do not consider myself upper class, but I dress like that on Sundays to feel comfortable.

Senator Gigantès: You dress like that on Sundays? Well now that I am moved to the country, I am forced to do that.

I think a study on the revenue production of consumption of luxury items would not be a bad idea. It deserves to be looked at. But that is not the philosophy of this government. The philosophy of this government is to tax the necessities and to exempt luxury items. Caviar is exempt. You know, a four-ounce can of yogurt is not, but caviar is exempt. Yet, when we asked in an amendment that you raise the taxes on expensive cars and other luxury items, you turned down the amendment.

• (0450)

Senator Corbin: Think of the poor fisherman who catches the sturgeon to extract the caviar. He is not rich. There is caviar produced in New Brunswick from the lower stretches of the Saint John River. Perhaps you did not know that. It is of excellent quality.

Senator Gigantès: Really?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: Where can one get some?

Senator Corbin: Well, I do not have the address currently but I know of friends in Montreal who get their supply from New Brunswick every year.

Senator Gigantès: Well, if you could obtain the address, you would be performing a service for me. I learned to like caviar in prison camp in Korea. I was a prisoner for thirty-three months.

One day we saw in the outdoor privy a piece of newspaper which showed a chin and a piece of very characteristic moustache with a piece of black border around the picture. We said, "Stalin's dead!" We had been eating boiled millet and wearing rags. Three weeks later, a colonel arrived with one of those four imperial gallon gasoline tins full of caviar. That is when we knew we were to be liberated. They fattened us up. It was not a bad idea to start us on caviar because we were starved and caviar is full of protein and very easy to digest. I acquired a terrific taste for caviar then but I cannot afford to satisfy it now. You tell me that the caviar from New Brunswick is pretty good, and I assume it is less expensive than Iranian caviar.

Senator Corbin: It does not come cheaply but it is of excellent quality.

Senator Gigantès: Maybe I can afford a small jar every three months or so.

Senator Corbin: I am talking about a big jar. I will get you the address.

Senator Gigantès: Get me the address. Maybe you could convince a rich Tory from New Brunswick to give me a jar.

Senator Corbin: Oh, no, I do not think they even know it exists in New Brunswick. You would have to be from Montreal to know that you can get a supply of caviar from New Brunswick.

Senator Gigantès: We Quebecers know a good thing when we see it. We have not been able to get very much beyond this survey that shows 70 per cent of the sample did not consider it morally wrong to pay a trader in cash or volunteer not to charge GST and sixty-five per cent appeared to consider it acceptable behaviour to take cash for work performed to evade GST or income tax.

[Senator Gigantès.]

> In another survey of those who tried to evade tax, on a scale of one (never) to ten (always), the Irish scored 3.35, compared with a European average of 2.64; moreover, the sample indicated that the younger the person the more likely he is to take a casual view of tax evasion (the index for the 18-24 age group was 4.05, compared with 2.11 for those over 75).

Those over 75 are more afraid of tangling with the authorities than are the young.

> Although prevention of tax evasion within the EC remains primarily the responsibility of the national authorities, the Community has issued two Council Directives, one for mutual assistance in the exchange of information and the other for mutual assistance in the recovery of VAT. Increasing rates for VAT make the tax conspicuous and make successful evasion all the more valuable to trader and public alike.

By the way, in other parts of this book it is said that nowhere was the tax introduced and not later increased. The money machine is too tempting.

Forms of evasion. Now, before anybody shouts that I am trying to teach people how to evade the tax, let me say that this book is widely available and I am quoting.

> Traders who are liable to [GST] but do not register.

That is one of the most prevalent forms of evasion.

> Traders have an obligation to assess their trading turnover (or whatever other criteria used to establish the [GST] threshold . . .) and if they qualify, they must register for [GST]. If traders initially are not within the [GST] limits, most legislation requires traders to notify the authorities either ex post when sales exceed the limit, and even, in some cases, when there are reasonable grounds to believe that sales in the coming 12 months will exceed the annual threshold. The problem of evasion is created when traders who should register do not.
> This means that although they pay [GST] on their purchases, their sales are not liable. Their value added, therefore, escapes [GST] and they are in a better competitive position than those who pay tax. The government loses revenue.
> On the whole, this is a minor problem because, principally, only small traders will fail to register (although not only small, that is, "special" traders in Korea, as the penalties show in Table 14-1) and relatively little revenue is at risk. Another, perhaps larger problem, is those traders who are outside the approved legal structure, such as bookmakers, operators of sauna parlors, and call girls. As one government's internal document put it, "These individuals also could be liable but probably will not register."

I wonder if we are going to have legislation introduced to have call girls and bookmakers registered.

Exaggerating the refund claims; that is another form of fraud.

> One of the simplest ways to evade that [GST] is to inflate the claims to deduct [GST] paid at earlier stages. In the Netherlands it has been estimated that 44 per cent of all [GST] fraud involved fake claims for prior-stage tax. The simplest method is to fabricate fake invoices for purchases never made. Indeed, businesses have been established solely to invent and print false invoices for sale to those wishing to defraud the revenue. Clearly, there is a limit to the scope for this as too many fake invoices would squeeze the taxable values to the point where the authorities would become suspicious and, in any case, audit would identify the fraudulent invoice.
> A more complicated but more remunerative (and riskier), device to claim fake refunds is when a new business is started, because then the authorities could expect [GST] deductions to exceed [GST] liability since there would be large purchases of capital equipment and raw materials. Most authorities will pay refunds quickly to avoid squeezing business liquidity; this can mean that before the time comes around for an audit the firm goes out of business and disappears. For this reason, among others, some countries will not make large refunds—especially to newly established traders—without first checking the complex authenticity of the claims.

Here is another instance where if they want to avoid evasion, the authorities in Canada are going to have considerable compliance and surveillance costs.

> Unrecorded Cash Purchases
> Small traders (and sometimes large ones) will buy goods from a primary (unregistered) supplier, such as a farmer, and because the transaction is not recorded, the purchaser will be able to sell the goods without charging [GST] and no record will exist. In general, this is not a serious problem because most purchasers will want to record the sale to claim the [GST] as credit. But if the production chain is short, which it frequently is . . . then this can become a major form of evasion.
>
> Credit claimed for invoices from unregistered suppliers.
> Credit for [GST] paid on inputs can only be claimed when the purchase is made from a registered supplier. An unregistered supplier could be an exempt or a small trader, perhaps already enjoying a special treatment for [GST], or it could simply be a private person. The input purchases may be perfectly valid and it may be that the purchase does actually involve paying a price inclusive of [GST] that is impossible to claim because the supplier is unregistered. That is just too bad. If the trader who has purchased from the unregistered supplier pretends that the purchase invoice has a [GST] number, or creates an imaginary [GST] number, the authorities are defrauded.

● (0500)

> The sums involved are unlikely to be great, since less suppliers will be registered. Nevertheless the practice is illegal.

And so on.

> Credit notes on purchases including GST are not shown on the returns.

That is another way.

> Credit Claims for Taxable Supplies Used in Exempt Activities: If a business is wholly exempt, no credit can be claimed. The problem arises when a trader is selling both taxable and exempt goods and services. It may prove quite easy to divert purchased inputs on which VAT credit is claimed against taxed sales to help produce and sell exempt items. The problem is that some such decisions can be, in all good faith, extremely uncertain. The VAT content on the capital purchase of a shop and its equipment should be split between the sales that are exempt (say on processed food) and the rest that are taxable; in this case, the VAT authorities may simply allow the credit in direct proportion to the split between taxable and exempt sales. It is much more difficult when the same raw materials may be inputs to exempt and taxable outputs, and some traders may deliberately offset more credit against VAT than was actually involved.
> Credit Claimed for Purchases That Are Not Creditable: The best-known example of this type of fraud is the credit claimed for an automobile for business purposes when, in fact, it is used for nonbusiness purposes and should be classified as nondeductible.

[Translation]

Senator De Bané: Would my colleague allow me to ask a question?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, please do.

Senator De Bané: These excerpts and other papers written by specialists lead us to think that the administration of this law is going to be extremely complex. The fact that a large number of people have been hired to implement the system, that all provincial governments but one refuse to get involved in collecting this tax, and the fact that it is completely different from those that exist in other countries, lead many people to conclude that it will be extremely difficult to have an open system where taxpayers, businessmen and businesses will be able to figure out what is expected of them.

I know that you, sir, have studied the matter in depth and notwithstanding the hundreds of millions of dollars that are being spent to put this administrative apparatus in place, in light of the provisions of the law itself and of the procedures that will have to apply, in light of the fact that provincial governments refuse to participate, and of the fact that the system has many exemptions, some of which you have mentioned, that seem to depend on irrational criteria, do you think that the government, who think that the GST is going to solve all of their problems, are going to be able to raise all of the tax revenue they expect to raise with this tax?

Senator Gigantès: There is another aspect to be considered. If the government manages to derive those benefits immediately, in a recession, that will make the situation worse. The recession will cause a decrease in its tax revenue, and will be tempted, as have many other countries have been, to increase the tax rate to make up its losses and fill its coffers. This increased revenue will again make the economic situation worse. That is one of the negative aspects of a consumption tax, coupled with a progressive income tax, if you will: it is sensitive to the economic situation but not to unavoidable necessary expenses.

If my income decreases, I pay less tax, and that fact allows me to survive, if not to prosper; but if I am forced to pay tax on necessities, on things which I cannot avoid, such as the dentist when I have a raging toothache, and if at the same time my income is in a decline because of the recession, I will have less money to invest in my business and get it back on its feet. In that sense it is a regressive tax and it hurts the economy. All consumption taxes hurt the economy in that way, and they hit hardest when things are not going well, so it is when things are in a downturn that we must avoid imposing that kind of tax. That is one of the reasons why I supported Senator Waters' amendment to postpone the tax for a year; economists, even those of the Milton Freidman's school, will tell you that you do not introduce a new tax, especially not a consumption tax, when the economy is in a downturn.

So will the government recover its costs? The answer depends on the economy and how it evolves, and on whether they really keep the rate at the current proposed level. What has happened in other countries is that governments have increased the rate. They could have brought in other kinds of consumption taxes that would have been cheaper to collect. The tax introduced by New Zealand has not changed things from that perspective. The example that they always give is that of the New Zealand business man who says at the end of the quarter: I had $100,000 in sales, so I owe $7,000 tax, but I bought $90,000 worth of taxable materials, and you owe me a $6,300 refund for the tax I paid on them. So I owe you $700. There is no new accounting involved, and the government has no additional monitoring to do. The process is the same as before the tax was introduced.

They can use their computers to see whether someone is defrauding them systematically and carry out ordinary inspections. They can even do cross-checking, by comparing a businessman's income tax return and his turnover. We could have used that simple model. But no, we had to go and get all the most complicated, difficult and convoluted aspects of the British system.

Now, there are a lot of things in Great Britain that I am very fond of, but they do have a way of making things complicated: for instance, finding an address in London, if you do not already know where you are going, is maddening! Cumberland Square, Cumberland Close, Cumberland Street, Cumberland Avenue, Cumberland whatever, and then you have number 17 following number 1, after which you have number 32 and then number 2. You really have to have been there before to be able to find a place, and their consumption tax system also seems to be caracterized by this amazing British complexity.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (0510)

[English]

We will come back to the study on value-added tax conducted by the International Monetary Fund. Credit for the GST paid on input can only be paid on purchases made by a registered supplier. Apparently, there are people who buy from an unregistered supplier who invent a GST number in the hopes that they will not be caught, and most of them are not.

Credit notes on purchases including GST not shown on returns is another way—

Senator Phillips: Could the honourable senator speak somewhat louder, please? We are having difficulty hearing him over here.

Senator Gigantès: Is the Honourable Senator Phillips wearing a hearing aid? I think he should take the trouble to wear one. If his does not work, I can send mine over. It works very well.

I must preserve my voice. There is nothing in the rules that says I have to speak more loudly than I wish to speak.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry I asked.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. That is what is so nice about Senator Phillips. He really is a friendly and splendid fellow to have around. He does not get into any unnecessary quarrels with any of us. After a while I am sure that his colleagues will learn how very well liked he is by all of us because of his habits.

Senator Phillips, where is Senator Simard, now that I need him?

Senator Phillips: He will be arriving at 7 o'clock.

Senator Gigantès: There is no problem after that.

Senator Phillips: He will hold your hand all day.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: You said that the imposition of this tax while a full-blown recession is under way was of very grave concern. Allow me to play devil's advocate for a moment to tell you what Pierre Fortin, the economist, said recently, and I quote:

[English]

> . . . there is general agreement that the economy will adjust to the introduction of the 7-per cent GST through a temporary mini-stagflation: inflation and unemployment will be higher for a while. There will be a one-time effect of about 1.5 per cent on the general price level as measured, say, by the Consumer Price Index. Based on past experience, most analysts believe that both the elimination of the MST and the imposition of the GST will be fully passed through to the consumer. They also think that the wage response to the CPI increase, if any, will be small, and that the Bank of Canada will, accordingly, let the price shock go through without any further monetary tightening. My own view is strongly supportive of this consensus, which amounts to saying that on the inflation front the GST justifies caution, but not pessimism. There is more uncertainty about the 1991-92 impact of the GST on production. The assessment here depends on the assumed timing of the negative impact on consumption compared to that of the positive impact on net exports and investment. But the consensus provides for a slight increase of real GDP and a slight increase in the aggregate unemployment rate over 1991-92.

[Translation]

And what strikes me is that he says that in his opinion:

[English]

> . . . the proposed GST package is solidly progressive: it redistributes income from upper-middle and upper income families to lower-middle and lower income families. There are two fundamental reasons for this outcome. First, the Sales Tax Credit (STC) brings about a substantial reduction of the tax burden on lower-middle and low income families. Second, the shift from the MST, which is a tax on goods, to the GST, which is a tax on both goods and services, increases the relative tax burden of upper-middle and upper income families, because the rich spend proportionately more on services and less on goods than the poor. One negative aspect is that the progressivity of the GST package is least pronounced among two-adult families with children. I want to point out in passing that the decision of not taxing basic groceries makes the GST less, not more, progressive. If basic groceries were taxed, the incomes of poor families would be unaffected because they would get an offsetting increase in their STC. But the incomes of rich families would fall by the full amount of the tax. Hence, taxing basic food would have made the system more, not less, progressive. On reflection . . .

[Translation]

But then, after having explained why he is in favour of that measure, he wonders why everyone is against it. He of course blames the government's communication strategy, saying that it was very poor. He then says that all countries share a peculiarity, which is that whenever a tax reform is discussed people talk about costs rather than benefits. He thinks that the government has probably misjudged the situation but feels that this is a progressive tax, whereas you have clearly shown that it is a regressive tax, in spite of the credits that will be paid to individuals of modest means.

Of course, someone who makes a $2,000 purchase has already spent a $140 simply for the privilege of making that purchase. Thus, it is quite clear that the credits which low-income persons will receive from governments will not compensate for the additional burden they will have to bear. As several people have demonstrated, everything depends on the situations chosen as benchmarks by the Department of Finance.

If they had taken the case of a couple earning $15,000 a year who in one year had to buy a refrigerator, a stove, a washing machine and a dryer, aside from everything else, it would become quite obvious that the credit they would receive from the government would not offset all of the taxes they would have had to pay.

But of course, if they supposed that the couple would not make any major purchases during the year, it became much easier to claim that the credit they will receive will be quite adequate to offset their additional tax burden. But, be that as it may, I would be very interested in hearing my colleague's comments on the matter.

Senator Gigantès: Firstly, let me say that I believe Professor Fortin wrote this paper when the government was still expecting what is known as a "soft landing", that is to say a much milder recession than the one we seem to be heading into. Now, because of the severe recession that seems to be hitting the United States, we are going to have more serious problems.

It is all well and good to say that this will improve our exports, while even with an 86-cent dollar, our export situation was dismal. We cannot look at these things in isolation. Someone asked me earlier what I would have propose. I would have suggested that we set interest rates at the same level as the United States, which would have meant a lower dollar, which would in turn have helped our exports much more than the GST ever will. That is the first argument.

My second argument is that Professor Fortin, like most of those who support the GST, has not taken the administrative costs of small businesses into account. I have read studies to you that show that these costs will reach 9.3% of their turnover, an expense for which these small businesses will receive no compensation. They are not going to absorb that 9.3%; they will pass it on to their customers. So the customers may be receiving a 7% refund, but they are going to have to pay an additional 9.3% to offset the additional administrative costs imposed on the convenience store, for instance, or on various other stores.

And then, consider the case of a student who has a $7,000 annual income. He has been advised that he will be receiving a $67 tax refund cheque every quarter. So, that would be $268 more per year. But take 7% of his $7,000, and you will put things in perspective. He spends everything. This student will buy taxable foods such as a sandwich and a small container of yogourt. This type of thing is taxable, as you know. So on his $7,000, he will pay $490 in tax, while his refund will only amount to $268.

The figures speak for themselves. The GST is supposed to solve all of those problems, but it does not. I see a new group of collegues has come in. I will give them a more general presentation, rather than going into details, and get into specifics later.

Senator De Bané: I would like to ask a single question; may I?

Senator Gigantès: Please go ahead, my friend.

Senator De Bané: His proposals make Mr. Fortin a strong advocate of the consumption tax concept. As I have the floor, perhaps my collegue could sit down.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

Senator De Bané: In fact, referring to one of Maurice Halley's ideas—Mr. Halley was awarded the Nobel Prize for Economics—involving the taxing of capital and monetary reform in 1977, he advocates the following idea: the abolition of personal income taxes and of taxes on corporate profits.

So what he is proposing, really, is the following idea: the complete abolition of personal and corporate income tax, which would be replaced by a much higher GST on all consumer products and durable goods. He says:

● (0520)

[English]

> This would mean replacing the current taxation of wealth-generating activities such as work, production and saving by the taxation of wealth-consuming activities.

[Translation]

So, he suggests that we abolish personal and corporate income tax and introduce a 25% GST. He states:

[English]

> Progressivity of the tax system could then be retained through the provision of a universal tax credit (say, of $20,000 to $30,000) reflecting basic family needs. A simple, low, flat, fair, and globally competitive tax system would emerge.

[Translation]

Of course, he says:

[English]

> This is only one possibility, but one that I consider highly attractive and feasible. We may have a number of steps to go before we can get there. But what we need, and right now, is a long-term integrated vision of what we want our tax system to attain in a globally competitive world environment. The most important problem with the current episode of tax reform may precisely be that we were not offered any such vision in which to interpret the various elements put forward.

[Translation]

I do not know what my honourable colleague thinks of these ideas, which are at the very least thought provoking.

Senator Gigantès: Well, I think economists, and Milton Friedman heads the list, have always been attracted to simple solutions. And Mr. Fortin's proposals are simple: we provide tax credits and by the same token ensure a guaranteed minimum income. The whole thing is quite simple.

As Mr. Parizeau expressed it, there is a threshold above which people pay taxes, and below which they receive subsidies from the government. But what is included? Do you include old age pensions, unemployment insurance and and workmen's compensation?

I looked into that. I asked the Library of Parliament's Economic Research Branch to examine the issue. What they found is that we would not have a simple system. If it were simple, the system would also be very unfair. That is the way things are. If you start from the premise that we want to contain the costs of our social safety net at current levels, and if it takes the form of a universal guaranteed minimum income system, old age pensioners would suddenly find themselves with a reduced income. There would be cuts in that area.

The unemployed would also see their benefits cut, even though they might have contributed for many years and never been out of work before suddenly finding themselves in that position. And their benefits would be cut! The only ones to benefit from the system would be those who are receiving welfare payments. It would not help the working poor very much at all.

So the young economists of the Milton Friedman school were forced to conclude that the complex system we now have may be inevitable and that complexity is not always necessarily a bad thing. And what Mr. Fortin is proposing is intellectually pleasing, orderly, neat, and is in fact quite similar to what Calder proposed a few years ago and to the ideas of Milton Friedman. Simple methods cost less to administer.

But in this study I had carried out, which you may obtain from the Library of Parliament's Research Branch, what became apparent was that administrative costs would not be reduced because there would be so many exceptions.

Your only other option is to decide to implement an unfair system. You would have to say to the elderly: "We are very sorry, pensioners, but we are going to cut your old age pension so that everyone below a certain threshold has the same income". If that does not appeal to you, for heaven's sake why choose the elderly as a target group? Would you rather say to someone who has contributed to the unemployment insurance fund for 25 years and suddenly finds himself out of work: "No, you are not going to receive the maximum benefits you are entitled to, you are going to receive less"?

That person could go to court and say: "Listen, I was promised a certain protection and that promise is being broken. And yet, I kept my end of the bargain, I paid into the fund." So, what Professor Fortin is proposing is very difficult to implement. It would be nice if we could do it, but unfortunately we can't.

Then there is another objection. If we set up a system that abolished income tax and taxed consumption only, in my opinion, we would be depriving ourselves of one of the tools to fight inflation which I have referred to here before. That is not my idea; it has been put forward by several economists, most recently by Robert R. Growner and Lester Perrault in a book they have written.

According to them, the way to fight inflation is not to increase interest rates but, in periods which the Bank of Canada or the Federal Bank in the United States consider truly inflationist, the bank may declare any increase in income of more than five per cent from one year to the next, which it can assess from your tax return, to be irregular. Anything above five per cent would be taken from you in its entirety. That is one way of doing things, although some people will certainly say: This is unfair, why are you doing this? But as an inflation fighting strategy, it is actually less destructive than high interest rates. High interest rates hit the construction industry hard, and have a negative effect on all businesses that operate with borrowed working capital.

They go to the bank . . . someone who is building a house for me borrows money from the bank for a few days in order to pay sub-contractors and purchase materials. I pay him at the end of the month, but in the meantime he operates with a loan. If you increase interest rates, you may bankrupt him. This is one of the reasons we are seeing so many bankruptcies these days. Combine that with a recession and you have a catastrophe.

As I see that a new group of people have come in opposite, I see that I will have to go over all of this again, and I will give each new group I see the same benefit. Fortunately Senator Castonguay is staying on, in deep concentration like a good little boy doing his assignment in grade school.

Let me tell the newcomers that there is a scheme to this presentation, which will last a long time—not the newcomers in the sense of the new senators, but in the sense of the new shift. This is a general presentation which will deal with the faults of Tory policy in general. I will be reading later from a book entitled: Conservative Illusion. Of course, it is a very old illusion.

I will begin with what is wrong with the GST, in particular, and point out that it is impossibly complicated. The costs of the administration falling on the traders, approximately 9.3 per cent, will fall ultimately on the consumers. They will also be an inflationary influence overlooked by most economists cited by the government.

It could be a simpler consumption tax. It is possible to design a comsumption tax to replace the manufacturers' sales tax without penalizing exporters and without making it so complicated that it is going to drive people nuts. I have given you some examples of the complications.

I will give you a synopsis of the GST, and then I will go back to specifics.

In the June 1987 white paper on sales tax reform, the government criticized the existing manufacturers' sales tax for its narrow base, widely different effects on prices and complexity, among other problems. The government's white paper also proposed that a multi-stage sales tax be substituted for the existing federal sales tax. However, it recognized that compliance costs under the multi-stage tax depend critically on two factors: the breadth of the tax base and the structure of tax rates. Complexity would increase if the base were selective or if different rates were applied to different products.

On the question of fairness, the government's white paper stated that one dimension was the treatment of sectors and firms so that the tax would not confer any unfair competitive advantage or disadvantage. Fair tax treatment of different products and low compliance costs were among the government's intended goals in designing a multi-stage sales tax. It would be useful to compare the results of this sales tax reform with the government's stated goals. I did not state the goals of the government; the government stated them.

Under the GST, basic groceries, prescription drugs and medical devices are among the supplies designated as tax-free. This creates differential taxation of similar products and leads to tax inequities among competing products. For instance, the government's August 1989 technical paper acknowledged:

> No matter how the lines are drawn, the great variety of food products makes it virtually impossible to remove every possible anomaly.

If I had been wording that, I would have been worried about having "possible" appear twice. Euphonically it is bad, but what can one do? This is a government.

The truth of this statement was borne out in the testimony received by the third banking committee. The committee heard that yogurt would be taxable when purchased in single servings. This is one of those aberrations. However, it will be tax free when packaged for sale in multiples of single servings. So, if you buy a pair, it is not taxed; if you buy one, it is. According to the National Dairy Council most yogurt is purchased by Canadians in single servings, not multiple servings. It is difficult to understand why basic foods, such as yogurt, should be taxable. Ice cream, ice milk, sherbert, frozen yogurt or frozen puddings would also be taxable when sold in single servings, but not in packages of multiple servings.

The other example involves cookies and other sweetened baked goods, which are taxable when sold in packages of less than six items, but are non-taxable when sold in packages of more than five items.

Listen to the following sentence. It is from the government regulations:

> Cookies and other sweetened baked goods are taxable when sold in packages of less than six items, but non-taxable when sold in packages of more than five items. At the same time, chocolate confectionaries, such as chocolate bars, would be taxable under the GST, regardless of the number of items in the package. As we heard in the textimony, differential taxation of cookies and confectionaries is unfair, given that these products compete directly, and that their ingredients and nutritional content is similar.

The Canadian Soft Drink Association brought another inequity to the attention of the committee members. They noted that carbonated beverages would be taxable under the GST, but that ice tea, flavoured mineral water, and coffee, would not be taxable. Can somebody please explain why? The Canadian Soft Drink Association believes that taxing similar competing products differently is discriminatory. And it is.

Also, food sold by take-out establishments would be taxable. That means food that is consumed by most university and CEGEP students. Yet grocery stores sell prepared foods which are in every respect the same except that these require heating. For example, frozen pizza purchased in a grocery store would be tax free, but when delivered by Pizza Pizza, it would be taxable. It must have something to do with temperature. Popcorn is taxed when it is hot, it is not taxed when it is cold. Pizza is taxed when it is hot, it is not taxed when it is cold. There must be some kind of preference for cold. It is strange.

How is it fair that caviar sold in an upscale delicatessen would be GST free, yet a hamburger—

Senator Corbin: Caviar.

Senator Gigantès: Caviar comes from virgin sturgeon. Virgin sturgeon is a very fine fish.

If you buy a hamburger at McDonald's, you pay 7 per cent.

Furthermore, businesses classified as "eating establishments" would be taxable on the sale of all food and drink except for food sold in a form not suitable for immediate consumption; or, the sweetened baked goods contained in a package of more than five items.

The Quaker Oats Company takes issue with the taxation of granola products. As proposed, the GST would not apply to granola products that are sold primarily as breakfast cereals. The tax would apply to granola bars, even when these were sold in a package of more than five items. Can anybody explain this to me? The government witnesses could not. We asked them. They did not know.

It would seem logical that if cookies are not taxable in packages of more than five items, granola bars should be afforded the same treatment. After all, it could be argued that the contents of a granola bar meets the nutritional description of basic groceries more closely than do cookies. Yet granola bars in packages of five or more are taxed. Cookies in packages of five or more are not taxed.

Furthermore, granola bars compete directly with cookies, which would not be taxable when sold in multiples of more than five items.

In various snack foods; the GST would apply to sales of salted nuts or seeds, but not to unsalted nuts or seeds sold for human consumption. Is it to try to discourage the consumption of salt? I asked that question. I was told that they did not know why they did it like that. When sold for other than human consumption, (i.e., birdseed) these items would be taxable. It is not specified in the regulations whether if you give salted nuts to birds, those are taxable too.

To further complicate the system, snack mixtures that contain cereals, nuts, seeds, dried fruit, or any other edible products, would be taxable, except when sold as a breakfast cereal.

The lack of logic in this situation is the bad feature. A tax law should not be so absurd that the people do not understand why it is so. It should not be written so that one may break it by inadvertence.

The GST would unfairly discriminate against some types of health care services and against certain kinds of health care providers. For instance, long-term care facilities are treated differently, according to their ownership or funding. Public sector facilities such as chronic care hospitals and municipal homes for the aged would be exempt from the GST and would be eligible for a rebate of 83 per cent of the tax paid on purchases. Other non-profit nursing homes would be exempt from the GST, but would receive only a 50 per cent rebate of the tax paid as services. Nursing homes operating for profit would also not be taxable for their supplies, but would not receive any rebate of the tax paid on their purchases.

Can any of the senators opposite explain this? Perhaps I can give you the paper and maybe someone who has recently been a public servant, and has had contact with the strange birds that inhabit Finance, could explain. Senator Kinsella, would you volunteer for such a thing? To explain Finance to me?

• (0550)

Health care services offered by one of the practitioners recognized in Bill C-62 would be exempt from the GST. The list of the recognized health care practitioner services include physician services, nursing services, dental services, optometric services, chiropractic services, physiotherapy services, chiropodic services, paediatric services, osteopathic services, audiological services, speech therapy services, occupational therapy services, psychological services and dental hygienist services.

However, the Senate Banking Committee heard that the services of a number of other health care practitioners would be taxable under the GST. This list includes psychoanalytical psychotherapists for children. Why should a therapist for children be taxed and an audiologist giving his service to a child not be taxed?

Senator Frith: Senator Gigantès, could I ask if you would be able to distinguish, while listing these taxable and non-taxable services, the difference between what they call an input tax and a tax to the client or the patient or the customer. I think during the hearings it is a distinction that many found a little difficult to understand. Because of the study that Senator Gigantès has done, he might very well be in a position to help clarify that point by illustration of individual examples.

I am speaking now of services rather than of products. I understand that input is taxable on some services. For example, services that a physician receives that are part of his operating costs are subject to tax, but that tax is not passed onto the patient. In other words, the service itself is not taxable. I may be wrong about this; that is why I am asking. It may be that Senator Gigantès does not have an answer to this.

As I understand it, there are services provided to the physician—distinguishing "to the physician" and "by the physician"—that are taxable. Therefore, his cost of doing business in almost every item is taxable. The actual bill that he passes onto the patient will have no tax appearing on that bill.

That does not mean, of course, that the customer does not end up paying the tax. A doctor has to adjust his fees accordingly, in order to take into account his increased cost of doing business.

I wonder if that distinction is relevant, at this time, to the information that Senator Gigantès is giving us.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, honourable senator. It is relevant in the sense that if your input is taxable but your output is not; you cannot claim a tax refund. As you pointed out, of course, the fee will have to go up to cover that. In effect, the practitioner or anyone giving a service who does not impose the 7 per cent tax, but who has been taxed on all the equipment and materials he uses, will not be able to recover the tax. Supposing he spends $10,000 on materials such as the little sticks for depressing the tongues, paper towels or whatever; with tax at 7 per cent, that would be an additional $700. He cannot recover that $700 so he will put it on the fee.

This means that "non-taxable" is a myth. You cannot expect the practitioner to absorb this cost. He will pass it on by increasing the price of the fee. Instead of recovering the input tax from the government, he will recover it from his customer.

These non-taxable services are a myth. Or to use a word that colleagues opposite have used with regard to my french text, a fraud. Does that satisfy you?

Senator Frith: That is very helpful. Thank you.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. Do not take your shoes off because it is difficult to put them back on later.

Senator Frith: No. I am just tying up my laces.

Senator Gigantès: We have a question of fair taxation of health care products. Under the GST, prescription drugs are tax free, while drugs obtained over the counter are taxable. Some drugs such as acetylsalicylic acid, which is aspirin, can be obtained either over the counter or by prescription. Despite the GST, drugs obtained over the counter should be lower in price because there is no dispensing fee. However, since prescription drugs are often subsidized by a private or public drug insurance plan, the application of GST to drugs purchased over the counter will increase the incentive to obtain drugs by prescription.

We complain that people use medical services when there is no need. Therefore, the cost of medicare goes up. Here we have a measure that is going to encourage more people to use medicare. Somebody suffering from a mild form of arthritis who, up until now, has been buying aspirin over the counter, will suddenly be told that if you obtain a doctor's prescription, it is not taxed.

You could drive me nuts with those bells; is it an alarm clock or is it your cellular phone, senator?

Senator Corbin: My alarm clock. I thought I could sleep tonight but you kept me awake.

Senator Gigantès: With this tax, we will encourage greater use of physicians' services. Therefore, it will increase the cost of medicare. It might be arguable that it will increase the cost of medicare more than the government derives from taxing these health care products. Therefore, the government loses.

The uneven application of the GST will also send different price signals to the market, depending on the means used for birth control. Under Bill C-62, birth control pills are zero-rated, which is tax free. Since these are obtained by prescription, abortions and vasectomies are exempt. This means they could still bear a degree of tax, because there will be no input tax credits. The price will be passed on to the customer, so to speak, as you said earlier.

Condoms will be fully taxable. At a time when we have a national scare about AIDS, we have advertisements for condom use, and children are being taught by personalities in schools about condom use, could someone explain why we tax them? We want people to use them, but we tax them. Is it that we prefer vasectomies to condoms? A vasectomy does not help in preventing AIDS.

Fair Taxation of Education: Bill C-62 would exempt credit courses towards a diploma, a degree or course in English or French, or occupational training. It would tax other non-credit courses. Thus, tuition fees for training in other languages besides English or French would be taxable. We live in an open economy. We want to trade with the world and to be able to be competitive abroad. We want to send Canadians to other countries to work for Canadian companies which promote Canadian products elsewhere. We are going to tax training in those other languages.

• (0600)

It would seem to me that we should at least exempt Japanese, German and Spanish, and Russian—some of the east European languages. These are new, great markets that are opening up. But the government is going to make the learning of languages that would help us penetrate those markets taxable.

Representatives from several groups told the committee that the taxation of non-credit courses was unacceptable. The Alberta Association for Continuing Education noted that non-credit learning courses are no longer offered purely as hobbies, but are intended to satisfy objectives related to employment and career plans for personal, family and community development. The Canadian Federation of Students stated that education is inherently beneficial to society regardless of whether the courses have credit or non-credit designation.

Another item is the compliance costs which I talked about earlier. Compliance costs to the Value Added Taxes, the GST: suppliers of exempt and non-exempt goods and services must apportion their inputs in order to claim input tax credits on purchases used to produce taxable supplies. If you sold birth-control pills and a condom from the same cash register, you bought this cash register, you are entitled to a credit on the tax because it is an input. But you are entitled to a credit only on the tax for only those items that are taxable, that go through your cash. You must not demand an input, a tax rebate, for all the money that is going through your cash register on condoms, but you can on health pills. Think of the bookkeeping you have to do. Every single item has to be recorded. That is why the compliance cost for small businesses is 9.3 per cent of turnover. It seems aberrant to do it that way, but that is what the tax does, and this is not just in the drugstore. There would be similar problems for suppliers such as financial institutions, educational institutions, charities and non-profit organizations. Suppose you have an educational institution that teaches French and English but also Italian. Italian, that is taxable, and the institution can claim an input credit or a part of the input tax it has paid for Italian courses, but not for French and English courses. So it goes on. Insanity.

Charities have the same problem. Landlords. The New Zealand system of few exemptions should appeal particularly to small businesses because of the relatively low compliance costs. British studies, as I told you earlier, found that the compliance costs of the GST are about 40 times larger for a small business, as a percentage of sales, than for large firms. One of the themes that I was stressing earlier is that this is a tax that makes it easier for big business and harder for everybody else.

In a forthcoming book, Professor John Quailey and Deborah Fretts state that although the GST itself can hardly be called a radical proposal, since many other countries have already adopted credit invoice, value added taxes, the particular form of GST that Canada proposes to introduce is, by international standards, surprisingly complex.

Why do we have to choose something that is surprisingly complex? There are simpler systems yet we take the hardest one to repair. It also has a relatively narrow base, and if European experience is anything to go by, further complications may yet develop including increases in the tax rate and multiple rates. The title of the book is: The Economics of the GST, and it is being produced by the Canadian Tax Foundation.

The proposal originally favoured by the government was a business transfer tax, or BTT, imposed as a single rate on a comprehensive tax base. If the government wanted to have such a consumption tax, they should have had the courage of their convictions and gone with the BTT. Simple. One rate, one everything, one report. No problems. A firm's tax liability under the BTT can be calculated by subtracting aggregate purchases from aggregate sales and applying the BTT right to the result. As they keep a record of their aggregate purchases and their aggregate sales, no extra administration costs would be incurred by business. The same books could be used. John Bulloch of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business says the BTT would be workable with the two-tier federal/provincial tax system because there cannot be any exemptions and the tax calculation is based on existing books of record rather than invoices. Mr. Bulloch told the Senate Banking Committee, "If you want exemptions and disability, you can have it with one tax such as England has. You can have it in Canada if the taxes are harmonized. You cannot have what they now propose as a two-tier tax. You cannot harmonize the system. You will have to start from scratch. It will not work. The country will be in chaos."

Senator Kinsella, this is another reason why I went back to one of my favourite topics. This Prime Minister is the one who was saying that all he had to do was to be elected, and an era of total and over-sickening federal/provincial harmony would be upon us, covering us like a thick blanket of fog, a gooey fog. Everybody would be kissy, smoochy, and there would be no difficult premiers anywhere. Total harmony. No problems. And he cannot even convince them to harmonize the tax system.

That was another thing that launched me on to the Prime Minister's disastrous effects on this country.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (0610)

Senator Kenny: Would Senator Gigantès permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Kenny: He was talking about harmonizing the tax systems between one province and another. While he is at it, I wonder if he would comment on the pressure that has been placed on provincial governments, forcing them either to raise taxes, cut services or return larger deficits.

> The GST proposal represents an attempt by the federal government to push its deficit problem onto the provincial governments. Every provincial Premier has publicly opposed the GST. A conference Board of Canada study commissioned by the provincial governments indicated that during the first three years of operation the GST would reduce provincial tax revenues by up to $6.9 billion. Provinces would be faced with three alternatives: by recovering those lost revenues through additional tax increases of their own; or reducing services to the public; or running larger deficits (or smaller surpluses).

If they were lucky enough to have a surplus.

> Canadians could face the double burden of higher provincial taxes on top of the federal GST. A report prepared by the provinces on the fiscal effects of the GST summarized the impact it could have on the provinces.

Here I will quote briefly from a report by the provincial governments on the fiscal impacts of the GST.

> In addition to needlessly threatening the economic situation in the short term, the federal GST would seriously jeopardize the provinces' financial position, already made difficult because of the federal government's policy of progressive financial withdrawal from health care, post-secondary education and regional economic development. The economic impact of the GST could thus be worse if provincial governments had to adopt measures to restore their own fiscal situations.
> If the GST takes effect in 1991—we hope it does not, but if it does—consumers face combined federal-provincial rates of sales tax ranging from 7 per cent in Alberta, where there is presently no provincial sales tax, to 19 per cent in Newfoundland, where consumers would pay the 12 per cent retail sales tax on top of the 7 per cent federal GST.
> Worse yet, consumers face the prospect of even higher sales taxes if provincial governments are forced to raise their tax rates to recover lost revenues. In fact, provincial governments have already indicated that the GST would leave them with no choice but to raise provincial taxes.

Senator Gigantès: I would ask Senator Kenny whether there is a passage in that interesting document, from which he is reading, which explains why the GST will reduce provincial revenue? Is there such a passage?

Senator Kenny: I can look for one. What I was coming to, senator, is a statement by Hon. Huber Kitchen, the Finance Minister of Newfoundland. He said that they will probably have to raise their provincial sales tax from 12 per cent to 15 per cent or more if the GST is not withdrawn. Either that, or they will have to increase their provincial income tax rate, which is now 62 per cent of the federal rate, to 75 or 80 per cent.

Understanding that provincial co-operation is critical to any successful reform of the sales tax system, Finance committee members were shocked to learn that the federal government never actually put any specific sales tax proposal on the negotiating table with the provinces. Provincial governments were never asked whether they would join a unified sales tax system before the federal government broke off negotiations in April 1989.

John Bulloch recently stated:

> We were told, and we accepted the government's word, that they were negotiating for two years. We have only uncovered from travelling across Canada and talking to people who were in those hearings that there was nothing on the table; that most of the meetings had been technical in scope while federal officials learned about implementing retail sales taxes. There were no negotiations.

It goes on to state that the government's haste to meet its self-imposed deadline, to have the GST in place by 1991, has led to major flaws in the GST proposal. Mr. Bullock makes the point that if the federal government were really serious about a unified system, it would not have made all of the stupid mistakes it has made.

> The failure of the federal government to obtain provincial cooperation has doomed the GST to failure. The losers will be all Canadians.

I really wanted to draw these problems to the attention of Senator Gigantès, problems which seem to be related to what he was talking about. I would ask him if he could comment on them further. I do not really have the answer to the question he asked of me, at least not in the report before me.

Senator Gigantès: I have one disagreement with Mr. John Bulloch. He stated that if the government were really serious, it would not make all of these stupid mistakes. I think he underestimates this government. I think this government is quite capable of being utterly serious and making even more stupid mistakes, as it has done all along.

Yes, honourable senators, I have discussed many of these points. I cited some learned documents about all of the defects of the GST, as it has been constructed. I agree with Mr. Bullock that it is a crazy tax. I remember reading that, despite the kissy-smoochy atmosphere that Mr. Mulroney was supposed to have generated with his molasses voice, he did not, in effect, consult with the provinces on a very important thing; the invasion of a field of taxation considered to be the provinces' own.

This great democratic leader who was going to bring peace and harmony to our land has been a kind of Attila the Hun, trampling everybody underfoot and doing it stupidly.

Senator Davey: I have listened with interest to Senator Kenny's comments about the Prime Minister. I was not here when he had a discussion with Senator Kinsella in that regard and I do not think he would have seen this morning's Globe and Mail. However, I would like to draw to his attention something written on this subject. I would be interested in his observations thereon. It is taken from Jeffrey Simpson's column in this morning's Globe and Mail. The heading is: "Canada needs clarity and conviction, and Mr. Mulroney offers neither." There was apparently an article in this month's Atlantic magazine on Mario Cuomo, in which Cuomo states that political leadership is defined as a combination of plumbing and poetry. If senators would allow me, I would like to read a line or two of the Simpson column. I think it is relevant.

Senator Gigantès: I would be grateful if Senator Davey would read the column in its entirety.

Senator Davey: I will read half of it, because it is relevant. It states:

> Earlier this week, Brian Mulroney launched another of his barroom attacks on Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien. Why was Mr. Chrétien hiding under his pool table during the Meech Lake debate, Mr. Mulroney demanded to know.
>
> Apart from the silly inaccuracy—Mr. Chrétien does not have a pool table—the remarks, and others of an equally partisan nature, gave an insight into the essential character of the Prime Minister as above all else, and perhaps nothing more than, a parish pump politician.

• (0620)

> Mr. Mulroney has this thing about Mr. Chrétien, and he has had it for a long time. It is as though Mr. Chrétien, like former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, had somehow got under Mr. Mulroney's skin. His presence itches so badly that the Prime Minister cannot resist the temptation to itch.
>
> When Mr. Mulroney reaches for poetry, it usually has been prepared by others. When he reaches for his own thoughts, they are frequently the stuff of barroom discourse. This creates the widespread impression that whenever the Prime Minister reaches for poetry, he is not revealing his innermost convictions and, therefore, should not be believed. His is the poetry of artifice, of fancy words rather than conviction.
>
> His interview with The Globe and Mail last summer about the Meech Lake process was justly celebrated for his "roll the dice" remark. But far more revealing, and ultimately more damaging, were his other descriptions of events, past and then present, expressed in language more appropriate to some brandy-and-cigars affair than a national audience.
> A great deal of political discourse is prefabricated, written by legions of speechwriters whose work is then vetted by committees and reviewed by those with a sharp eye for the 10-second television clip. That is why we, as citizens, must cherish and learn from such glimmers of genuine thought and emotion as political leaders offer.

From them, we learn whether the convictions and clarity of poetry exist in our leaders.

That is Jeffrey Simpson, who some of us on this side and on that side regard as a fairly senior and respected journalist. I am wondering if those comments dovetail with the things you were saying about the Prime Minister when I was not here. Would you think this is a fairly effective description?

Senator Gigantès: I think it is a very polite description of the Prime Minister. I think I have an answer for Mr. Simpson about what it is that Trudeau and Chrétien have done to Mulroney. In fact they have not done anything to him. He has done something terrible to them. Like a wife beater, he feels angry at the person he has beaten. The betrayer feels anger towards those he has betrayed. I was illustrating that earlier by reading a document which I tabled for the Senate. Perhaps, to spare the good people opposite who have heard it already, I will come back to it when the shift changes.

I must say that Senator Hatfield shows forbearance and generosity, because he comes out smelling like a rose in what I am about to say. He is not one of the guilty parties. However, due to his operations recently, I would not say exactly that Senator Castonguay comes out smelling like a rose in what will come out later.

By the way, Senator Fairbairn, I understand that when you were speaking you had the temerity, the effrontery, the lack of decorum to absorb pieces of tangerine. Did you dare do that in the presence of Senator Castonguay?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: He said it was a terrible lack of decorum on my part to put something between my lips while addressing the Senate. There were other senators on that side stuffing their faces and that was perfectly all right. However, I put a piece of tangerine in my mouth in the presence of—

Senator Davey: They were playing bridge in the corner.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, and they got up and asked me to be respectable. Senator Forrestall was chewing something over here.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gigantès, I should explain that during my brief remarks yesterday and the day before, I plead a certain degree of weakness. During that period of time, whenever I had the opportunity to take questions from colleagues and took my seat for a few minutes, I may have consumed no more than six sections of a tangerine.

Senator Gigantès: Perhaps that is why he is angry. I have consumed seven so far. I apologize, Senator Castonguay, I should have kept my consumption lower.

Senator Fairbairn: I will be prepared to get you more.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, but I have a good supply.

We were talking about the alternatives to the GST and I will deal with that on Tuesday morning, as I promised my good friend, Senator MacDonald.

Here I have things which were said to us by witnesses who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce concerning the GST. I think we should refresh the memories of senators opposite, especially those in the last batch of appointments who did not participate in those hearings, and who do not know exactly what the witnesses were saying.

[Senator Davey.]

Ms. Edith Johnston, Secretary of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, described her federation as a national umbrella organization with which seniors across Canada, particularly those in provincial groups, are affiliated. With her that morning was Alex Mansfield, the President of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario, which is the largest provincial affiliate of the national organization. Their briefs were very similar as both organizations work out of the same office. Naturally, because they are affiliated with the same organization, they have the same goals in life.

Mr. Mansfield said he was one of at least 300,000 senior citizens in Ontario who have wished that the proposed general sales tax would go away. That is how many members his organization has, 300,000. That is five times the population of Whitehorse. That is an awful lot of wishful Canadians.

There were a number of reasons they wanted to see the general sales tax go away. Perhaps the biggest reason was that they feel it adds to the injustice already done towards many Canadians. That is, to non-wealthy Canadians, and most senior citizens fall in that category.

I would say to honourable senators of the Liberal persuasion who have come in here recently that in the documents I was reading from, there was evidence that compliance costs are 40 times lower for large corporations than they are for small businesses, referring of course to the GST. For small businesses compliance costs are on average, 9.3 per cent on turnover. They will be passed along.

The evidence I was reading from established that not only is this tax a transfer of a tax burden from the manufacturers to consumers, it is also discriminatory and regressive in its administration. It hits the poor business much harder than it hits the rich business. Of course, here we have Mr. Mansfield saying that the tax will add to the injustice already done towards many Canadians, non-wealthy Canadians. This is a most important distinction, because most senior citizens fall in that category. Certainly his organization wants a change in the tax system, but they want true reform.

● (0630)

Ostensibly, this is what Mr. Chrétien is saying, and the Tories dump on him. I pointed out to them that, if he came out with a tax reform, springing like a female fully-armed from the head of Zeus, they would be dumping on him for producing a tax reform not knowing what the situation would be like in two years' time. A redistribution of taxation in this country—who taxes what and when—coupled with the Free Trade Agreement with the United States, coupled with a free trade agreement with Mexico, coupled with the problems of the GATT, will probably create an economic situation very different from the one we now have. The foreign investment picture may look different, because things are changing in Europe.

It would be highly irresponsible for a Liberal leader at this stage to invent a taxation system to please Senator Macdonald or Senator Cogger or, I suppose, Senator Simard.

We see the United Senior Citizens of Ontario wanting true reform. The Liberals will give them true reform, not a reform which benefits the rich only. We want a tax system, says Mr. Alex Banfield, that is based on the ability to pay. The GST represents a move in the opposite direction.

For the benefit of my francophone colleagues, I will shift to French.

[Translation]

The government said that the primary goods will not be taxed. But diapers and coffins will be. The government said that they will not oppose inflation. But, in an article dated 28 June issue of the Mississauga News, it was indicated that an increase of the rate per thousand for Mississauga will be directly attibutable to the costs due to the GST. Costs such as employee's time, change of the software, updating the ledgers, and that will not be the only sector where the hidden costs of the GST will be passed to the consumers.

Our capacity to pay whatever we have to pay will be decreased by inflation. Most senior citizens have a limited income from which they are quite ready to pay their fair share to the government. But we are not happy with paying the proposed tax. And you will find why in the document you have in front of you.

I will now give the floor to Edith Johnson, because our two briefs are more or less similar. Miss Johnson is now speaking, she is the National President for the National Pensioners and senior citizens Federation. I will hand this document over when I have done with it:

As we already said, Canadian seniors are opposed to an unfair Canadian tax system and proposed changes to this tax system will perpetuate and increase this unfairness. We are in favor of a tax system based on the capacity to pay and which, according to us, would eblable us to face properly the present commitments Canada has regarding social programs.

The National Federation is opposed to the proposed tax because it is a regressive tax. Under this proposed tax, the average Canadian will literally be taxed from the craddle to the grave. Diapers as well as coffins will be subject to a higher tax.

[English]

Senator Stollery: I have a question.

As I understand, these are witnesses who appeared before the committee. Did they in any way reflect upon or discuss the issue of clawbacks; clawbacks instituted when the bill was passed a few weeks ago under the provisional rules under which we have been operating in the chamber? Some of the witnesses who were representing senior citizens' groups may not have thought of the added, rather onerous, cost, the limit on their pensions nor the effect that it is going to have on their ability to pay the GST.

Perhaps some of those associations would have an even stronger opinion now. They would be much more concerned now than when they were talking to the members of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee as it was travelling around the country.

The clawback means that the older citizens are going to be hit twice. They are going to be hit by the clawback, which will reduce their pensions and their ability to resist inflation. The compounding element of inflation will make their savings worth less and, at the same time, they will be hit with a new tax.

We all know that the older citizens of our country have worked very hard in their youth and in their middle years to accumulate their retirement benefits. We also know that the poorest sector of our society is the single female over 65. They are the ones who will now have the clawback provision applied and who will also be paying the GST.

Perhaps you could enlighten us as to whether some of the witnesses reflected on that.

Senator Gigantès: I do not have the documentation with me, but I do remember that the same groups of senior citizens appeared in respect of both of those bills. They drew the connection, as you have. They objected to the clawback because, in the way it is indexed, they will lose 3.0 per cent every year. It is not indexed for the first 3.0 per cent of inflation. So the limit at which the clawback starts, in effect, goes down every year.

They also objected to the fact that, under the clawback legislation, a couple in retirement, each with a $49,000 pension, is not subject to the clawback. However, a couple living with one pension of $51,000 will be subject to the clawback.

Senator Stollery: Perhaps I could put this into perspective.

The figures were announced on the weekend and, to my surprise, in Ontario the average family income is now $57,000 a year. It is difficult to keep up with the increasing incomes. Thirty years ago, annual family income was something like $50 a week.

The clawback takes a bit of time to affect pensioners, but actually that time is now. At any rate that time is not going to be very far away when we already have, as I say, in the province of Ontario, the average family income of $57,000. That does not take into account that it is probably higher in Metropolitan Toronto. I guess in Metropolitan Toronto we are looking at an average family income of well over $60,000 a year. I would like to know what effect that has on the situation?

● (0640)

Senator Gigantès: Senator Hatfield, were you noticing disorderly conduct of any kind that you were drawing our attention to? Or are you referring to what you are exchanging with your neighbour and former New Brunswick cabinet colleague? Maybe he thought you were interrupting his conversation with Senator Robertson, which, of course, might be disorderly on our part, after all.

The point is, the clawback and the GST were clearly linked in the minds of pensioners who appeared before us, senior citizens, and they felt the two together were going to damage them. Of course they will. There is no disputing that.

Senator Stollery: And more damaging to them than to other sectors of society because of the limits on their income.

Senator Gigantès: And we get a lot of tremolos in the voices of Tories about incomes of poor senior citizens on fixed incomes and how are they going to manage with inflation. What is the first thing they do? They try to de-index, and we have to have the little old lady come to the front steps and tell Mr. Mulroney that he was a liar, as everybody knows.Now, they have indexed again through the clawback.

Senator Stollery: I wonder what happened to the little old lady?

Senator Gigantès: I would hate to think. They probably have—

Senator Stollery: They have iced her?

Senator Gigantès: Who knows? Who knows?

Senator Stollery: I guess they have iced the little old lady. We will not be hearing from her any more.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: I will proceed with Ms. Johnston's submission.

> As we have said, the seniors of Canada are opposed to Canada's unfair tax system and the proposed amendments to that tax system which will perpetuate and accentuate unfairness. We support a tax system based on ability to pay and believe such a tax system would adequately provide for Canada's existing social programs.
> The "National" is opposed to this proposed tax because it is regressive. Under the proposed tax ordinary Canadians will be taxed literally from the cradle to the grave. Both diapers and coffins will be subject to more tax, which does not consider a consumer's ability to pay. For this reason we view the tax as regressive.
> The tax burden will be firmly hoisted upon the shoulders of those least able to afford it. Low- and middle-income families will pay a higher percentage of their income more than will the wealthy to compensate for the GST, because they must spend their income immediately on consumer goods and do not have extra money . . .
>
> The tax simply is not fair. Effectively, ordinary Canadians will be penalized for not being wealthy. Their ability to save will be further eroded by the GST, making it harder for them to become wealthy and to enjoy the benefits the system has created for upper-income Canadians.
> The Canadian tax system favours big business and wealthy Canadians. Between 1984 and 1988 the income tax bill for low-income Canadians went up 44 per cent. Middle-income families paid 20 per cent more while the wealthy paid 6 per cent less. Individuals account for 47 per cent of tax revenue, while the corporate share of tax revenue is about 10 per cent.
> In 1950 both groups paid roughly the same share of federal government income—about 28 per cent each. The richest 20 per cent of Canadians own about 70 per cent of Canadian wealth.
>
> The poorest 20 per cent of Canadians owe more than they own. Under the GST both will be taxed at the same rate.

[Senator Gigantès.]

This is straight from the mouth of the President of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, and I see no pity opposite for those senior citizens. Since a number of our Tory colleagues on the other side are also senior citizens, I think they should identify to a certain extent with those senior citizens who are not as fortunate as they are, and who will oppose the GST. However, I don't hold out much hope for them.

> Seniors are willing to pay their fair of taxes, but that is only what they want to pay, only what is fair. Fair taxation could only be achieved through real tax reform.

[English]

I will say this in English, Senator MacDonald, because this concerns you. Seniors are willing to pay their fair share of taxes, but that is only what they want to pay, only what is fair. Fair taxation could only be achieved through real tax reform. By real reform we mean making big corporations pay. In 1987 the big corporations did not have to pay taxes on $27 billion of profit. The corporations also owe about $36 billion in deferred taxes. It is time to make big business pay its share.

● (0650)

Ms. Johnston, who is secretary of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, said earlier in this text that:

> The Canadian tax system favours big business and wealthy Canadians. Between 1984 and 1988 the income tax bill for low-income Canadians went up 44 per cent. Middle-income families paid 20 per cent more while the wealthy paid 6 per cent less. Individuals account for 47 per cent of tax revenue, while the corporate share of tax revenue is about 10 per cent. In 1950 both groups paid roughly the same share of federal government income—about 28 per cent each.

Taxes on the profits of corporations have gone down systematically ever since Mr. Mulroney came to power.

> Basing taxes on the ability to pay, we say that the wealthy should pay a higher percentage of their income in taxes than poor people. The tax system has already built this principle into its system, but it could be done much more fairly. Until 1988, Canada had 10 income tax brackets with the poorest paying a rate of 9 per cent and the richest 34 per cent. Now, Canada has just three brackets: 17 per cent, 26 per cent and 29 per cent.

These are the three figures. There were ten brackets and the highest paid 54 per cent and the lowest paid 9 per cent. Now there are three brackets and the lowest pays 17 per cent and the highest pays 29 per cent. These figures show that the poor now pay more than they used to; the rich now pay less than they used to. This is what the Tories did. This is not fairness. You are making the poor carry the burden of the rich.

Senator Nurgitz, were you looking puzzled because of remarks that were being made to you by the page or because of my bad accent while I read? Would you like me to read that again? No. Thank you, sir; you are so kind for saving my voice.

> It is essential that we get rid of tax loopholes for the wealthy. The tax system allows the wealthy many ways to avoid taxes. Special breaks like the business entertainment tax deduction should be eliminated. Inheritance, capital gains and landholdings could all be taxed.

We are asking for alternatives to the GST. Remember that article in MacLean's the other day about a one trillion dollar windfall about to come to the Yuppies through inheritance taxes? Why not have inheritance taxes? I won't leave very much to my children, but I think it should be taxed. Of course, if we have inheritance taxes, the wealth cannot multiply and the power cannot multiply as fast.

> The GST does not make sense in a progressive country. A dollar means something more to a person who has only $2 than it does to a person who has $1,000. For the most part seniors do not have that many dollars. It is unfair to hit them with a consumption tax that further restricts their buying power. Why should the extra dollars of the wealthy, those they use for investment and those they inherit from wealthy relatives, be protected from taxation while the entire population is being asked to give up 7 per cent of their spending dollars? It is backward.

In case you missed my reference, this is Ms. Edith Johnston, Secretary of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation who is saying this. We will recognize some of these things in one of the alternative taxations that I will present to you Tuesday morning, Senator MacDonald.

> The following is a request that we had on 50,000 petitions that were circulated by our members. We call on government to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax; reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations; ensure that, if and when there is broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturer's sales tax, that reform not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab; and cause the government to cease with the proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Senator Kenny: Senator Gigantès, I wonder if I could ask you a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Kenny: The GST proposal would shift the tax burden from corporations to consumers.

> Under the GST proposal, corporations would receive input tax credits for 100 per cent of the GST they pay on all of their purchases. In this way the GST would remove the sales tax burden completely from corporations and pass it along to the final consumer.
>
> At the beginning of tax reform the Finance Minister promised that corporations would pay a larger share of tax than they did previously and that individuals would pay less. However, Jim Frank, Chief Economist for the Conference Board of Canada, produced evidence that the GST would shift taxes from corporations to consumers in a significant way. He predicted that corporate profits would increase by $600 million in 1991 and by $4.9 billion in 1992, at a time when economic growth will be slowing, and while real disposable income of consumers is predicted to fall by $7.3 billion in 1991 and by $5.8 billion in 1992. These figures also suggest that the Manufacturers Sales Tax is currently being absorbed, at least partially, at the corporate level through reduced profits.
> The GST proposal would shift the tax burden from manufactured goods to services
> The GST would, for the first time, put a sales tax on services, the fastest growing segment of the Canadian economy. The Finance Committee heard from many labour-intensive service industries, such as tourism and food services, about the effects that the GST would have on their industries. As the service sector is the fastest growing part of the Canadian economy, the GST would put a new tax on that particular sector which is generating most of the new jobs in Canada. There has been no indication that the government understands the importance of this shift of the tax burden onto labour-intensive services or what this means for employment opportunities . . .

As we are heading into a recession, this tax seems to be attacking the very part of the economy that is growing fastest and strongest. I would be interested in your comments on this area.

Senator Gigantès: It is indeed small businesses that produce the majority of the jobs; and businesses such as tourism are labour intensive. There is a recession. On top of the recession and the loss of revenue that results from this recession, these businesses which produce jobs will now have to pay GST.

In remarks I was making during the previous shift, the compliance cost for GST for small businesses is 9.3 per cent of sales. The 9.3 per cent of sales is a huge percentage. To start with, wherever possible services which also incur this 9.3 per cent will pass it on to customers. These small businesses will not only have their own 9.3 per cent of sales in additional tax, but they will be getting it—

Senator Hastings: Relax, Senator Gigantès. Changing of the guard. Wait until the guard changes. Nobody is listening.

Senator Frith: It is time for an orange. Just relax and let them fill the hour. They are making lots of noise and this happens every day at 7:00 a.m.

• (0700)

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, while the guard is being changed, earlier I read you the column by Jeffrey Simpson in this morning's Globe and Mail. I read it into the record. I won't read it again.

Senator Hastings: Why not? I did not hear it.

Senator Davey: Well, in the spirit of asking Senator Gigantès who may wish to comment on it, and perhaps it will be something we can usefully do while the guard is being changed—and perhaps they can be a little more quiet—this is Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail this morning. It is entitled, "Canada needs clarity and conviction, and Mr. Mulroney offers neither" and I quoted in part. He says:

> Earlier this week, Brian Mulroney launched another of his barroom attacks on Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien. Why was Mr. Chrétien hiding under his pool table during the Meech Lake debate, Mr. Mulroney demanded to know.
>
> Apart from the silly inaccuracy—Mr. Chrétien does not have a pool table—the remarks, and others of an equally partisan nature, gave an insight into the essential character of the Prime Minister as above all else, and perhaps nothing more than, a parish pump politician.
>
> Mr. Mulroney has this thing about Mr. Chrétien, and he has had it for a long time. It is as though Mr. Chrétien, like former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, had somehow got under Mr. Mulroney's skin, where his presence itches so badly that the Prime Minister cannot resist the temptation to itch.
>
> When Mr. Mulroney reaches for poetry, it usually has been prepared by others. When he reaches for his own thoughts, they are frequently the stuff of barroom discourse. This creates the widespread impression that whenever the Prime Minister reaches for poetry, he is not revealing his innermost convictions and therefore should not be believed. His is the poetry of artifice, of fancy words rather than conviction.
> His interview with The Globe and Mail last summer about the Meech Lake process was justly celebrated for his "roll the dice" remark. But far more revealing, and ultimately more damaging, were his other descriptions of events, past and then-present, expressed in language more appropriate to some brandy-and-cigars affair than a national audience.

Now, if I could, Senator Gigantès, also draw to your attention an editorial which appeared on Wednesday, December 5th in the Financial Post. Perhaps I could read this and then you may wish to comment on it as well. This editorial is, "Financial Post, Wednesday, December 5." It is entitled "Mulroney must stop trying to fix blame." It says:

> Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is still looking for someone or something to blame for the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. First, it was Newfoundland Premier Clyde Wells. Later it was the amending formula. Now it's Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien. This week the Prime Minister lashed out at Chrétien for having killed Meech and, by extension, for the growing alienation of Quebec from Canada.
> Mulroney says Chrétien "hid under his pool table" when the accord was being negotiated in Ottawa last June—a studied neutrality which helped bury the constitutional deal. "As a result of his activities and theories, Meech Lake was indeed killed," Mulroney says. "And that gave rise to the Bélanger-Campeau commission which is now giving rise to serious threats to the unity of Canada."
>
> Mulroney is prone to exaggerate and he is now trying to rewrite history once again. In this case, he has the facts only half right.
>
> It's true Chrétien's position on Meech Lake was ambivalent. In January, 1990, shortly before he announced his intention to run for leadership, he gave a well-crafted, scholarly speech stating his objections to the accord. There was doubt at the time that Chrétien really believed the accord was that bad, but he was under pressure to oppose the deal from Pierre Trudeau and his acolytes and he needed their help to win the Liberal party's leadership. Throughout the campaign, in interviews and speeches, he sought changes to the deal to save it, changes which Quebec rejected.
>
> Last June, when the premiers gathered in Ottawa to save the deal, Chrétien went silent. In private, he and his assistants were trying to find a way for Clyde Wells and Gary Filmon to accept the deal. Although he refused to admit it in public—as he should have done—Chrétien now believed the country was better off with some variant of the accord than without it. Like other critics of the accord—such as Sharon Carstairs, who says Chrétien helped change her mind—he was worried about the consequences of failure.
> Because Chrétien retreated into silence until he won the leadership on June 23, the day after the accord died in Manitoba and Newfoundland, he offers his critics an easy target. In that, Mulroney had a point. If Chrétien had changed his mind on the Accord, he should have said so. But Mulroney will not give Chrétien any credit for his private efforts to save the accord.
> Mulroney does not stop there. He blames Chrétien for destroying the Accord. This is reminiscent of Mulroney's attacks last winter when he blamed Chrétien for Quebec's failure to sign the Constitution in 1981. That was not true then, nor is Chrétien to be blamed now. Again Mulroney is the principal of the school of revisionism.
> The Prime Minister deserves credit for bringing the provinces together to achieve the agreement on constitutional reform. But he also has to answer for Meech's secret process of negotiation, for agreeing to a weakening of federal power, for isolating Newfoundland in the latter stages of negotiation, and for boasting of "rolling the dice" last June. Ironically, all of that also contributed to the demise of the accord he so vigorously championed.

Rather than scorning the past, Mulroney should look ahead. He should salute Chrétien's desire to appear before the Bélanger-Campeau commission on Quebec's constitutional future. He ought to do the same. His excuse that a Prime Minister should not appear before a provincial commission is pretty lame stuff; he appeared before the Newfoundland legislature in June to defend Meech. (He even spoke to the city council of Saint John recently on national unity.)

Federalism needs all the friends it can get in Quebec, and Jean Chrétien is one of them.

Here we have, Senator Gigantès, back to back in two Progressive Conservative newspapers: The Globe and Mail with Jeffrey Simpson and The Financial Post—these are Tory organs and here is what they are saying about the Prime Minister.

I bring this up because you spoke about this earlier and you said you might come back to it in the course of your remarks.

Senator Gigantès: The point that most interests me in the Simpson column is a question on which I can give an answer, that is what it is that Chrétien and Trudeau did to Mulroney that—I will leave aside the perfectly disgusting image of his being under Mr. Mulroney's skin. It is not mine; it is Jeffrey Simpson's and very tasteless. I do not think they did anything to him. He did something to them, and he did something despicable, treacherous and mendacious and he cannot forgive them. He cannot forgive them for having being the people to whom he did this terrible thing.

I have a document here which I have already tabled, but which I will read again, and I will set the stage for this. The request by provinces for a redistribution of powers within the constitution is quite all right. Mr. Trudeau reasons very cogently that some things had to happen before this redistribution could take place.

• (0710)

One of the things that had to happen was to patriate the Constitution. We could not be running to London all the time, asking for permission. We had already had a bad experience in the Labrador case, where the private interests of Lord Haldane kept part of Labrador out of the deal. We obviously had to have the Constitution patriated.

Before we could proceed to a redistribution of powers, we needed an amending formula other than unanimity. Unanimity would make any reasonable redistribution of powers impossible.

Finally, the fact that is often overlooked is that we needed some provisions that would allow for reform in the relationship between one province—most probably Quebec—and the rest, along with the federal government. This is what Mr. Trudeau wanted to do: to proceed logically to patriate the Constitution, have an amending formula and then discuss the redistribution of powers.

I would like to point out that he achieved the first three steps. If there was no redistribution of powers, which he is accused of not having done, it is because the government of Quebec refused to participate. Not only that, Mr. Ryan, having been defeated in a provincial election, was too traumatized by the prospect of being outflanked by the nationalists that he, too, adopted the nationalist stand and paralysed the process of reform.

The Constitution Act, 1982 was praised in 1982 by Mr. Mulroney. He was all for it. But when he started running for the 1984 election, Mr. Mulroney needed an organization in Quebec. There was one ready made, willing to serve him, and that was the PQ. In order to work with that organization, he adopted their phrases, one of which, of course, was "the betrayal of 1982". Mr. Mulroney used that phrase again the other day.

What is the betrayal of 1982? The betrayal of 1982 is the 1982 Constitution. I will get to the Night of the Long Knives in a moment, but the betrayal of 1982 was the adoption of a Constitution that Quebec did not want.

Honourable senators, I have before me a document which I have tabled. It is a news release plus other texts produced by the eight Canadian premiers who were known as the Gang of Eight. One of them was the Premier of Quebec, Mr. René Lévesque. This news release is dated April 16, 1981. If senators do not trust my reading of the copy, they can ask that the Library of Parliament provide one to them, as it did to me. It states:

NEWS RELEASE

April 16, 1981

Ottawa—Premiers from eight Canadian provinces today signed a new and historic Canadian patriation plan including an amending formula for the constitution.

Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Saskatchewan were signatories to the "Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan."

We are talking of a document that Mr. Lévesque anticipated in writing and which he signed—a very good document, as senators will see.

It calls for patriation of the constitution and, as part of the patriation plan, acceptance of an amending formula that would ensure all future amendments are made in Canada.

In the constitutional accord the signing provinces agreed to:

patriate rapidly the Constitution of Canada;

adopt a new amending formula for the Canadian Constitution;

enter into intensive constitutional negotiations during a three-year period based on the new amending formula; and discontinue all court action on this matter.

> The Canadian patriation plan is conditional upon the Government of Canada withdrawing the proposed joint address on the constitution.

As senators know, Mr. Trudeau was proposing constitutional change and the provinces were taking him to court, saying that he could not do so without negotiating with the provinces. I return to the text:

> Under the Canadian patriation plan the United Kingdom parliament would end its trusteeship over the British North America Act without damaging its historically fine relationship with Canada.
>
> The new amending formula combines flexibility and stability; this is a principal feature of the accord.
> Under the formula, all amendments to the constitution must have approval of the Canadian parliament, except those related to the internal constitution of a province.

This first paragraph about what the new Constitution should contain is part of the Constitution Act, 1982, which I hold in my right hand. If any senators want to check it, I will lend it to them. I will continue with the text:

> Most amendments would require legislative approval of two-thirds of the provinces (seven) representing at least 50 per cent of the population of the ten provinces. This establishes legal equality amongst all provinces.

The amending formula, "seven and fifty", is written into the Constitution in these very words. Mr. Lévesque signed that.

> When an amendment diminishes a province's rights, privileges, or powers, an individual province may choose to retain these rights, privileges and powers by obtaining the approval of a majority vote of the total number of members of its legislature; and such a province would then receive adequate financial compensation.

This is contained in the Constitution but the financial compensation is limited to language and cultural matters only.

> For a limited number of important matters including those relating to the Crown, parliamentary representation, language and the composition of the Supreme Court, the consent of all provincial legislatures would be required.

That is precisely what the Trudeau Constitution says.

> This amending formula is demonstrably preferable for all Canadians to that proposed by the federal government because it:
> recognizes the equality of provinces within Canada.

This comes up again in a document Mr. Lévesque signed, which, in effect, gives up special status or "distinct society". Provinces are all equal, and that is stated in a document that Mr. Lévesque helped draft and sign.

The next item is extremely important because it pertains to the so-called "Night of the Long Knives". The amending formula:

> avoids the need for a referendum to choose an amending formula or as a method of amending the constitution.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (0720)

Provincial premiers did not like the idea of a referendum which Mr. Trudeau liked. Here they are solemnly saying that what they are proposing does away with the need for a referendum, either for approving an amending formula or for amending the Constitution. This is a document that Mr. Levesque helped draft and then signed. The formula:

> removes the absolute veto power that the federal government proposes to give the Senate over constitutional reform, including Senate reform.

Absolute veto power of the Senate is replaced by a suspensive veto of 180 days in the Constitution of Mr. Trudeau. The news release continues:

> The premiers agreed that together with the federal government an agenda for constitutional change could be immediately drawn up. This would include all the subjects that were discussed . . .
> The eight premiers pointed out that their agreement on the Canadian constitution shows clearly and positively that significant constitutional progress is possible when all parties approach the issue with sincerity and goodwill.

The next document is the Constitutional Accord Canadian Patriation Plan. This is the text that Mr. Lévesque helped draft and which he signed:

> WHEREAS Canada is a mature and independent country with a federal system of government,
>
> AND WHEREAS the Parliament of the United Kingdom has retained, at the request of the Parliament of Canada and with the approval of the Provinces, residual power to amend certain parts of the British North America Act upon receiving a proper request from Canada,
>
> AND WHEREAS it is fitting and proper for the Constitution of Canada to be amendable in all respects by action taken wholly within Canada,
>
> AND WHEREAS the full exercise of the sovereignty of Canada requires a Canadian amending procedure in keeping with the federal nature of Canada,
>
> NOW THEREFORE, the Governments subscribing to this Accord agree as follows:
>
> 1. To patriate the Constitution of Canada by taking the necessary steps through the Parliament of Canada and the Legislatures of the provinces;
>
> 2. To accept, as part of patriation, the amending formula attached to this Accord as the formula for making all future amendments to the Constitution of Canada;
>
> 3. To embark upon an intensive three-year period of constitutional renewal based on the new amending formula and without delay to determine an agenda following acceptance of this Accord; and
>
> 4. To discontinue court proceedings now pending in Canada relative to the proposed Joint Address on the Constitution now before Parliament.
>
> The Canadian Patriation Plan is conditional upon the Government of Canada withdrawing the proposed Joint

Address on the Constitution now before Parliament and subscribing to this Accord.

The Provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario are invited to sign this Accord.

Dated at Ottawa this 16th day of April, 1981.

Then there is space for all the signatures. On the original, which I do not have, there is the signature of Mr. Lévesque. The library has proof of that.

Here is the amending formula:

1. All amendments to the Constitution of Canada, except those related to the internal constitution of the provinces require the agreement of the Parliament of Canada.

2. Any formula must recognize the constitutional equality of provinces as equal partners in Confederation.

René Lévesque drafted and signed and commented upon this. No special status, said René Lévesque. No distinct society. He wrote a document in which all provinces were to be proclaimed equal. To continue:

3. Any amending formula must protect the diversity of Canada.

4. Any constitutional amendment taking away an existing provincial area of jurisdiction or proprietary right should not be imposed on any province not desiring it.

That is in the Constitution of Canada. To continue:

5. Any amending formula must strike a balance between stability and flexibility.

6. Some amendments are of such fundamental importance to the country that all eleven governments must agree.

During discussions, it was recognized that more than one method of amending the Constitution would be necessary. Accordingly, this formula contains different methods depending on the nature of the amendment.

The eleven sections described as "Part A-Amending Formula for the Constitution of Canada" are designed to contain a full and complete procedure—

Senator Rizzuto: Senator Gigantès, may I ask you a couple of questions about the inflexibility of the Liberals in 1981-1982? Were there amendments made to the Constitution Act, 1982, over what the government proposed in the House? As far as I know, there were.

Second, I think that we were not afforded the same flexibility by the Conservative government regarding the Meech Lake Accord, whether we liked it or not. We had proposed amendments, the minimum, although several of us were in favour of passing it unchanged. They were rejected. The same can be said about the GST today. I for one am convinced that, had the amendment concerning books, or even the amendment postponing the implementation of the tax until 1992, been passed with the support of government members, it would have given many Canadians and Canadian businesses the time to adjust.

Do you think that, if we had approved an amendment on books—we know that even Mr. Mulroney said it was conceivable—or putting off the implementation of the GST for a year, until January 1, 1992, many Liberal senators would have supported this bill? We could have praised the Conservative government for its flexibility at that occasion. It could have recognized that it does not have the monopoly of truth and shown the Canadian people its willingness to make a positive gesture by accepting one or two amendments.

In view of that, I think we are a far step from what the Conservatives criticized us for in 1981-1982. I remember clearly. I was here. However uncompromizing the Trudeaus, Lalondes and Chrétiens may have been said to be, and God knows they were given a rough ride, the truth of the matter is that there were amendments to the Constitution Act of 1982.

We were not afforded the same flexibility regarding the Meech Lake Accord and it did not go through. Heaven knows that the Liberals and Mr. Chrétien are blamed for that. Honourable senators, Senator Simard agrees, but he should also answer the following question: Why refuse to amend the Meech Lake Accord? What does it mean to be flexible? Why did you not accept a couple of amendments to the proposed GST from this side of the House?

Perhaps the GST would have been passed by now. Is that flexibility? We should take a good hard look at what the Conservative government did. Flexibility is making a proposal and, past a certain point, being able to accept criticism and some amendments where necessary. That is what it is. I suggest—you may not recognize it readily, Senator Simard, but we should give it some thought nonetheless—that the Conservative government is the one showing inflexibility.

That is why I wanted you to tell me, on the subject of flexibility, Senator Gigantès, if we could have avoided being here at 7 o'clock in the morning had our colleagues from the other side cooperated and agreed to adopt one or two amendments.

Could an amendment on books have been allowed? God knows that Canadians and all involved think so. There were indeed a number of senators opposite who said they might have wanted an amendment. That makes a lot of sense, but it was not done.

It would not have been the end of the world either to put off the tax for a year. In view of the economic situation, many Canadians are also suggesting postponing it for a year. No, we might as well be talking to a wall. But then the senators opposite criticize us for trying to delay the process to prevent the GST from going through.

Senator Simard: You are the ones delaying the process.

Senator Rizzuto: That is correct. That is what I said, Senator Simard. I am not in the habit of meaning one thing and saying another.

You probably know that. I was here before you, and I can tell you that I am not the type to talk for the sake of talking. I do maintain that, had there been amendments at this stage, we would not be here now, that is for sure.

• (0730)

[English]

Senator Simard: Why didn't your members and your chairman propose amendments instead of closing the book on September 24? You were not interested in amendments then. Your minds had been made up since June, July or August to axe the tax. That was your decision. You shot and you scored in your own goal. You were skating backward.

You have the nerve, Senator Rizzuto, to come here and say, "Why didn't you accept amendments?" You closed the door, led by Senator Frith, the enforcer, on that day. He was the one who controlled Senator Buckwold and his committee. He said: "No amendments. You have three hours to accept it, or not."

They changed the rules. There were rules in those days, apparently, but after that there were no more rules.

The facts contradict you completely, Senator Rizzuto. So it is too late to be seeking exemptions for everybody and his dog; it's too late.

I am sure we will hear from you and your colleagues between now and the end of December seeking an exemption for the Liberal Party of Canada. That is the only exemption you have not asked for.

Senator Hastings: I rise on a point of order that has been raised by Senator Simard. I remind Senator Simard that his own minister, the Minister of National Revenue, when he appeared before the committee in Toronto in July said there would be no amendments. He said that the passage of this bill was a fait accompli. Those words were echoed by the Minister of Finance who said there would be no amendments and that passage was a fait accompli.

How could one amend a bill that was so flawed that it was beyond amending? Remember that it was your own minister who said: "Don't amend; pass"—in July.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: I was trying to demonstrate the great flexibility shown by Prime Minister Trudeau and Mr. Chrétien in 1982, because I wanted a document which proved that the 1982 Constitution Act, as adopted by Mr. Trudeau, was the one written by Mr. Lévesque and the other members of the "Gang of eight; it was a document which Mr. Trudeau accepted. It was not what he wanted, but he gave a little and accepted it.

I will go on and demonstrate paragraph by paragraph.

[English]

This is on the so-called betrayal of 1982 which Mr. Mulroney uses. I have in one hand the Constitution Act, 1982, which I shall call the Trudeau Constitution, and in the other hand I have a document drafted and signed by the eight premiers who were colloquially known as the Gang of Eight. Mr. Lévesque was a member of this group, and he helped draft this document and signed it.

It states:

> The eleven sections described as "Part A - Amending Formula for the Constitution of Canada" are designed to contain a full and complete procedure for the future amendment of the Constitution of Canada in all respects. The provisions contained in Part A would replace both the limited amending formulas now contained in sections 91(1) and 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act as well as the United Kingdom Parliament's residual responsibility for amending certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution.
> This amending formula would apply not only to the B.N.A. Act, 1867, and amendments made to it since that date, but also to the other parts of the Constitution of Canada, including the constitutional statutes and Orders-in-Council which relate to the entry into Canada of particular provinces, for example, The Manitoba Act, 1870, the Terms of Union admitting British Columbia in 1871, and Prince Edward Island in 1873, The Alberta Act, 1905, The Saskatchewan Act, 1905, and the Terms of Union with Newfoundland, 1949.
> This amending formula is clearly preferable to the one proposed by the federal government—

As you will see, this amending formula was the one which the federal government accepted. Mr. Trudeau bent as much as he had to to get agreement—no arrogance, no gloating, no cheap shots. He bent.

It is better, they say, because:

> —it recognizes the constitutional equality of each of Canada's provinces;

Again, this is in a document drafted and signed by Mr. Lévesque. There is no mention of special status or distinct society; on the contrary, the constitutional equality of each of Canada's provinces.

> 2) it gives the Senate only a suspensive rather than an absolute veto over constitutional amendment;

• (0740)

> (3) Any amendments made under subsection (1) derogating—

That is in the Constitution of 1982.

Next:

That is in the Trudeau constitution.

"Amending Formula":

> (1) No proclamation shall issue under section 1 before the expiry of one year from the date of the passage of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure, unless the Legislative Assembly of every province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

That is in the 1982 Constitution. What I am reading to you is a document that Mr. Lévesque helped draft and sign and which Mr. Trudeau accepted.

> (2) No proclamation shall issue under section 1 after the expiry of three years from the date of the passage of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure.

That is the 1982 Constitution. This is something that Mr. Lévesque and other premiers wanted, and there was a lot of bitching by the federal government after the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, because of this provision. It was a provision that Mr. Trudeau accepted to be flexible.

Next:

> (3) Subject to this section, the Government of Canada shall advise the Governor General to issue a proclamation forthwith upon the passage of the requisite resolutions under this Part.
>
> In the event that a province dissents from an amendment conferring legislative jurisdiction on Parliament, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction—

This is a Trudeau resolution, but limited to a certain field only.

Senator Tremblay: And that made a big difference.

Senator Gigantès: Hold on, we will get to it.

Senator Tremblay: —You reread it.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, yes. Think how much bending there is in all this, by Mr. Trudeau. Think of it. He accepted, as the Constitution of Canada, almost completely, a document written by Mr. Lévesque and signed by Mr. Lévesque and other premiers. Come on.

> Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, of the provinces, including any alteration to boundaries between provinces or the use of the English or the French language within that province may be made only by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and the Legislative Assembly of every province to which the amendment applies.
> An amendment may be made without a resolution of the Senate—

That is in the Constitution, as are all the things that I am reading to you:

> —authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, after the expiration of those one hundred and eighty days, the House of Commons again passed the resolution, but any period when Parliament is dissolved shall not be counted in computing the one hundred and eighty days.

That is in the Trudeau constitution.

> (1) The procedures for amendment may be initiated by the Senate, by the House of Commons, or by the Legislative Assembly of a province.

That is in the Trudeau Constitution.

> (2) A resolution authorizing an amendment may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation.

That is in the Trudeau Constitution. This is a document written and signed by René Lévesque along with the other seven premiers.

> (3) A resolution of—

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, I apologize for asking a question, but I was not in the chamber when you began your speech. I have been listening for three quarters of an hour and you keep talking about Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Lévesque. I doubt that they had anything much to say about the GST in the document you are referring to. I wonder where is the link between third reading of the bill now before us and your reading these papers on the constitution. It flows from your lengthy introduction, but could you sum it up for me in two minutes?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I can sum it up for you. During the previous shift, two of your colleagues began talking about the GST and went on to upbraid Mr. Chrétien for his lack of firmness in connection with the constitutional issue. Naturally, this opened up the question of the constitution. This is why I repeat some of the things I said during the first shift because the matter of the current Prime Minister's credibility is of utmost importance. Anything to do with the GST and any action taken by this government depend on the credibility of the Prime Minister.

I am in the process of demonstrating that on such a crucial issue as the constitution he does not have that credibility.

I continue. This is the document written and signed by Mr. Lévesque.

[English]

> 7. Subject to sections 9 and 10, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

That is in the Trudeau Constitution.

> 8. Subject to section 9, the Legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

And that is in the Trudeau Constitution.

> 9. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada when authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the Legislative Assemblies of all of the provinces:
>
> (a) the office of the Queen, of the Governor General or of the Lieutenant Governor;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators representing the province at the time this provision comes into force;

(c) the use of the English or French language except with respect to section 4;

And that is in the Constitution that Mr. Trudeau promulgated.

(d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada;

(e) an amendment to any of the provisions of this Part.

The amending formula continues:

Amendments to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters shall be made in accordance with the provisions of section 1(1) of this Part and sections 1 (2) and 1 (3) shall not apply:

(a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selection of members thereto;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) the Supreme Court of Canada, except with respect to clause (d) of section 9.

And that is in the Constitution that Mr. Trudeau promulgated. Yet it is a text that Mr. Lévesque wrote and signed.

I continue:

(e) the extension of existing provinces into the Territories;

This comes under the amendments that can only be done under section 1.1.

(e) the extension of existing provinces into the Territories;

(f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces;

• (0750)

(g) an amendment to any of the provisions of Part B.

I continue with the Amending Formula as follows:

1. A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the First Ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada within fifteen years of the enactment of this Part to review the provisions for the amendment of the Constitution of Canada.

The first ministers also gave some explanatory notes which I think are interesting to hear.

Part B allows for the delegation of legislative authority from one order of government to the other, something which is not now provided for in the B.N.A. Act. Delegation of legislative authority would add considerable flexibility to Canada's constitutional arrangements and could reduce the duplication of administrative services.

[Senator Gigantès.]

This Part would permit the Parliament of Canada to consent to the making of a provincial law in an area of federal responsibility. Conversely, it would permit one or more provinces to consent to the making of a federal law in an area of provincial responsibility.

This is the premiers talking, and this is a point Mr. Trudeau not only accepted but for which he was always arguing.

There is also provision for the consents to relate to all laws in relation to a particular matter of jurisdiction, as distinct from a particular statute. In the event of delegation, financial compensation is payable to the governments exercising delegated power.

I would like to turn to Senator Tremblay as he was saying this is a very important issue. He is otherwise engaged so I will come back to him on that point.

Delegation could conceivably be used to test the effect of transferring responsibility for a certain jurisdictional area before proceeding in a more general way through the amending formula itself. Finally, a delegation of power may be revoked upon two years' notice.

1. Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution of Canada, Parliament may make laws—

We are coming back to the agreement of eight premiers.

—in relation to a matter coming within the legislative jurisdiction of a province, if prior to the enactment, the Legislature of at least one province has consented to the operation of such a statute in that province.

2. A statute passed pursuant to section 1 shall not have effect in any province unless the Legislature of that province has consented to its operation.

That is in the Trudeau Constitution. These are proposals by René Levesque that Trudeau accepted and put into the 1982 Constitution.

3. The Legislature of a province may make laws in the province in relation to a matter coming within the legislative jurisdiction of Parliament, if, prior to the enactment, Parliament has consented to the enactment of such a statute by the Legislature of that province.

4. A consent given under this Part may relate to a specific statute or to all laws in relation to a particular matter.

5. A consent given under this Part may be revoked upon giving two years' notice, and

(a) if the consent was given under section 1, any law made by Parliament to which the consent relates shall thereupon cease to have effect in the province revoking the consent, but the revocation of the consent does not affect the operation of that law in any other province;

(b) if the consent was given under section 3, any law made by the Legislature of a province to which the consent relates shall thereupon cease to have effect.

Senator Doody: Senator Gigantès, speak from your own place. Is that your place?

Senator Gigantès: Would you like me to move there? I can.

Senator Doody: That is what the rules say. You are a staunch enforcer of the rules.

Senator Muir: Nothing should be recorded from another seat.

Senator Gigantès: There we are.

> 6. In the event of a delegation of legislative authority from Parliament to the Legislature of a province, the Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of that province, taking into account the per capita costs to exercise that jurisdiction.

Senator Tremblay, may we come back to the point you raised where I said that Mr. Trudeau accepted the delegation only partially. I would like to draw your attention to Article 43 of the Constitution.

Senator Simard: Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau!

Senator Gigantès: I know. You are right.

Senator Simard: Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau!

Senator Gigantès: I continue as follows:

> 43. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including—

Senator Simard: Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau!

Senator Gigantès:

> (a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces, and
>
> (b) any amendment to any provision that relates to the use of the English or the French language within a province,—

Senator Simard: Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau!

Senator Gigantès:

> —may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General—

Senator Simard: That is not a question, by the way.

Senator Gigantès:

> —under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies.

This amendment would have allowed the making of separate and specific delegation deals with a specific province and not necessarily with all of them. It was put in the Constitution so that special deals could be made with Quebec. There was no possibility of doing anything because Quebec refused to negotiate.

You give me another explanation for this. The provision for a special and distinct status is there. It happens to be in the Constitution and was put there by Mr. Trudeau.

Senator Tremblay: Look at Article 16.

Senator Gigantès: I will look at 16 in a moment.

Senator Stollery: Articles 16 to 20.

Senator Tremblay: Articles 16 to 20.

Senator Gigantès: These are the linguistic matters and they were accepted by Mr. Lévesque. It is in there. It is conceded.

Senator Tremblay: Section 43 was meant to apply sections 16 to 20.

Senator Gigantès: I know, but it also allowed special deals with a province. So what happens?

Senator Tremblay: That is construed on your part.

Senator Gigantès: The words are there; you do not have to construe them. The words are there. What we have is a document written by Mr. Lévesque and signed by Mr. Lévesque.

Senator Simard: Go back to your seat, go back to your seat.

Senator Stollery: It is OK; I prefer the company here.

Senator Gigantès: It was accepted by Mr. Trudeau. It is because my glasses of water are there, sir. It was accepted by Mr. Trudeau in a demonstration—

An Hon. Senator: Move them, move them.

Senator Stollery: Simard would have you in chains if he could. He would prefer leg irons.

Senator Gigantès: I did not know he was kinky. Are you kinky, Senator Simard? Would you like me in chains?

Senator Stollery: Yes, in chains, leg irons and handcuffs.

Senator Gigantès: So what happens? Let me continue a little. We have the example of considerable flexibility by Mr. Trudeau. He accepts practically the totality of what Mr. Lévesque was asking.

Senator Simard: That is why Turner left him; he is so flexible a man.

Senator Gigantès: Of course, Mr. Lévesque, as head of a separatist party, could not possibly accept a federalist Constitution. So he backed out from something he more or less had signed. What is worse, in backing out during the negotiations, he turned on his seven partners because, above all, those seven partners did not want a referendum.

It appears in this document, "avoids the need for a referendum to choose an amending formula or as a method of amending the Constitution." It is mentioned repeatedly. They did not want a referendum. Senator Hatfield was here earlier and said that was true. The premiers did not want a referendum. Mr. Trudeau wanted a referendum. There is a discussion during the day before the Night of the long knives, and there were difficulties negotiating the agreement. Mr. Trudeau says, why do we not have a referendum and let the people decide? Mr. Lévesque says right, let us have a referendum. Mr. Trudeau says OK and leaves the meeting.

Now, what did Mr. Lévesque do by that statement? He abandoned his seven colleagues on a point that was absolutely crucial to them. They totally lost their trust in him and consequently they hurried to make a deal. To soften the blow of this deal, Mr. Lévesque's own proposals formed the basis of that deal.

Hold on. So what is it Mulroney has done? Mulroney defended this in 1982. He said it was splendid. He wrote an article in La Presse saying so. Splendid. He sent congratulations to Mr. Trudeau. He praised this in speech after speech.

Senator Simard: Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau!

Senator Gigantès: Then, when he wanted to get elected in 1984, he needed a political machine in Quebec. There was one available and offering itself; it was that of the Party Quebecois, the separatist party. Mr. Mulroney adopted the key phrases of the vocabulary of the Péquiste. One of the key phrases of that vocabulary is "the 1982 betrayal". It is Mr. Mulroney who betrayed. He knifed the backs of the people he had supported.

He looks like one of those hydrostatic birds that you put in front of a glass and it dips its nose and it stands up. I do not know what his glass contains.

Having done the dirty on Trudeau and Jean Chrétien, Mr. Mulroney cannot forgive them. That is the explanation. I hope it answers your question, senator.

• (0800)

Senator Davey: I was interested in Senator Simard who was attempting to hector you by mumbling the name Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau over and over again, and I thought that was an inverted form of flattery. I thought he might be interested—I see he is leaving, but I hoped he might stay around long enough.

I have in hand a Toronto Star-CTV poll, November 26, "Who best represents your view of Canada?" It is rather interesting. Trudeau tops the list of seven leaders. Out of seven leaders—Senator Simard has left. Perhaps, when he returns I can complete this study—you won't be surprised, Senator Gigantès, that Pierre Trudeau is at 28 per cent. In the Atlantic provinces he is at 34 per cent. Mr. Mulroney is at nine per cent. I mentioned the Atlantic provinces for Senator Simard's benefit. In my province of Ontario, Trudeau is at 38 per cent and Prime Minister Mulroney is at six per cent. The point is that the things you have been saying about the former prime minister, apparently he is almost as popular today as he was when he was the leader.

Senator Stollery: Does Mr. Mulroney have relatives in Ontario? I was just wondering about the six per cent.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Davey, you should not be too hard on Senator Simard. He was reciting his mantra, Trudeau, Trudeau. He was reciting his mantra.

Senator Stollery: I have a question for you, Senator Gigantès. My curiosity was aroused when you mentioned this business of the provincial premiers and the referendum, and I have never understood why they are so opposed to the referendum. Why in Ontario is that? That is something that I don't understand.

Senator Gigantès: At the highest level of motivation, as I said earlier, there is the feeling that in the British-style parliamentary system, the legislature is elected and the legislature produces a government which has a prime minister, and the legislature, through its prime minister, does not feel like being second-guessed. At the highest level of motivation, they feel that a referendum distorts the whole system which gets a run lasting three or four years.

Senator Stollery: May I point out to you, Senator Gigantès, that in the United Kingdom they do have referenda. They had one on the EEC and they are contemplating another one.

Senator Gigantès: The United Kingdom took that decision, but it has not been—it is a precedent—it has not been a practice in British democracy to have referenda whereas the Swiss have them constantly. To put it at a lower level of motivation, no premier likes running the risk of being repudiated by his people in a referendum on a major issue. They object to referenda.

Senator Stollery: Actually, the real issue is the possible repudiation. For example, I suppose the premier would not object to the referendum if he or she thought they were going to win it. The problem they have with it is, in fact, if they think they are going to lose it. Where they become nervous, I suppose, is when they are losing the confidence of the people that they claim to represent. It does seem a rather artificial claim; does it not?

Senator Gigantès: I am not prepared to tar all premiers and put the same sort of feathers on them. There may be some who theoretically and quite honestly believe that a referendum has no place in the British parliamentary system.

Senator Stollery: Even though they have them in Britain?

Senator Gigantès: Those are very new in Britain.

Senator Stollery: But they have them.

Senator Gigantès: They are very new. That is the point.

If I may resume, refreshing the minds of my fellow senators about testimony that we received in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee of the GST, this is testimony being given alternately by Ms. Edith Johnston, Secretary of the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens' Federation and Mr. Alex Mansfield who is President of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario. At this point, Ms. Johnston is still continuing her exposé:

> The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens' Federation worked with a number of community groups from across the country a little while ago to expose the GST. I will not read out the names of all the groups that participated. However, in summary, I will say that the National Pensioners has added its voice to those of a huge number of ordinary Canadians who are asking that Parliament reject the proposed GST and instead to look at instituting real tax reform based on ability to pay.
> Corporations should pay their share of the tax burden. The wealthy should pay a higher proportion of their income in taxes than poor people. Tax loopholes and income tax allowances that protect the wealthy from taxation should be eliminated. These measures would allow Canada to collect the revenue it needs to run our existing social programs and to collect it in a way that is fair to all Canadians.

Thank you for listening to me. We would welcome some questions and some dialogue with you.

The Chairman: Would you outline your organization, the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens' Federation, and tell us how many members you have? I heard a figure of 300,000 for Ontario. What areas are represented by your organization? Is this a brief that has been developed by all your provincial affiliates? You did not tell us much about that.

A very pertinent question by the Chairman.

Ms. Johnston: I am sorry about that, Mr. Chairman. The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens' Federation represents .75 million to 1 million senior citizens from across Canada. Every province has a provincial organization, such as the United Senior Citizens of Ontario, that is affiliated with the National. We have affiliates from the grass roots and up.

• (0810)

I do not like that metaphor either, but it deals with the senior citizens.

The briefs that will be presented from across Canada will be very similar to ours. Our policy and our resolutions at our conventions are all the same.

The Chairman: You are an umbrella organization for senior citizen groups across the country?

Ms. Johnston: Yes. We are a non-profit organization. We do not have researchers and a lot of expert staff. We are quite unsophisticated but are willing to stand up for our rights and see what we can do to fight for them.

The Chairman: I might explain to our witnesses that the questioners are limited to five minutes. The chairman, on instruction, at the end of the five-minute period will stop the questioning.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am very glad that we have both of you here this morning because almost every single group that we have heard from in the last two days has indicated that the cost of living for people on fixed incomes—mostly seniors—will go up. That will also be the case in the area of tourism and clothing. The Ontario March of Dimes came to us concerned about what will happen to people with disabilities. Rent, home ownership or building ownership and a whole range of professional occupations such as dietitians, massage therapists, occupational therapists, people whose services seniors especially might need, along with books, periodicals and reading materials will all be affected. Yesterday we heard that even for pets, companion animals that you might have, you will have to pay 7 per cent on their shots and so on. So we are really quite appalled at what is going to go on in your lives.

Our friends on the other side said yesterday that there is a certain proportion of seniors who have a lot of money. I suppose there are some. I would like to ask you how many in your organization will really have difficulty in two ways: first because they are on fixed incomes, and second because they will have difficulty getting the rebates which will be available to them because of their health, literacy or whatever else. How many people are really going to be most hard hit by this tax?

Ms. Johnston: The National Pensioners is a grass roots organization. Every single senior citizen, and more than our group represents, will be affected by the GST simply because it taxes the very basics of life. The two groups of people which will be hit the most are students who do not have incomes and seniors. Students will have to pay the 7 per cent tax, as will seniors, just the same as the wealthy. There is no graduated base here. Thus, every single thing from diapers to coffins will be taxed, except some food. There is some question as to what kinds of food will be taxed.

In remarks earlier I pointed out that students in universities eat prepared foods—things such as sandwiches. They have to eat at least two meals in the cafeteria and will buy a sandwich, perhaps, on the way home. Good students are hard working. They do not necessarily have the time to cook. That sort of food will be taxed.

I have also done a calculation which shows that a student with an income of approximately $7,000 will be taxed more than the rebate that such a student would receive. The tax would be approximately $490 and the rebate would be approximately $270. The student would be $220 worse off. For a student on an income of $7,000, to cover everything including tuition, a loss of $220 is a considerable one. But that, of course, would not worry a Tory.

Returning to the text, Mr. Mansfield stated:

> In the Province of Ontario we are looking at approximately 47 per cent who receive gains.

He means various extra bits of help for people who would otherwise be destitute.

Senator Marsden: So we are looking at at least 150,000 people in the Province of Ontario?

Ms. Johnston: We do not have the statistics with regard to the percentages, and I do not have them in my head. But we know that in today's society there are a great many low-income people. It is not only the low-income people who will be affected by this measure, it will be those who are just above the low-income people. It is the middle-income people who are still going to be taxed the same as the wealthy. This just is not fair.

[Translation]

I read in the newspaper last night that the cost of housing will go up by $10,000 simply because of what the GST will do to all the things that are involved in housing.

Something else I would like to mention is that at a time when we are wanting to restrain on some of these things in order to implement the GST thousands of people will have to be employed.

Earlier this morning, I referred to the fact that administration costs represent 9.3 per cent of sales, which is quite a lot. These administration costs were measured in Europe. I read some excellent literature on the subject and also a study by the International Monetary Fund. I agree with these studies that the cost is around 9.3 per cent. So what does the businessman do about those 9.3 per cent administration costs he did not have before? He is going to pass them on to his customers. So we will have a 7 per cent tax plus 9.3 per cent administration costs that will be passed on to the customer. And that is something economists who support the GST have not given sufficient consideration.

This will certainly have a negative impact. There will be a recession. If you take the small businessman, his sales are already dropping because of the recession. His prices will go up because of the GST, and his administration costs will go up as well, which will cause prices to rise even more, and because of the recession, he is going to lose sales. He is going to be caught in a squeeze between rising prices and dropping sales.

And we will see even more bankruptcies that we have seen so far. In fact, it is happening already.

Here we have a question by Senator Poitras. He said:

> Mr. Chairman, thank you for the opportunity to comment on the questions of Senator Marsden. She always has good questions.
>
> Could you tell me, Madam, how much each of these senior citizens pays in federal sales tax right now?
>
> Ms. Johnston: I do not know.
>
> Senator Poitras: Do you agree that you now pay the federal sales tax and that it costs you something?
>
> Ms. Johnston: If I pay federal sales tax, is it not hidden? Is that not the 13.5 per cent tax?
>
> Senator Poitras: The manufacturers' sales tax, yes, call it any name you like. You are aware of that?
>
> Ms. Johnston: Yes.
>
> Senator Poitras: How much does it cost you and other senior citizens annually? Would you agree with the official figure of $800 per person?
>
> Ms. Johnston: I have no idea. I have never done that kind of research.
>
> Senator Poitras: I think it is important that you be aware of it.
>
> Second, do you agree that there will be a credit to seniors under the new tax? Thus, if you have these two figures how much more will the new tax cost you?
>
> Ms. Johnston: Are you talking about the tax back?
>
> Senator Poitras: The credit that people will receive every three months.
>
> Ms. Johnston: It is not going to do senior citizens very much good. Seniors who are at the low-income or middle-income level and who pay all the federal sales tax are not going to get back what they pay.
>
> Senator Poitras: Do you have any figures in that regard?
>
> Ms. Johnston: No, I do not.
>
> Senator Poitras: Could you get us figures?

Then we have a comment by Mr. Mansfield:

> May I mention the fact that 25 per cent of Canadians live in poverty. They will not be filing income tax returns. Thus they will not be getting any credits.
>
> Senator Poitras: Why?
>
> Mr. Mansfield: Why will they not do it? Because they do not have to.
>
> Senator Poitras: For a group like you it will involve a one-page form.
> Mr. Mansfield: Also, the fact is that a family of four earning $15,000 will pay $938 in GST but will receive only $508 in terms of a tax credit. They are losing out.

I have another argument I would like to add at this point. The government has finally come out of the closet.

[English]

He has come out of the closet and says "Yes, it is going to collect extra money in order to bring down the deficit." At the beginning that was not going to happen. It was going to be revenue neutral, no extra money, and therefore it was going to be a much better tax to replace that wicked, wicked killer of jobs, the manufacturers' sales tax. That of course harmed exports but nowhere near as much as exports are harmed by the high dollar produced by Mr. Wilson's manic infatuation with high rates of interest.

● (0820)

It seems simple. If there is going to be sufficiently more money taken out of the system in order to reduce the national debt, people are going to pay that money. It is not going to result from immaculate conception or spontaneous generation. It will come out of the pockets of ordinary people. They will be paying more tax than they were before, otherwise the government will not have the extra money it needs, it says, to reduce the deficit.

There is a basic fallacy at the heart of this tax, put there by the government's propaganda. The government never levels with the people and says it needs more money so it is going to take more money. No, no. It says, "We are going to change the tax because it is wicked, and we are going to have a sweet pussycat of a tax, a fair tax. It will make us more money, but you will not pay more money." That is roughly what the government has been trying to sell, and is still trying to sell. It would be nice if it could be done. It would be equivalent to the philosopher's stone which was supposed to transmute base metals into gold. However, no one has much succeeded in that.

I must say I was a little sympathetic with Mrs. Johnston. I happened to be present at that particular time when Senator Poitras, a very nice man, was pushing her to give him figures which she did not have, and for a very good reason. There is no way of making any sense out of the government's figures. Senators opposite may not be aware of this, but traders are receiving continual alterations to the regulations already. The tax is already a nightmare.

[Translation]

Then Senator Poitras said that they will not pay the manufacturers' sales tax any longer, something which costs them $800 a year. Later on, we see that Senator Poitras is stuck, when all of a sudden we are talking of a family paying $800 in tax but getting nothing back. I am quoting you, senator, from Issue No. 59 relating to Bill C-62, when you questioned Mr. Mansfield on the subject.

Mr. Mansfield answered that a family of four earning $15,000 will pay $938 in GST but will receive only $508 in tax credits. They are losing out. That is when you mentioned they will not pay the $800 any longer. You know all that by heart. How can you reconcile bringing in additional revenue with the new tax to fight the deficit—right?—and not taking more money from the taxpayers?

Without dipping into the pockets of Canadians, you will never get the surplus you need to fight the deficit. How will you come up with these additional funds if the new tax does not bring in more than the existing manufacturers' sales tax? It has always been a mystery to me.

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, you do not understand. Indeed, you do not understand that, in economics, it is not a matter of simply reducing the interest rates, and do this or that. We have a set of tax measures and this set enables us in the end to carry out our responsibilities and provide programs to the public. However, for the government as for anybody, there are only 100 cents in a dollar.

When the Liberals were forming the government, they did not understand that fact. That is why the country was in debt when we came to power. We have always lived beyond our means. I believe the time has come to stop living beyond our means. That is the foremost responsibility. It is the responsiblity of the elected and non-elected members of Parliament to be aware of that.

Senator Gigantès: I am very grateful to you to have at last explained that to me. So you will be collecting more money from this new tax than from the old one to meet your responsibilities and stop living beyond your means. Therefore the new tax will generate more revenue than the old one, will it not?

Senator Poitras: That is to allow for more productivity. With greater productivity, more revenue will be available to the government. There will not be as big a black market and fewer people will seek ways of avoiding tax on this or that. Everybody will pay equally. That is what a fair tax is all about.

Senator Gigantès: It will be one of those magical taxes. And you say the black market will not be as big. You see, there is the European experience. That tax was examined in Europe. The black market did not shrink, it grew. Pick the study you want: that of the International Monetary Fund that says there is a black market under this tax and that everybody cheats on the GST, or quite a large number of people; or a study made by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the National Federation of Independent Business, education and research foundation. I was telling this to your colleagues of the previous shift who were getting a little bit tired; not as obviously as you at this time of day, but I like it when you are peppy, Senator Poitras. That would break my heart to see you downcast, really!

Senator Poitras: I gave you a chance to rest.

Senator Gigantès: So you do not want to answer the question anymore?

Senator Poitras: No. That is all old stuff.

Senator Gigantès: All old stuff.

Senator Poitras: We have known for a long time what you are saying, and it has been better said by better qualified people.

Senator Gigantès: I say that you are going to take more money than ever before out of the taxpayer's pocket. You are telling us that in the middle of a recession, with our dollar at 86 cents, sky-high interest rates, 165,000 manufacturing jobs lost in 1989, bankruptcies on the upsurge, you are going to introduce the GST and bingo, the recession will disappear because you have reduced the purchasing power of the population. That is what you are saying.

Senator Poitras: That is not what I said.

Senator Gigantès: Explain to me how you can say it any other way! Go on, I sit down. You are going to explain that to us on Wednesday. Tuesday I will probably be speaking, because I promised Senator MacDonald I would give him some information on some other ways to collect that money. I told you the other day about ways to reduce your spending. If you had lowered interest rates to the American level and if you had the same tax rates as the United States have on corporate profits, the national debt would have been $85 billion lower as of December 31st, 1989.

You did not want to do that, because high interest rates are fine for people with money to lend, that is your friends. Then, let's stop talking about you and Mr. Mansfield. Here is what Mrs. Johnston was saying:

> We still feel that what we are saying in here is true.

● (0830)

Finally, Senator Haidasz, a man much more concerned about the plight of needy Golden agers who is not a big capitalist, a good family physician, who takes care of poor people and whose main concern is not to make money but to cure people. Senator Haidasz raised the folowing issue: I was speaking in French just before you, Senator Simard:

> First, I would like to say how much I appreciate your appearance here this morning before our committee.

Doctor David is a lot less fussy on the French issue than Senator Simard. He is more courteous. He is an extremely polite gentleman. Senator Hébert still remembers how Senator David cured him of his angina pectoris. It was angina, was it not? Senator Hébert had told us that he had sought your advice about his problems in your area of expertise as a cardiologist. I know that because of your oath of secrecy, you cannot tell me what he was suffering from. We will have to ask Jacques Hébert personally. You do not know the difference because you are seeing phrenologists. Dr. David is a cardiologist.

Senator Stollery: Anyway, Dr. David is a very gracious man, a fine gentleman.

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely. That is the effect Senator Simard has on me when I see him. I become just a little more high spirited. I no longer feel any fatigue. It is as though I had just started instead of having started at midnight. What time is it now? Only 8.30 a.m. Only nine hours and thirty minutes to go.

Senator Stollery: I suppose that you are about to start your remarks, because so far, we have only heard the beginning.

Senator Gigantès: No. That was the kick off.

Senator Stollery: No not yet. It is only the beginning.

Senator Gigantès: I am only providing you with information, and when I am about to finish on Tuesday, I will conclude my demonstration. There has to be a general plan, doesn't there? I explained it to your predecessors. There is a Tory tendency. There are some good Tory people who believe that the world would be much better if nobody rocked the boat and allowed things to remain as they are because they personally feel good. They still believe in the good old days.

I told your predecessors that the Roman poet Lucretius, quoting his master Epicurus, had said that, in the good old days, people were all small, happy, stupid and cavern dwellers. There is this dream. I understand that you had an education, but not a classical education. Lucretus was a major philosopher. Once in a while, therefore, there is a Tory counterrevolution which tries to undo the progress which the other classes of society have achieved.

The GST, in your case—because you are part of this counter-revolution—usually chooses a parvenu. It does not choose someone whose wealth dates back to earlier generations. It chooses a parvenu who has just made a pile of money and who is very impressed by the luxury and wealth of the rich and who does their dirty work. He belittles whatever progress may have been made, he shifts the burden of taxes from the rich to the poor, and he does away with east-west links that keep this country together. Via Rail is an example of that.

It is in that context that the Mulroney government took a number of measures to restore the supremacy of conservatism, the way to rally conservative allies in this country, and the result is that the country is severely harmed.

One such thing is the GST. Since that is what we are talking about it is the theme of my speech. I am doing my best to remind you of certain facts which were mentioned before. I know you do not want to hear anything, Senator Poitras, but after all in a democratic society it is one's duty to explain the views of those who are opposed to the majority. A small digression concerning the GST. Why would they want to stop you, and why would Senator Simard get all excited and talk about the rights of the majority? Indeed, the minority has rights as well! I am speaking but I did not address my remarks to you. Can someone say that I was talking to him? I am not talking to him, I am talking about him, and that is different. A simple matter of preposition. You are using the wrong preposition. I am talking about—not to—you. I find him very sympathetic. I gain new strength every time I look at him.

An Hon. Senator: The golden calf.

Senator Gigantès: The golden calf or the golden word! Well, in any event, we in the opposition have a duty... He is surrounded by calves, but they are golden. Senator Simard is surrounded by golden calves and hoping some of it will rub off on him. The other day he had nothing but praise for monsignor Castonguay—

Senator Stollery: No, the monsignor does not like that, the monsignor over there. Fortunately he is not here.

Senator Gigantès: I can have a small slice of tangerine without upsetting Senator Castonguay, he who got carried away earlier. Why say I had no right to eat a tangerine? Other colleagues are or were nibbling. Others come here slightly under the weather but that does not offend him. There is the difference. My tangerine has not fermented and does not contain alcohol, so that is bad. But if one of his colleagues were drinking pure alcohol, that would be all right.

We have the duty to do what we are doing, Senator Poitras.

• (0840)

[English]

A situation in which the activity of politics is devalued is inimical to parliamentary democracy. Parliament, after all, is fundamentally about debate—"rhetoric" in the classical Greek sense—and the transacting of the people's business in public.

We do not have much of a public, but such as it is, welcome. Such as it is, welcome, oh public.

Parliament is also about the right to dissent. Genuine political opposition is a necessary attribute of democracy, tolerance, and trust in the ability of citizens to resolve differences by peaceful means.

The only person who has threatened the use of violence here, and we heard him, is the Leader of the Government.

Senator Stollery: He has withdrawn that. He withdrew—

Senator Gigantès: He withdrew the threat or he said he didn't say what he did say?

Senator Stollery: Like the Bishop of Crewe.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, all right.

The existence of an opposition, without which politics ceases and administration takes over, is indispensable to the functioning of parliamentary political systems. If these systems are perceived as not working well—as being "seriously overloaded", to quote a distinguished Canadian opposition leader, the Honourable Robert Stanfield—it may be the rights of political oppositions which are immediately and most visibly at stake, but ultimately the threat is to the democratic rights and freedoms generally.

The division between government and opposition is as old as political democracy itself.

I will just give you one little anecdote. Pericles, the great democratic statesman of ancient Athens—my mantra, my ancient Greek Trudeau—was walking home one night from the prytaneion, which was Government House in ancient Athens.

Senator Stollery: Senator Barootes would know all about this.

Senator Gigantès: And he was followed all the way home by a citizen who was pouring insults on him, a sort of ancient Athenian Simard. When Pericles arrived at his home, he called his servants, told them to take torches and light his fellow citizen home. The servant said, "For heaven's sake, boss, master, the fellow has been insulting you all the way from the prytaneion." Pericles said, "It is his right and his duty. This is a democracy." So, if Pericles could put up with that, I can put up with something and you should be able to put up with—I restrain myself. I almost said a name, but I did not.

So the division between government and opposition is as old as political democracy itself.

In Aristotle's Athenian polity, the essence of self-government was that the citizens were, in turn, both the rulers and the ruled. Government could alternate among different groups of citizens, and the minority could seek to persuade a majority of its point of view by political means rather than by violence.

In an age of mass politics, direct citizen democracy has been replaced, with rare exceptions by representative systems providing for periodic elections. In turn, these electoral contests are usually dominated by a small number of political parties which select their own candidates and leaders.

What has not changed, however, in our modern liberal-democratic society—and that is "liberal democratic society", with a small "small l" liberal, not to be confused, with the big "L" Liberal, which is us. However, on the other side—and I am digressing because of the excellent meeting of the Foreign Affairs committee that Senator Ottenheimer organized the other day for us to meet Mr. Georgi Arbatov, a powerful Soviet official, whom most of us had met before. Here he was complaining about the Conservatives. Whom did he mean by "Conservatives"? The Stalinists? The Brezhnevites. It was an accurate description, because what he was talking about was people who had a quiet vested interest and wanted no challenge from any change.

When Conservatives talk of "change", what they mean is the return to the good old days when they were on top. Totally. And nobody else had any other privileges. That is what they mean by "change".

Senator Simard: During the Liberal years. You are right. Crushing people.

Senator Hastings: Those were years of progress and prosperity.

• (0850)

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon.

Senator Hastings: They were years of progress and prosperity.

An Hon. Senator: We never had it so good.

Senator Barootes: What about price or wage controls?

Senator Hastings: That was you. That was your policy.

An Hon. Senator: No, it was your policy.

Senator Gigantès: Is this a point of order? You really are an impossible people. You mind when we adopt your policies and you mind when we do not. There is no way we can please you.

Senator Doody: Ours were the years when Canada was great. That should please you.

Senator Gigantès: I like this kind of participation, Senator Doody.

Senator Simard: 20 per cent interest rates.

Senator Barootes: Years of debt.

Senator Gigantès: Years of what?

Senator Barootes: Debt.

Senator Gigantès: Are you talking about private medicine?

Senator Hastings: Debt. You are the experts. Deficits, deficits and debt. Deficits and debt.

Senator Stollery: Senator Davey, would you like to remind us of the poll that you just read? Would you like to read your survey again?

Senator Frith: If I were to have a nice quiet chat, somehow I do not think I would have it in front of Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Do you have a problem?

Senator Frith: No, but I think your colleagues might be having one.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Davey, could you read that poll, please?

Senator Davey: The leadership poll?

Senator Hastings: Senator Simard did not hear that poll.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Simard has to be reminded that the voice of the people is the voice of God.

Senator Davey: Senator Gigantès, this is a poll that appeared in the Toronto Star on Monday, November 26. It was entitled "Who best represents your view of Canada?"

Senator Frith: Start at the bottom.

Senator Davey: The numbers were: Pierre Trudeau, 28 per cent.

An Hon. Senator: We are not listening.

Senator Davey: Clyde Wells, 13 per cent; Audrey MacLaughlin, 10 per cent; Jean Chrétien, 9 per cent; Brian Mulroney, 9 per cent; Lucien Bouchard, 7 per cent; Preston Manning, 6 per cent.

There is a regional breakdown and I was anxious to refer to the Atlantic for the sake of Senator Simard who was so interested in it. Pierre Trudeau led with 34 per cent and Brian Mulroney was at 9 per cent.

Senator Hastings: Where was Senator Simard?

Senator Davey: In Ontario, which is my province, Pierre Trudeau led with 38 per cent; Brian Mulroney was at 6 per cent. This is a clear indication of the continuing popularity of the former Prime Minister. I think we should be grateful to Senator Simard for repeating his name over and over and over again.

Senator Barootes: Stalin remained popular for 20 years after he died.

Senator Frith: With you, perhaps.

Senator Hastings; You worshipped him.

Senator Simard: Are you predicting a Trudeau comeback? Senator Davey, are you wishing for a Trudeau comeback?

Senator Hastings: There are a lot of Canadians wishing for that.

Senator Davey: That would be too much to hope for.

Senator Kenny: Senator Davey, could you tell us the methodology for how that poll was taken, please.

Senator Doody: If he does, he will have spoken in the debate.

Senator Frith: You are right. You had better ask Senator Gigantès what he thinks of the methodology.

Senator Davey: I thought I had posed my question to Senator Gigantès.

Senator Hastings: You are asking a question.

Senator Davey: I thought he wanted to reflect on this particular poll in view of the comments, mumbling and jumbling from Senator Simard. I wondered how you squared that, Senator Gigantès. I am sure it was disturbing for you to listen to that and I thought you would find this Trudeau information helpful. Do you not find it helpful?

Senator Gigantès: I find it extremely helpful.

Senator Frith: Good.

Senator Gigantès: I also find it tragic.

Senator Frith: You are right again.

Senator Gigantès: As I said in an article I wrote, which was published in the Moncton Times-Transcript, "May my father's Liberal soul forgive me, but for the next two years I long for a credible Tory Prime Minister, because the dangerous period for this country is the next two years." Quebec is going to come up with proposals for a radical restructuring of the federation and who will be leading us? The apprentice sorcerer and his inept acolyte? They blew Meech Lake. With eight provinces on side, the two opposition parties backing them, they blew it. This is the gang of Keystone cops.

Senator Hastings: Dice throwers.

Senator Stollery: It is a good thing they blew it because—

Senator Gigantès: Just think of it. Who speaks for Canada?

Senator Stollery: Well, right now, nobody we know of. Except for Jean Chrétien.

Senator Gigantès: In the government, is it possible that English Canadians could at any time trust Brian Mulroney, who is a prisoner of his separatist caucus, as everybody knows. English Canadians are not stupid. That is why Trudeau is so much more popular. That is why Mr. Mulroney is down to 3 per cent—where was it was down to 3 per cent?

Senator Davey: Somewhere in New Brunswick, I think.

Senator Gigantès: In New Brunswick?

Senator Stollery: Senator Neiman, I think, has a question for you.

Senator Neiman: Senator Gigantès, I thought perhaps you would like to revert to a question concerning the GST for a moment.

Senator Simard: Good idea.

Senator Neiman: Perhaps too much conversation regarding Mr. Trudeau becomes a little troublesome for the other side, from time to time. Especially with some of the facts and figures that Senator Davey has been able to put on the record just now.

Senator Simard: Those do not scare us.

Senator Neiman: I am sure you have read this article in The Gazette.

Senator Frith: Ask him if he has, please.

Senator Neiman: Certainly. Have you read this article in The Gazette dated November 27? The title of it is, "Language is the latest snag in the proposed GST legislation." The smaller headline says, "Years of litigation could result, lawyer says". It is written by Craig Toomey of The Gazette.

> The French-language version of the federal government's proposed goods-and-services tax legislation differs significantly from the English text and could result in years of litigation, a senior Montreal tax lawyer said yesterday.

This is a quotation of which I think you should be aware:

> "As far as I'm concerned this will certainly give rise to disputes," Claude Desaulniers, senior tax partner at Stikeman Elliot, told reporters on the opening day of a major tax conference organized by the non-profit Canadian Tax Foundation.
>
> Desaulniers said that the French version of the 330-page Bill C-62 "is more of an adaptation" than a direct translation of the original English text and is "quite different."

My interest is particularly piqued by this because our Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee is, at the moment, studying draft proposals regarding anomalies and anachronisms in various pieces of legislation. One of the things we have to deal with is the lack of concordance between English and French texts.

Senator Carney: Is this a speech or a question?

Senator Neiman: This is a question and I am coming to it. Just be patient.

Senator Gigantès: I want to be able to understand it.

Senator Neiman: I want to point out that there is a judicial convention insofar as criminal law is concerned that, if there is a lack of concordance between two texts, the interpretation which is most favourable to the accused will be adopted.

I wonder if you have heard of a similar type of convention employed by the Department of Revenue, because obviously this lack of concordance between the two texts is going to cause a great deal of litigation.

● (0900)

Senator Gigantès: It is an excellent question and it is very interesting.

Senator Teed: Yes or no?

Senator Gigantès: I have an answer to the question.

Senator Neiman: I would be happy to repeat it again if you would like me to.

Senator Gigantès: Please do. I was being interrupted. It was difficult to hear.

Senator Neiman: I might just read another paragraph because this might help you in your answer, Senator Gigantès. This article goes on to say that:

> Coupled with the fact that the GST bill also is very technical, parts of it are bound to be challenged by unhappy taxpayers in the next two or three years, he predicted. "A court will have to find out which version translates most correctly the intention of the legislation."

Senator Gigantès: Senator Neiman, it is a very interesting question. There is a question of estoppel. I was speaking about it the other day, and the revenue department is very hot on estoppel, a doctrine promulgated by a great jurist of Edward III of England; I thought Senator Beaudoin would find the name of that great jurist for me. He laid the foundations of the great system of common law and started codifying it to some extent. He enunciated the doctrine of estopal which says that if a servant of the Crown makes a mistake, the Crown is not bound by the mistake. The Revenue Department interprets that to mean that it is their duty to get the maximum amount of blood out of a stone, regardless of what errors were committed in the process of writing the law.

Senator Stollery: An old doctrine.

Senator Gigantès: It is a very old doctrine. Pay up first, we will discuss the legalities later.

There is another very interesting point you raise which might explain their theory for introducing it on January 1. Supposing they have two years of life as a government. There are all these Tory lawyers, all these Tory lawyers in Quebec and in other parts of Canada. They are going to have a field day arguing which is the most appropriate course and they will make a lot of money. I wonder if that is one of the reasons they are in so much of a hurry to get through by January 1. They have to give all these people who have been lying for them right, left and centre—distorting and rewriting history and all that—they have to give them some way of making money. You know some of them—well I won't mention any names. I don't want to be mean. I don't think Senator Simard should feel in any way attacked, because he is not a lawyer. He is only an accountant. I don't know if he was present the other day when I was describing the practice of accountancy as the world's oldest profession.

Senator Neiman: I am not sure.

Senator Gigantès: It was first practised by that caveman who said to the other caveman, "If you give me one arm of the baboon you have just killed, I will do you an audit. I will tell you how many arms are left. Except that today it takes an arm and a leg to get an audit.

I don't know if Senator Simard was here last time. I tried that out at a meeting of the Association of Accountants of Montreal and it went down like a lead balloon. Accountants do not have a sense of humour. How could they?

In any event, that is the most serious and difficult thing about what you have just said. Of course, a hard thing to put up with is that, in their hurry, not only are they changing the regulations all the time—which may be because of the lack of concordance between the two texts—but they rushed the thing so much that they did not even take the trouble to do something elementary in a bilingual country to achieve this concordance. I do not know how it is going to be straightened out.

Senator Neiman: Senator Gigantès, in defense of some chartered accountants, at least, are you aware that at least one chartered accountant—in fact, the senior partner of one of our most distinguished firms who wrote one of the so-called "little bibles" in trying to describe the GST and assist other accountants in interpreting the GST—has stated publicly that in spite of the fact that he in general agrees with the GST and is looking forward to all of the business that will be derived from interpreting it, he still feels that there is a serious injustice about to be perpetrated on the taxpayers because of the many, many sections in there that are simply unclear. And do you know that he recommended to our committee—unfortunately his recommendation came a little late, but he recommended that one of the amendments we should try to make to the GST would be to the effect that taxpayers should be saved from paying the penalties on certain of those sections until such time as the actual meaning is clarified by the Department of Revenue. He estimated that, conservatively, it will take from three to five years to clarify many of the sections in the tax. That is why he suggested that this amendment should be put in, in order to help the taxpayers who want to pay their tax, but are simply confused by the language of the text.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Neiman, I hope you did not take my remarks about the orgin of accountancy and the fact that it has the honour of being the world's oldest profession in my reading of pre-history to mean that I lack respect for tax accountants. There are some accountants who lack a sense of humour as is evidenced here quite often, but there are others who do, and the one you cited—would you care to give the name?

Senator Neiman: It is Michener, David Michener.

Senator Gigantès: David Michener seems to be a man of great wisdom and with a great sense of equity and with due regard for the tribulations that ordinary taxpayers will suffer under this abominable, ill-conceived, badly prepared, stupidly constructed, wrongly translated, uncoordinated, over-complex, and generally "Mulroneyite" and "Lowell Murrayite" tax. It is the same sort of confused mindset represented if you like, metaphorically, by a haystack that has been hit by a tornado. They do not know what to do anymore. They do not know which way is up. They are incompetent and they have produced an incompetent tax. They could have adopted a simpler model.

As I was saying to the previous shift, we were told by this administration that they were going to come in and be kissy-smoochy with all the provinces. Oh, wow! I mean the thought was, wjem it wasn't being icky, it was being touchy, having all these touchyfeely sessions of first ministers meeting somewhere and drinking milk to excess and squeezing one another and all telling one another what wonderful people they were and that then they'd go back to the provincial provinces and Ottawa-bashing would be a thing of the past. Never a bad word would escape their lips with regard to the federal government. Poor, little, old Devine would be an utter pussycat with regard to the Rafferty Dam. He would say, "Yes, Sir, Yes, Sir, three bags full, Sir." Most of them would go around with no hair at the front of their heads, tugging at their forelock to dear old Brian.

All this friendship, and not only could they not get the Meech Lake legislation through, but they could not even organize the tax. Most of them stood to make more money if they had come on board.

• (0910)

We could have had a much simpler tax, like that of New Zealand, but no, this government had to find the most complex tax.

Senator Carney: New Zealand taxes food. Do you want to tax food?

Senator Gigantès: I beg your pardon? I will accept an intervention from Senator Carney if she is seated because I realize she has problems. If she will not repeat it, that is fine.

[Senator Neiman.]

Senator Lefebvre: Senator Carney said that New Zealand taxes food, and she had something to say about that.

Senator Gigantès: What I am saying is that they are moral cowards on the other side. If they wanted to have a consumption tax, with compensation to the less well off, they should have taken their courage in both hands and said that they would tax everything at exactly the same rate, with no exceptions, and that they would calculate what to give back to the less well off to take care of that. But no, they had to have different treatment for caviar and yoghurt. We now have this absurd situation, about which most of the people who appeared before the committee complained.

I will get back to the role of the Opposition, because I do not think our friends opposite, after having played that role for years, understand it. They should, but they do not.

It is not only the British-style Parliaments that have ongoing legitimate contestation for decision-making power. Every pluralistic democratic legislature contains both supporters and opponents of the executive. In all parts of the world, these legislatures are confronted with the problem of executive dominance—not all of them, I hope, by a Mulroney—in the face of modern demands for more and more government services.

By the way, if you wnted to read more on this issue, you might look at David Olson's The Legislative Process: A Comparative Approach, published by Harper & Row in 1980, especially Chapter l. The changing balance of forces in political society is the subject of numerous articles in the international comparative politics journal Government and Opposition. I am sure that senators will find it very instructive. Its Autumn 1988 issue contains an article by George Feaver, "Letter from Canada," which surveys the Canadian political developments since 1968. I think it illustrates that the Tories never did learn how to be an opposition and they never did learn how to be a government.

The complaint is often heard that because of pressures legislative politics is inefficient, ineffective, and in danger of becoming obsolete. Accordingly, we are going to look at some of the countervailing powers available to oppositions in legislatures which, through their heritage in the British Commonwealth, look to the Westminster model of parliamentary democracy for inspiration.

By the way, those who have sat in the gallery of the House of Commons know that on occasion it makes the Senate at its worst appear as an oasis of common civility. We did not get down to grunting like pigs—well, with the exception of the Leader of the Government when he was speaking to Senator Molgat. Other senators were banging desks, but I think some of the things that British parliamentarians have done are worse.

Although one speaks of the model of British parliamentary practice, it still rests entirely on convention. The emergence of a set pattern of government and opposition is of comparatively recent origin. There was a time when the subjects thought fit for parliamentary debate were severely limited. There was a time when opposition to the government's handling of affairs of state could be considered to smack of treason—I think that is somewhat the attitude of our friends opposite—and was hence dangerous.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, the member of Parliament who went beyond presenting private, local and special grievances or bills, to oppose the Crown, or even to debate such national issues as the right of succession, foreign policy and religion, risked imprisonment and worse.

This brings to mind the words of Senator Simard when he thought we might return to those good old days, and have us terrified of doing anything except preent private local and special grievances or bills.

Of this period the historian Macaulay said that every man meddling in public affairs took his life in his own hands. Those must have been happy days, because now what has happened is that the life of the whole country—the existence of the country—has been taken into a set of incapable hands: four incapable hands, in effect, in the matter of federal-provincial relations, the two of Mr. Mulroney and the two of his apprentice.

"It was," says McCauley, "we seriously believe, as safe to be a highwayman as to be a distinguished leader of the opposition." I wonder whether Senator Frith ever feels that safe.

It was not until the 18th Century that it came to be constitutionally accepted that an opposition could be loyal across the whole spectrum of public policy. The concept of being loyal includes fighting very hard against the decisions of the government if one believes that that is for the good of the country. It is not being loyal to the government—it is being loyal to the people represented by the Sovereign in the British institution.

Nevertheless, one cannot refer to the existence of an opposition in the modern sense because throughout most of the 18th Century not only was there no disciplined, organized and ongoing political formation dedicated to opposing the government, but the very idea of a faction or party was disreputable—a very Conservative view.

Since the gradual formation of cohesive Whig and Tory party groups in the latter part of the 18th Century, the term "the Opposition" has been applied chiefly to the party or parties whose elected members do not support the ministry and who offer themselves to the voting public, not just as individual candidates, but as an organized and disciplined alternative government. The actual term "His Majesty's Opposition" was coined during a British debate in 1826 and has been in use ever since.

With the development of cabinet government and the rise of political parties, responsible government has come to rely on electoral strategies in addition to strictly parliamentary ones. The governing party is responsible to the Commons chiefly in that it can be turned out of office and replaced by another party at the next election. The government must continue to enjoy the confidence of the House between elections. I suspect that one of the problems is that Mr. Mulroney does not even have the confidence of his own caucus, but there is nothing much its members can do. They are damned if they do and damned if they don't.

Even in minority government situations, the government must continue to enjoy the confidence of the house between elections, but, even in minority government situations, the real test of confidence is not in the daily balance of forces between government and opposition in the chamber but in the anticipated or threatened electoral contest among the major parties.

As the distinguished parliamentarian Stanley Knowles put it:

> . . . the opposition should so conduct itself in Parliament as to persuade the people of the country that it could be an improvement on the government of the day. No one will deny that our system works best when there is a change of government at reasonable intervals.

• (0920)

The role of an opposition party, Mr. Knowles noted, is to check and prod, but ultimately to replace the government party. Bernard Crick has also described the British House of Commons as the place where a "continuous election campaign . . . . is fought." Well, don't be too surprised if we imitate our model.

In Canada in this century, as far as Mr. Knowles' criterion of "reasonable intervals" is concerned, has often been more the exception than the rule. This has led a number of observers to point out the potential dangers to parliamentary processes of long periods of one party control of the executive. We are going to make sure this does not happen in the case of the Tories.

Because electoral standing is a necessary but not a sufficient condition of government legitimacy, one must guard against devaluing the ongoing test of legitimacy which takes place through the intermediary of the legislature and the legislative opposition. Our existence lends what legitimacy you have on either side, because you have none according to the polls. It is the fact of the existence of this institution and of the House of Commons, with an opposition within it, which makes the process legitimate. It is not Mr. Mulroney, it is not his discredited government, it is the institution. Such an institution cannot exist without an opposition that is feisty and fights to defend its rights that are being trampled by your Speaker.

It is crucial to maintain the distinction between parliamentary representative democracy and the sort of direct plebiscitary appeal to the people which history shows can be made compatible with the most technocratic and authoritarian forms of government.

This should be interpreted to mean that the fact that you won an election, which in a sense is a plebiscite, does not mean that you are in the clear. What gives legitimacy to the system of government is the continuing existence of institutions such as the Senate and House of Commons, and their legitimacy rests entirely on the fact that there is an opposition. Without an opposition the government is not legitimate.

A vigorous opposition in Parliament can be the chief bulwark against the temptation to force majeure and bureaucratic empire. Where are our ex-deputy ministers? They are all out of the chamber. I once was lecturing a group of deputy ministers and then we had a discussion and I told them that they remind me of nothing so much as members of the Politburo. They had such an autocratic idea of how things run and such a desire to control their ministers by controlling whatever information the ministers received. So what is the difference between them and the Kremlin?

The people speak through the loyal opposition as well as the government. I have been reading to you the sayings of some people, Ms. Johnston and Mr. Mansfield and others through our petitions. The people speak through us. People also speak through backbenchers as well as cabinet ministers. It is not only my friend Len Marchand who speaks for the people. I, a backbencher, three rows behind him, also speak for the people so long as they let me know what it is they want me to say.

There is simply no substitute for the checks and balances which are brought into play in the representative and watchdog functions performed by ordinary members of Parliament, and we are members of Parliament. There is a deplorable tradition, which Senator Olson never fails to correct, which says "members of Parliament and senators". It should say "members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate", or "members of the House of Commons and senators," because in both Houses we are members of Parliament.

You see, I am a nice fellow. There is my friend Senator Macquarrie listening, I am sure, to very tastefully chosen music. I don't mind. He is wearing an apparatus. He probably has a Walkman tucked away somewhere, hoping to get a better result. I don't object to that.

Senator Frith: It is all right to wear something like that as long as you don't eat it, I guess.

Senator Gigantès: Yes. There was "Monseigneur" Castonguay objecting to my having a piece of tangerine. Really!

Members of the upper house are expected to act as a chamber of sober second thought. By the way, I assure you that it is only drinking water in this glass. I have never been drunk in this place. I have been drunk only three times in my life, and I didn't find it agreeable. On another occasion I will tell you about the last occasion when this happened to me. It was in World War II.

Just as members of the upper house are expected to act as a chamber of sober second thought—and we observe this pretty well, although not always the sober part on your side—as well as a guarantor of minority rights and sectional interests, so, too, members of the opposition in the lower house, are called upon to act as a brake on government haste, to ensure that all legislation receives the due process of parliamentary deliberation, and to see that diverse and opposing points of view have a chance to be aired and defended.

The opposition's role in Canada. By the British North American Act of 1867, Canada inherited a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Responsible cabinet government and the doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament were thereby entrenched in the Canadian political system. The role of the opposition in a parliamentary federation such as Canada's is obviously different from that of congressional representatives in a pluralist federation like the United States, where legislators exercise considerably more independence and need not take their cue from the executive branch. Opposition to government proposals in Congress is expressed through a fluid, often bipartisan, coalition. In Canada the parliamentary opposition is much more structured, and has a more formal status. But it also has to contend with a disciplined government party which may control the legislature for long periods of time—the carrot and stick.

If you want to know what true leadership is, think of Allan MacEachen having to exercise authority over the 50 of us on this side and he has no carrot and no stick. Royce Frith participates in this leadership, and both of them have done so very successfully. They have nothing to offer me as a favour for saying what I am saying now, except their friendship, I hope.

The party system as we know it is here to stay. We cannot go back to Sir John A. Macdonald's day when parties included a number of loose fish and when the government could be defeated by shifting coalitions of members in the Commons without resigning. Today the division between government and opposition, as noted, is highly structured and runs almost exclusively along party lines. This does not mean, however, that everything is a fait accompli, once the party lines are decided at election time.

• (0930)

Interestingly, the term "His (or Her) Majesty's Opposition" has been in use in Canada longer than the title "Prime Minister," an indication of the assured constitutional standing of the former. The role of the Leader of the Opposition and of opposition parties is to be as vigilant and diligent as the members of the government on the other side of the House.

This is how two of Canada's greatest parliamentarians have described the importance of the legislative opposition. First is Stanley Knowles, the one who, they say, has walked the corridors of this august institution with a Bible in one hand and a stiletto in the other. I am quoting Stanley Knowles:

> I submit, therefore, that you do not have full political democracy—

Let alone the economic as well as the political democracy for which his party stood.

> —unless you include along with the ingredients that are taken for granted, such as universal suffrage, the secret ballot and majority rule, a full and unquestioned recognition of the rights and functions of the opposition to the government of the day. Only in this way can you protect the rights of minorities; only in this way can you make sure that the force of public opinion will be brought to > bear on the legislative process, and we are indeed fortunate in Canada to have inherited from the United Kingdom a parliamentary system of government, the genius of which is the responsibility of the government to a Parliament in which the rights of those who support the government and likewise the rights of those who oppose it are clearly recognized.

I wish Speaker Charbonneau were here to hear that.

Someone whom we all loved, even though we may have disagreed with him, who was in the fine, true tradition of Sir John A. Macdonald, was John George Diefenbaker. He addressed the Empire Club of Canada in Toronto on October 27, 1949, on "The role of the Opposition in Parliament." He had not yet taken power. He was at his very best at the time, at the full maturity of his talents as an oppositionist and, of course, he was a great leader and lawyer. He stated in his address:

> If Parliament is to be preserved as a living institution, His Majesty's Loyal Opposition must fearlessly perform its functions. When it properly discharges them, the preservation of our freedom is assured. The reading of history proves that freedom always dies when criticism ends. It upholds and maintains the rights of minorities against majorities.

That is why I was reading to you before from the words of the Canadian Union of Senior Citizens. The opposition upholds and maintains the rights of minorities against majorities. There is always that conflict. You can't have an amicable symbiosis if you don't have democracy. You have to have a fight. Parliament is the substitution of words for combat between two champions in an arena where the judgment of God, le jugement de Dieu, manifested itself by letting the champion of one side win. The loser generally lost his head or an arm or died by some puncture of his body. We eventually substituted a more civilized method of arguing with one another, even yelling at one another. But the discussion, the opposition, the fight is essential for the legitimacy of the institution.

A parliamentary institution of the British persuasion in which there is no dispute, in which there is "touchy-feely" agreement all the time, "smoothy-touchy" is a disservice to democracy and it is going to make the institution appear less legitimate. If the institution of Parliament, either of its chambers, loses its legitimacy by being too tame, then forget it. The government itself loses its legitimacy. This is something that senators opposite had better remember. It is something that Senator Flynn always understood, bless his heart. How I miss him. As I was saying to Senator Flynn on another day, there are some people here who now pretend to be hecklers. They are not fit to tie his shoe laces. I pointed out that I missed him dearly, that many might not but I did, and he said that only I would make a compliment with a sting in its tail, and we both laughed, and that's a good thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker went on to state:

> [The opposition] should supervise all expenditures and prevent over-expenditure by exposing to the light of public opinion wasteful expenditures or worse. It finds fault.

I try to do that all the time, and I must say that with this government it is very easy. I don't have to strain myself at all, honourable Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations. I can find fault in my sleep.

Speaking of the opposition, Mr. Diefenbaker said:

> It suggests amendments; it asks questions and elicits information; it arouses and educates.

Why am I reading all these texts? I was telling Senator Cogger this morning that I had to educate him, and he said, "Who says so?" I said, "John George Diefenbaker says I have to educate you." You, too, Senator Poitras. Your problem is that you think you know everything and you don't want to listen to anything.

I remember the other day you said, without having read my book or listening to it, that you didn't think it was good. I am prepared to accept that it is not good, but from people who read it. You say immediately, without having read it, that it isn't good. It is a defect, it is a block to your further education. You are not too old to learn more, Senator Poitras, and I beseech you to keep an open mind. You might hear something that you will find useful. I try to listen to my daughter, the separatist. I learn a lot of things from her.

So Mr. Diefenbaker said that the Opposition "arouses, educates and molds public opinion by voice and vote." One of our duties is to mold public opinion by voice and vote. What we are engaged in now is cultivating a public opinion that is adverse to this government. We are the opposition and we believe you are members of a party that runs a terribly bad government, and it is our duty, John George Diefenbaker has said, to cultivate this opposition to you, the public's opposition, the public's hostility, to you. It is our duty.

Mr. Diefenbaker said that the opposition "must scrutinize every action by the government and in doing so prevents the short-cuts to democratic procedure that governments like to make." We heard from Senator Stewart of the famous short-cut that started the battle between us when you tried to sneak by the borrowing bill, which you had no right to do. We, as Liberals, tried in the other house, and it made the level of indignation of Mr. Michael Wilson reach new heights. People even wondered whether it would affect the squash game he played with Marc Lalonde that evening. He whipped him, as usual, so we were all reassured that the future Minister of Finance was all right.

● (0940)

The Hon. Lester B. Pearson, Mr. Diefenbaker's successor as Prime Minister, a frequent victim of the latter's parliamentary skills, was moved to add a few choice words of his own about the adversarial nature of the House of Commons.

I hope members opposite will tell Senator Castonguay that what I am about to put into my mouth are two pills of Tylenol. I don't think there is anything in the rules of the Senate that says a senator cannot give himself a headache by talking a long time and then taking a couple of pills to remedy it.

Senator Buckwold: How about the listeners?

Senator Gigantès: The listeners can walk out or they can do as Senator Beaudoin does and listen to good radio. Look at him.

Senator Beaudoin: What did you say?

Senator Chaput-Rolland: Nothing.

Senator Gigantès: I have to make a remark to Senator Tremblay, and I am waiting until he finishes consulting his physician.

John A. Macdonald and John George Diefenbaker have been quoted, and various other authorities, Senator Tremblay, saying that democracy, more or less, would be taken over by your successors as deputy ministers, unless they were in opposition; that the lack of a vigorous opposition creates bureaucratic, technocaratic, government. Sir John A. Macdonald, John George Diefenbaker and Stanley Knowles consider that as a fate worse than death for a state. Obviously they didn'ot know you personally too well, otherwise they would not have said things like that. They would have said, "With the exception, of course, of Arthur Tremblay." And if Bolduc were here, I would say, "With the exception, of course, of Mr. Bolduc." Do I see any other former deputy ministers that I must put in the exceptions so their feelings are not hurt? No.

This is what Mr. Pearson said. I can't imitate his accent, and I won't try.

> In national politics during the years when I was in the government, I watched the opposition perform their duty vigorously and industriously, with courage and determination.

Anyone who heard Senator Fairbairn the other day will recognize how apt these qualifications are: vigorous, industrious, courageous, determined.

> They rightly insisted on their right to oppose, attack and criticize—

Oppose, attack and criticize. I believe these characterize me fairly well, and the rest of us.

> —to engage in that cut and thrust of debate—

That is why I regret the departure of Senator Flynn. It was more fun when he was here. Senator Simard is in no way a substitute.

> —so often and so strongly recommended by those concerned with the vigour and health of Parliament and the health of democracy. I cannot forebear to add, however, that the application of this procedure has, in the past, been occasionally resented by those who are cut and thrust at.

Too bad. I even give myself a headache, so I can understand that some of you might not like it. As I said, you can do what the honourable Leader of the Government is doing and take a rest.

[Senator Gigantès.]

When one reads the above it is hard to conceive of the history of parliamentary control of the executive as a straightforward one of ossification and "decline," to cite what has become a common lament. One factor which may account for the prevalence of this pessimistic interpretation is that, overshadowed by the cabinet's immediate responsibility for "affairs of state," the work of backbenchers and opposition members does not always receive the credit it deserves. Yet as J.R. Mallory remarked a few years ago:

> . . . it would not be an exaggeration to say that practically every significant measure of reform in the last forty years has been introduced in Parliament by a private member, usually, but not invariably from the opposition.

At times it has been the opposition which has led, especially on social issues, and the government which has eventually followed. It would, therefore, be an exaggeration to claim that congressional systems are necessarily much more vigorous and aggressive in a legislative sense than our own.

Of course, you have been trying your best to turn this house into, at most, a squeaky rubber stamp. The more I reflect upon what has happened, and knowing that we may find ourselves on the government side and you on the opposition side or it might even be, who knows, some other party, I have reflected on the suspensive veto and I have concluded that a suspensive veto of a given duration will simply be taken into account by the government, which will move its planning operation's back, the critical amount of time sufficient to take care of that suspensive veto, and therefore a house such as the Senate, elected with a suspensive veto only would be nothing more than a rubber stamp that squeaks, and squeaks for a limited time. It stops squeaking after a while, by statute.

I am beginning to think that maybe the Australian system is not bad, that it is better than some of the things I had been proposing. I was hoping in one of these illusions that we might have a less partisan Senate. Then I run my eyes over some of you across the way and I wonder how I could ever feel non-partisan about you. That does not include Senator Doody, about whom I feel very non-partisan. It does not include Senator Roblin, about whom I feel very non-partisan. It does not include Senator Bélisle, about whom I feel very non-partisan. It does not include Senator MacQuarrie, who cannot hear me and about whom I feel very non-partisan, nor Senator Beaudoin, et cetera, et cetera. I like many of the new senators, too. Senator Oliver, I think you are a wonderful man and I could feel non-partisan about you, but there are some others I could not feel non-partisan about. I don't dare say anything nasty about Dr. David. Who knows what will happen during these many hours when I am talking? His professional conscience as a physician might force him across the floor to help me, or perhaps say whether I should be taken out feet first or head first.

Ralph Heintzman has pointed out:

> One of the most attractive features of Parliament, for example, is a powerful symbolic resonance.

You did not know we had symbolic resonance, did you? I can raise the volume of my voice. I will do so on Tuesday. As I am finishing I will give you the full benefit of my vocal cords.

> In addition to its practical value, the daily confrontation of government and "loyal" opposition in the House of Commons symbolizes the inner dialogue, the continual sequence of question and answer, which distinguishes the truly civilized mind and is reflected in the social and public life of a civil community. Just as a genuinely sound mind does not suppress either of its two fundamental impulses but listens instead to both, and tries unceasingly to achieve a synthesis in which their opposition will be reconciled, so too the good society recognizes that opposing tendencies or not each other's enemies but each other's partners instead, and their indispensable complement. They are linked by an educational contract which is at once the condition and the sign of civilization.

● (0950)

Unfortunately, as everyone knows, this ideal of civility does not always obtain in parliamentary practice. When debate degenerates into sterile reflex antagonism the process itself becomes discredited—by squeamish people. I think we should not be too squeamish. We should be sufficiently robust to take the cut and trust of vigorous debate for the benefit of the nation and for the sake of educating members opposite. You are educating us and we are educating you.

Senator Neiman, could you tell me what this is; have you any idea?

Senator Neiman: Let me see if I can help you.

An Hon. Senator: Don't you have enough material?

Senator Gigantès: It is probably more material against the GST. People are sending it by the bucketful. This is a good idea. Why not? I don't know how they found out I was here; maybe they are overhearing outside. Shocking!

But all MPs have the right to articulate the interests of their constituents, to scrutinize the actions of the government, and, if in opposition, to present alternative policies to the public.

Of course, Senator Poitras will not listen to alternative policies. It took me eight hours to give him a complete, concatenated, multi-dimensional economic policy that takes into account all aspects of the economy and of the role of government in Canada—all of it: education, regional development, defence, diplomacy, the whole bit. But you would not listen. You do not know if I was talking sense or not. All you know is that I was talking and you wished I would not. But it does not bother me one little bit. As I have said before, I was an editorial writer and I am used to the fact of having no more than two readers, the chief editorial reader and my wife, who would not get coffee unless she read my editorial in the morning.

Senator Neiman, is this of interest to the current debate?

Senator Neiman: It might be.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, Senator Neiman is one of the ornaments of this house. She is a great legislator, she is a great human being, and she did me a magnificent service by recommending that I buy a bouvier des Flandres, and there isn't a better dog.

Senator Neiman: Hear, hear.

Senator Gigantès: If there were more bouviers des Flandres among us, this would be a better house.

Now, all this criticism requires time on the parliamentary agenda, time which the government usually thinks would be better spent proceeding with its legislative program. Not only is this time one of the most important commodities in parliamentary politics, there is also the presumption that:

> The House of Commons is the ordinary scene of the battle. It is the great public stage at the centre of the national amphitheatre.

So said John Stewart in The Canadian House of Commons.

Accordingly, opposition parties and individual MPs compete fiercely for time on this stage. Here we do not have such compulsion. The opposition has certainly lost some of its prerogatives in this regard. For example, the right to talk out government bills—closure, 1913; to filibuster—a limit on individual debate, 1927; to extend indefinitely major debates, 1955; and to appeal the rulings of the Speaker, 1965. By the way, we could reach a stage where we do not have the right to appeal the rulings of the Speaker, if a Speaker here were elected by a government majority, a majority of government members and a majority of opposition members. I can think of several Tories I would trust in that role but not the present company. I don't mean Senator Baroutes; I mean Senator Charbonneau. I trust your staff. That was the purport of what I was saying before I so rudely interrupted your reading. Don't worry; I trust you and I like you.

The length of speeches has been considerably shortened and in 1969 closure was used to pass a complicated Standing Order (75 A, B and C) setting out the procedure to be followed to impose time allocation on debate either unilaterally or with the consent of one or more opposition parties. Nonetheless, the opposition still has numerous opportunities to confront the government: In the daily Question Period, in the eight days of debate following the Speech from the Throne, and the six days following the Budget, and in the 25 opposition days scattered throughout each session.

The opposition, moreover, has benefited a great deal from the increased allowances for secretarial and research staff granted to each party caucus, as well as from expanded facilities such as those of the Library of Parliament. Lacking the resources of the government, opposition members have a vital stake in the continued improvement of services to parliamentarians.

Although after the remarks of Senator Neiman reminding us of what that lawyer from Stikeman, Elliot was saying about the unholy mess and the non-concordance of French and English texts of Bill C-62, I wonder if it is a help to have the vast bureaucracy behind you. It controls the information you are going to get. It only lets the minister have what the bureaucracy thinks it is safe for the minister to know. Those of you who have served in the government understand that. Bureaucracy makes a mess and then defends it to the death and will not retreat. It tells the minister to fight to within an inch of his life to defend the indefensible.

[Translation]

Senator Lefebvre: I hope this will be useful to all my colleagues as well. Earlier, you were the target of attacks from the other side, when you gave examples of the incompetence of this government, the Mulroney government. They attacked you with figures reflecting their very partisan view of the Trudeau years to cover themselves, as you know. You had no difficulty rebutting their allegations and I congratulate you on that.

These criticisms are yet another example of the inability of the Tories to take on any responsibility for the fiasco caused by their incompetence in managing this country. They keep trying to put the blame on the former government, Trudeau and friends. They have been in power for six years, but it seems that was not long enough for them to get rid of their opposition mentality. They formed the opposition for so long that it does not feel right for them to sit on the government side. They went as far as blaming the Trudeau-Chrétien team and the Liberal caucus for excluding Quebec from the Constitution Act of 1982.

This is a crucial question, Senator Gigantès, because I think that the Canadian people want clear answers on this issue. Do you think it was in the interest of the then Péquiste government to sign the deal or were Mr. Lévesque's demands unacceptable for those who truly believed and still believe in our country?

Do you think that those who criticize, especially the government leader, are showing hypocrisy or a lack of understanding, as if every honest citizen of this country knew? In those days, a Péquiste government could not support the edification of a strong and united Canada. I think it is time to put an end to that type of criticism which shows bad faith, in my opinion.

Senator Gigantès: The problem with what you are suggesting is that the people . . . You wish to join in the debate, Senator Poitras?

Senator Poitras: The honourable senator always has good questions. However, he is not speaking to the right man. He would be better off asking the leader of the opposition. He was in government. He could tell him he was not interested in Quebec joining.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Lefebvre, you just saw a demonstration of weakness.

Senator Lefebvre: I would like to correct what was said by my honourable friend and colleague Senator Poitras, who seems to have been brainwashed since he first arrived here. This was certainly not how Canadians viewed the matter at the time.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, earlier I read you a document that is absolutely authentic. You can check with the Library of Parliament. I laid it on the Table of the Senate. This was a document drafted and signed by Mr. Lévesque, a document that represents most of the Constitution Act, 1982, except for the opting-out clause with full compensation for any province.

I maintain, and Mr. Trudeau maintains, that he had included instead section 43, according to which opting-out with full compensation could be done by provinces on an individual basis but would not automatically apply to all provinces. Section 43 would have enabled them to give Quebec, with its different needs and distinct identity, the instruments it needed to protect that identity. So what happened?

Quebec withdrew from the talks, despite the fact that the Constitution Act, 1982, was drafted by René Lévesque. We have the document here. Quebec withdrew from the talks, and not a single clause could be used. Especially not section 43 which would have provided conditions that were more acceptable and better adapted to the needs of Quebec.

They withdrew. Why did Mr. Lévesque withdraw? I have a lot of respect for him. I may remind you I was the only member of the Parliament of Canada to make a very long speech in tribute to Lévesque when he stepped down as Premier.

I believe he was an honourable man. It must have been hard for him to reject a document he himself had drafted and which Mr. Trudeau had accepted and in fact made into the Constitution Act, 1982. However, I don't think Mr. Lévesque could have convinced his party to accept a constitution drafted by the very man separatists considered on a level with Satan. I mean, if you lose a battle and you don't want to blame yourself because that would be too painful, you look for someone else to blame. So the separatists blamed it all on Trudeau, the man who beat them, the man who was scathing in his speeches and who always had the upper hand when confronted with them. And when he had to face one of them, Trudeau always came out the winner. Intellectually, he was superior and he had no equal as a debater. Yet, there was a Tory member who sometimes made Mr. Trudeau nervous, I mean, Mr. Clark, a man he held in high esteem. Mr. Clark sometimes made him nervous. When he is involved in a full debate in the House of Commons, he can be sensational; I have a lot of admiration for him. He is straightforward, has an excellent sense of humour, always hits the nail straight on the head and never makes honeyed and unctuous remarks as the Prime Minister does. You were expecting it, were you not?

So it was not possible not only for the people within the party, but also for the people associated with it—I will try to hide their names somewhat—people like Daniel Bourgault, Pierre Larouche and the other so-called "aggressive" political scientists to agree with something Mr. Trudeau had accepted. It would have meant a set back for their movement towards independence. They rejected it. Later on, they clearly demonstrated that Mr. Lévesque, in their opinion, was not enough of a hard-liner and they forced him to resign. We must also wonder why Mr. Ryan, the Liberal Leader at the time, did not accept the Constitution Act, 1982.

It is very difficult to determine exactly why. First of all, he had just experienced an election defeat. And who had defeated him? Nationalism. Like Mr. Bourassa, Mr. Ryan developed, following his defeat by both nationalists and péquistes, a fear of being outflanked by péquistes. He did not want to appear less catholic than the Pope, less nationalist than the nationalists. So he voted together with the PQ Party to reject the Constitution Act, 1982, which showed the additional flaw of being that written by Lévesque instead of the one he had himself written in a little beige book.

I would have meant for Mr. Ryan two consecutive humiliations, including his election defeat. The fact was that the Trudeau-Chrétien team had prevailed and accepted, not his own text, but René Lévesque's. Because he could not accept it, he turned it down.

Thus began for Quebec a period where the province voluntarily shunned a constitution which had all the necessary ingredients for Quebec to become a distinct society. But Quebec turned them down, following which there was a pause. During that time, Quebec journalists were largely separatists, with such honourable exceptions as Lysiane Gagnon, Francine Pelletier and Marcel Adam. The others would often make childish remarks, including Mr. Alain Dubuc who, during the debate on the Free Trade Accord, wrote in a La Presse editorial:

If it is bad for Ontario, it must be good for Quebec.

Coming from an economist, such a statement is unthinkable. Ontario is by far Quebec's greatest trading partner. For each province the volume of trade amounts to $35 billion and represents 600,000 jobs. A true economist cannot say that if it's bad for my best trade partner, it is good for me.

It is as though a grocer said: "If it is bad for my customers, it is good for me", This is unthinkable, and is the result of bigotry and romanticism. Now, I am convinced that, unfortunately, Quebec will become independent.

I will live in Quebec and do my best to help my province. But I am afraid it will suffer because over the years it has developed a contingent of journalists made up of mini groups of propagandists. And even after separation they will no longer have to run down English Canada but they will continue to do so even though it will have nothing to do with the matter, but they have developped bad habits. They will be unable to face the truth.

English Canada does have the equivalent of those journalists. You want to know where they are? Look at the Ottawa Sun or the Toronto Sun and you will find at least two or three such columnists. I am not even referring to people who walked all over the Quebec flag, to the odd Orangeman here and there, or to the imbecile Canadian Air Line Pilots Association cretins, they do exist. You know what they will do?

There is a small Ottawa River island over which the Champlain bridge crosses to Quebec. On both sides they will agree to put up a wall. On the Quebec side they will call it the wall of humiliations and they will list them. The first will be Lucien Bouchard's and it will read: I have been humiliated, Canada made me ambassador to Paris and minister! What humiliation! On the other side it will be called the wall of ingratitude. Talk about ingratitude, ambassador to Paris and minister! That is the way it will be done. And this whole gang of imbecile people who ape one another are mini groups and self-described political experts who will stand in the way of the two ex-partners by preventing them from agreeing quietly to a civilized divorce.

Naturally some people will get involved for nothing more than monetary considerations. I can imagine an Ontario dealer raising hell because he spots a Quebec brick on his sidewalk—or vice versa.

Senator David: A fiction novel!

Senator Gigantès: A fiction novel!

Senator David: We are supposed to be dealing with the third reading of Bill C-62.

Senator Gigantès: But that is on topic. The incompetence of this government, the destruction of Canada by this government and the lies this government told about the Canadian Constitution are all part . . .

Senator David: No, it is out of topic. It is part of your filibuster that has been going on for twelve hours or so.

Senator Gigantès: Only a dozen hours! There are the reasons why I worry about any step taken by this government. It is out of control, if it ever was in control. It is out of touch. This government, even though it has francophone members, was incapable of producing a document in which the French and English texts of Bill C-62 matched.

Senator David: What makes you say that?

Senator Gigantès: Mr. Mulroney does not dare stand up for Canada. He never did in six years and he used, as did Senator Lowell Murray, separatist terms. He sided with Quebec and spoke like them. There was only one voice for Quebec. It is too late now to change that. So there!

This is an incompetent government which is harming the country. Whatever I consider, I realize it is coming from the same incompetent people who did not even manage to get the Meech Lake Accord signed when everything was working in their favour. There! He is smiling. It is his failure and that of Mulroney, because of their boastfulness and their inability to flatter a wee bit the natives and do them justice and to refrain from exposing Mr. Clyde Wells and cornering him. That from a government headed by a man who built his reputation as a labour-management negotiator.

It is elementary. You leave the door open. You give people a chance to save face, if necessary. But no: Mr. Mulroney's ego was too overpowering. He had to give that incredible interview which appeared in the Globe and Mail, and which Jeffrey Simpson qualified as unworthy of a bar where people get drunk on brandy and tell their "macho" tall tales.

With a prime minister like that who is not particular about the kind of legislation he sends us, I have to look at where the legislation came from and I wonder: "What is going to happen to this country?" I will tell you what is going to happen. This is part of a whole series of events. For instance, the systematic weakening of east-west links in this country by Mulroney's defence of the separatist concept; by the attack on VIA Rail; by the attack on Air Canada; and by the attack on the CBC.

Meanwhile, Canada is being sold out to the United States. Take the free trade agreement. You don't want to hear the truth! That's the problem, honourable senators. What did the Americans want? They wanted absolute guaranteed access to all our natural resources. They also wanted to be able to come and take over any Canadian company, without having to meet conditions such as not laying off staff, continuing to do research in this country, and using Canadian or Quebec subcontractors. All that was swept away by article 16 of the free trade agreement.

Those conditions still exist in Europe, in the Common Market. Every member of the Common Market, of the European Community that will be Europe 92, agrees that a country admitting foreign investment has the right to impose conditions. Why? Because those governments realize that governments must have a social conscience. The weakest in our society must be protected.

The Mulroney government has weakened east-west links and given the Americans everything they wanted. What did we want? We have a few definitions. I could get out my book, if I have it with me, but I will probably be accused of wanting to have it translated. I'll see if I have it. I have some exact quotes of what was said at the time by Ms. Carney—By the way, where is she?—who was then minister.

It's easy to look up in this book. So on page 21 of my book, which is called Is the Free Trade Deal really for you?, I have some absolutely telling quotes by Ms. Carney. She said:

● (1015)

[English]

Mrs. Carney, in the House of Commons, said that U.S. trade remedy laws used against Canadian exporters are unfair. Trade laws in the U.S. are at the disposal of any interest group that wants to bring an action on Canada.

In the last seven years Americans have launched some 40 cases in U.S. courts against Canadian goods. Many have failed, but those that have succeeded penalized Canadian exports worth $6.5 billion. Mrs. Carney said that no one knows better than she does the effect that the American trade remedy laws have had on our exports. We have seen it in shakes and shingles, fish, lumber and farm products. Their unilateral decisions on what they call unfair practices are the problem between us. Americans call them fair trade laws, but they are not.

Mrs. Carney goes on to say that what is equally important is a disturbing reluctance on the part of the U.S. to accept the verdict when U.S. interests do not win a case. We saw that in the softwood lumber case. We won the case in 1983. We then faced a number of legislative initiatives seeking, in one way or another, to limit our exports to the U.S. We then faced a fact-finding investigation and yet another countervail action. If the U.S. industry does not get what it wants, there will be the likelihood of more congressional action.

Mrs. Carney speaks very eloquently. I could not have said it better. She continues to say that U.S. court cases against Canadian exporters based on U.S. trade remedy laws complicate investment decisions because, to be successful, Canadian producers need security of access to foreign markets. If the rules keep changing, then security is jeopardized and diminished. This remark was made by Mrs. Carney in the House of Commons on October 9, 1986.

Senator Simard, this is being translated free. Please react.

I will continue with Mrs. Carney's remarks. She said that all her discussions with Japanese inventors encourage her to believe that should we have security of our access to the U.S. market and give U.S. equal access to our market, secured by a long-term binding treaty, investments from Japan and other places would flow in increasing quantities to Canada and create jobs. As long as we have the present countervail system and the same U.S. trade remedy laws and as long as there is great uncertainty about what we can and cannot do in order to access the U.S. market, it will be a drag on investment.

Mrs. Carney said a little later that we wanted the Americans to abolish those laws and not apply them to Canada. We did not get that. We got a promise that we could negotiate them.

The Free Trade Agreement says that, no matter what we negotiate, Congress would always have the right to change the trade remedy laws as they wished. In other words, if we started winning with a set of trade remedy laws that we had negotiated, they could then change them and we would start losing again.

We gave them free access to our natural resources and the right for Americans to invest in Canadian industry or buy existing Canadian industries, shut them down, take their research to Colorado or northern California. In exchange, we got zip; we got absolutely zip.

Senator David has left, but he wants me to consider any particular legislation by the Mulroney government in isolation, without thinking of the incompetence they have displayed in everything they have touched of major importance. Look what is happening in the Gulf at the moment. The American fuel supply is in danger. This was foreseeable. Americans were afraid of it. Why do you think in Chapter 9 of the Free Trade Agreement they wanted us to give them full and unlimited access to our energy resources, access equal to our own? They knew that their other sources of supply were vulnerable. Don't tell me that was not an asset we could sell for a good price. But no, we gave it away.

Not only did we give it away, but when the deal was failing, Mr. Wilson went to the United States to talk with Mr. Baker. Mr. Baker said, "Listen, the free trade deal will be overturned by our various lobbyists and industries if the Canadian dollar stays low because we cannot compete with products with a 72-cent dollar. You'd better push it up to 85 cents, otherwise I cannot guarantee how well the Free Trade Agreement will work." So, we pushed up the Canadian dollar. We had unprecedented high interest rates in a time of boom, with an inflation rate of around 5 per cent. We had real interest rates of 8 and 9 per cent, which is unheard of in history. Whom does it benefit? Those who have money to lend and get 8 and 9 per cent after inflation. Whom does it benefit? Mr. Mulroney's American friends, who are wiping out our export industry.

Senator David wants me to look at any one bill in isolation. I would be failing in my duty as a Canadian and legislator if I did not see the context and if I did not say to myself that I have to look at these things with particularly close attention. This legislation is coming to us from certified incompetents. If you deal with certified incompetents, you have to be doubly careful. If you are not doubly careful, things will just get worse.

I was reading excerpts from a paper I have on how democracy works and should work. These excerpts are from John George Diefenbaker and Sir John A. Macdonald regarding the role of the opposition. The role of a vigorous, courageous and even obstreperous opposition becomes much more important when one deals with incompetence—demonstrated incompetence. Take any of the major initiatives of this government. The government has been incompetent. We have to be careful, vigilant and harsh because they do not deserve anything else from the rest of us. The danger is too great. I should like to come back to the role of the opposition a little later.

We were talking about time. After all, I am occupying a great deal of time here and I intend to occupy more time. I have here a note by C. E. S. Franks entitled "Procedural Reform in the Legislative Process."

Not only is time "one of the most important commodities in parliamentary politics," there is also the presumption that: "The House of Commons is the ordinary scene of the battle . . . ."

You can substitute the Senate for the House of Commons, because this is where it is happening. The House of Commons is no longer operative, because Mr. Mulroney has imposed a parliamentary dictatorship there. So much so that one of his backbenchers had to leave, saying that the only thing that was done was what the Prime Minister wanted. That particular backbencher also put his finger on the fact that Canadians cannot trust this Prime Minister.

So time was allocated, constrained, and the question remains how best the opposition can make use of the parliamentary time which is available to it. For example, the evidence suggests that control remains weak over the public purse. MPs are expected to oversee the government's spending plans through the scrutiny of departmental estimates which are referred to the appropriate standing committees around the start of each fiscal year. But even with the current expanded and reformed committee system, changes are very rarely attempted in the government's supply bills and expenditure plans.

If you want to see a list of these things, I refer you to a book written by Harold D. Clarke and others. The book is entitled, "Parliament, Policy and Representations," Part II. I especially refer you to the article by Paul Thomas entitled, "Parliament and the Purse Strings," at pages 160-181 of this collection.

• (1030)

A variety of proposals have been suggested to involve MPs in a more meaningful way in the policy and expenditure management process, since by itself the Public Accounts Committee is only able to exercise a post-audit function. Most of these proposals involve increasing the power and in dependence of parliamentary committees. But, as Thomas Hockin has noted—that is your colleague and a noted political scientist—there is bound to be some ambivalence on both sides of the house about such reforms.

> Neither the government nor the Opposition has a vested interest in asserting its patrimony over all of the results of the committee system . . . . Some Opposition MPs wonder if the role of the Opposition in committees does not sometimes become too collegial, in that Government and Opposition MPs may simply end up doing little more than tidying up a minister's bill.

That is what you seem to want us to do. You give us a bill that is a disaster and you want us to tidy it up.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Senator Gigantès, I was looking at the figures on the number of times the government has used closure on the bill that we are dealing with presently. Unfortunately, I left the figures in my office, but they are quite dramatic. Closure has been used more often since 1988, not only more than at any other time in Canadian history but also—and the number 30 times comes to mind—

Senator Gigantès: Probably more than all the previous years in Canada's history.

Senator Stollery: Yes. This makes your comments even more appropriate because of the role of the Senate in the amending process of the bill. As you have said, the House of Commons committee possibly can be criticized because it becomes a collegial exercise. Having served, as other senators here have, on House of Commons committees, I woauld say that the opposition has little power on a House of Commons committee because the government is ready at any time with its majority to overrule the opposition.

A House of Commons committee has never been a great experience, no matter whether you are a government supporter or a member of the opposition. The process is under the control of the minister and the cabinet to such an extent that the committee system, to anyone who has had any experience with it, could be said to have broken down years ago. This is not simply a criticism of this government. For years, the committee system has been questionable.

You then must add to that the newly introduced procedure of closure at every stage. The opposition must have a role. In other words, debate has to take place somewhere. However, it is no longer taking place in the House of Commons. Therefore if it is not taking place in the House of Commons, do you see the role of the Senate becoming more like the House of Lords? The example that Senator Stewart pointed out to us yesterday was of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom, the upper chamber, where much of the amending process takes place and where very often much of the debate takes place hundreds of times in a year. This occurs partially because of the press of business and partially because of the breakdown of the House of Commons as a debating institution, and the control of the ministers.

In Canada the control of the ministry is even more absolute than it is in the United Kingdom. The senators opposite are a good example of that. They never seem to question the leadership. They are a very accepting group of people. Surely, no matter what is done with the rules in the future, we are seeing in the Senate a chamber that is reacting to that imposition of closure in the House of Commons.

There has to be an outlet for contrary opinion, which has been extinguished methodically in the House of Commons. This might come as a surprise to many senators but the Senate will have to be the outlet for that frustration and for the natural process of amending. I am not talking here about a holus-bolus throwing out of government bills, or of being unnecessarily obstructive.

If there is not an outlet for the frustration of the public and minority opinion in your vision of the future of the second chamber and the Canadian parliamentary system, then we enter a different field of problems such as civil disobedience, disorder and so on.

Senator, in your analysis of the problem that you have just explained to us, do you discern more and more a transfer to the Senate of the traditional role of the House of Commons such as amending and debating and all the other sorts of things that Parliament has developed over the last century and a half?

Senator van Roggen: Before you answer that question, Senator Gigantès, yesterday afternoon when Senator Stewart was speaking he touched on this same subject and the enormous amount of power now assumed by prime ministers under our system. I asked him if he could recall the author of the quotation that I often use which is that it took the Parliament at Westminster 500 years to wrest absolute power away from the kings and only 100 years to give it back to prime ministers. I wonder, first, if you have heard that expression, and whether you know who the author is?

Senator Gigantès: I am afraid, Senator van Roggen, that I do not have the scholarship of Senator Stewart or yourself. I do not know the author. I am fairly poor on quotations. That is why I use a computer with a large memory and a special filing system. It is not one of the quotations that I have in the filing system. However, I will ask the Library of Parliament to find it, because it seems to me to be an excellent one.

I should like to answer Senator Stollery's question. I will speak with death in my heart as a citizen of this country—and I will speak about what will be left of Canada. I do not think that Canada as we know it today will survive Mulroney. I think Quebec will separate. Therefore, when I am being asked to give opinions on what the Canada that remains should have in the way of a Senate, I can only give academic opinions, though Canadian constitutional history and practice and parliamentary history and practice are not my field.

I have become increasingly more convinced that what some honourable senators have been saying for a long time was right, namely, that you had thought this out very carefully, and that something like the Australian Senate, with both houses elected and with a double dissolution, might be what Canada needs—and by "Canada" I mean the rump of Canada after Quebec leaves.

In that event there would surely have to be some counterbalance for the massive electoral power of Ontario. Will Ontario accept that, or will Ontario decide, like Quebec, to go it alone? I do not know. If Ontario accepts it and wants to keep the rump of Canada together, it will have to give the small provinces a greater say in the central government. That greater say would probably have to be through a Senate.

If we are to have a more powerful Senate, what sort of "more powerful Senate" are we talking about? I have come to think seriously about a Senate with a suspensive veto. I do not think that, in this country, it would work. What we are talking about is a well-established House of Commons that has had exclusivity of power for a long time, and who will not be prepared to share it. The way the system functions in the House of Commons is such that the prime ministers have iron control and will simply change their critical path and introduce bills the requisite number of months earlier in order to take care of the Senate's suspensive veto. That is why I talk of the suspensive veto in the Canadian context as a rubber stamp that squeaks for a limited period of time. On the other hand, the Australian system, which Senator Roblin has defended eloquently in this House, weighted representation heavily by region rather than strictly representation by population.

● (1045)

Senator Buckwold: It is equal. Tasmania has the same number of senators as does New South Wales.

Senator Gigantès: After Quebec leaves, that may be the price that Ontario might have to pay to keep Canada together, if that is what Ontario wants.

What happens where there is a confrontation between the two chambers? The Australians have found the formula of double dissolution. Of course, the chambers are not elected for the same periods of time. While there can be some distinctiveness in what the two chambers deal with, but there must be an overlap. Important bills would have to be approved by both Houses. If there is a clash, the Prime Minister then should have the right to use double dissolution. We have two cases, then. Either the Prime Minister knows he will win in an election, and the Senate will then give way to arrive at a compromise, or the Prime Minister knows that he will lose, and he will bow to the Senate. That is what will happen. It seems to work fairly well in Australia.

I do not see it working in a Canada in which Quebec has remained as a sort of loose associate. Quite legitimately, Quebec would be worried about the demographically smaller place that it occupies than does Canada as a whole. As a Quebec senator I could not possibly accept an upper chamber which would be equal for all regions. It is unthinkable. Quebec is already worried about having a fixed number of 75 MPs in a Parliament the size of which grows all the time. So, if Quebec stays in Confederation, perhaps the abolition of the Senate would be an easier thing to convince Quebec to accept than an Australian model with double dissolution.

I feel terribly sad when I think about all these things because I do not see a rosy solution. I am sunk in pessimism. Senator David was saying that I was spinning a novel, un roman. I do not think it is un roman that there are excited idiots on both sides of the Ottawa River writing frustratedly, and sometimes brilliantly in terms of eloquence, and talking sheer nonsense, working on the emotions of people on both sides. There will be endless images of my flag being trampled upon, and your flag being trampled upon. National anthems will be booed on both sides. It will be awful.

Senator David assumes that everyone is as civilized as he. Obviously, he does not read the Sun newspaper. If his equivalent, the civilized anglophone cardiologist, were to read Mr. Daniel Latouche, would be shocked out of his mind. He would not believe it. No anglophone could possibly accept that what Latouche says about anglophones represents anglophones. We each have images of ourselves. His attacks on anglophones and their motives are such that no anglophone could ever possibly accept them, and vice versa. These people will continue to write and make the construction of a sovereignty association type of Quebec-Canada union almost impossible.

So, honourable senators, I am in the deepest pessimism. My pessimism is only tempered by the fact that, what the hell, I live in Quebec, a place I love. I love my house in the Gatineau. I have a collection of separatist but lovable relatives of whom I am terribly fond, and they will protect me.

A student of a senator opposite said, "Senator, you will always be considered a good Quebecer if you have the true interests of Quebec at heart". I replied, "Who defines those interests?" and he said, "The majority". The senator opposite knows of whom I speak. I do not want to mention his name.

What, then, happens to the minority? If someone disagrees with a majority does that, ipso facto, mean that he is a bad Quebecer? That is what this young man was saying. I had the same sort of thing said to me by the Chef du Cabinet of Pierre Marc Johnson when he was still a minister. I met this man at a federal-provincial conference in Victoria. We were discussing the subject very amicably over a good dinner, and he said to me, "You can't possibly understand, you are not a real Quebecer". I said, "Well, I live in Quebec. I married a Quebec woman. Our daughter goes to a Quebec school. We speak French at home. I obey the laws. I pay Quebec taxes." He said, "Vous n'êtes pas un francophone pure-laine!"

Let us not forget our colleague Mr. Flynn who, on two occasions, and I do not mind—

[Translation]

I have been called a wog in so many countries that I am used to it. I feel that people who make remarks like the one Senator Flynn made and which I will repeat in a moment are those who have a problem, not me. When you have been a wog in 59 countries, you harden yourself against it and you find it funny. You laugh a lot. You refuse to take yourself seriously because if you did, life would become unbearable.

Senator Stollery: We laugh at people who take themselves so seriously.

Senator Gigantès: That's their problem! they can do what they want, they can take themselves seriously. On the first occasion, Senator Flynn was asking me why I was so concerned about the free trade agreement. My answer can be found in the Debates of the Senate. I answered: Maybe its because I am a new Canadian. He said: You look it. So, Senator McElman got very annoyed and said that that was a racist comment. And I said: "Come on, let's calm down. I only interpret Senator Flynn's comment as meaning that he finds that I do not look like him physically, and I will always be grateful to him for that finding." But it was still a racist comment on his part.

Oh, you want me to accept that, to say nothing, to answer nothing! And then, very recently, just before he retired, at one point I said I was a Quebecer. He said: "Ah, you a Quebecer?" And I said: "What do you mean, am I not a Quebecer?" He said: "Well, maybe technically." That also was racist!

Listen to me well, the hordes of lawyers who are my in-laws will defend me against the narrow-minded people who live on both sides of the river.

Senator Stollery: I would like to ask you a question.

Senator Gigantès: You are wlecome, my friend.

Senator Stollery: Senator Gigantès, I did not understand the use of the word racism in Canada. Could you explain that to me, because I don't understand how it applies here. What do you mean by race, we are all of the same race even if we speak two languages. People from France, of French origin, and people of British, Scotish or Irish origin belong to the same race! Race is something else. There might be a Chinese race, a Hindu race or an African race, but in Canada, why do we use the word race so much, it is not proper. We do not have two races, we might have two languages, two main languages, but that is it. As a Torontonian, I do not understand that.

Senator Gigantès: Indeed, you never did understand that problem and I must apologize to you for putting it to you so bluntly. I hope you will take it in good part, but you should read Men and, maître draveur by Mgr. Savard to have a better grasp of the situation. You should read Groulx also. You should have been in the car with my beautiful sister-in-law from Quebec and myself and the kids. When we stopped in Poltimore to buy some ice cream—

Senator Stollery: Because she was black?

Senator Gigantès: She is not black. She is quite white and so am I. We stopped in Poltimore where there was this Anglophone selling ice cream. This beautiful and distinguished lady stepped out of the car to buy ice cream cones. When she adressed the gentleman in French, in Quebec, she was told: "Speak White". What would you want her to make of that? What would you want her daughter to think? But those things happen. They do happen sometimes.

Let's take the case of the Turks and the Greeks. When the Turks invaded the Byzantine Empire in the 10th century, there were 20 million Christians. One hundred thousand Turkish horsemen conquered that empire. After the conquest, they mated with women of the country, because they had no women with them. When we look at the Turks and the Greeks in Constantinople, it is quite difficult to tell them apart.

There was a television report on Albania the other day. It is very difficult to see the difference between inhabitants of different Balkan States or between inhabitants of the Balkans and those of Asia Minor. So, when it comes to genes and chromosomes, and so on, we are all quite the same. There is however a lot of racism in the Balkans. The Bulgarians are trying to throw out of the country all the Muslim. When you look at both groups, you can't see the difference between a Muslim and an Orthodox. But they feel different.

Senator Stollery: Listen, I speak neither French nor English, and I know only a little bit of Spanish. I don't speak any of the Balkan languages. Like you, Senator Gigantès, I know the world a little, and the Balkans very well. I know that in the Balkans, there are people who are prejudiced and bigoted. There are tribes who hate each other. You see, we refer to them as tribes. They came a long time ago from the other side of the Caucasus. They hate each other because they are from different tribes. I say this as someone who has traveled a little in 35 years. I believe it is important to use the right words, words which mean something, you know. Some Yugoslav are Muslim, Christian, Orthodox, Catholic, et cetera, but for me, these are not racial differences. They are all of the same race. They all form the same people. However, when we speak of Blacks, then, yes, that is another race. You may have heard of a very wellknown book, entitled Seligman's Races of Africa. There are five races in Africa.

You see, the word "race" means something specific. But it is becoming a stereotyped word, a very "in" word in Canada. But Canada is Canada, and it is the only country I know where we use this word for something which is not, anyway, a racial issue. In Canada, the problem is linguistic, it is a language issue.

Senator Gigantès: Monsignor Savard was speaking of a blood difference.

Senator Stollery: But it is the same blood.

Senator Gigantès: He was nevertheless speaking of blood; he does not accept this way of seeing things.

Senator Stollery: He was referring to the Gascons, and the Normands.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: Like many other Quebeckers, he had his own perception of it. And not necessarily a bad perception at that. He thought that, from a genetic point of view, they made up a distinct group. Some people from Quebec believe that.

Senator Beaudoin: I have a question for Senator Gigantès. For the record, I think we need to clarify something. I am all in favour of individual rights. I give a course on the Canadian Bill of Rights. You say that some of our most famous writers from Quebec used the word "race". That is true, especially for writers from the beginning of the century, like Father Groulx. But careful! Most of our modern writers in Quebec now refer to their ethnic origin. You talk about Félix-Antoine Savard. Let's not forget he was one of the first to promote Canadian unity. He said: "Joy to our reunited people", not reunited races, but people. It could be said that Félix-Antoine Savard is one of those who would like Canada to hold together and who would want a country where individual rights are respected. Those rights are well protected by the Supreme Court and the Charter of Rights.

It can be witnessed once more this morning in the decisions made by the Supreme Court and it can be seen also in the works of modern writers. I am quite ready to participate in a debate on individual rights versus collective ones. Some federalists and some separatists are respectful of rights and freedoms. Those issues should not be all mixed up. I would be rather cautious in that regard.

In the Canadian Constitution, the words "race" and "origine nationale ou ethnique" are found in the French version of section 15 of the Charter of Rights. In universities today, the word "ethnie" has replaced "race". At the turn of the century, the word "race" was used in Great Britain, France, Canada and elsewhere. Although this is an interesting issue, it should not be used as a red herring. I do not mind debating that matter. I find it quite interesting. I am all for fundamental liberties and I think we all support them, at least I hope so! There may be some who support them less, I do not know.

However, when we are having a debate on the structure of tomorrow's Canada, this is an additional subject. Of course, I want all reforms to our system to be made with due respect to rights and liberties. I am only saying this as a matter of principle since we probably have common views on the subject.

Senator Gigantès: I understand that you would prefer a euphemism like "ethnic group" rather than "race". I remember someone I liked a lot. He was a faithful friend of mine, who left me his children. He was quite offended by the fact that Larkin Kerwin was rector of Laval University. He used to say: "A foreigner. This is unthinkable!" Larkin Kerwin spoke a very good French, with a slight accent . . .

Senator Poitras: He has no accent.

Senator Gigantès: No accent?

Senator Poitras: No, he speaks French better than you do.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you. That gives even more weight to my argument. And now this excellent person . . .

Senator Poitras: He is a great Canadian who was president of the National Research Council and who is now president of the Space Centre, and I think that you should retract.

Senator Gigantès: I did not say anything against this excellent person. I was simply saying that another person . . . You never listen, senator Poitras. It is a bad habit. You never listen. You got angry for no reason at all.

Senator Poitras: You are talking through your hat about all the great Canadians and you make no difference. It is unacceptable.

Senator Gigantès: I was not talking about him. I was talking about a Quebecker who was shocked by the fact that Mr. Larkin Kerwin was president of Laval University.

Senator Poitras: He is ignorant if he found that shocking. Mr. Kerwin is a Canadian, he is a Quebecker. He was born here whereas others were not.

Senator Gigantès: Now this is a remark that is close to being racist. So, that "real" Quebecker was shocked by the fact that the president of Laval University was not a "real" francophone, as he said. And yet, as senator Poitras said so well, Larkin Kerwin is a great Quebecker, a great Canadian, a great scientist, a superb person, and senator . . .

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators—

Senator Doody: Would you yield for a moment, please, Senator Gigantès? You have been going for seven hours. Would you sit down for a minute please?

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate on this anniversary, the first anniversary of the tragedy which took place in Montreal at l'École Polytechnique, that we stand for a moment of silence to commemorate those who were slain that day.

Honourable Senators observed one minute of silent tribute.

TRAGEDY OF POLYTECH UNIVERSITY

FIRST ANNIVERSARY—SILENT TRIBUTE

Senator Spivak: Thank you.

Honourable senators, last year at this time, Marc Lépine walked into a classroom at the University of Montreal, l'Ecole Polytechnique, carrying a semi-automatic rifle. He separated the men from the women, ordered the men to leave, and told the remaining female engineering students, "I am fighting feminism." He opened fire and then searched for more victims. On the first anniversary of this tragedy, our first thoughts are for the families of the victims.

[Translation]

I would like to express my deepest sympathy to the families of the victims and I mourn the loss of these young women promised to a bright future.

[English]

It is inevitable that these 14 young women, victims of the largest mass murder in our history, should have become a symbol for the escalating level of violence against women. The event itself has fuelled a debate within Canada about its very significance, the central question being whether what happened in Montreal on December 6, 1989, was simply the senseless actions of a mad gunman, an isolated event, or whether, as many believe, it was a result of the inherent, profoundly disturbing, ingrained attitudes both sexist and violent that are present in our society today towards women.

A tragedy of this dimension raises a number of large issues, each fraught with its separate complexities; gun control, emergency response systems, familial grief, the particular psychology of Marc Lépine, and the general malaise of socially-entrenched sexism.

I want to touch on just two of those issues briefly. It is increasingly recognized that violence against women is often treated too lightly in the courts, in our universities, and in the texture and structure of our daily lives. What is heartening is that we are beginning to address the issue of violence against children, and the significance of such experience to the vicious circle inscribed by violence, by all violence practiced against all people. Marc Lépine was a victim of extreme childhood violence who was terrified of his father. The family was subjected to constant terror so that, as one columnist put it, the blood then spilled, went unstaunched, unreported, unpunished, left to flow right up to the front steps of l'École Polytechnique. We must do more to break the cycle of violence by directing attention to children who experience or witness it.

We need also to restrain the use of the gun as the ultimate machine in the war against women, to halt the flow of the 15,000 machine guns and other Rambo-type weaponry coming into Canada each year. The students of l'École Polytechnique have mounted an impressive campaign for gun control. Hearings have begun on Bill C-80, the proposed gun control law. Tougher gun control legislation is absolutely necessary. Marc Lépine had a 30-bullet clip in his rifle allowing him to kill 14 women without ever having to stop to reload his gun.

I want also to pay tribute, if I may, with your indulgence, to the commemorative gesture of a Winnipeg woman, a former director of a women's shelter in Winnipeg who has had 14 bronze plaques engraved each with one victim's name, and the date and the words, "Murdered by Misogynist." These will be on display in Winnipeg in prominent locations for one year so that the people of Winnipeg will be reminded of the tragedy in Montreal, and also the people of Montreal will understand that, in Winnipeg, we share their tragedy.

On this sad anniversary, we remember and hope that this kind of thing will never happen again, and we urge the federal government to take the necessary steps to deal with violence against women. Senator Royce Frith has spoken very eloquently in this chamber about the entire subject, the tragedy, the issue of violence against women, and when we are finished with our current business, I hope to take up and deal a little more fully with this issue. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, as Senator Spivak, who spoke before me, noted, today we remember with great sadness the 14 young women who were murdered so senselessly one year ago at l'Ecole Polytechnique in Montreal. There were a multitude of pressures on the mind of Marc Lépine as he dismissed the male students and then systematically gunned down his female victims with a semi-automatic rifle before taking his own life. It is interesting to me that, almost immediately after that event, the automatic reaction was, that he was deeply troubled, that he must be mad—almost as an excuse, or attempting to find the reason which motivated him, other than the one that was revealed in his own suicide note released two weeks ago. That note made it very clear that whatever else troubled him, at the core of his actions was an extreme hatred of women, a hatred of the place in society increasingly occupied by women in modern Canada.

● (1115)

In Montreal the target was very young women, a new generation with the enthusiasm and determination to pursue a productive future along whatever path their ability and ambition led them. In this case, it was engineering, a field traditionally dominated by men. As Lépine prepared to kill these young women, he branded them first with what to him was a venomous label. He called them feminists.

The tragedy of the Montreal massacre is as wounding today as it was a year ago. Part of that tragedy, I suppose, is that after the shock and horror, and after the tears and the vigils, this dreadful event has really tailed off to a degree into national silence rather than forcing a new resolve at the highest levels of our multi-government and social structures, to heighten awareness of the daily reality of violence against women. We as a nation have carried on much as before. There were determined efforts by the survivors, by students at l'École Polytechnique who were friends of the victims. There was an eloquent young women who, just in the last couple of days, was interviewed on the CBC's Journal about her campaign for gun control. The efforts of concerned individuals and women's groups continue.

However, once again attempts to tackle in a meaningful way the issue of gun control appear to be faltering as the traditional strength of the gun lobby pushes back a seemingly weaker cause of societal protection. In spite of increasing daily evidence of battered women, abused children, of loss of life through family violence across this country, funding for assistance and support is curtailed.

Young women should be able to rely on the strength behind the words "equal opportunity" in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, outside a courtroom, those words remain empty until they are given meaning by a fundamental shift in our collective attitudes and a reversal of our passivity towards constant evidence of violence around us.

As we contemplate the events of last yer in Montreal, surely we as legislators have a special responsibility, not just to promote the attitudinal change but also to try to force priorities on all governments that would attack the core causes that breed violence and instability.

As Senator Spivak noted, my colleague Senator Frith has an inquiry on the Senate order paper into the whole issue that flowed from the events that took place in Montreal a year ago. I would hope in calmer times that a number of us, and not just the women in this chamber but the men as well would choose to speak in this debate openly and from their hearts on what is not just a women's issue but a very fundamental issue on how women and men can coincide on equal and supportive terms throughout our society in Canada.

The Montreal massacre is a very painful reminder of a widespread illness. Hopefully, in 1991, we will be able, in really substantive terms, to do more to set about finding a cure. This is the least we can do for the families of those 14 young women whom we think of today with great sympathy. Thank you.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, before I resume my discussion with Senator Poitras, I, too, would like to speak very briefly about what happened in Montreal.

I am a father of daughters and have been blessed with wonderful nieces, and when I think of the families of these young women and their loss, and when I think of the loss to us of these young women . . .

[Translation]

To lose these precious young women is one of the worst tragedies that can happen. The loss is for us all. I often think of their parents because I cannot imagine what it must have been for the University of Montreal official when he was informed that his daughter had been shot. He had to go and pick her up. Senators Spivak and Fairbairn are right. It cannot be hidden or forgotten. We must discuss and try to find what dreadful disease is causing such nonsensical tragedies. This one was particularly horrible, with 14 victims, but they happen every day.

Violence against women is a daily occurence. We should look into that some day. Allow me a 30 seconds' silence before I follow in senator Poitras' steps. Thirty seconds.

Let me tell you my deep respect and admiration for Larkin Kerwin. I could not believe or accept that someone would question his capacity to hold his position as rector of Laval University and his right to do so. I was not attacking Mr. Kerwin. On the contrary, I admire him.

In your answer, you displayed the same attitude as that person who criticized Kerwin for not having been born here. Petty comments such as that «pure laine» upset me, especially from someone as worldly and prominent as you. I am ashamed for you. Someone else I would not mind, but you, how could a man of quality such as you react that way. It is distressing!

Senator Poitras: Thank you for taking back what you just said. As regards my comments, they were not directed at you in particular, and, if need be, I will do as you did.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Poitras, I took back nothing. There was nothing to take back since I said nothing offensive concerning Mr. Kerwin. I just reaffirmed my admiration for the man. The record will show what I said. You were not listening; you did not hear. Ask your fellows around you. They will explain.

Let us get back to the subject for a moment. The Opposition has the duty to oppose. I have before me a text with several English quotations. One of these is from a minister of yours, Mr. Tom Hockin, whom I admire greatly. He presided the Joint Commission on Canada's External Relations, and did an exemplary job. He produced a very good report. We all got along extremely well with that man, a civilized man, without an once of meanness and petty pseudo-nationalism. He was a fine man, a civilized man, so everything went well.

On the subject of the reform of the House of Commons, he said . . .

[English]

> Neither the Government nor the Opposition has a vested interest in asserting its patrimony over all of the results of the committee system . . . . Some Opposition MPs wonder if the role of the Opposition in committees does not sometimes become too collegial, in that Government and Opposition MPs may simply end up doing little more than tidying up a minister's bill. Not surprisingly, therefore, some Opposition MPs feel not enough partisan advantage is gained from all this work.

I deplore the business of partisan advantage. Sometimes, I suppose, it is necessary. Mr. Hawkins, having proven that he is a great committee chairman and a great Canadian, had in a sense an easy subject to deal with, although there was the pretentious issue of the idiot "Star Wars" policies of the Reagan administration.

We had before us witnesses who wanted to make money out of producing an absurd and ridiculous system for defence, which even its proponents said would not work. As is my wont, I was not very kind to those people. After all, when a general comes and says: "It is a marvellous system, it will keep out 96 per cent of all warheads coming towards North America," I would say that means it would allow 4 per cent to come in.

The Russians, on land-based missiles alone and not counting their submarines, have 6,000 warheads. Is this witness, therefore, telling us that 240 warheads of at least 1 megaton each, coming at the United States, is progress, is useful? If the first 240 cities of the United States are eliminated in a rain of warheads, what will be left? What are we talking about? What kind of reality is it that we are talking in mega-deaths?

I am ashamed to say that there were Canadian witnesses, good Conservatives all without a doubt, who saw a chance of making money out of this absurd enterprise which, out of their own mouths was condemned as a useless waste of money that could better be spent improving this country. They wanted our government to contribute. They wanted to have contracts from the United States. They wanted to make the arms race a little more dangerous, make it last a little longer, and their ploy would have succeeded if Gorbachev had not been in power.

Mr. Hockin had generally an easy task except on matters dealing with the "Star Wars" illusions and delusions of Ronald Reagan. That is another Conservative abberation. How anybody could elect such a man is beyond me, and how Conservatives could like him is only proof of how dangerous the Conservative illusion is—a matter about which I will be speaking on Tuesday.

• (1130)

There is at least an implicit conflict between the notion of MPs as legislators acting in concert with a common purpose, and their expected practice and roles based on adversarial representation. As Hockin points out, however, the genius of the parliamentary process is that adversary politics is not simply negative, but can itself be an important part of the shaping of government policy.

We were saying earlier that what legitimizes this government at this time is that there is a Parliament with two chambers, in both of which there is a strong opposition which is vocal and weariless—

[Translation]

It is better expressed in French. If the opposition did not exist, your government, low as it is in the latest polls, would lose much of its legitimacy. Because it is part of an institution such as Parliament where an opposition challenges it, your government acquires what little legitimacy it has left, because it can always say it was elected, it is within a parliament, it has an opposition. Without the opposition or if the opposition were what I call the "squeaky rubber stamp", your government right now would no longer have any legitimacy.

[English]

Indeed, without good opposition, policy consensus would be a meaningless formality. Parliament could not do its work without the techniques of advocacy, contestation and persuasion pursued by the party caucuses and by individual members.

I know this goes against the feelings of the squeamish and of the good, kind pillars of society.

[Translation]

—the mainstays who throughout their careers were told yes by their subordinates and by people who want to make a little money or get a few favours and suddenly find themselves in the middle of an arena where their friends in government, their Prime Minister is challenged in a very fierce way. But that is quite unbecoming! It is not good form! How awful! That would not be acceptable at the Rideau Club. We are not at the Rideau Club here, we are in Parliament and as I wear myself out repeating to you, Parliament it a substitute for the judgement of God, and we are fighting each other not with swords or clubs but with words.

If you cannot take any beating, you are at the wrong place, especially when I am around. So Mr. Hockin concluded the paper he wrote on the role of committees and Parliament as follows:

[English]

Hockin concludes:

> To choose adversary propaganda politics instead of collegial coalescent politics may not be without effect on policy in the long run.

[Translation]

So fierce criticism and battle, do have good effects. He expressed himself in English, so I will quote him in English and then have this translated for free, as Senator Simard would say . . .

[English]

> In fact, it can be suggested further that Opposition parties pursue at least four fundamental representational, yet partisan, roles in their activity in the House of Commons. Regardless of the nature of the party, all Opposition parties use the Canadian House as a public forum first to check on the Government's integrity. They are in constant pursuit of evidence not only of Government misspending of funds but of wider examples of dishonesty and arbitrary behaviour.

In the past six years this has been an easy thing for the opposition to do. I now return to Mr. Hockin.

> Second, the Opposition prods the Government to act on behalf of certain interests, opinions and needs in society. Third, the opposition probes for information and although it seldom has success in eliciting hard information from the Government during the oral question period, it can be remarkably effective (if it works at it) in eliciting such information in written questions and in committees. Fourth, the Opposition attempts to re-interpret the Government's interpretation . . .

Naturally, any government—your party or our party—is self-serving. It will talk about what pleases it. It will attempt to put its best face forward.

It is the role of the opposition to reinterpret the government's interpretation. Scrape away the chalk and show what is underneath the dreadful image of an inept and incompetent government.

> These functions of the Opposition parties, when combined with surreptitious efforts by backbench Government MPs—

Long live Pat Nowlan.

> —to influence the cabinet, help one to understand more comprehensively the general role of the House of Commons in the political and policy process in Canada.

This is taken from "Adversary Politics and Some Functions of the Canadian House of Commons," pages 377 and 378 by Tom Hockin.

That being said, even if the parliamentary mandates were to become more clearly appreciated by the Canadian public, opposition parties would still face some formidable challenges. In particular, when major decisions take place without passing through parliamentary channels, the opposition is placed at a distinct disadvantage in terms of its ability to meaningfully scrutinize and influence government actions.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Increased resort to extra-parliamentary means to resolve the country's problems, e.g. federal-provincial conferences, interest group consultations, etc., leads inevitably as well to a greater prominence for extra-parliamentary forms of opposition. To be fully credible as an institution, Parliament must be able to demonstrate an active presence across the full range of national public policy concerns.

That is what we are all about in this place. We are demonstrating an interest in protecting the Canadian public over the full range of its concerns. If you do not like the way we do it and cannot stand the heat, what are you doing in the kitchen?

The burden of making Parliament more effective falls, above all, on the shoulders of the opposition and members of parliament in their individual capacities.

The next subject I would like to deal with is opposition rights and responsibilities. We are dealing with the 32nd Parliament, 1980 to 1984, where you will see the contrast between the behaviour of a Liberal Speaker, the Right Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, and Senator Charbonneau, whom you call Speaker, but we do not.

The first session of the first Parliament of the 1980s set a number of seemingly unenviable precedents which tested the stamina of both the government and the opposition. The session was the longest on record—approximately 400 sitting days—not least because of several episodes in which the opposition, as a last resort, employed its tactics in order to block the normal course of parliamentary business. Yet in the end, the session gave birth to a new Canadian Constitution, as well as many major pieces of legislation.

Whenever I discuss this Constitution, I will remind you that it was written by René Levesque; the text was signed by him, and in an act of unparalleled flexibility, it was accepted by Trudeau. I would like you to show me flexibility on the part of anyone at your ministerial desk.

From the point of view of the future role of the opposition, it is important to assess how Parliament acquitted itself under the strain of these extraordinary circumstances.

Parliamentary reform rose to the top of the agenda in Canada in the late 1960s, largely as a result of the frustrating experience with successive minority governments and the exceedingly long and acrimonious debate over the adoption of a national flag. However, the reform process itself became so vexed that eventually the government imposed a series of changes to streamline the rules of debate over the strenuous objections of the opposition.

Then, as later, there were critics who wondered what was the use of reform if, after all, "the function of Parliament as a whole is to ventilate, not to legislate." Still, most interested observers continued to believe strongly that Parliament had to be more than just a place for fruitless "ventilation."

You have left us with nothing but ventilation. As was pointed out by my colleagues earlier in this debate, your Minister of National Revenue said that he would accept absolutely no amendments to this bill. That is on the record, and you cannot deny it. Senator Simard denies it, but he will deny anything.

Then your Minister of Finance backed up the Minister of Revenue and said that there would be no amendments. He did not have the gall to ask us to propose amendments at the committee stage. We were told that you would accept no amendments.

We heard today from Senator Neiman that you do not have a concordance in your bill between the English and the French texts. Lawyers will become millionaires fighting over the GST if we do not manage to stop it. Citizens will be able to sue forever on the basis of no concordance, and so they should.

We have looked at the whole bill. You have heard some of the defects, and I will read you more. I have a whole caseful of defects here. Of all the models to imitate, we picked the very worst, the one that the British have produced and which resembles the way they number their houses—number 1, number 37, number 4 and number 203, and then the similar names next to one another, such as Cumberland Crescent, Cumberland Avenue, Cumberland Square, Cumberland Road. You need a doctorate in taxi operation to find your way around London.

We have been left with only ventilation because of you. You pretend—and you know it is a lie—that when we were a majority we blocked things that the Prime Minister wanted. Senator McElman, before he left, gave a speech and he left me the data. On a large number of occasions when a Liberal majority blocked a bill, they blocked a Liberal government.

What mattered most to Mr. Trudeau was constitutional reform. In June 1978, the Liberal majority in the Senate told him that his Bill C-60 would not pass this chamber. Through that bill, he wanted to change the Constitution without consulting the provinces. His appointees—they were not puppets whose strings are pulled but human beings with minds and courage—said to him that it would not pass. They forced him to back down. Being an intelligent man, he backed down and did not go into a fit because his mirror had told him that he was not the most beautiful of all.

• (1145)

Your government then comes into power and says, "No amendments, no amendments, no amendments," all along. "My way or no way." Having said that, you complain that we do not propose amendments. So you have left us only with ventilations. What you are getting from me is hyperventilation, and you will be getting it for many more hours to come. Any time any senator opposite wants to stand up and try any tricks or give me a shot, I will be delighted; I will love it. You will get a shot right back in the mouth. I do not ask for any quarter, and as you know I do not give any.

Parliamentary reform rose to the top of the agenda in Canada in the late 1960s, as we said. There are people who object to the fact that it is only ventilation.

We have here someone who did great things for Parliament. During 1982 and 1983, the Lefebvre committee produced a series of innovative reports. The senator should take a bow. I am saying nice things about you, dear colleague. I am saying that during 1982—that Senator Poitras will not listen is one thing; but that you will not listen when I say what a great man you are, what can I do?

Senator Lefebvre: It surprised me so much to hear that praise that it stunned me, that is all.

Senator Gigantès: What do you mean that I surprised you by praising you? Don't I always praise you? Have you ever heard me say anything nasty about you—anything other than compliments? Do not pay any attention to Senator Poitras.

Senator Poitras: He will not speak—

Senator Gigantès: He does not understand what I am saying. It is my fault, though, because, as he pointed out, I was not born here and my accent probably is not good enough for him.

Senator Barootes: Like the rest of us, he does not believe you—that is the problem.

Senator Hastings: Oh, ye of little faith.

Senator Gigantès: My darling Staf, not you and I. We are two Greeks. If we get into a shouting match, you and I, we will drive them nuts. So why don't you relax a little? Not you and I, please. We have good relations. Besides, before this is over I may need your professional services.

During 1982 and 1983 the Lefebvre committee produced a series of innovative reports. One of the most notable early recommendations to be accepted was the automatic referral of reports from government departments and agencies to the relevant Commons standing committees, and the requirement for substantive government response to committee reports.

The only response we get from this government, though, is, "Pass it without amendment. Accept that whatever we say is right. Even if it is wrong, it is right."

Sweeping proposals in later reports to increase the scrutiny of expenditures made little headway, I regret. But in a number of other areas—election of the Speaker, broadening the composition of the Board of Internal Economy, the use of legislative committees with chairmen drawn from a panel of members chosen by the Speaker from both sides of the house—the work of the special committee in enhancing the role of private members of all parties was not in vain.

Senator Lefebvre, take another bow. Your work was not in vain. Senator Rizzuto, tell Senator Lefebvre that I am continuing to say nice things about him. This does not happen very often to many of us in this chamber.

Senator Lefebvre: I promise to listen.

Senator Gigantès: Please do. Bask in it.

How much these institutional changes benefited the opposition is open to question since some of them, such as shortening the length of speeches, were designed to make the work of Parliament more efficient and expeditious. The changes also did not address the continued rigid operation of party discipline, which put the onus of holding the government to account squarely on the ingenuity and procedural arsenal of the opposition parties and their parliamentary leadership. Van Loon and Whittington have observed:

> In a majority government situation, the basic strengths and weaknesses of the opposition parties in parliament are determined primarily by the procedures of the House of Commons. Since they are never going to be able to outvote the government on any policy proposal, the opposition parties must content themselves with using subtler techniques to attempt to influence policy.

We now have the definition of what I am doing. This is my subtle technique. Wait until you see my unsubtle technique.

The two major confrontational incidents drawn from the first session of the 32nd Parliament showed the lengths to which a determined opposition could go.

You will all chuckle with approval when I describe the behaviour on the part of your fellow Tories, which is much worse than anything we ever did here. You probably think that it was wonderful. Who knows? Maybe it was.

In the first incident, the opposition successfully prevented the government from moving time allocation on debate on third reading of its constitutional resolution. By raising a steady stream of points of order and questions of privilege, house business was interrupted, with two agreed-upon exceptions, from March 26, 1981, until April 8, when the Government House Leader tabled a complex special motion as a compromise which both guaranteed the government an eventual conclusion to the debate, and conceded the opposition's point. The Liberals conceded the opposition's point.

Perhaps things would be better in this house if the Leader of the Government in this house—I choke on the word "honourable"—thought of conceding a point occasionally. But I daresay the apprentice's sorcerer, the Prime Minister, who holds his strings would not accept.

In any event, the Liberals conceded—although they had a majority situation—the opposition's point that the bill be delayed until the Supreme Court ruled on the constitutionality of the resolution before the house. That is a big concession. We asked for a similar concession with respect to your appointment of eight new senators. But we were told, "No. Absolutely not. We will not discuss this". What you want is no amendments, no suggestions and total silence on our part. That is what you want, but you will not get it.

In the second incident, the opposition balked at a multi-purpose, omnibus bill—Bill C-94, the Energy Security Act, which was introduced by the government as part of its controversial National Energy Program. By refusing to answer the bells that summoning members to a recorded vote on a related adjournment motion, the official opposition held up house proceedings while the division bells rang from 4:20 p.m. on March 2, 1982 until 2:28 p.m. on March 17, when the logjam was broken by an all-party agreement to split the bill into eight separate acts, all of which were subsequently passed with limited debate.

It was the government that made the concession—that is, it was the Liberals who made the concession. The Tories rang the bells for 15 days. At that time, a Liberal was the Speaker, namely, the Right Honourable Madam Sauvé. She did not do what Senator Charbonneau did. She did not call in the Liberals at a time that was known only to them and hold a vote. She let the bells ring. She knew what the bell ringing was for. The bell ringing occurred in order to allow the opposition, which was a minority, a weapon with which to fight the government. That is what the opposition is there for in a Parliament. That is what it is for, namely, to fight the government. Madam Sauvé, a democrat, understood that and allowed the bells to ring. The government had to pay a price for the ending of the ringing of the bells. It had to agree to split the bill into eight parts, as the opposition wanted it.

Can you cite an example of reasonableness comparable to that on the part of your government during the six years that you have been destroying the country? In the above case, the opposition achieved a partial victory in its stand against the omnibus bill. It is rather more difficult to say how much was gained in terms of public comprehension and scrutiny of the complex energy legislation by the attention accorded the sensational bell-ringing episode. There was some opposition disappointment that the media coverage did not extend far into the substance of the legislation. Well, join the club—at least we have joined the club now.

I will digress here, as a journalist. Within the hearing of my dear friend, Senator Doyle, I might talk a bit about the problems of a journalist and the problems of deadlines.

As an editorial writer in the Gazette, I had to attend the editorial meetings that started at ten in the morning. By 11:30 assignments had been distributed and I had to deliver an editorial of eight and three-quarter column inches by 4:30 precisely, and not one minute later. That took place from 11:30 to 4:30—five hours. But two of those hours included the lunch hour, when you could not get anyone on the phone. You had to do some research and you had to write. You always had the feeling that you were on the fringe of superficiality. It was difficult to feel satisfied at the end of an editorial with anything but the language. You often had the feeling that, by clever use of language you were camouflaging your lack of knowledge.

I am reminded of the time I was sent to the Dominican Republic by you, Senator Doyle, when Trujillo was overthrown. I arrived on a Friday night at two in the morning. I was supposed to report for the Observer at eight in the morning, Dominican time, to catch their last edition. Tell me this: Who can talk to you? Who can you find to talk to you the first time you go to a place where the dictator has just been killed? The place is in a state of seige and everyone is scared of themselves, the armed forces and the police. Nobody wants to talk. I said, well, I will do a kind of Hemingway piece all about the appearance of the place, the lighting and the moonlight glinting on the machine guns. I said to myself that next week I will have learned something of value. But by the next week I had been moved to another story by Senator Doyle. I never did get to explain the situation. I did not even find out what the hell the situation was. I did, however, receive a telegram of congratulation from the paper on how good my article was. It was meaningless, but the paper liked it. That is journalism.

● (1200)

The Tories were very upset after the bell-ringing episode that the only attention they got was for the bell ringing itself and not for the substance of what they were saying. This is a fate that awaits me. All the journalists will care about—and who can blame them—is how many hours I talked and how well I stand. I have been sent messages by journalists asking, "How do you feel?" Not, "What are you talking about?" They are not around to listen, and I do not blame them. Those are the vagaries of the journalistic profession. It is not an easy one, but a great one, one which I commend to any youngster. Apart from being a senator, I know of no other occupation in which you can be insolent. One thing that is absolutely essential for the survival of democracy is insolence. Some of the well-meaning senators we have across the way with their inordinate wish for reverence, decorum, proper manners and respectability do not seem to understand that if all these rules they would like all of us to apply were applied, democracy would seriously suffer. Occasionally, to make someone like Mulroney or even Lowell Murray listen to an argument, an eloquent pen or even a stiletto will not produce a result. You have to get a club and hit them over the head with it, verbally.

It might have been less of a problem for the opposition during the National Energy Program if the issues at stake had been simple and clearcut. I think in many ways our message has penetrated. Honourable senators have heard about the article written by Jeffrey Simpson this morning, and similar articles which have appeared elsewhere, concerning the question of who speaks for Canada. There is talk about the Prime Minister's overweaning pride and his incapacity to handle affairs. As I have said before, the fish starts rotting at the head and goes down from the Prime Minister to his whole cabinet. There is a pervasive aura of failure and incompetence at a time when the country badly needs decent government.

I will repeat what I said earlier, and may my liberal father's soul forgive me for saying it: I long for a good, decent, credible Tory Prime Minister until the next election for the next two years so that he can speak for Canada, and so that he can try to heal some of the damage the present incumbent of 24 Sussex Drive has inflicted on this wonderful country. As I said in the article I wrote, Canada is a sweet country and does not deserve Mulroney. I am not about to say that those across the way do not deserve him; they do. But the country does not deserve him. I do not want honourable senators to think I am getting soft, but I would accept a decent Tory as a Prime Minister, and there are some sitting over there now.

In the bitterly-contested 1980-82 session referred to, the government risked the wrath of the opposition by invoking the guillotine rule a total of eight times. Several special orders incorporating time allocation were also passed with respect to constitutional and energy matters after repeated head-on collisions had exhausted both sides of the house. But the government on many occasions, and repeatedly, failed.

This is something the Conservative government at the present time does not understand. It does not understand that democracy by definition is compromise. The Conservatives today seem, like all Conservatives, to have this vision of absolute perfection harking back to a mythical, wonderful, golden time. There is no perfection. Perfection is tyranny. I know that tyranny does not concern the Conservatives very much, that it does not bother them and that they feel comfortable with it. If that were not the case, they would not stay in their caucus. Pat Nowlan was saying things that everyone knows: for instance, that Mr. Mulroney is a tyrant and that he is damaging the country. They will ask themselves one day, "How guilty was I in not doing something to stop it?"

Ultimately, a good deal was accomplished. The constitutional resolution was improved, however arduously, at each stage in the journey toward patriation. I demonstrated one of those before. Trudeau accepted Lévesque's text for the Constitution.

Some committees were very active and a number of special parliamentary task forces produced highly regarded reports. In short, the 32nd Parliament was far more productive than public cynicism or confusion might suggest.

I would also like to suggest that some of the press is much too tied ideologically to the way of thinking of their multi-millionaire owners. Editorial writers are not told what to write, but hired because of the way they think. An example is the current Editor-in-Chief of the Globe and Mail, William Thorsell. In the trade, he is known as a dinosaur; one of those Alberta relics that suddenly became revived. He is changing the Globe and Mail from a fair imitation of the New York Times to a poor imitation of the Wall Street Journal. He has economic ideas that are only the ideas of Herbert Spencer and others who say, "They did not have my luck to be born with a silver spoon in my mouth, to catch the attention of Megarry and Lord Thompson to be put in charge of a fine newspaper," a newspaper that had been built up to its eminence by Senator Doyle. They now have the fun of destroying it. Thorsell was picked because he thinks like Lord Thompson and Megarry. He inherited Doyle, who did not think like them. He had the courage to be an independent thinker. I worked for Doyle. He was a great editor.

Although the election of September, 1984 left the opposition caucuses smaller and weaker than in the previous Parliament, one of the first initiatives of the Mulroney government was to set up a special committee on House of Commons reform, with the avowed intention of giving more clout to backbench MPs. Excuse me for laughing. Any Tory backbench MP, on hearing or reading this, will either weep or laugh.

The McGrath committee—and where is McGrath now? Is he still the Lieutenant Governor of Newfoundland? Honest men cannot stay very long in that government—tabled its first report in December of 1984. As a result of the committee's recommendations, changes to the Standing Orders were made on a provisional basis in June of 1985 and February of 1986. In June, 1987 the entire reform package, with slight additions and modifications, was made permanent.

Among the rule changes of potential benefit to opposition members, and as well in some cases to independent-minded government backbenchers—such as Messrs. Kindy, Kilgour, Nowlan and those who did not run in 1988 because they were sick and tired of the conditions under which they were working—were: the election of the Speaker by secret ballot of all members; provision for three opposition representatives on the Board of Internal Economy; establishment of ad hoc legislative committees chaired by members of a panel chosen by the Speaker from private members on both sides of the House; increased committee scrutiny of delegated legislation with the possibility of disallowance; and committee review of Governor in Council appointments. Has that ever happened? Was there a committee set up to review such appointments? Undoubtedly, it could use the talents of Senator Poitras, who thinks people not born in Canada are not quite as decent, good, intelligent or worthwhile as people born in Canada, as if the geographic location at which your mother has her labour has some effect on your character.

Senator Turner: What about the native people?

Senator Gigantès: I will get to that in a while.

Another change was a provision for the Leader of the Opposition to extend by an additional ten sitting days the time available to one standing committee to study the estimates. Honourable senators will remember how the whole process was perverted when the Conservatives tried to get borrowing authority in this chamber without tabling the estimates. I am never tired of repeating that. It is like going to the bank and saying, "Lend me money". The banker will say, "What are you going to do with it?" You say, "I am not going to tell you what I am going to do with it. Just lend me the money". You will not be very successful trying that.

The McGrath committee also recommended a significant relaxation of party discipline. That is really rich! I think that must have been the point at which they decided to ship him off to the job of Lieutenant Governor in Newfoundland. This significant relaxation of party discipline was recommended so that only very rarely would House votes be regarded explicitly as matters of confidence. However, entrenched attitudes and habits have proved hard to break. The 33rd Parliament was not noticeably less partisan or adversarial than the one which preceded it, to the chagrin of those impatient for further reform.

I am not shocked by the adjectives "adversarial and partisan." If reform is to make Parliament what our prissy and proper colleagues across the way would want, we will have to have parliamentary agreements with Monseigneur Castonguay across the way who is shocked because I dare to put a piece of tangerine in my mouth. Do not tell him, please, that that is what I am about to do. He will make a scene.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gigantès, I would like to ask you a question. I hate to do so in the middle of your reading of the report concerning opposition in a parliamentary system. However, you keep referring to the reforms contained within the McGrath Report.

• (1215)

Indeed, I suppose, if that report were followed in the spirit in which it was written, it would have created reforms. Do you believe that the way these changes in the House of Commons have taken place has, in fact, reformed the procedures at all, other than the obvious benefits of electing the Speaker which is something we could probably look for in this chamber as well? Perhaps you could give me your thoughts on this. As the years have gone on and through the eighties, following the McGrath report, it seems, observing from this distance, that instead of strengthening the House of Commons, strengthening the independence of the committee system and strengthening the role of the backbencher—which was supposed to be fundamental to that report—we have found in a sense that the House of Commons is not functioning well, is not functioning smoothly, is not opened up. The system is not opened up. Many would say, in fact, that it is the reverse. Over the last six years almost from the time legislation has been introduced in the Commons, Canadians, either as groups or as individuals interested in that legislation have been coming to our side in advance to say, "May we appear before your committee when the legislation gets here, because we no longer feel we have an opportunity to be heard in the House of Commons." This is exactly what has happened over in the British Parliament, where, ironically, the House of Lords is often looked upon now as the populous chamber.

Senator Gigantès: When you have a Prime Minister with overweening pride who refuses to accept that any idea that is not his—he does not have many—is any good, you are faced with a situation in which even the most admirable report is not worth the paper it is written on, to quote the Prime Minister who was referring to the Constitution in those days, including the Charter of Rights. His view of the Charter of Rights is that it is not worth the paper it is written on. If you remember I was asking the Leader of the Government in those days—the same one we now have-to ask the Prime Minister whether, when the Prime Minister said that it was not worth the paper it was written on, he thought that it was not worth the paper on which are written the constitutional rights everyone has, the following fundamental freedoms: freedom of conscience and religion—it's not worth the paper it is written on. Of course, if it is Mr. Mulroney's, he has his druthers. It is not because he tried to repeal his rights—freedom of thought, belief, opinion, and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication—not worth the paper it is written on.

Senator Fairbairn: Equal opportunity for women.

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely. Not worth the paper it is written on. That is the Prime Minister's view of our Constitution. If he treats the Constitution with such cavalier disrespect and lack of understanding, what do you expect he would do to the report written by an honest man? I mean how could the Prime Minister understand an honest man like McGrath? McGrath was an honest man, a decent, honest man. So his reforms were a dead letter as you so ably say, Senator Fairbairn. The House of Commons, despite the reforms, has become worse and we can only attribute this to the Prime Minister, because if the report of Senator McGrath was the instrument for making it better, then if it has become worse, it is because the Prime Minister, and now that savage, street fighter his Leader of the House, Harvie Andre, are making the situation untenable. As you say, more and more people have turned to us. Witness the hundreds of thousands of petitions and letters we have received, not only about the GST. People somehow have a feeling that we might be fairer in a free vote, more reliable to choose a good solution over the abortion law? We are, despite our shenanigans which were so necessary. They had left us no other means of defending the rights of the opposition. People were asked if they approved of the Senate tactics. They were not asked if they approved of what the Senate was doing. They were asked if they approved of the Senate's tactics. The majority approved of the Senate tactics. Three times more people approved of the Senate tactics—that is desk banging by approval of the Prime Minister, if you do not count Quebec. The Prime Minister is at 3 per cent—where is it, in New Brunswick?

Senator Fairbairn: Alberta.

Senator Gigantès: Alberta. A Tory Prime Minister in Alberta. My esteem for the intelligence of Albertans was always high, but right now it is way up there in the stratosphere, beyond. I could easily be hoisted by my esteem to one of those orbiting satellites, because Albertans are showing magnificent good sense in evaluating this destructive man.

In contrast to the numerical weakness of the official opposition in the House of Commons, members of its caucus held a strong majority in the Senate. The renewed activism of senators in opposition provoked several protracted confrontations with the government, notably over bills on borrowing authority, pharmaceutical patents, refugee determination and, finally, implementation of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement. The government several times threatened action to take away the Senate's power to defeat bills.

The French call this a rotomotate, a sort of empty thread, boastful, strutting. A rotomotate. He knows he cannot do it, if he cannot get agreement from the provinces on the GST. How is he going to get agreement for the western provinces on reducing the powers of the Senate when the western provinces wanted to augment it? Why is he making that empty gesture like a toad that puffs itself up so as to be frightening? Nobody is frightened. The press pricks the toad, the air comes out and our Prime Minister returns to his smaller size.

You wish to ask me another question?

Senator Fairbairn: If I could ask you another question, along the same, about the powers of the Senate. Is it not your understanding of the views of, not only the western region, but, indeed, parts of the eastern region, that what they want is not a Senate with reduced powers. They want a Senate with the elective accountability to use the wide powers that it has, not to reduce those powers. A reduction of the powers of the Senate, even if it were elected, surely flies in the face of what the people in my region, and I believe people in the maritime region, are asking for. At least that was my understanding. You know that area very well as well. Maybe you have different views, I would be interested in hearing them.

Senator Gigantès: No, I do not. Were you here when I was asked by Senator Beaudoin and by Senator Stollery what I thought about the evolution of the Senate? I talked on this issue. You were not here.

Senator Fairbairn: I was preoccupied at that point.

Senator Gigantès: Well, I think I had better repeat it.

Senator Fairbairn: Because I did miss it, and Senator Frith told me it was very interesting.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Frith was distracting you. He has a habit of doing that. Charming man. He distracts me very often.

I was saying that unfortunately when I think about constitutional reform, I have death in my heart. I really believe that two more years of Mulroney will mean the separation of Canada. The reformed Senate we are talking about would have to be a Senate for the run, after Quebec leaves. It may well be the price a reformed Senate with equal representation and the Australian device of double dissolution would have to opay. It might well be the price that Ontario would have to pay to keep Canada together. In this way, other parts of Canada would not be so terribly afraid of the massive power that its numbers would give Ontario in a Canadian House of Commons after separation.

I also said that I did not see what the Senate with a mere suspensive veto would do, or how good that would be, or if it would be any good at all, because the government of the day could simply do its flow charts, its action plan, and take account of the length of the suspensive veto. It would turn the Senate into a squeaky, rubber stamp. The squeak would have to last a finite number of days or weeks. That would be tantamount to an Australian Senate for the English part of Canada.

I don't suppose that an independent Quebec would have a second chamber, if it did, despite the idiots, the fanatical idiots who like wiping their feet on flags on both sides of the Ottawa River, and if they can be overcome after a number of years, and reason prevails again and some association has worked on it—which would be very difficult because of those idiots—then I do not see a Senate of the Australian model being acceptable to Quebec. I said, because Quebec is worried about the reduction of its relative, democratic weight within Canada, it would not accept the Senate with as much power as the House of Commons, in anything like a close sovereignty association which would reduce its authority. This would be a one on one thing. The members of the European Economic Community have given two votes each to the Latch partners in the European Parliament or in the European Commission and the European court. They have given two votes each to Spain though it is considered as in between the big and the small. The small members of the European Community have one vote each and with Spain on their side, they cannot top the combined votes of France, Germany, Britain and Italy. I do not see Quebec for many decades feeling comfortable enough with any situation in which it would consider itself subject to being outvoted. What it would like, and I do not believe it can get it, is a one-on-one situation in which the rest of Canada has one vote and Quebec has one vote. I do not think that is achievable. It is a tragedy but I do not think it is achievable.

• (1230)

For the rest of Canada, or if by some strange miracle Canada survives, we are going to have to go to something like the Australian model.

Senator Fairbairn: May I ask another question, Senator Gigantès? I am very disturbed to hear your pessimism about the future of Canada and your feeling that separation is inevitable for the province of Quebec. I find that hard to accept from you, because, at your core, you have always indicated a feeling of optimism that problems can be worked out. I am wondering if you could tell me—and I hope it will be a positive answer—that you have not completely abandoned either your efforts or your conviction that it is still possible to keep this country together?

Senator Gigantès: I would like to think it is possible to keep the country together, but look at the circumstances. The strongest federalist force in Quebec right now is Premier Robert Bourassa. I am very worried about how long he is staying in the hospital. He did have a malignant melanoma. We do know that it was metastasized into his lymphatic system. He then went back for a check-up. He was operated on again and he has been in the hospital a considerably long time.

I am not a medical doctor. I have read the statistics. Some people survive, but they are few. Most people do not survive this. Therefore, we have the dominant Liberal federalist force in Quebec, Premier Bourassa, having to think of what happens next, and, because of the failing of his health, he will not be considered by the rest of Canada as a good long-term prospect for negotiating. The chances of the rest of Canada having to negotiate with Parizeau are very great.

Senator Fairbairn: What about Rémillard?

Senator Gigantès: Well, who knows? He might surprise us. Harry Truman surprised people. I hope he does. My main worry is on the federal side. We are in opposition and Mr. Chrétien is the Leader of the Opposition. The Leader of the Government of Canada is someone utterly distrusted by English Canadians. They will have nightmares at the thought that he might be negotiating with Quebec on anything. They consider him, and quite rightly, a prisoner of the separatists in the Quebec caucus. I do not see how, under these practical circumstances, we can find an accommodation in which English Canada will be wise enough to accept Quebec's demands and Quebec will be wise enough not to start feeling humiliated every time somebody questions the position of a comma or a full stop.

That is why I was giving the example that I am afraid the political scientists and columnists on both sides will construct a wall on Victoria Island, where the Champlain bridge passes; and the wall will be called, on one side, the "wall of the humiliations", and, on the other, the "wall of the ingratitudes". And the first humiliation described will be how Lucien Bouchard was humiliated by Canada by being made Ambassador to Paris and then a member of the cabinet. On the other side of the wall some columnists from the Ottawa Sun will be filling in the ingratitudes, and the first one will be that Bouchard was made an ambassador and a minister. He was dragged out of his little backwater and made Ambassador to Paris. That will be an ingratitude. There will be a period when we will be lobbing ingratitudes and humiliations over that wall, and it is going to make it very, very difficult for people of good will and reason to reach a decent accommodation.

Of course, I enjoy taking shots at Mr. Mulroney, but I wish he were better, even though his being better might doom my party to another term in opposition. I do wish he were better, because Canada in the next two years preceding the election needs a decent Prime Minister, and we do not have one. That is why I am afraid.

Now I will continue.

> To sum up, developments during the last two parliaments have had a mixed impact on the fortunes of political oppositions in Canada. The major overhaul of House of Commons rules begun in 1982 and completed in 1987, and the renewed activism of the Senate after 1984, have provided new opportunities for opposition members to contribute to the policy process, at least at the margins. The presence of television cameras in the Commons and the possible expansion of electronic coverage to committee hearings are also innovations which offer advantages to a skilled opposition. At the same time, some of the procedural reforms, such as the streamlining of debates and the taking of votes, primarily aid the government by making it harder for opposition parties to sustain the use of dilatory or obstructionist tactics. Moreover, the opposition must be careful that in resorting to time-wasting devices and theatrical outbursts in Question Period it is not creating an unfavourable impression of parliament among the general public.
> The two parliamentary oppositions in Ottawa must also consider their role in relation to other extra-parliamentary circumstances and forms of political opposition. Our electoral system frequently results in sharp regional imbalances in the parties' caucus representation, in a high electoral casualty rate for caucus dissidents and independents, and in the exclusion of a growing number of minor or so-called "fringe" parties from parliamentary life.

That may not be the case in the next Parliament. That will only make matters worse.

> A significant number of Canadians probably feel that their views are not adequately represented in the ranks of either the government or the opposition. At the same time, non-party protest and lobby groups have become increasingly active at all stages of the political process. In constitutional matters, the major oppositional roles now tend to be played by provincial governments and legislatures. The opposition caucuses, therefore, cannot just fix their confrontational gaze on the government benches; they must also look over their shoulders at other under-represented or competing groups, with at times louder voices, in the arena of national politics.

As a recent text observes:

This is by Robert Jackson, Doreen Jackson and Nicolas Baxter-Moore. It is entitled Politics in Canada: Culture, Institutions, Behaviour and Public Policy, and I quote:

> . . . many of the difficulties encountered by the opposition in formulating effective criticism of government policy have less to do with House of Commons procedures or research facilities than with more fundamental problems which also afflict parliamentary oppositions in the other western democracies. One is that the official Opposition in Parliament often has difficulty in making itself heard above the "hubbub" coming from other political actors. Major interest groups and private research institutes frequently offer articulate and well-publicized criticisms of government policy, and, in a federal context such as Canada, "there is little doubt that the clashes between the provinces and the federal government . . . detract attention from the federal parliamentary opposition on some of the most important issues in Canadian politics."
> Sometimes, too, it may be difficult for the opposition parties to offer clearcut alternatives to government policy. Some issues do not lend themselves to a confrontational style of politics, since they cut across party lines and strain party cohesion on both sides of the House. This is especially true of moral issues such as abortion, capital punishment or nuclear weapons. On other social and economic policy issues, the development of an ideological consensus supportive of the mixed-economy and the welfare state in most western societies has tended to preclude the presentation of radical policy alternatives by a "loyal" opposition.
> Parliament exists not only to transact the business of state, but to provide a forum in which all legitimate points of view can be expressed.

I once said in a speech and wrote in an article that one of the roles of the Senate was for heresy. I meant a forum for people who do not accept the general consensus, who have radical views. I shocked a professor of political science, who wrote a book about it, saying that I was proposing heresy, as if this was terrible. If a professor is not capable of preaching heresy, what is he doing in the university? He does not preach, perhaps, in some faculties, but in others he should, and the faculty of political science to which this person belonged, really needed some professor for teaching heresy, and this professor was young. In any event, someone once said as long as they spell your name right, it does not matter what they say about you, and he did spell my name right. There are all kinds of students, probably, who think that there is a heretical senator, namely, me, but they probably have forgotten my name by now.

Why have you deprived me of Senator Simard? What is this, a conspiracy to weaken me? That is not nice. In any event, I shall continue:

> The government has a right and duty to govern. The opposition's right and duty, if it believes the public interest is at stake, is to oppose the government's policies and actions by every legitimate parliamentary means. In so doing, oppositions try to convince the electorate that they should change places with the government. Because of this continuous contest, parliamentary democracy is always a more or less trying affair, but politics, not mere administration, is what representative, alternative government is all about.
> The debate about the respective roles of governments and oppositions is not a new one. Today, however, the development of state institutions, and the expanding horizon of state activities tend to contrast unfavourably with the relative "underdevelopment" of legislative controls over the executive branch. This has directed attention to the factors impinging on the effective operation of "checks and balances" in democratic political systems, and, in turn, to numerous proposals for legislative reform. In parliamentary systems there is a fundamental constitutional rinciple of responsible government at stake. And in the Canadian case, the tradition of one-party government, combined with the frequent weakness of legislative oppositions, poses added dangers.

● (1245)

This is a scholar writing this and he thinks a weak opposition is a danger.

> Under these circumstances preserving and enhancing the role of the opposition becomes critical to the democratic legitimacy of the system as a whole. With rare exceptions, government backbenchers cannot hold the cabinet and civil service to account. It is the opposition which is chiefly responsible for keeping government on its toes, and for fearlessly asserting the rights of the legislature vis-à-vis the executive. By performing these duties the opposition is really doing everyone a favour because, as John Stewart has noted, "slipping things through the house may seem smart in the short run. In the long run it works to discredit both the government and Parliament."

That quotation is from John Stewart's "Strengthening the Commons," Journal of Canadian Studies, special issue on "Responsible Government Reconsidered," Summer 1979, page 47.

> However much the classical model of parliaments may be said to have waned in favour of one based on administrative convenience, the best guarantee of good government is still the vigilance of an effective parliamentary opposition.

I have a choice to offer my colleagues. I could go on reading from submissions made to us by people who testified in the committee regarding the goods and services tax. I also have several books I could read from. I have an excellent book here on the psychology of military competence. Military thinking is an important part of Conservative thinking and of the Conservative illusion. It is a whole study on the incompetence of this facet of Conservative thinking. I have another text which talks about opposition and the relationship between opposition and the government. If we want to get into economics and illustrate the inflexibility of Conservative economic thinking, I have John Kenneth Galbraith's monumental and marvellous latest book entitled, "Economics in Perspective." It is written with his unfailing eloquence and with a high value of entertainment.

Don't despair. There is more; there is much more.

[Translation]

Senator David: Senator Gigantès, would you entertain remarks or comments?

Senator Gigantès: Remarks without comments?

Senator David: No, remarks and comments.

Senator Gigantès: But of course, since we are such good friends.

Senator David: You were asking which book you should read to us. You realize, of course, we all have shelves full of books, and we could all volunteer our services. However, may I remind you that we are still at the third reading stage of Bill C-62, and for the past half hour, you have talked about just about everything except what actually concerns us in this Chamber.

So I suggest that instead of reading us a book, you shold let one of your colleagues speak to the subject of today's proceedings. You have been on your feet for twelve hours, and I imagine you must be getting tired. As far as we are concerned, we are starting to feel quite weary.

Senator Gigantès: What a pity! No staying power! Me, tired? Never. So you don't think I can find a connection. You think I selected these books at random. I did not. They were selected to support my criticism of your fiscal and economic policies, and the GST is part and parcel of these policies.

Senator David: Honourable Senator Gigantès, you talked to us about Mr. Bourassa's health. I don't think that was an appropriate subject for discussion in this Chamber.

Senator Simard: It was in poor taste.

Senator David: When you talk about Quebec's independence, which has not happened yet and will never happen, I hope . . . When you talk about the organization of the House of Commons; when you talk about the moral aspects of certain laws; when you make a speech about the loyal opposition, the role of the Senate and the opposition, and refer to the credibility of professors who teach heresies—and you are probably one of them—and when you go on about the merits and weaknesses of democracy, all these subjects are irrelevant to the debate on the GST, as far as I can see.

Senator Gigantès: What can I say, Senator? All I can say is that your logic is entirely linear. Senator Poitras told me several times . . .

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator David: I don't understand what that means.

Senator Gigantès: In a straight line.

Senator David: Yes, but is it good logic or just a nasty surprise?

Senator Gigantès: Just a minute! It is linear. It is not sufficiently multidimensional. When Senator Poitras was talking about the GST, he said a number of times that we cannot consider the GST in a vacuum. We must consider the total impact on the economy and the fact that it will stimulate the economy.

Senator David: Is that an example of vertical logic?

Senator Gigantès: No, what he suggested was a multidimensional analysis of the GST. He said that you could not simply . . .

Senator Simard: Did you say demented?

Senator Gigantès: I say insane when I refer to the findings of your phrenologist, after the examination he does now and again.

Senator Poitras is quite right to say that the GST cannot be viewed in an isolated context. It has to be examined in light of the over-all economic situation. Among other things he said that, as a result of its impact in other sectors of the economy, it will boost production, improve productivity and bolster imports, and that each of these components has its own fallout and repercussions. That is like a huge speadsheet, but even a spreadsheet is not enough to cover all bases.

Therefore I can hardly talk about the GST without referring to the government's over-all economic policy. And then I cannot talk about the government's over-all economic policy without referring to politicians. It is just as if you were saying «you simply cannot talk about the right front wheel of a car, just like that, and how it handles on the road without referring to the car itself. Is it overloaded, properly loaded, what condition is it in?». To that I add that I cannot mention all these elements without saying something about the driver.

So if you expect us to rate the performance of a given part of the car, of this government mechanism, of an aspect of the GST, if we really want to know what we are doing to assess the consequences we must inevitably raise questions about the driver.

You may have the world's best legislation and even the world's best tax system, but I have a problem if I see that the government is blinded by its economic ideology and its conservatism. The minute I say that, I feel I owe you an explanation. I do not want you to tell me what are the objections to conservatism. I looked around for quite some time before laying my hands on this excellent book which I am sure you will not want to read because it is entitled The Conservative Illusion. Still I believe you ought to listen to the odd quotation as I go about explaining my position. And who knows, maybe one or two of you will appreciate some of the book's lines enough to borrow it and read it.

So the whole issue is interrelated. And we have an economy where I have always advocated using a military strategy.

Indeed I suggested in my book which, according to my dear colleague Senator Simard, I had translated fraudulently—

Senator Simard: I did not say fraudulently.

Senator Gigantès: I got it fraudulently.

Senator Simard: You had it translated fraudulently.

Senator Gigantès: You are judging others by comparing them with your "fraudulent" caucus colleagues. You have been hanging around too many bums—

You have kept company with too many crooks to be able to stand in moral judgment, and when I say crooks, I mean your colleagues who are now behind bars or have been ordered to pay huge penalties. Such were the people you kept company with within the Tory caucus. There are some good people there, but you kept company also with some bad people who gave you wrong ideas about what other people are doing.

Senator Simard: Like what?

Senator Gigantès: You were not present when I indicated that as a proof of the incompetence of your government, of your leader here, and of yourself, you are not aware that your own government has a program under which French publishers who want to translate an English book, can do so and Canada Council will cover the costs.

If my French publisher wanted to publish this book, there was no need for me to provide him with a French text. In fact, I submitted to him a French text last year, but he turned it down. The opposite is also true. If I wrote a book in French, the Canada Council would be prepared to cover the costs, so that an English publisher who would want publish this book could have it translated into English.

Therefore, you are not only an ill-mannered lout, but you are showing abysmal ignorance by not knowing that this government program exists and makes it absolutely unnecessary to obtain those so-called fraudulent translations.

As I said the other day, you must be a super ignoramus to believe that it would be possible to take a translation and make overnight the necessary corrections to submit it to a publisher. It is not worth it. The publisher will give it to someone who will do the job. It is not worth it. Absolutely not.

As I said, however, I can understand you. You have been friends with many members of your caucus who have been sentenced by the courts for criminal acts and, naturally, under their influence, you judge others with the standards of your own caucus members.

Senator Simard: Are you talking about the Sky Shops?

Senator Gigantès: About what?

Senator Simard: About the Sky Shops?

Senator Gigantès: The courts found him not guilty. I am talking about your colleagues who were found guilty and sentenced.

Senator Poitras: Such innuendos have no place here.

Senator Gigantès: In the case of Mr. Desrosiers, was it an innuendo? In the case of your other colleagues who were found guilty of misappropriation of funds, are they innuendos? The member of the House of Commons who was Hull's godfather who pleaded guilty on 50 counts?

Senator Simard: Do you want us to investigate all Liberal members of the Senate and the House of Commons since Confederation? We will not play this game. This is just a smut-throwing campaign. We will leave that to you.

Senator Gigantès: You are a real swine to accuse a colleague . . .

Senator Simard: Halleluia!

Senator Gigantès: You are really a disgusting nincompoop . . .

Senator Simard: Even a pig!

Senator Gigantès: You tried to publish a provincial newspaper and you failed.

Senator Simard: You wallow in anything.

Senator Gigantès: You were not even able to publish a small local newspaper.

Senator Simard: That is terrible!

Senator Gigantès: It is not your field.

Senator Simard: Of course, you do not read French newspapers.

Senator Gigantès: Certainly, I read them.

Senator Simard: You said that English newspapers were the only one you could trust. You said so in so many words in this House two years ago. We know what you think of French newspapers in Canada.

Senator Gigantès: Unfortunately, I have to read them. As I said earlier, I read Pierre Latouche, Daniel Bourgault and the other aggressive political scientists.

Senator Simard: You are the executioner.

Senator Gigantès: I, the executioner! It is a little better than the contemptable part played by your own leader, than that wizard we have for prime minister who will destroy our country! Now, Senator David, since you want me to read you the evidence given by some people opposing the GST, I will ask you to choose between several witnesses. There is the evidence . . .

Senator David: You could choose to stop talking.

Senator Gigantès: But I don't want to. I am in top shape. My doctor told me I could talk like this for hours and hours.

Senator Simard: An expert in trash.

Senator Gigantès: What? An expert in trash.

Senator Simard: Go on.

Senator Gigantès: I have heard you were about to be hired to sniff out truffles. So you have a choice, senator David. There is a Mr. Jack Braunstein, president of the Canadian Actors' Equity Association. Also Mr. Jos Duffy, Chief Executive Officer of the Ontario Provincial Building Trades Council.

Senator David: I am sure he is going to read something. You mentioned earlier several documents on philosophy and military strategy. That would take our minds off the issue before us and could teach us something. I would go for that.

Senator Gigantès: So you see, I was right to offer you several options. I know you find me annoying. I enjoy annoying senator Simard, but not you. That is why I am asking you to choose between all the options I gave you. There is also Mr. Frank Piserchia, National Secretary Treasurer of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada. He had several appropriate comments to make about the GST, electrifying stuff really. And that goes on and on and on. There is a Mr. Simon Tanla who made an individual presentation. And that's only in one issue, I have all the others. So, what would it be, military strategy?

Senator David: Why not, do as you wish . . .

Senator Gigantès: Very well, I will pick a name I find very appealing, Mr. Frank Piserchia, National Secretary Treasurer of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada. Please, senator Simard, I would not mind really if you wish to go and get some more truffles, maybe sniff them, go on, please.

> Mr. Chairman, my name is Frank Piserchia. I am the National Secretary Treasury of the union.

Would you prefer military strategy. Make up your mind! One moment, he wants us to talk about GST-related issues, the next, he wants to hear about military strategy. It's a bit disconcerting. You are confusing us, my friends.

> Mr. Chairman, my name is Frank Piserchia. I am the National Secretary Treasurer of the union.

That is the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada.

This is an electrifying testimony

> On my right is Joe McCabe, a member of the national executive board and to my far right is Sheelagh MacDonald.

Did I spell it right? I heard a funny story in Senegal. Many people there are named Dia, it is a family name. A local man who had been to France was telling me that one day he went to the post office to send a telegram to his village, also called Dia. The employee asked him to spell it, and he said to her: "You too, want to know all the nice girls."

You know, I was getting dehydrated, the honorable senators on the other side would be really sorry if I were to run out of water to wet my parched throat. How long am I going to speak? There are only five hours left! In five more hours I will be through my first session. I will start again tomorrow morning, and then continue Monday and Tuesday.

Senator David: Then Wednesday, and Thursday . . .

Senator Gigantès: I don't know, some colleagues of mine want to speak very badly. Senator Sparrow said that no matter how long I speak, he will speak longer.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (1300)

[English]

Did you know that, Senator Bonnell? Senator Sparrow says that no matter how many hours I speak, he will speak longer than I do.

Senator Bonnell: No, I didn't know that, but I am quite sure that Senator Sparrow will beat your record. Therefore, your record in the Guinness Book of World Records will only be there for a short period of time. I will enjoy it as long as you will—that is, your opportunity to do so—but Senator Sparrow told me that he was younger than you and he had more to read. He had some good thoughts that he wanted to put forward, especially on soil.

Senator Frith: You think he causes us trouble?

Senator Bonnell: He wanted you to have the record for a short time, but he did not want you to be like our good friends "Rocket" Richard and Gordie Howe.

An Hon. Senator: Bring on Mr. Sparrow!

Senator Bonnell: For them Wayne Gretzky would follow and win the battle. Senator Sparrow is out now having chicken breast. I understand that he will be back shortly, waiting for an opportunity to follow.

Senator Doody: Will Senator Gigantès yield to him then?

Senator Bonnell: When Senator Gigantès yields, his record will be broken shortly thereafter. It is only for that short time that the Greeks will be the champions of the world.

Senator Carney: Is this a question?

Senator Roblin: Where is Senator Sparrow?

Senator Bonnell: He will come later.

Senator Roblin: You should go get him.

Senator Doody: Get him. His speech cannot be any worse.

Senator Gigantès: I do not know why anyone considers these records important. What is important here is instructing people like Senator Simard, who has no other chance of being instructed.

Senator Carney: Thanks for your short speech.

Senator Gigantès: You wish me to shorten my speech? I will only speak for a total of 44 hours; that is all—just for you.

Senator Steuart: Only that long? More.

Senator Gigantès: All right. I have to take Senator Carney into consideration. She wants me to shorten my speech. I will cut it down to 44 hours. If my colleagues protest, I will go to 45 hours.

[Translation]

> Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we wish to express our appreciation for having given us the opportunity to express our views on this crucial issue.

So, you see, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada consider the GST to be a crucial issue. Are you not concerned with the opinion of such an important union, whose members are conscientious workers and good citizens who make this country work and who make sure that you get electrical power in your home and that your radios are in working order? You could not care less whether or not these people oppose the GST. You are not willing to listen.

This is why I feel I have the duty to repeat to you what these people said, because I am sure you did not listen when they came before our committee. This is particularly interesting to me because I missed this testimony. I was in bed with a very very bad case of viral pneumonia this summer. I was also getting depressed while thinking of this government and it did affect my health. Fortunately, I am a little better now. Anyway, this is what the witness had to say:

> Our organization, the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of Canada, is a union representing 13,000 workers in the manufacturing sector, mainly in the electrical and electronic industry of Ontario, Quebec and Alberta.

So this is a high tech industry. These people produce useful things for the economy, things that we need in order to maintain our technological leadership and our competitiveness.

[English]

Senator Cools: Senator Gigantès, may I ask you a question, please?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Cools: My concern is as follows. Honourable senators, I know that I tend to ramble when I ask questions. I beg the indulgence of the senators opposite if I tend to ramble a bit in the questions that I put to the senator now speaking.

What I should like to impress upon the members is that, as a member of the committee which studied this particular bill and as I tried to grapple with the subject matter at hand, I have failed as yet to—

Senator Simard: Question.

Senator Cools: —come to terms with and to understand the intellectual framework—

Senator Simard: Question.

Senator Cools: —and the concept that this government used to instruct itself and to inform itself—

Senator Simard: Question.

Senator Cools: —as it developed this measure.

● (1315)

Senator Simard: Question!

Senator Cools: I hear an echo around me. It is an echo to which I have grown quite accustomed.

Senator Gigantès: Perhaps it is someone searching for truffles.

Senator Cools: It is the sound of Simard. It is a Simard sound.I know it well. I accompanied it to Canso and to St. John's and a few other places, so I know the sound very well. In any event, what I am wondering, Senator Gigantès, is whether in your research and in the preparation you made for your speech you have been able to study and comprehend the conceptual framework for this legislation? That is my first question.

My second question is this. Were you able to study the testimony of a Mr. Wolfe Goodman of Goodman and Carr—

Senator Frith: A classmate of mine at Osgoode Hall.

Senator Cools: I am glad you added that, Senator Frith, because Mr. Goodman on Tuesday, June 5, 1990, before the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce made some interesting comments. As a matter of fact, he made a presentation which is extremely cogent and well reasoned. It is almost persuasive for people not like myself or for those who sit on our side of the house. It is persuasive for those who support the government.

At page 41:7 of the issue number 41 he states, and I quote:

> Unfortunately, this leaves only consumption taxes as a possible area for tax increase . . . There is an astonishing degree of public hostility to consumption taxes, although it is difficult to see why this should be the case.

At page 41:10 he is reported to have said:

> You may well ask if the system is so simple why is the bill so complicated? The answer is that there are many pages that deal with special situations. In the United States the pattern of legislation is rather different and most special situations would be dealt with in regulations having the force of law. In Canada, under the present manufacturers' sales tax special situations are dealt with by departmental rulings that do not even have the force of law. They are sometimes rather broad interpretations by government. The draughtsmen of the goods and services tax, to have attempted to include virtually all of these special cases in the legislation itself, accounts for—

Senator Barootes: Has Senator Gigantès finished his speech and have you started yours?

Senator Gigantès: Would you allow me a moment? I am taking notes of the honourable senator's questions and I will answer them seriatim. I cannot posssibly know what the questions are if I don't take notes.

Senator Barootes: Your speech is over, it is her turn now.

Senator Gigantès: You hope. I haven't.

Senator Cools: Senator Gigantès, these questions are very important. I have been struggling to get answers to some of these questions. I must share with Senator Gigantès that the last time I posed this sort of question, Senator Nurgitz added, and it may be on the record, that Mr. Goodman articulated the government's case very well indeed.

Could you answer those questions, sequentially, please?

Senator Gigantès: We start with a premise by Mr. Goodman that taxes must be increased, and that consumption taxes are the last possible area for tax increases. Why do we need tax increases? The government tells us we need tax increases because we have to pay for the deficit. Are there other ways?

Now, honourable senators opposite may not know that I promised Senator MacDonald that I would read an alternative way of raising money for the government on Tuesday morning. I sort of have a date with him. It is a time which is convenient to both of us. If honourable senators opposite have no objection, I am prepared to read it now in case your shift is not on Tuesday morning, and I will read it again to Senator MacDonald because it wouldn't be fair for me not to keep my promise.

There is a government premise that taxes must be raised. I pointed out the other day that there are other ways of decreasing the government deficit. One is to lower interest rates to the U.S. level, and the other is to increase corporate profit taxes to the U.S. level. I pointed out that this would not lead to a catastrophe, and my authority was Mr. Wilson who, in an article he sent to the Wall Street Journal, explained what a fine place Canada is in which to park your money. He said that Canada is safe, has a well-educated electorate and all it takes to make it a paradise for investment. It has space, and we can bring in immigrants who will be the skilled workers of tomorrow. We have natural resources and great riches in energy. That being the case, if I were an alarmed investor somewhere else in the world I would not think that Canada is a bad place to go. Ontario, Quebec or Alberta are good, nice havens to park my money, if I had any. I will only have money if I win a lottery, and I am afraid that my wife probably forgot to buy one for last night's draw. She is absentminded that way. She doesn't believe as I do that that is the only way that we can possibly ever—

Senator Cools: You had better be careful because I see her in the gallery.

Senator Gigantès: Did you buy a lottery ticket? She probably didn't buy a lottery ticket. This truly upsets me. It is a terrible situation. Possibly my favourite number will come up.

There is no reason why we could not lower our interest rates to what they are in the United States and raise our corporate profit taxes to what they are in the United States. I gave the figures to Senator David who doubted them. For those who doubt them, I have the figures in my office and I would be delighted to photostat them at the taxpayers' expense and let you have them. You will see that in the first five years of the government's functioning it could have saved $85 billion by doing what I proposed. In other words, it could have reduced the national debt by $85 billion by December 31, 1989. That would have relieved immediately any pressure that might have existed on the Canadian dollar, and interest rates could have been brought down further.

Senator Poitras keeps talking about the necessity of seeing all the side effects, the after effects, the before effects and whatever. It is a multi-dimensional catatonation, as I am fond of saying.

With lower interest rates a lot of businesses that have gone bankrupt would not have gone bankrupt. People wanting to start up businesses would not have been put off by the enormous burden of interest rates and would have started those businesses. I am talking of small businesses which produce a lot of revenue, such as improving tourist facilities, making them able to compete in attractiveness and coquettishness with what we find in U.S. resorts. It sometimes looks as if one has crossed into a different country when one crosses from the U.S. into Canada. It no longer is a different country since you sold it to the Americans under the Free Trade Agreement. It will not be a country either after it is broken up in two.

Our tourist facilities need improving, but it is very difficult to improve them if they can be improved only by borrowing money, which costs a prohibitive amount of interest.

I made another suggestion when I was reading my book. It concerns the use of money we spend on welfare and unemployment to create jobs. For any of you who want to see how the arithmetic works, I suggest that you borrow my book from the library. It will show you that the cost of unemployment above 4 per cent in real dollars, that is, after subtracting inflation, accounts for the total increase in the national debt between 1968 and 1985, inclusive.

Obviously, this is an unbearable burden. I was suggesting various measures by which money we now give people for not working be used to create jobs, and not government jobs. I was quoting, for instance, Professor Graham from Dalhousie. I don't know if he is related to our Senator Graham. Both should be proud of the fact if they are related, for they are both splendid people. He said that we could use that money to subsidize jobs, new jobs and companies that are new or expanding tourist facilities. It would not cost us more. It would cost us less. We would be reducing the deficit because we would be using money to create new goods or services.

These are ways to increase the revenues of the government and decrease the indebtedness of the government that have nothing to do with a consumption tax. Why does the government want a consumption tax of this kind? Because it shifts the burden of the tax from the manufacturers. It also shifts the administrative burden from the manufacturers and puts it on small people, which brings me back to an objection that Senator David raised: Why do I go back all the time to Tory philosophy and thinking? It is because it is that kind of measure that first occurs to a Tory: How can we soak the poor? I am not for soaking the poor. I don't particularly want to soak anybody. There are other means, Senator Cools, if you would listen, since you asked the question, you naughty girl. Senator Bonnell, kindly stop talking to Senator Cool so she can hear my political economy.

What this classmate of Senator Frith's was suggesting represented the government view, which is a true Tory view, is "how do we keep interest high so that all our Tory friends have a lot of money to lend to make a lot of money? How do we soak the poor and relieve the tax burden of the rich?" That is what I was complaining about. Although he is an eloquent person, I think his testimony is flawed.

Senator Cools, you were talking of conception. The conception of the Tories is to soak the poor and to relieve the burden of the rich. That is where he goes wrong. We have in Finance something that worries me. We have people in the upper reaches of Finance who are making policy. They draw down salaries of $100,000 or more. Their wives often work there and they draw salaries of $100,000 or more. I am not saying that they have any bad motive, but when you have all this cash to stash, you like having opportunities for making safe returns on your investment. There is nothing better than high interest rates and government bonds. They have unconsciously and quite honestly a natural proclivity for liking what is good for them. We all do. Now, I, unfortunately, like some of my colleagues. I like certain sorts of foods too much, and they show, n'est pas?

• (1330)

Senator Cools: Are you suggesting that you are overweight?

Senator Gigantès: I am, but my tailor hides it effectively.

Senator Cools: You should recommend your tailor to some of the others.

Senator Gigantès: The policymakers of this government are people who have the natural human proclivity thinking that those ideas are the best which are going to increase their welfare, using their own welfare in the sense that economists use welfare, to mean their bien-être, making them richer than they are. That is the kind of policy we have. It is not at all surprising. That is their concept.

You then asked if the system is so simple, why is the tax so complicated.

Senator Cools: That is right.

Senator Gigantès: They did not want it to be so complicated. I will give them that. Even the Tories are not that masochistic. They wanted a business transfer tax, which in some ways would have worked, like the New Zealand tax, which reports at the end of the quarter, or the month or the year, whatever is the reporting period. I keep repeating this but it is so simple. Mr. Bulloch, by the way, said he would kill in order to get the New Zealand form of taxation rather than this can of worms, not only worms but demented worms, "démentiel," to use the wording of our specialist in worms and worm quotes, Senator Simard. Why did they pick this? Because, of course, Mr. Mulroney came in, as I have said before. That is where it is all tied. The constitutional process, the federal-provincial relations. You heard it several times today, Senator Beaudoin. What do you want me to do? I am being asked questions and I have to answer them. It would be most discourteous not to enlighten Senator Cools.

Senator Cools: Absolutely.

Senator Gigantès: Yes. So they come in and there is Mr. Mulroney. He thinks relations are going to be all kissy-smoochy with the provincial premiers. They are going to get together. It is going to be such a lovefest. I mean, even Peckford was going to be good natured. He was for a while. And Devine was going to be exactly what his name says, spelled a little differently, and the obstreperous and stubborn Mr. Filmon in Winnipeg was going to be so cooperative. It wasn't true. The one truly cooperative provincial premier, John buchana, was transmitted to the Senate, and I wonder if he wasn't transmitted to the Senate because he was taking such intemperate shots at the GST. We have a whole collection of quotations from him saying how terrible this tax was.

So Mr. Mulroney thought that if he shut them all in a room and let them get bombed out of their minds drinking milk, then they would all kiss and make up and they would accept his proposals for a unified national tax, taxing exactly the same things, one rate, no exceptions. It was even proposed that the government show some guts, if it was going to go for a consumption tax, and tax everything, including food, and give a crust of bread to the poor, so to speak, by starting the elements of a guaranteed annual income.

This is a dream that Milton Freedman and our NDP shared, that you draw a line and you say that below the line of income everybody receives a subvention from the government until they are brought up to this line, and above that line people pay taxes. Below the line they don't pay taxes, but they receive subventions. Above the line they pay taxaes and do not receive subventions from the government. It is very nice but unfortunately we already have a system in place with old age pensions, family allowances, supplemental old age pensions, Canada Pension Plan, and various union pensions. We have unemployment insurance.

An ideal system that Tories and socialist dream of alike is one that would subsume all these other programs, put them all together, and under the income tax you would have this one system where if you declare income tax of, say, $10,000, you would get $5,000 from the government to come up to $15,000, and above the $15,000 you would be taxed progressively. Very nice! You wipe out the public servants who work the welfare system. Those who look after the unemployment insurance, it is great, wonderful savings. Then you come to all the exceptions, and they are difficult. What do you do with the worker who has worked 35, 30 years, has faithfully paid into unemployment insurance, believing and actually having a piece of paper that says that if he ever becomes unemployed he will receive 60 per cent of his earnings for 50 weeks.

Now, if you do that and if you give the old folk the level of pensions they now have, taking away the supplement and the Canada Pension Plan, then the system would be much more expensive than it now is if you bring everybody else up to that level. If you do not bring everybody else up to that level and you bring, say, the old folks, and those who deserve unemployment insurance, down to whatever average level will make sure that current expenditures on the social safety net do not become higher, then the old people would have less than they now have and the unemployed who have faithfully contributed into the unemployment fund and have not touched it for, say, 30 years, would have less than they now have. What would be an equitable solution? Well, you grandfather them. That means those who have certain privileges now would retain those privileges and you would say to others, "If you enter the system now, those privileges which your fathers and grandfathers have, you will not have. You will hereafter have the following." The Parliamentary Library Research Branch studied it very, very carefully. It was a brilliant study by Marion Wrobel, and it turns out that administratively it would be more costly, and there would be considerable degrees of unfairness. It turns out that the best thing we can do is just leave the system we now have, as complex as it now is, and admit that it is made up of separate programs because not everybody has the same needs and the programs have to be separate in consequence so as to be different to meet different needs.

The Tories thought that they would get kissy-smoochy, as we said, with all the provincial premiers, get them to agree there would be one tax, say 5 per cent for the federal government, 5 per cent for the provincial governments, that there would be a flat tax of 10 per cent on all consumption and there would be tax credits constituting a sort of embryonic guaranteed annual income for all those unable to bear the burden of the tax without help.

It was like having dinner with the Borgias, a famous family of popes, and, of course, Lucrezia Borgia, a famous poisoner, very attractive, and they produced popes who had sons and daughters, including Pope Julius who was the patron of Michelangelo, a very important person in all this to know, and Cesare Borgia, one of the great condottieri. The Italians, bless them, have simplified their spelling. They have removed all those unnecessary duplications of consonants. He was one of the great condottieri and one of the great commanders of condottieri in the Middle Ages and he is the one for whom Nicolo Machiavelli wrote The Prince.

Senator Cools: Senator, I think Machiavelli is one word. The others on the other side can't spell.

Senator Gigantès: The others on the other side have nothing of Machiavelli's spirit. Machiavelli was a very wise, a very learned man. I mean, associating one of the great thinkers of all times with a cheap, shanty Irish, puffed-up guy, is very unfair. You should not do that, because the ghost of Machiavelli will rise up at night and haunt you.

Senator Cools: Yes?

Senator Gigantès: So it did not work. Suddenly they found themselves having to impose a tax at the same time as provincial taxes that were taxing things different to those the federal government wanted to tax. In other words, the Tory provincial premiers are saying, "Are you mad? We are facing an election. You want to tax food? They are going to scalp us." So we ended up with a system which does not tax imported caviar, no matter how much of it you buy, but which does tax a four-ounce can of yogurt, which taxes—I keep repeating these examples, they are very instructive—popcorn when it is hot, but stops taxing it as soon as it cools off. The same is true with pizzas. Hot pizza is taxed. Let it cool for a while. You go to a restaurant and you say, "Hey, buddy, let the pizza cool," and then you do not pay the 7 per cent. That's cool.

So you have these absurd and paralysing complexities which simply reflect—this is where we come again to the constitutional issues through the wrong way of thinking of Tories—their incompetence, incompetence, utter, total, frightening incompetence in negotiating a free trade agreement in which, as if they were playing a game of bridge, they gave away, they threw away their aces without getting anything in return.

Madam, I have wonderful quotations from you. If you were not here when I was reading them, they are very accurate. I will do that later if you like, I will repeat what you were saying about the Americans, what it is you wanted to get from them and what it is you got.

• (1345)

This is what happened. Through incompetence, they launched into something that turned into a nightmare and, as I was saying this morning, it is going to cost 9.3 per cent of sales as administrative costs. That is average. However, the administrative costs of the smaller businesses will be 40 times larger than those of the large businesses that can afford to have complete computerization and can afford to have specialists to deal with this. A small mall shop, the independent drug store, independent grocery store, the independent boutique that sells dresses or a store that sells men's clothing, they are going to be paying at least 9 per cent of their sales in administrative costs. And where does this 9.3 per cent go? The business person is not going to swallow it. He will pass it on to the consumers, so the tax will not be 7 per cent. It will be 7 per cent plus 9.3 per cent for a total of 16.3 per cent. Add on top of that the Quebec tax and one sees what it does in Quebec. This is why I say it is incompetence.

They hire a very eloquent and smart gentlemen, a classmate of Senator Frith's—that is probably why he became eloquent, rubbing shoulders with our Royce at school—at Osgoode Hall, wasn't it, Royce? What the hell, naturally he was bound to become eloquent and splendid, and then the government hired him to try and camouflage their incompetence.

Senator Frith: They let you go that far; don't push it.

Senator Gigantès: Pardon?

Senator Frith: They let you get away with it; don't push it any further.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I think I will change subjects. Do you want me to give you another alternative to tax and consumption? I gave you mine, but I have others and I promised to suggest one other alternative to Senator MacDonald on Tuesday morning because I will still be talking then, and he would be bitterly disappointed if I did not read it to him, but would you allow me to read it twice, once now and once then?

Senator Cools: Sure.

Senator Gigantès: Are there any objections opposite? Fine. I will first give you the executive summaries, so to speak.

> The debate about the proposed goods and services tax has been hampered by a lack of well articulated and quantified alternatives.

When you read a sentence like that it means the author of the alternative knows and believes he is well articulated and quantified, so brace yourselves for some figures:

> This paper attempts to remedy this deficiency by comparing the government's proposed 7 per cent GST with an alternative reform that would involve repealing the Manufacturers' Sales Tax (MST) and collecting most of the lost revenue by simply increasing income tax rates.

Of course, this is an anathema for Tories, but what can we do?

> The paper shows that the alternative approach satisfies the primary goals of the government's sales tax reform while avoiding the deficiencies of the GST. The overall conclusion is that the proposed alternative or a refining of it should be seriously considered by the government and debated by the public before proceeding with the GST reform.

Is this perfectly clear, my Liberal colleagues? Not one of you has any clarification you would like to ask—

Senator Cools: Not yet.

Senator Gigantès: To let me get off my feet for a while? All right.

> The main elements of the income tax alternative to the GST are as follows: Eliminate the MST and associated federal sales tax credit—

Senator Frith: Eliminate what?

Senator Gigantès: Eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax and associated federal sales tax credit. It is giving these steps now.

Senator Frith: Perhaps, Senator Gigantès, if you would just give me—have a seat. I am just afraid that someone might object that two senators were standing and might have to invoke Rule 26 or something like that.

If I understand the phase that you are moving into now, it is the question of alternatives to the GST. You then refer to the manufacturers' sales tax. The manufacturers' sales tax is usually advanced in the context of debate on the GST as something that the GST is to replace, as something evil that ought to be replaced, and that people should accept, although it is not always put quite this way, the obvious and imaginable evils of the GST because it will replace the even greater evil of the manufacturers' sales tax.

I recall, and perhaps this is what you were coming to, that there are two sides to that. That is usually the end of that discussion. In other words, people usually admit—too many people, it seems to me, immediately admit, yes, the manufacturers' sales tax is a terrible tax and, therefore, make me an offer. The idea is to open the mind to anything rather than the manufacturers' sales tax. There are two dimensions to that and I would be interested to see if there is going to be something developed in your material on it.

One is that most of the people actually objecting to the manufacturers' sale tax during the hearings and in the material I read, were people who were manufacturers in the broad sense of the word, that is, if not directly manufacturers, they were large companies who had an interest in manufacturing or whose commercial lives and profit lives were interlocked with manufacturing, and they were usually large. Or they were people who accepted the cant that it is a terrible tax without ever really having looked at it. That is one dimension.

The proposition was put forward that these people were happy to see it replaced because they saw it as a way to take a tax they found burdensome and spread some of it over the backs of a larger number of people, spread their burden and increase their sales and, therefore, their profits. However, if I am not mistaken, we also have a presentation from at least one person, and I remember one in particular, the accountant, Alan Martin, I think, from Orillia.

Senator Cools: Yes.

Senator Frith: I don't believe he was the only one, but he was certainly one who said, "Not so fast. The manufacturers' sale tax may be at 13 per cent, for example, a burdensome unattractive tax, a tax that does not meet the criteria of desirable taxes, but with some adjustment it might do the job of revenue raising just as well as GST and in the final result be a lot fairer".

So I am interrupting you to ask you, if you can, to select material or to emphasize, or present your own views on that aspect of the matter, because it has come to the point where no analysis is made of the three propositions. First, the biggest enemy the country has is the deficit.

Senator Bonnell: Mulroney.

Senator Frith: No, the three propositions I would like you to address, and ask if you will address—maybe the first one is simply a base for it—that anything that reduces the deficit is desirable, whether you agree with that and whether the manufacturers' sales tax can play a role in reducing the deficit, and with some adjustment might do it better than the GST, and therefore the GST should not be embraced simply for reasons of escaping the manufacturers' sales tax? Third—I forget what my third point was but I will think of it and that will give me a chance to rise and remind you of what it was.

Senator Gigantès: I am most grateful to you, Senator Frith, for that question. It enabled me to nibble half a cookie. Perhaps Senator Frith did not pick up Senator Bonnell's remark that the biggest handicap and the worst thing that this country faces is not the deficit but Prime Minister Mulroney. That sort of slipped by him. I recommend Senator Bonnell's remark to him.

I have a problem with what you produced, Senator Frith, and I am prepared to talk about it.

Senator Simard: Are you standing or sitting down?

Senator Cools: He is standing, I can see him from here.

Senator Gigantès: The person whose suggestions I am going to read is somebody who accepts the idea that it is preferable to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, but I think that he will take the point of view that you would agree with—that it is a question of reforming it to remove its defects. Of course, the main defect from the point of view of the manufacturers, was that all the costs of administration, and so on, were on them. They could pass it along, but it was more complicated to pass on the tax to the consumer. It would be much nicer if the government came in and passed it on to the consumer. That is why they want a consumption tax.

I would like to point out to those who fear the deficit so much that there is an interesting comparison to make. Before the Second World War, we had no national debt and no deficit. None. In real terms, after deducting for inflation, the gross domestic product per capita—in real terms—was around $1,500. In real terms, it is four times higher now. In 1939, infant mortality was four times what it is now. Indoor plumbing was non-existent for 80 per cent of Canadian homes. Now, it is non-existent for only about 5 per cent of Canadian homes. In 1939, one family in ten had a motor car. Today, a family who does not have a motor car is very rare. In 1939 central heating was a feature in only 5 per cent of the homes. Today, nearly all homes have central heating. In 1939 people who went on vacation outside a 50-mile radius were a distinct minority, a very small minority of the population. Today, literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians go on vacation to places such as Florida, Mexico or Europe. In 1939 only 5 per cent of our young people went to university. In the case of females, it was even lower. Today, half of our young people go to university for secondary education. The situation of the population today, by any valid measure, is superior. Let us take the welfare situation and let us put medicare in there.

• (1400)

In 1939 many people could not afford a doctor unless they found a generous, compassionate doctor who was prepared to look after them and wait for payment until the ship came in, or the harvest came in or whatever. The doctors would even accept payment in kind. Now, everyone in Canada has wall to wall coverage, from womb to tomb. People do not have to die or see their children crippled and suffering, because they cannot afford medicare.

There is no standard that you can think of for which Canadians today are not immeasurably better off than they were in 1939. In 1939 there was neither national debt nor deficit. Today there is a national debt and a deficit. If a national debt is such a terrible tragedy, why are we so much better off than when we did not have a national debt? We should think about that.

Naturally, a businessman like Senator Poitras would not understand this, because he does not care about the welfare of poor people. Senator Poitras said earlier that somehow someone not born in Canada, was a little less than others. I heard him say it, and we will see it on the record. He should wash his mouth out with soap, so as to become a civilized human being and a little less bigoted. He should concern himself with the needs of ordinary people, and accept the statistical facts that all of us are better off today than we were in 1939—I am talking of real dollars—when there was neither deficit nor national debt.

Earlier, there were times when the national debt, in terms of a proportion of the gross domestic product, was much higher than it is now, and we paid it down. How did we pay it down?

[Senator Gigantès.]

We had the closest thing to a full employment policy that we have ever had. We also had low interest rates.

Which countries best manage their debt and avoid having deficits? I gave you those figures. The Economic Council of Canada has now adopted my figures and they are in its latest report. My conclusion is that the only way to reduce the debt permanently and to manage it permanently is to reduce unemployment. Every unemployed person in 1989 cost society exactly as much as they earned before they lost their job. Before they lost their job, they were being paid by society $15,640 a year in 1989 dollars. After they lost their job they were still being paid $15,640 by society . Where do those dollars come from? They are from unemployment insurance or welfare. Thus, there is a loss of tax revenue for the three levels of government.

Before they became unemployed and were receiving $15,640, they were producing goods and services. Therefore, they were adding to the gross domestic product and to the tax base. Gross domestic income equals the gross domestic product equals the gross domestic expenditures. When these people were earning, they were producing. When they were working and producing, they were earning something and they were giving a product equal to what they were earning. Once they became unemployed they still received the same amount from society, but they produced nothing in exchange. As long as members opposite do not understand that, they will not be able to deal with the deficit.

The full employment countries, says the Economic Council of Canada—plagiarizing me with not even a tip of the academic hat, but that is all right—which are Sweden, Norway, Japan and Austria, have very little debt. They have measured this over a period of 17 years. The latest figures I have are from 1987. I looked at the years from 1972 to 1987. If you add up the years with a deficit and the years with a surplus, Sweden's total is positive at the end in real dollars after inflation. Norway has an immense surplus. Austria is very close to a surplus. Germany started to have problems with a deficit and debts, the minute she abandoned her full employment policies. Unless you understand that unemployment and debt are intimately tied together, you will never solve the problem of the debt. No one has.

Even euthanasia would not work. Supposing you took the unemployed, welfare recipients, pensioners and the sick out and shot them, you would then have fewer consumers, less production, less of a tax base and, therefore, less revenue for the government to bring down the debt. Get that through your Conservative skulls. That is the way to solve the debt problem: reduce unemployment; put people to work. Countries that do that have solved the problem of the debt, and of the deficit.

Senator Poitras, if you want the whole calculation, read my book. If you are too poor to buy it, I will lend you a copy.

Senator Tremblay: Buy him a gift.

Senator Gigantès: He is richer I am. Why should I give him a gift? He should be giving me gifts.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gigantès, during the debate on the amendment to do with the book tax, Senator Poitras indicated that if a book was a good book, even with the tax, people would buy it and read it.

Senator Simard: If it is a good book.

Senator Fairbairn: I am sure that Senator Poitras will want to buy your book and read it.

Senator Gigantès: As I said earlier, Senator Simard, there is an excellent job for you in southern France sniffing truffles. That you would probably understand, the book you would not. So I would not offer you any book.

There is still some hope for Senator Poitras. When it comes to production or anything to do with printing or communicating information, he is incompetent. He attempted to produce a newspaper in New Brunswick and he failed miserably. So he is not qualified to talk about this field.

Senator MacEachen, some time ago, before you arrived, I was pointing out the contrast between the inept Tory leadership and your leadership. I said that you have 50 obstreperous, difficult people. You do not have carrots or sticks, but you run us. That is leadership.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: I have a point of order. Would Senator Gigantès tell Senator MacEachen what he said about his friend, the Rector of Laval University? Be a man and repeat that in front of Senator MacEachen.

Senator Perrault: Don't get partisan.

Senator Gigantès: There are two senators on the other side who do not comprehend things. One is Senator Simard, who never understands anything anybody says. He functions in an incoherent dimension. When, in effect, I was praising Kerwin Lackey; praising him as a wonderful Canadian, a great scientist, a magnificent citizen and a great Quebecer, Senator Poitras also misunderstood. Now he misunderstands the misunderstanding.

When Senator Simard is here, it does wonders to my blood circulation and to my feeling of fatigue. I get rejuvenated by about a year. He is a wonderful tonic.

Senator Simard: You are having a nervous breakdown.

Senator Gigantès: I give nervous breakdowns, I do not get them.

Senator Simard: You are still going through your nervous breakdown, if it is not a totally hopeless burnout.

Senator Frith: He at least got over his. Yours just seems to be starting.

Senator Perrault: Get your emotions under control.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Simard, your speech is incoherent. I do not want to wait for the official transcript, so would you mind repeating what you just said?

Senator Simard: It is on the record, as you said this morning.

Senator Gigantès: It will give me pleasure to read the record. I do not promise to understand it, but I will try to read it.

Senator Simard: That is your problem. That would not be the first time.

Senator Gigantès: We now come to the second question put by Senator Frith. The proposal on how to obtain the necessary revenue is not my proposal. It is someone else's. It is by Neil Brooks in his book Studies in Social Policy. He submitted it to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. In one day you will have heard two alternative ways of settling the debt problem and the deficit. My proposal is to utilize the funds we now pay people to do nothing, in order to create jobs. From becoming recipients of handouts, they become both contributors to society and taxpayers.

Senator Simard, I cannot thank you enough. You really do rejuvenate me.

Senator Simard: You should be standing up, not sitting down.

Senator Gigantès: I am sitting because you are talking. Once you stop talking I will stand up.

Senator Simard: You were sitting before I was talking.

Senator Cools: He is not sitting.

Senator Perrault: Come on, senator, be kind and understanding.

• (1415)

Senator Gigantès: Have you stopped talking? As soon as you talk, I will sit.

Mr. Brooks states the steps that he proposed as an alternative to the GST. We have this mythology that there is no alternative to the GST. But there are several alternatives, In fact, I have already explained one. Here is another, namely, to eliminate the manufacturers' sales tax and the associated federal sales tax credit. I am reading Mr. Neil Brooks' submission. It will take a fairly long time. He goes on to state:

> Increase federal income taxes by increasing the surtax. This would increase the bottom federal tax rate from 17.9 per cent to 20.6 per cent; the middle rate from 27.3 per cent to 31.5 per cent; and the top rate from 30.5 per cent to 35.1 per cent.
> Increase tobacco, alcohol, and gas excise taxes to maintain prices on these commodities at current levels.
> Increase government revenues from corporations by $2 billion to recover part of the windfall gain to corporations resulting from repeal of the MST.

Of course these are not things that Tories would like to hear, because your pals will be deprived of the gifts that you are preparing for them.

Mr. Brooks goes on to state that the main results of introducing the alternative would be as follows:

> Revenue neutrality is maintained.

> Distortions and competitive disadvantages of the existing MST are removed.
>
> Administration and compliance costs of federal tax collections are reduced substantially, for both government and business, especially small business.
>
> The general sales tax base is left to the provinces. The federal tax system is fairer and more progressive. In particular, under the income tax alternatives the after-tax income of middle income families—e.g. the $30,000 to $35,000 income range—would be about $270 greater than under the GST reforms,—

This is a good number cruncher. He knows what he is saying. He goes on to say:

> —while the after-tax income of families in the over $100,000 income range would decline by about $300.

Even Senator Poitras could afford losing $300 per year. Under the income tax alternative low income families would be paying less total federal tax and high income families would be paying more—not much, but they would be paying more. He goes on to say:

> Inflation decreases by about 2 percentage points, reducing pressure on interest rates and on government debt servicing costs.
>
> The argument for the GST so far is that we have no choice. This study suggests that there are alternatives and there is a choice to be made.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: Now I will just skip . . . Do you want me to repeat all that in French, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: No, please!

Senator Gigantès: Are you sure? Well, I will go on in French, because I think it might do some good. That was just the summary. So we'll go on. He didn't give the whole text in French and English. He just gave a summary. In the interests of bilingualism, to make sure it is alive and well in this august assembly, I will now give you the summary in French as well.

As you know, I have my doubts as to the quality of the translation. Not that these people don't do their best, but with the constant interruptions and comments . . .

I know that with someone like Senator Simard in the ring, it is extremely difficult to hear what is said and to produce an adequate translation. It's a wonder . . .

Senator Simard: You said they weren't any good and they should go home and resign! Yes, it is on the record! Thank you, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: You and your government may have your merits. In any case, I like the people here. I think they are marvelous. I don't like you that much, and I don't like your Prime Minister, but I do like Senator Macquarrie, an admirable gentleman, and Senator Poitras, yes, I like you too. You are really quite charming.

So are there any Tory senators whose feelings would be hurt if I did not declare my affections? Senator Bolduc, although he didn't ask, is one of the people I like, and Senator Beaudoin too. I just caught an absolutely murderous glance from Senator Balfour. I won't comment further, since he was nice to me several times.

[Senator Gigantès.]

> The debate on the proposed goods and services tax (GST) has been hampered by a very obvious failure to provide a set of clearly identified alternatives. This study is an attempt to remedy the situation by comparing the 7 per cent GST proposed by the government with a different approach that would abolish the present manufacturers' sales tax and recover this revenue by simply raising income tax rates.

Corporate taxes as well, of course.

> The study shows that this approach meets the main objectives of the government's tax reform while avoiding the drawbacks of the GST. The main points of the proposed approach are as follows: abolish the MST and corresponding tax credits; increase federal income tax by raising the surtax: this would raise the bottom level of the tax rate from 17.9 per cent to 20.6 per cent, the middle level from 27.3 per cent to 31.5 per cent and the top level from 30.5 per cent to 35.1 per cent; raise taxes on tobacco, alcohol and gasoline to maintain the prices of these products at their present level; increase government revenues from business enterprises by $2 billion, in order to recover part of the windfall enjoyed by these businesses after abolition of the manufacturers' sales tax.
> The principal consequences of this approach are as follows:

That, I think, is the summary.

> Total tax revenues remain the same. Distortions and competitive disadvantages caused by the present MST are eliminated. Administration and operating costs in connection with collection of federal tax and income tax will be substantially reduced, both for the government and for businesses, especially small businesses. The general sales tax is left up to the provinces.
> The federal tax system becomes fairer and more progressive. More specifically, the net income of middle-income families, let us say from $30,000 to $35,000, would be about $270 more than if the same families were subject to the GST, while incomes of families with an annual income of more than $100,000 would drop by about $300.

In fact, this means that according to the proposed approach, low-income families would pay less federal tax, in the final insance, while upper-income families would pay more.

> Consumer prices went down by 2 per cent, thereby reducing the pressure on interest rates and federal debt servicing costs.

As you can see, as soon as Senator Simard opens his mouth, the Senate becomes dull. I am sorry. Yes, dear friend.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: A moment ago, you mentioned again the national debt. Did you not say that in 1939, there was no national debt?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, I did.

Senator Tremblay: According to the data which I have just received from the Library, the national debt amounted to $3 billion in 1937 and $3.271 billion in 1939.

Senator Gigantès: How much does it amount to now, per capita?

Senator Tremblay: In 1937, it amounted to $279 per capita and represented 66 per cent of the Gross National Product.

Senator Gigantès: How much?

Senator Tremblay: 66 per cent.

Senator Gigantès: In 1939?

Senator Tremblay: No, in 1937, I did not get the figure for 1939. The two figures I quoted indicate that it must have been about the same.

Senator Gigantès: But do you agree that the national debt you are complaining about was much higher per capita in constant dollars before World War II?

Senator Tremblay: Personally, I was surprised to learn that there was no national debt in 1939. I wanted to check and I just did.

Senator Gigantès: I will bring you the relevant figures. My argument was that, in spite of a major per capita increase in the national debt during all those years, the well-being of Canadians improved immensely. So, if a national debt is such a bad thing, how is it that the personal well-being of each and everyone of us is so much better than in those years when the national debt was lower?

Senator Bolduc: What years are you referring to?

Senator Gigantès: I did not hear your question. Could you speak louder. My system did not catch you, senator, but you are a little far away.

Senator Bolduc: So you said that our well-being skyrocketed. What period are you referring to?

Senator Gigantès: Since 1939.

Senator Bolduc: Until what year?

Senator Gigantès: Until now. Even after six years of the Mulroney government.

Senator Bolduc: No, sir, you are mistaken. You are making a big mistake, senator, a big mistake. It went up between 1945 and 1960. After that it increased a little bit less. It has been stable since 1975.

Senator Gigantès: Senator, just where do you disagree when I say that our personal well-being today is by far superior to what it was in 1939? We live in better houses, more central heating, more cars per family, more of our children are attending university, we enjoy all kinds of medical care we did not have before, a lot more people take holidays and have cottages full of household appliances. On average, we Canadians are a lot better off than we were in 1939, yet our per capita national debt in real stable after-inflation dollars is heavier that it was at that time.

What I was asking is if the bigger national debt or higher national debt level is such a dire predicament, how come each of us is better off now than at that time?

Senator Bolduc: Productivity increased considerably between 1945 and 1960. That is a fact. It was during that time that social programs were set up. And it was in 1975 that we began to realize the real cost of these social measures. And today the situation is stagnant, that is where we are. Most of this can be traced right back to the $200 billion debt we inherited from the Liberals. Since then, eight years at 10 per cent a year has worked out to $360 billion, which is where we stand right now.

Senator Gigantès: What is your question, senator?

Senator Bolduc: I am not embarrassed to the point where I cannot make a sobering statement to pull you back into the real world.

Senator Gigantès: Are you suggesting that the real world is evidence that we are in worse shape now than we were in 1939? I say the opposite. You disagree when I say that we are better off today than in 1939? That is why I like you so much. Sometimes he can keep quiet when he cannot tell the truth. So there you are.

The federal tax system is becoming more equitable and more progressive. Consumer prices are declining by about 2 per cent. The main argument in favour of the GST so far is that we have no other alternative, but these studies indicate that there are other solutions and that it is possible to make a choice.

Now his text is in English. I will not translate as I read because my version would not be very good and would likely upset Senator Simard. Thank you for coming, you give me strength.

[English]

The implementation of the government's proposed goods and services tax has engendered more public discussion and debate than any proposed tax change in Canada's history. The intensity of the public discussion is well founded. The proposed tax reforms will mark a fundamental change in the direction of the federal government's tax mix.

Tax mix changes refer to changes in the relative amounts of revenue the government collects from different tax bases. Until recently, the federal sales tax has been a declining percentage of federal tax revenues. I will now refer to Table 1 which appears in the record of the hearings of the Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It can be found in the submission of Professor Neil Brooks.

He says that according to his table, the share of revenues obtained from the federal sales tax—the tax is applied to a manufacturers' sale price and is therefore commonly referred to as the manufacturers' sales tax—which was more than 16 per cent in 1965, and which fell to 14 per cent in 1970 and to slightly more than 12 per cent by 1985.

The relative importance of the income tax, by contrast, has grown steadily from approximately 29 per cent in 1965 to more than 46 per cent in 1985. The increase in the share of revenue obtained from the income tax, particularly in the late 1960s and early 1970s, reflects in part the fact that since the income tax was not indexed for inflation, even individuals whose incomes were increasing only at the rate of inflation were being pushed into higher rate brackets.

Also, throughout much of this period personal incomes were increasing in real terms. Corporate tax revenues have been a declining share of federal revenues partly because of the reduction of numerous tax incentives in the 1970s to offset the effects of inflation from corporate income to provide targeted assistance to various regions and sectors in the economy.

I hasten to say that this was a bad policy on the part of Liberal governments. As Mr. Chrétien said at the time, "Why are we doing those fellow any favours? They never vote for us".

There is a study which appears in Only Work Works, a Senate report dated December, 1987 which shows that for every $2 of government help to manufacturers only $1 of benefit is produced. In other words, it is a dead loss for the government to help manufacturers. Professor Heliwell, from the University of British Columbia, is quoted in that study. He is about as orthodox an economist as can be found. He was of the opinion that subsidies or tax concessions to business were wrong on the grounds that if they went to buy equipment that reduces the need for labour and decreases production at the same time, then these businesses can go to any bank to get a loan to make this purchase. If a loan cannot be obtained to buy such equipment, because it cannot be proved that such equipment is viable, then they should not be in business and the federal government should certainly not be helping them. Shame on the Liberals! They were nice to business when they should not have been. It never pays to feed the hand that bites you.

These changes in the tax mix, in particular the increased reliance on the income tax and the decreasing reliance on the manufacturers' sales tax, can be explained in terms of the general economic conditions of the times. However, they were supported by the political environment.

In 1967, the Royal Commission on Taxation, which was hailed around the world as a landmark in taxation, concluded that because the tax burden could be distributed more equitably through the use of income tax and not the sales tax, more reliance should be placed upon it. Indeed, the Commission concluded that the federal government should abandon eventually the sales tax field to the provinces.

Following the public debate on the Commission's report, the association of income tax with a fair tax system was widely accepted by Canadians. Another mistake we made was that we allowed ourselves to be pushed by business into not applying the Carter Commission report. We should have applied it. We should have accepted it. Unfortunately, we did not. The country has suffered as a result.

This long-term trend in the tax mix has been gradually reversed in the last few years. Since 1984 the amount of corporate tax paid in real terms has increased by 21 per cent, personal income tax by 46 per cent and consumption taxes by 67 per cent. This increased reliance on consumption taxes will become even more pronounced in 1991 when, if the GST is enacted, an additional $1.1 billion will be raised through the federal sales tax. Moreover, not only will the enactment of the GST consolidate recent increases in the share of federal taxes collected through consumption taxes, it will also result in a tax structure that will lend itself to, if not encourage, further increases in the share of federal revenues collected through consumption taxes.

Although the GST will only be 7 per cent when introduced, many tax analysts argue that to take maximum advantage of the administrative machinery that must be put in place in both the private and public sectors to administer it, the rate should be over 10 per cent. In other words, if it is less than 10 per cent, the expenses we are incurring for putting it into place are not justifiable.

Most countries which have introduced such a tax have soon afterwards increased their rate to as high as 18 per cent to 23 per cent. New Zealand, which three years ago introduced a goods and services tax similar to the one the Canadian government is proposing, recently increased its rate from 9 per cent to 12.5 per cent.

Senator Lucier: Senator Gigantès, would you permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Lucier: You talk about other countries having a VAT. We keep referring to the fact that the rates in those countries have increased. Has anyone paid any particular attention to the fact that already in Quebec that province has agreed to meld its tax with the GST? In fact, there will be two GSTs for the taxpayers of Quebec. I do not think that they are aware yet of what is going to hit them within a year or two.

It seems to me that the people of Quebec will realize within a year or two that they already have an 18 per cent GST because the Government of Quebec is using the GST as an opportunity to introduce a GST of its own and to remove its sales tax. There are sales taxes now on goods in Quebec. There will soon be one on services. Have you had an opportunity to look at that situation? I am somewhat suspicious of it. In fact, the Minister of Revenue in Quebec resigned over that very issue. He thought that such a move would be unfair and onerous on the people of Quebec.

Senator Gigantès: If the Government of Quebec wants to take advantage of the GST, which is on a broader base of goods than the Quebec sales tax, and ride piggyback with it and to some extent place the blame on the federal government, which is proper and the usual provincial practice, then there is nothing much we can do.

Yes, indeed, the people of Quebec will realize that instead of paying 9 per cent, as they were paying up until now, they will suddenly be paying 18 per cent. As I pointed out earlier, the adminstration cost of the tax is about 9.3 per cent of sales. There is no doubt but that these costs will be passed on to the consumer. Given the reality of increasing prices, the Quebec consumer may be facing the equivalent in GST of 25 per cent. What can be done? If one gets into bed with Mr. Mulroney, one ends up facing a cost 25 per cent. If you are a quadruped, you lose a leg.

Senator Lucier: My point was that I wonder if the people of Quebec who will be paying this tax have really had it put to them before. Do they understand what is going to happen to them? It seems that they have not fully understood. No one has gone to great lengths to explain it because of other problems in Quebec right now. There is a commission going around in Quebec right now which is really dominating the press. It seems to me that the people of Quebec have not been made aware of what is in store for them. What you have said about the increase in taxes for the people of Quebec will hit them some day, but it might be too late. They will be taken by surprise when it hits them. That is my point.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Lucier, I have not seen studies in the Quebec press or in learned journals about the perception of the Quebec public on what the tax will be. Criticism of Mulroney government policies in the Quebec press is generally muted. They reserve their fire for others, not for Mr. Mulroney. It is, of course, entirely a democratic right to dump on anyone you want. But the people of Quebec are generally very perceptive. I think they know what the tax is doing to them. However, they are business people, like business people elsewhere. The big business people, whom they love to call institutions in Quebec, have been for this tax for the same reason as big business people in the rest of the country are all for this tax.

● (1445)

Senator Lucier: It is to their advantage.

Senator Gigantès: It is to their advantage, and at this time, because they have helped the movement for sovereignty, independence, self-assertion—call it what you will—they have more prestige than before. Quebec has been on a jag of worshipping its business people, le merveilleux monde des affaires. There are some journalists who do not sort of faint with reverence at the sight of these monuments, these human monuments to greed, but most Quebecers do and I think that may influence their judgment. You know, if a monument like Monsieur Castonguay, Monsieur Poitras think this is a good tax, it must be. It must be.

Senator Lucier: They trust him.

Senator Gigantès: Of course. He looks trustworthy. Even I would trust him, even though I am getting to know that he will give me a sneaky and unworthy blow from time to time. He is such a cuddly, trustworthy guy that he has a huge effect. One of Mr. Mulroney's secret weapons. He put Mr. Poitras in front and all Quebec could be saying, "How could he be telling us a lie? It is not possible. He is such a wonderful man. Everybody's favourite uncle or grandfather." That is the way Mr. Mulroney operates.

[Translation]

Senator David: Sorry to interrupt, senator Gigantès. I am very touched by the concern the honourable senator opposite is showing for the people of Quebec, who are so preoccupied with sovereignty-association, independance, renewed or improved federalism and the like that they cannot even see this tax coming and must therefore be dummies.

I resist the idea that there be 4 or 5 million dummies living in Quebec. I believe that the business people have explained well the impact this tax will have. The great newspaper editorialists, particularly Alain Dubuc, who wrote numerous articles on the subject and whom you were quoting this morning, explained it abundantly. The evening before last, the President of the Consumers' Association was on a show I was watching on TV.

I understand. You must be so tired after talking for 13 hours on this, that and the other. I understand full well that you may have some problem understanding.

Senator Gigantès: You can cancel the 6 p.m. adjournment. I am ready to go on.

Senator David: What I said is that I am talking somewhat on behalf of the Quebecers. I was saying that the President of the Consumers Association, who represents thousands of members, publicly supported the tax in principle. I would not say that the people of Quebec do not know what ot expect with this tax. I do not think that the honourable senator displayed concern for our people out of generosity.

[English]

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I would like to make it very clear that when I was asking my question of Senator Gigantès, I was not in any way trying to belittle the people of Quebec, nor have I ever done that. Nor will I ever do it. I was just trying to point out that this is a very complex tax, to begin with, the GST, and the Quebec melding of their tax with the GST will again be much more complex, and the truth of the matter is that the ordinary working person of Quebec is worried about how he is going to get himself through the recession, worried about what he is going to do about Christmas, and is being depressed. Let us face it. The majority of the press in Quebec is dealing with the commission hearings and with the Constitution right now. That is basically the type of thing they are dealing with. They are not spending a lot of time trying to explain the GST, and the new GST that will take place with Quebec involved, to the people of Quebec. Now I know that the people of Quebec eventually will find out what is happening as the people of the rest of Canada have done, but we have been dealing with this GST in the Senate for quite a few months now, and I still say that there are a lot in people of Canada who do not understand the GST. In fact, the people in the government who are selling it do not understand it, and if you do not believe that, call them any day and ask them questions about how you deal with the GST, where it applies and where it does not apply.

Senator Molgat told us last week that a person operating a laundromat in Manitoba telephoned the department and how much does he charge. He was told that he had to charge 17/100s or something of a dollar per load of laundry. Well, you know, if anybody can understand that, I would be very surprised.

My point was simply that I think that the province of Quebec, having been the first to harmonize their tax with the GST, and having done it in their own way, which is to add their own GST on top of the GST finds it is not that easy to understand. There must have been something that was not quite right with it and something not very understandable because the minister responsible for it thought it was important enough for him to resign his cabinet post over it.

I am not in any way belittling the people of Quebec. I want to make it clear I did not do that, I would never do that, and as far as the question as to who can understand it and who cannot understand it is concerned, let us face the fact. We dealt with the Meech Lake Accord for three years and most of us still do not know what is in the Meech Lake Accord. That was my point, senator. I was not in any way belittling the people of Quebec.

Senator David: You said that the Minister of Finance resigned. It is not the Minister of Finance, who is Gérard Lévesque. It is the Minister of Revenue, I think.

Senator Lucier: I accept that, sir. It is the Minister of Revenue.

Senator David: When you say that the newspapers are so full about these questions of Constitution, I must remind you that nearly every major editorial now has its economic pages where the GST has been fully explained. How well everybody understood the explanation, that is another matter, but you cannot go from the premise that because we speak so much of constitutional affairs that we have avoided speaking about the GST. That is the only point I want to make very clear.

Senator Lucier: Yes, senator, I accept your point and I understand what you are saying. I accept what you say that the economic pages do carry that type of item, and my point, again, is that most of the people who are going to pay the tax do not read the economic pages of the newspaper.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: Senator David, I hope you will recall—and if not, I would ask you to look into the record at this point—that my answer was to the effect that I believe that the Quebecers are clever enough and know exactly what is happening.

I think that the Quebecers understand politics better than several other groups of Canadians. They do real well.

Senator Simard: That is why they voted against the Liberals in 1984 and again in 1988!

Senator Gigantès: Were they right to vote Liberal when Trudeau had huge majorities? No, no. Answer me please!

[Senator Lucier.]

Senator Simard: I said what I had to say. This is not Question Period. Do what you want and I will proceed as I wish.

Senator Gigantès: Would you please speak more clearly? It is a devil of a job to try to understand you.

Senator Simard: You do not need to understand what I said, as long as it is recorded in the Debates.

Senator Gigantès: Of course, I need to understand you. I am very curious. I want to learn things. I always expect that a jewel of knowledge . . . I would like to hear something that I could put in a box, a jewel of wisdom from senator Simard. I would put it in a box and, naturally, in my computer.

Senator Simard: They are not pearls. This is but a lot of words. Words that have been coming for twelve hours. There are not many pearls in it. I see only grains of sand.

Senator Gigantès: Would you like me to start all over again with the duty of the opposition to oppose and to air a situation like the one that exists now where the House of Commons has impeded the due democratic process and we are forced to take over and do our best to stimulate public opinion and even make it hostile to what your government is doing. Because what your government is doing is really bad for the country. What are we supposed to do until the next election in 1992? We must do something because we have no credible prime minister in Canada now. That is a serious problem. Our duty is to make few things known.

Senator Simard: Senator Gigantès trusts in the good judgement of Quebecers, in their understanding of matters such as the GST and the constitutionnal issue. I shall remind him that on Pierre Nadeau's TV show, last Sunday night, on this one hour talk show broadcast on the French network, during his interview with the Prime Minister, the following question was put to the Quebec audience: "What are the chances of Mr. Mulroney being reelected"? Sixty-two per cent of those who were asked said that Prime Minister Mulroney would be re-elected. I agree with them. I always thought that people from New Brunswick, people from the province of Quebec, that Canadians in general have a good judgment and, at this time, they tell us that they would re-elect Mr. Mulroney (and we know that you said the most negative things, we know that you specialize in using the most offensive epithets when you talk about Prime Minister Mulroney). Despite an unpopular tax, many Quebeckers, undoubtedly influenced by the foolish behaviour of the Liberal Party in this Chamber over the last two or three months, tell us that, in two years, after the next federal election, it will not be Jean Chrétien who will lead this country, it will not be Phillip Edmondston, it will not be Audrey McLaughlin, it will not be the Liberal Party, it will be Prime Minister Mulroney and his Progressive Conservative government. So, good night, senator . . .

Senator Gigantès: Please. I miss you so much when you are not here. It is awful when you leave me. I cannot hold back my tears when you leave. Tell me, in February 1980, were you a Conservative?

Senator Simard: I said I would not take part in a question period here. I made my statement. You can do what you want. I will certainly not play your game of questions and answers.

Senator Gigantès: Something serious like this study of the effects of the GST.

Senator Simard: Yes, it is time you got serious.

Senator Gigantès: I only have three hours and fifteen minutes to go to reach eighteen hours.

Senator Simard: No, not already!

Senator Gigantès: What are those noises? Is Senator Corbin making noises again?

> Still, in spite of this important shift in the mix of federal government taxes from income to consumption and its vital wide-ranging public discussion of the reforms, the distributive effect of the tax changes are not so well understood by most people—

Except, of course, Senator Simard, who understands everything.

> Virtually, no information is available that can be used to evaluate alternatives to the GST—

This is a considerable economist, and in his opinion Senator Lucier is right. There is not enough information for people to really understand the options, the alternatives. Should it be the GST or should it be something else? We have here a considerable economist who has done a major piece of work and at the beginning he says:

> . . . no information is available that can be used to evaluate alternatives to the GST. The government has insisted that, to be taken seriously, critics of the tax must be prepared to offer alternatives. However, the public has been provided with very little information upon which to offer and evaluate alternatives. The government's central proposal is to repeal the manufacturers' sales tax and to replace it with the GST. The two main characteristics of the GST that distinguish it from the MST are that:
> One, whereas the MST is levied only on manufacturers the GST is a multi-stage tax that will be levied at every level of the production and distribution process.
>
> Two, whereas the MST is levied only on manufactured products, the GST will be levied on practically all goods and services.
>
> However, if the MST is repealed, enacting a new GST is not only or necessarily the best way to recover the lost revenues. A more straightforward alternative would be simply to increase income tax rates. Somewhat surprisingly this alternative has not been widely considered. Perhaps most people think that not enough revenue would be raised through the income tax to start making the rates "uncompetitive".

A most important conclusion of this paper is that:

> A relatively modest increase in income tax rates could raise the required revenues. The change would not only avoid all the administrative and compliance costs of introducing a new tax, eliminate those adverse micro-economic effects of increasing taxes on consumption and resolve a difficult problem of federal-provincial relations but it would also increase the overall fairness of the tax system.

That would not be bad, would it?

> The purpose of this brief working paper then is to provide some information on the GST and its possible income tax alternative to it. The most important aspect of any tax change is the answer to the question, who gains, who loses. Therefore, this aspect of the GST reforms and the alternatives will be emphasized.
> This paper is divided into three parts and then appendixes. The first part briefly describes the GST reforms. One section of this part examines the need to abolish the MST. Another describes the various elements of the GST reforms. And the third section analyses the effects of substituting a 7 per cent GST for the MST on the prices of more than 40 goods and various expenditure categories.
>
> The second part of the paper describes the income tax alternatives to the GST and examines the effect of such changes on consumer prices. The third and final part compares these two tax reform alternatives. It is divided into two major sections. The first section reviews the seven main arguments that have been offered in favour of changing the tax mix from income to consumption and the four main arguments that have been made in favour of even greater reliance on the income tax.
>
> The second section compares the distribution effects of the GST reforms and the income tax alternatives. The conclusion suggests that the government's obligation to justify the enactment of a new tax, the GST, instead of collecting the revenue needed to offset the repeal of the MST through the income tax, has not been discharged. An analysis of the aggregate and distributional effects of the GST and an income tax alternative is based upon a data base and computer model developed by Statistics Canada, called The Social Policy Simulation Data Base and Model, (SPSD/M).
>
> The appendix contains some technical detail relating to the SPSD/M.

I will mail the appendix to Senator Simard tomorrow.

> The choices of parameters and assumptions and projections, together with an interpretation of the results, are the responsibility of the author.
> The need for reform. Abolishing the manufacturers' sales tax. At present the federal government sales tax, MST, is levied on the manufacturer's selling price of domestic goods and the duty-paid value for imported manufactured goods. The current rates are 19 per cent for tobacco and alcohol, 9 per cent for construction material and 13.5 per cent for other manufactured goods. The tax is invisible at the retail level so many Canadians are not even aware that, in effect, they pay the tax whenever they purchase manufactured goods. Yet, if the MST were to remain in place, the government estimates the tax would raise $18.5 billion in revenue in 1991. The need for introducing the GST or for making any change in the basic structure of the federal tax system has arisen because of problems with the manufacturers' sales tax. These problems have been known for a long time and at least since the 1967 report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, but particularly in the last 15 years, tax analysts and government officials have discussed intensively the need to repeal the tax.

Senator Fairbairn: I wonder if I could ask you a question, Senator Gigantès? You mentioned the MST, and you had discussed that a little bit earlier this morning, as I had the other day when I was speaking about the views of the Minister of Finance on the manufacturers' sales tax, which he had referred to back in the early days of the first Mulroney government as "a silent killer of jobs" and did not have a good thing to say about it. Subsequently, if I recall correctly, instead of getting rid of the tax at that point, or altering it or changing it in some way, he raised it four times. I am wondering if you could give me your thoughts on that?

Senator Gigantès: On what?

Senator Fairbairn: On what would have motivated the Minister of Finance and his economic advisers to set about increasing a tax up to 13.5 per cent from 9 per cent, I believe it was, when he had stated so vehemently that this was a worthless tax, a silent killer of jobs? Yet he hung on to it and he raised it and raised it and raised it. I wonder what your thoughts were on his hanging on to that tax for as long as he did without broaching some of the alternatives, such as the one you were discussing a minute ago about income taxes.

Senator Gigantès: Both the alternatives that I suggested, such as one of fighting the deficit and fighting the national debt through job creation and Neil Brooks' alternative of increasing income taxes, are the kind of policies that Conservatives do not adopt. Job creation means to some extent, in their eyes, an increased role for government in the economy. They have conditioned themselves, along with Frederick Hyatt, and Reagan and his Rambonomics, that the only thing that must be done is to decrease as far as possible the participation of government in the economy.

They would like to privatize everything. Doctor Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute is a home-grown apostle of this theory. He says that anything for which you do not have to pay a price you abuse. I can think of many examples where even a Tory would not abuse something for which he did not have to pay a price. However, I remember Michael Walker saying to me that the best example of that was the increase in hysterectomies in Saskatchewan when medicare was introduced. He said hysterectomies went up like that! That shows you, he said, that the minute you provide a service for free, people abuse it. I said that is not what it shows to me. What it shows to me is one of two things; first, women who needed hysterectomies could not afford them before or, if you do not believe that, Saskatchewan doctors are prepared to butcher perfectly healthy women for money. Take your pick.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Our health care system is vital. In spite of the complaints of the business people about it, it is still, in the opinion of the New England Journal of Medicine, for instance, and Harvard University, which did a huge comparative study of various health care systems—the best value for money with least constraints on doctors, much less constraints than private insurance companies are imposing on doctors in the United States, and total coverage and satisfaction on the part of the population.

There was even a study published by the Fraser Institute in 1987. The Institute commissioned it and it was one of its people who did it. This person compared the health care systems in the European Economic Community, in Australia, New Zealand, the United States, Britain and Canada, and you can find the exact quotation either in my book or Only Work Works. He says that it is the best system there is in the world in terms of value for money. The reason I am saying this is that it is possible, in fact it is essential sometimes, to have a role for the government in the economy. Tories reject that. The problem is that the free market, powerful though it is, and effective though it is, is not good in looking after the poor, the sick and the weak. It just does not do that well. Therefore, it had best be trusted to some agency that uses public funds.

• (1510)

The suggestion I was giving earlier was to fight the deficit the way the successful deficit-fighters among nations do, and that is through work creation. That is not something that Tory ideology is prepared to look at.

Senator Fairbairn: The Economic Council suggested that also.

Senator Gigantès: The Economic Council is suggesting that, and maybe it will percolate. Judith Maxwell is a Tory appointee, and that gives me some hope. Perhaps they will believe her. If they do not believe me, perhaps they will believe her when she repeats what I said.

This morning Senator Stewart was talking about the attitude of the true Conservative or the free market believer à la Adam Smith, who believes that all tax is a distortion of what Adam Smith called the state of nature and which we call the free market. Instinctively, the Tories suspect solutions that increase taxes, especially taxes they pay. They were, and always have been, against income tax. They always have more or less favoured consumption tax. Consumption tax does favour the rich at the expense of the poor. It is not progressive.

Neil Brooks suggests a progressive taxation system, and not a consumption tax, to provide the revenue. The Tories will not accept this. It is not a policy that Tories will accept. It would be as if somebody suggested communist economics to us Liberals; we would not accept them.

I do not know why they are the way they are. That reminds me of a Turkish saying that God first created the Turk and because the Turk thought a lot of himself, to punish him, God created the Greek.

Senator Turner: What about the goddess?

Senator Gigantès: Let's not get sexist now, Senator Turner. Please let's keep sex out of this.

We could turn this around and say that God created humanity and to keep humanity from getting a little uppity, God created Tories to annoy humanity.

Senator Perrault: To afflict humanity.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Perrault, you always have the mot juste. God bless you.

I will continue with the excellent contribution of Professor Neil Brooks. He said:

> The need for introducing the GST, or for making any change in the basic structure of the federal tax system, has arisen because of problems with the MST. These problems have been known for a long time, and at least since the 1967 Report of the Royal Commission on Taxation, but particularly in the last 15 years, tax analysts and government officials have discussed intensively the need to repeal the tax. During this time, the government has released numerous reports outlining the shortcomings of the tax. These flaws include the following: (1) because the MST is imposed on many business inputs, the tax can have a cascading effect substantially increasing the effective tax on some goods; (2) the tax varies greatly as a percentage of the retail price of goods since mark-ups beyond the manufacturer's level vary from product to product; (3) imported goods are favoured over domestically produced ones since for most imported goods the costs of advertising, warranting, warehousing, and transportation are incurred after the good is imported; (4) the tax is complex and notoriously difficult to enforce fairly since firms attempt to shift as many aspects of their business as they can beyond the manufacturer's level; (5) since it is imposed on all goods including exports, Canadian firms exporting abroad are at a competitive disadvantage compared to foreign firms whose goods do not bear such a tax; and finally (6) the tax base is very narrow—in particular it does not include services, even though services are an increasing percentage of value-added in Canada, most of the good jobs are in manufacturing not services, and high-income individuals tend to spend a larger percentage of their income on services than low-income individuals.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Gigantès, would you permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Bonnell: I understand that Ottawa got the new NHL team expansion. Do you think that will make any difference in the economy here in Ottawa?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bonnell, would you please repeat the question? You are moving to a different dimension of economics. I am prepared to adapt, but please repeat the question slowly. I have been talking for 16 hours and 3 minutes.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Ottawa Senators will be back in Ottawa as a national hockey team. Since the NHL has honoured us with that good news, will that make any difference in the economy of Ottawa and the changes in the GST? Would the government of Canada take the advice of the senators and reject the GST or at least put it off for a year?

Senator Gigantès: Every team at its inception has problems proving its worth and has problems selling tickets. Civic pride is fine, but if the team is not playing too well—as new teams will not because old teams will not give them prime choices in a draft—then we are likely to get Ottawa Senators on ice who are not quite as feisty and effective as Ottawa senators on a red carpet.

If you have a team that is not performing too well and you slap an extra tax on the ticket, then you are likely to find that your attendance is low. If attendance is low, the team cannot afford to buy better players, attendance goes even lower, the coach gets fired, and we have a general mess, all of it due to Mr. Mulroney, naturally.

Senator David: Of course.

Senator Bonnell: Would you permit a supplementary question, Senator Gigantès?

Senator Gigantès: Of course.

Senator Bonnell: If the Ottawa Senators do get involved deeply in the NHL and if they do get into difficulties, will the referee side with the Ottawa team and take the puck and put it in the net, so that they can win, just like they have done here in the Red Chamber?

Senator Gigantès: I did not know Senator Charbonneau was a hockey referee. He must be good on skates, especially on thin ice.

We have seen the flaws of the MST. Professor Brooks goes on:

> Numerous attempts have been made to fix up the MST, including shifting the taxation of particular goods to the wholesale level, using national values where the normal distribution pattern for goods excludes the wholesale level, and ignoring marketing companies that are related to manufacturing companies when assessing the tax. However, none of these attempts has been particularly successful. It is now widely agreed that the tax is beyond repair and should be repealed.
>
> 2. Elements and Overall Fiscal Impact of the GST Reforms
>
> The major element of the GST reform is, of course, the abolition of the MST and the implementation of the GST. However, there are a number of other elements to the government's GST reforms, and each is important in understanding the total distributional effects. Each will be described briefly.
> (a) Eliminate the MST-implement the GST.
> In the year that it is proposed that the MST be abolished, in 1991, the government estimates the tax would raise about $18.5 billion of revenue. Therefore, the GST reforms must raise at least this amount of revenue. However, even if the GST were designed simply to raise the same amount of revenue as the MST, the burden on Canadian consumers would be substantially increased.

Using the input-output analysis associated with the SPSD/M, it is estimated that about $1.5 billion of the MST is imposed on manufactured goods that are exported. In addition, about $3.2 billion of the MST falls on business investments in construction and machinery. Under the GST all exports and business imports will be freed of tax. On balance, it is estimated that Canadian consumers would pay almost $4.7 billion more in tax even if the GST were simply substituted for the MST and the same amount of revenue collected.

It is important to hear this second paragraph on page 5 again. It says:

Using the input-output analysis associated with the SPSD/M, it is estimated that about $1.5 billion of the MST is imposed on manufactured goods that are exported. In addition, about $3.2 billion of the MST falls on business investments in construction and machinery. Under the GST all exports and business imports will be free of tax. On balance, it is estimated that Canadian consumers would pay almost $4.7 billion more in tax even if the GST were simply substituted for the MST and the same amount of revenue collected.

There is a clear transfer of tax burden from the manufacturers to the consumers. Perhaps the manufacturers passed it on through prices, but not the export prices. Manufacturers, of course, think it is simpler if the government does it, and then they do not have to worry about it. Professor Brooks goes on:

The increased taxes levied on consumer goods sold in Canada under the GST will result, the government estimates, in prices increasing by about 1.25 per cent. This price increase will result, in turn, in the increase of government transfer payments that are indexed for inflation. It will impose additional hardships on low-income Canadians since their cost of living will increase. The government estimates that offsetting these effects, including administering the new tax, will cost an additional $2.9 billion. Thus, under the GST reforms, the government must raise $21.4 billion ($18.5 billion to replace the revenues lost by repealing the MST, plus $2.9 to cover the consequential offsets).

● (1520)

Sales Tax Credit

To protect low income Canadians from the increase in the price in consumer goods, as a major offset to enacting the GST, the government proposes to increase the refundable sales tax credit. This enriched refundable sales tax credit (the GST tax credit), will be set at $190 per adult (the existing refundable sales tax credit will pay $140 in 1990) and $100 per child (up from $70 in 1990). The threshold, that is, the income level at which the credit will begin to be reduced, will be set at $24,800 in 1991 (up from $18,000 in 1980). The GST credit will be reduced by five cents for every dollar of income the recipient earns above the $24,800 threshold to compensate them for the fact that they face higher living costs than couples with the same incomes because they have to maintain a separate household, single parents and adults will be able to claim an additional credit. This "single person's supplement" will be 2 per cent of net income of $6,175, reaching a maximum $100 at a net income of $13,175. In the words of the Technical Paper on the Goods and Services Tax, the purpose of this complex formula is to ensure that the single person's supplement is targeted "to lower income working or retired singles who maintain their own households and are not dependent on parents or other supporting persons." Single parents will be able to claim the adult rate for one of their children ($190 instead of $100). The government estimates that the cost of enhancing the sales tax credit will be $1.2 billion.

Housing Rebate

To protect middle income house buyers—

Before I continue, I highly recommend to my colleagues on both sides that they get this paper and read it carefully. It is difficult, I realize, to follow all these figures unless you want to take a pencil and paper and do the addition. I have checked Mr. Brooks. He is fairly good. I realize that after hearing a whole cascade of figures one after the other you get to the point where you are not too sure what you heard last and what you will hear next.

An Hon. Senator: Will you send me a copy?

Senator Gigantès: You would like me to send you a copy?

An Hon. Senator: Or shall I take it as read?

Senator Gigantès: Oh, no. I cannot do that, because there are some of you who are not in the habit of reading. I am hoping that some words will penetrate. Not you, sir, or Senator Tremblay. Senator Tremblay is an avid reader. He devours reading material. He is very particular about every word. He is awfully good at it. I have no worries about Senator Tremblay not reading this, because he will. If there are any errors, he will find them. He has a great reputation for this. If I believed in reincarnation, I would say that he was—

Senator Tremblay: Children in families are told that it is not polite to talk at the same time you eat.

Senator Gigantès: Oh, here we have Senator Castonguay complaining because I was having a small piece of tangerine. Now there is Senator Tremblay complaining because I have a square centimeter of biscuit.

Senator Fairbairn: Good grief!

Senator Perrault: Shocking.

Senator Gigantès: Hit me. My manners are deplorable. I promise that I will correct my ways. I will do penance. I will go to church on Christmas day even though it will be 40 below in Quebec City. I will be dragged there by my separatist relatives and I will ask for forgiveness and confess myself. I will say, "I ate one little piece of tangerine in the presence of Monseigneur Castonguay and one square centimeter of petit beure biscuit in the presence of Monseigneur Arthur Tremblay. I will be punished. I will be made to say all kinds of Avés.

[Translation]

Senator David: Then, you will excommunicate!

Senator Gigantès: Are you intervening Senator David? Do you have anything to say about my manners? No, how nice of you! You truly are a gentleman. I would entrust my heart to you anytime. Thank you.

[English]

I left off at "Housing Rebate". It states:

> To protect middle income house buyers from the increase in house prices, the government is proposing to provide a GST housing rebate, costing $0.2 billion. The rebate will be set at 2.5 percentage points of tax on newly-constructed residential dwellings costing up to $350,000. The rebate will be phased out for houses priced over $350,000 until it is completely eliminated for houses costing $450,000 and more.

This must be a measure that must strike terror in the hearts of some Tories and some of my Liberal colleagues who have houses that are worth more than $450,000. He goes on to say:

> In assessing the cost of the changes and their effect on different families, the effect of the price increase on transfer payments must be considered. Some federal government transfer payments are indexed for price increases. Old Age Security payments are fully indexed for inflation,—

That is thanks to the old lady who tackled Mr. Mulroney on the steps of Parliament and told him what she thought of him. He goes on to say:

> —while other transfer payments like family allowances and credits delivered through the tax system are indexed for inflation above 3 per cent.

In other words, they lose a percentage of their value each year. After all, they are undeserving poor. Why should they be given any help? God has not chosen them. Let the government smite them.

He goes on to say that in the year the GST reforms take effect, inflation will likely be above 3 per cent; consequently, to the extent that the GST reforms affect prices, all individuals who receive indexed transfer payments will receive larger payments. This will both impose a larger cost on the government and ameliorate the effect of the GST on these individuals. The government has estimated that the increased transfers to individuals and the decreased tax revenues because of indexation effects resulting from the GST reforms will cost about $0.9 billion. Apart from any possible effects of the current budget freeze, transfers to the provinces, which are also indexed, will increase—

Senator Cools: Senator Gigantès, would you be so kind as to accept a question?

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator Cools: Earlier, Senator Gigantès, both myself and Senator Frith referred to the testimony that Mr. Wilf Goodman presented to committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—where he presented to the committee an apologia for the government's initiative.

Earlier, I asked you whether or not you had given much consideration to the mechanisms by which this government had informed itself as it developed this legislation. I wish to return to that subject matter. As you speak, and as everyone else raises questions, there seems to be a fundamental assumption that the government has made at all times. That assumption is that the manufacturers' sales tax is such an abomination or such a terrible thing that it needed to be changed. In his testimony that day, Mr. Wilf Goodman described it as something that only the devil could have devised.

Some time ago, Senator Frith referred to a particular witness who came to us and essentially cautioned us about that very question. In other words, the witness cautioned us and urged us to be more inquiring as to the proposition and conclusion that the current manufacturers' sales tax was such an abomination.

It was interesting, because several years ago when Mr. Wilson presented his various study papers on tax reforms, he ended up choosing in this tax a different one than the one that he seemed to favour in 1987.

My question to you is: In your work and in your study were you able to come to terms in any way with the conclusion that the government arrived at? They begin their presentation to us with that assumption, but we do not ever find out how they ever got to that assumption. Were you ever able to ascertain that?

Senator Gigantès: There are alternatives. The manufacturers' sales tax, as we were told, has a component of $1.7 billion on exports. The damage to our exports is in the amount of $1.7 billion. But this damage to our exports is infinitesimal compared to the damage to our exports that has occurred from pushing the dollar up, through secret agreement with the United States, from around the 72 cent mark to the 85 cent or 86 cent range.

If you discuss that, it becomes infinitesimal. When we are talking about exports of $120 billion, the loss we have experienced because of that—that is $1.7 billion—is a little over 1 per cent. The increase in the value of the dollar is much more. That is what is really hitting our exports. They could ameliorate the export situation and could even remove the tax from exports. That would improve the manufacturers' sales tax considerably. However, they did not choose that route. They chose other routes, namely, the route of the GST. The alternatives were: A full employment policy—but that is unconscionable for a Tory government, because it means a more active role for the government in the economy. They did not want to choose that.

They did not want to choose the alternative that I am reading now, the Neil Brooks alternative, which is to increase income and corporate profit taxes. That is not the sort of thing that the Conservative government will do. They wanted to change the tax. They could have changed it a little, but they changed it more because it suited their big business clients to have it changed in the way it has been changed.

• (1530)

As I have just read from Neil Brooks' figures, the burden of the tax on manufacturers is reduced by $4.7 billion, some of which is shifted to the consumer. Not all of the burden is transferred to the consumer, some of it sticks with the manufacturers. The manufacturing friends of the government wanted the government to take the burden away from them and dump it on to the poorer people of Canada.

They came out with the assumption that the only alternative was the GST, because other alternatives available are contrary to Tory economic ideology. They started with the assumption that the manufacturers' sales tax is less desirable than the GST because it demonstrably puts more of a burden on manufacturers than does the GST. I do not know if that answers your question or not.

Senator Cools: I am not fully satisfied that my question has been totally answered. I appreciate your efforts. I will be happy to return to the subject later.

Senator Gigantès: On another occasion, perhaps, we will talk more about this.

I am now anxious to get Mr. Brooks on the record for the benefit of those senators who find reading such stuff a little airy and who might willy-nilly allow some words to percolate into their consciousness.

The government estimates that the GST will cost about $0.2 billion more to administer than the MST. We already know that they have shot right through that estimate and have asked for more money. It is now nearly $0.5 billion for which they are asking, and climbing, which is another example of the incompetence about which I complain. They cannot even count.

Estimates of the number of people required to administer the complex provisions of the proposed GST vary. Recent reports mention the hiring of an additional 3,900 employees in the Department of National Revenue, with at least as many to be hired by the private sector. If one is going to be checked by the tax police one has to have people who will be able to answer the questions of those tax police.

A small shopowner will have to learn and teach his staff some 300 pages of illogical regulations. If there were logic to it, then it would be easier to learn. Of course, it is clear they learn immediately that caviar is not taxed. There are other complications as to when and what is taxed that go beyond the principle that seems to be if something is cold you do not tax it and if it is hot you do. That would cover fish, pizza and popcorn.

Including the offsets, the government estimates that in order to abolish the MST and replace it with the "revenue-neutral" GST, the government will have to raise $21.4 billion in revenue. It proposes to make up this revenue primarily through the 7 per cent GST. With the MST we were being taxed to the extent of $18.5 billion. With the GST, and without being able to use any money yet to decrease the deficit, it is going to add $3 billion to taxation. That is to cover costs.

The government proposes to make up this revenue primarily through this 7 per cent GST. This new tax is estimated to raise $19.6 billion. The other $1.8 billion will be raised through miscellaneous sources reflecting, no doubt, a political judgment about what is acceptable: the capital tax on large corporations will be increased by $0.2 billion. That is not $0.2 billion per corporation, but for all corporations. We know that, too, will be unfairly applied because there are so many corporations which pay no taxes at all. All the big oil companies pay no tax at all, and have not paid for years.

The income tax surtax will be increased by $0.2 billion. The excise tax on cigarettes, tobacco and fuel will be increased to offset the declining revenues resulting from switching from a 19 per cent rate at the manufacturers' level to a 7 per cent rate at the retail level. Government expenditures will be cut by $0.7 billion.

I now come to Table 2 which compares the Finance Department's estimates of the federal fiscal gains and losses with the GST reforms with those calculated using the database and model underlying the analysis in this paper. The estimates are not quite the same because of modelling differences. However, the fact that the estimates are so remarkably close gives one confidence that the issues addressed here are fundamental questions of principle and design, not accidents of computational technique or underlying data.

Senator Molgat: Senator Gigantès, I wonder if I could interrupt you? I realize you are dealing with the Brooks' proposal. Have you had an opportunity to look at what Mr. Hurtig had to say insofar as alternatives and insofar as the problem is concerned? I would like to deal with the paper he presents in which he makes some very alarming statements which I think requires some in-depth study.

One of the things he states is:

> The Canadian tax system has been characterized by enormous tax concessions for giant corporations, conglomerates and wealthy individuals.
>
> Huge, very profitable and powerful banks, trust companies, insurance companies, petroleum companies and mining companies have been paying remarkably low real rates of taxation on real profits, rates of tax well below that of average Canadian individuals, families, and well below the rates of most small and medium-sized Canadian businesses.
>
> The Mulroney government "tax reform" has increased the tax burden for the overwhelming majority of individual Canadians and their families and decreased it for the very wealthy.
>
> At the same time effective corporate tax increases for the largest, most profitable corporations have been modest and the government's own projections of corporate tax revenue for 1992 show small increases.

The result is a shocking concentration of wealth and power in Canada and an excessive tax burden for the overwhelming majority of Canadians.

He then goes on to say that his statistics, of which he has a great many within his presentation, come from Statistics Canada, the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue or the Bank of Canada. His international statistics are from the OECD, the IMF or the U.S. Department of Commerce. He seems to have documented his material well. I am sure that it has been studied by others.

I would like to point out that he also proposes quite a number of alternatives to the GST. It has been my impression all along that there really has not been an adequate study of alternatives. The government has been trying to say that there are no alternatives.

He goes on to state:

Contrary to the Mulroney-Wilson oft-repeated line, there are many alternatives to the GST.

Higher, effective taxes on large corporations are the place to start.

An increase in the personal income tax rate for the top fifth of Canadian taxpayers is another.

More corporate audits and much more attention to transfer pricing would yield billion of dollars in tax revenue.

Tax audits by Revenue Canada on corporations have dropped dramatically in recent years from almost 7.5 per cent of corporations to less than 2 per cent. Revenue Canada has indicated in 1988 that for every dollar spent on audits over $17 in tax revenue was collected.

If Canada had a wealth tax at the same rate as the OECD average, it would raise almost $2 billion.

Progressive, but relatively small inheritance taxes could produce another $2 billion.

Even a modest 2% reduction in interest rates would save some $7 billion over four years.

As we are aware, there is a real need for a reduction in interest rates for other reasons altogether, as well as the reduction of government expense. From the standpoint of the economy and what we are presently faced with in terms of the recession we are into there is a valid reason for a reduction in interest rates per se, altogether aside from what this would mean to government expenditures.

Mr. Hurtig continues:

A reduction in the artificially high value of the Canadian dollar would aid exports, increase profits and produce substantial additional revenue.

Again, as an aside, we have heard from a previous minister of this government that there is an under-the-table deal. I know that members on the other side have said that that is not so. The unfortunate part is that the American counterpart in this affair, the one who should know, is now dead. Thus, it is very difficult to get the proof from the one individual who would have it. Nevertheless, there is a former cabinet minister of this government who says that there was a deal to keep the Canadian dollar up.

Mr. Hurtig continues:

Luxury tax on expensive cars, expensive jewellery, expensive homes and other luxury expenditures should be introduced.

That is the exact amendment we proposed in this chamber recently. It was turned down by the Conservatives.

Mr. Hurtig continues:

Progressive, graduated corporate and individual income tax rates should be reintroduced.

There should be full taxation of capital gains as in the U.S. and in the U.K.

Artificially high depreciation allowances should be eliminated.

An increasingly large number of corporations pay no taxes on billions of dollars of profits. A minimum tax rate should be introduced on all corporate profits.

• (1540)

Too many wealthy individuals pay no income tax on large incomes every year. There should be a minimum income tax in such cases as well.

Consideration should be given to charging interest on deferred corporation taxes and to accelerated collection of deferred taxes.

Finally, the entire tax system should be revamped to make it more progressive, i.e. based on the ability to pay.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Hurtig says that his statistics come from impeccable sources, and he enumerated those sources. I wonder if Senator Gigantès, who has done an in-depth study on this matter, has looked at, first of all, the Hurtig statements which I read at the outset and the Hurtig alternatives, and whether he can, at some stage, deal with the presentation made by Mr. Hurtig, because I had the impression that that was really not gone into in depth. I think when he made his presentation, he was limited in time and could not make his full presentation to the committee. Therefore I think it would be important to have someone like Senator Gigantès tell us whether he believes the statements are valid, and what he thinks of the alternatives.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, senator. The statements are valid, and the facts he gives about the shift of the tax burden from the rich to the less rich is simply a statistical fact. All you have to do is look at it. It is there in the figures of Statistics Canada. That is what people elect a Conservative government to do, or rather those who finance the propaganda that helps elect a Conservative government, or buy the elections through massive advertising, and so on. That is what they elect the Conservative to do. That is not surprising at all.

You will find that what Mr. Hurtig suggests as a means of increasing government revenues without the GST is a cross, in many ways, between what Mr. Brooks proposes and some of the things I propose and have always proposed in this chamber with respect to decreasing interest rates and increasing taxes on corporate profits. What I added, and which neither Hurtig nor Brooks put in, is in fact the theory or proposal that has now been adopted by the Economic Council of Canada in its latest report, namely if we are to deal with the deficit and with the debt, we should do what the countries have done that have avoided deficit and debt problems on a long-term basis: That is, have perhaps a deficit one year and a surplus the next. Here I am referring to the full-employment countries. There is no other solution, basically. Everything else is much more painful. So what we are looking at here instead of the GST, is a range of options that would decrease interest rates, increase federal and corporate taxes to the American level, and work on full employment.

These are the options and, as I was saying in response to an earlier question from Senator Fairbairn, they are not options that are acceptable to Tories. The picture of the changes in the tax system which Mr. Hurtig outlined for us are exactly what the Tories wanted. We remember Mr. Wilson saying that what this country needs is more rich people. He has done his best through the tax system to increase the number of rich people, and of course, there is a corollary to that: an increase in the number of poor people. Now that the economy is in recession, we will be seeing even more of them.

This recession was supposed to have a soft landing. In my view, the loss of 165,000 manufacturing jobs in 1989, and heaven knows how many there will be in 1990, are not a soft landing. Try to tell that to the people who lost their jobs, particularly those who lost their jobs in the CBC yesterday, and who were told from one minute to the next, "You are out. You don't have a job."

We must consider what it is that Tory governments generally want to do, and that is soak the poor and make the rich richer. That is what Tories are. I cannot blame them. It is the nature of the breed. It is like my dog. He digs holes in the ground. That is fine. I am not comparing a Bouvier to a Tory. However, my dog is a noble animal, but I very seldom feel like calling a Tory a noble animal. Animal, perhaps, but noble, no.

There really are not too many options. If you are a Tory, you do not want to increase taxes on the rich. You do not want to increase corporate taxes, and you certainly do not want to decrease interest rates, because all your friends make a lot of money with high interest rates. You do not want to have job creation programs because those mean a greater role for the government in the economy and, as we all know, that is anathema for Tories.

Therefore, the Tories opted for the GST. This was questioned by Senator Cools, as to why they had opted for the GST. They opted for the GST under two imperatives. One was the imperative of shifting the burden of $4.7 billion, says Brooks, from the shoulders of the manufacturers under the MST, to the shoulders of consumers. That was one imperative. They were determined to do that.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The other imperative was not to put any other weight on their ideological clients, and this they have not done. So they were not about to adopt Liberal solutions. So there we are. They were also constrained by their secret deal over the Free Trade Agreement in keeping interest rates high and, therefore, crippling our exports.

If I may, I will now return to Mr. Brooks. As I said to Senator Castonguay, Senator Teed does not have many problems. She falls asleep easily, and sleeps like a little child. It is wonderful. Many senators, as you can see, have brought radios, and are listening to, I hope, good music, although I have strong suspicions that Senator Macquarrie might be a secret rock fan, enjoying heavy metal stuff. You know, many more might resort to these techniques before I am through—sometime in January. There are simpler, cheaper methods. You can buy little rubber things that you put in your ears, and they cut down the sound. However I find that if you have hair in your ears, as we have in our age group, despite what Dr. Keon says we can do with some machine he was talking about, they are ticklish and not comfortable. Cotton wool is comfortable if you soak it very lightly in olive oil, and if you don't mind smelling like a salad. However, to return to Mr. Brooks:

> 3. The Shift in the Tax Burden on Particular Consumption Goods and Services Resulting from the GST Reforms
> The government estimates that as a result of the GST reforms the consumer price index will increase by 1.25 per cent. However, the burden of the MST varies enormously across goods depending upon how much of the tax falls on business inputs used in manufacturing the good and how much value is added to the good after the manufacturer's level. Moreover, the GST will apply to many goods and services not taxed under the MST. Therefore, replacing the MST with the GST will substantially shift the tax burden among various consumption goods and services.
> The input-output model associated with the SPSD/M was used to estimate the shift in effective tax burden for the 40 personal expenditure categories, as well as for the remaining final demand in other sectors.

That is Table 3, and as I say, this is a submission Professor Brooks made to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and if you ask the clerk of that committee he will let you have a copy. It is good reading. I am trying to tempt your appetite. I am sure the honourable senators opposite are discussing the very last paragraph I read, and debating the merits of the Brooks suggestion for reform versus mine and versus those of Mr. Hurtig. It is heartening to see Tories taking a real interest in public matters and public policy. I am getting a smile from Senator Jack Marshall, who is a nice man.

> Column 4 Table 3 shows the net increase or decrease of federal tax revenues for each consumer expenditure category, taking into account the proposed federal excise tax changes, the repeal of the 13.5 per cent MST, and the implementation of the 7 per cent GST; column 5 shows the consequential changes to provincial sales tax revenue because of the change in retail prices resulting from the shifting federal tax burden;

Just think of the complexity of the darn thing, when they change the federal tax.

So what this last paragraph says is that this change in the tax system knocks the calculations of provincial taxes into a cocked hat. That is one of the reasons why the provinces were not too happy, and not too cooperative.

Senator Steuart: I would like to ask you, senator, about provincial tax and the problems the federal government has had, as I understand it, in obtaining the cooperation of the provinces in the melding of the taxes. As you know, that would, of course, mean most, if not all, of the provinces widening the base of their tax, and I presume possibly lowering their tax.

However, I have two questions in that regard. First, Quebec was the only province up to this point, as I understand it, that had agreed to meld their tax. However, Quebec is already saying that they do not intend to tax books, or that they are thinking seriously about not taxing books and magazines and so on. I would think that could create a serious problem because if it is to work, the tax has to be exactly the same for storekeepers and for people in business, if they want to charge the tax. My question in that regard is, do you foresee this could happen in many provinces, the provincial government getting tremendous pressure, as it does every now and then, to take the tax off children's clothing, or to take the tax off this or some service? Again, you have a real problem of the two taxes really being melded. The other thing in your research—

● (1550)

Senator Simard: What research do you mean?

Senator Steuart: I wish you would not interrupt because as one gets older one tends to lose one's place, so I have to start all over again. I started off reminding you, Senator Gigantès to talk about the provinces melding their tax and already we see a little trouble in paradise between the government of Quebec—

Senator Simard: You are talking about a melting income tax, harmonizing the tax.

Senator Steuart: Melding does not mean melting.

Senator Simard: Senator Gigantès has confused people enough already.

Senator Steuart: We use that in western Canada.

Senator Simard: Stick to the technical terms.

Senator Steuart: All right. In western Canada we use "melding" or "harmonizing" or getting along well, or not being interrupted, all those kinds of things. Where was I? Speaking of the melting pot, or is it the mosaic you want? In any event, harmonizing the tax.

Senator Simard: Oh.

Senator Steuart: Speaking of harmonizing, there appears already to be trouble in paradise with the Quebec government getting along with the federal government, if it can be considered paradise. There are some of us who think of it as some other location. However, there is trouble. Do you see more trouble down the road if this terrible tax passes and if more provinces decide they will jump in and loot the public purse and loot the taxpayer?

Do you also see a tremendous increase in the revenue for the provinces—we know it will happen with the federal government—if they harmonize, meld, put the taxes one on top of the other, squeeze them together, whatever the word is? Do you believe that there would be a greater burden on the taxpayers than we are now facing and will face if the GST is put on by the federal government alone? Have I made myself clear?

Senator Fairbairn: Clear as a bell.

Senator Steuart: And if I have, I apologize.

Senator Gigantès: What can I say, I am already feeling sufficiently depressed about this tax. You have opened other dark vistas, you and Senator Simard melding. What a horrible thought.

Senator Perrault: Mind-boggling.

Senator Steuart: I like you, I feel for you. Can it be worse than it is?

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Gigantès: It is a little hard to imagine that it would be worse than it is, but with this government everything is possible. If anything can go wrong, it will, Murphy's law and Murphy's golden rule. Those who have the gold rule! Put those two together, start squeezing people, after melding and harmonizing them, and you may be sure that somehow or other Canadians will be worse off, not the rich, but the poor. Will provincial governments, with unbalanced dates of election, compared with the federal government, be willing to sacrifice points in the popularity polls and seats in the election by following the example of the complexities in the tax set by the federal government? I do not think so. There is a special relationship between the Quebec government and the Tory government.

Senator Steuart: Unholy alliance.

Senator Gigantès: Well, I would not say so. Let us leave those words out. We might upset Senator David when he comes in again.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard, too.

Senator Gigantès: Well, that does not matter if we upset him. He likes being upset.

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Gigantès: No?

Senator Simard: No.

Senator Gigantès: No, earlier he was reciting a mantra. He was saying, "Trudeau, Trudeau, Trudeau", and he felt better.

Of course, anybody would feel better with such a mantra. What can I say, yes, it can get worse and if it can, it will, you may be sure. This is an incompetent government. My deputy leader said that I had told them about their incompetence enough times in the past 16 hours and he said that for the two hours to come I should be a little more scholarly and change subjects. I even was so nice, I will let you know, that I offered them a choice as to the subject.

Senator Fairbairn: And they picked Neil Brooks.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, there was Neil Brooks. I also suggested that I could read some more of the thousands of pages of submissions that I have here complaining about the various aspects of the GST. They were not too sure—

Senator Perrault: Please do read it.

Senator Gigantès: Pardon?

Senator Perrault: We want to hear the letters. Can we hear them, please?

Senator Gigantès: Oh, you will hear some of those, yes, absolutely. Of course, I also said that even if they were bored at times with the general theme, they cannot avoid what is going wrong now because, of course, the Tories got involved. Senator Poitras and I agreed on one thing, that the economy is complex. You cannot look at the GST in only one way, and he could think of several ways, and I added a few more, for example, the GST, the effect it will have on the economy, the side effects, how well will it be managed? Can we trust the government in what it says?

What is the track record of the government in terms of credibility and in terms of confidence, which gets us into why are they as they are, and the Tories were saying earlier, when I was answering Senator Cools and Senator Molgat as to why they picked this particular tax, well, they have no choice. It was their manufacturing friends who paid for their election victory who wanted the tax burden taken off their shoulders. Of course, they did not want it replaced by increasing income tax on the rich or on corporate profits.

What options are left? There are several. One would be decreasing interest rates and increasing the corporate taxes to correspond with those of the United States. The rich do not want that. Another option is to do as I have always said, and now the Economic Council is saying, go for full employment. The countries that have no deficit and no debt problems are countries with full employment policies. However, the Tories do not want that.

That inevitably leads one to ask, what is the structure, the origin of Tory thought? I have a whole collection of briefs here from which I intend to read. I suggest that one of the things I could do for senators opposite is read from this excellent book by Dr. Allerback. This was his doctorate thesis at Columbia. Senator Stewart knew him.

Senator Corbin: Who was that?

Senator Gigantès: Dr. Allerback.

Senator Poitras: In what century?

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Gigantès: He is quite recent, sir.

Senator Corbin: In your century, I think.

Senator Cools: Well, Senator Poitras, it has to be this century.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, are you now leaving the realm, the field of federal-provincial relations or will there still be an opportunity for me to put a question to you? I notice the great interest that Senator Simard had in at least the latest exchange. I was not here all day. I was here last night when you started speaking. I wish to congratulate you on an excellent job. In fact, at 3 o'clock today you made the CBC national news with your unique performance. I extend to you my warmest congratulations, you are fighting a good cause and it is being recognized right across Canada.

● (1600)

On the subject of federal-provincial relations, I am going to read a few quotes and afterwards I would like you to comment on the current state of federal-provincial relations. I do not expect you to relate at length to the Meech Lake exercise. You did so very well earlier this day in the wee hours of the morning. I thought you did quite a thorough and professional job of setting the record straight. That is not the type of federal-provincial relations I would like you to address at this time.

I should like to talk about fiscal matters. I have in my hand an extract from the Synoptic Reports of the Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick, Volume 2, session of 1972. Guess who was Minister of Finance in New Brunswick in 1972? The Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard. I am going to say very nice things about him, so I would ask him not to get excited. What I have to say is highly positive and highly constructive. I have always had respect for Senator Simard, except during the election period when he would not stay in his court and mind his business. However, that is a thing of the past.

Nevertheless, we are talking about federal-provincial relations. In the course of the presentation of his budget on April 5, 1972, the then Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard, Minister of Finance for New Brunswick said this:

> The past 12 months have seen a great deal of activity in the field of federal-provincial relations. From the point of view of the general public, the most evident item of business has probably been the federal-provincial discussions on changes in the income tax system.

This is very relevant to the current debate. He goes on to say:

> Two years after the introduction of the White Paper on Income Tax Reform, the federal government presented to parliament its revised tax legislation, which was passed late in December. During the year many discussions took place between the federal and provincial governments on the shape of the tax changes, with some concessions . . .

I presume this next comment is an editorial comment on the part of Senator Simard. He could not be perceived as cooperating 100 per cent with the federal government—the Liberal government of the day in Ottawa, so he said:

> ... finally being made by Ottawa late in the fall. Among these were changes in the proposed method of taxing co-operatives, ...

Honourable senators will recall that our side of the house presented an important amendment regarding cooperatives and the way the GST affects cooperatives, especially those in the Atlantic region. I repeat:

> Among these changes in the proposed method of taxing co-operatives, which New Brunswick strongly urged because of the important role played by co-operatives in our province.

Of course, New Brunswick urged, but the federal Liberal members of the day—people like Herb Breau, Eymard Corbin, Jean-Eudes Dubé and others from New Brunswick—were the ones in the trenches here in Ottawa fighting for the cooperatives.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Corbin: The Honourable Edgar Benson, Minister of Finance—Gentle Ben—was a man who understood the fabric of this country. He did not have any notions of seamless webs or what have you. He understood that Canada is made up of a variety of fabrics and so on and so forth. I will not get into that, but he had a gut feeling for Canada.

Senator Simard is delighted that I should quote him in this debate.

Senator Simard: Stick to my statement, though.

Senator Corbin: I am trying. It is like the Bible, it is not the kind of a statement you can read and forget about. You have to comment on it.

Senator Gigantès: If Senator Simard was involved, it is memorable stuff.

Senator Corbin: The Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard continued:

> Work and debate on this extremely complex subject continued later than originally estimated. As a result, the province was not able to proceed with its revised tax legislation last autumn, as originally planned. That item of business will be dealt with at this session, so I shall defer any further remarks at this time.

I quote this, Senator Gigantès, to illustrate the state of federal-provincial relations as they existed in those days with a Tory government in New Brunswick, a Liberal administration in Ottawa, and the state of relations today between Ottawa and all of the provinces. There is now a situation where provinces are taking the federal government to court over the GST, something unheard of in the days of Gentle Ben.

Senator Simard continues:

> As a direct consequence of the federal government's income tax changes, which included withdrawal from the estate and gift tax areas, six of the 10 provinces decided to introduce their own provincial succession duty and gift tax Acts. Three other provinces decided to continue, with some modifications, their own succession duty legislation already in effect. As a result of the federal withdrawal and the provinces' subsequent decision to reenter the succession duty field on an individual basis, a great amount of work was required by the six provinces, with technical assistance and advice from federal authorities.

There again is that excellent cooperation between the central government in Ottawa and the provincial government. He continues:

> It was a fast-paced, unique and complex exercise in interprovincial cooperation, but it proved once again that our federal structure is capable of attaining high degrees of effective and cooperative action.

What a beautiful picture. It is so well put by the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard of those days. But where is he today? Where has the federal cooperation gone?

The provincial ministers of finance wanted a summit with the central government this fall. They were denied that opportunity. Ottawa said no way, no cooperation. The only thing that has been happening in Ottawa is the ramming of this legislation through Parliament.

Before you comment on this, Senator Gigantès, I should like to read two or three other brief quotations from the same speech. Later on Senator Simard said:

> The major item of business concerning federal-provincial financial affairs over the past year has been our continuing discussions on the new federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

He went on and said that they had achieved objectives satisfactory to most people. Later on in his speech—I am on page 488—he said:

> During the year, negotiations were also initiated on a new method of sharing health costs by the two levels of government.

In the following paragraph he said:

> In the fall of last year, the federal government offered the provinces financial assistance to carry out new capital projects during the winter months. They got those programs under very favourable conditions.

● (1610)

Later on in his speech he said:

> Mr. Speaker, it has been a very productive year for New Brunswick in the field of federal-provincial relations.

Keep in mind that we are talking about a true-blue Tory administration and a gentle, humane Liberal administration in Ottawa. He goes on to say:

> Mr. Speaker, it has been a very productive year for New Brunswick in the field of federal-provincial relations. Although much has been done to establish programs which will benefit our province and its people, there will always remain more to be done.

Those words, Senator Gigantès, were uttered by the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard, the same person sitting across the way today with a cold heart, who will not consider the needs of the cooperatives; who is contributing to ramming the GST through the Parliament of Canada. Can you believe it?

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Corbin: Can you believe it?

Senator Murray: Is this a question?

Senator Frith: He just said, "Can you believe it?"

Senator Corbin: Not at all the same person that we knew back in New Brunswick in 1972.

Senator Doody: Answer.

Senator Corbin: As Senator Doody will recognize—

Senator Simard: Perhaps I can comment before Senator Gigantès continues.

Senator Perrault: You do not need to comment, you offer an apology.

Senator Simard: First, I want to thank Senator Corbin for having elevated the quality of debate here this afternoon by quoting a statement that I made in 1972.

Second, I must add—

Senator Frith: Quit when you are ahead.

Senator Simard: —that although we did introduce succession duty after much cooperation, technical assistance and other assistance from Ottawa in those years—in fact, there was great cooperation during those years between New Brunswick and the federal government—two years later we removed it. Even then we were flexible. Having recognized a mistake, we could change our minds. That should be included in our record. We introduced succession duties as the federal government vacated the field, but removed them two years later.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, I am not faulting you for having done that.

Senator Simard: I am coming to my point.

Senator Corbin: I am not faulting you, but you did it after K.C. Irving left New Brunswick.

Senator Simard: That did not change our thinking at all. That was not the reason for the change.

Senator Perrault: No.

Senator Simard: That was not the reason for the change. I just thought I would give you a more complete picture of what happened to the succession duties.

Senator Corbin: I can put your whole speech on the record if you wish.

Senator Simard: We were flexible then and we are still flexible now, as we would have been flexible and as, I am sure, the federal government of today would have welcomed possible amendments on September 24 or in the days that followed that date where the debate was cut off.

I have always said that it takes two to tango.

Senator Frith: To tangle?

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Simard: You cannot do it alone. During those years of 1972, thanks to Richard Hatfield, who was the Premier of New Brunswick at that time and who insisted that we be tolerant, non-partisan and go out of our way to maintain good relations with Ottawa, even though there was a Liberal government in Ottawa, we were able to do all these things. We improved that cooperation. We received a lot from the federal government.

Senator Corbin: Right on.

Senator Perrault: You sure did.

Senator Simard: That helped New Brunswick.

Senator Corbin: Right on.

Senator Perrault: It certainly did.

Senator Simard: That was the main preoccupation of Richard Hatfield when he was Premier of New Brunswick.

Senator Corbin: And the Trudeau government.

Senator Simard: It was hard at times for me to be patient with some of the things that occurred. This is quite contrary to what is happening today. We have a Finance Minister in New Brunswick who never loses an opportunity to knock federal backs—that is, Michael Wilson and the federal government.

Senator Perrault: He is not here to defend himself, so do not attack him.

Senator Simard: That is why the relations are so tense between the two governments presently.

Senator Corbin: Is that so?

Senator Simard: Yes. It takes two to tango.

Senator Frith: To "tango" or "tangle"?

Senator Simard: The Finance Minister of New Brunswick, Mr. Maher, never misses an opportunity to criticize the federal government today. He says things like, "Too bad we are losing $20 million." But the citizens of New Brunswick will gain $20 million because of the GST.

Senator Robertson: No, it is $35 million.

Senator Simard: Is it $35 million? Perhaps he has changed his mind. He never gives us credit. When New Brunswick gets windfall payments for the federal government, as the provinces received for several years, whether as unconditional grants or other federal transfers, Mr. Maher says the provincial government is a good manager.

[Translation]

He boasts. Mr. Masse tells him: "So, you have a nice Liberal administration, let us balance our budget"—that is what he has been saying for two years. But if there are some negative adjustments to make, then he says "No, that is awful! The federal government is cutting us back." And when we try to bring under control the annual growth of transfer payments to provinces, as we have been doing for the last couple of years, he comes out with statements like: "What a bad federal government! How bad for consumers!" It gives me pleasure, Senator Gigantès, to echo those comments.

This is why the situation, that had been excellent in 1972, changed considerably when Mr. McKenna came to power. He never lies. Very recently Mr. McKenna blamed my minister, my M.P., Mr. Valcourt, for the Tragedy Rage decision.

He went on and on about Mr. Valcourt's partisanship and his aggressivity! He never gave him credit, for example, for preserving the Acadian Peninsula from an expansion of those same shipyards, nor for all the agreements which benefit the province of New Brunswick. He never gave credit to Mr. Valcourt. I find this quite regrettable because I think it would make for a much better relationship, like we had from 1970 to 1987 under Mr. Richard Hatfield, even if we did not always agree, even if some decisions came down against us at the time. And we even supported the rapatriation of the Constitution, although it was a bad agreement, and all this pleased the people of New Brunswick.

Therefore, Senator Corbin, I think you for having raised the level of debate in this House today. Thank you for having made those points and I fully agree with you when you preach for better co-operation in federal-provincial relations. I would encourage you, and your colleagues, to talk to Mr. McKenna, to talk to your Minister of Finance and to all those who would be tempted and who often succumb to the temptation to criticize unduly our present federal government. Thank you!

Senator Corbin: I thank Senator Simard for these kind words. Personally, I have always held him in high regard except, as I said earlier, at election time—no more tango then, only tangles. But otherwise our relationship has been rather good. But I am disappointed to see Senator Simard claim for himself all the credit for the many successful initiatives which have benefitted New Brunswick at the time of Mr. Hatfield's government.

If there had not been a Trudeau government in Ottawa at the time what would have happened to the Hatfield government? Would these people have stayed in power for so long? This was just to react to the question and the comments of Senator Simard—comments following the question I had asked of Senator Gigantès. Coming back to our subject, would you be so kind, dear colleague Gigantès, to answer my two or three previous questions?

Senator Gigantès: What really moves me in Senator Simard is his Dr. Jekyll personality which he has shown us tonight. Usually, it is Mr. Hyde. I am moved nevertheless. It is nice to see him try and one understands why he shouted earlier "Trudeau, Trudeau", because these were his best years at the time of the Trudeau government. He got everything he wanted.

The federal government allowed him to look good and it is understandable that he would turn into a zen buddhist and preach his faith in Mr. Trudeau, shouting his mantra like he did this morning. Could you not recommend the man who wrote that speech to Mr. Mulroney? It is a much better speech than those the prime minister is making. Where is that young man or that young lady who wrote for you in New Brunswick? Somebody must have written that speech for him, do you not think?

That statement you read, was it not a speech he made? We have to get to the bottom of this, do we not? We must establish the facts because it is a historical event . . .

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, I was quoting the synoptic report of the Proceedings of the New Brunswick Legislature (1972 Session, Volume 2) and the quotes were from page 481 onward. Does it answer your question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly, you quoted Senator Simard's statements. He had an extraordinary script. I wish his speech writer were here to resume his brilliant work. Maybe Senator Simard could loan him from time to time to Mr. Mulroney and maybe even to me. I am very humble about this. I have always recognized that there are people who write better than I, who speak better than I, who understand better than I and I would be very happy to see that person join us here.

I believe our capital has an absolute need for this person because if there is someone who can put in Senator Simard's mouth the character of Dr. Jekyll instead of that of Mr. Hyde which we have been seeing here all the time, this must be en extraordinary person; we need him or her in this capital. Really, Senator Corbin, since you have a good relationship with Senator Simard, urge him to get this person to come here. Maybe he could ask his guru, his mentor, Mr. Trudeau, when he returns from his trip, to convince this person to come here to moderate Mr. Simard's statements like before. Finally, he has left me. I am trying. It is awful! I miss him already.

So, I will return to the writings of our good professor Neil Brooks who says he used the model prepared by Statistics Canada to determine the tax shift.

Percentage-wise, increase in the cost of men's clothing, 6 per cent; increase in women's and children's clothing, 5.8 per cent; shoes, 6 per cent; gross rents, three tenths of 1 per cent; gross rent paid, 2.49 per cent; hydro, 6.5 per cent; natural gas, 4.9 per cent; other fuels, 5.8 per cent.

He figured out this way how much prices would increase because of the GST. It is very difficult to reconcile these figures arrived at by Mr. Brooks and by the government and which are based on the same data bank. It is very, very difficult to reconcile these results with the government claim that prices would increase by only 1.25 per cent. According to Professor Brooks' figures which I mentioned earlier, the main price increase would result from the increase in administration costs due to the GST which businesses will pass on to consumers.

After those figures, which show that the GST will certainly not be an improvement, let us look at the income tax alternative. He says:

• (1620)

[English]

Compared to the proposed GST reforms—and any of you who missed any of this may care to come Tuesday morning when I will be reading it for Senator MacDonald; and if that does not suit you I am prepared to go on on Wednesday—the income tax alternatives are straightforward. The manufacturers' sales tax would be abolished and most of the lost revenue would be collected through the income tax by increasing the income tax rates. This increase in federal income tax rates would be done simply by increasing the federal surtax rate in order to leave provincial income tax revenues unaffected.

If the MST were abolished and no consumption tax substituted for it, approximately $10.5 billion would have to be raised through the income tax. A calculation by which this amount is obtained is illustrated in Table 4. Tables cannot be described in text. I advise honourable senators to obtain a copy of this document. They will find it enlightening.

In 1991, the manufacturers' sales tax would raise $18.5 billion in revenues. However, if it is abolished, provincial revenues would also decline by about $0.8 billion. Provinces levy their retail sales taxes on the price of goods which includes the MST. If the MST is abolished, the price of goods will drop and thus provincial sales tax revenues will decline. Thus, for the change to revenue neutral to all levels of government $19.3 billion of revenue must be found.

About $2.3 billion of the MST falls on goods purchased by the government sector. If the MST were abolished and the reduced taxes reflected in prices, the government sector would need $2.3 billion less in revenue to finance its purchases.

About $2.3 billion of MST falls on alcoholic beverages, tobacco products and gasoline. There is little reason for reducing the tax burden on these products. Therefore, the relevant excise taxes would be increased to recover this revenue.

● (1630)

If the MST were abolished, refundable sales tax credit could be repealed, saving $0.9 billion. If the MST were abolished and all tax cost reduction passed on directly through prices, the consumer price index would decline by slightly more than two percentage points. This would save the government $1 billion in transfer payments to individuals and the provinces. It would also result in additional income tax collections of $0.2 billion because of reduced tax indexing effects.

Finally, if the MST were abolished, there would be a substantial windfall to corporations. In 1991 over $1.5 billion of the MST would be levied on exports. Since Canadian corporations are price takers in world markets, corporate profits would presumably increase by this amount. Moreover, some large percentage of the MST levied on corporate fixed capital investment likely falls on corporate profits. Therefore, if the MST were abolished, it seems fair to raise the revenue collected through the corporate income tax by $2 billion. This additional revenue from corporations would easily be collected without raising the basic corporate tax rate. The low tax rate for manufacturing and processing credits could be abolished. One of its justifications has always been the additional burden the MST imposes on corporations engaged in manufacturing and processing. So it could be abolished. Other corporate tax incentives might be abolished through loopholes closed. Measures might be taken to increase corporate tax compliance. The large-corporation tax might be increased or a minimum corporate tax might be enacted.

[Senator Gigantès.]

He has a table where he shows all this, Table 4. It is difficult to be precise. Here is an honest economist. The minute he says it is difficult to be precise, my trust in him increases, not like the Department of Finance figures.

Senator Marsden: Neil Brooks is not an economist. He is a tax lawyer.

Senator Gigantès: I am sorry, but he does seem to know his economics. Neil Brooks is a tax lawyer, not an economist. I suspect he has had economics somewhere.

Senator Frith: It is a good thing you are quoting him on a tax matter then.

Senator Gigantès: I am quoting him on a tax matter but he still seems to understand economics pretty well. It is difficult to be precise about the income tax rate schedule that a typical Canadian might face. If an additional $10.5 billion was collected through the income tax, since basic provincial income tax rates vary enormously and since there is now an array of federal and provincial surtaxes on top of the basic tax rates, in our alternative scenario we make the simple assumption that the 3 per cent additional surtax for high income individuals is eliminated and that the over-all surtax is increased from its 1991 legislative value of 5 per cent to 31 per cent, this change is sufficient to raise the required $10.5 billion additional revenue. This would increase the bottom federal income tax rate by 2.7 percentage points, the middle rate by 4.2 percentage points and the top rate by 4.6 percentage points. Those individuals subject to the high income surtax would have their rate increased by less than 4.6 percentage points because of the elimination of the 3 per cent additional surtax on high income individuals. In 1989 the basic provincial rates expressed as a percentage of federal tax were as follows: Alberta, 46.5 per cent; British Columbia, 51.5 per cent; Manitoba, 52 per cent; New Brunswick, 60 per cent; Newfoundland, 61 per cent; Nova Scotia, 56.5 per cent; Ontario, 52 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 57 per cent; Saskatchewan, 50 per cent; Quebec administers its own income tax. On the assumption that the basic provincial rate is 55 per cent and ignoring special federal and provincial surtaxes, Table 5 sets out the federal and combined federal-provincial rates, both under the present system, and the income tax alternative.

On an income of $0 to $27,500, the 1991 legislated 5 per cent federal surtax, the tax combined would be 27.7 per cent. The income tax alternative puts that up to 13.4 per cent. That is combined federal-provincial. On an income from $27,500 to $55,500, the combined federal-provincial bite would be 42.3 per cent with GST on the side and 46.5 per cent through the income tax alternative. For $55,000 and over the combined provincial-federal tax take would be 57.2 per cent and it would be 52 per cent in the income tax alternative which would replace the GST.

The changes in the income tax rates that would be needed to replace the manufacturers' sales tax are more modest. To make this point a number of things might be noted about the proposed schedule. The highest rate would be about what it was in 1984 when the present government took office. It is more than 10 percentage points lower than the rate in 1981. It is more than 30 percentage points lower than it was throughout the 1960s when Canada experienced its highest rates for growth and lowest unemployment rates—that's the secret, lowest unemployment rates—and is much lower than the average top marginal rate in European countries. This is not something that was written many years ago. This is February, 1990. The shift in the tax burden on particular consumption goods and services resulting from an income tax alternative reform. If the MST were abolished and the revenue loss collected through the income tax, the consumer price index would decrease by 2.27 percentage points as a consequence.

You only have an hour and 20 minutes to put up with me.

Senator Frith: Less than that. Just an hour and a very few minutes.

Senator Gigantès: Don't we break at 6?

Senator Frith: The motion can be made at a quarter to 6.

Senator Gigantès: At a quarter to 6 we are going to break?

Senator Frith: A motion can be made.

Senator Murray: We are so enthralled.

Senator Gigantès: I am most grateful. Senator Lowell Murray, that is an act of kindness on your part, to actually express interest in what I have to say. I mean, he will deny that that is what he was doing, but I will live with this happy thought that secretly he is interested in the Neil Brooks presentation. I will write to Mr. Brooks and tell him. He will be gratified.

We were saying that if the MST were abolished and the revenue loss collected through the income tax, the consumer price index would decrease by 2.7 per cent as a consequence. This assumes, of course, that manufacturers who pay their MST would pass the tax savings on to consumers if it were abolished. This is the one error I find, so far, in Neil Brooks, the assumption, that the manufacturers would pass on the tax savings. Since this is the assumption that the government is making in proposing the GST reforms, it seems reasonable to make the same assumption for the income-tax-alternative reform.

● (1640)

Then he has a Table 6, which uses these same expenditure categories as Table 3 and it illustrates the price decline for various goods and services. Through his income tax techniques for gathering the revenue lost through not applying the GST, Brooks finds that food would decline in price by 1.6 per cent. Home furnishings would decline in price by around 8 per cent. Motor vehicles would decline in price by over 8 per cent. Jewellery and cosmetics would decline in price by over 6 per cent, and, perhaps more significantly, new housing would decline in price by 2.8 per cent.

In Part III, he compares the alternatives:

> The main purpose of this paper is to compare the distributional consequences of the GST reforms and an income tax alternative. However, in spite of, or aside from, the distributional consequences, a number of arguments have been put forward to justify shifting more of the tax burden from income to consumption. To place the distributional consequences of the two alternatives in a wider context, the arguments for or against a tax-mix change will be reviewed briefly. The purpose of this review is not to resolve definitively the various issues at stake in this tax-mix change, but simply to review the various arguments and to expose their empirical and value assumptions. Obviously there is an enormous literature testing these empirical assumptions and elaborating on these value premises, but none of it is reviewed here. The arguments are reviewed only in enough detail to make the point that there is no compelling a priori reason for shifting more of the tax burden from income to consumption that would make the distributional consequences irrelevant. Indeed, on the contrary, there are good reasons, even aside from increased fairness, for shifting more of the tax burden from consumption to income.

Section 1 of this part sets out the arguments for and against a tax-mix change from income to consumption: Section 2 compares in detail the distributional effects of the GST reforms and the income tax alternative.

> Arguments For and Against a Tax Mix Change from Income and Consumption
> (a) Main arguments for Greater Reliance on Consumption Taxes: Arguments for Replacing the MST with the GST
> (i) To Rebalance the Government's Revenue Sources
> From 1965 to 1984, the revenue from the manufacturers' sales tax made up a decreasing percentage of total federal government revenues. An argument that is sometimes made for increasing the weight of consumption taxes in the mix of personal taxes is to restore balance in the government's revenue sources. The precise logic of this argument is difficult to discern. Presumably the argument rests on the premise that in 1965, or at some earlier time, the federal government tax mix was "correct"—

This is part, incidentally, of what I call the Conservative illusion and what the book by Mr. Allerback calls a Conservative illusion. There is always some earlier better time. It was all very nice in the past. I have a theory which I hesitate to express and which is that basically this belief in the "good old days" is based on the deterioration of the human body. You will see this very clearly if you read Plato. As he ages, his dialogues change in tone and his belief in a past more glorious, more gentle increases. The older and weaker he gets, the better the good old days look. A more realistic man, Epicurus, said, in the good old days we were all small, brutish, frightened and living in caves. But there it is. Balance the government's tax sources and have them in this mythical past correct balance.

But, of course, without more evidence, the opposite premise, namely that the trend away from consumption taxes at the federal level is leading to the optimal tax mix, is just as plausible.

In judging the "correctness" of the tax mix, one of two obvious standards might be used. First, the tax system is one of the policy instruments the government uses in achieving its stabilization, allocation and redistribution objectives; therefore, the tax mix might be evaluated in terms of how effective it renders the tax system as a policy instrument in achieving these objectives. Unfortunately, those who support increasing reliance on consumption taxes have not specified a policy objective that requires a tax-mix change. By contrast, those who oppose the shift in the tax mix towards consumption have argued that unless substantial revenues are collected through income tax, the effectiveness of the overall tax system in reducing income disparities will be impaired.

Canada's tax mix might also be judged by international standards. In 1987, according to comparative revenue statistics of member countries compiled by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), Canada collects 28.9 per cent of total taxes from taxes on goods and services.

This is taking federal and provincial together.

> This is slightly below the OECD average of 30.3 per cent. Canada collects substantially more in taxes on personal income than most OECD countries: Canada collects 38.7 per cent of total taxes from taxes on personal income; the OECD average is 30.7 per cent. However, when social security contributions, which in most countries are equivalent to a tax on labour income, are added to direct income taxes, Canada's tax burden on personal income is below the OECD average: 52 per cent of Canada's total taxes are collected from both these sources; the OECD average is 55 per cent. Certainly by international standards, Canada's present tax mix does not look out of line. Nor would it be out of line with the tax mix in other countries if substantial revenues were shifted to either income or consumption taxes.
> Although this paper is not the place for an in-depth international tax comparison, two further points might be noted in making a judgment about Canada's tax mix by international standards. First, the United States, with whose retailers Canadian retailers must now compete, places very little reliance on general sales taxes. Governments in the United States collect only 16.7 per cent of total taxes from taxes on goods and services. Second, most of the OECD countries that collect more revenue than Canada from regressive consumption taxes also collect some amount of revenue from various forms of wealth taxes that fall exclusively on the very rich. Canada is one of only two OECD countries that does not have a general tax on wealth or wealth transfers.
> (ii) To Increase the Fairness of the Tax System
>
> It is commonly asserted that taxes on consumption are unfair: because consumption as a fraction of income declines as income increases, low-income individuals necessarily devote a larger percentage of their income to such a tax than high-income individuals. However, a number of commentators, economists in particular, have suggested that a tax on consumption is in fact fairer than a tax on income.

[Senator Gigantès.]

• (1650)

> One equity argument sometimes heard in support of taxes on consumption rests on the notion that it is fairer to tax people on the value of the goods and services they take out of the economy (the goods and services they purchase) than the value of the goods and services they contribute (their salaries). Two points might be noted about this argument. First, although taxing consumption might have the connotation of favouring foresight and thrift, in fact, the ultimate purpose of saving is future consumption, and a sceptic might ask, why should wanting to consume in the future have moral primacy over wanting to consume currently?

Senator Olson: I should like to ask a question, Senator Gigantès. You are discussing the matter of fairness of a consumption tax vis-à-vis an income tax. Could you give us your views on the cost of collecting it?

There is going to be an army of tax inspectors and policemen of various kinds. There will be small amounts collected on every transaction, whether it is goods or services. In the part of Canada that I come from, that is one of the main objections to Bill C-62. It is not so much the money. People have said over and over again that they realize the federal government has to reduce the deficit. They are hoping the government will do something about monetary policy so that interest rates will come down. Apparently the government stubbornly refuses to deal with that.

The people who live in my part of Canada realize that the government needs more money, but they do not like to be made slaves of accounting to the federal government or to any government, for that matter. As you know, Alberta has no provincial sales tax.

Perhaps there should be a straight sales tax without all the opportunities for rebates because rebates complicate things greatly. Then we could pass out money to the poor people through the present social welfare system. Would that not be a tremendous improvement over what is in Bill C-62?

Senator Gigantès: Thank you, Senator Olson. I have read studies that have been made about the operational effects of the goods and services tax in other countries. There is no doubt that it is very costly for governments to perceive them, as you pointed out. We are only beginning to scratch the surface of the costs. As you remember, they said it was going to cost some $200 million. The figure is now up to $475 million to pay for the tax police and for setting this up.

There is also the extreme and discriminatory administration burden for the business people. On average, that cost is 9.3 per cent of sales, but it is 40 times higher for small businesses than for big businesses. Big businesses can computerize and centralize the processing of all this incredible paperwork, whereas in small business, the proprietor has to use his or her time, or if they have to hire a tax accountant to do this extra work, then their costs go up enormously.

Senator Olson: I have read some of the new regulations that the Department of Finance are talking about. They are saying that simplified bookkeeping will be available to smaller businesses—people in the category of under $500,000 gross sales, for example. They attempt to say that this will be streamlined bookkeeping. They can do it with the Department of National Revenue, so they do not have to do a lot of detailed accounting.

There is another problem that comes up, and that is the matter of going back through the commercial system to be eligible for the rebates on all the tax that has been paid up to a certain point. Have you looked at that to see if there is going to be some relief for the smaller businesses?

Senator Gigantès: Senator Olson, we were told by one of the witnesses that small businesses with, say, an income of no more than $30,000 a year would be able to pay a flat 5 per cent and not have to prove anything or keep any paper. However, above that, and before they become large enough to be able to afford the very substantial set-up costs, they will be paying for equipment and continuous administration in a situation where the provinces and the federal government are not in agreement and where an item might be taxed at one rate by the province and another rate by the GST. One province may put its tax on top of the GST and another province might keep it separate. Then there are these absurd categories that no one understands—and everybody wonders how in heavn they got in there—which necessitates that the owner of a business has to learn a 300-page book of regulations. The regulations in this 300-page book are already being changed every day by the Department of Revenue, which cannot make up its mind.

Senator Olson: They do not know what to say.

Senator Gigantès: Exactly. This is a genuine administrative burden. The studies that have been made in Europe rank GST-type taxes as the bête noire of all business. They say if there is anything they would like to be rid of more than anything else, because of the incredible burden of paperwork, it is this kind of tax. There are simpler ways of having a GST. The people want to get rid of this nightmare of paperwork that eats into their free time. In a small business, the time of the proprietor is probably the main asset of the business.

There is no doubt that this is a bad tax. There are alternatives for doing what the government wants to do. I am reading one of them now. I will return to this document:

> Two points might be noted about this argument. First, although taxing consumption might have the connotation of favouring foresight and thrift, in fact, the ultimate purpose of saving is future consumption, and the sceptic might ask, why should wanting to consume in the future have moral primacy over wanting to consume currently? Second, although the way the argument is normally stated the ethical intuition underlying it is not clear, it seems to depend upon a notion that a consumer is using up something.

● (1700)

There has been a fair exchange, which is part of the argument that I used when I say that the only solution to the deficit problem and to the national debt problem is to put people to work so that they will be producing goods and services for the money they receive, which is equal to the money they receive when they work and not receive the same money as they do, or cost society the same amount of money, when they do not work and they do not then produce any goods and services. That produces a terrible drain on the economy. Mr. Brooks goes on to say:

> The goods and services may be gone, but the price of the goods is now in someone else's hands. Moreover, contrary to the implicit assumption underlying the way the argument is normally stating, saving is not more virtuous than consuming. Consumption is not a claim on community resources. It involves an exchange between private individuals after which both are presumably better off.

One has the money and the other has the goods or services, that is all. The goods and services are still there, only they have changed hands. Mr. Brooks goes on to say:

> In introducing the GST, the government has added a twist to this argument by suggesting it is fairer to tax consumption because people have a choice about whether they will save or consume and thus pay the tax. But for low-or even most middle-income people, the option of saving from income is meaningless. They must spend all their income simply to survive at an adequate standard of living.
> A second equity argument frequently made to support a shift from income to consumption taxes is that a tax on consumption in effect taxes people on their total income over their lifetime instead of, as with an income tax, their income as measured over some shorter interval of time, usually a year. Although the argument is technical, basically the proponents of this argument attempt to show first that a consumption tax is more likely than an income tax to collect the same amount of tax from two people with the same lifetime income and then to argue the fairness of that result. But even accepting the technical argument, although it is not without its difficulties, the fairness aspect of the argument is not persuasive. It has two elements. First, it is alleged the taxing consumption measures long-term well-being better than income.

Let me repeat this sentence. "It states that it is alleged that taxing consumption measures long-term well-being better than income." Mr. Brooks goes on to say:

> But the notion that only fairness over people's lifetime matters, and not their economic circumstances over relatively short periods, has little merit.

He does not say this, but it is also a dastardly paternalistic attitude that the government knows better than the people about how they should spend their money and when. They are better judges about when the need arises, be it over a lifetime or during a short period of years when a cherished child is put through a special school or given special help in order to achieve career goals that would not be possible otherwise. Mr. Brooks further states:

> Given the enormous changes that can occur over a lifetime, brought on by family instability, economic insecurity, political change and other uncertainties, most people understandably make judgments about their relative economic well-being over a much shorter timeframe. Indeed, comparing the economic circumstances of two individuals over a one-year period is hard enough, let alone over a lifetime.
>
> The second element of this equity argument is that because an income tax taxes the return to saving it discriminates between those who choose to consume in the present and those who choose to save and consume in the future. Again, ignoring the technical difficulties with this argument, the fairness intuition that underlies it is tenuous. Income earned from savings is rarely, if ever, simply compensation for deferred consumption. In many cases income from savings will be a mixture of income from property, human capital and luck. A successful investment in a complex, high-risk business venture, for example, frequently requires considerable managerial input as well as a fair measure of luck. Thus to the extent that what is loosely called income from property is really income from human capital and luck, it is not being double-taxed under an income tax. Also, even assuming that income from savings results primarily from the simple owning of property, holding wealth for most people has value not just as delayed consumption but is itself an act of consumption. It provides them with security, social prestige and power. This intangible consumption is preferred by many people over tangible consumption. But under a sales tax this act of consumption is not taxed.
> (iii) To Improve Incentives to Work
>
> A shift to consumption taxes, which will allow for a fall in income taxation, will lead to an increase in work effort, it is sometimes argued.

I have difficulty with this argument and so does he. He goes on to say:

> With lower average and marginal income tax rates, workers will be willing to work longer hours of overtime, more willing to take on responsibility and risk, and might make different career choices. This argument obviously assumes that tax rates have some effect on the incentive to work. Theoretically, workers who bear a lower tax rate might either work less since they need less income to maintain their existing standard of living, or they might work harder since they are able to earn more after-tax income for each hour worked. The empirical studies done to date > are of little assistance in determining which of these offsetting income and substitution effects in fact predominates.

That is an important paragraph, because it deals with one of the moralizing assumptions and paternalistic assumptions, namely, that you can make people do as you wish through some form of tax. Liberals believe a little more in the free world; Tories only believe in the free world for the rich. I will read this paragraph again. It states:

> A shift to consumption taxes, which will allow for a fall in income taxation, will lead to an increase in work effort, it is sometimes argued. With lower average and marginal income tax rates, workers will be willing to work longer hours of overtime, more willing to take on responsibility and risk, and might make different career choices. This argument obviously assumes that tax rates have some effect on the incentive to work. Theoretically, workers who bear a lower tax rate might work less since they need less income to maintain their existing standard of living, or they might work harder since they are able to earn more after-tax income for each hour worked. The empirical studies done to date are of little assistance in determining which of these offsetting income and substitution effects in fact predominates.

That means that there is no evidence to say that if you lower income taxes and substitute consumption taxes, people will work harder. It does not seem to make any difference. But even aside from this contentious issue, generally, unless workers suffer from some form of fiscal illusion when such a tax mix change is made, shifting the tax burden from income to consumption should have no effect on work incentives. A worker's total effective marginal tax rate does not change if the rate on earnings is lowered but the rate on the goods and services the worker purchases is increased by a corresponding amount.

● (1710)

In other words, it will be taken away from him in one way or another. If it is taken away under the label "income tax" or under the label "consumption tax", what is the difference? The government is putting the hand into the pocket of this worker and taking out the money.

Theoretically, workers who bear a lower tax rate might either work less since they need less income to maintain their existing standard of living, or they might work harder since they are able to earn more after tax-income for each hour worked. Theoretical studies show that there is no difference.

That is to say, workers are left with the same after-tax position whether a tax is collected on their earnings or on the goods and services they consume. Therefore, it is difficult to see why their work habits would change in response to such a shift.

All this, of course, is sheer flummery. It is to find a good excuse to shift the tax burden from the rich manufacturers who pay for the political campaigns of the Tories to poorer people.

Senator Kirby: Senator Gigantès, in light of the economic data which you are now reading, would you care to comment on the following issue? Today, I had a chance to meet with several leading economists who are among the leading economic forecasters in the country. While economic forecasters do not always agree precisely, they certainly agree on the broad outlines of the likely economic future that this country will see in 1991 and 1992.

Depending on which of the leading business economists you talk to, they will tell you that the current recession is going to last until at least the middle of 1991. That is what the more optimistic ones say. The more pessimistic ones say that the recession will continue into the spring of 1992.

Moreover, when you ask them what the cause of the recession is or, in particular, what action needs to be taken to reduce the effects of the recession and to get Canada out of it, they make two fairly telling observations. The first is that the recession will be longer and deeper the longer interest rates stay up. As they point out, it is the reluctance of Canadians to borrow in uncertain times when interest rates are at current levels which is maintaining the recession.

The second item these economists point out is that it is the policy of the Bank of Canada to keep interest rates high until inflation has been wrung completely out of the economy. Again, I point out to honourable senators that these remarks were made by a reasonably representative cross-section of senior industrial and bank economists. Their belief is that the impact of the GST on the rate of inflation will be somewhere between 2 per cent and 2.5 per cent.

In light of the material that you have been reading to the house, would you comment on the fact that we seem to be caught in the following, what some might call, illogical or irrational situation? That is to say, the government proposes to take a policy action which will increase the rate of inflation by 2 per cent to 2.5 per cent. Faced with that increase and the rate of inflation, the Governor of the Bank of Canada maintains the position that he has to keep interest rates high in order to reduce inflation. The fact is that in the opinion of all these leading economists the high interest rate policy is one of the key factors causing the recession, one which will, in fact, lengthen the recession. Therefore, we are in a situation in which the implementation of the GST, combined with the policy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, will lead to a recession which is likely to be longer and deeper. Indeed, in those circumstances, it is likely to spread into at least the beginning, if not the middle, of 1992. In other words, it will continue for some 15 to 18 months from now.

In light of the data you were reading with respect to marginal tax rates, would you care to comment on the apparent inconsistency of the Minister of Finance pushing a policy which is designed to decrease inflation, the Governor of the Bank of Canada pushing a policy which is designed to decrease inflation and the Prime Minister saying that the purpose of economic policy is to end the recession? Could you attempt to make some sense out of those three fairly contradictory statements? It is fairly clear from talking, as I did earlier today, to these 15 economists that they are unable to make any sense out of the situation.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you for your question, senator. Your economist friends are perfectly right. We are in a recession and the government is increasing taxes. It is taking more money out of the economy. The people who buy have less money with which to buy. Therefore, sales will fall in various industries. Profits will be less. If profits are less, there will be less money to invest. Borrowing for investment is prohibitive, which is one of the causes of the recession. Interest rates are too high.

Because interest rates are too high, our exports have suffered tremendously with a considerable loss of jobs. All these people who have lost jobs in the manufacturing sector, jobs which have disappeared perhaps forever, are truncated customers. Therefore, there is less money coming into the hands of business, less money with which to do more business. That accelerates the recession.

When economists say that the recession might last until the middle of 1991 if they are optimistic, or to the end of 1991 if they are average, or until the end of 1992 if they are pessimistic, what they are saying is that statistically we will see a shift in two successive quarters from decreasing economic activity to increasing economic activity. However, that does not mean that when the time comes to declare the recession over the economy will be back to pre-recession times, or that jobs will be created, and that those who lost their jobs and who do not have money to buy the necessities of life, the luxuries of life or to invest in houses or anything at all will be reabsorbed. In consequence, they drag the economy down.

Just for argument's sake let us say that it gets to the point where it has fallen for several quarters at a total of 6 percentage points of gross domestic product. Then, in two successive quarters let us say it stops falling and grows by one-tenth of 1 per cent in each of those two successive quarters. That signals the end of the recession, but we are still 5.8 percentage points below what we were before. We are growing again, but we are growing from the bottom of the well, and it is a very difficult circumstance.

• (1720)

You asked me how to reconcile the contradictory policies of the government, and Senator Simard laughs and I can well understand. If I were in his place, I would laugh. He has been a Minister of Finance. He thinks it is very funny that anyone is being asked to reconcile the irreconcilable. I can fully understand. If he were still Minister of Finance for New Brunswick, he would be meeting with his fellow provincial Finance Ministers and saying, "Michael Wilson and John Crow and Brian Mulroney have been collectively mad. Démonciel, as he says in French, and it is. Here is the Minister of Finance about to take money out of the pockets of consumers with a new tax. You do not do that in a recession because it accelerates the recession. Nevertheless, he is about to do that with a new tax that will be inflationary.

It is misleading when the Department of Finance says, "The inflationary consequence of the tax will be a one-time 1.25 per cent." All the witnesses disputed that. The Department of Finance was not prepared to show us the assumptions of how they calculated that. Also, we must not forget the extra costs to business people for setting up and for administering this tax for the government. The average extra cost is 9.3 per cent of sales. It will be passed on, and it will have an inflationary effect. If you think that the Governor of the Bank of Canada would freak out at an increase of 1.25 or 2.5 per cent, what then will he do when the increase is not 1.25 or 2.5 per cent, but is more, because the administrative costs of this tax are being passed on to the consumer?

I do not know if a reasonable finance minister or a governor of the central bank would do what Mr. Wilson and Mr. Crow are doing, and to have the Prime Minister say in those circumstances that his policies are designed to take us out of the recession faster is aberrant. You say to yourself, "What is he talking about?" There must be legions of economists, like those you heard us read from this morning, who are pinching one another and saying, "Is this for real? Are these guys—"

So let us return. To repeat:

> . . . workers are left in the same after-tax position whether a tax is collected on their earnings or on the goods and services they consume; therefore, it is difficult to see why their work habits would change in response to such a shift. Moreover, some analysts argue that since a general consumption tax does not have an effect upon income that it saves currently, it is therefore economically equivalent to a tax on wages alone. According to this view, a revenue-neutral switch from an income tax to a consumption tax requires higher effective marginal tax rates on wages, thereby perhaps discouraging work effort.

Would senators like me to read that again? It is a fairly complex argument, but it is a good one.

Senator Doody: Wait for the movie. I would rather wait for the movie.

Senator Gigantès: Do you think I could get a government grant to do this movie? I will star you, put you right in there, in the middle.

Senator Doody: If you promise to do it in some other country.

Senator Gigantès: Front row centre, as the great tax expert. Actually you would do so much better than either the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Government in the Senate because people would trust you, which they cannot do with others. What a nice nature you have! You are all ready to start talking movie production with me. Recommend me to Telefilm, put me in the hands of Madame Louise Beaudoin, but do not tell her that I am a federalist because she would not give me a cent.

> Finally, even if it could be shown that a tax mix change would cause people to work harder, it is not obvious that this would be a socially desirable result. Unless it can be shown that the level of income taxation has distorted individuals' labour decisions, then providing incentives for them to choose to work over leisure involves the government in making social judgements that override an individual's own assessment of the weafare he or she gains from working.

You see here one of the basic contradictions of Conservatism. Conservatives scream that an individual's freedom to make his own economic decisions should prevail. However, what we are seeing here is a Conservative government restricting the economic freedom, and therefore the free will of people, and saying instead that the government will decide how the people will work and what they will do.

The next heading in the Brooks report is:

> "To Improve Incentives to Save"
>
> One of the primary arguments that the government has advanced for the goods and services tax is that as a tax on consumption instead of income it will lead to a higher level of private savings—

—and that adds a tax on consumption, instead of on income—

> —and thus a higher level of capital formation, (that is, plant and equipment), and ultimately a higher standard of living for all Canadians. Unfortunately, every link in this chain of argument is open to serious question.

I am glad to say that Mr. Brooks is about to enumerate his questions.

> First, there is little evidence that savings are too low in Canada.

We have this obsession that if the Japanese save 150 per cent, so should we.

> Certainly by international standards Canada's savings rate is quite high.

I would recommend to senators opposite that they borrow this book from the library and they look at the tables here that show that, indeed, we are doing pretty well in terms of savings, and that, on average, we are better than the European Economic Community, and we are certainly better than the United States. Only Japan is ahead of us.

> Moreover, whether collectively a society should save more and consume less is at the end of the day a value judgement. The trade-off implicit in increasing savings means a transfer of consumption from the current generation to subsequent generations.

Notice none of our splendid economic masters who are friends of the Conservative Party intend to deny themselves the luxury of cars or private shares. No, no, it is the working people they want to exploit and take their money so they can invest the money of the workers instead of investing their own. That is why we have unions. Solidarity forever, yes, sir.

● (1730)

> The ethical judgement underlying this tradeoff might seem uncontentious, particularly if it is being made by current generation and if it involved reduced current consumption for those who are otherwise well-off. However, just as likely, the present consumption that is forgone will be that of poor people to whom the government transfer payments might be made or that of those who benefit from public health services and education.

Remember what I was saying earlier about this new wonderful fashion of disentangling the health service giving Billy Vander Zalm full authority to do to the health service in British Columbia exactly as he wishes, abolishing, in other words, equality of this very vital, very central, very essential service throughout Canada for the people of this country. Save a few bucks for the rich. And, of course, not only will health services be hit but education also and then there will be moaning and gnashing of teeth about our workforce not being as well trained. Look at how the countries which have well-trained workforces spend for their training. Germany is terribly impressive. It is three or four times higher than the rate of spending of our enterprises.

Senator Fairbairn: Senator Gigantès, I wonder if I could ask you a very brief question? As you were just saying how the people who are on the lower-income level of the scale are being most severely hurt, could you give us your views on how effective the tax credit that is being proposed under the GST will truly be for people who are at the lower end of the income scale? It is the government's view that this will equalize or completely compensate them for the money they will have to spend, the extra money as a result of this tax, whereas it has been suggested by a number of groups that this tax credit will fall far short of what it will actually cost the poorer people in their daily living item by item if this tax should go through.

Senator Gigantès: I am glad you asked this question. Let us take the example of a university student with an income of $7,000 with a 7 per cent GST—take a university student in Quebec. There is 7 per cent plus another 8 per cent on top. That is 15 per cent, but actually it is on $107. Another 7 per cent on $107 gives you a higher tax than that. It is 15.49, but let us call it 15.5 per cent. So out of $7,000 a university student is going to be paying taxes on rent, on clothes, and, as I was saying earlier, most of the university students live on cafeteria food. They buy one can of yogurt and that is taxed. They buy a wrapped sandwich and that is taxed. They buy a pizza. Often if they are good and conscientious students, they do not have time to go home and cook.

Remember, the rule is, if it is hot, it is taxable. They have to equip themselves with a kitchen if they are going to avoid the cost of that tax. So $7,000 gives you more than $1,000 in tax. That student is going to receive in Quebec four times 67, in other words, $248. That student is going to pay $760 more tax than a student now pays. They are going to subtract from that that portion of the $748 that corresponds to the manufacturers' sales tax, the hidden tax, the student pays before. Well, we have seen that part of this manufacturers' sales tax goes on exports. Therefore, the student does not pay it. It is on goods that are exported.

We have seen that there are other items of this manufacturers' sales tax that do not go towards the Canadian consumer. For instance, industries are taxed on inputs to construct new buildings or to buy new equipment, and that does not reach that student, not immediately. Therefore, expressing this in the most generous terms for the government, this student will pay $500 more in tax than before and when you have $7,000 a year, and when most of that $7,000 goes on rent—about $5,000—$500 is a quarter of the money a student has to live on. It will not work.

We have another category which is in many ways also possibly more tragic. Our research people use various other statistics about the claims that mothers make for child tax credit. How many of these mothers who are poor actually make the claim?

Senator Fairbairn: Exactly.

Senator Gigantès: Eighty-five per cent.

Wonderful coverage. Eighty-five per cent. How many out of the 15 per cent? How about these poor people who are too sick, too tired, too stoned, too whatever—

Senator Fairbairn: Or illiterate.

Senator Gigantès: —or illiterate, who do not now fill in the necessary paperwork to get the child tax credit? And, of course, they have not filed an income tax because they are below the taxable levels. We are asked to believe that somehow all of these good Tories will be running around finding these suffering mothers and pressing $248 into their hands in four equal segments. I do not think so.

In other countries where this same sort of tax prevails, it has not happened. They have not been rescued. They have been allowed to stay there and rot in their poverty and misery feeling friendless, helpless and bringing up children who will grow up feeling friendless and helpless to be the children of yet another generation, and to harm our society.

Senator Fairbairn: I have another question just following along on what you had said. I wonder whether you would agree with my contention that there has been in this country already over the last several years, through negligence, a lack of focusing on these 15 per cent, or whatever the percentage may be, in terms of literacy. Illiteracy in Canada is much higher than that. But because we have failed to focus on this level, we are solidifying an underclass in our society that, once established and once being supported in a way such as is now common across Canada with the food banks and these kinds of things that never used to exist in our country—once this underclass is established, it will be incredibly difficult to eradicate it and it will require incredibly sensitive and compassionate policies to prevent generation after generation of young people coming through this same process.

I am wondering whether this is something that you yourself see, or have seen in all the research you have done on employment and everything?

Senator Gigantès: You will remember also, Senator Fairbairn, when we were doing the youth report under the able and wonderful chairmanship of our friend, Jacques Hébert, we found that in this city of Ottawa—and this is back in 1985—fat city, they call it in the rest of Canada, there are over 400 youngsters sleeping outside at night in the winter without any shelter at all. They are looking for a hot grate to sleep on, freezing in somebody's doorway. This is in Fat City.

● (1740)

People say that I knock on Tories. There is another member of the youth committee, and you may remember that that member of the youth committee proposed as a solution to youth unemployment that people who hired domestics be allowed to deduct the wages they pay to those domestics. That senator, who is here in this chamber right now, was saying that this was a solution to youth unemployment. Turn our young into housemaids. That is an underclass, if you look at the sociological history of servants in Britain or France in the last century and before. All you see is misery, resentment, hatred and the reduction of the gastily class antagonisms that exist in Britain and which undermine the capacity of that country to grow. There is much hatred that exists there. That is because mother, grandmother and great-grandmother were expoited.

Senator Fairbairn: The distance between the rich and the poor.

Senator Gigantès: That is right. We have a senator here who wanted to bring this back into this country, where people came to escape from it.

If you are a Tory, you do not feel happy unless you have an underclass. I am not at all surprised when they neglect the 15 per cent because that is being a Tory. There is no charity.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO ADJOURN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise not to interrupt or change Senator Gigantès' status, who, I suppose, has broken some sort of record, having spoken for 18 hours in this debate.

I rise to present the following to you, which has been agreed upon by Senator Doody and myself.

It being after 5:45 o'clock on Thursday, I propose to move, pursuant to Rule P-1(a), that the Senate adjourn. By the terms of that rule, the sitting is thereby automatically suspended until 2 p.m. tomorrow.

A motion tomorrow after 5 p.m., pursuant to Rule P-2, would suspend the sitting until 2 p.m. Monday next. In the result, there would be three hours of sitting tomorrow between 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. and then suspension for the weekend. In that specific context, the leaderships see no reason why tomorrow's three hours should not take place between 9 a.m. and 12 noon.

We propose, therefore, with leave of the Senate that the effect of today's—that is Thursday's—provisional Rule P-1(a) motion will be to permit a motion pursuant to provisional Rule P-2 to be made after 12 noon tomorrow, December 7, rather than not until after 5 p.m.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted, I will move that motion.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule P-1(a), I move that the Senate do now adjourn. The effect of that is automatically to suspend the sitting until tomorrow at 2 p.m. However, because of what we have agreed upon, it will be at 9 a.m. tomorrow. I intend to withdraw the motion tomorrow.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the Senate is now suspended until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, it is not yet 6 o'clock. You need unanimous consent and I did not give it. I told you I wanted to speak until 6 p.m.

I now rise on a question of privilege. This is the second time within a couple of weeks that I have refused unanimous consent and it was disregarded. The rights and privileges of a senator include the right to refuse unanimous consent.

Some Hon. Senators: You agreed.

Senator Gigantès: You agreed; I did not. You need unanimous consent to adjourn ahead of time.

Senator Frith: We have to come back at 2 p.m. tomorrow then.

Senator Gigantès: Let me speak until 6 o'clock and I will withdraw my objection.

Senator Doody: We had an agreement with your leader.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Frith, you should warn me of these things. I will agree.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we suspend the sitting of the Senate?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 9 a.m., December 7, 1990.

[Editor's Note: For continuation of proceedings see Issue No. 115M.]

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 29, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 115L.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 9 a.m., Friday, December 7, 1990, the Acting Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO ADJOURN WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not rising in the debate, but, as the senator who moved the motion last night under Rule P-1(a), to withdraw that motion pursuant to its terms.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: As I was saying yesterday before I was so rudely interrupted—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): By me!

Senator Gigantès: —by Senator Frith—

Senator Frith: The word "rudely" always seems to go with the word "interrupted". You never hear anyone say, "before I was politely interrupted".

Senator Gigantès: I was part way through reading, for your benefit, this excellent study by Mr. Neil Brooks, who provides one of the many alternatives. I will recapitulate this later and give you a clear, very slow explanation of exactly what alternatives to the GST are available. I will be very slow in both English and French because obviously yesterday I was having some problems communicating with Senator Poitras and Senator Simard.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Don't you start something this morning!

Senator Gigantès: So there are no doubts in anyone's mind about what I am saying, I will speak very slowly and very carefully.

Senator Frith: I do not want the metaphor taken too seriously, but is there not a saying about "sleeping dogs"?

Senator Gigantès: By the way, I was feeling very invigorated after my speech yesterday and had a marvellous dinner with someone who is arguably the most beautiful girl in the country, my 11-year old niece. She did not think much of what we were doing.

An Hon. Senator: Nor do we!

Senator Gigantès: Yesterday we were talking about improving incentives to save. I think we should go over that particular part of the text of Mr. Brooks, because, as he says—I can wait until you finish talking because I think it is important for you to understand this.

Senator Doody: You have lost your audience!

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: Senator Poitras, please, pay attention, because you are always complaining that we have no alternatives. We do. Just listen!

[English]

I will repeat three of the paragraphs because they were important, and I had been interrupted yesterday.

> One of the primary arguments that the government has advanced for the goods and services tax is that as a tax on consumption instead of income it will lead to a higher level of private savings, and thus a higher level of capital formation (that is, plant end equipment), and ultimately a higher standard of living for all Canadians.

This is Senator Poitras' argument. Again he is missing the answer, and later he is going to tell me that I have not proposed any alternatives. As I was saying:

> . . . as a tax on consumption instead of income it will lead to a higher level of private savings, and thus a higher level of capital formation—

Is that not part of the lies your side is spreading around the country?

> —(that is, plant and equipment), and ultimately a higher standard of living for all Canadians.

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Don't tell me you are already tired without even having had a question!

Senator Gigantès: Would you like to ask a question?

> Unfortunately, every link in this chain of argument is open to serious question.

That is important for members opposite to understand because you cannot fool everyone. People out there do the calculations and expose the flummery of your arguments.

> First, there is little evidence that savings are too low in Canada.

Yesterday I pointed out that somewhere in my book—which you can borrow from the library if you are too much of a tightwad to buy a copy. It will be no skin off my nose, because I have donated the royalties to a scholarship fund, but my publisher would be happy if you bought a copy of my book.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Senator Gigantès, may I ask you to explain the expression you have just used, "no skin off my nose"? What does it mean? I have never heard that before.

Senator Gigantès: Tightwad?

Senator Corbin: You used the expression "no skin off my nose". Did I hear you correctly?

Senator Gigantès: Yes.

Senator Corbin: What does it mean?

Senator Gigantès: The expression "no skin off my nose" means that it does not affect me at all. It is a British expression, which first appeared in Shakespeare in the Merry Wives of Windsor.

There is a table in my book which gives OECD figures that show that Canada's rate of savings as a proportion of GDP are higher than average in the 21 countries of the OECD and certainly higher than the United States. We are second only to Japan. Mr. Brooks has obviously looked at the same figures because he says:

> Certainly by international standards Canada's savings rate is quite high. Moreover, whether collectively a society should save more and consume less is at the end of the day a value judgement.

When he says "at the end of the day", Mr. Brooks was obviously listening to various people on the other side, notably, the honourable leader. I am mellowing this morning. I even used the word "honourable" when referring to Senator Murray. He has a habit of saying "at the end of the day". Mr. Brooks is talking about the end of the day too.

> . . . whether collectively a society should save more and consume less is at the end of the day a value judgement. The trade-off implicit in increasing savings means a transfer of consumption from the current generation to subsequent generations.

Starve now for the sake of your grandchildren.

> The ethical judgement underlying this trade-off might seem uncontentious, particularly if it is being made by the current generation and if it involves reduced current consumption for those who are otherwise well-off.

Like Senator Poitras.

> However, just as likely, the present consumption that is foregone will be that of poor people to whom government transfer payments might be made or that of those who benefit from public health services and education.

[Senator Gigantès.]

As I was pointing out yesterday, there is a serious movement among respectable, "bien pensants" Conservatives to shift more funds toward private education and to allow a private, parallel health care system for the rich with the best doctors, nurses and technicians. As a result, there will be two classes of health care. We do that by the disentanglement method that has led Billy Vander Zalm and other Tory premiers to put their sticky fingers, and those of their friends, into the huge medicare pie.

• (0910)

I am sorry that Senator Castonguay is not here, but I have not missed his change of view from when he was Minister of Health Care to now that he is president of an insurance company. Who makes hugh profits out of private health care insurance? The insurance companies. Senator Castonguay did not allow insurance companies to participate in the health care system that he was setting up so admirably in Quebec when he was Minister, but now that he is pesident of a huge financial group that is big in insurance, he is in favour—come on, come on, I am provoking—of allowing private health insurance, through which the rich can buy a policy, possibly from his group thus further enriching it, so that there will be private hospitals taking care of the likes of Senator Poitras—to whom I wish the best of health forever.

I hope you never need a doctor or a hospital, senator. You are a wonderful man, even though you are bigoted about those of us whose mothers did not have the privilege of being here to give us birth, and therefore we did not have that special sanctity that geographic location confers. Ah well! I will have to live under that burden.

Mr. Brooks continues:

> If it is these latter members of the current generation—that is, the poor.

You do not meet them where you live, honourable members opposite, and if you did you would probably say, "Soyez respectable", as Madame Lavoie-Roux said yesterday. By the way, that is the last refuge of the Conservatives. They say, "It is bad manners to eat" or, "You are not being respectable. Don't put a piece of tangerine in your mouth. Oh, how very shocking!"

Senator Poitras: You would not understand that.

Senator Gigantès: I understand compassion. I understand the need of the poor to be helped and I think that is a little more important than worrying whether the great stone-faced Senator Castonguay, who is already a monument while he is still alive, or even yourself or somebody on the other side will say to me that I should not put a piece of tangerine in my mouth. By the way, I have a considerable supply of pieces of tangerine and I will put them in my mouth whenever I feel like it, whether you like it or not. If any of you want any, send over a page and I will be generous and give you some.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, did I understand you correctly to say that you were admonished by Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux for drinking water or something?

Senator Gigantès: No. She thought I was not respectable. She said, "Soyez respectable." Perhaps she meant, "Soyez respectueux", because I was being a little feisty in laying into Senator Poitras and Senator Castonguay and others on the other side.

Senator Corbin: I see. That is the same Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, the same Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, who, for a whole hour before she got up in the Senate and said that, was stretched on two chairs here; her noble body was stretched on two chairs while you were talking, and she was dozing away. I wonder if there was any respectability in that? These people cannot have it both ways, Senator Gigantès.

Senator Poitras: Wait until she is here.

Senator Doyle: At least she was not playing the kazoo!

Senator Corbin: Do you want to make a speech? Senator Gigantès, I would suggest that you take it easy, and do not be embarrassed by whatever admonitions they want to make to you. I have a list of 20 breaches of protocol and decorum that these people have committed since you started speaking. So go ahead, do your thing, and do not be intimidated. However, I would also suggest that you not overly provoke them, because they could become dangerous.

Senator Gigantès: First, I should like to say that I think that Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux sleeping by herself on two chairs is perfectly respectable, as far as I am concerned. There is nothing disrespectable about a married lady sleeping alone on two chairs. Now, the other thing I would like is for you to explain to me, sir, in what way you think our colleagues opposite might become dangerous.

Senator Corbin: I beg your pardon?

Senator Gigantès: You said I should not provoke them too much because they might become dangerous. I would like to hear from you in which way you think they might become dangerous so I could judge for my own self whether this is real danger or not.

Senator Corbin: By that, I mean do not extend their power of retention in the face of all the proofs and facts you are bringing to us in this house, in terms of the GST being bad legislation. They can take only so much of that. As you noticed yesterday, I put certain facts on the record and Senator Simard jumped to his feet and made a speech. I would not want them to have to interrupt your speech any more than they have in the past few days. That is what I meant by not overly provoking them. I am not afraid of the facts, but there are some facts they just cannot take. So take it easy on them.

Senator Gigantès: Well, thank you. I see you are recalling me to my duties as the teacher I once was, and I must be faithful to the lessons I must preach. Regardless of the quality of the class, I must make an attempt to see that the lesson is absorbed.

What we are talking about here, and what Mr. Brooks is very convincingly knocking on the head, is this standard Tory argument that it is better for the poor to save rather than consume. He says that:

> If it is these latter members of the current generation who are affected by government policy designed to reduce current consumption, then the value judgement becomes more problematic.
>
> Second, even if the social judgement were made that private savings should be increased, it is unlikely that relieving more of the return to savings from tax would have that effect.

I repeat:

> . . . it is unlikely that relieving more of the return to savings from tax would have that effect.

He continues:

> It is well known in economic theory that a decrease in taxes on income from saving can either increase or decrease savings.

This may sound like a paradox, but life is pretty paradoxical.

> Based on the empirical studies, although the magnitude of the effects of tax on savings remains a matter of controversy, the best evidence is that at most it is modest.

Am I talking slowly enough for you, Senator Poitras?

> In particular, since our present income tax already provides substantial incentives for savings, for example by providing tax assistance for saving for retirement, a shift in the tax mix towards greater revenue from the sales tax could at the very best have a marginal effect—

"Marginal" means small in this instance, because there is "marginal" used in another sense in economics, and as the uppermost tax bracket that would hit you.

> . . . a shift in the tax mix towards greater revenue from the sales tax could at the very best have a marginal effect in increasing personal savings. The argument that a tax mix change can have little effect on savings is supported by the fact that there appears to be no correlation between, for example, the percentage of revenues a country collects in taxes on goods and services and its savings rate. Japan, for example, collects a small percentage of its revenues from sales tax—

They have just introduced a 3.3 per cent sales tax, which is driving business people in Japan absolutely around the bend. Even though they are very good at figuring and have computers, it does make life difficult. Even though Japan derives a very small percentage of its revenue from sales taxes, it has the highest rate of private savings of any of the developed countries.

● (0920)

> Also, in the United States, somewhat to the embarrassment of economists who argued that there is a strong correlation between after-tax rates of returns and savings, in recent years the savings rate has fallen at the same time that marginal tax rates have been lowered and real interest rates have increased.

Senator Poitras, the experience in the United States shows that even though the income rates have fallen and interest rates have increased, the savings rate has also fallen in the United States. So where is this correlation that if money is taken away from people every time they buy something they will prefer not to buy and will save the money.

> Third, even if a tax mix change in favour of consumption increased personal savings somewhat, the effect on total savings in the economy would be trivial since personal savings are only a small percentage of total savings.

Total savings include retained earnings by corporations. Savings also include Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan contributions. Contributions towards unemployment insurance and accident insurance are also considered savings. Payments on insurance policies are considered savings. In economic terms and in statistical terms, those are the majority of savings in a country. It is not only personal savings that make the difference.

> Moreover, even if the private rate of savings were to increase, it is not clear that investment would increase. To raise domestic productivity, the additional savings would have to result in increased business capital formation in Canada. But in a small, open economy like Canada's, there is likely little connection between domestic savings and domestic investment since domestic interest rates vary directly with international interest rates.

There is a fairly well-founded rumour going around that Power Corporation is selling off all its remaining assets and getting into a liquid position. Where do you think it is parking its money? It is parking it in Europe in écus and Swiss francs.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Gigantès: I do not know if it is a shame.

Senator Haidasz: It should be invested in Canada.

Senator Gigantès: One must not ask capital to have patriotism.

Senator Stanbury: Or emotion.

Senator Gigantès: Or emotion. Absolutely not. Who knows, but perhaps when artificial intelligence is perfected we can enter emotion, shame, patriotism and humanity factors into the computer and perhaps the computer will make decisions that are more beneficial to the general welfare than the hearts of Tory capitalists. There have been good capitalists, but they are either Liberals or crypto-Liberals.

Senator Turner: No integrity.

Senator Gigantès: Integrity! Let us not use words that we do not understand, senator.

Senator Haidasz: What happened to corporate citizenship, senator?

Senator Gigantès: That is the only citizenship they accept in their hearts, the citizenship of their corporations. Corporate citizenship is an aptly coined phrase.

Senator Haidasz: Good corporate citizenship.

Senator Gigantès: Good corporate citizenship. They would say, as it was said in that marvelous movie, Wall Street, by Michael Douglas, "Greed is good, greed is right. It is what builds fortunes." Unfortunately, it builds fortunes but does not necessarily build nations. That is why people have invented governments, because if everything had been left to private greed, nations would not have been built and we would still be in caves dodging sabre-toothed tigers with mellifluous accents.

By the way, senators may remember that line in My Fair Lady about the dreadful Hungarian. I do not want to say anything bad about Hungarians, so I will replace "Hungarian" with the word "vulgarian".

Senator Frith: Zoltan Karpathy.

Senator Gigantès: "Zoltan Mulroney" is what I am talking about. "Zoltan Mulroney oozing charm from every pore, oils his way across the floor." That is the feeling I have every time I see him.

> But in a small, open economy like Canada's, there is likely little connection between domestic savings and domestic investment since domestic interest rates vary directly with international interest rates.

Power Corporation will probably take all its money and invest it in Europe, where it thinks the new Marshall Plan fueled by West German energy will create great opportunities for increasing that money, and we will never see it again.

> If domestic savings increase, domestic interest rates might fall in the short term . . .

If there is an abundance of money to lend, then the "rent" paid to borrow it goes down; interest rates are "rent".

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators may have heard that Phil Esposito received tens of millions of dollars to invest in a National Hockey League franchise in Tampa, Florida. I hear that the Ottawa Senators club also got a National Hockey League franchise yesterday. We should be happy about that. They will be called the Ottawa Senators.

Senator Stanbury: The fighting Senators.

Senator Haidasz: Yes. We are giving them an example of how to fight during the debate on the GST.

However, the club and the organizers should be congratulated and we wish them all a very successful hockey season here in Ottawa. They do not have an arena or the land on which to build one. Perhaps Power Corporation could finance the Ottawa Senators' club or lend them some of the millions of dollars that Senator Gigantès suggests may go to Europe so that they could buy the land and build a modern hockey arena.

Senator Gigantès: Senator Bonnell brought up this issue yesterday and I pointed out that, if they have the usual problems of a start-up team, they will not be brilliant during the first few seasons. If the cost of the ticket is increased because of GST, and the cost of every hot dog, can of beer, and of the hotel which they will no doubt have—with picture windows looking onto the arena so it can be seen what the occupants of those rooms are doing if the hockey game gets dull, they may have a rocky road. They may be unable to fill the seats; they may not have sufficient spectators and may have a problem with making enough money to be able to afford what is necessary for a hockey team, which is the purchase of better players. But as for the arena, I would suggest to the owners not to rush, because if Mr. Mulroney continues destroying the country as he is, the Parliament buildings might be available, because there will be no Canadian Parliament. There may be no Canada. And the House of Commons is probably large enough to house a rink.

• (0930)

Prime Minister Mulroney, by the way, said that he would welcome a new set of senators to Ottawa. He said that the last bunch wasn't any good. He says he doesn't like the old fogies in the upper chamber.

Senator Stewart: That puts Senator Oliver in his place.

Senator Gigantès: Where is Senator Johnson or Senator Teed?

Senator Stewart: They should be up on a question of privilege.

Senator Gigantès: Brian Mulroney is calling them old fogies.

Senator Molgat: Qui a fait cette déclaration?

Senator Gigantès: Brian Mulroney.

At any rate, this is a digression from what I was about to say. There is absolutely no proof that shifting the tax mix towards a consumption tax, which will increase the share of government revenues through indirect taxation on consumption and lessen the amount of government revenues taken through income tax, will increase savings. If domestic demand for savings outstrips supply, and interest rates are pushed appreciably higher than international rates, foreign funds will flow into Canada in search of high returns.

The point made here is important. If there is an increase in savings in Canada, there will be an oversupply or a larger supply of money to lend. As I was saying when I was reading from my book, when supply increases in any commodity, its price falls. Therefore, our interest rates will fall below international rates and Canadian investors, like the power corporations faced with a low return on funds at home, will simply invest abroad. That is good corporate citizenship. It may not be good Canadian citizenship, but we are not talking about Canadian citizenship, we are talking about Tories. The only citizenship they recognize is corporate citizenship.

Conversely, if domestic demand for savings outstrips supply and interest rates are high, then foreign funds will come into Canada. I was making that point when I was reading my book on an earlier occasion. On the wonders of globalization and of the money market, if we have a globalized money market, then sticking labels on funds and saying that they are Canadian or foreign does not make sense. Savings in Canada, because we are such a small country, really have nothing to do with the amount of investment and capital formation, plants and equipment that will come to Canada. What will bring plants and equipment here is the natural resources we have that can be used.

If we did not have this fool's deal that we made in the form of the Free Trade Agreement, we would have better capital formation in Canada than we now have. But we threw away our trump cards. We gave away our natural resources for a mess of pottage. Thus, notwithstanding the domestic savings rate, the increasing internationalization of financial markets effectively caps the domestic cost of capital.

To continue with this report, it states:

> Finally, shifting the tax mix from savings to consumption can at best have only an indirect effect on savings. In contrast, reducing budget deficits directly increases net personal savings. Consequently, the main positive effect on savings and growth will come from successfully reducing budget deficits using either the income tax or a new consumption tax.

The point that Mr. Brooks is making is that consumption tax is not any better at reducing the deficit than income tax. A little later I will be discussing alternatives to the GST and I will make the point, as I have before—and I must keep making it until everyone understands it—that the only way to reduce deficits and the national debt is to reduce unemployment. Through repetition, I finally made the Economic Council of Canada understand that.

Senator Stewart: They are relatively receptive to new ideas at the Economic Council.

Senator Gigantès: Probably because there are not many rich people there. Judith Maxwell is a fine person and, as far as I know, she is not a corporate citizen. She is only a Canadian citizen.

Another argument that is being given for introducing the GST is to reduce opportunities for evading tax. As we saw earlier when I was presenting information on what happened in countries that have a sort of GST in Europe, tax evasion is not reduced. That is simply an illusion.

> It is sometimes asserted that a tax mix change would reduce the amount of income that illegally escapes tax. A number of reasons are offered for this result: since marginal income tax rates can be lowered if more of the tax burden is shifted to consumption taxes, the incentive to evade income tax is reduced; a broad-based sales tax is easier to enforce than an income tax . . .

• (0940)

Senator Simard will probably get up and yell at me because he has misunderstood something I was saying, because he is not paying attention. He is wasting his time talking to Senator Lowell Murray. Everyone knows that it is a waste of time talking to Lowell Murray. He does not have anything to say that is in any way useful to this country. Look what he has done with his various statements, and in particular his insulting statements about provincial premiers during the Meech Lake Accord, which cornered them into having to react, and therefore sank the deal.

Senator Stewart: But he knew how to instruct the legislature of Manitoba to break its rules, and indeed the laws of the province.

Senator Stanbury: He has experience in breaking the rules.

Senator Gigantès: He has, that is right. He has used that experience, of course, with Senator Charbonneau, whom they still call Speaker on the other side.

Yesterday Senator Bonnell was pointing out that he might have a whole new career as a referee in the National Hockey League, helping the team called the "Ottawa Senators". Senator Bonnell was suggesting that he might run off with the puck and put it in the opposing team's net, forgetting his status as a referee, and using his usual partisan tactics by himself.

A number of reasons are offered for the expectation that a consumption tax will reduce tax evasion at the income tax level. It is easier to enforce, and therefore you can catch people trying to evade.

[Translation]

Good morning, dear Senator Tremblay! I missed you. I am so glad you are here. You are really very nice and very quick, a lot quicker than the rest of your colleagues. I would like them to imitate you. Senator Bolduc is very nice also. All those who have never doubted the quality of Quebec's senior civil servants should think about it. We have two magnificent specimens here. They are really more impressive than the specimens from Quebec's business sector.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Senator Gigantès, "Timeo Danaos et dona ferentis" (I fear the Greeks, especially when they are bringing presents). I guess that apply also to compliments!

Senator Gigantès: No, dear senator, because my compliments are like scorpions; there is always something at the end. I am keeping that for later on. This morning, as I was saying, I am feeling particularly well.

I was asked yesterday, when I ended: what gave you the stamina to hold for 18 hours? I answered: Senator Simard. Senator Fairbairn asked me if, at the end, I had difficulty to focus. She used the expression "Focus your sight", and I said:

[English]

Focus your sight. It is only when I look at Senator Simard. So bless you for being here. You truly quintuple my strength, at least to begin with. As you go on it gets stronger and stronger. If only they would keep you here forever, I could speak forever.

Senator Simard: You have read enough, Senator MacEachen? I cannot blame you. I wish we could all leave.

Senator Gigantès: Senator MacEachen does not have to listen to me. You are the ones who have to provide a quorum. All of us except me, can leave. For a three hour stretch, I do not need the help of my friends for questions. Not yet; not yet.

Senator Frith: Even when Senator Simard is smiling, you might be all right.

Senator Stanbury: You can ask questions, though. That is all right.

[Translation]

Senator David: That is against the rules.

Sénateur Gigantès: What? Giving me a piece of paper? He told me that one of them has his fly open. You have sent me many notes like that when I was talking. I do not know who is mischievous enough on your side to play such a trick, like a grade 3 kid. I myself am in grade 4. I remember that in grade 3, we used to send little notes to the teacher saying that his fly was not closed. We thought it was very funny to see the teacher trying to button himself up.

[Senator Stanbury.]

I was always told that when you talk to a public with "short attention span", like you, you have to relieve pressure by changing subjects once in a while. I cannot talk to you about economy for longer than 30 seconds. It would not sink in, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: You are perfectly able to talk more than 30 seconds. You are an expert.

[English]

Jack of all trades, master of none.

Please focus on something. Focus.

Senator Gigantès: On you? I will spoil my eyesight.

Senator Simard: Focus.

Senator Gigantès: I am focusing on the text. It is a very important text.

Senator Simard: Focus on the clock.

Senator Gigantès:

> . . . even this simplistic economic model of evasion behaviour ignores the fact that higher tax rates increase the cost of evasion in two ways. First, an increase in the tax rate increases the penalty for evading, since fines are typically proportional to unpaid tax. Second, an increase in the tax rate increases the incentive for the tax department to audit; for a given level of under-reporting, a higher tax rate increases the total tax and penalty collected from an audit.

Mr. Brooks is saying that if you really want to catch tax evaders, a high income tax rate is a better investment for revenuers, a better investment in tax police than it is for a 7 per cent consumption tax.

> On balance, recent studies have found that the costs of noncompliance associated with an increase in tax rates outweigh the benefits, so that an increase in the tax rate should in theory actually increase compliance. A number of recent empirical studies have failed to find any relationship between tax rates and compliance.

I think they would probably find an inverse relationship between compliance and party affiliation. If you are a Tory, you dodge taxes, generally. You find ways of paying as little as possible.

Senator Turner: Are you saying they are not honest?

Senator Gigantès: Let us not use a vocabulary that they do not understand. Please, Senator, you keep coming back at me with words like, "integrity", and "honesty". We are talking to Tories now.

Senator Turner: That is what I was taught when I was a young lad; to be honest and truthful, and have a lots of integrity. That is what makes the world go round.

Senator Gigantès: Senator, you are a Liberal.

Senator Turner: I knew there was a difference.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, there is.

> The claim that if there are two somewhat equal tax bases—the income and consumption bases—individuals who are inclined to evade taxes will find it more difficult to evade both instead of just one has a plausible ring to it. However, even if this is the case, the revenue gains would be marginal at best. Self-employed people who evade the income tax will also presumably evade the goods and services tax. Although some sales tax will have been levied on their business inputs it will in many cases not be significant. It seems indisputable that if the government were to devote the additional resources it will use in administrating the goods and services tax to increasing compliance with the income tax, much more revenue would be raised from the underground economy.

If you are trying to recover evasion on 27 per cent, you are making more money than trying to recover evasion on 7 per cent. That is simple logic. So why are the Tories doing this? They are doing it, as we said yesterday, because the GST shifts the burden from manufacturers to consumers and to poorer people. They are doing it because, having decided to shift the burden, they do not want to contemplate the alternatives such as the one Neil Brooks proposes, because those are alternatives which are anathema to the Tory philosophy.

● (0950

To increase the export competitiveness of Canadian business. That is another item in favour of the GST as propounded by the Tories.

> A shift in the tax mix from income to consumption has been advocated as a way of increasing Canada's export competitiveness. This argument is presumably premised on the observation that a consumption tax like the GST is imposed on all imports but rebated on all exports. However, this characteristic of the GST cannot encourage exports or finalize imports. Foreign goods that Canadian exports compete with obviously do not bear the Canadian GST. Further, while imports will bear the tax, so will all goods produced in Canada. The point is that, in terms of its effect on a country's trade balance, a consumption tax that is imposed on imports and not exports is equivalent to not having such a tax at all.
> A slightly more sophisticated version of this argument suggests that, since an income tax is borne directly by all capital and labour in Canada, and must be reflected in prices, whereas a goods and services tax can be removed from exported goods, raising more revenue through the goods and services tax would increase Canada's export competitiveness by decreasing the income tax burden on exported goods. But if the tax is lifted from exports, the revenue must be made up, presumably by being levied on domestic goods—

Right? You no longer collect the $1.5 billion that Mr. Brooks tells us is collected on exported goods, and you do not want to lower the general tax take. You wil, therefore, take it on domestic goods.

> —and most analysts argue that any increased cost of Canadian goods would be compensated for in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. That is to say, any improvement in Canada's export competitiveness by changing the tax mix would be offset by an appreciation in the exchange value of the Canadian dollar. This conclusion reflects a widely accepted theorem of international trade, namely, that under certain realistic conditions a general tax on consumption is equivalent to a general tax on production, the only difference being the exchange rate. The only way that a tax mix change can increase Canada's competitive position is if workers are prepared to take a drop in real wages. It has not worked in other countries.

I realize that must be very disappointing for the ladies and gentlemen opposite, for whom the secret of success is to grind the faces of the poor and make the workers take less for the work they do, but there it is. They will fight back, and I do not blame them. I will be here on this side saying, "I go along with you, give it to them."

This is another of these lovely arguments, to encourage highly-skilled Canadians to remain in Canada. If you increase the consumption tax, you will encourage them to remain in Canada.

> If the tax burden is shifted from the income to the consumption tax, the argument goes, then income tax rates can be lowered and highly skilled and paid Canadians will be encouraged to remain in Canada.

Earlier in this paper, which I hope you will receive from the Clerk of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, Mr. Brooks demonstrated with figures that came from the OECD, that to some extent the total tax burden in Canada is lower when compared to the average of taxes imposed in various OECD countries. It is certainly lower than in most of the countries to which our skilled workers would want to go.

There are other factors, as well. Do you really think that a skilled Canadian worker would like to go to the United States and give up medicare? He would need phrenological care, as do some members opposite, if he were prepared to go to the United States and face the vagaries of a catastrophic major illness; or,in order to avoid it, pay about $2,000 for each family member to have medical insurance coverage equal to that here in Canada.

Gosh, they are starting early in the other house. Actually, they are lazy people. We have already been at it for an hour.

> If the tax burden is shifted from the income to the consumption tax, the argument goes, then income tax rates can be lowered and highly skilled and paid Canadians will be encouraged to remain in Canada.

Another reflection of this is corporate citizenship, which is what we were talking about earlier. The good people across the way who concocted this tax believe that all Canadians think as they do, and that the tax rate is the only thing that matters. I would like to let them in on a secret. The vast majority of Canadians find more to love in Canada than the tax rate. They would not leave this country for another country. This is a beautiful country, a sweet country. Canada does not deserve Brian Mulroney.

> Even when the question is whether a country should increase its overall tax burden in order to finance public services, the concern about the effect this might have on research scientists, engineers and medical doctors leaving the country is frequently overstated. However, in the context of a tax mix change it has absolutely no validity.

Think of it. Mr. Brooks is saying it is a false use of the argument to say that if you decrease income tax rates, you will keep skilled workers here. It is a false use of the argument when you are in a situation in which you are simply shifting the tax burden from one form of tax to another. What the Tories are saying is if we take the same amount of money but more out of your left pocket than your right pocket, you will want to stay in Canada. Whereas if we take the same amount but more out of your right pocket than your left pocket, you will not want to stay in Canada. In terms of economic reasoning, it takes infantilism to believe that.

> International labour movements are not the result of marginal decisions: people either migrate or they do not. Consequently, in deciding whether to migrate, a taxpayer's average effective rate is what is significant, not his or her marginal rate. Although a revenue and distributionally neutral tax change from an income to a consumption base might reduce a taxpayer's marginal tax rate, by definition it will not change the overall amount of tax he or she pays.

It is just a question of into which pocket the government dips its hand.

• (1000)

Here are Mr. Brooks' arguments for greater reliance on income taxes—arguments for replacing the manufacturers' sales tax with an income tax alternative. Members opposite keep saying that no alternatives have been presented. Of course there are alternatives, but none that a Tory can stomach. The first argument of Mr. Brooks has to do with regressivity. He says:

> The major criticism of consumption taxes is that they are regressive. Low-income individuals consume a greater percentage of their income than high-income individuals. Consequently, the effective rate of a tax on consumption declines as income increases. This is illustrated in Table 17; column 4 of that table shows that with the GST, federal commodity taxes will be 7.1 per cent of a low-income family's income, but only 3.1 per cent of a high-income family's income.

That table is constructed from the same data base used by Statistics Canada and the Department of Finance, so we are not talking about different figures or a different data base. We are not comparing apples and oranges; they are all good, Canadian apples with no Tory worms in them.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Hon. Charles Turner: Is that something like Campeau building a house in Austria?

Senator Gigantès: In Austria?

Senator Turner: Yes.

Senator Gigantès: Are you talking about the Mr. Campeau who bit off more junk bonds than he could chew?

Senator Turner: That is true.

Senator Gigantès: Austria welcomes him.

That table and the figures that the Department of Finance uses shows:

> . . . federal commodity taxes will be 7.1 per cent of a low-income family's income, but only 3.1 per cent of a high-income family's income. Moreover, a shift in the tax mix from income to consumption shifts the typical taxpayer's burden to different parts of his or her life span. Relying more on consumption taxes burdens people at the stage in their life when they are consuming, not when they are saving.

I would like to repeat that sentence.

> Relying more on consumption taxes burdens people at the stage in their life when they are consuming, not when they are saving.

Young couples starting out in life and trying to establish themselves live on tight budgets, as do students. They spend every bit of money they have. They have not reached the stage when they can start saving. They are still trying to acquire the tools with which they will eventually make themselves able to save, and we are making it harder for them to acquire those tools by imposing a consumption tax upon them. As Mr. Brooks says:

> Thus it results in people paying more when they are starting out in life—

It is amazing how much I agree with this man. In fact, I often find myself stopping at the end of a sentence to interpret it, only to return to the text and find that he has given the same interpretation. Yesterday, I found out how much I was being misunderstood verbally by Senator Poitras, who obviously had problems with my foreign accent, whether I spoke in French or English, and Senator Simard, who has problems with comprehension, period, which necessitates slow repetition.

As I was saying, Mr. Brooks also said that a consumption tax results in people paying more when they are starting out in life and borrowing against future income.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Senator Gigantès, I wonder if I might ask a question. You made a good point about the proportionately greater cost to young people when they consume almost everything they earn. The same thing would be true of the elderly who are in a poverty situation, having to spend everything they receive in the way of pension or other income they might have. Should we not make a distinction between young people and the elderly who have no concern about poverty or financial problems, compared to those who are in a poorer situation? It is a question of the proportion of income that has to be spent on consumption rather than the absolute dollars spent. Is that a fair analysis of the situation?

Senator Gigantès: That is a perfectly fair analysis of the situation, Senator Stanbury, and thank you for touching upon this point. The fact is that, among young people and old, retired people, along with that large segment of society, the working poor, the proportion of their income spent on consumption is huge. In fact, they spend much of their income on consumption, and they will be hard hit by this tax.

I remember reading an article in the Globe and Mail about an admirable immigrant who had the misfortune of not being born in this land and who would have, because of that, offended the sensibilities of Senator Poitras. She probably has as bad an accent as I do. She had three children and worked in a Chicken Villa rather than go on welfare. She would have been better off on welfare, but her pride would not let her take it. She was bringing up three children by buying second-hand clothes, repairing those clothes herself and working extra shifts at minimum wage to earn extra money. A very admirable person! She spent every penny she had on consumption—every penny! Now she will be taxed for every penny of that by this consumption tax.

• (1010)

Senator Stanbury: Which means, I suppose, that she will be able to buy 7 percent less for her three children and for herself than she was able to buy under earlier circumstances without the GST. It is not just that everything will cost more; it is the deprivation that is involved in reducing the disposable income, or the income that can be used to purchase actual goods.

Senator Gigantès: You are quite right. The argument is often made by people opposite that a person like that should take into account the reduction in the price of certain items because the manufacturers' sales tax will be taken off. However, if you look at the list of those items, not all of those items are inputs into what a poor person buys. Also, if you take into account whatever GST tax rebates that person will receive, it turns out, as Mr. Brooks was pointing out earlier, that, in the best of circumstances, the poor person who spends all of his or her income on consumption will be paying 4.9 per cent more, and that is after allowing for the rebates and after allowing for the lower price—if the lowering in the price is passed, which is something to be wondered at. It is not very common that a reduction in tax is passed on to the consumers. The fruits of such a reduction are generally kept as part of the earnings of the corporate citizens. They keep it in the corporation so they can take it and invest it in Austria, or wherever.

The consumption tax taxes people less when they are in their big earning years and saving. It taxes them more when they are more vulnerable, at the beginning of their working life, and at the end of their working life or beyond. As Mr. Brooks says:

> To most people this shift of taxes likely seems illogical and unfair. In effect, the tax burden is shifted away from the time in their life when people have the greatest ability to pay and to the time in their life when they have the least ability to pay.

I must repeat this because it affects poor people, the less well off, who represent the majority. With a consumption tax:

> . . . the tax burden is shifted away from the time in their life when people have the greatest ability to pay and to the time in their life when they have the least ability to pay.

This just happens to be a true fact. I know it does not matter a damn to this government, but it is a fact. Does anybody have any questions? No? Then I will continue:

> The government concedes the regressivity of the goods and services tax—

It admits it!

> —but it argues that this regressivity can be offset by refundable sales tax credits for people at the lower income levels. However, there are a number of problems with this attempt to remove the regressivity of the tax. First, the refundable credit can remove the regressivity of the tax only up to the point where the maximum credit is paid. At the point where the credit begins to phase out (at $24,800 under the government's proposal) and beyond the tax remains regressive.

In other words, the lower-middle class gets it in the neck once more, as usual. I should also point out that that group does not emigrate; even thought they get it in the neck, the great middle class of Canada stays loyal to this country because they are Canadian citizens, not corporate citizens.

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, may I put a question to you? You are saying that the citizens of this country are getting it in the neck, but they are also concerned about the way they are being used, with reference to a promised tax credit. For example, I have here in my hands a letter dated October 3, 1990. It is signed, and my correspondent says:

> The Conservative Party, itself, is treading a very thin line, the anger of the Canadian public is very close to the surface. The present government has used subterfuge under the guise of leadership which is unforgiveable.

And I particularly draw your attention to the following sentence:

> The present government's promise, received in September of a tax credit or rebate—

Where are you, Senator Gigantès?

Senator Gigantès: I am right here. I am picking up some garbage.

Senator Corbin: I could not see you.

Senator Gigantès: Don't worry about me.

Senator Corbin: I hope you are listening.

Senator Gigantès: Absolutely. My ears are very sensitive to your voice.

Senator Corbin: All right. I will begin that sentence again:

> The present government's promise received in September of a tax credit or rebate in December 90 and April 91 > smacks of a pay-off to citizens and is an insult to our intelligence.

I wonder if you would care to comment on that, along with the statement you have just made that they are getting it in the neck? I conclude from this quote that they are more profoundly hurt by the insult than by anything else, and I would like to have your views on that matter.

Senator Gigantès: Well, obviously that letter is from a fine Canadian citizen, one of those I was talking about in the majority who do not think of Canada simply as a tax system but who love this country and who do, quite properly, feel insulted when this government opposite, well known for its addiction to manipulative techniques of advertising, tries them once again. They use techniques which are best illustrated, if you like, by the Prime Minister himself. Remember the sacred trust? The pensions of the old are a sacred trust. However, what does he do as soon as he gets into office? He tries to de-index those pensions. It took that wonderfully courageous old Canadian lady telling him face to face on the steps of Parliament what a prevaricating, mendacious departure it was from the path of rectitude for him to retreat. He did not retreat immediately, but when the polls showed him that he had to retreat, he did so, and it was not done out of conscience, regret or shame for having been so manipulative.

● (1020)

After all, this is the man who shook Joe Clark's hand and said, "I'm right behind you"—with a knife which he planted in Mr. Clark's back. I have never forgotten that. Even when I have disagreed with statements made by Mr. Clark, I have never had a doubt in my mind that he cares about Canada. I cannot say the same about the Prime Minister or many other Tories. I trust in and believe that Mr. Clark cares about Canada. I do not feel that way about Brian Mulroney.

Why is the Prime Minister's standing at 3 per cent in Alberta? Because the people of Alberta are not fools. Why is he generally at 14 per cent in the country? Quebeckers are loyal to him temporarily and he is benefitting from a wave of lying propaganda on behalf of the separatists who see him as a very precious tool for achieving their ends. After all, when will they again get a Canadian Prime Minister who is prepared to accept and use their vocabulary when misleading the people of Quebec. Of course they support him. Daniel Latouche, Pierre Bourgeault and company, and many other groups support Mulroney. Who else have they got to support? He is their best tool, their best implement. He has delivered. If Quebec did not have separatists dominating its media, Mulroney would be at 3 per cent even there. The people of Quebec are being systematically misinformed, deliberately misinformed, and as soon as they realize that this is misinformation, the polls will shift and Mulroney will plummet even in that province.

It will not be the type of failure that your publishing venture suffered, Senator Simard. You are no one to talk to anyone about publishing, that is for sure. We would never accept your advice on it because all it would lead to would be catastrophe. We heard yesterday it was federal help and cooperation that helped your province when you were Minister of Finance. If you had not been helped out of the hole, your province would have been in terrible trouble when you were Minister of Finance.

The Business Council on National Issues produced a four-page insert for the press at the bidding of the Mulroney government when it was losing the battle for public opinion. Perhaps that was not the most effective piece of propaganda on their part. There were letters written by chief executive officers to their staff, telling them they would lose their jobs if the free trade deal does not go through, which was the opposite of the truth. They have lost their jobs because the trade deal went through. They scared poor people. The Business Council on National Issues produced this insert in which there was the infamous questions and answers, a concoction of lies. The most striking one of all was one in which Tom d'Aquino, who wrote that dreadful document, stated: "We will use the Free Trade Agreement as a pretext to ask for a reduction in social services". The answer was, of course, no. The minute the Free Trade Agreement was signed, Mr. Thibeault, President of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and Tom d'Aquino, President of the Business Council on National Issues, and all their ilk, said that we have to cut the social services. What does that mean? It means cutting the pensions of the old, cutting unemployment insurance and hitting people when their corporate citizen bosses have decided to take the money and put it in Mexico or wherever, and throw thousands of families into the streets. Of course, we must cut their unemployment insurance at that time.

That is why, Senator Corbin, the person who wrote to you does not believe what this government says and is insulted that the government should think that it can once more fool the people of Canada. You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all of the time, but you cannot fool all of the people all of the time. Of course, if you are a congenital liar, you think that you can, but it finally catches up with you and you pay for it. What is unfortunate is that it cannot catch up with Mulroney until two years from now, and those two years are enough for the country to self-destruct through his terrible, awful, absurd—

[Translation]

Senator Chaput-Rolland, you can go complain to Quebec journalists. I do not have to ask you to refrain from telling the truth. You do not tell it usually. Go write something on the Wailing Wall, Senator.

Senator Hébert: You have scared her, she is gone.

Senator Gigantès: No, I did not scare her, I hope she will say in an article or an interview that she hates me more than you. Since she said that you are the one she hates most amongst the Liberals, you are unsufferable!

[English]

> The government concedes the regressivity of the goods and services tax, but it argues that this regressivity can be offset by refundable sales tax credits for people at the lower income levels.

Even if this were true, there are a number of problems with this attempt to remove the regressivity of the tax.

• (1030)

Before we get to his definition of these problems, I would like to say that even if this were true it is not going to be true for the 15 per cent who do not claim the child tax credit. They will not claim it because they are illiterate, they do not know about it, or they are too poor or too sick. Honourable senators, these are not small numbers. Fifteen per cent do not claim the child tax credit. We are talking about tens of thousands of people who will not get these sales tax credits because they cannot go about collecting them. They do not know how. There is no provision for helping these people.

They are the very poor, the most vulnerable. People like single mothers who do not claim the child tax credit will not be claiming the credit for the sales tax. They will be paying an extra 7 per cent on the very little that they buy. They will be able to consume 7 per cent less. In effect, it means that they will be able to eat 7 per cent less, and already they are malnourished. They will have to make their children do with holes in their winter boots a little longer.

There is no provision to help them. But why should they be helped? They are poor. The good Lord wants them to be poor. If he did not want them to be poor, he would have made them corporate citizens instead of Canadian citizens.

Let us go to what Mr. Brooks thinks are the problems with the government's attempt to remove the regressivity tax. I come back to a point that stimulated my friend, the Hon. Eymard Corbin, to read that letter from one of his neighbours.

> First, the refundable credit can remove the regressivity of the tax only up to the point where the maximum credit is paid. At the point where the credit begins to phase out (at $24,800 under the government's proposal) and beyond the tax remains regressive.

Honourable senators, an income of $24,800 is no longer rich. That means that your secretaries are not going to get the refund. It means that most people are not going to get the refund. The lower-middle class and the middle-middle class, who are the pillars of any society and who already bear the major part of the tax burden, are going to get hit with the full unalloyed 7 per cent extra. Congratulations. This is really a sweet thing to do for them. Make it easier for the rich, hit the middle class and hit the poor. But then, if people vote in a Tory government, that is what happens.

> Consequently, no matter how generous the credit, middle-income earners will pay a larger percentage of their income in the tax than high-income earners. Again, this can be seen in Table 17; column 5 shows that if the refundable credit is regarded as a direct refund of the GST, federal commodity taxes are progressive up to the $35,000 to $45,000 family income group, but are regressive over higher income groups. And families in the highest income groups still pay less of their income in federal commodity taxes (3.1 per cent) than families in the lowest income group (4.2 per cent). There is no logic to placing the maximum burden of a new tax on people with middle incomes, particularly since studies have shown that they were the ones most adversely affected by the 1988 personal income tax reforms.

This is what I was saying a little earlier. The burden of tax has been shifted onto these people. Now an extra 7 per cent burden has been placed upon them. That is wonderful, but, of course, what do senators opposite care? If they cared, they would not be Tories. And if they care and they are sitting on the other side of the chamber, they are crypto-Liberals. They are not really Tories.

> Second, the proposed refundable sales tax credit is itself inadequate to remove the regressivity of the federal sales tax . . . The credit does not fully compensate many low-income families for the increase in the sales tax burden they will bear under the GST. Most notably, the credit begins to phase out for many individuals and families living below the poverty line, particularly those living in large cities.

The poverty level in Toronto is a high one compared with what it is in a small village.

Senator Kirby: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Kirby: Given the subject now under discussion and given the impact of the GST on people with low and fixed incomes, I wonder whether he would mind commenting on a letter I received from a woman named Anne Parkhill. She lives in a small community in northern Ontario. I received this letter two days ago. I will read just an excerpt from it which bears directly on the point that Senator Gigantès is making.

> This is just a letter to thank you for all of your hard work, dedication and the many sacrifices that you have made to try and stop the most regressive tax this country has ever seen. It is heartwarming to know that someone at least took the time to listen to average Canadians and take to heart and to mind exactly what they were saying: That Canadians do not want the GST.
> We as a country are in a recession whether the Conservative government knows it or not and for some Canadians the situation is getting worse and worse all the time. I speak of those people on fixed incomes who see no hope in sight of which I am one. Maybe the Conservatives should try and live on less than $550.00 a month which I am required to do.
> We have a great country here and the tyranny that is being transgressed upon the Senate as well as the House of Commons makes one wonder with all the freedom and democracy that is taking place around the world what is happening to this country? Where is all the arrogance coming from? What has happened to the idea that Canada is a country governed for and on behalf of its people and not so that the government of the day makes itself look good?

> Anyway, thank you Mr. Kirby for putting up the good fight on behalf of the Canadian people. It is good to know that there are some people who are willing to listen, who do care and are compassionate as well as understanding to the plight of average to poor Canadians.

• (1040)

Many of us on both sides of this chamber have been receiving comments like that. I think they speak quite eloquently and passionately about the impact the GST will have on people living on low and fixed incomes. As Mrs. Parkhill says, she is living on less than $550 a month as it is.

Because this is precisely the subject you were on, I wonder if you might comment in practical terms on the impact of a 7 per cent sales tax and with unindexed tax credits, which will decline in real terms by 3 per cent a year, will have on someone like Mrs. Parkhill? As she points out in her letter, she is already at the point where she is struggling to survive. I thought you might want to comment on this particular case because it is a very clear example of an average Canadian who has taken the time and trouble to write to the Senate and tell us they appreciate the fight which all of us are putting up on their behalf. The letter also explains in some detail precisely why they are opposed to the tax and the impact it will have and why we are fighting it.

What do you think the impact of the GST and in particular the tax credits will be on Mrs. Parkhill as the years roll by?

Senator Gigantès: Thank you very much for reading that letter, senator. You will excuse me, I must move this because I will trip over it and people opposite will think I am wobbly. One of them actually told someone in the media yesterday that I was glassy-eyed and wobbly.

Senator Doody: We were the ones who were glassy-eyed.

Senator Gigantès: That is exactly what I told the media. The opposition members were glassy-eyed and wobbly, I was not.

Senator Doyle: We are going to get in the Guinness Book of Records for having listened to you.

Senator Gigantès: You should. However, it should be contested if you phrase it that way. You should say "for having sat through" because you do not listen.

Senator Doyle: We do.

Senator Gigantès: Maybe you do but I don't think Senator Poitras always listens carefully. If he had, he would not have totally reversed the meaning of the praise I was pouring on the former—

Senator Poitras: You can stop. I don't listen anymore.

Senator Gigantès: There you are. He does not listen. He thinks he can get up and take potshots and when he gets some back he says, "I don't listen anymore." You may not listen anymore but that is not going to stop me from reminding you of your pettiness in making that comment that I was not born here. That was petty, small, bigoted—

Senator Hébert: And racist.

[Senator Kirby.]

Senator Gigantès: —and racist. Senator Beaudoin would prefer the word "ethnicity" rather than "racist".

Mrs. Parkhill—

Senator Hébert: I hope she was born here.

Senator Gigantès: It would not make any difference to Tories because she is poor and the poor don't count.

Mrs. Parkhill is the kind of person who will suffer most from this tax because, as I was pointing out yesterday, we are not only talking about a 7 per cent increase, we are talking about the phenomena which has been seen in Europe of increased administrative costs for all small businesses because of the GST. Why should the Mom and Pop store where she goes to get her supplies absorb that cost? It will pass it on to its customers. She will be paying more than 7 per cent, probably up to 10. That means she will have $55 less a year.

Now, $55 less a year for honourable senators opposite is not even a good lunch at their favourite restaurant. It is not even a good bottle of wine. It is not even a necktie. But for Mrs. Parkhill it is 36 days of doing without because she spends every penny of her $550 a month. She is at the limit and you may be sure at $550 a month she is malnourished. Either she will eat 10 per cent less each day or she will only be able to live part of the year, not for the last 36 and a half days.

Since there are things she cannot compress, like her rent, and the rent probably takes up most of that $550, she is going to have to eat less, she is going to have to heat her abode less, she is going to have to go out in winter boots that let in water. She will be sick more often and be a bigger burden on our health services than before.

Of course, this is a typical example of Tory stupidity, unless there is a plan in the back of their minds, and I will come to that. If we continue with our health services because the public will not let the government cut them, we are going to pay much more as taxpayers towards the health of Mrs. Parkhill, which will be aggravated by this cut in her income, than the $55 that will be squeezed out of her by this infamous tax.

Of course, if the Tories have their way and continue privatizing medicare, well then, she can die unattended because she is not one of the elect. If she were, she would not be poor. If she is poor she is undeserving. That is basic to Tory thinking. If you are poor, you are undeserving.

I wish Mrs. Parkhill every bit of good luck if she is to survive the next two years under an unfeeling and dreadful government headed by a man who has no conscience and no patriotism. Worst of all, he has no useful skills for this country. If you write to her, Senator Kirby, give her my sympathy and thank her for the encouraging words she has given us. Let's get back to Mr. Brooks:

> (3) As has been noted many times, because the credit is only partially indexed (for inflation over 3 per cent), it will lose its value over time. The National Council of Welfare has estimated that within two years after enactment 100,000 families will lose the credit and by the fifth year 700,000 familes will have lost it—

• (1050)

For certain, during this Tory term, 100,000 families will suffer, because of this tax, within three years. God help us if they stay five years; 700,000 families. That is nearly one and a half million people who will be worse off, because of this one Tory measure. They will have lost their protection, because inflation will have eroded the real value of the threshold at which it begins to phase out.

> Even though the goods and services tax will continue to be imposed on the inflationary price of goods, by the fifth year the government will be paying $700 million less to low-income families in removing the regressivity of the tax.

Is this fair, to take that $700 million out of the hide of the poor instead of, as the author of this paper, Neil Brooks, suggests, increasing a little, just a little, the taxes of the rich? And by how much would the rich be hit if the proposed income tax increases were made? He told us the highest income families would be paying $300 more a year. What is $300 more a year? Five neckties for Senator Poitras. That is all it is. But no, we cannot increase the taxes of our corporate citizens, we must increase the taxes of our Canadian citizens. That is what we must do. That is what this government is asking us to do.

Then there are people who have been brainwashed. You don't like that word, Madame? They have been brainwashed by this government into thinking that we here in the Senate are wrong to oppose this wicked tax, that we are wrong to defend the interests of these hundreds of thousands of people who will see their income eroded by this wicked tax, to defend Mrs. Parkhill, who is going to have to cut her food and the heat in her house and her capacity to go out of that house and not sink in the depression in which the underprivileged sink, because of this wicked tax.

Senator Turner: The tax is $1,400 on a $20,000 car, the average person's purchase.

Senator Gigantès: Yes, as you say.

Neil Brooks writes:

> Finally, and perhaps more fundamentally, it does seem strange to impose a tax on low-income individuals and then give them a credit to offset it.

Why impose it to start with?

> For one thing this adds substantial complexity to the tax transfer system.

I am going to answer Mr. Brooks right now before I continue. He seems to be a little more trusting and naive than I am. The reason this tax has been put there is thatthe corporate citizenry wants it. It does not matter what the consequences are. They don't care about the complexity. In fact the complexity will give them an argument afterwards for suggesting that more of these transfers be cut because they are too expensive to administer. So let's draw a few more people off the poverty cliff, let a few more of them sink.

Mr. Brooks says:

> [This tax] imposes additional administrative costs on the government and increases compliance costs for low-income individuals.
> Claiming the credit not only requires them to make relatively complex computations (similar to computations that many taxpayers make mistakes on in their tax returns), but also requires them to file a significant amount of paperwork. To illustrate the problems with just one aspect of the compensation package, the limited rebate of the GST on lower-priced new housing will result in somewhat different effects in different areas, because of variations in housing prices. In addition, distinguishing between major renovations and minor repairs will lead to endless problems. Most important, the refundable sales tax credit leaves low-income individuals much more vulnerable to political misunderstandings and whim. The credit is highly visible, while the additional GST that low-income individuals pay will tend not to be noticed.

This is a typical, typical Mulroney ploy. The credit is more visible than the tax. They put their hand in your hip pocket and rob your wallet, and they give a small portion of it back in your outstretched hand in the front. You have seen what they have given you, but you have not noticed that they have removed money from your wallet. This is a typical, absolutely typical, Mulroney ploy.

Mr. Brooks continues:

> This might result in provinces feeling less urgency to maintain the real value of social security payments and the federal government feeling less pressure to enact and enrich other programs to assist low-income individuals.
>
> To avoid the Adverse Macroeconomic Effects of Introducing a GST:
> A good deal of uncertainty surrounds the macroeconomic effects of introducing the GST. Although the government is predicting only a 1.25 per cent rise in the consumer price level, this estimate is based upon a number of highly optimistic assumptions: that manufacturers will pass forward tax reductions, that businesses will not attempt to increase prices to protect themselves from, or take advantage of, uncertainty relating to the effects of the tax, and that labour will be prepared to take a one-time decline in real wage rates. Under an income tax alternative, not only would all these adverse macroeconomic effects of the GST be avoided, but the rate of inflation as measured by the Consumer Price Index would decrease by more than 2 percentage points. This relative price deflation could lead to a decrease in interest rates and thus the deficit.

The calculations behind this argument are arithmetically irrevocable. One has to ask, again, if replacing the manufacturers' sales tax with a modest increase in income tax rates, as Neil Brooks suggests, is going to give the government the revenue it wants and create less distortion and not hit the poor and bring down interest rates by 2 percentage points, why is the government not taking this route insteand of taking the route of a consumption tax? Look at what Neil Brooks is saying. He rids the corporate citizenship of this manufacturers' sales tax that they do not like. He rids our exports of the tax burden that we are told is robbing us of jobs, and it is also going to bring inflation, it is going to bring down the consumer price index by 2 per cent, which should allow or in fact induce the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring down interest rates.

• (1100)

So why don't they want to do that? We have to ask this question. Why does this government opposite not want to follow a course that will bring down interest rates? Does anybody know? Can there be any explanation other than that government and the corporate citizens it represents, because they are the only ones it represents, like high interest rates because they have money to lend? Can any senator suggest a different course?

They keep asking about an alternative. I am giving you a very well calculated alternative based on the same figures they are using, produced by Neil Brooks, a great tax lawyer. Nobody has been able to sink his calculations. If they run out of arguments, all they do is say things like, "You are eating a piece of tangerine," or they scream "Be respectable." When they run out of arguments, they get on a high horse and try to be huffy and offended, but they cannot answer these important questions. Here is an alternative. You will raise the same amount of revenue. You will get rid of the ill-effects of the MST, and exports will no longer be burdened. The burden on the rich will be $300 a year, which is nothing, absolutely nothing. Maybe I'm wrong because for the rich every penny counts. The burden on the rich would be $300 a year and it would save the poor from having an extra burden placed upon them.

Why are they not accepting the Neil Brooks suggestion? They have not shot it down. The Department of Finance has not said that its calculations are wrong. The honourable senators opposite refuse to read it. Why do they refuse to read? It is because it does not go with their gut feeling that the way to do things is to soak the poor. They are afraid of a precedent which might increase, by a little, $300 a year, the taxes of someone like Senator Poitras. Nothing! A mere flea bite! They are not prepared to do it. They do not want to adopt a solution that will decrease interest rates. They do not want to adopt a solution that would decrease the consumer price index by 2 percentage points. What would that do? It would help us get out of the recession faster. No doubt about it. It would keep us from getting into a new recession. It would give us a longer breathing space between recessions, bacause the majority of businesses in this country operate on a revolving loan, and when things go bad they have to shut down because they are always on the margin.

I recently built a house and I came to know a number of subcontractors. I used them and paid them for their services. I am devastated by the number of them who have gone under. My chief contractor and several of his subcontractors have gone under. These are people I have met. They are not statistics. They are nice, good, honest workers who gave me excellent service. They have gone under. Why? Interest rates killed them. They are too high.

So, here is a solution that would reduce inflation by 2 percentage points, which would be a good inducement to reduce interest rates, if Mr. Crowe is telling the truth when he says he is keeping interest rates up because he wants to reduce inflation. But no, the Tories don't want to adopt this solution, even though it would only cost rich Tories, even rich Liberals, even rich New Democrats—and there are more of them than we think—$300 extra a year to make life just a little bit easier for a Mrs. Parkhill who is going to have to reduce her food intake because she cannot reduce her rent, reduce the heat in her apartment in the winter, and not be able to buy that necessary pair of winter boots so she can get out. No, that is not to be. I don't know why I am wasting my time making such an argument to Tories.

Mrs. Brooks says:

> A good deal of uncertainty surrounds the macroeconomic effects of introducing the GST.

The Tory government does not look at figures that in any way go against the holy precepts of Conservatism, which are essentially "Don't bug me, I'm well off. Accept. Tug your forelock, shut up, take lower wages, make maidservants out of your daughters, valets out of your sons. Lts's have servants and let's have the wages of domestics tax-deductible," as one of the senators opposite suggested to the astonishment of her colleagues on the Special Committee on Youth. Yes, one of your colleagues suggested that. What this country needs are more scullery maids, and not only should this country have more scullery maids but their wages should be tax-deductible. Part of the wages, about half the tax bracket of that particular senator, should be paid by the taxpayers in general. She can afford to pay a scullery maid on her own but, no, half of it must be paid by the taxpayer and, of course, through a consumption tax, part of the wages of that scullery maid will be paid, according to that senator, by the scullery maid. "Let us have more scullery maids. That is how to solve youth unemployment," says one of the honourable senators opposite to her colleagues on the Youth Committee.

Believe me, children don't want to be your servants; they don't want to be anybody's servants. They don't accept the corporate ethic of Monseigneur Castonguay who, when he runs out of arguments, lectures someone on this side about eating tangerines. Since when did he become an arbiter of etiquette?

You want the children of Canadian citizens to become scullery maids, and you want the tax system to pay for part of their wages. That is Tory heaven. That is what Tories think the country is all about; and if it is not the way they want it they will take their marbles and go and invest them in Mexico where workers are paid $1.49 an hour. In their great stupidity they don't understand that a worker who is paid $1.49 an hour cannot buy the product of the good corporate overlord who produces expensive products somewhere else. If they go on like that they will impoverish their customers in rich countries. It is strange to live in this day and age and see that Tory mentality, Rambonomics, are still where they wer, right in their gut. They have not changed. Marx said that the very rich are self-destructive. I had hopes that they had learned a bit, and most of the time they appear as if they had, but then came Reagan. But at least with Mr. Reagan there is the excuse that there was a time when he was handsome, I suppose, and he appeared in many B movies, once with a chimpanzee. The chimpanzee stole the show.

Senator Stanbury: Bonzo!

Senator Gigantès: Bonzo! So the Americans—and we imitate them—go and elect the acolyte of Bonzo as president. We imitated them.

Senator Hébert: We elect Bonzo.

Senator Gigantès: We elect an Irish Bonzo, a dreadful vulgarian who oozes—I must find another word besides charm—smarm from every pore and oils his way across the floor. That's what we do. This is very alarming. The good corporate citizens opposite have brought the media communications. If you think that the CBC would have lasted many more terms under the Tory government, you are wrong. They want media they own. You don't lay down the lines too strongly if you own a particular newspaper or radio or TV station; you just don't hire the people who don't think as you do. The corporate citizens who owned the Globe and Mail got tired of having that obstreperous, stubborn, difficult, opinionated man across the way who ran an honest newspaper, and they replaced him with one of their own, a dinosaur, and they are spoiling a paper. This is what is so worrisome. The power of manipulation of television with the absolutely enormous admirable public oration skills of some senators opposite are putting democracy in danger.

Look at the last election campaign in the United States in 1988. At the end of the election did we know what the positions of either candidate were? No, we did not. From both sides all we were fed was a collection of scurrilous, vicious ad hominem attacks concocted by the manipulators of the media, who also own all those private stations and on which they can put anything they want so that they confuse the public. They attain power to make the daughters of citizens who are not corporate citizens into scullery maids on tax-deductible wages. This is basically in their guts. This is where they come from. This is the kind of people they are across the way, amd I don't want any questions. I am in full fight now. When I want a question I will let you know.

The next subheading in Mr. Brooks' report is "To Avoid the Administrative and Compliance Costs of Implementing the GST".

Senator Teed: He said he was in full flight!

Senator Gigantès: You have not heard anything yet, Senator Teed. I will be going on for days unless Mr. MacEachen forbids me. So if you dislike this, ask him about it.

Senator Simard: It is a good time to adjourn.

Senator Gigantès: It is a good time to adjourn?

Senator Corbin: Senator Gigantès, may I ask you a pertinent question?

Senator Simard: He said no questions.

Senator Corbin: You said you would remain in full flight for days, or words to that effect, unless Mr. MacEachen forbids you. Have you considered the possibility of a coup, a putch, or some intervention by members on the other side which would have the effect of preventing you from continuing your remarks? What would you do in those circumstances?

Senator Gigantès: I would not be surprised. After all, they have established the principle that the referee picks up the ball and runs over the goal vine and scores a touchdown for one of the teams. This is, in effect, what they did.

Senator Stanbury: Several times.

Senator Gigantès: Several times. Let us remember, it was a perfectly understood rule and tradition that no vote would take place in the Senate—I see Senator Simard is itching to intervene and I will so enjoy it, bless his heart. The ringing of the bells simply signals that there will be a vote. The time of the vote is the time fixed by the two whips. That was the principele. That was the rule. Rules can be changed by agreement. They were in the other house, not by a coup. The Liberal Speaker in the other house, as we saw yesterday—

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honorable Senators, I would like to remind this chamber, if I may, that liberal Senator Gigantès has told and promised us a moment ago he would not entertain any more questions. Even in the Opposition, he and his party break their promises every day. He just told us he would not accept any more questions. And within five seconds, Senator Corbin stood up, started another flight of oratory precisely to break a promise and try to answer the question.

Senator Corbin: He said he would answer any bright question.

Senator Simard: Maybe so. I said and I want to keep my promise that I would never ask you any question.

I make a statement. I hope the new editors, who are also ex editors of "Cité Libre" will want to publish this statement in their next issue, which Senator Hébert is so proud of by the way. I remind you, for the record, that the only thing mentioned in today's newspapers about Senator's Gigantès 24 hours long speech is the fact that he did not go to pee! Of course, the newspapers could not mention the alternatives to GST proposed by the Liberal Party. There are not any. Senator Gigantès, like all his old colleagues, has also mentioned some alternatives suggested par Dr Woods. So far, and it is 11:20, Friday morning, after more than 24 hours listening to Senator Gigantès' remarks, the Grits have not come forward with any alternative to the GST. They do not have any position on the subject, and they do not have any position on almost anything for that matter. That is why we look so much forward to next Tuesday, when Jean Chrétien, surely newly elected in Beauséjour, will want to start letting Canadians know what his alternatives and propositions are. We wish it. We are anxious to see him do it.

But the point I wanted to make is that Senator Gigantès has failed to convince the press that he really had something to say. The only thing they remember is that he did not go to the toilet or that he might have gone at 11 o'clock yesterday morning. Even on that point, the press does not agree. Senator Gigantès, I ask you to take advantage of the 30 minutes you have left to tell us what is the position of the Liberal Party regarding the alternatives to the GST, the timetable, etc. I wish you good luck. I wish you will survive these ill-assorted and inconsistent remarks. He has tried to cover almost every aspect of life, from literature to military strategy, to taxation. He has said nothing that could let us know whether he is for or against the GST, to which extent and above all, the alternatives. Good luck, Senator Gigantès, that is all I can wish you this morning.

Senator Gigantès: That is very kind of you. I accept these wishes. I have not read the newspapers yet, but I suppose one of the reasons why they only mention that I did not pee for 17 hours and 45 minutes is that it really takes a miracle to be able to listen to some of your remarks and not pee.

• (1120)

[English]

He started it. I was not saying anything. He started it. He brought the issue up. As I told all of you yesterday, if you give me a shot, you will get one right back—and I am not sexist at all; whatever the sex on the other side, give me a shot and you will get one back in the mouth. I can take them. I love taking them. But I give them right back. I enjoy the fight; I really do.

I thought all this morning I was explaining an alternative, but I must summarize because Senator Simard wants me to give a Liberal Party position on the GST. We have two more years to go.

Senator Simard: An alternative, an official alternative.

Senator Gigantès: We have two more years to go between now and the election.

Senator Stanbury: Terrible years!

Senator Gigantès: Two terrible years. We do not know what the circumstances are going to be, and the degree of the catastrophe; nevertheless, I am prepared to give you an alternative, and I am prepared to bet good money that the main features of what I will propose will be in the Liberal Party policy platform for the election in Canada two years from now, if you have not destroyed the country between now and then.

Senator Stanbury: They have already destroyed it.

Senator Gigantès: Well, if they do not totally, finally destroy it, and if Quebec has not walked out in despair over the incompetence of the people opposite. That is an underlying factor. They seem to like Mr. Mulroney, but they see the place going to pieces. They see terrible abuses of policy and a terrible lack of intelligence.

So what is the purpose of a tax reform? It should be fair. It should collect money. We should put an end to the deficit, if possible, and we should also reduce the debt as soon as possible as a percentage of the gross domestic product. We should therefore make the gross domestic product increase at a faster rate.

The first thing that I can tell you is that this goods and services tax will be wiped out by the Liberal Party when it comes to power. You want policy? I promise you this. It is unequivocal.

The next priority for the Liberal Party after it comes to power will be to move towards a full employment policy. Every unemployed person in this country costs the society exactly as much as that unemployed person received from his or her employer when he or she was working. When these people were working and receiving $15,640 a year on average—these are the 1989 figures—they were producing $15,640 worth of goods and services. That is what it means. You are paid for what you produce and that $15,640 of goods and services is an addition to the gross domestic product—in other words, an addition to the tax base that does not now exist. What we are now doing is paying all these unemployed people the same amount of money they were paid when they were working, and we are paying them to do nothing.

So our first movement will be towards full employment. If you want to know exactly how that can be done, read my book. If you do not want to read it, I will read it for you on tape and give you the tape. Of course, you will say it is a bad book. You do not know. You have not looked at it. I will make an exception for you, Senator Simard. Authors do not like to give copies of their books free. Publishers do not like it when we give copies of our books free, but I will go to a bookstore and I will buy a copy of my book—at full price, so that my publisher does not mind—and I will give you the copy.

Senator Simard: Do you want to ruin my vacation, my Christmas holidays? Wait for January after the GST goes through, and perhaps we will think about it.

Senator Gigantès: So we will abolish the GST and we will institute a full employment policy. A full employment policy will give increases in revenue to the government sufficient to stop it being in a deficit position. Those are the two basic pillars of the Liberal economic policy in the next Liberal administration.

• (1130)

Hon. Paul David: Senator Gigantès, may I ask you what your scheme is for full employment. What is your policy? Do you mean that you will put everybody on construction at the expense of the government? Who will pay for that, and what is the scheme?

Senator Gigantès: You are an incredible lot. You tell us that we have no alternatives to offer, nothing to suggest. I take the trouble to put my vocal cords at risk and read to you in detail precisely how a full-employment policy would be implemented.

I told you that the proposals I was making had been studied by the Economic Council of Canada, and by Informetrica. Both are reputable think-tanks. The Economic Council of Canada is funded by the government and run by an appointee of Mr. Mulroney, Mrs. Judith Maxwell. In her latest report to the Economic Council of Canada she adopted my basic thesis, which is that we absolutely cannot do away with the deficit and thus eventually do away with the debt if we do not have a full-employment policy. She adopted my main comparative argument, which is that the countries that have a full-employment policy do best in terms of reducing the deficit by reducing unemployment and thus reducing the debt. It is a long argument. We are talking about a 200-page book. In this session I have only some 30 minutes left. I cannot read the whole book.

You senators opposite accuse us of not having alternatives. When I give an alternative, you will not listen. This, of course, is typical manipulation of the facts. You do not want to hear whether or not we have an alternative. In fact, you prefer not to hear our alternatives because all you want to do is parrot the lines, which is effective from the point of view of cheap publicity and effective within an overworked press that does not have the time to inform itself sufficiently. We do have alternatives. Read a little. It does not do any harm. Reading is not bad for you.

How a full-employment policy can be implemented in this country and at the same time be used to improve the skills of our working force and train young people to escape the jobs they have and go to better jobs is contained in my book in detail. For God's sake read it! If you do not read it, do not tell me I have not given you the details. It is your fault.

Senator Simard: It is too bad Trudeau did not have those policies in his years when inflation and unemployment were at double-digit figures. Did Mr. Trudeau have those policies? Did he put them into practice?

Senator Gigantès: No. I had not worked them out yet.

Senator Simard: Is this a new invention?

Senator Gigantès: It is not a new invention. Others have thought of it.

Senator Simard: Is it the product of a fertile imagination?

Senator Gigantès: It is not a fertile imagination, it is arithmetic. Of course, when you were Minister of Finance of New Brunswick you demonstrated that arithmetic was not one of your favourite subjects. When you were Minister of Finance you demonstrated that you were not capable without the help of people such as Senator Corbin who was then a Liberal member of Parliament from New Brunswick. You could not make both ends meet without help from the federal government, which was Liberal.

All I am pointing out is that you ask a question, you are given the answer and then you say that you have not been given an answer. It reminds me of a particular comedy in which there was a boxer who was not particularly good. He was going into the ring with another boxer who was clobbering him with left hooks, and he was saying, "He does not have a left jab." I have given you the answer and you do not want to hear it because all you want to do, because it is easier and the press is lazy or overworked, is to say that we do not have an alternative. We do have an alternative, but you do not want to hear it.

I will continue with the alternatives. First, abolish the GST. Second, install a full-employment policy. There are many foreign models of how it can be done. All countries with a full-employment policy do well. This is typical know-nothing Tory behaviour. It does not suit them to listen, because if they listen they will perhaps feel a tiny smidgen more uncomfortable about lying as to what alternatives we have. Like Senator Poitras, it is much easier not to listen.

Senator Hébert: Senator David asked you a question and then he does not listen.

Senator Gigantès: Senator David asked me a question about full employment. For hours I read the details of exactly what that is, but they do not want to hear.

After those two principal features of a future Liberal economic policy for this country—that is, abolish the consumption tax, the GST, and concentrate on full-employment measures—we will then look at tax reform. Tax reform should and will feature corporate tax profits at the same level as those in the United States—not below, as they are here. They will feature graduated income taxes slightly higher than those we presently have here, and they will be lowered as the deficit is lowered. There you have it in full detail, and I bet that will be found in the Liberal platform. I will now repeat it in French for those of you who do not understand my accent in English. Perhaps you will not understand my accent in French either.

[Translation]

So I bet you the economic policy of the next liberal government will be as follows. If Canada still exists in two years, if you do not have destroyed it until then, I do not know.

See, you do not want to listen. You ask questions and you do not want answers. You want to go on parrotting and repeating these slogans which the incompetent apprentice sorcerer who is the leader of the government whispers into you hears, this fellow who destroyed the Meech Lake Accord, him and his chief, because of their incompetence and their stupidity . . .

Senator Simard: What are you drinking now?

Senator Gigantès: Only water, my dear friend. I leave those strong drinks to your colleagues on the other side. And you have plenty of drunkards on your side. As for yourself, I would ask you to go sniff at truffles. To give you a break!

Senator Simard: I will read you a letter which most of the senators have received. It is dated October 17 and could not be more current. It relates much more to the TPS than those remarks of Senator Gigantès about Meech Lake, the debt of the Liberal Party and his future policies in an eventual liberal government in 2015. It is really current. It is an urgent letter sent to all Sears' customers. It is signed by W.J. Hilton.

[English]

Dear Customer:

As we prepare to send you this catalogue, legislation for the proposed Goods and Services Tax is still before the Senate. No one knows for certain if it will become law. If it does not, the existing Federal Sales Tax . . . will remain in force.

This presents us with a problem!

The selling prices of many items in this book have already been reduced by the identified amount of Federal Sales Tax (see page three).

Senator Buckwold, I thought you would like this line. I will repeat it for you.

The selling prices of many items in this book have already been reduced by the identified amount of Federal Sales Tax . . .

If the FST is not eliminated—

Senator Buckwold: I have a question. Did the senator say "many items" or "all items"?

Senator Simard: I said "many items".

Senator Buckwold: "Many items"—we always said there would be many items reduced. I just wanted Senator Simard to know that all items will not be reduced.

Senator Simard: I did not write this letter. It goes on to state:

If the FST is not eliminated on January 1, the cost of these items to Sears will be increased accordingly and the selling prices printed in the catalogue will have to be adjusted. Of course if that happens, it will also mean the 7% GST will not be added to the selling price.

We'll make every attempt to ensure that you are notified of any price increase when you place your order and hope you will bear with us as we try to cope with this uncertain situation.

That letter was written a few weeks ago. We have now completed the first week of December. We are three weeks away from January 1. I think that senators opposite have shown much irresponsibility over the last three months.

Senator Stanbury: Who has?

Senator Simard: Canadians hope that you will come to your senses soon and allow this house to vote.

Senator Hébert: What is the question?

Senator Kenny: What is the question?

Senator Simard: This is a further demonstration of Liberal irresponsibility that we have been subjected to over the last couple of days by Senator Gigantès. If this is not filibustering, boy, I don't know what is. Senators opposite have already delayed the sending of cheques to Canadians—

Senator Corbin: What cheques?

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: The first instalment of the refundable tax credit. That means $80 million for New Brunswick alone, and this is just before the Christmas season.

I hope that senators opposite will allow us to vote. I, for one, am prepared to sit until January 1, but that will not be good enough for the people who wrote this letter and their customers, as well as people who are expecting their cheques. Why does Senator Gigantès not put an end to his foolishness and tell his colleagues to do the same?

Senator Kenny: Is that the question?

Senator Gigantès: Is that the question? Are you asking why I do not put an end to my foolishness? Is that the question?

Senator Simard: That is the first question I am going to ask.

Senator Gigantès: I will wait for the other one.

Senator Simard: The other one is: Why don't you come to your senses?

Senator Stanbury: That is our question to you.

Senator Simard: Please save this house from—

Senator Gigantès: Please what?

Senator Simard: Save this house . . .

[Translation]

Please save this house from promises about policies of a future government, hypothetical in 2000 or 2015. And since Senator Gigantès tells us he has alternatives today, are they the results of a recent study or did he own the truth when he was writing Mr Trudeau's speeches? Or did M. Trudeau himself not rejected Senator Gigantès' theories? But if someone lives in the past, it is Senator Gigantès, whose sole reason to live, whose sole reason to continue his debates in the house is to praise a guy who precisely represents the past, Mr. Trudeau.

Senator Corbin, I ask you to think about that over the week end.

Senator Corbin: I can think about it now if you want to get back to your seat. But I will not do it because it would be considered as a speech and I intend to do that later on.

[English]

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have the floor. If any senator wants to intervene, please ask for my permission. Otherwise, senators opposite will say that I am relinquishing the floor. I do not want to lose my place, because I have several more days in which to tell Tories how terrible they are. Please proceed, Senator Buckwold. I still have the floor.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I am asking the Speaker if it is all right if I correct one of the statements made by Senator Simard.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: First Senator Gigantès must approve. He has the floor.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I have approved an intervention by Senator Buckwold. I will then approve an intervention from Senator Corbin.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On a point of order, our rules state that if a senator misquotes another senator, the misquoted senator has the right to re-establish the facts on the record. If that is what Senator Buckwold intends to do, he is perfectly in order, in my opinion.

Senator Buckwold: I did not want in any way to interfere or possibly disrupt the important message being passed on by Senator Gigantès—one that I think we want to listen to with great care.

I wanted to correct an impression made by Senator Simard, because I see that we have a lone reporter sitting in the gallery and I do not want a statement to go out to the effect that Sears has suddenly reduced its prices by the amount of the present manufactures' sales tax. What they have said is that they have adjusted their prices to reflect the removal of the federal sales tax where applicable and then, in very small print, and in a very low voice, Senator Simard said that 7 per cent will be added to the price.

Everyone agrees that there will be some price reductions, but—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: "Many", not "some".

Senator Buckwold: Yes, many price reductions before the tax is added, sure. But the end result of what the consumer has to put into his pocket or take out of his pocket, is that he is going to be paying more. You check the Sears catalogue and you will find—

Senator Simard: Which page?

Senator Buckwold: Any page you want to read, but get the one with the big print. Let us say that you go to the ladies' underwear, a very interesting department.

Senator Gigantès: I am sure the ladies would object, though.

Senator Buckwold: No, I am going to say one thing about ladies' underwear—it is not coming down, it is going up. Because there is no manufacturers' sales tax on ladies clothing at the present time, there is nothing to bring it down. Anything that is not taxed, and that is a large number of items in the Sears catalogue, will go up, not down, when you add the 7 per cent. We have already been told that the price of clothing, children's wear, footwear, will go up. This will happen to a lot of things.

• (1150)

I just wanted to make it clear so that we do not get a story in the press that Senator Simard, that great authority on the GST, is saying that Sears are reducing prices and the Senate, by delaying, is costing consumers money. That is nonsense. There will be some price reductions, but except for a few big-ticket items the consumer will be paying more. That is why the Government itself says there will be an inflationary factor in the GST.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators—

Senator Gigantès: No, no. You have to ask me. Sit down, Senator Simard. I have the floor. You do not have the floor. I will give you the floor if you ask me.

Senator Simard: May I have the floor?

Senator Gigantès: Yes, certainly, you can have the floor.

Senator Simard: You see all the things we have to do to get our message to people. I have to seek the permission of Senator Gigantès even after I have received the permission of Senator Corbin. I wish you guys would get together.

Senator Corbin: Do you want another point of order, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Give me two minutes.

Senator Corbin: Now or later? I suggest that you are interrupting Senator Gigantès' speech, and nothing else. You are not contributing anything at all to the Debate. Why not just sit down and listen to Senator Gigantès?

Senator Simard: That is a very subjective statement but that is another thing.

Senator Buckwold, you say that by and large items in the Sears catalogue and others will go up in price. Some will go down, some will go up, but generally, you say they will go up.

Senator Buckwold: When you add the tax to the posted price the end result will be a higher price.

Senator Simard: I accept that. I think I heard you right. What I do not accept is this. Last week you were very happy to quote a document by the Department of Finance saying that three provinces would be paying less taxes and seven would be paying more, or vice versa. Did you read that statement?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Senator Simard: You were happy to read that statement?

Senator Buckwold: Right.

Senator Simard: It demonstrated that the tax was revenue neutral. Right. So if it is revenue neutral, and we know the old tax was on products and now is applied to goods and services, how can your statement be true? On the one hand you say it is revenue neutral; and on the other, since we are adding services as taxable items, that must mean the price of goods will come down. How do you reconcile these two statements?

Senator Buckwold: Senator Simard, you sat on that committee and although you and I did not always agree, I always said that you were very intelligent and observant and understood what went on, although you did not always express it that way.

The fact is there are many other aspects to the net revenue results of the GST. The cost of inventory rebates is in the millions of dollars. The cost of running the system will be hundreds of millions of dollars. There is the employment of three or four thousand extra people. The cost of promoting the tax. The net result is in the first year it is revenue neutral, but believe me, many people think it will be higher. The Government itself says, and I dispute this figure, that the inflationary factor will be 1.25 per cent. You say it is zero. Labour economists say it is 3 to 3.5 per cent.

You are basing your conclusion of revenue neutrality on the fact that everyone will drop their prices to the full extent of the present manufacturers' sales tax. You know that is not the case. As a wholesale merchant I know that is not the case. I can say right here it is not likely that our company is going to reduce its prices fully when the government is only going to pay us 8.1 per cent instead of the 13.5 per cent as a rebate for the sales tax we pay.

All I am saying is that the premise that all prices are suddenly going to drop to the full extent, to the last decimal point, and be reflected in the final selling price is just inaccurate. Most people in business know this.

The second aspect, and we have talked about this before, is the inflationary effect of labour. I have read about some labour contracts which already have built into them the effects of the GST on prices, and that will mean higher wages.

When you add the two together, no economist says prices will not go up. The argument is simply about how much, and that is the answer I have for you.

Senator Simard: Let me try something—

Senator Gigantès: No, you have to ask me for permission to talk to him.

Senator Simard: Then I would like to adjourn the debate.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have concluded my point of order.

MOTION FOR THIRD READING—DEBATE RESUMED

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will promise that I will make an attempt on Monday to come back to this issue. However, I would like to point out that we have heard today Senator Simard and Senator David asking what is the Liberal alternative to the GST. How would we achieve full employment?

I want to point out that I have covered those issues in full detail. I have read the documents and given all the numbers. I told them what the documents are. In a sort of fit of incredible generosity I even promised to buy a copy of my book in a bookstore and give it to Senator Simard so he can see in detail, with all the costs, how full employment can be implemented. Adopting a full employment policy, as the Economic Council of Canada now says, finally following my suggestion, is the only way to reduce the deficit and the debt in the long run.

• (1200)

What the demonstration made today by the Tories proves is that they do not want to hear that there is a Liberal alternative, because they want to go on parroting their propaganda line that there is not. And when they ask, "do you have an alternative?" and you tell them the alternative, they then say, "So you do not have an alternative." That is infantile behaviour. Maybe I can understand and forgive that on the part of Senator Simard, but on the part of Senator David, a man of science, I find it peculiar.

Some Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Gigantès: I have not finished yet. Anytime now we are going to adjourn. I would like to wish you all a happy and restful weekend. I know that I have a very difficult task to perform on Monday, because after three attempts I cannot manage to get some obvious facts into your comprehension. Maybe you understand; maybe what you are doing is dishonest propaganda. As I said, from Senator Simard that does not surprise me, but from Senator David it shocks me, because this is a man of science whom we all respect. It truly shocks me, sir, that you parrot the inane phrenological statements of the gentleman on your left.

I can understand that Senator Poitras does not want to listen, because he is one of those whom I call, not a Canadian citizen, but a corporate citizen.

After Monday, I hope the press listens. There is a Liberal alternative. We give the Liberal alternative and you keep parroting that there is not one.

Thank you very much. See you Monday.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, pursuant to provisional rule P-2, and the unanimous consent given yesterday to move such a motion on this day, December 7, after 12 noon—

Senator MacEachen: Are you going to move, "I see strangers", or are you going to move one of the others?

Senator Frith: I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to the order adopted yesterday, which Senator Frith moves, seconded by Senator Doody, which is, that the Senate do now adjourn. The Senate is now accordingly suspended until Monday, December 10 at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until Monday, December 10, 1990, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, November 29, 1990

[Editor's Note: Continuation of proceedings from Issue No. 115 M.]

The sitting of the Senate was resumed at 2:10 p.m., Monday, December 10, 1990, the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT MOTION WITHDRAWN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on Friday I moved a motion under Rule P-2, which provides for the senator moving a motion to withdraw it on the Monday when the sitting is resumed, and I do so.

PRIVILEGE

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

Honourable senators, as reported in the press, it seems that remarks made by myself and my seatmate, Senator van Roggen, did not meet with the approval of many, or of some, and certainly I stand to express an apology if anything that was said by myself or Senator van Roggen offended anyone who heard or read what was said.

I want to say quite clearly that nothing was meant to offend anyone. If any person was offended, I personally apologize, and I have been authorized by Senator van Roggen to apologize on his behalf. He feels as badly as I do that objection was taken to what was said.

THE LATE HONOURABLE HENRY D. HICKS

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I rise with great sadness to record the death on the weekend of our former colleague, The Honourable Henry Hicks.

Nine months ago we honoured Henry Hicks on the occasion of his 75th birthday and his retirement from the Senate. We saw him off to a retirement which we were confident would be long, happy and productive. He was in good health and spirits. He had lost none of his intellectual vigour. He had years ahead of him to pursue his various avocations and the hobbies which he enjoyed, and he had just married again. All of us rejoiced in the good fortune and the agreeable future that seemed to be his, and we shared his obvious happiness and good humour.

The end came yesterday—suddenly, tragically and cruelly. Both Henry and his wife, Rosalie, were killed in an automobile accident in Nova Scotia, their life together in retirement cut short. Our sympathy goes out to their families in their great loss at this time of shock and sadness.

Our former colleague was, as some of us noted in the tributes we paid to him last February, a man of many parts: Rhodes scholar, soldier, minister of the Crown, Premier, Leader of the Liberal Party of Nova Scotia, President of Dalhousie University, and member of the Senate for 18 years. His career has been unmatched by anyone in our lifetime. Henry Hicks leaves behind a respected name, a host of friends and a brilliant example of public service for future generations of Nova Scotians and Canadians to admire and try to emulate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is with sadness that I rise to pay my respects to the memory of our late friend and former colleague, the Honourable Henry Hicks. As Senator Murray said, we did pay tribute to him and recounted in detail his career on February 21 of this year. At that time we recounted his diversified career in law, politics, education, in the provincial assembly and in the Senate of Canada. But I think we dealt particularly with his lively personality and interest in life, which he expressed in a number of ways, including that of cabinetmaking and the hobby, if one might call it that, of philately. He was one of the foremost philatelists in this country and had built up some valuable collections which he disposed of at a profit, and we used to amuse ourselves in reminding Henry of that.

On that occasion, after having recounted his career, I said:

> Honourable senators, that is all I want to say, except to wish Senator Hicks many years of happiness and long life. As we know, Henry was recently married and we are glad to see his new wife in the gallery today. We wish both of them much happiness and long life.

Well, I think the events of yesterday show to all of us how precarious our grip is upon this life and how impossible it is to predict with any certainty the future of anyone's happiness. I certainly was greatly shocked to be told last evening that Henry and his wife had been killed in a road accident. Like Senator Murray, I want to extend to his family—his brother, who lives in Ottawa, and his children—my condolences. To the family of his late wife I also extend my condolences.

Hon. John Buchanan: Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, I rise to join with Senator Murray and Senator MacEachen in expressing my deep sympathy at the passing of Senator Henry Hicks and his wife, Rosalie, known by all of her friends simply as "Hummie". I found out about this tragedy yesterday in speaking to mutual friends of ours in the Annapolis Valley, where Henry and Hummie had been visiting yesterday afternoon. Within a matter of three or four hours, my wife was speaking to those people and found out about the highway accident.

I knew Henry Hicks very well for over 25 years. Although of different political persuasions, we were always very close friends. For over 20 years, I suppose, there would not have been a week that I did not speak to Henry. He had a permanent parking spot in the Province House lot and he would either be in speaking to myself or someone else. Or, as Senator MacEachen said, he might be in speaking with our provincial driver, Jack Wheatley, trading stamps in their respected collections.

Henry Hicks was an interesting man. As Senator Murray has said, he was a lawyer, a soldier, an MLA, a cabinet minister, Premier of Nova Scotia, a member of the Senate of Canada, an educator—what a variety in a career spanning well over 50 years.

Thus, I stand this afternoon to express deep sympathy on behalf of myself and other members of this chamber on the tragic death of an outstanding Nova Scotian and his dear wife.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I had the honour to be summoned to this chamber on the same day as the late Senator Hicks, that being April 27, 1972. In fact, I was sworn into the Senate on the same day as Henry, as he was called by everyone who knew him well, along with the Honourable George McIlraith and the late Senator Margaret Norrie.

Henry was my friend and colleague. For a time he was my leader, my premier, and, indeed, on occasion, he was my mentor.

One thing about Senator Hicks was that no matter how tough or complicated the issue, he had an opinion, as we all know, and he voiced it, even if he knew he was in the lonely minority. He never avoided the tough decisions. We always knew where he stood. He was one of the most perceptive individuals I have ever known. He was naturally inquisitive. He was always on the hunt for new information, whether it had to do with general knowledge or a specific topic of world significance and importance or, indeed, just a tidbit.

Henry Hicks was an enthusiastic debater. He was partisan in politics but not necessarily partisan on the big issues. He was a man of great commonsense, and the common good was always his first priority. He had a great sense of humour. His loud chuckles will probably echo and re-echo in these corridors for a long time to come.

Henry's record as a member of the armed forces in World War II, as an educator, as a university president, as a minister, as a leader, as a premier, and as a senator are well documented. His death and that of his wife, Hummie, and, indeed, the two other deaths which occurred as a result of this tragic accident yesterday, cause us much sadness, in this chamber and indeed in Nova Scotia and in many areas of the country. I join with all honourable senators in extending to all concerned an expression of deep regret.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I want to associate myself with the remarks made by Senators Murray and MacEachen, as followed by Senators Buchanan and Graham. There is not much that remains to be said. However, I have two or three points that I would like to make.

I think everyone recognized that Senator Henry Hicks was a man of extraordinary ability. He had the political misfortune to come to the premiership of Nova Scotia just when the fortunes of the Liberal Party were ebbing, and ebbing fast. There were those who said that this was a great misfortune for the province. On the other hand, his departure from provincial politics meant that he was available to become, first, Dean of Arts and Science at Dalhousie University, and then President of that university. What was politics' loss was great gain fro higher education in Nova Scotia. I remember talking to some friends who are on the faculty of that university. They said quite candidly that they had been appalled when Henry Hicks was appointed president, but that they had had to withdraw all the expressions of uncertainty that they had uttered, because he turned out to be an unusually good president. In fact, they referred to him as a great president of the university, a man who laid the foundation for a revival of the university in the latter part of this century, and, indeed, the foundation for a great future in the coming century.

As Senator Graham has said, Henry Hicks was a man of strong opinions. He was always prepared to share his opinions. What I found delightful about him was that after the argument was over, if he felt he had not come out all that well, he was prepared to say so. It was a most attractive quality. It bespoke the greatness of the man.

Henry Hicks was a man of sound understanding, a kind of old-fashioned understanding of the principles of constitutional government. He was prepared to explain his views whenever the occasion presented itself. I do not think there is any question that the people of Nova Scotia, regardless of their political persuasion, will agree that his death is a tragedy and a great loss.

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION FOR THIRD READING—MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, because of Senator Hicks' death, I do not have my heart in this debate. Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Frith:

That, pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3(a), the debate on which I was speaking be now adjourned.

The Hon. The Speaker: It was moved by Senator Gigantès, seconded by Senator Frith:

That pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3(a), the debate be now adjourned.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those opposed to the motion please say nay?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And two senators having risen.

DIVISION DEFERRED

Hon. William J. Petten: Pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3(a), I request that the division be deferred until 5:45 p.m. on the next sitting day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the division is deferred until tomorrow at 5:45 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, today, December 10, is the International Day for Human Rights. It was on December 10, 1948, that the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights—-

Senator Frith: Honourable senator, I want to hear what you are saying; take as long as you like, but I just wonder if the senator is rising on just other business, on a point of privilege or—

Senator Kinsella: A question of privilege. I wish to present to honourable senators a distinguished Canadian in the gallery.

Honourable senators, it was on this day in 1948 when the General Assembly of the United Nations adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, an instrument described by some as the international Magna Carta of all mankind, a common standard of achievement, by reference to which the conduct of governments can and will be judged. Honourable senators, a distinguished Canadian was the architect of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and that Canadian was Professor John Humphrey, who, honourable senators, I am delighted to be able to advise you now sits in the gallery.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I rise simply to remind you that when a division is requested pursuant to Provisional Rule P-3.(a), the Senate shall proceed to consider other regular business. I presume, therefore, your Honour will call for the next order.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-39, An Act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be now read the third time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

COPYRIGHT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Gigantès, for the third reading of the Bill S-8, An Act to amend the Copyright Act.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to speak on this order. Senator Marsden, who is not here yet, I am sure thought I would never get around to doing so.

Honourable senators will remember that this order dealing with Bill S-8, which honourable senators will find in their desks, has to be understood in the context of the amendments to the Copyright Act that were proposed by this government. Those amendments deal particularly with the question of creative rights which, although existing for many years, had not been enforced. In particular, I am referring to the rights of authors, painters and other creative artists.

As previous debates on this bill and this order demonstrate, as recorded in the Debates of the Senate, there is no doubt that the reform that was introduced by this government to the Copyright Act was long overdue.

Honourable senators, just to summarize, the context is as follows: although the creative rights for example of an author have existed for many years, they were seriously affected by the arrival of the widespread ability to copy. We now take for granted the ability to make numerous copies of any document that comes into our hands. In fact, for many years in our own offices, and certainly in our schools, commercial offices and industrial offices, there was a device that used to print copies called a Gestetner; then there was mimeographing and then, of course, photocopying.

The arrival of photocopying, with all the advantage it represented over and above the ability to copy as it then existed was a revolution and, in fact, illustrated the principles of Alvin Toffler's, Future Shock.

Of course, it takes time for technology to settle in and for society to adapt to such an advance in the technological revolution. I am always struck by the point made by Mr. McLuhan in his book The Gutenberg Galaxy, when he pointed out that when Gutenberg invented the printing press, he did not understand the revolution that he was launching because, as McLuhan says, we tend to go through life, and society tends to advance by looking at its progress in a rearview mirror. It sees what was, and not the dimension of what might lie ahead.

Gutenberg invented the printing press to solve a particular problem. The problem he was solving was the fact that monks copying out the Bible and other scriptures had to each copy the introduction, those beautiful forms that we see—and there is a word for that. What is the word for the beautiful coloured writing you see when you open a very old Bible?

Senator Kinsella: Illuminations.

Senator Frith: Illuminations, thank you. Each illumination had to be copied by one monk, and if several copies were required, they had to be made by several monks, or the same monk had to copy the same illumination over and over again. In order to solve that problem, Gutenberg came up with the idea of making a copy—what today would be called an offset—of the illumination and, of course, all the calligraphy that went into the whole book, thereby saving the monks from the chore of doing it over and over again.

• (1430)

What Gutenberg did not realize, of course, is that he was creating a total revolution in human communications. This led to the publishing industry, newspapers, and everything else that today we take for granted. Therefore, copyright, an English word that is easily understood as the right to copy, became what is known as intellectual property. In French it is les droits d'auteur, which is equally explicit and articulate and would, of course, translate literally as "the right of the author".

I do not want to go into the history of how copyright developed but it did develop in a system analogous to the principle behind all inventions and creativity, namely, that the state should protect the rights of creators for a certain period of time in order to encourage creativity. That is the concept behind patent law, which is there to encourage inventors to invent products or devices which will benefit society. In exchange, society says to the inventor that it will allow him or her a period of 50 years, as the case may be, of protection during which they will have the sole right to produce this invention or license its production. The same applies to the copyright inherent in a painting, in a story, or in print, and those of you who have had anything to do with copyright law will know that the basic principle is that the right is in the text and not in the idea. In the same way, the right of an invention is in the actual specifications or particulars that describe it rather than in the article itself.

Let us jump ahead a number of centuries to the advance of copying ability through Xerox and other copying devices, and see what the position is from the point of view of an author. If I had been an author before photocopying came about, I would have had some protection because it was difficult at that time for people to make copies. If I wrote a book, I assigned the copyright to a publisher, and the publisher paid me so much per copy sold for that copyright. While it is true that people could make copies of that book before photocopying came along, it was a pretty messy business. Someone could sit at a typewriter and copy it out, but how would he make copies? He would have to have done it in the same way as was done when I first started practicing law, namely by using carbon paper.

At that time, if you wanted to change the wording of a statement of claim, or a deed, or something of that kind, you had to retype the whole thing. We had nothing like the kind of production we have today where you use a mouse on the computer and just wipe out the part you do not want.

So if I had been an author and I had written a book or any other printed article before photocopying came along, I wpi;d have had a pretty good idea that my rights would be protected. Yes, they could have been infringed, but at that time it was a lot of trouble to copy things by making carbons. As well, many of you will remember the Gestetner method when you would wind up with blue ink all over your fingers if you were trying to make copies of things. It was generally a messy and very difficult business.

Then all of a sudden, along comes photocopying and the advancement of photocopying machines. People can now take my book which has been published—and for which, admittedly, I have received some payment—opened it up and reproduced it—not type it out but reproduce it by making photocopies of the exact wording and the exact page from the book published by the publisher to whom I gave my copyright and who is paying me. For what is he paying me? For the sale of the book. He is not paying me for photocopies that are being made all over the place.

Suddenly this photocopying is happening all over the place. People can do it in their homes if they have photocopiers. It is done in schools, it is done in office towers; it is done everywhere. Of course, in every instance that that was done, there was an infringement on my copyright.

What, then, is my recourse as an author? I could try and chase down everyone who tried to photocopy my work and, if I could find them, I could take legal action to enforce my copyright. That could be done to any of us. I doubt whether there is a single person in the Senate today, and perhaps very few above the age of 15 in the city of Ottawa or in the country of Canada, who have not at some time infringed on copyright by making a photocopy of a protected work. My only recourse as an author was—and is—to try and track all of these millions of people down and tell them they owe me three cents or four cents or something for my copyright.

What, then, of the composers of songs and the people who write the words for songs? They have protection. Why? Because they were faced with the same problem years and years ago. We read today about the problems between great composers, Mozart and others, and their publishers, but the copyright was understood and the copies were made by the publishers.

● (1440)

Of course, hit songs became an important part of our life. Perhaps not many of you are as old as I am, but I remember when the most successful and widespread method of distributing songs—and let us just stick to popular songs—was through music publishers. Honourable senators may remember that, around the old piano, there was always what was called sheet music. The sheet music was put together by a music publisher who had his or her stable of songwriters. For example, a man like Irving Berlin would have had no protection for his compositions without publishers.

So was born what became known as the greatest friend ever to musical composers and songwriters, ASCAP, which stands for the American Society for Composers, Authors and Publishers. If you were a songwriter, you would join ASCAP. The publisher was a member, as you were, and you made agreements as to, for example, how many cents you would get for each copy of your music.

There were also song pluggers, who would sit in places like Macy's and Gimbel's in New York, and in Eaton's and Simpson's in Toronto. These chaps would play their pianos in public places and plug the song or the sheet music.

Then people stopped buying sheet music to put on the old piano in the living room and started buying records. This created a problem for the authors, composers and performers. Incidentally, the Canadian version of ASCAP is CAPAC, which stands for Canadian Association of Publishers, Authors and Composers. Thereafter, the money came in through the sale of records. That did not create a serious problem for the copyright owner because the distribution of records through record stores was controllable, auditable, visible and supervisable, if that is an acceptable word.

It then became popular to listen to these records on the radio rather than to buy them. Of course, having a record played on the radio helped your sales at the record store, but it did not get you anything for the performance. This is a very important stage in the development of copyright as it relates to Bill S-8. I say that because the reaction of the radio station owners to the suggestion that they would have to pay a copyright fee to the copyright owner for the playing of the work on the radio was the same as the reaction we are getting now from the people who find that they may have to pay a copyright fee for copying printed works. The radio stations said, "We can't keep track of that. How can we do that? Every time we play a record, we have to find out who the author is, and so on." Eventually it was negotiated between CAPAC and BMI—

Senator Barootes: ASCAP.

Senator Frith: ASCAP is the U.S. organization and CAPAC is the Canadian organization. I am talking now about Canada. It was negotiated that a certain fee would be paid based on gross revenue. I shall not go into the details but the Copyright Appeal Board endorsed the procedure on an overall basis.

That is the setting of the scene when this government did something that was an improvement, in my view as a lawyer, and as one who has been involved with copyright and broadcasting. The government decided to come forward with amendments to the Copyright Act, and I am on record as supporting that initiative. The government brought forward Part I in its efforts to amend the Copyright Act. Under Part I, authors faced with this uncontrollable technical ability to copy written works were given the opportunity to enforce their copyright without having to run around to every individual user in order to enforce their creative rights. Those are the key words in understanding the dramatis personae or the players in this field; the users, large and small, of printed copyright and the uncontrolled ability of others to copy.

Here was the problem: How could this be done? I shall not get into the technicalities, but let us assume that all of us here are authors and that we do our work individually and separately. We cannot track down every use that is made of our written work, so we want to get together to try and enforce our rights. The essence of the difficulty is that that would be considered a combination in restraint of trade. We would be getting together in order to establish an association to set up reprography. That association could be considered a combination in restraint of trade, if there were enough of us. Of course, if there were not enough, it would not be effective. Our objective would be to approach the departments of education, just as CAPAC and BMI approached the radio station owners, and say to them, "Look, you can use our copyright, but you have to sit down and negotiate a fee with us in order to do so." However, they could then turn around and say: "But that would be in restraint of trade because what your are doing is throttling competition."

● (1450)

What is the essence of Part I of the Copyright Act? The essence of it is that it is not a combination in restraint of trade to form associations to enforce copyright in written works. I shall limit my remarks to written works at the moment for purposes of illustration. That was the state of affairs when the bill was passed, and that is the state of affairs now.

What is the reason for Bill S-8? Bill S-8 is sponsored by our colleague, Senator Marsden, who, as senators will remember, is a university professor. She has spent most of her life in education and is a very well-known and distinguished member of the educational community in Canada. She herself, along with her colleagues, has experienced the difficulties that arise when there are revolutionary changes in society such as the one we are now facing; namely, that we can no longer continue to refuse to acknowledge that creative rights exist. We can no longer simply abuse those creative rights. It is in this larger social context that society wants to encourage creative rights, and it does so by giving protection to the creators and allowing them to receive a decent and fair compensation for their creative efforts.

However, this comes as a terrible shock to a lot of us, including many of us in the educational community. The educational community says such things as: "Do you mean that if I am in the middle of teaching something and I want to make a photocopy of a publication or write an excerpt from it on the board, I am breaking copyright?" The answer is: "Yes, unless you have the permission of the copyright owner, the person who created it, you are breaking copyright." That is why I come back to these arguments, which have such a familiar ring to me.

The essence of all of these arguments is the same as that of the arguments we heard years ago when radio and television stations took the position: "It would be nice to be able to protect copyright owners but it is too much trouble, it is too difficult, it is technically impossible" and so on. All of those things were said. The problem was solved through negotiation, and that is exactly what Part I of the Copyright Act is trying to elicit. But it does create these problems.

What does Senator Marsden intend to do with this bill? Let us look for a moment at what she wants to accomplish. All regimes or schemes for the collective enforcement of copyright contain exemptions, particular situations that require negotiation. What is the problem in this case? The problem is that essentially the exemptions are to be in Part II of this legislation, and Part II has not yet been passed. I do not even think it has been introduced in the other place.

Senator Marsden and the interests that she represents—and they are substantial and important ones, dealing directly with the education of our society—hope that there will be exemptions for educational use. Let me pause here for a moment to state the general problem with exemptions.

The argument that is made usually goes like this: "But you really can't expect our educational system to bear the costs of paying these creators their rights. We admit that they have these rights. We admit that they should be paid. We admit that they are entitled to a fair return for their efforts, but in the name of the education of our children, they ought not to be paid." What are we doing? We are saying to these creators, those who write the textbooks that are so important, for example, to our children, or other material that the schools decide to use: "Look, you have decided to create these written works for the benefit of society. We admit that they are for the benefit of society because we want to use them, but we don't want to pay you for them."

What we are saying, in effect, is: "Would you mind subsidizing the educational system? Would you mind our using your works for the education of society without our paying for it?" We are really asking them to give up their right to be paid for their contribution to the educational system.

We would not say to the principal of a school that he should not be paid; nor would we suggest to a teacher that he or she should not be paid. We are not about to say to the contractors who build the schools or to the suppliers who supply them that, in the name of the education of our children, they should not be paid. We would never say to the contractor: "You don't expect us to pay for the school you built, do you? It is for our children." We would never say to a teacher: "How can you be asking for a raise? How can you ask to be paid at all? You are doing this for our children. You realize that we have to raise the money from the taxpayers in order to educate our children. You don't expect us to pay for it, do you?" Do the paper companies ever say: "Oh, sorry, never thought of it—of course not. We don't expect you to pay for this." Do we ever think the contractor should say: "No, no, I won't even send you a bill"? Do we ever expect the teachers to say: "I never thought of it. When you put it that way, why would I expect a raise when what I am doing is for the education of our children?"

However, that is what we are asking the creative writers to do. We are saying to them: "Don't you understand how difficult it is to pay you? We have never paid you before. We have trampled all over your rights and have never paid you and now you are asking to be paid. Now we have to get this money out of the taxpayer in order to educate our children, and it is all because you insist on being paid like everybody else—full price for full services."

This brings us to the whole question of exemptions, which are supposed to be dealt with in Part II of the legislation. I can tell I am boring many of you with my remarks. However, that diminishes neither my enthusiasm nor my passion for the protection of the rights of our creators and the need for all of society as users to pay for the creative efforts and works of our authors and others, just as we pay everybody else for their contributions to society. Thus, I now wish to move the adjournment of the debate on this order.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Before that is done, I wish to ask a question of Senator Frith. I fully sympathize with the point of view that he has raised. It is unfair to ask all authors, literary as opposed to textbook, since authors of textbooks generally make money—and I do not write literature so I am not involved in this—to permit works, or parts of them, which are discussed in a literature class. They may be be copied by students to whom such works have been assigned.

Before the photocopier students would have to secure a copy somehow. Libraries never had enough copies for students, but they would secure a copy, read it, make notes and perhaps even use one another's notes. More copies of the book were not bought than they are now.

Once the photocopier came into being, students would go to a library and copy, for example, part of a collection of short stories. Their colleagues would then photocopy the photocopy, thus giving all a copy of the text to take home. You are asking them to break a very old habit. When I went to university in 1967 this was a habit which prevailed. It is a habit which has gone on for a good long time. We are now asking that the habit be broken. How will it be broken? As I was saying before the deputy leader so rudely interrupted me—

Senator Frith: As I said last time, interruptions are always rude. When did you last hear someone say, "Before I was so politely interrupted . . ."?

Senator Gigantès: I thought that most of the interruptions which were made during my long speech were extremely useful.

You are proposing to break a well-entrenched habit of students. If a lengthy work is involved, it may cost more to photocopy it than to buy it. Yet, there is a problem with the finances of students involved here. How do you propose to address that problem? What can be done when a student says, "In this collection of short stories, I need to study this particular one. The book costs $25. Yet, the short story which is ten pages long will cost but $1 to photocopy"? Admittedly, the student, technically, is stealing the royalties due to the author of the book. How do you propose to solve this problem? There are many students who do not have much money.

Senator Frith: The simple answer is by negotiating. The honourable senator raises the same questions as those raised about records. "How can we deal with them when we only play one cut, or this one or that one?" It can be done by negotiating and raising exactly the kind of questions which Senator Gigantès has raised. Incidentally, I am not proposing this. It is in place now. There are associations in existence which can start negotiations. They are called collectives. They are now legitimate, which they were not until this government brought in Part I. The answer is that you hold negotiations. You do what has been done in other fields: you make sure that all the difficult questions are raised—and Senator Gigantès' question is a classic example of the kind of question a user would raise. The creative collective would say, "We have an idea on that. We thought we would do this and make the adjustment this way or that way". If the matter cannot be worked out, it can be taken to the Copyright Appeal Board, which is exactly what is done elsewhere.

The shock of all this is that society has never really addressed this matter in the past. The question of performing rights has been addressed. Yet, the question of composition rights concerning music has not been addressed.

The essence of Senator Marsden's bill is not so much the question of exemptions, but her understandable impatience in this matter. I support her in her impatience, as do most government members, I believe. I know that Senator Poitras and other members of the government with whom I have spoken support fully Senator Marsden's impatience with the delay in the passage of Part II. It would deal with the exemptions. In effect, what she is asking for in Bill S-8 is an anticipatory exemption. In effect, she wants to say, "I want an exemption now". Speaking for the constituency which I represent in this small context—that is, the creators—I would say, "But you are going to take all my bargaining rights away when I start to negotiate exemptions under Part II. It will already have been granted".

I would like to leave my remarks at that point as I adjourn the debate. I do so in order to avoid going over the background again. I will then tighten up the focus. The next time I deal with this matter, I will deal with the following questions: Why do we not have Part II yet? I ask this question now, because I hope the members opposite who are interested in this bill will consult their colleagues in the government, particularly the Minister of Communications, Marcel Masse, in order to join in the debate.

If Part II is passed in the near future, I think Senator Marsden will be satisfied. As long as she knows we will soon have Part II, we can sit down, and the educational community can negotiate exemptions. However, if she has to keep waiting and waiting for Part II, she will want to have her bill passed, which will, in effect, give her the something in advance. My problem with that, as I say, is that it might put the creators in the position of having their case settled before they even get down to the bargaining table.

For the other main point I want to address, I refer honourable senators to the very useful study done by Consumer and Corporate Affairs on the question of copyright. In fact, I cannot offhand think of any subject which has been so well researched, and which research is so available, as the research done by this government and the previous government on the question of copyright. There were a large number of proposals, drafts and suggestions. The one I refer honourable senators to on this particular question, namely, exemptions under the Copyright Act as enacted by Part I, is a study done by Dennis N. Magnusson and Victor Nabhan. It is part of a series called "Copyright Revision Studies." Its title is "Exemptions under the Canadian Copyright Act". Incidentally, Mr. Magnusson is at the faculty of law of Queen's University and Mr. Nabham is at the faculty of law of Laval University. This part deals with exemptions.

I do not want to give away the plot and say the butler did it. However, essentially the result of the studies done by the department is that there should not be educational exemptions. However, that is something for negotiation under Part II, when it comes along.

I would like to tighten the focus of Bill S-8 on the question of educational exemptions under the Copyright Act as it now stands and the relationship between Bill S-8 and the studies which have been done on the subject of exemptions, particularly educational exemptions under the Copyright Act. Therefore, honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate on this order.

Senator Bosa: Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

The explanatory note of Bill S-8 states:

> The purpose of this amendment is to exempt from copyright infringement certain activities that are carried out for educational purposes in circumstances where a licence is not obtainable on reasonable terms and conditions.

Could the honourable gentleman give us an idea of what he considers to be "not obtainable on reasonable terms and conditions"?

Senator Frith: I will be dealing with this when I speak to the next order. However, that is the problem. One can see, I hope, from what I said, that there should be negotiations for a licence. The negotiations take place between the users, which in this case will be the educational institutions, and the collectives, and they will be negotiating a licence. The problem I see with Bill S-8 is that it will say: they do not have to get a licence, if they can say it is "not obtainable on reasonable terms and conditions." The question is, and I will have quite a bit to say about this, who decides what is reasonable?

If one says to the user, "If you do not think the terms are reasonable, you can go ahead and break the law and not get a licence." Why would they then negotiate? They would just say, "Sorry, I do not think that is reasonable". You would never get anywhere with negotiations, if one side is able to say that they do not think the other is reasonable, and, thereby, can get away without a licence.

That is a good question on which to leave the matter, as we adjourn the debate on this wintry afternoon.

Senator Bosa: Does Senator Frith not have a specific example to give us, so that we could learn what is meant by "on reasonable terms and conditions"?

Senator Frith: Yes, I can give you an example. Let us suppose that Senator Bosa, who has experience in the insurance business, has the rights to a certain area for a company. No one is able to represent that company in that area other than himself unless he licenses them. Suppose they come to him and they say, "Senator Bosa, I would like everything east of Yonge Street". Senator Bosa then says, "All right, it will cost you so much". They then say, "I don't think that's reasonable, so I am going to go ahead and do it anyway". Is that a good example?

Senator Bosa: It is.

Senator Frith: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that all remaining Orders stand and that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.
