SALE OF RAILWAY PASSENGER TICKETS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK, in introducing a Bill (No. 43) respecting the sale of railway passenger tickets, said: The object of the Bill was to prevent the unauthorized sale of railway passenger tickets. This practice, which is known as that of ticket scalping, has been developed within the last few years, and is assuming every year greater proportions. I am aware it is a matter requiring very careful consideration before this House should pass a law prohibiting the carrying on of every kind of business; but I shall be able to show the House that this business has a very injurious effect. Canadian railways, especially the trunk lines, have to compete with railways in the United States, and it is the practice across the lines to sell through railway tickets at a lower rate than the local tariff rate in Canada; the reason alleged for this action being, that if they do not do so, they would not obtain any of the through passenger traffic. Those tickets are brought into Canada and sold. In the contract entered into by the railway company with the passenger to carry him, say from Chicago to Boston and return at a certain rate, it is distinctly stated that one of the conditions is that the ticket is not transferable. As soon as the passengers arrive in Canada they find offices open in some of the large cities where it is announced that railway tickets are bought and sold. Tickets are sold to those unauthorized agents, and a fraud is thus perpetrated on the railway companies. Not only has the practice a tendency to allow the use of partly used tickets, but it is a direct incentive to railway employees to commit a breach of trust, either by allowing tickets to pass without being punched, or by obtaining passes which have been used and selling them over and over again at greatly reduced rates to those unauthorized agents. Not only that, but such offices are places where stolen goods are received. When railway passenger tickets have been stolen from the company's office they have in many cases been taken to those unauthorized agents. There is no way of tracing the tickets sold by such agents, and of ascertaining whether they have been stolen from the company's offices. It is proposed by the Bill to prevent the practice of ticket scalping by stating that persons selling tickets in the various cities must be authorized by the railway companies, and that unless they are so authorized they shall not sell the tickets to pass over the lines, and a contravention of this Act shall be a misdemeanor, and the offender shall be liable to fine or imprisonment or both. There was a proposal in the Bill by which a railway company could purchase tickets belonging to another company, so that the companies may be able to give through rates.

Bill read the first time.

ST. JOHN HARBOR.

Mr. DOMVILLE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill, this Session of Parliament, to place the harbor of St. John, N.B., under a Commission?

Mr. POPE (Queen's) said that some correspondence had taken place on the subject; but hitherto, parties in St. John had not been able to agree among themselves. If they arrived at an agreement and submitted the matter to the Government, their proposal would be taken into consideration.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, What is the present estimated cost of the first 100 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, west of Selkirk, now under construction, and to be taken over by the Syndicate?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER said the total estimated cost of the first 100 miles of the Canadian Pacific Railway, west of Selkirk, was $1,350,000, equal to $13,500 per mile; and he would lay on the Table a detailed statement showing how that estimate had been arrived at.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy the time of the House one moment, as a matter of favor, for a personal explanation. I was unexpectedly called to my feet yesterday to reply to the hon. member for North Norfolk. I had no idea of addressing the House at the time, and perhaps, under the excitement of the moment, I said more than I would have said under other circumstances. It has always been my desire—and I think the House will agree that I have shown that desire—to observe, so far as possible, the proprieties of this House, and not in any way to infringe, not only the Rules, but the courtesies of debate; and I think it is due to the House that I should say that, on this occasion, I did make use of an expression which, upon more mature reflection, I would not have used. I make this explanation without consultation, without suggestion, and certainly not because I was vaguely called to account for it by an hon. member who, I must say, did it in a very courteous manner last night; but I do it because I think every gentleman who occupies the time of this House owes it to himself, to the House, and to the country, if at any unguarded moment he descends below the point at which fair argument and fair debate should stop, that he should promptly endeavor to put himself right. No man in the House, perhaps, has had more occasion than I, from those who have been my opponents in the House and from the Opposition public press, to feel somewhat bitterly in respect to personal attacks which have been made upon me. But, Sir,

"I carry anger as the flint bears fire,
Which, much enforced, yields a hasty spark,
And straight is cool again."

and if I am bitter or severe, the feeling passes away with the occasion. I wish to say that I had no intention of making a personal attack when I unguardedly said that certain acts reminded me of the course of pot-house politicians I did not apply, I could not apply, the phrase to hon. gentlemen opposite. I did not intend it to be personal. I am sorry I made use of any such language, and I trust the House will receive my apology with the frankness with which I give it; and I have only to say that I trust others who may, in the heat of the moment, be guilty of unguarded expressions will remember that it is due to this House that we should all endeavor to keep up the dignity of debate.

THE DUTY ON MALT.

Mr. ORTON moved for all papers and correspondence in reference to the removal of excise duty from malt, and the collecting of Revenue from malt liquors, as in Great Britain and the United States. He said: Mr. Speaker, the question of removing the duty from malt and placing it on malt liquors, has been casually referred to on many former occasions in this House, chiefly from a brewer's point of view. The matter is now assuming a difficult shape, and is interesting the agriculturists of the country. Our farmers are now competing actively with the farmers of other countries, and Britain herself, in supplying the English and European demand for meat stuffs, and what will place them in a more favorable position to compete successfully, is of importance to the whole country. After a long and arduous struggle in England, between the farmers and the brewers and maltsters, the duty has been removed from malt and placed upon malt liquors, and this has been done in the interest of the British farmer, because it is found that malt is a most valuable article of food, and can be used with great advantage in fattening animals. Malt is, in fact, partially digested barley, and one bushel of malt will go as far as one and a-half bushels of chopped barley, but while an excise duty is collected on malt it cannot be used as a common article of fodder for cattle. A great deal of barley, unfit for brewing purposes, could be used after being malted to very great advantage in cattle feeding. In the United States the duty is collected by stamps on the barrels or other packages of malt liquor, and is found to be a very convenient mode of collecting the duty, much more agreeable to the brewing interests, and also with benefit to the revenue. At the same time the farmers are at liberty to use malt for feeding purposes, which is a great boon to cattle breeders and cattle feeders, and gives them an advantage over our farmers in supplying the old country market with beef. I will read a letter from F. W. Stone, Esq., of Guelph, one of the most celebrated cattle breeders in Ontario, in reference to the subject:

"GUELPH, 31st December, 1880.

"Dr. G. T. Orton, M.P.:

"MY DEAR SIR,—In reply to your esteemed favor of 22nd respecting my opinion in reference to malt as food for cattle and other stock, beg to say that there cannot be any doubt but that malt, or even sprouted barley, is excellent for stock, but the high duty upon malt prevents it from being used as food for stock to advantage, and as the raising and feeding of cattle and sheep for the English market is yearly increasing, and likely to increase, so as to become one of our principal exports, our farmers should be afforded every opportunity to compete with our neighbors in the United States for the cattle trade with Great Britain. They certainly have advantages in pasture and cheap corn, and every inducement should be given to our farmers that would enable them to raise and feed stock for exportation. If the duty was taken off malt, no doubt many would use malt and sprouted barley more or less for feed for stock. If our country is to prosper, our farmers must raise and feed stock, to keep their farms in condition by consuming most of the coarse grain raised. If farmers do not feed their land it will very soon not feed them. The farmers in England, for many long years, petitioned for the repeal of the malt tax (and at last succeeded), on the grounds that it prevented them from using malt for feeding stock, to their great disadvantage, as much barley not fit for malt, or that the maltsters would not buy on account of the high duty, could be profitably made into malt or sprouted for feeding stock. The strongest argument you can use is to point to what England has done respecting duty on malt, where such an immense quantity was made and enormous revenue derived therefrom. To take the duty off malt and put it on beer and malt liquors, could not injure the revenue, and would give the farmers the benefit of using malt to feed their stock.

"Wishing you a happy New Year,

"I am, my dear Sir, yours truly,

"FREDERICK WM. STONE."

Mr. PLUMB.

Also from David Foote, Esq., a large farmer and cattle feeder of Elora, in my county:

"ELORA, 27th December, 1880.

"DEAR DOCTOR,—I got your letter. I see by the newspapers that the farming community in Great Britain are very much pleased that the duty has been taken off malt for feeding purposes. What is good for them, in this respect, cannot be bad for us. My own idea is, that the removal of this duty here would be a very great boon conferred on the farmers of Canada, particularly those in the cattle-feeding districts.

"It is a well known fact, that nearly all vegetable substances, when subjected to certain modes of preparation increase in nutritious qualities; for instance, crushed grain is more nourishing than when left whole; bread, still more so than flour; there is as much difference between crushed barley and malt, as between unleavened bread and a well baked baker's loaf; 'hard tack' is hard to take, but a well baked loaf of bread is always palatable. From the change which barley undergoes in malting one bushel of malt is equal to at least one and a-half of chopped barley, for feeding purposes. In the section of country where I was born and bred, it was no uncommon thing for farmers to buy malt for their horses and cattle, paying a duty I think, of about half-a-crown per bushel.

"Another argument in favor of your motion, is, that owing to the repeated failure of spring wheat, the attention of the farmers will be turned more to stock-raising for exportation, and a greater breadth of barley will be sown, which should be utilized to the best advantage.

"The prospects for those feeding cattle for the British market look bright. The company of which John Black, John Scott and Goodfellow are members, have already purchased nearly 3,000 head for April and May delivery; 600 of which are in the counties of Wellington and Waterloo. The prices to be paid will average $5.75 per 100 lbs., or an aggregate of about a quarter million dollars, not bad for the beginning of the season.

"Hoping you will get such a measure passed as will enable us to get all the malt we want for feeding purposes,

"I am,

"Yours truly,

"DAVID FOOTE."

I hope the Government will give the matter their early and serious consideration, as I can assure them that it is yearly becoming of greater importance to the agricultural interests of Canada, and the change will also be welcomed by the large brewing interests of this country.

Mr. MERNER. I can thoroughly endorse the views expressed by Dr. Orton on this matter. It will be of great advantage to brewers, as though they will still have to pay duty, if it is placed on malt liquors by means of stamps, as is the case in the United States, it will save them a great deal of inconvenience and annoyance that they are now unnecessarily subjected to by excise officers. I have no doubt also that it will be of use to the farmers. I would like to see the Government attend to this subject as soon as possible. The revenue will be collected cheaper in this way than by the present mode.

Motion withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to propose a motion, which will be seconded by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and will, I believe, meet with universal assent. Some of our friends have suffered very much in the House of late from their sedentary occupation and want of exercise, and we think, therefore, in order to restore them to their usual state of health, they should have an opportunity, this evening, of stretching their legs, by taking a walk in the cool, bracing air. I therefore move that when the House rises at six o'clock, it stands adjourned till three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

NEW PENITENTIARY AT DORCHESTER.

Mr. WELDON moved for a return of all machinery and other articles removed from the St. John Penitentiary to the new penitentiary at Dorchester, and the estimated value; also of all machinery and articles heretofore in use in the St. John Penitentiary sold by auction or otherwise disposed of, and the proceeds of such sales.

Mr. ANGLIN said it was very much to be hoped that when the returns came down they would remove many of the rumors in reference to the manner in which the machinery and other materials were disposed of on this occasion, and prove them to be unfounded. A good deal of feeling existed in New Brunswick in regard to the dismantling of the St. John establishment. It was felt that if the Province of New Brunswick must provide for criminals sentenced to less than two years imprisonment, the Dominion should have handed over that institution to the Provincial Government for the purpose, and also the machinery and other fittings that it was not worth while to remove or sell. As the story goes the whole institution was thoroughly dismantled, and machinery was taken down which, if allowed to stand, would have proved useful to the Provincial Government for many years, and which was only sold for old iron because it was not fit to be taken to the Dorchester Institution. It was to be hoped the return would show those statements had little foundation in fact.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had heard for the first time that any dissatisfaction existed in New Brunswick on this subject. He had no information of that character from the officers whose duty it was to superintend the removal of the penitentiary from St. John to Dorchester, nor had he heard of any dissatisfaction in the matter, nor cause for it. They had been prepared to do at St. John as was done at Halifax, to remove whatever materials and fittings were useful from the old institution to the new one. Government would make enquiry as to the facts in this case, with a view to laying them all before the House, with any explanations the officers involved might have to make.

Motion agreed to.

ST. JOHN PENITENTIARY.

Mr. WELDON moved for copies of all correspondence between the Government and the Government of the Province of New Brunswick, in respect to the St. John Penitentiary, since the first day of January, A. D., 1879, and also the special case agreed upon between the said Governments in respect of such penitentiary and imprisonment therein. He said in 1879 he had called the attention of the House on a motion he then made for papers connected with the St. John Penitentiary, and he now would briefly recapitulate the facts. The St. John Penitentiary was originally built by the city and county of St. John for a House of Correction, and in 1841, by arrangement the Province took the property as a penitentiary, and it was contended that by the arrangement the city and county of St. John had the right given to them to send their short term prisoner, rogues, vagabonds, etc. This privilege was continued down to the Union of the Provinces, and the prohibition in the Criminal Law of confining prisoners sentenced to less than two years imprisonment was suspended as regards this penitentiary. Now that the penitentiary was removed to Dorchester the question had come up. A special case had been submitted to the Supreme Court between the Dominion and Provincial Governments, upon questions as to the power of the Dominion Government, to legislate on this subject, a question upon which there could be but little doubt. What he contended was, that it was not a legal question but a moral obligation, to carry out the arrangement made in good faith between the city and county of St. John and the Province, and if upon investigation it was ascertained that such an arrangement was entered into, then that the Dominion Government in good faith should carry it out. The city and county of St. John were not allowed to appear by counsel on the argument of the special case. Another more serious question has also arisen upon the argument. The counsel for the Province sought an opinion upon the following question: Upon whom, the Dominion or Provincial Governments, does the responsibility rest to provide for the maintenance of prisoners sentenced to less than two years imprisonment with hard labor for offences against the law of Canada? This question the Dominion Government objected to being discussed, and the Court gave no opinion on the subject. We hoped the Government would consent to submit this question for the opinion of the Court and have this vexed question settled. By the Acts of Union the criminal law and the establishment and management of penitentiaries were given to this Parliament, while the establishment of public and reformatory prisons were given to the Local Parliaments. As the Province of New Brunswick stood, there was no place in which these prisoners could be confined except the common jails of the counties, and it was doubtful if an offender could be sentenced to hard labor in a common jail. At any rate it was a legal question which he hoped would be finally settled, as well as the other claims of the Province, which they sought not as suppliants but as rights to which they were entitled, and which questions seemed to be kept open for no other purpose than to enable members of the Local Government to take two or three trips a year to Ottawa at the expense of the Province.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said there was no objection whatever to bringing down the papers asked for by the hon. gentleman, and he would be glad of the opportunity of letting Parliament know by the production of those papers the exceptional position in which St. John stood with reference to the penitentiary in that city before and since Confederation, and down to the time of the removal of the institution to Dorchester. He would not now enter fully into the question, but simply say that the St. John Penitentiary was not in reality a penitentiary in any sense of the word. It was but a common gaol in which prisoners of all kinds—vagrants and drunkards as well as those convicted of the higher crimes—were imprisoned. In that respect its position was exceptional, for in the other Provinces, for crimes for which imprisonment under two years was imposed, the Provinces provided the prison accommodation. About the time when the question for removing the prison from St. John to Dorchester was being considered, the relation of the Province of New Brunswick, and the duties of the Dominion towards the Province and the city and county of St. John, came under discussion, and, after a voluminous correspondence, a case had been carefully prepared on the part of the Dominion and Provincial authorities and argued by able counsel in the Supreme Court of Canada. On that case so stated judgment had been given, and the hon. gentleman frankly stated that with the determination of the Court he could find no fault. The learned counsel for New Brunswick—the present Judge King of that Province—had proposed to raise the question stated by the hon. gentleman as to the right of the Dominion Legislature to define the periods of imprisonment for which the penitentiaries and the common goals should be respectively available. In other words, to determine whether in all cases of crime—those for which even the smallest punishment was given under the law—it was compulsory on the part of the Dominion to provide accommodation in the penitentiaries. I declined to submit to the Supreme Court what should be the policy of this Parliament. From Confederation down to the present time, with the exception of New Brunswick itself, I believe the policy of Parliament has been—and I never heard it disputed until then—to define when the respective counties in the Dominion should incur the expense and responsibility of providing for crime committed within their bounds. The decision of Parliament was that the punishment for all offences for which the Court awarded less than two years should be by confinement in the common jails of the country. In Ontario provision is made to relieve the counties by providing for confinement in the Central Prison, but in Nova Scotia and the other Provinces the receptacle is the common jail of the respective counties. New Brunswick, consequently, will have to adopt the same course. I understand that before the penitentiary in St. John was closed, all the prisoners convicted throughout New Brunswick were sent there, no matter what the crime was or how trifling the punishment imposed. I declined to submit to the Supreme Court the question, because I thought it was one which Parliament should deal with and not the Supreme Court.

Motion agreed to.

TENTH BATTALION OF MILITIA.

Mr. STRANGE, in moving for copies of all reports, papers, correspondence, telegrams, and Militia orders, relating to the 10th Battalion, Active Militia of Canada, from the 1st day of January, 1875, to the 1st day of January, 1881, said that three or four years ago a number of the officers of the regiment had some little disagreement among themselves which injured the efficiency of the regiment very much. Without going into the cause of the difficulty he wished for the paper in order that the public and those interested in military matters might understand exactly how the case stood. He wished, however, to draw the attention of the House to what he considered to be a great hardship that had been inflicted upon several officers who were not participants in any way in the quarrels of the regiment. The condition of the regiment arrived at such a pitch that, the Government, a few months ago, found it necessary to deprive all the gentlemen holding commissions in that regiment of their commissions. Although he believed it was in the interest of the regiment that those who were in the quarrel should lose their commissions, still he felt a great injustice had been done to many of the junior officers of the regiment. The case had been presented to him by some of those officers, one a volunteer of twelve years standing in England, who had been eleven years in the Canadian militia, and had the honor of being elected as a member of the Wimbledon team for three successive years. This gentleman stated that without any cause he had been virtually deprived of his commission, and he felt that he was in disgrace in consequence. His sons were growing up. One of them was imbued with a military spirit and wished to join the militia of Canada, but he felt if his father was to be cashiered for the offences of his superior officers, he should think twice before joining the force. He (Mr. Strange) trusted the papers would be brought down, so that the whole of the militia force might understand exactly how the matter stood.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for a return showing the amount appropriated each year on account of Dominion Lands, showing the sum expended in surveys, the amount expended in management, the area surveyed, and the area surveyed which is still unoccupied, said he did not know how far the information asked for in this motion had been embraced in other motions made this Session. He thought the information would be useful to the House, and perhaps to the right hon. gentleman himself, when brought under his notice in a tabulated form. Some years ago the practice was to make extensive surveys of public lands far beyond what the progress of settlement required. But those lands had been obliterated, and it was now almost impossible to tell the exact limits of the various sections and quarter-sections. He desired to know whether this policy had been revived since the right hon. gentleman had come back to power.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said this information had already been produced, but if his hon. friend required to see Mr. McDONALD (Pictou).

it separately he could be accommodated. In 1872 the surveys were in advance of the progress of settlement, but for the last two or three years the opposite was the case. Population was going far beyond the surveys, and considerable expenditure would be required for surveys in those portions of the country.

Mr. MILLS suggested that the return should be accompanied by a map, indicating where the country had been surveyed and where settlement had taken place.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT understood that most of the boundary marks in the North-West were of wood, and were frequently destroyed by prairie fires. If the expense would not be too great, he thought some of the principal marks, at least, ought to be composed of some more enduring material, such as stone or iron.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST TIMBER LIMITS.

Mr. MERNER, in moving for a return of the several timber limits granted to parties in the North-West Territories, the names of those to whom they were granted, the locality of the said limits and the number of acres specified, said that the granting of timber limits by the Government was a cause of great hardship to the settlers, who were not permitted to cut a stick of timber thereon for the purpose of building a house. The same difficulty prevailed in Ontario, and caused hundreds of people to leave Canada and go to the United States. In the United States no timber limits were granted, and he thought the Government should abolish them here, especially as timber was very scarce in the North-West.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD stated that of late years, especially since 1878, timber limits had been granted only to parties who undertook to erect saw mills, in order to supply settlers with lumber for building purposes. It was attempted, of course, as much as possible, to confine these limits to portions of the country not adopted or not sought after for settlement, and they were now only granted annually, so that if at any time the section where they existed was sought after for settlement, the department could stop the cutting of timber.

Motion agreed to.

EXPLORATIONS OF THE RIVER YAMASKA.

Mr. MASSUE, in moving for a copy of the Engineer who made, in 1880, an exploration of the River Yamaska from its mouth to Belle Pointe, in the counties of Bagot and St. Hyacinthe, said: I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the necessity of rendering navigable that part of the River Yamaska extending from its mouth to St. Hugues, in the county of Bagot, a distance of some twenty-one miles. Steamboats can run in spring and autumn as far as St. Aimé, but it is impossible for them to continue running during the summer season, because heretofore that part of the river has not received from preceding Administrations the attention it deserved. In insisting upon this improvement, I am only fulfilling a duty from which profit will accrue to the Province of Quebec, and naturally to the whole Dominion. If, as I trust, we succeed in this undertaking; if the present Government, who so well understand the advantages of improvements, as the basis of the future prosperity of the country, look favorably on this question, which has been under consideration since 1859, I say it, with conviction, will render justice to a population of about 130,000 souls living on the banks of this river which runs through the counties of Rouville, St. Hyacinthe, Bagot, Richelieu and Yamaska. Last year the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault) showed us the advantages that the counties just mentioned would derive from this improvement, from an agricultural, an industrial and a commercial point of view. The hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Vanasse) showed us the resources of that part of the country, by referring to the official reports of the census, and persuaded us that the considerable trade carried on there, taking into account the fertility of the soil and the industrial spirit of the population, would be a hundred times greater without those obstacles to navigation. I could not, Sir, allow the occasion to pass without pointing out more precisely, if it were possible, what are the industries and trade of some of the five parishes of the county I have the honor of representing, in order that you may judge of the profits that the country would derive from moneys spent on the improvement of that river, without losing sight of the fact that the area of the different counties watered by the River Yamaska comprises 1,170,198 square acres, of which more than half is in a state of culture. I will limit myself, in order not to take up the time of the House, to the agricultural products of two parishes only in the county of Richelieu, which are in the surveyed section. The parishes of St. Aimé and St. Martel are situated, the one on the north, the other on the south bank of this river, and they cover an area of seven miles by four miles and a-half. The valuation of the real estate is $700,000. The wood and hemlock-bark which goes through there, for the most part in transit, cannot be estimated at less than 8,000 or 10,000 cords. The product of the land, and products from other sources, which were above the average, were as follows: 17,200 bushels of wheat, 3,000 bushels of barley, 8,000 bushels of peas, 50,000 bushels of oats, 18,000 bushels of buckwheat, 1,500 bushels of beans, 8,000 bushels of Indian corn, 28,000 bushels of potatoes, 3,000 bushels of beets, 2,500 bushels of carrots, 3,000 bushels of turnips, 1,000 bushels of onions, 300,000 bundles of hay, 450,000 bundles of straw, 50,000 pounds of cheese, 20,000 pounds of butter, 20,000 dozens of eggs, 5,000 pairs of fowls, 60,000 pounds of tobacco. The annual sale of animals comprises 2,400 head of cattle, 1,000 horses, and 4,000 sheep. Relying on similar products, or nearly so, of twenty other parishes, we can safely say that the improvement of the River Yamaska would be a source of wealth for the country. Ste. Helene and St. Hugues, in the county of Bagot; St. Barnabé and St. Judes in the county of St. Hyacinthe; St. Louis de Bonssecours, and St. Aimé and St. Marcel in the county of Richelieu; St. Guillaume, St. David and St. Michel, in the county of Yamaska, would immediately benefit by it, as well as all the parishes lying behind these. Easy communication would secure an outlet for agricultural products, and thereby increase them; public enterprise would profit thereby, for the works would hardly be finished before we would see steamboat companies competing for the transportation to the market, either of Sorel or Montreal, the produce of these fertile parishes. Although I am well disposed towards helping the construction of a railway that is to unite the Atlantic with the Pacific, thereby strengthening the union of the Provinces, I think we should not lose sight of the advantages to be gained by improving the Yamaska River.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I feel much pleasure in having laid before this House the answer to the Address moved for by the hon. member. I must add, Mr. Speaker, that the attention of the Government has been specially drawn to this matter by three or four members, among others, by the hon. member for the county bordering on the Yamaska River. This question, no doubt, required to be looked into, and I am satisfied that the hon. member will see by the report that will be laid on the Table of this House, that the engineers, who have studied the question during last summer, have fulfilled their duty, and the reports that are now before the House will be sufficient to enable us to answer the question whether improvements are to be made there this year. The hon. member will find an answer to that question when the Budget is brought down.

Motion agreed to.

RIGHTS OF PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. McCUAIG, in moving for copies of all correspondence between any of the Provincial Governments and the Government of the Dominion relating to the rights of the Provincial Governments to appoint police magistrates, justices of the peace and inspectors of licenses, said that the Act of Confederation was so ambiguously drawn in this respect as to leave room for doubt whether the Dominion Government had power to appoint magistrates, justices of the peace and inspectors of licenses. Very recently a case in appeal was tried in Nova Scotia, and the Judge presiding pronounced in favor of the appellants. The decision was to the effect that the Dominion Government alone had the right to make the appointment. It was not necessary for him to call attention to the difficulties that often arose through the conflict of jurisdiction. This Parliament should determine whether the Provincial Parliament enjoyed the right or not. He was opposed to the Government allowing this matter to be tried by private individuals. It should have the case tried before the Supreme Court, which was the proper tribunal to determine whether the Dominion Government had the right to appoint police magistrates and justices of the peace or not.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said his hon. friend was not quite correct in reference to his recollection of the case decided in Nova Scotia. The Judge held that the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia had not the authority to appoint justices of the peace; but, at the time of the decision, Nova Scotia stood in a different position from the Provinces in this respect. At various periods since Confederation all the Provinces, or at any rate the Provinces of Ontario, New Brunswick and Manitoba, passed Provincial Acts authorizing the Lieutenant-Governors of those Provinces to appoint justices of the peace. At the time of the decision to which his hon. friend referred, Nova Scotia had not followed the precedent set by the other Provinces, and the Judge held that whatever the result might be, had Nova Scotia passed such an Act, the Lieutenant-Governor had not at the time the power, under our Constitution, to appoint justices of the peace. The result was, Nova Scotia the following Session passed an Act vesting such power in the Lieutenant-Governor. What effect that had on the general question is a very different point, well worthy of consideration. With reference to the mode of settling the question as suggested by his hon. friend, there was this difficulty, that in order to make that mode satisfactory to the several Provinces, each Province would, as a matter of course, have to accede to the proposition by joining in the case proposed to be made, and it is questionable whether the Provinces that claim that right under their own legislation would be prepared to join in such a case. The papers would be brought down and any information they could give would be at the disposal of his hon. friend.

Mr. McCUAIG said it appeared to him most extraordinary for the Provincial Legislatures, unless authority had been given them by the British North America Act, to assume to legislate on the subject of the appointment of Queen's Counsel. They could not arrogate to themselves powers properly belonging to the Dominion Parliament. He was wholly opposed to the proposition of the Minister of Justice, that the duty of determining that point should be thrown on private individuals. It was plain that the Judge in the County Court of Digby, who tried the case of Chas. H.

Denton vs. John Daley, in regard to the Canada Temperance Act, clearly understood the limited nature of Provincial rights in this respect. He says:

"But the second point is the more important one. Under our former constitution, except in an action of trespass against the acting Justice, it is difficult to conceive how it could be raised, so strong would be the assumption that gentlemen sitting as magistrates were clothed with the legal authority. It would be absurd to require them to produce their commission on each occasion, and equally preposterous to suggest a doubt that the august personage representing Sovereign power, had Her Majesty's authority for making such appointments."

Judge Savary went on to say, in his elaborate decision:

"Finally we have Section 6 of the Act ordaining that the Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior and County Courts, except the Judges of Probate of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick * * * * We find, therefore, in the Act nothing inconsistent with the retention of this prerogative in Her Majesty's hands, and the exercise of it by her duly constituted representative, the Governor General, alone."

He was only a layman, but, from what he could judge, this appeared the common sense view of the matter. He did not think the Provincial Governments, if not granted those powers by the Constitution, had any right to assume them. The Provincial Legislatures were rather inclined to be aggressive and assume powers not belonging to them. The Dominion Government had had frequent occasion to disallow bills passed by the Provinces. He hoped the Government of the Dominion would see that this case was brought before the Supreme Court which was established more particularly to settle grave questions of constitutional law. He believed the Provincial Appeal Courts were far better for the trial of most important commercial cases than the Supreme Court. At any rate this question should be finally settled and the rights of the Provinces and the Dominion respectively explained beyond doubt.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) said he agreed, in a great measure, with what had fallen from the last speaker. The appointment of justices of the peace in Ontario had become a matter of very great importance, as many of those appointments had given very grave dissatisfaction. Certain ignorant persons could now act as such justices by virtue of the commission issued by the Lieut.-Governor of Ontario. Such commissions having been issued, the only way in which the matter could be decided was by bringing any cases that might arise, in consequence of improper acts of such justices of the peace, before the Supreme Court. It so happened, however, that they were generally of such trifling importance, so far as the wrong done was concerned, that it was impossible to reach the Supreme Court in that way. Therefore it devolved on the Dominion Government to take the matter into their serious consideration, and adopt some means of securing a decision on the question, as to whether the Provincial Governments have power to make those appointments. The question should be easily solved, and if those Acts were passed, it was the duty of this Government to ascertain whether they were really constitutional or not. If it was to be left till the question could be decided by the Supreme Court, we might go on for years and have no satisfaction whatever. He had just been informed by an hon. friend that in the case of a person charged with an assault and battery before one of those new magistrates in Ontario, the magistrate, after looking into the matter and hearing the evidence, acquitted the accused of the assault, and found him guilty of the battery. That was the kind of law administered by some of those justices appointed by virtue of the Act passed by the Ontario Legislature, and of the commission issued by the Ontario Government.

Mr. MILLS said the hon. gentleman who made the motion observed that the Supreme Court did not enjoy the confidence of the country, that its only utility consisted in its being a Court for the decision of constitutional questions. He did not agree with that view, believing, on the contrary, that the Supreme Court had proved, on the whole, satisfactory, and enjoyed, in the main, the confidence of the country. If the course recommended by the hon. gentleman was adopted, little as he thought of the Supreme Court now, he would think still less of it in the future. It was a Court of appellate jurisdiction that had to review the decisions of the other tribunals, and had to deal with cases already argued in the Provincial Courts. The hon. gentleman proposed that instead of having cases brought before it in this way, it should have them submitted to it in the first instance and decided previous to the decisions of other Courts. He did not think there was any room for the doubt the hon. gentleman expressed. Who were the magistrates of the country? Ministerial officers who brought offenders before the Courts of the country. Those officers had certain judicial functions, but you could not constitute a Court without also adding the power to create a magistracy. No doubt the Government here may appoint magistrates in connection with the Supreme Court as ministerial officers; and if they were to exercise the powers given by the British North America Act, and establish Courts of original jurisdiction, they might also appoint magistrates in the various Provinces to assist in the administration of justice in those Courts. But so long as the administration of justice was vested in the Governments of the various Provinces, the power to appoint magistrates would be vested in them also. Upon whom devolved the maintenance of law and order, and of the peace? In what Government and Legislature was vested the police functions that necessarily should lodge somewhere, either in the Local or General Government? All knew where they lay. It would be absurd to suppose it possible for the Local Legislature and Government to discharge the duties devolving upon them without the power to appoint the ministerial officers in connection with such duties. The 14th sub-section of the 92nd section of the British North America Act of 1867, thus defines the powers of the Provincial Governments in this respect:

"The administration of justice in the Province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of Provincial Courts, both of civil and of criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those Courts."

So there was here not only the constitution, organization and maintenance of the Courts vested in the Governments of the Provinces, but the administration of justice as well.

Mr. McCUAIG. The Provincial Parliaments have no right to appoint any man to deal with the criminal law.

Mr. MILLS said, why should they not have that right? Why was it that the administration of the ordinary criminal law, dealing with the most serious offences in the country was vested in the Superior Courts of which the Judges were appointed by the Government here? It was not because this section was not broad enough to include the appointment of Judges, but because notwithstanding this section there was a special provision in a prior section giving the power of appointing Judges to the Governor General on the advice of his Ministers. The principle which applied in a case of that kind was that where they had a general provision of law, and a special provision excepting something with regard to the general provision, then they were to interpret the exceptional provision strictly, and so interpret the law did not give the power of appointing magistrates to this Government. If the hon. gentleman would look into the matter, he would see that if it were a prerogative of the Crown to appoint magistrates, and if the functions ordinarily discharged by magistrates were vested in tribunals created by another body, that prerogative must remain in abeyance in so far as such districts were concerned where those functions were so performed. The Governor General would have no more power to appoint a magistrate to assist in the administration of justice in a provincial court than Her Majesty would have; and hon. gentlemen knew that the creation of responsible government in this country had excluded Her Majesty from exercising that prerogative, and the constitution of the country had equally excluded the Governor General from exercising any such power, even though it should have been delegated to him by Her Majesty. His Excellency must govern within the limits of the powers which were set out in the constitution, and under that power he could not appoint magistrates to perform duties which were incident to the ordinary Provincial Courts.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria) said the hon. gentleman who had just sat down was disposed to rebuke the suggestion that the matter should be referred to the Supreme Court, because, as he said, that Court was one of appellate jurisdiction, and it would be incompetent for it to consider any question which might be brought before it as a court of primary jurisdiction. The Statute creating the Supreme Court, which was passed by the Government in which the hon. member for Bothwell afterwards held a seat, gave the Supreme Court primary jurisdiction in such questions as the one now before the House. The 52nd clause of the Supreme Court Act was as follows:—

“It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to refer to the Supreme Court, for hearing or consideration, any matters whatsoever as he may think fit; and the Court shall thereupon hear and consider the same, and certify their opinions thereon to the Governor in Council: Provided that any Judge or Judges of the said Court who may differ from the opinion of the majority may in like manner certify his or their opinion or opinions to the Governor in Council.”

So that manifestly it was quite competent for the Governor General to refer a question of this character respecting the construction of the Confederation Act to the Supreme Court, and it would be within the province of that Court to determine it. The hon. gentleman thought a case should first be raised by some private individual, and that, after passing through the Courts below, it should finally come before the Supreme Court in appeal. But surely it would not be fair that a private individual should be subjected to the costs which would be involved in such a process, and he (Mr. Cameron) feared that if they waited until some individual, for the purpose of settling this question, should see fit to carry a case through the various stages of litigation to the ultimate Court of Appeal, at his own expense, they would wait a long time. The question had been raised in Ontario—indeed he had raised it himself in a case of perjury alleged to have been committed before a justice of the peace. The learned Judge had reserved the question, but as his (Mr. Cameron's) client had been, and very properly, acquitted, there was an end of the question in that particular case. It could only be on a matter of comparatively trifling importance that such a question could be raised, because the cases which were brought before magistrates were generally those in which a small amount was involved, as their jurisdiction was very limited. Still as the matters which came before them were those connected with the everyday affairs of the people it was important that the question of the validity of their appointments should be settled, and he therefore agreed with his hon. friend from Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), that the Government should take steps to have the question decided by the Supreme Court, of whether the power of appointing magistrates lay in the hands of the Local Governments or in the Government of the Dominion. The fact that the Lieutenant-Governors in Council of the various Provinces had assumed that they had the power to pass Statutes, taking that power proved nothing, unless it could be shown that the Confederation Act gave them such power. He did not think that the members of this Government or the members of this House would be very anxious to obtain the additional patronage which this power would give them—he for one would not—nor was he prepared to say that if that power were thrown upon them their appointments would be more satisfactory than those which the hon.

member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) had so strongly condemned. No doubt there were many of the magistrates appointed who were inefficient and unfit for the discharge of their duties—men who encouraged litigation and gave very absurd decisions; but, on the other hand, there were many intelligent men who properly and efficiently fulfilled the functions to which they were appointed. That, however, was beside the real question, which was an important constitutional question, and one regarding which no doubt should be left on the minds of the people as to the validity of those who had such important duties to discharge.

Mr. BLAKE. I think there is one point which should not be lost sight of in reference to the suggestion of the hon. member for Prince Edward, and that is that in a written Constitution like ours, embracing within a few lines provisions which required for their interpretation a very extended commentary, we should not overlook the question of what has been the settled practice under an interpretation of that Constitution. It seems to me that this is of the utmost importance, as throwing light upon the real meaning and intention of the Constitution, and that neither judges, nor lawyers, nor members of Parliament, nor Governments, can ignore a settled practice for many years. Now, with reference to this particular matter the Local Legislatures assumed, rightly or wrongly, that they were possessed of the power of dealing with this portion of the administration of justice from, I think, the first year that this Constitution was inaugurated. Their acts were subject to disallowance if they were ultra vires, and it was obviously a case for disallowance because it was a direct assumption, on the theory that this was beyond their power, of the executive power of this Government, and it was calculated to produce the greatest degree of confusion that there should be a double set of officers of justice. No attempt has been made by the general Government under either party to exercise the supposed right of appointing justices of the peace, save perhaps by exceptional legislation in districts under Canadian control. We have, then, a practice of thirteen or fourteen years interpreted by the Local Legislatures and Governments, and by the action and inaction of the general Legislature as to the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, and I say that while no Judge can well ignore that in interpreting the Constitution, and it is conclusive against the propriety of this Parliament moving this Government now to take steps to upset that settled reading of the Constitution. If there be an error in this settled reading it is not for us to endeavor to establish that error. The Courts are open to all. The humblest subject can seek them, and if there has been an error he can seek redress. But at this time of day, and speaking of this in the political sense, I maintain that the relative powers of the general and local authorities are settled by our practice, and ought not to be upset or subverted by us; and any action of ours ought rather to be in the direction of establishing than of changing that settlement.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I think it is very inconvenient to discuss so important a question as is raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCuaig) in his speech, rather than in his motion, without due consideration, because however much reflection one may have given to these nice constitutional points, one is not ready at a moment's notice to express a decided opinion one way or the other. However, I would not like to have it said afterwards that by silence my consent was given to any doctrines that may be laid down in this House with respect to that Constitution. As a member of this House, and as having had something to do with the framing of the Constitution, I would say that I do not assent to the view expressed by the hon. gentleman opposite with reference to the liberty enjoyed by members of this House, and by Parliament as a body, in raising questions or in assenting to a principle which may be found at any moment to have been a wrong principle or contrary to the practice heretofore pursued under our Constitution. I do not think that one could plead with much success before a court of law that thirteen-years acquiescence in an improper interpretation of the Constitution binds either any subject of the country, or any member of Parliament, or any functionary. It is not easy to point out the person upon whom should be cast the duty of raising a question of this kind. It is asking a subject to undertake a very serious and expensive process to settle a constitutional question, if there is a remedy in any other way; on the other hand, it may be a question of great political difficulty for a Minister of Justice of his own motion to raise such a question as the proper interpretation of the Constitution on points involving the authority of the Government of the Dominion and of the Provinces. We know that there are sectional jealousies, and that judicial decisions have already been given upon the constitutionality of powers exercised by the local authorities. Upon the question itself I have never felt much difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that it was not contemplated by the framers of the Constitution that the appointment of ordinary magistrates should be regarded as a prerogative right that could only be exercised by the Governor-General. I think, according to the clause that was read by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), it follows, as a necessary legal consequence, that the local legislative bodies are competent to frame laws for the administration of justice and the constitution of Courts, and we must remember that in the exercise of that legislative power, they are also able to provide for the mode of exercising these functions, and the further mode in which the administration of justice shall be conducted, and that, therefore, as a matter of reasoning, they have the appointment of magistrates of the ordinary class. We use the word magistrates with reference to the highest judge, as well as the ordinary police magistrate; but in the sense in which this word would be applied to those who are concerned in the administration of justice under legislation, enacted by the Local Legislatures, it does seem to me that no very violent presumption is required in coming to the conclusion that that includes the power of providing for officers who shall be called magistrates, and who shall perform the functions that are ordinarily attributed to magistrates who act in the lower ranks of the judicature. But if the question is to be raised, then it might perhaps be raised by the expression of opinion by Parliament, upon a motion brought forward for that purpose, authorizing a case to be submitted to the Supreme Court. I rise, Sir, to offer an observation on the present circumstance because I think the hon. leader of the Opposition, whom we all know to be a very distinguished lawyer, has propounded a doctrine which, as applied to other clauses of the Constitution and to other cases which may arise, may prove somewhat embarrassing in the future as tending to limit the powers of this Parliament.

POST OFFICE AT LOWER CARAQUET.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for copies of all correspondence relating to the closing and re-opening of the post office at Lower Caraquez, County of Gloucester, N. B., and the change of the postmaster at that place, said that some three years ago, after considerable correspondence on the subject, he succeeded in obtaining the establishment of a weekly post office at Lower Caraquez in that county. The district contained a number of families who had not much communication with the rest of the world. He was surprised to find last year, at the time Parliament opened, that that post office was closed. He inquired as to the reason and found that it did not do sufficient business in the opinion of the Postmaster General to warrant the office being kept open. The revenue was unquestionably very much smaller than the expenditure. The opening of the post office could not on these grounds be justified; but there were other and higher reasons why it should be kept open. He appealed to the Postmaster General and placed before him the importance to these people of having postal communication even once a week, and asked that the office be re-established. He could ask no favor of the Minister; but he asked justice and fair play towards a large number of people. He was pleased to learn that the post office would be re-opened, the reasons having been found sufficient to justify that course; but he was surprised to find that although it had been found too expensive to run one mail weekly, yet under the new arrangement three mails were to be run every week. He was also surprised that the gentleman he (Mr. Anglin) had recommended in the first instance for the office had not been re-appointed. He (Mr. Anglin) wrote to the Postmaster General asking why that gentleman had been set aside, as he possessed an excellent character and a fair education, and was well qualified to discharge the duties. He, moreover, desired to know whether any charge had been preferred against this person, either of misconduct or incapacity, in order that he might have an opportunity of vindicating his reputation. The reply received was a somewhat curt one, and was to the effect that the postmaster having virtually ceased to be postmaster when the post office was closed, the department did not feel it necessary to re-appoint him. The whole circumstances give the proceedings the character of a petty political operation, which the Government should hesitate to carry out. He brought the matter before the House, because he wished it to be known throughout the country that that extraordinary course was taken to embarrass him politically in the country, and to encourage his opponents in the county. The present post office did not, moreover, so fully meet the wants of the district as did the former one. It was nearer to the main office at Caraquez, and was not in the centre of the population for whom it was required. The new postmaster was a political opponent, but there was no objection, if a new appointment had to be made, that a political opponent should be selected. He would have said nothing whatever on that point, but under the circumstances the country would like to know why it was that at one time a weekly mail for that district was considered too expensive, and yet within a short time afterwards a tri-weekly mail was established; and why a man was set aside against whom no complaint was made, or against whom no complaint could be justly made.

Mr. LANGEVIN. This matter occurred under the administration of my successor in the Post Office Department, and when I observed the notice on the paper I obtained from the Postmaster General a memorandum, to the following effect: The Lower Caraquez post office was closed in October, 1879, on account of the small amount of revenue only, $6.27 being collected during the year ending 30th June, 1879, while the annual cost of maintaining the office was $60. In April, 1880, it was represented to the Postmaster General that the small amount of business transacted at the office was mainly owing to the infrequency of the service—once a week—and an offer was received from John Young to convey the mail three times a week for the same price as was paid for a weekly service. The offer was accepted for one year as a trial; the post-office was reopened on 1st June, and John Young was appointed postmaster.

Mr. ANGLIN said the present post office did not accommodate the people whom it was designed originally to serve. It was now an office entirely for the accommodation of the postmaster himself, who was also paid for carrying his own mails; for that was what it amounted to.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICES AT POCKMOUCHE.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for correspondence respecting the closing of two post offices in the Parish of Pockmouche, County of Gloucester, New Brunswick, and the opening of another office and the appointment of another postmaster. He said that a large portion of the parish of Pockmouche was formerly served by two post offices, the population of the district served being considerably over 2,000. One of the offices was centrally situated; but he had felt a strong reluctance to ask for the removal of a postmaster who had been there for several years. The people on the other side of the river having been put to a great inconvenience in coming to this post office for their mails, a post office was, at his suggestion, established for their convenience. A short time ago, however, both post offices were abolished, and the whole district was now served by only one post office. The existence of the second post office did not entail any expense beyond the salary of the postmaster. Some of the people had to go a distance of four or five miles for their letters or papers. He thought this was one of those cases of petty political malice which ought to be thoroughly exposed, and he was sorry to find any one of the departments of this country degraded into becoming the agency for carrying out petty, local, political spites of this kind. There had been no complaint against either of the postmasters, and although not more than $10 or $12 a year was saved, the inconvenience caused to hundreds, and he might almost say thousands, of people through the change was very great indeed.

Mr. LANGEVIN said the hon. gentleman was quite wrong when he said there was any intention of using the post office Department for political purposes. The suppression of these two post offices took place because the public service required it. They could not place a post office at the door of every individual in the country. Post offices had multiplied to such an extent that it was proper for the Post Office Department to suppress such as were not really necessary. They had done that in different parts of the country, and though the saving in individual cases might not be more than $20, or $30, or $40, the saving multiplied twenty or thirty times made a large sum, and enabled the department to open post offices where none existed now. In the present instance, although the department had suppressed two post offices, they had established one in order to meet the requirements of that district; and he had no doubt, when the hon. gentleman saw the correspondence and ceased to look through his political glasses, he would find that the Post Office Department took the proper course.

Mr. ANGLIN said he had respectfully to contradict the hon. gentleman. He knew that district and its necessities, and he could assure the hon. gentleman that the department had been entirely misinformed when they had been told that the public service required the suppression of any one of these offices. At present a large number of people had to travel long distances, and to go far out of their way to reach the post office which had been established. The proper course would have been to remove one of these offices further away towards Tracadie, and place it more in the centre of the section it was designed to serve. The public service did not require the change that was made, and the cause and motive of it were entirely political and local. In this case there was something more than a mere petty local quarrel; there was the design to injure him in that particular district, but that entirely failed, because the people were all satisfied that the work was not of his doing, that he wished to obtain for them all the accommodation to which they were entitled with due regard to the protection of the public revenues. He had never asked anything from the late Government which he did not feel justified in asking within that limit. The hon. Minister had been misinformed and had misinformed the House when he said the public service required this to be done. It was low, petty, political malice that required it to be done.

Mr. O'CONNOR moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Return of all appointments made since September, 1877, of persons whose services were to be rendered partly or wholly in the Province of Manitoba, their salaries and by whom recommended.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, reports, letters and other documents in relation to a certain drawing of lots for lands on Red River, Province of Manitoba, in virtue of which the Hudson's Bay Company now claim to be the proprietors of a very considerable number of lots improved, cultivated and built upon by private individuals prior to the public notice of the 14th November, 1877, signed by J. S. Dennis, S. G.; also, copies of all reports and documents in consequence or in virtue of which the Dominion Government has, as it is stated, granted to the Hudson's Bay Company one-twentieth of all lands outside of the townships, or in the settlement belt; also, copies of all reports, records, or other documents, upon which the aforesaid notice of 14th November, 1877, was based; also, copies of all letters of instruction, schedules and other letters or documents, in relation to the said subject, addressed to the Lands Office at Winnipeg, with the answer thereto; also, copies of all memorials, claims, petitions and requests, forwarded to the Government on this subject, from the 14th November, 1877, up to this date.—(Mr. Royal.)

Copies of all papers touching the mission of Mr. Lang, of the Department of the Interior, last summer, to Manitoba, in connection with the unpatented lands of said Province.—(Mr. Royal.)

Copies of all correspondence relating to the appointment of Major General Luard; together with copies of all complaints made to the Department of Militia, or the Government, in regard to the administration of Militia affairs by the said Luard.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Copies of communications or correspondence affecting applications for patents to land in the parish of St. Peter.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Copies (1) of the correspondence respecting the contract for all the wood furnished to the Department of Marine for the use of the lower lightship in the Traverse during the past summer; (2) The price paid for this wood, the quantity, quality and kind furnished; (3) The person who furnished this wood; (4) The person who received and measured this wood; (5) Copies of the aforesaid contract or of any document giving evidence of its terms.—(Mr. Casgrain.)

House adjourned at 6 o'clock, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION OF RICHELIEU.

Mr. LAURIER moved that the first Order of the Day be the resumption of the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Laurier, for the reception of the petition of Edmund Ritter and others, complaining of a certain failure of justice in connection with the Controverted Election of Richelieu.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LAURIER asked that the petition be read.

The petition was read accordingly.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The day that petition was presented, I held, as I do now, that it ought not to be received. It is a mere election petition. It sets forth that the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue) was elected in September 1878; that he gained his election through improper means; through extensive bribery; not only by his agents, friends and followers, but by himself; that petition and counter petition were made; that the case was fixed for enquête and merits, and adjourned until the 25th November, 1879, when both petition and counter-petition were dismissed with costs; that this judgment was obtained through collusion and fraud; that there was an understanding to the effect that the member elect, Mr. Massue, was to pay the costs in both cases, and that apart from that he had to pay very large sums of money to some of the petitioners; that this bribery and those improper practices are an infringement of the franchise and the provisions of the House; and the prayer of the petition is that the petitioners should be allowed to prove those facts, not only the facts which brought about the judgment, but also those preceding the judgment and which were the cause of the first contestation. They ask to be allowed to lay before this House the nature of those facts. Before proceeding to prove that this is a mere election petition, I will read the judgment, pages 23 and 24 of the Journals of the House of last Session:

"The Court, having heard the pleadings of the Attorneys of the parties upon the election petition of the petitioners, Jean Jacques Bruneau, et al., vs. Louis Huet Massue, complaining of the election and return of the said Louis Huet Massue, as member elected at the election of a member for the House of Commons of Canada, for the Electoral District of Richelieu, held on the tenth day of September for the nomination of candidates, and on the 17th day of September for the polling of votes, in the year of Our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight (1878):—And upon the counter-petition presented by the said Louis Huet Massue vs. Georges Isidore Berthe, the candidate who opposed him at the said election, and upon the issue between the said parties, having taken communication of the paper-writings of the parties drawn up for the institution of their suit, examined the exhibits and papers filed by the parties respectively, having duly considered the evidence, and upon the whole deliberated, the said case having been fixed for yesterday, the twenty-fourth (24th) November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine (1879), for proof and hearing, then on yesterday put off and adjourned regularly to this twenty-fifth (25th) day of November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-nine (1879).

"Whereas, the petitioners, Jean Jacques Bruneau, et al., have completely failed to prove the essential allegations in their petition, and, whereas, none of the illegal corrupt practices alleged against the respondent, Louis Huet Massue, have been proved; but, on the contrary, the said Louis Huet Massue, his son, Louis Aimé Massue, and his agent, Daniel McCarthy, all three have sworn that they did not commit in relation to the said election, and during the said election, any unlawful or corrupt act, and no other evidence hath been offered: has set aside, and sets aside the said election petition with costs to Messrs. Mathieu et Gagnon, Attorneys for the respondent.

"And adjudicating upon the petition or counter-petition filed by the said Louis Huet Massue, against Georges Isidore Barthe, the candidate opposed to him at the said election:

"Whereas, the said Louis Huet Massue has proved no part of his allegations against the said respondent, Georges Isidore Barthe, the sole witness examined, Napoléon H. Ladouceur, M. D., not having revealed any fact sufficient to constitute a charge against the said Georges Isidore Barthe, in like manner, has set aside and sets aside the said petition of the said Louis Huet Massue, with costs to Mre. Germain, Attorney for the respondent.

"And the Court directs that the deposit of 1,000 made by the petitioners, Jean Jacques Bruneau, et al., and the deposit of a like sum of $1,000, made by the said Louis Huet Massue, in the hands of A. N. Gouin, Esq., Prothonotary of this Court, and by him deposited in accordance with the provisions of the Act respecting judicial deposits in the hands of the Provincial Treasurer, be returned and paid back by the said Provincial Treasurer to the said Prothonotary of this Court, A. N. Gouin, Esq., and by the latter handed over to the petitioners and to the said Louis Huet Massue, after deduction from each of the said deposits, respectively, of an amount sufficient to cover the costs which shall be taxed in favor of the opposite party respectively, including cost of witnesses, constables, criers, and others, which said costs shall be paid by the said Prothonotary to the proper parties entitled thereto.

"By the Court.

"CHARLES GILL,
"J.S.C."

MR. LAURIER,

The petition alleges there was collusion, and that without any evidence whatever the petition was dismissed. We see by this judgment that evidence was adduced and the best evidence called by the petitioners themselves, that of Mr. Massue, whose high character is recognized by everybody. The petitioners themselves had so much confidence in the member elect that they could do no better than call him as a witness. They called his son and then his agent, and being unable to prove any corrupt practices, the petition was dismissed. Now, Sir, they came to this House with a petition in which they insinuate that there have been improper practices, and that the judgment was obtained by collusion and fraud, and it is the same petition word for word which was brought up last Session, except some changes in the names of the petitioners. By the Acts of 1873 and 1874 I contend that this Parliament did exactly as has been done by the Imperial Parliament; that is, we have divested ourselves of all jurisdiction in election cases, and of the means of inquiring into allegations of corrupt practices on the part of those who sit in this House as members thereof. There are now other modes by which such cases can be dealt with. First, they can be dealt with by an election petition, to be presented within thirty days of the announcement in the Canada Gazette of the return of the member. If the seat should be still contested by election petition before the Courts, it is to be contested according to the following clause:—

"The petition must be presented not later than thirty days after the day of publication in the Canada Gazette, of the receipt of the return to the writ of election by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, unless it questions the return or election upon an allegation of corrupt practices, and specifically alleges a payment of money or other act of bribery, to have been committed by any member or on his account, or with his privacy since the time of such return in pursuance, or in furtherance of such corrupt practice in which case the petition may be presented at any time within thirty days after the date of such payment or act so committed."

This Parliament has a right to take cognizance of the facts when the case has been finally disposed of by the Courts and then only on the certificate of the Judges as to special Acts of bribery. In the present case a final judgment has been rendered by the Courts according to section 63. We have before us a judgment unimpeached and unimpeachable, and it is therefore impossible for us to erect ourselves into a high court of appeal to review the judgments of an election court. If the allegations of the petition be true, they should come before the same Court by a special petition, though I admit that this remedy was not available in this case, because the petition was not presented as it should have been within the limit of time provided by law. As to the remedy, by presenting a petition to Parliament, I wish to refer to a decision rendered in 1874, by the Speaker of that day, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), and which is thus recorded on our Journals:

"A motion being made and seconded, that the petition of Horatio LeBoutillier, of Gaspé Basin, Province of Quebec, presented on Thursday last, praying that the return for the last election for the electoral district of Gaspé, be completed and amended, as a matter of privilege, by substituting the name of the petitioner for that of Louis George Harper, be now received;

"And objection being taken to the reception of this petition, on the ground that the subject is one which could only come under the cognizance of the courts of law as provided by statute;

"Mr. Speaker said: 'I cannot find any rule or precedent to guide me in coming to a conclusion on this question. I think it would be well for the House to consider this matter, and lay down a rule with respect to similar petitions in the future. I am of opinion that it is an election petition. Looking over the late English journals, I cannot find any cases of petitions of this nature having been ruled out. After considering all the circumstances, I think that the petition ought not to be received.'"

Later on, in 1873, there was a very important case which came up before the Imperial Parliament. The facts are not similar to those presented here, but the principle involved is exactly the same. An election had taken place for Stroud and the seat of the member returned was contested, and he lost his seat but was not disqualified. The Judge in his return spoke of bribery being committed by some other party, and on a motion being made that the member be unseated some members of the House strongly objected on the ground that by implication the certificate of the Judge showed that the member ought to be disqualified. Some members of the House desired to take new action and go further than the Judge had done. The debate was exactly on a similar question to this: whether Parliament, after having divested itself of jurisdiction in the matter, ought to take cognizance of that case. I will read an extract from a very important book which has just been published, "Amos' Constitutional History," page 445:

"The question has arisen in the English House as to whether by assenting to the Act the House of Commons has for ever parted with its undoubted jurisdiction in cases of election petitions. Under the Act the Judges made their report to the House of Commons, and in the course of their report they are requested to state whether they believed that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed."

Now, under our own law, there are two means of unseating members. When bribery has prevailed in an election to such an extent as that the electors ought to be disfranchised, we have the necessary machinery as provided in 1876. Then a Commission may go on the spot and make enquiry; and if the enquiry corroborates the facts of the petition, further action may be taken to disfranchise the constituency. The work referred to goes on to say:

"On the presentation of this report it might be held to be competent for any member to propose, and for the House to take, any further steps which might commend themselves, without being further bound by the Act. But it would appear by the debate which took place in the House of Commons, February 9th, 1875, that it is no longer practically competent for the House of Commons to do other than carry out the logical results of the Reports of Elections' Judges. The sitting member for Stroud had been declared by the Election Judge not duly elected, but the Judge added, in a last paragraph of a long report, that he had no reason to believe that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. On the proposition for issuing the new writ for Stroud being resisted in the face of the exculpatory report of the Election Judge. Mr. Disraeli, as Prime Minister and leader of the House of Commons, made a speech which derives some importance from the exactness with which it seems to have expressed the mind of the House. Mr. Disraeli said, in fact, that the House of Commons could not refuse to issue a writ for Stroud without abrogating the Election Petition Act, and, as he says, asserting the authority of the House, independently of the other estates of the realm. Referring to the Act itself, Mr. Disraeli says: In that Act there were certain powers given to the Judges which the House of Commons waived after ample discussion, after great thought, and with a due sense of the sacrifices they were making. If we were now to announce that, because the decision of a Judge acting under such authority does not please us we are to come to a decision contrary to that which, according to the provisions of the law, has been made public, I can only look upon it that if this motion were carried, the authority of that Act would be entirely superseded. I am not prepared, however, to supersede or abrogate that Act. * * * I trust the House will not allow itself to deviate into a path so dangerous and difficult as the one that has been indicated, and which we have been recommended to pursue to-night. I am sure if we do we shall open up a scene of confusion which will not easily end, and no question of a contest will ever come before the House without some proposition being made so unconstitutional in its character that the result must be the degradation of the authority of Parliament, and the reduction of all our powers to make ourselves useful to the country."

Mr. Speaker, I rest the case on that important petition. This petition in fact is not a mere election petition. It is one of a class the jurisdiction over which this Parliament entirely divested itself by the Acts of 1873 and 1874, and we have nothing whatever to do with the means by which a member gets or keeps his seat.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend has altogether mistaken the character of this petition. It is by no means an election petition. It is not even alleged that the hon. member for Richelieu has been guilty, either by himself or through his agents, of improper practices. It is alleged simply, that a petition was filed against him charging that his election had been tainted by corrupt practices, committed both by himself and by his agents.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is only alleged,

Mr. LAURIER. Yes; and that through a corrupt agreement entered into between himself and the petitioner, the investigation of these charges was waived. This is the gist of the allegation of the present petition. This petition is based upon peculiar facts, and is in itself of a peculiar nature. The allegations of the petitions are of such a nature as must command the very guarded action of the House. On the one hand, if the allegations of the petition were true, they would certainly constitute a serious charge against a member of this House. On the other hand, if they are true, it is manifest that the ends of justice have been defeated, and that the rights of the people, to be represented in this House according to the forms of law, have been jeopardized and actually set at naught. Personally I know absolutely nothing of the truth of the allegations made in this petition, and, in justice to the hon. member for Richelieu, I must say that until their truth has been established he must be held to be innocent of them all. On the other hand, I am informed that the petitioners whose names appear at the bottom of this petition are men of respectability, men of position and influence in their community, who would not make such assertions unless they had prima facie evidence that they are true. I take it, therefore, that this petition is purely judicial in its character, and ought to be dealt with in a purely judicial spirit, and with the full determination to administer the law without fear or favor, and to do justice to both parties. It may be well that I should state the allegations of this petition for the benefit of those members who have had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with them. At the last election the candidates were the present sitting member, Mr. Massue and Mr. Barthe, who had the honor of holding the seat in the previous Parliament now occupied by Mr. Massue. Mr. Massue was returned by the returning officer as elected, and in due course a petition was filed against him, charging him personally and his agents with corrupt practices. Though it is not material to the purpose of the present discussion, I may say that a counter-petition was filed against Mr. Barthe, charging him with corrupt practices, and asking for his disqualification. After divers desultory proceedings the case was set down for trial on the 24th November, 1879, and on that day, the Judge being present, a trial was gone over. Three witnesses were examined on the part of the petitioner—Mr. Massue, his son, and Mr. Massue's agent, Daniel McCarthy, each of whom, on oath, denied being guilty of corrupt practices; and there being no other witness the petition was dismissed. The judgment of the Court was as follows:—

"Whereas, the Petitioners, Jean Jacques Bruneau, et al., have completely failed to prove the essential allegations in their petition, and, whereas, none of the illegal, corrupt practices alleged against the respondent, Louis Huet Massue, have been proved, but, on the contrary, the said Louis Huet Massue, his son, Louis Aimé Massue, and his agent, Daniel McCarthy, all three, have sworn that they did not commit, in relation to the said election and during the said election, any unlawful or corrupt act, and no evidence hath been offered: has set aside, and sets aside the said election petition with costs."

It would appear from the allegations of this petition now before the House, that this trial which took place on the 29th November, 1879, was not a true and genuine trial, but a mock trial—that it was nothing but a solemn judicial farce—to which the Judge was made an unconscious party. The petitioners allege that at the time this trial took place, a corrupt agreement, made for a money consideration, had been entered into between the petitioners and the respondent to the effect that the petition should be abandoned; but to prevent the public being informed of this agreement, and to prevent any elector coming forward and being substituted in lieu of the petitioners, it had been resolved between the petitioners and the respondent that the formality of a trial should be gone through, so that the respondent should hold his seat. That is the allegation of the petition. It must be borne in mind that this was not a private case; the petitioners were not acting for themselves, but for the public as the trustees of the public. I need not say that in any case of a purely private nature, the law always views with favor any compromise that may be entered into between parties for the settlement of their dispute; but that principle does not apply to cases in which the public are in any way interested. The law provides that in all cases in which the public are interested, no agreement shall take place between the parties, except openly, and in full sight of the Court. This is a principle of common law, and it is also specially provided for in the 54th section of the Controverted Elections Act, which reads as follows:—

"An election petition under this Act shall not be withdrawn without the leave of the Court or Judge (according as the petition is then before the Court, or before the Judge for trial) upon special application to be made in and at the prescribed manner, time and place.

"No such application shall be made until the prescribed notice has been given in the Electoral District to which the petition relates of the intention of the petitioner to make an application for the withdrawal of his petition.

"On the hearing of the application for withdrawal, any person who might have been a petitioner in respect of the election to which the petition relates, may apply to the Court or Judge to be substituted as a petitioner for the petitioner so desirous of withdrawing the petition."

Now, there can be no doubt that if the petitioners had resolved to withdraw their petition, and not to prosecute any further the contestation they had entered into, they would have had a perfect right to do so. But, as I said, they were trustees for the electors of the county of Richelieu, and if they chose to abandon the trust they had taken upon themselves, they were bound to notify their principals, so that the electors of the country, if they chose, might go on with the case. As I have said, it was quite competent for them to abandon that position, but if they did so they were bound under the terms of the law to give notice to the public. If they had given notice to the public, if they had placed an announcement in any newspaper that upon such a day they would apply to be relieved from the position of petitioners in this case, then, as the petitioners now before the House say, they themselves would have come forward and would have asked to be substituted. Now, what were the means adopted of carrying out this agreement, of preventing the investigation made, and preventing at the same time the public from interfering, and any other elector from coming in and being substituted for the original petitioners? There was a mode adopted—I know nothing about it, except that the petitioners say this was the mode adopted—that is to say, resort was had to a mock trial. The proceedings under the law were a sham; witnesses were called who proved nothing of the charge brought against the hon. member, and the proceedings had the effect of confirming the hon. member in his seat. This is the charge brought under the petition; it is not an election petition as the hon. President of the Privy Council has stated. If the facts alleged in the petition be true that there has been a corrupt agreement entered into between the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue) and the petitioners; and if it be true that this corrupt agreement was made, as stated in the petition, for a money consideration, every one must agree that a great wrong has been committed against Mr. Ritter, and that judgment was obtained in a fraudulent manner; then it is the duty of Parliament to deal with the case in the same manner. I understand the hon. President of the Council objects to the reception of this petition; but if it is clear on the face of the petition that the grievances set forth were true; that some wrong has been committed—and this is a wrong in my humble judgment—the petition is entitled to the favorable consideration of the House. So far as I understand, a petition is always accepted by the House when it sets forth a grievance, though the House might come to the conclusion that it is not expedient to grant the remedy which is sought; and in my experience every petition that has been presented has always been received, except where the prayer clashed with the law of the land or the rules of the House. If this petition, as the hon. President of the Council states, clashed with the law, it cannot be received; but if the petition sets forth a grievance for which there is no other adequate remedy contemplated in the law, then the petition should be received. What would be the remedy which the House could apply in this case I am not prepared to say at this moment. The hon. President of the Council objects to the petition because it is an election petition, that it is sought under it to re-try the county election of Richelieu, to prefer again the charges of corrupt practices which were brought against the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue). Nothing of the kind is intended or sought for, and if the hon. gentleman had carefully read the petition he would have seen that such was the case. I feel bound, as the hon. President of the Council has taken that line of argument, to read to the House extracts from the petition. The petition first sets out the election; then it goes on to say that the election was controverted:

"That on the 4th November, 1878, a petition was filed at the office of the Clerk of the Superior Court, at Sorel, the chef lieu of the District of Richelieu, by two duly qualified electors, namely: Jean Jacques J. Bruneau and Joseph Pottier, machinists, of the said Town of Sorel, in the said electoral district of Richelieu, contesting the election of the said Louis Huet Massue, for corrupt practice, both by himself and by his agents and praying that the said election should be declared void, and the said Louis Huet Massue disqualified in accordance with the law.

"That on the day fixed for the hearing, namely, the 24th November, 1879, the Court, then presided over by the Hon. Mr. Justice Gill, dismissed the two petitions for want of evidence, with costs against the petitioners in each case respectively.

"That your petitioners have since learned, and are in a position to prove, that the suit which took place on that day, in respect of the petition of the said Jean Jacques J. Bruneau and Joseph Pottier, against the said Louis Huet Massue, was not decided, after hearing both parties, in good faith as between the said petitioners and the said Louis Huet Massue; but that, on the contrary, the said suit was carried on by collusion and in bad faith between the said petitioners and the said Louis Huet Massue, with the view of preventing a hearing in respect of the corrupt practices with which the said Louis Huet Massue was charged, the voiding of his election and his personal disqualification.

"That your petitioners have since learned, and are in a position to prove, that on the day fixed for the hearing of the said petition, an arrangement existed between the said petitioners and the said Louis Huet Massue, by which it was agreed that the said petitioners would produce no witness, to the end that final judgment might be given dismissing the said petition, and that it was in consequence of that arrangement that no witness able to prove the allegations of the said petition against the said Louis Huet Massue was heard on behalf of the said petitioners, and that the said petition was dismissed.

"That to induce the said petitioners not to cause any witness to be heard who could prove the allegations of the said petition against the said Louis Huet Massue, the said Louis Huet Massue did then promise to pay, and has in fact since paid, both to the said petitioners and to various other persons, considerable sums amounting to several thousand dollars, wherein were included even the costs which the said petitioners were adjudged to pay by the judgment dismissing their said petition, and also all costs on both sides of the said petition of the said Louis Huet Massue against the said George Isidore Barthe his opponent.

"That no notice was ever given by the petitioners, or the said Louis Huet Massue, of their intention not to proceed to the proof of the facts alleged in the said petition.

"That if such notice had been given, your petitioners and other electors would at once have applied to the Court to be substituted for the said petitioners, and would have proceeded to prove the allegations of the said petition in as much as your petitioners truly believe that the said Louis Huet Massue was elected by means of corrupt practices by his agents and by himself personally.

"That the said Louis Huet Massue took his seat in your honorable House and sat there during the whole of the last Session and is now there sitting during the present Session; that nevertheless from the knowledge that they have of what occurred at the last election in the electoral district of Richelieu, your petitioners truly believe that the said Louis Huet Massue has no right to the seat occupied by him, and that the hearing of the said petition filed against him would have demonstrated the fact, and would have resulted in the voiding of the said election, and the disqualification of the said Louis Huet Massue.

"That the said Louis Huet Massue, by preventing and impeding, as he did do, the trying of the allegations of the said petition prepared against himself, thus obtaining from the Court the dismissal of the said petition, did in that way prevent the electors of the said electoral district of Richelieu from effectually contesting his election, and thus was enabled to continue to represent a constituency which he was not entitled to represent, and that by so doing, he did serious injury to the rights and liberties of the electors of the electoral district of Richelieu, as well as to the privileges and dignity of your honorable House;

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that they may be permitted to adduce before your honorable House proof of the facts hereinbefore set forth, to the end that upon proof of such facts your honorable House may take such steps as it may deem just to indicate the rights and liberties of the electors of the electoral district of Richelieu, as well as its own privileges and dignity.

"And your petitioners will ever pray.

"SOREL, 13th December, 1880."

It is plain that under this petition it is not sought to prove before this House the charge of corrupt practices made against Mr. Massue. I apprehend that, in the present state of the law, no election can be contested by the persons and in the manner contemplated by law. The petition does not say that Mr. Massue has been guilty of corrupt practices, either by himself or by his agents, but it simply says that in the opinion of the petitioners there has been fraud committed and a corrupt agreement arrived at between the petitioners and respondent in the case, thereby preventing proper trial under the Election Act. It does not follow that even if the investigation had been as full as possible, the election would have been voided; therefore the President of the Council can scarcely be serious when he states that it is suggested by the petition to again place Mr. Massue on his trial; but what they complain of is that there has been a failure of justice. Not only so, but they complain that a corrupt agreement was made, and that it has had the effect of preventing the electors of Richelieu from exercising the rights granted them by the State. In this case is it not clear that the independence of Parliament has been sorely interfered with, and the rights of the people trampled on? The hon. President of the Council argued that we could not interfere with a Judge's decision. The Judge was imposed upon; the trial that took place did not bring before him the facts of the case, and he was taken by surprise. If that were so, there must be a remedy, and where could that be found except in Parliament? So far as the reception of this petition is concerned, I will cite a case which is perfectly analogous. I have said, and I think the statement cannot be controverted, that when a subject of Her Majesty comes before this House with a petition setting forth a grievance, this House is bound to receive the petition, notwithstanding the fact that the prayer is such it cannot be granted. The hon. President of the Council says the petition cannot be received because the judgment of the Judge is final and cannot be gainsayed. I do not dispute that at this moment; but I contend that a grievance is set forth in the petition, and that that is sufficient to entitle it to be received by this House. The analogous case to which I refer is mentioned in the English Hansard, page 1186, vol. 194, third series:

"Sir EDWARD COLEBROOK presented a petition from certain electors of the counties of Peebles and Selkirk, complaining that, at the last general election, upwards of fifty of the voters had a qualification of an 'illusory character'; that arrangements were being made for largely increasing the same description of votes; and praying the House to afford a remedy. He begged to move that the petition be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Petition read.

Sir GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, that the 50th clause of the Corrupt Practices Act, passed last Session, stated that no return of a member to Parliament should be questioned, except in accordance with the provisions of that Act. He would therefore beg to ask the right hon. gentleman in the chair, whether it is competent for any hon. member to present such a petition; the time for presenting election petitions being limited by the 50th section of the Corrupt Practices Act of last Session? He wished, therefore, to know whether the petitioners were not precluded by that Act from presenting this petition?

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand it, the petition is not one questioning the return of a member. It merely sets forth a grievance which the petitioners think requires the consideration of the House."

This case is exactly the same. It sets forth an agreement. It does not question the ruling of the Judge on this question; it merely says that the Judge was taken by surprise and imposed upon. I may be asked, what will be the consequence; what will be the remedy? I would not be prepared, at this moment, to point out a remedy. That is a question for the due and mature deliberation of the House. But I would suggest that the petition be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections for a thorough investigation, and that that Committee report to the House after they have investigated the facts. I would not go any further. My hon. friend (Mr. Mousseau) suggests that the petitioners could have a remedy before the Court. That would be well enough if this were a case to try according to the rules and procedure of Lower Canada; but I apprehend that under our law of Controverted Elections the Judge is simply exercising a delegated authority, which reverts to the House after he has made his report to Parliament. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that there might be some weight in the argument of the hon. member, that if the facts which are alleged here had been brought before the Judge before his final report to the House, and he had been shown that he had been taken by surprise and had been imposed upon, he might be asked to reconsider the case; but it seems to me that after the Judge has made his report, after the powers delegated him are exhausted, the remedy for the wrong which has been committed does not lie in his hands; but that it is to be sought at the hand of the authority which delegated the power he has exercised—that is to say, at the hands of this House. For the present I would not venture to suggest any other remedy than this one. Whatever may be the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, there is a point which must be quite clear and conclusive to the mind of every member of this House. It is this: If the facts herein stated are true, if it be proved that a corrupt agreement has been entered into between the plaintiff and the respondent for a money consideration paid by the respondent, then the seat which the hon. gentleman occupies in this House has been obtained through fraud, and it must be conclusive that the independence of Parliament has been violated, and the party guilty of that fraud is liable to the censure of this House. It may be said that it is a hardship that such an investigation should take place upon the simple representation of a petition. I know it is; but such a hardship is a consequence of a free state of Government. It is a hardship no doubt, if, after being in a court of justice in a suit brought against him by another person, and he gains it, he is compelled again to have the suit re-opened. But, Mr. Speaker, if the charge brought against the hon. member for Richelieu be true, if the facts be true, it is no hardship. While, if the facts are not true, the hon. member is entitled to the full protection of the House. The petitioners whose names are at the bottom of the petition are responsible for them, and if the charges advanced by them in this petition are false, they would be amenable to and receive the censure of this House. I therefore move, Mr. Speaker, that the petition be received.

Mr. OUMET. Mr. Speaker, I will only mention a few arguments in favor of the dismissal—to use a legal expression—of this petition. I suppose the question just now before the House is as to whether this petition may be received or may be considered by this House. The question before us now is the same as would be before a Court if a demur was raised to a petition, or any legal process. The principle upon which this petition may be received, or may be considered, rests on the fact that this House has within its jurisdiction the granting of the remedy asked for, and that the remedy cannot be obtained otherwise in any legal way than through this Chamber. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, nobody would ever have supported the reception here of the petition on an accusation which might be brought to the cognizance of the Courts, and if a remedy could be granted by the Courts, and if the facts stated in this petition can be dealt with, and a remedy given by the Courts, the petition cannot be taken away from the jurisdiction of the Courts and brought here nobody knows for what purpose. I shall not make any insinuations as to the purposes of the petitioners, but nobody knows for what purpose this House should take these facts from the cognizance of the Courts and adjudicate upon them. I may say, Mr. Speaker, it has been granted by the hon. member who has just spoken, that if this petition is an election petition this House cannot take cognizance of it. Still I humbly maintain that this petition contains all the usual allegations of an election petition; that all the facts contained in this petition may be brought in the regular way before the tribunals mentioned in the Controverted Elections Act, and that the remedy does not lie with this House. Even in the prayer of the petition: "That the petitioners may be permitted to adduce before your honorable House proofs of the facts hereinbefore set forth to the end, that upon proofs of such facts your honorable House may take such steps as it may deem just to vindicate the rights and liberties of electors of the electoral district of Richelieu as well as its own privileges and dignity," the privileges and dignity of the House come next to the rights and liberties of the county of Richelieu. What are those facts upon which the petitioners want to adduce evidence? The petitioners allege first, that the hon. member for Richelieu was guilty of bribery during his election, by himself and through his son and his agent; but they say afterwards: "That the said Louis H. Massue took his seat in your honorable House, and sat there during the whole of last Session; he is there now, sitting during the present Session; and nevertheless from the knowledge they have of what occurred at the last election in the electoral district of Richelieu, your petitioners truly believe that the said Louis H. Massue has no right to the seat occupied by him." What is the fact they want to prove? Even supposing the hon. member for Richelieu had been guilty of corrupt practices during his election, these petitioners cannot prove such practices before this House. Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that the trial was, as the hon. member for Quebec East has been pleased to say, a mock trial. That is not a fact that can be brought against him if he was not guilty of corrupt practices; and that he was guilty of corrupt practices cannot be proven here. Every one knows that these election trials are dangerous, not on account very often of the accusations that are made, but on account of the number of false witnesses every one can bring before the Court. Let us remember what has passed during this trial. Instead of their being presumptions of a corrupt or mock trial, instead of their being presumption that the lawyers and even the Judge were all bought, as insinuated, the facts related in the judgment—facts which cannot be controverted—are that these petitioners had full confidence in the hon. member for Richelieu, and in the oaths of his son and his agent, and after all these parties had sworn they were not guilty of corrupt practices, the petitioners decided to let the hon. member go. They did not attempt, after this proof, to raise the human devices which are used not only during elections, but also during election trials. I come back to the point I was making. What is it these petitioners want to do? To begin a new trial against the hon. member for Richelieu. They call on this House to allow them to bring witnesses before it to prove corrupt practices on the part of the hon. member; they wish to produce here evidence they should have brought before the Court. Is not this the very essence of an election petition. No petition can be received here unless the remedy be shown to be within the jurisdiction of this House. No election petition can be received by us when the remedy asked for can be obtained in the ordinary way indicated by the law of this country. If what is asked by this petition can be granted by the Courts, this House has nothing to do with it. If the hon. member for Richelieu were guilty of corrupt practices during his election and then bought off his accusers, bought off those who brought the petition before the Court, the latter fact, if proved, constitutes also a corrupt practice and comes under the 2nd sub-section of section 9 of the Controverted Elections Act, which read as follows:—

"The petition must be presented not later than thirty days after the day of publication in the Canada Gazette of the receipt of the return to the writ of election by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, unless it questions the return or election upon allegation of corrupt practices, and specially alleges a payment of money or other act of bribery to have been committed by any member, or on his account or with his privity, since the terms of such return, in pursuance or in furtherance of such corrupt practice, in which case the petition may be presented at any time within thirty days after the date of such payment or act so committed; and in case any such petition is presented, the sitting member, whose election and return is petitioned against, may, not later than fifteen days after service of such petition against his election and return, file a petition complaining of any unlawful and corrupt act by any candidate at the same election who was not returned and who is not a petitioner, and on whose behalf the seat is not claimed."

Here is a case clearly laid down and the remedy indicated. Under the provisions of this section the petitioners may make the complaint, which is made in the present petition and obtain the remedy. The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) says: 'No; they cannot,' and I am of the same opinion. Why? Because the time has elapsed within which these parties were obliged by law to bring their petition before the Courts. It would be an absurd proposition to say that such petitions might be allowed to come up against any member of this House, two or three years after the time provided by law, and one which I do not think anybody would entertain for one moment. That, however, is exactly the proposition which has been made by the parties to this petition. There is another reason why this petition should not be received; it may be a lawyer's argument, but notwithstanding it may be so much the better for a good many members of this House. If this petition were brought before a Court I say it should not be entertained, because on its face it appears that the facts mentioned in it have taken place more than thirty days before the petition was presented. The Court would say this petition cannot be received, because it was not filed in proper time. It is not alleged in the petition that the facts have come to the knowledge of the petitioners just before the presentation of the petition; in fact they have been known to them for two years. Another argument against the reception of the petition is, that it was presented last year and then withdrawn. Now, what is the presumption? In law I should say that that would be sufficient to prevent a new petition from being brought before the House, and the presumption, according to the notions of common sense, is that the allegation set forth in the petition, and which are the same as those in the petition presented last year, could not be sustained by the evidence offered to adduce. And what are we asked to do by this petition? We are asked to say that the judgment rendered by the Hon. Judge Gill, who was the President of the Court during the trial, as well as the lawyers and the parties, have all been bought. Not only so, but without proper evidence we are asked to say that the depositions of the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue), his son, and his agent, who is one of the principal citizens of Sorel, were false, that they all committed perjury, for that is what is insinuated in the petition. I say that the reception of this petition by the House would be to admit that an hon. member of this House whom we have had here for two or three years, and who has been declared by the Courts of his country perfectly innocent, had really perjured himself, and was really guilty of the charges which were made in a petition, which is signed by irresponsible parties. I say that when such an accusation is brought before the House against an hon. member, and when another hon. member asks that the petition containing such allegations shall be received, I say that that member ought to render himself responsible for the truthfulness of the accusations that are contained in the petition. The hon. member for Quebec East should stake his honor, in some degree, in taking such a course against the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I have a word or two to say on this question. The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Quimet) concluded his speech with an observation which I think he ought not to have made. I do not think there are contained in the petitions any allegations that the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Massue), his son, or his agent, were guilty of perjury. That is not the ground upon which the present petitioners invoke the interference of this House, or an investigation at the hands of Parliament. It appears to me that the position taken by the member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) is clear and plain; and, in my humble opinion, the propositions he made to the House have not been answered, and are, in fact, unanswerable. The President of the Council Mr. Mousseau in anticipation of, and the hon. member for Laval after the speech of the hon. member for Quebec East, take the ground that this is an election petition. That this is substantially an election petition, and being an election petition that it is not a proper subject for enquiry by this House; that the matter having been disposed of by the law courts the petitioners have no right to come to Parliament for redress. It may be admitted, for the sake of argument, that if this were an election petition in which the petitioners were claiming the seat for Mr. Barthe, that it would not be a fit subject for inquiry here, and that the petitioner having resorted to the Courts, should be tried by the highest of the Courts. But I submit that there is not a word in this petition that affects the seat of the hon. member for Richelieu. By way of introduction and recital some statements are made with respect to the petition that was presented before the Election Court, but these allegations are only there by way of introduction. The real charges of this petition are embraced in two or three clauses of it. For the purpose of showing that the rights of the seat are in no way involved, I will read the first clause bearing on that question:

"That the proceedings before the Election Court were not carried on in good faith between the petitioners and the sitting members, but that, on the contrary, the said trial was carried on loosely and in bad faith between the petitioner and the sitting member, with the object of preventing a trial of the charges of corrupt practices against the sitting member."

There is not a word there that affects the position of the case up to the time of trial. What Mr. Massue did, or what his agents did, is not alleged in that petition as a ground of complaint. The ground of complaint is that the enquiry into the conduct of Mr. Massue and his agents was stifled by collusion and fraud. The next allegation that has any bearing is in the following words:—

"That the petitioners can prove that on the day fixed upon for trial, there existed between the petitioners and the sitting member an agreement by which it had been stipulated that the petitioners should bring forward no witnesses so that the petitioners should be dismissed, and on that account no witnesses were brought forward."

Now, there is not a word there that affects the relative position of the parties up to the day fixed for the trial. The allegation is that by a corrupt agreement made between the petitioners and Mr. Massue the whole investigation was stifled. There was a mock trial, the administration of justice was impeded, and on this ground it is asked that Parliament should interfere.

"That in order that the petitioners should call no evidence to prove their petition, the sitting member had then promised to pay, and has in fact since paid, to the petitioners considerable sums of money amounting to several thousand dollars, in which sums were the cost of the petition presented against Mr. Massue, the sitting member, and the cross petition presented against Mr. Barthe, the contestant."

Now, these are the three allegations, and they are substantially these: that by a corrupt agreement between the sitting member and the petitioners, that petition was not investigated in good faith, that the sitting member agreed to pay as part consideration for not calling witnesses, not only the costs of the petition which he filed against Mr. Barthe, but the costs thrown upon Mr. Barthe by the dismissal of the case. In the case to which the hon. member for Quebec East has referred, the allegations were strongly in favor of the position taken by the President of the Council. In the petition presented to the Imperial Parliament there were some allegations that might be considered as affecting the seat of the sitting member. There it was alleged that the sitting member was elected by what is called in Scotland "faggot votes"—bogus votes; that he got fifty bogus votes; and that the political party opposed by the petitioners in that constituency had made an attempt to manufacture more "faggot votes;" and that if the sitting member were unseated and a new election ordered, these manufactured "faggot votes" would be used. There was an allegation that directly affected the seat. The attention of the Speaker was drawn to the point that it was substantially an election petition, but the Speaker said that there being no claim to the seat it was not an election petition and therefore could be received by the House. There is another case to which I would draw your attention that has some bearing on this point. It is the case of the Rochdale election. There was a petition filed against the sitting member. The matter was under investigation as to the right of the sitting member to the seat. It was charged that an attempt was made to keep a material witness of the petitioners out of the way. It was alleged that one of the friends of the sitting member had offered a bribe of £50 to this witness to absent himself from England and go to New Orleans for the purpose of escaping from the necessity of giving evidence in this investigation. The charge was that a conspiracy had been entered into between the sitting member or his friends and the petitioners; that the witnesses that were necessary for the purpose of establishing the charge in the petition were not to be called, by collusion between the sitting member and the petitioners or the petitioners' friends, and, by collusion between the sitting member and the petitioners, and so in the case we are now discussing, it is alleged that it was agreed that in consideration of a sum of money, no witnesses should be called, and that judgment by default should be taken, dismissing the petition on the ground of there being no evidence, and the sitting member retained in his seat. In the English case a petition was presented to Parliament, complaining that a man, by the name of Johnson, had offered a bribe of £50 sterling to a witness, to induce him to leave England and go to New Orleans for the purpose of avoiding the giving of evidence in the case. A Select Committee was appointed to investigate the facts. But the motion of my hon. friend does not go that far. His proposition now is that this petition should be received by the House, so that subsequent action may be taken upon it after further consideration. That case appears to me to be clearly analogous to the one we are now discussing. If the English case was a fit subject for investigation, then surely in this case it is a fit subject for investigation, whether this alleged corrupt conspiracy between the sitting member and the petitioners did take place or not. If it did take place; if these people, by this corrupt agreement, stepped in between the respondent and justice, then surely it is a proper subject for inquiry here. If the sitting member is innocent, and if no such compact was made, he himself, ought to be the very first to court investigation. The fact that the matter has been before the Court, and that judgment has been given, is no reason why Parliament should not interfere. A precisely similar point came before the Imperial Parliament. A petition was presented to the Court of Sessions in Scotland against Sir Sidney Waterlow, on the ground that he had a contract with the Government at the time of his election. That petition was withdrawn for reasons best known to the sitting member. The electors were not satisfied, however, and at the next session of Parliament they presented a petition complaining of what had been done, and the matter was made a subject of inquiry by the Imperial Parliament. I think the result was that Sir Sidney Waterlow had to resign his seat and go back for re-election. I say this is in no sense an election petition affecting the seat of the sitting member. It is a charge of conspiracy, of collusion, which defeated the ends of justice, and that the sitting member—whether guilty of corrupt practices or not—was a party to that collusion. Now, I submit that that is a fit and proper subject for investigation, and that it is the duty of the House to receive the petition. What will be done with it afterwards is another question.

Mr. LAURIER. I wish to say a word in answer to the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), who has used language at which I must protest against at once. The hon. gentleman said I had insinuated that the lawyer who had conducted this case was bought. Now, I never said anything that could reflect either on the lawyer who conducted the case or on the Judge who presided at the trial. Of the lawyer, I never said a word; of the Judge, I never said a word but this: that this trial had been a farce, to which he had been made an unconscious party, and I think the hon. member was quite blamable, and did not act properly towards a colleague in this House when he attributed to me language that I did not use. I have nothing to say against the Judge; on the contrary, I know him to be a very honorable man, who would not lend himself to anything dishonorable. The hon. member for Laval heard me all through, and he had no reason to use the language towards me which he did, and which amounted to a slander.

Mr. SPEAKER. As this is a very important matter, perhaps the House will allow me to take time to consider it.

Hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND.

Mr. TROW enquired, Whether the Government have had any correspondence with the Imperial Government respecting the promotion of assisted emigration from the over-populated or distressed districts in Ireland? Whether information has been requested by the Imperial Government respecting the various Provinces of the Dominion as fields for emigration; and if so, has such information been furnished? If such correspondence has taken place between the Government and the Imperial Government; will it be laid upon the Table during the present Session of Parliament?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government have had correspondence with reference to the promotion of assisted emigration from Ireland, and those papers will be brought down. No information has been requested by the Imperial Government as to the various Provinces as fields for emigration.

JUDICIAL SALARIES.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether it is intended to propose any measure relating to judicial salaries of Judges of the Superior Courts other than those of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) replied in the negative.

TRANSATLANTIC STEAM NAVIGATION.

Mr. WELDON, in the absence of Mr. KILLAM, enquired, Whether any correspondence has taken place between the Government and any person, on the subject of steam communication between St. John, N.B., and Liverpool?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There has.

Mr. WELDON, in the absence of Mr. KILLAM, enquired, Whether, in the event of a subsidy being voted for a line of Mr. CAMERON (Huron).

steamers between St. John, N.B., and Liverpool, the Government will ask for public tenders for the service?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a question that cannot well be put. It puts a hypothetical case. The question should be first whether a subsidy will be voted.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Perhaps you will answer that question.

SALARIES OF ONTARIO COUNTY COURT JUDGES.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether it is intended to propose any measure as to the salaries of the County Court Judges of other Provinces than Ontario?

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). It is not intended to propose any measure as to the salaries of the County Court Judges, other than is contained in the resolution now on the Table of the House, and of which notice has been given.

MONUMENT TO THE LATE SIR GEORGE E. CARTIER.

Mr. TASSÉ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to give effect this year to the resolution adopted by Parliament in 1873, in relation to the erection of a monument to the memory of Sir George E. Cartier, in acknowledgment of his services to the country?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is the intention of the Government.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. HOOPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of this honorable House to a paragraph in the Toronto daily Globe of yesterday's date. The paragraph is headed, "abusing the franking privileges," and is as follows:—

"A few days ago it was accurately stated in the Globe that a member of Parliament whose initials were 'E. H.' had been franking at the public expense circulars for a protectionist newspaper published in this city. It happens there are three members whose initials are 'E. H.' It is therefore as well to explain that the member franking the circulars was not Edward Holton, the Liberal member for Chateaugay."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question is simply who are the three members whose initials are composed of E. H.? This paragraph states plainly that it is not the hon. member for Chateaugay (Mr. Holton), and on reference to the Parliamentary Companion, I find that the only other members are the hon. member for the County of Prince, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hackett) and myself. Now, so far as I am concerned, the allegation contained in this paragraph is false, and I emphatically deny ever having at any time, or under any circumstances, abused my privilege of franking; and more especially as regards a circular in any paper in Ottawa for protection purposes. I presume the hon. member for Prince is quite capable of answering for himself.

Mr. HACKETT. The hon. member has called the attention of the House to this paragraph, and as he has, I presume, satisfactorily to the House, cleared himself of this charge. As it might be considered that I am the guilty party, I now rise for the purpose of explaining that as I have no connection with the paper, nor been requested by anybody to frank for them, so far as I am concerned the allegation is a falsehood. The matter really is not worthy of notice, and it is only because it has been brought up by the hon. member who has just spoken that I make this statement.

Mr. McINNES. I also rise to a question of privilege. I find in the Ottawa Free Press of yesterday there is an editorial on the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Bunster), and in that editorial I find that the member for Yale (Mr. Barnard) and myself are represented as not having voted on the division on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver. I will read the article for the information of the House. After dealing with the absurdity of the motion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bunster), it goes on to say:

"Where was Mr. DeCosmos? Where was Mr. McInnes? Where was Mr. Barnard? Echo answers where. Sir John A. Macdonald, the only other representative of the Pacific slope, was present, but made no sign, though Mr. Bunster turned upon him a mute appealing gaze that would have moved a man of stone."

I need not tell this House that I was present, and that I voted against the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver; so did the hon. member for Yale. I did so upon that occasion, and I am prepared to vote against it as often as it is brought down in this House.

Mr. BUNSTER. If the hon. member for Westminster feels aggrieved at having given a wrong vote for my motion, which in duty bound he ought to have done, it is no fault of mine; and if other hon. members were absent it was no fault of mine. If I saw fit to bring the motion before the House, it was my privilege to do so, and if this House and the country did not think fit to endorse my motion I could not help that. I made the motion in justice to a contract that exists. I brought that motion before this House to remind the House and the country of the contract between British Columbia and the Dominion, guaranteed by Lord Carnarvon.

An hon. MEMBER. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is a little out of order. It is very well for an hon. member to state that a report is incorrect, and, of course, any hon. member can correct anything which has not been well reported; but no new question can be raised.

Mr. BUNSTER. The statement in the paper is not correct.

Mr. McINNES. My object in bringing the matter before the House, was that it placed myself and the hon. member for Yale in a false position. No doubt there was an object in the article, as they must have known that I was in my place, as also the hon. member for Yale, and that we recorded our votes. I simply wish that the reporter of that paper may be more accurate in his reports.

Mr. SPEAKER. What I stated does not apply to the hon. member who has just spoken. He was in the right when he protested against what was reported—that he was absent from his seat the other day. He stated that he was present. Of course it is a question of fact. What I mean is, that when an extract from a newspaper is read, and the statement contained in it corrected by a member, no new question ought to be raised.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman has a right to make this statement, but if this practice is to be availed of as extensively as it appears to have been availed of recently, we ought to have a new heading to our proceedings, "Motions for the correction of errors in newspapers." Seriously, I hope this privilege will be availed of with great discretion, because if, on both sides of the House, we propose to correct all the mistakes of newspapers, we shall have very little else to do.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that we ought to deal with these subjects with a great deal of prudence, and unless charges, seriously affecting a member in respect to his duties as a member of Parliament, the matter should be passed over as an error of the Press. The hon. gentleman is quite right from another point of view. He knows perfectly well that if the majority of this House were to attempt to correct all the errors of the Grit press, no other business would be done during the twenty-four hours.

Mr. ANGLIN. If we attempted to meet all the false charges made by the organs of the hon. gentlemen opposite, I think all night would be occupied.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If this practice relating to the reporter's gallery, which we all respect to a certain extent—and we respect the Grit reporters, although the hon. gentlemen opposite do not do so—is to prevail, the reporters' gallery must be considered a part of this House, and members must single out reporters and say: "You have said so-and-so, and I wish to controvert what you have said."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and if any reporter who is allowed to come into the House to report the debates, adds to that position that of correspondent, and takes to slandering members or stating what is false, I think the House, in defence of its own privileges, should see that the reporter should be expelled from this House.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). I rise to a question of privilege. In the report in the Ottawa Free Press of the speech delivered the other night by the hon. member who bears the same name as myself, that hon. gentleman is reported as saying:

"Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) called attention to a pamphlet sent to his constituents with 'Thomas Robertson's compliments.' He had no objection to that hon. gentleman sending this literature, provided he stated it was Thomas Robertson, of Shelburne. (Laughter.) Hon. gentlemen might laugh, but forgery had been committed. He had collected two of the wrappers, which bore the initials 'T.R., M.P.' There was only one other gentleman who could sign these initials, and that was the member for Shelburne, and he had been assured by that gentleman that the signature was his. He passed on to charge the Opposition with pursuing an unpatriotic policy, and with having failed in their attempts to create an agitation."

I do not think that this is a correct report.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT enquired when hon. members might expect the Estimates to be brought down.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not before Wednesday next.

EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. White (Cardwell) for an Order of the House for a statement of the number of persons who have passed from Canada to the United States by way of Sarnia and Windsor, since 1st of January, 1880, and of persons who have within the same period come into Canada from the United States by way of Windsor and Sarnia, &c.; the motion of Sir Richard J. Cartwright in amendment thereto; and the motion of Sir John A. Macdonald in amendment to the said amendment was resumed.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT'S amendment that 1st January, 1870, be substituted for 1st January, 1880, was negatived.

Mr. THOMPSON suggested that a statement of those who went into the United States by way of the Suspension and the International Bridges be also asked for in the motion.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) objected to the suggestion, on the ground that reports had already been obtained from these particular places, and that if necessary they could be made the object of a subsequent motion. It was better this motion should pass as it stood.

Mr. ANGLIN said that when this question was first introduced, hon. gentlemen opposite asserted that the statements respecting emigration from Canada were grossly exaggerated. It was difficult to obtain precise information because it was sometimes difficult to distinguish between emigrants and people who went to the States on business or pleasure with the intention of returning. Nevertheless, from his part of the country the number of people who left for the States last season was so much in excess of ordinary travel and of previous seasons, that no doubt could exist that a large emigration took place. The estimates varied widely, but the lowest showed a very high figure compared with previous years. The steamers on the line from St. John to Portland and Boston were crowded on every outgoing trip with Canadians, a large number of whom were the flower of our population, consisting to a large extent of skilled laborers. He had heard it stated that the population of St. John and Portland had decreased within some months by 6,000 or 8,000 souls. Clergymen of several denominations had told him they had observed a marked diminution in their congregations, and any one accustomed to the town could not help remarking the small number of people to be now met in the streets, in the stores, and around the wharves. But very few of those who left would return. True, some had returned to work in the boot and shoe factories, in which there was now more employment than a year ago, but the number who returned was very small. It was not an uncommon thing to see the steamers detained, waiting the arrival of a car or two car loads of people for the United States, from Nova Scotia, and various parts of his Province by the Intercolonial; and there was not a schooner, of the many that left every bay and creek of the New Brunswick and part of the Nova Scotia coast, for the United States, that did not carry some passengers who intended settling in there.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. ANGLIN. It might be said, as it had been said, that of those who left the city of St. John during the years 1875-80, that a large number were those who came there to assist in rebuilding the city after the great fire of 1877. It was true, a very large number came from the United States in the fall of 1877, and probably some in the spring of 1878, but it was also true that nearly all of those people had returned by the close of 1878, and that few, if any of them, were included in those who left the city and neighborhood in 1879, when there was so large an exodus. But speaking of the great numbers who left, and many of them he feared never to return, he did not include at any time mere sojourners in the city. He spoke entirely of those who were either natives of St. John or of the Province of New Brunswick, or had lived there the greater part of their lives, and had hoped to spend the rest of their days there, but who were driven away for want of employment, or because, if they were employed, their wages were so low as scarcely to provide food for their families. They had heard similar reports from the Province of Quebec. They had heard from time to time that there were trains, with cars crowded with natives of that Province and others, who were residents of the Province, who were leaving to seek employment in the United States, many of them with the expressed intention of settling in the United States permanently. No doubt some of these had returned, but he was sorry to say that the number returning was small, compared with those who went away. But the most startling reports they had received were from the western districts, and the report of which was the subject of the resolution before the House. It would almost seem incredible that from that district, and from the ports of that district, so vast a number of the people of Canada could have gone out of the country to settle in the United States. The report, however, appeared to be official in its character, though its accuracy had been impugned. He believed the hon. Minister of Agriculture some weeks ago had told the House that he had caused official inquiry to be made through one of the gentlemen employed in his department, and that that gentleman had satisfied himself that the figures were grossly exaggerated. But they had heard another account of that inquiry and its result. They had heard it stated that the United States official who had made this report to his Government, had treated as an insult to himself and his Government the inquiries made by the officer deputed by the Minister of Agriculture, and had insisted on the absolute accuracy of his returns. This much, however, was certain: that the returns which were now impugned by hon. gentlemen opposite, and ridiculed by them as being exaggerated and incredible in their character, were precisely such returns as these hon. gentlemen chose to rely upon for the four or five years when the Mackenzie Administration was in power. They had then pointed to the outflow of people from Canada during those years; and the average number which left during those years was very much less than the average number that had left for a great many years preceding which hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, though the number was larger than they desired to see leave the country. Those hon. gentlemen declared to all who chose to believe them—and many professed to believe them—that that outflow of population could be checked if only they were restored to power and afforded an opportunity of putting their great National Policy into operation. It was quite natural that they should now feel sore at finding that in this second year after they retired, in the year after the National Policy went into operation, the outflow of the people exceeded the outflow of any previous year—not merely during the Mackenzie Administration, but also during their own previous Administration—by so many thousands. It was the largest outflow that had ever been heard of in this country, so that it was quite natural that these hon. gentlemen should try to throw discredit on the official returns which showed such results. But in doing this they also attempted to throw discredit on the very figures which they themselves had relied on during the campaigns of the previous three or four years. In those years they had never heard the accuracy of these returns doubted; in those years they were wailing and lamenting over the deplorable fact that our people could not find employment in their own country; that our young men had no scope and verge for their ambition in this country; and that those who were enterprising were unwilling to be cribbed, cabined and confined in Canada, under a Government that did not know how to protect the country or promote its welfare; that did not know how to open up revenues of industry for the ambitious and enterprising young men of the country, who were, therefore, leaving it in such numbers. He thought it was to be regretted that objection was made to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright). He thought if they would go into an inquiry on this subject at all, it should be a thorough inquiry; if they were to have the test applied to one set of figures, the same test should be applied by the same men to the corresponding figures, so that if they were found to be exaggerated in one case it might be ascertained if they were not exaggerated in the other. Then they would, at all events, be able to form some idea of the extent of the emigration of Canadians to the United States from that district, and by the ports of that district, however much they might differ as to its causes. Its causes were, he believed, multifarious. He would be sorry to hold the present Government responsible to the full extent for that extraordinary outflow of our population. He did not believe the Government could have prevented it no matter what they did, but at all events it had proved that the operation of the National Policy was powerless to check the outflow of our people to the United States, though these

hon. gentlemen had promised over and over again that it would check the exodus of our people to the American territories; and that so far from checking it, that outflow has enormously increased since their return to power. He trusted and hoped that now that the great business depression had passed away all over the country; that now that Canada, and even the city of St. John was enjoying better times, our emigration would not be so great as it had been. He trusted and hoped that a great many of those who had left would find it to their interest to return and to bring with them many valuable citizens to this country who, finding themselves contented with their lot in Canada, would be the means in their turn of inducing many others to follow their example.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY said he had some information which he was sure would be gratifying to the hon. gentleman who just sat down, with reference to the number of Canadians who had returned by the International line to the city of St. John during the last autumn. He had seen it stated in one of the papers that 150 people had returned by one boat, and he had asked the emigration agent there to interview the agent of that line of steamers, and to ask that gentleman to furnish him (Sir Leonard Tilley) with information as to the number who had returned by that line. He had been informed by Captain Chisholm that 2,270 persons had returned to Canada during the season by their line. It was true that quite a number had left early in the season, but the above number had returned by the International line alone. Without wishing to anticipate any financial statement, he might be allowed to quote from returns recently placed in his hands covering the first six months of the present fiscal year, as compared with the same period of the last fiscal year, giving the exports and imports of the Provinces. As regarded New Brunswick, if there had been a large emigration, there had been also a considerable increase in the consuming power of the population. For the first six months of 1879, the exports and imports amounted to $4,563,660; whereas for the first six months of the present year they amounted to $6,816,000. The exports were this year, $2,684,000, against $1,693,000 last year. Similar comparative statistics for the whole Dominion showed that if there had been such a tremendous exodus as was pretended, the returns did not indicate it. In the article of tea, during the first six months of last year, duty was paid on 6,062,000 lbs., while for the corresponding period this year duty had been paid on 8,098,000 lbs.; coffee, last year, 711,441 lbs., this year, 886,317 lbs.; dried fruits, last year, 282,824 lbs., this year, 495,142 lbs. Of molasses, consumed principally in the Lower Provinces, 40,000 gallons more were consumed in the six months of the present year than during the corresponding period of last year. It was true, doubtless, that on some of these items, some part of the consumption of the first six months of the present year had been taken out of the similar period of last year, but it still was quite clear that if we had a smaller population by reason of the exodus the consuming power of the population had been wonderfully increased.

Mr. WELDON said he would have liked if the hon. the Finance Minister had ascertained from Captain Chisholm the number of persons who had departed by the International line of steamers. No man who lived in St. John, and who had opportunities of knowing what was going on throughout the Province, could fail to see that great numbers of people had been emigrating from that Province. A man would have to shut his eyes to ignore it. For instance, last September he left St. John to go to the United States, and the Intercolonial train failed to connect with the western train, consequently when the next Intercolonial train came up there was a large number of people collected on both trains. Along with the conductor he endeavored to ascertain the number of emigrants on both trains, and found there were not less than 125 going to reside in the United States, some from New Brunswick and some from Prince Edward Island. The hon. the Finance Minister had given returns of imports for the last two years. He (Mr. Weldon) would compare 1877 with 1880, and he found that whereas in 1877 the imports amounted to $7,000,000, they were reduced in 1880 to something like $3,000,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY asked if the former period was not that when everything was being rebuilt in St. John on account of the fire.

Mr. WELDON said he would begin with 1875, when the imports were $9,853,000; 1876, $6,013,000; 1877, $6,917,950; 1878, $3,474,000; 1879, $3,338,000; 1880, $3,996,000. That showed how the importations had fallen off during the last two years. Doubtless there had been an influx of workmen into St. John after the great fire, but that increase had been more than lost since by emigration. Anyone going down to the wharf of the International line of steamers, leaving three times a week, could not fail to see large numbers of persons easily to be recognized as emigrants, who had gathered up their household goods and were seeking homes in another country. In regard to the city of St. John he found that in 1878 the number of ratepayers who paid poll-tax on both the eastern and western sides were 6,331; where in 1880 the number had diminished to 4,973, a falling off in two years of about 1,350, representing a population of 5,000 people. Any person who travelled across the Bay of Fundy could not fail to see that a large number of people were leaving Nova Scotia by the American boats for the United States. On one occasion an American boat was detained two hours, waiting the arrival of 150 emigrants whom she carried off to the United States. For the first time in the history of New Brunswick, the annual increase in ship building which had been her experience for years, had ceased in 1880; and not only so, but the amount of money invested in that industry had actually diminished. And this had happened during a year when Providence had blessed the labor of the husbandman with an abundant harvest, and when, for the first time since 1873, good prices had been obtained for their lumber in Great Britain. In spite of the bountiful harvest and the revival in the lumber trade, this exodus was going on, and he could only attribute it to the policy which taxed our bread, our clothing, and every necessary of life, and compelled the laboring man to go where he could get higher wages.

An hon. MEMBER. In a country where the taxes are higher.

Mr. WELDON. But not to a country where bread was taxed. This exodus of our people was due to the policy of this Government, which took money out of the pockets of the people, not merely to increase the revenue, but to place it in the hands of monopolists.

Mr. MacDONNELL (Inverness) said that when this question arose the other day, he had heard with surprise from the Minister of Agriculture the statement that the emigration from the Dominion had not been greater during the past year than it had been in previous years. His own impression, so far as the Province of Nova Scotia was concerned, was entirely the reverse, and in order to ascertain what the emigration was, he had written to the agent of an American line of steamers running between Prince Edward Island and Boston, touching at the port of Hawksbury, in the county of Inverness. The agent of that line had replied to him that the number of passengers leaving that port was, in 1876, 436; in 1877, 447; in 1878, 373; in 1879, 484, and in 1880, 1,525. The number which had left in 1880 nearly quadrupled the number in any previous year during the past four years, although that year had been marked with a bountiful harvest, particularly in the county he represented. The exodus from other counties must have been greater than from Inverness, because there was no county in the Province less affected by changes in trade. This, he thought, was satisfactory evidence of the melancholy fact that the exodus of the people from the Province of Nova Scotia was on the increase; and it was a sad commentary on the policy adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, a policy which, to use the words of the famous resolution of the hon. leader of the Government, was not only to retain in our country our countrymen, but to cause our expatriated countrymen to return.

Mr. HACKETT said hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, in their efforts to make it appear that there was a terrible exodus from those Provinces, were most industrious in collecting evidence. He knew that some people were leaving the Maritime Provinces for the United States; but why? In order to join their friends there, who had gone during the administration of affairs by hon. gentlemen opposite. He knew instances of farmers who had left Prince Edward Island in 1876 and 1877 for the United States, who had bettered their condition there, and who had written to their friends to sell out their property and join them. They were not driven out by the National Policy. He knew young men who, last year, had given up good positions worth $40 a month, had gone to Colorado in the hope of making much more; but he expected them soon to come back. It mattered not whether a man went to the United States on business or pleasure, he was set down as an emigrant, forced to leave by the National Policy. He had travelled recently to Boston, with his wife and two children, on the line of steamers to which reference had been made; and he supposed he and his family had been put down as emigrants, driven out of the country by the National Policy.

Mr. SHAW said that too much had been made out of the emigration from Canada to the United States. He had occasion to visit Manitoba, and proceeded there by way of Duluth. He returned by way of the St. Paul and Minneapolis Railway, and on the cars there came a United States agent, who took a list of the passengers, enquiring where they came from. He (Mr. Shaw) stated that he came from Ontario, and had been in Manitoba; and he inferred that people who had gone from Ontario into Manitoba and returned to the United States were emigrants to that country. The agent had a book prepared with a list; and as the hon. members for South and Centre Huron, together with two County Court Judges in Ontario, were on board, they, together with himself (Mr. Shaw), were all entered as emigrants to the United States. He would like to know from the hon. members for Centre and South Huron whether their names were not also taken.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). No.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said he would like to know, from the Finance Minister down to the youngest member of this House, whether that practice prevailed a few years ago when hon. gentlemen were crying aloud and bewailing that there was an exodus from this country. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie) had been here he would have arisen and given the House the benefit of his experience and would have shown that he was not driving the people out of this country. The hon. gentleman from Prince (Mr. Hackett) who had spoken just now had explained to the House how it was that there was no exodus going on, except a few friends left behind of the many whom the Mackenzie Government had driven out of the country. The discussion of that question should be approached in a spirit above party, for it was one which, if based on facts at all, was a serious matter, and one which demanded serious consideration. If the fact was as stated a few years ago by the right hon. gentleman now at the head of the Government, that the exodus prevailed because the taxes were not high enough, and if although he has since been in power and raised the taxes, believing he could pin the people to the soil, then, the right hon. gentleman having tried his remedy and failed, hon. gentlemen opposite should acknowledge that their denunciation of the policy which they said was driving the people out of the country was a mistake; they should arise and seek to remove the impression they created then, and acknowledge it was a mistaken policy by which they attempted to remove the evil. He was amazed at the Finance Minister, who had a reputation which he thoroughly accorded to the hon. gentleman, of being a man who ought to be, and could be, if he was living in good company, a candid and fair man. He thought when the question was introduced that hon. members would rise above party, for if they could not rise above the influence of partizanship the fact was not creditable to the House, and that the Finance Minister would offer some reasonable explanation; that he would admit there was an exodus and that he was sorry for it. Instead of doing that the hon. gentleman rose and spoke about some steamship information by which he declared he was able to know some people had returned to St. John. Did the hon. gentleman wish the House to know that the body of emigration was in our favor? Did he wish the House to understand that our expatriated countrymen were returning? If not, why should he have referred to the fact at all. Why should he not have dealt fairly and candidly with this question, instead of in a captious and pettifogging spirit? Why did he not admit that the remedies had not been successful, and that the people had not been kept in the country, instead of making a statement in which he was careful not to commit himself to the statement which he dare not make—that the National Policy was keeping the people in the country and remedying the misfortunes which existed during the hard times which went before. Hon. gentlemen opposite had had plenty of opportunity for trying their remedial measures. They have had years of prosperity, such as the Mackenzie Government never enjoyed. They have had those years of prosperity, having come into power under the promise that they would remedy the evils which were said to exist, the chief of which was an exodus of our people, and which continues with an increasing tide under the National Policy; yet the Finance Minister rises with a bundle of papers and declares that policy is justified because a certain number of people have returned to St. John, though he knows they are only a fraction of the people who have gone from there as well as elsewhere. Hon. gentlemen opposite state that the people should not believe statements made about the exodus. But it was the duty of statesmen to look at facts as they exist, and to find remedies for evils, and if hon. gentlemen on the Treasury Benches found that the same state of things exists to-day, as existed when they were in Opposition, and that the National Policy had done nothing to relieve it, it should occur to the Finance Minister whether there were not some people in the country whose position should be ameliorated, and who should be wed, as it were, to the country, besides the manufacturers to whom the hon. gentleman had given so much attention.

Mr. POPE (Compton) said that when the statements of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who talked about the exodus from this country were disproved, in respect to one part of the country, they had to go down to St. John. Not one month ago they were declaring from the house-tops, on every occasion, that the exodus was from Port Huron, but there is not a word about Port Huron to-day. The Port Huron question was settled.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. POPE. Hon. members could not get over the figures, which were clear and explicit. They might read newspapers and letters from agents showing that a certain number of passengers had gone from Inverness or some other place, but it could be shown that they were, for the most part, going because they had business to do there. He believed they would find a greater number of passengers travelling from every port in this Dominion, last year, than had travelled during previous years; because there had been a general increase of business, and with increased business a greater flow of money; and, of course, when people got money they were found travelling. But he would tell hon. gentlemen that there was no exodus of any consequence from this country, at the present moment, and that there was a larger emigration from the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. POPE said the hon. gentleman knew nothing about it. When people talked about emigration from this country, he could tell them that they did not take into account the immigration into this country from the United States. There was no doubt there was, and would ever be, emigration from this country into the United States, and the figures would show, if hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would look at them, that what they disclose, and what they try to make the country believe about everybody who was leaving, was altogether incorrect. Of course, there was no doubt that the country being more prosperous now there were more passengers passing through Port Huron than some years ago.

Mr. CHARLTON said he had been amused at some of the reasons assigned by hon. gentlemen for the extent of immigration to the United States. Admitting that emigration did exist, the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Hackett) told the House that the people were going from Prince Edward Island to the United States because they had friends there. Their friends in the United States seemed to have a great attraction to them. That was one of the reasons operating powerfully in the matter of emigration to the United States. During the last eleven years something like 3,500,000 emigrants had gone into that country. Their friends were drawn to that country from Germany, Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, and other countries; and the hon. gentleman from Prince (Mr. Hackett), told the House that people were going there not because they were not doing well in their own country, but because they imagined they could do better in the United States. The hon. gentleman, as well as another hon. gentleman, informed the House that in their opinion the United States immigration statistics are defective, because, in their opinion, all travellers into that country were counted as immigrants. He thought, also, that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture advanced that opinion.

An hon. MEMBER. So they are.

Mr. CHALTON said they were not. The United States Customs authorities, when entering a person as an immigrant, inquired of that person his last place of residence, whether he was a citizen of that country, and his destination, and if he represented himself as an inhabitant of a foreign country, emigrating to the United States for the purpose of settling in it, he was entered as an immigrant. If the person was an immigrant his goods passed in free.

Mr. POPE. From the evidence given by Mr. Averil, those questions are not asked because it is a matter of impossibility in the limited time. It would take, he said, twenty men to do so.

Mr. CHARLTON said he knew that trains were detained long enough to enable the Customs officers to make the enquiries the law required, and these officers were not particularly scrupulous about detaining railway trains.

The following letter from the collector at Port Huron would bear out his statement:

"CUSTOM HOUSE, PORT HURON, MICH.,
"COLLECTOR'S OFFICE, 29th January, 1881."

"SIR,—In reply to your enquiries as to the manner of obtaining immigration statistics at this port, I would state that it is the practice for the United States Customs Officers to cross the river to Point Edward upon the arrival of all passenger trains from the East. They then get on board the trains and examine all the hand baggage and parcels in the coaches, and at the same time ascertaining, as nearly as they can, the number in each coach. Announcements are made in each coach, that all persons from Canada will have to claim their baggage and effects upon the arrival of the train at Port Huron. Upon the arrival of the train at Port Huron all baggage from Canada is unloaded, and must be claimed by the owner, when it is opened and examined, when the owner is interrogated as to the place they are from, where they are going, and their intention to remain permanently in this country.

"All baggage of passengers from the Eastern States, passing through Canada, is manifested at the port; when the car leaves the United States the manifest contains a description of the package, together with a check number, this manifest is placed in the car, the car sealed by a United States Customs Officer, and sent in bond to this port, when the car is opened by a United States Customs Officer, who compares the contents of the car with manifest, and if found correct the baggage goes on to its destination without further examination. Two and sometimes three officers cross the river and upon arrival at this port, five and sometimes six officers are employed in examining and passing the Canada baggage, and it often takes an hour or more to make the examination on a single train. The Grand Trunk Railway furnish men to open baggage and to obtain such information as we may desire.

"All parties arriving from Canada with effects, intending to live here, have to make an entry of the same and make oath that they intend to become permanent residents in this country. Passengers going to Manitoba or other British possessions are not classed as immigrants, the furnish an invoice of value of their effects and bond is given for their delivery at their destination.

"We class all immigrants as from the country they started from, not as from Canada. Immigrants from Europe are classed from the country of their last permanent residence. The practice at the Great Western railway is the same, and quite a large number cross the frontier by teams as well as at the different points.

"Respectfully,
H. N. BOTSFORD.

"To Mr. GORMAN,
"Sarnia."

He hoped this information from the United States' Collector at Port Huron would satisfy the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. POPE said there was no confidence whatever to be placed in it. He could prove that by the collector's own officials. His salary depended on the business he could get.

Mr. CHARLTON said it would be understood the hon. Minister of Agriculture, in his place in the House of Commons, discredited the statistics furnished by the United States' Customs officers, especially the one at Port Huron, also the authenticity and reliability of all American statistics.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is your statement.

Mr. CHARLTON said if the immigration statistics at the port of Port Huron were not reliable, as the hon. Minister of Agriculture would have this House and the country believe, then the immigration statistics of the United States were totally unreliable. He held that the statement made by the Collector of Customs at Port Huron was a satisfactory one. He knew from personal observation, having crossed Port Huron repeatedly, that two or three Customs officers boarded every train, that every passenger who had baggage was interrogated, and the utmost pains taken to ascertain the correct destination of these passengers.

Mr. BOWELL. I may give the hon. gentleman a little information as to the manner in which the United States authorities at Washington have obtained their statistics in one class that has come under my notice. They send to the Customs Department of this country to ascertain the amount of imports from the United States, and in every instance the amount has aggregated two or three millions more than their records showed. I merely give this as an instance to show they are not as infallible as the hon. gentleman would lead us to believe they are.

Mr. CHARLTON said they were not discussing imports. The hon. Minister of Agriculture said we were receiving a very large immigration from the United States. Had he any means of informing us what that immigration last year amounted to.

Mr. POPE. I have ; but not with me.

Mr. CHARLTON said he hoped the hon. Minister would not delay in producing it. He felt some curiosity as to the extent of the information the hon. Minister had on this subject. The United States Bureau of Statistics a few days ago issued their report on immigration for the six months ending 31st of December last, which gave the result of the immigration for the year. The annual report would not be issued for a few days yet. According to the report he mentioned, the immigration to the United States last year was not only unusually larger from Canada, but from all parts of the world. It reached 586,068, if any reliance could be placed on the United States statistics, but he supposed the hon. Minister of Agriculture would consider the report mere guess work. The immigration exceeded that of the three previous years. It was 125,000 greater than the largest immigration in any previous year in the history of the country. Over half of that came from Great Britain and her dominions. Great Britain furnished 296,025 ; about one-seventh—or 84,794 came from Ireland, and 134,728 are said to have come from the Dominion of Canada. That was for the twelve months ending 31st December, 1880. The increase in population of the United States during the last decade had been 11,594,188 ; the increase due to immigration had been 3,006,245, leaving 8,587,943 due to other causes. The increase by immigration during the last year was 70 per cent. as great as the average annual natural increase for the last ten years. The emigration from Canada to the United States—if these statistics were reliable—amounted to $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total population of the Dominion. Although those statistics were discredited, he believed that no hon. gentleman who had any knowledge as to the condition of affairs in Canada could be ignorant of the fact that a very large emigration had taken place to the United States during the past year. He believed it would be the testimony of every member of the House that in his own particular locality this movement had been greater than at any previous time. In his own locality the movement had been unusually large ; and while the population of the whole of Canada had decreased $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. by this emigration, he had no doubt that in his own locality the decrease due to emigration to the United States was from 5 to 10 per cent. It was an indisputable fact that in many parts of the country the movement had assumed vast proportions. His business led him to visit the United States frequently, he had crossed the boundary at Port Huron he presumed a score of times during the last few years, and he had noticed great numbers of emigrants crossing at that port. He had seen loaded trains, a large proportion of whose passengers were emigrants for the western States—not only on the Grand Trunk Railway, but on the Great Western as well. He had seen the streets of Port Huron, of Saginaw, and of Bay City, thronged with Canadians who were moving over from their own country to the United States in large numbers. He had no doubt, from personal observation—from his own experience as an eye witness—that the figures which had been given as to the extent of the exodus were substantially correct. But he had not merely the evidence of personal observation, for any person travelling in Northern Michigan must be impressed with the fact that a large proportion of the population of that country were Canadians. He had made inquiries of intelligent men in Northern Michigan, as to the relative proportion of Canadians to the whole population, and he had never known any man put the proportion at less than one-fourth, and the best informed had told him that in that part of the State at least one-half the population, were Canadians. One of the principal newspapers in the west—a paper published in London—published a special edition for the benefit of its Michigan readers who had emigrated from Canada.

Mr. BOWELL. You do not mean to say that they have all gone in there within the last few years ?

Mr. CHARLTON said he was not saying that they had all gone in during the last two years, but he said the population of Northern Michigan was possibly one-half Canadian, that the accession to their number during the last year had been immense, and that from what he had seen himself, and from what he had obtained from trustworthy witnesses, he did not believe the extent of the exodus had been exaggerated by the statistics which had been given. It was perfectly natural that hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches should attempt to discredit the authenticity of the American statistics with reference to this matter. He did not claim that these statistics were absolutely correct, but he did claim that they were substantially correct. He had no doubt from the evidence of his own eyes that our population were drifting away from us with great rapidity ; he had no doubt that we had lost last year 134,000 souls by emigration to America as the statistics of the latter country demonstrated. And these men who were crossing over were the very flower of the population of this country—not the old, the decrepit, or the infants, but men in the very prime of life. In Northern Michigan they would find one-half or two-thirds of the stalwart men who were engaged in the lumber woods there were from Canada, and they would find that in Minnesota, Dakota, and the other Western States, Canada contributed the best kind of immigrants. The United States pointed with pride to the fact that they received more immigrants from Canada last year than from Germany ; that of the 586,000 they received as immigrants from the whole world, nearly 135,000 were from Canada, and they had no objection to receiving such immigrants still more rapidly. They were offering every inducement to bring them there, and it certainly spoke little for the wisdom of the policy adopted in this country that this emigration movement should continue so large and increase so rapidly. He thought that hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of attempting to discredit the well authenticated reports of American officials ; instead of taking refuge behind the plea that the information was false ; instead of insulting the officials of a powerful neighbor, might better own up that their policy had not increased the prosperity of this country—own up that in consequence of the policy they had adopted, our population was drifting away from us. It certainly was drifting away from us. He believed these statistics were correct, notwithstanding all the assertions that the Minister of Agriculture might make to the contrary. He believed that the statistics of the Collector of Customs at Port Huron were to be relied upon, and that the Minister of Agriculture has cast on that officer a needless taunt and a gratuitous insult.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew) said, that if hon. gentlemen opposite were sincerely desirous of preventing the exodus of which they had heard so much they would refrain from so repeatedly presenting to Canadians the advantages of settlement in the United States, as they had been persistently doing since the advent to power of the present Government. They all knew that, during the last two Sessions of Parliament, these hon. gentlemen had been doing their best to point out to our people that the advantages presented by settlement in the United States were much greater than could be offered to settlers in Canada, and surely they did not imagine that statements of this kind made by leading politicians on the floor of this House would have no effect. If these hon. gentlemen believed in these statements about the extent of the exodus to Canada, they should also believe that that exodus was largely due to their own efforts in this House, in drawing attention to the great advantages for settlement possessed by the United States in comparison with Canada. He believed it would be shown, when this matter was finally settled before the Committee on Immigration and Colonization, that the statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, with reference to this exodus, were entirely unfounded in fact. It would be shown, he thought, from the evidence of those who were connected with the collection of statistics in the United States, that it was utterly impossible for one man, or for twenty men, to collect accurate statistics of the exodus at the port of Port Huron. It would be shown, from the returns of the Great Western Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, that those statements were greatly exaggerated. No member of this House ought to know better than the hon. member for North Norfolk, that a large number of the lumber operatives in Northern Michigan were Canadians who went to the United States in the autumn of the year and returned in the spring. Mr. Speaker knows that a large number of Canadians went from his (Mr. Speaker's) section of the country to the lumber regions of Michigan in the fall and returned in the spring. He (Mr. White) had no doubt that every one of these operatives was counted as a Canadian emigrating to the United States, and he had no doubt that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) was aware of that fact. Even if the statements which these hon. gentlemen made were true, if they believed them to be true, but have a patriotic feeling in their breasts, they would not follow the line of argument which they have adopted in this House and before the country. Instead of endeavoring to weaken the hands of the Government, instead of endeavoring to show that the adoption of a National Policy had had the effect of driving out the population to a country where protection is still greater than it was here, if hon. gentlemen opposite would endeavor to show the advantages the people would derive by remaining in this country they would be doing more for the interest of this country than they appear to be desirous of doing.

Mr. FARROW said if we were losing 134,000 Canadians every year by emigration, as was pretended, it was high time we began to enquire into the matter. It was a fact that Canadians went to the United States to remain; large numbers went to remain transiently to work in the lumber woods of Michigan or elsewhere, but after earning $50 or $100 they came back again. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had said that the American Customs officers visited every train crossing the line, and enquired of each passenger whence he came and whither he was going. He (Mr. Farrow) did a little travelling last summer into the United States and the North-West. By a strange coincidence he met on the route his two hon. friends from South and Centre Huron (Mr. Cameron and Sir Richard J. Cartwright). They took the boat at Kincardine, upon which were 300 second-class passengers all going to Manitoba. When they arrived at Duluth the United States Customs officers came along and examined their valises, their shirts and stockings, and everything they had. But not a word did he (Mr. Farrow) hear that officer ask any of these people as to where they were going. He simply did his duty and passed on. One would think that with such a prize as 300 emigrants the officer would have interrogated them, but he did nothing of the kind. Why, it was all bosh. The county of Huron had sent many families to Kansas and Dakota, and some of these families had had sad experience there. One of his neighbors who had gone to Kansas for the sake of placing his children upon farms, had sowed 100 acres of wheat last year which yielded him only ten bushels. That man wanted to come back now, and there were hundreds in a like position. In Minnesota this winter the cold had been so intense that people had been obliged to burn their chairs and other furniture to keep themselves from freezing—and dare not get out of bed for several days. If his hon. friends opposite were patriotic, if they would praise up their own country instead of running it down like the hon. member for Centre Huron, we would see more Americans coming into Canada and fewer Canadians going to the United States. But for one family going to the United States to remain, there were ten going to Manitoba and the North-West. He ventured to say that the county of Huron had sent more inhabitants into the North-West than any other two counties in Canada. When his hon. friend from South and Centre Huron were in Manitoba they were toasted at a banquet in Emerson. Doubtless they felt pretty well and got off a little wind. He happened, by nice coincidence, to be not far away at the time. He had seen in their paper a report of their speeches on that occasion. The hon. member for Centre Huron told the people of Emerson how distasteful was the Government land policy, but before he got out of the country what did he do? Why, he bought five or six thousand acres of land, notwithstanding the great distastefulness of the Government land policy. Now, he would read for the benefit of the House—

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). What is the paper?

Mr. FARROW. Oh, you know it. It is your own Grit paper.

Mr. CAMERON. What is the name of it?

Mr. FARROW. It is not the International.

Mr. CAMERON. You told me the other day it was. I think it is yet.

Mr. FARROW supposed the hon. gentleman was satisfied with the authority. The hon. member for Centre Huron was reported as saying:

"I was most surprised, in the course of my progress through the magnificent country that lies to the west of us, to find a tremendous extent of most beautiful prairie land," &c.

Then he went on to say that the country was excellent, but the inhabitants were going out of it—that no less than 4,500 had gone out of Manitoba into Dakota. Yet he chose to buy land there. Then he went on to speak of his travels through that beautiful country—oh, such a fertile country!—with scarcely a house along the whole road, and all waiting for the settler to come along, but the Government's land policy kept them out. What was that policy? Every man could get 160 acres of land free, and could pre-empt another 160 acres. Was not that a good policy? Where could they get it in Dakota? Now, he wanted the hon. member for Centre Huron to get up and tell them where he got his statistics showing that 4,500 had left Manitoba for Dakota. He could not do it.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will find them if he examines the records of the Land Office at Pombina.

Mr. FARROW said he would guarantee that when these statistics were examined before the Immigration Committee, they would not be found correct. Why did they go there? The hon. gentleman had induced them to go when he was there.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. They had gone before, I suppose.

Mr. FARROW said the hon. gentleman wanted more of them to go. He had said to them: "Gentlemen, look what this Government are doing. They tax you 40 or 50 per cent., instead of letting you buy from your neighbors. You ought not to be taxed thus; you ought not to trade with your Ontario brethren; you ought to go and leave your money with the Yankees;" and he advised them, to all intents and purposes, not to settle in that country which was cursed with such a bad Government. Why, inhabitants of the North-West had told him (Mr. Farrow) that this was the best Government for Manitoba and the North-West that had ever existed, and had said "God speed their policy." Why was it this hon. gentleman made such unpatriotic speeches? Was it to get back into power? Well, he thought they would lay this country waste, and desolate and burn it up, if they could only thereby reach the Treasury benches. That seemed to be their whole desire, but he trusted that it would be many years before they realized it.

Mr. MILLS said one hon. gentleman had told them how very unpatriotic they were on this side of the House in alluding to the large expatriation of people from this country to the United States. It was singular that hon. gentlemen opposite did not discover the unpatriotic character of such a proceeding while sitting on this side of the House. There was on the Journals of 1878 a resolution proposed by the hon. gentleman now leading the Government, expressing his great regret that a policy had not been adopted which would induce the people of Canada to remain at home; and the hon. Minister of Railways, when asked in what way the people of this country could be prevented from emigrating to the United States, replied that a Government was unworthy to occupy seats on the Treasury benches that could not adopt a policy which would secure that end. These hon. gentlemen, by lamentations of this kind, succeeded at the elections and came to office. They had had control of public affairs for the past two years, and so far from the emigration diminishing it had gone on at an accelerated pace. True, the emigration from this country to the United States, during the five years of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, had averaged 24,000 or 25,000 annually, but during the five years hon. gentlemen opposite had been in office previously, it had averaged 42,000 annually; during the first year of their return, it had increased by 10,000, and during the last year, it had exceeded the emigration of the last year of Mr. Mackenzie's Government by 76,000. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, feeling the force of these statistics, undertook to deny them, saying that they were wholly unreliable. Well, the returns were made up now exactly as they had been before, and if they were exaggerated last year they were exaggerated in 1875 and 1876, when the hon. gentleman relied on them. The fact was hon. gentlemen opposite had not kept their promises to the public. They had excited high expectations, and the people had been disappointed. The increased prosperity of foreign countries had enabled Canadian merchants to deal more largely with them than before. What did the hon. Minister of Finance do? He came down to the House two years ago and proposed a change in the tariff, and he further proposed that the people should be prevented from importing as largely as before. He said we were impoverishing ourselves by buying too much from abroad, and he undertook to cure that by discouraging trade with foreign countries. In spite of the tariff the increased building operations in American cities had caused an enlarged demand for Canadian lumber. Our lumbermen had been enabled to employ a larger number of hands both in the woods and at the mills, owing also to the increased demand for lumber in the West Indies and South America; and it was to our improved foreign trade that our increased prosperity, so far as it had increased, was due. If the emigration had diminished during the past month or two, it was because of that foreign trade. The Minister of Finance had stated that the revenue had increased; that trade with foreign countries had increased, and that that increased trade, which he had undertaken to prevent by the increased tariff, was evidence of our prosperity. That prosperity was, however, in direct opposition to the policy which the hon. Minister had enunciated in Parliament and incorporated in the fiscal legislation of 1879. The Minister of Agriculture had submitted statistics of the most preposterous character ever submitted to Parliament. The hon. gentleman undertook to state what the emigration was by a process in simple subtraction: so many people travelled by railway eastward and so many westward, and the difference between the two showed the number of people who had emigrated from Canada to the United States. It was perfectly obvious that no conclusion could be drawn, such as had been drawn by the Minister, from the statistics which he had submitted to the House. The hon. gentleman had affirmed that both sides of the House took an extreme view, especially hon. gentlemen of the Opposition. That bore a striking resemblance to the story of the colored man who remarked how much two ladies resembled each other, especially the one on this side. It was evident that this was a very disagreeable discussion for hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. They had formerly made loud complaints respecting the exodus, and during the elections of 1878 they raised a cry with respect to the extensive emigration, regarding which their patriotic feelings were very much excited. At that time the emigration reached 24,000 yearly; in fact, during the last year of the Mackenzie Government the number was 22,000—now it was nearly 140,000; but those hon. gentlemen did not complain; they decided it as unpatriotic to say anything about it. If hon. gentlemen opposite were honest in their declarations in 1878, they should call on their leaders to redeem the promises which they made to revive the trade and prosperity of the country. They had declared that this was in the power of a Government to do; although they of the Liberal party were under the impression that the prosperity of a people depended on the favor of Providence and their own industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite held that this was a mistaken view, and contended that a Government which adopted a proper fiscal policy could make the country prosperous in spite of the people or of Providence. The result had not been such as those who followed the present occupants of the Treasury benches had a right to expect. It had been anything but creditable to these hon. gentlemen, who, feeling they could make no defence, that they had disappointed the people, that they had excited expectations that could not be fulfilled, now complained that the subject should be in any way discussed.

Mr. McCALLUM said it appeared to him that gentlemen on the other side of the House could never learn by experience. They told the House, and wished the people of the country to believe, that during their reign on the Government side of the House, Canada was as prosperous as it is to-day. When they (the Conservatives) were on the other side of the House they had asked the Liberals to re-arrange the tariff, so as to assist the industries of the country, and thereby prevent, as far as possible, people going to the United States to seek employment. He had no doubt a great many people went to the United States. A great many young men went there to work at lumbering during the winter, but they returned in the spring. His hon. friend (Mr. Charlton) said he saw people crossing in armies at Port Huron into Michigan. He (Mr. McCallum) thought he had been as much as the hon. gentleman in that locality, as he did business there; but he had not witnessed the extraordinary exodus that was alleged to have taken place. He had seen, as he had stated, young men going there occasionally to work in the lumber woods, and he was satisfied that the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) himself must have seen many young men leaving this country to go and work during the winter in the lumbering districts of the United States, and returning in the spring. This was the ground taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite, in support of their assertion that the country was not prosperous, and that they were flies on the wheel. They told the House that no legislation could assist the industries of the country; that prosperity was only owing to good crops; that they never had good crops; that they were unfortunate. The people did not want a Government in power that was unfortunate. People will not employ men who are unfortunate. Did hon. gentlemen want to go back to the policy that they advocated and carried out when on this side of the House? Did they want them to go back to bad crops and hard times? He wished to know if the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) wished to advance such an opinion. He (Mr. McCallum) wished he would, because then the people of Canada would hold him to account for it. He (Mr. McCallum) was very much amused, when on the Opposition side of the House, to see the hon. gentlemen opposite swallowing everything that was offered them, no matter what. It put him in mind of something he had witnessed about two years ago. Robins had built their nests on the verandah of his house, and the old robins coming to the young ones, the latter opened their mouths and whether a worm or a stone was dropped into them down they went. Hon. gentlemen opposite forgot that they were fed on stones, the chief of which was the free-trade stone, and a great many who had swallowed stones had sickened and died without being able to find their way back to this House; and even the hon. the leader of the Opposition had got a stone in his stomach and sickened for a time, but he got well and the electors of West Durham had sent him here. But hon. gentlemen opposite would not learn by experience, and the old bird was feeding them the same bad diet.

Mr. GIGAULT said the statistics of the American officials were not correct, and he could prove by an American journal that we could not rely on their reports. The New York Tribune of 31st January last, speaking of this emigration, said:

"It is commonly said that a large part of the emigration from Canada is of persons who have crossed the sea in vessels which entered Canadian ports, but who have either changed their purpose as to location, after a brief residence in the Dominion, or were originally intending to cross into this country, and to make their homes in the Far West. It would be interesting and useful to have the officials at Port Huron, where a great proportion of the Canadian immigrants enter, instructed to ascertain and report more minutely in regard to this movement."

It was thus obvious that the Minister of Agriculture had very good reason not to attach too much importance to the statistics of the American officials at Port Huron. It would prove very amusing to the electors of Quebec to hear what had been said by Opposition speakers to-night. According to them there was a great exodus from that Province, and that there was only desolation in that part of the Dominion; but the electors of that Province would affirm that there had never been so much satisfaction and contentment as there was now. Some strong Liberals who voted against him at the last election had told him they did not know how the Reform party could expect to obtain power when the National Policy was doing so much good. Yet hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House continued to pretend that the National Policy was ruining the country. The Reform party had had occasion very often to appeal to the electors since 1878. The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington), who spoke a short time ago, knew something about that. Brome was not very far from his own constituency. It was represented in 1878 by a Liberal. Now it was represented by a Conservative. The Reform party had appealed also to the patriotism and intelligence of the electors of Charlevoix and Argenteuil to show that they were dissatisfied with the National Policy, and they knew what answer had been given to those appeals. Speeches and words would not make the electors unhappy. The only thing that would make them unhappy was the fear that the Reform party might return to power, and again introduce that ruinous free-trade policy which existed before 1879. That fear he thought, however, should not exist. The more the Reform party spoke against the National Policy the more unpopular that party became. There was hardly any one without employment in the Province of Quebec to-day. He thought the usefulness of charitable institutions in that part of the country was almost gone. There were almost no poor there; those who could not formerly get employment obtained it to-day. He knew that new manufactures had started in his county and had sprung up in St. John, Montreal and other parts of Quebec. Money was so abundant that many farmers who had money and were willing to lend it at 6 per cent, could not obtain borrowers. The hon. member for Bothwell need not say there was disappointment among the people. On the contrary, there was great satisfaction with the policy of the present Government.

Mr. BOURBEAU. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that for a long time past the young people of Canada have been emigrating to the United States in order to find work. It is a well known fact that it is not long since manufacturers in Canada received any encouragement. The protective tariff adopted by the Americans had encouraged the manufactories of that country, and consequently had drawn away our young people seeking work. We have remarked that emigration to the United States has principally increased since the crisis came upon us in 1874. A tide of emigration then set in which it is not always easy to stop, but I think I am aware of the cause that induced a great many Canadians to go to the United States since last year. The American railway companies have largely contributed to that state of things; they have agents established all through the country, active agents for the sale of passenger tickets on their lines, and these agents were instructed to tell people that were in debt, people whose business prospects were not brilliant, people who had most suffered by the crisis that we have just got through—these agents were careful to tell them: "If you go to the United States, to such or such a town, the manufactories are in full operation, wages are good, you cannot fail to make a great deal of money, and you will come back in a couple of years with enough money to pay your debts and to purchase a fine farm." I have known persons who have allowed themselves to be led away by the fine speeches of these ticket agents, who went to the States, after having sacrificed the few goods they had, and who are now weeping and wishing to come back to Canada. But they cannot; they will be obliged to remain there some time yet; they will still have to know homesickness, with their families, in a strange land. I went to the United States myself, not with the intention of working there, but in order to verify the fact that more than the half of those who are there would fain see themselves back in Canada and wish they had never set foot on American soil. What most aggrieves these poor emigrants who have been drawn to the States by the insinuating speeches of the agents is to learn that our manufactories in Canada are now progressing, that new ones are being started every day, and that workingmen get better prices in Canada to-day than in the United States. I do not say that prices are higher, but they are more remunerative, because living expenses are less here, because in Canada they are at home and can practice economy much more effectually, and live much more happily here than in the United States. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has spoken of the bankruptcies that have occurred in Canada within the last year. I think, Sir, that the bankruptcies that have occurred in Canada since last year are far from attaining the rate of bankruptcies that occurred during the time that the present Opposition were in power, that is to say from 1874 to 1878. The National Policy adopted by our Government has put new life into the business of the country. Our manufactories are filled with workingmen who had been long waiting for work, and we see great activity everywhere. Our leather manufactories are working on a great scale; we have to-day an excellent market for Canadian manufactured leather, thanks to the protection that the Government has extended to these leather manufactories. We have great encouragement for boot and shoe manufactories. It is well known that during several years considerable efforts were made to promote the manufacture of leather in Canada, and you know, Sir, what great difficulties were met with. Protection, that has been granted by the Government, was wanting. To-day those boot and shoe manufactories are progressing rapidly, and increasing daily in numbers. That is a well-known fact that no one can question. Paper manufactories are also progressing and working on a large scale. Agricultural implements, such as shovels, spades, axes, mowing machines, and all other kinds of agricultural implements, are also manufactured in great numbers. Last summer the manufacturers of the articles I have just mentioned, could not furnish half the demands. I know a manufacturer who could not fill the orders he received; and I heard a manufacturer say that he could have sold 800 mowing machines over and above those he had manufactured. Is that a proof that the business of the country is decreasing because this manufacturer missed the sale of 800 mowing machines, worth from $60.00 to $80.00 each? The National Policy has been severely criticised, but it is less spoken of than a year ago. I notice that silence is pretty generally observed on this subject. Hon. gentlemen limited themselves to emigrants going to the United States, but they have not repeated this year what they said last year, to wit: that the National Policy was raising the price of articles of consumption in Canada. Well, after having looked over the tariff, and comparing the prices of articles of consumption, I see that it is precisely the articles upon which the heaviest duties were imposed that we are now buying at the lowest prices. I will take, for example, axes, upon which a duty of 35 per cent. was imposed, and I am in a position to prove that they are sold cheaper to-day than three years ago. I will take hats, upon which a duty of 30 per cent. was put, I can show that since the adoption of the National Policy we have in the country three manufactories of hats that we had not before; and I can, moreover, prove that hats are selling cheaper to-day than three years ago. I can also speak of cotton goods manufactured in Canada; and although the tariff has been raised about thirty-five per cent, I am in a position to state that cotton goods are selling in Canada, proportionately speaking, cheaper than in other countries; and the quality of cotton goods manufactured in Canada can compare with the cotton goods of any other country. The cotton goods manufactured in Canada is of better quality than the cotton-wares that used to be brought from Europe, and can compare favorably with the cotton goods manufactured in the United States. I might mention a great many other articles upon which a duty of thirty to thirty-five per cent. was imposed and that are now selling cheaper than when there was a duty of seventeen and a half per cent. put on them. One day I was speaking in public, in one of the parishes of my county, and a man who works in iron said to me: "With your National Policy you make me pay very dear for my iron; iron that we used to buy last year at $2 per one hundred pounds is now selling at $3.00; and that is on account of your National Policy." But I took the Tariff, and showed him that the duty on iron had only been raised about four and a half per cent. on one hundred pounds, and yet iron had gone up $1. I met the same person later, when iron had gone down $1, and I asked him if the National Policy had the result of putting up and putting down the price of iron. Of course, there will be fluctuations in the market; to-day iron may be very dear, to-morrow it will be cheaper, and we must not conclude that every increase in price is due to the National Policy. Well, Sir, all the agricultural implements that are made in Canada, and that are employed in this country for the cultivation of the land, the duty on all these implements was raised from seventeen and a half to thirty-five per cent., and yet the farmers who need them do not pay any dearer for them; on the contrary, as I have just stated, they are bought cheaper from the fact that they are made in Canada. If you go into a store, Mr. Speaker, you will see that on the shelves and on the counter, more than half of the goods—I am speaking of a general store—are manufactured in Canada. Before the adoption of the present tariff, before the adoption of the National Policy, there were on the counters American cottons, American shirtings, blankets imported from Europe, tweeds imported from Europe. To-day you can hardly find a piece of bleached cotton imported from Europe or the United States. All the cotton goods sold in Canada are for the greater part manufactured in the country. And after that, Sir, they tell us that the National Policy is driving people away from Canada; that emigration is on the increase; that the National Policy is ruining the country. How can that be explained? I would say to hon. gentlemen opposite make haste and speak of the emigrants that are going to the United States, for you will not be able to speak of them long advantageously; soon you will be obliged to speak of them no more, because we are drawing near to the end of this great emigration to the United States. As I said in the beginning, once the tide has set in it is difficult to stop it, but the National Policy is calculated to put an end to this tide of emigration. The increase in the manufactures of the country, the wages of the workmen that have increased from 75 to 100 per cent. within the last two or three years, and the settlement of the lands in the North-West, will impede the tide of emigration, for the Company that we have just entrusted with the building of the Pacific Railway will open up a splendid market for Canadian manufactures. We will soon see this tide of emigration setting in towards the North-West, and we will then have the outlet that hon. gentlemen were so anxious about when we adopted the National Policy. We have often been reproached with striving to glut the market. Well, we are going to open up a market for the surplus of Canadian manufactures. The opening of the lands of the North-West to settlement will draw a great number of immigrants from Europe. On reaching the North-West, the first thing these immigrants want is to procure the most necessary articles for furnishing their houses; they want a stove, they want cooking utensils, all these articles are manufactured in the country, and the National Policy will prevent the inhabitants of the North-West from purchasing them from the United States; so much the more so, that they will be able to get them cheaper here. The settlers in the North-West will require agricultural implements; they will need ploughs; they will need reapers and mowing machines, threshing machines; and these articles, where will they get them? They will come and purchase them in the older Provinces of Canada. Then we will see emigration cease; then the young people of Canada will find profitable employment in our home manufactures and will cease to go away. The heads of families will not be obliged to leave the country to go and earn money wherewith to pay their debts contracted during the hard times; times will have become better, and the fathers of families will not be tempted to change their position. Sir, I say that times will be better, but they are already better. What do we see in the country places as well as in the towns? We see the proof that times are much better, and I will show that such is the case from the fact that the money lenders, the usurers who were ruining the rural population, who were lending money at twenty, twenty-five and thirty per cent.—these money lenders, who have been the cause of a great many people going to the United States; these lenders of money at twenty-five and thirty per cent., cannot lend to-day at even eight per cent., money having become easier. The farmer can, therefore, sell his produce with more advantage. And if the farmers were, to-day, consulted and asked what difference there is between the prices they can obtain for their produce now and the prices they were getting two or three years ago, before the adoption of the National Policy, they would say that, to-day, they are satisfied, but that before the adoption of the National Policy they were far from being so. And in the rural district, where I reside, I have often seen our worthy farmers trying to sell their produce to men who could have promised to pay, and who would have kept their promise, but without success. They could not even sell their goods on credit, and still less for cash. To-day, everything is selling for cash. Money was never more plentiful in the rural districts than it is to-day. I have not the advantage, Sir, of residing in town, but if I judge of what is taking place in the towns by what I see in the country, I should say that the townspeople must be satisfied with the result of the National Policy, because if, in the country, business is good, we are able to meet our obligations towards our furnishers in town. I consider that the rural districts help to increase the trade of the cities; I consider that the country is one of the most powerful feeders of the town; that whenever business is prosperous in the country, it cannot but be prosperous in the cities also. Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to speak upon the National Policy, but the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) tried to insinuate that this policy had brought about a great many bankruptcies in the country this year. And I deemed it my duty to refute that assertion by saying a few words about the manufactories that are now in the country; by trying briefly to show the advantages of the National Policy, and by endeavoring to prove that, far from being hurtful to the commercial interests of Canada, the National Policy has been beneficial to the trade of the country. I think that I have succeeded in showing that the hon. member for Bothwell was wrong in stating that the National Policy had resulted in a great many bankruptcies in this country.

Mr. OLIVIER. Mr. Speaker, I will not occupy the time of this honorable House at any great length. I only crave its indulgence for a few minutes. The hon. gentlemen who have just sat down, the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau) and the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Gigault), have shown us the Province of Quebec in an era of such great prosperity that it really pains me to contradict them. I, also, am happy to state that the Province of Quebec is in a prosperous condition; but there is one fact that is clear for everybody, a fact that one must be blind not to see, and that is that emigration from the Province of Quebec is constantly increasing, instead of decreasing. It is quite natural that these gentlemen should boast of the progress of the Province of Quebec, for during the elections of 1878 these gentlemen endeavored to establish that their policy would bring back prosperity to the country; and, to-day, in order to show that their arguments were good, they come and tell us that the Province of Quebec is enjoying a period of prosperity unheard of until now. Well, Sir, the fact that emigration is increasing in the Province of Quebec, as well as in the other Provinces is, I think, calculated to convince these gentlemen that the National Policy has not fulfilled the object they intended it to fulfil. In the Province of Quebec, as well as in the other Provinces, I think I am able to say that the National Policy has missed the mark; for one must be blind, or not go out of the house, not to see every day car loads of emigrants setting off for the United States. These gentlemen are pleased to state that these people are only going for a few days, and that they will come back later. But everyone knows, as well as I do, that nine-tenths of those who start for the States do not come back, but go to swell the population of the neighboring Republic. Hon. Ministers when questioned last year as to the remedy that could be brought to stop this scourge, answered that they knew of none; that by his very character the Canadian was apt to emigrate; and that they said that the people of the Province of Quebec were still emigrating, in spite of the National Policy. Well, this year, and especially within the three months that have just elapsed, we see by American statistics that emigration has increased, and goes on increasing. Thus I think that hon. Ministers from the Province of Quebec, who are now sitting on the Treasury benches, and whose capacities are so much boasted of, would be acting patriotically if they sought for some means of preventing emigration. Unheard of efforts are being made to direct immigration towards the North-West and Manitoba. Far from blaming this policy, I congratulate the Government on having taken steps to encourage immigration to the North-West; but we should not forget the interests of our own Province; and these gentlemen, far from seeking to find some means of keeping our Canadians at home, especially in the Province of Quebec, do all in their power to induce the French-Canadians to emigrate to the North-West. Sir, help was asked for the construction of railways in the Province of Quebec, in order to aid the settlement of the valleys of the Saguenay and Lake St. John. What answer was given? The answer was that the question was under consideration, which was equivalent to saying that nothing would be done; that no help would be given for these railways. Well, Sir, I think that it would have been wiser, instead of inducing our people to go to the North-West, to aid the construction of these railways, which would have secured the development of a hundred parishes, that would contain thousands and thousands of people before ten years. I am far, Sir, from seeing the great prosperity mentioned by the hon. member for Arthabaska (Mr. Bourbeau). In my county there are not a great many manufactories; the county that I have the honor of representing is essentially an agricultural county, and the people are far from lauding the National Policy. The farmers ask themselves what good this policy has done them. Produce sells at better prices to-day because the demand in the American market is better. That is what we see; and it is only in the counties, represented by members who are friends of the Government, that these great changes are noticed. As for us, Sir, although we pay all possible attention to any changes that may take place, we have not yet seen that any has occurred.

Mr. BÉCHARD said he had not intended saying anything in this debate, but the speech of his hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Gigault) impelled him to say a few words. He was surprised when he heard the hon. Minister of Agriculture attempting to lead the House to believe that the emigration of people from the Province of Quebec to the United States was almost nil; and he confessed his surprise was not a little increased when he heard the hon. member for Rouville sustaining the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture. It was well known to any man who lived in the Province of Quebec, that there never was, in the history of that Province, such an exodus as was witnessed from the fall of 1879 up to this moment. The hon. Minister of Agriculture, who came from Quebec, knew this but did not wish to admit it. He (Mr. Béchard) represented a county whose population was about 15,000 souls, and from that county, since 1879, over 1,000 people had gone to the United States. A very large exodus could also be said to have taken place from Rouville, and the several counties adjacent to his. The newspapers of both political parties had contained articles deploring the immense exodus from the Province of Quebec to the United States within the past two years. The hon. member for Rouville said the people were to-day well satisfied. He (Mr. Béchard) did not deny that. They had a very good crop last year and a moderately good crop this year, and the demand in foreign markets had been brisk so that the farmers obtained good prices for their produce. But the people understood this was not owing to the National Policy. They understood that when they depended on the foreign markets for the prices of their produce, the high prices were not the result of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman said he had met Liberals in his county who told him they could not understand how the Liberal party could be dissatisfied with the results of the National Policy. If that hon. gentleman was to call a meeting in his county he could not get a majority of his constituents to pass a resolution endorsing the National Policy. The hon. gentleman referred to elections in the Province of Quebec within the last couple of years, as a proof that the people were satisfied with the National Policy. But he might have referred to the election which took place in his own constituency a year ago, in which the Liberal candidate was elected by over 250 majority, notwithstanding the great efforts and influence of hon. gentlemen.

Mr. HOUDÉ. That was for another Parliament.

Mr. BÉCHARD. The struggle was made on the same ground, in a great measure, as that which took place in Ontario, that is to say, on the ground of Federal politics. He (Mr. Béchard) did not attribute this great exodus to the application of the National Policy, but he would say the National Policy had failed to prevent it, as was promised two years ago and during the last elections.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex) said hon. gentlemen opposite made a great mistake in attempting to discredit the statements made by hon. gentlemen on this side, in regard to the great exodus from the Dominion since a year or two. These statements were either true or untrue. To sustain the position that they were untrue we had simply the general statements of hon. gentlemen opposite; we had the reckless calculation of the hon. Minister of Agriculture who attempted to arrive at the extent of the emigration from Canada by deducting the number of passengers crossing the frontier into the United States from those returning. What had we to sustain the contention that the exodus does exist? We had, in the first place, very carefully prepared statistics from the United States, statistics prepared by Custom-house officers, who were, no doubt, quite able to discharge the duties of their office; we had statements which embraced not simply the general report of emigrants or of people passing from one country to another, but that gave details such as their last place of residence, their occupation, destination, &c. Statements prepared in this way with such care, which were made, not merely at the frontier ports of entry, but at all the Atlantic and Pacific ports of entry, which were sent to Washington, authenticated by the signatures of these Custom-house officers, were more to be depended on than the general statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite. These very statements had been quoted by hon. gentlemen opposite, during the regime of the late Administration, as a proof that the country was languishing, that the people were not prospering, that our trade was declining; and if hon. gentlemen made use of these statements fairly, as proving the existence of that state of things under the late Government, it did not lie in their mouths to refuse at least to pay respectful deference to similar statistics quoted on the opposite side of the House. This was a very serious question, the weight of the evidence, so far as he had been able to consider it, went to show that there was an alarming exodus. He believed that the facts quoted by hon. gentlemen on this side were sustained by similar asseverations in their own localities. He was not prepared to say what was the extent of this emigration from his own district, but he did say that he had no reason to believe that the population in the western part of Ontario was increasing very rapidly. He could go further and give many instances in which prosperous and well-to-do farmers had sold out and gone to the North-West. But there was more than that involved in the statement. It was a serious thing in a country like ours, with only a limited population, to be told that something like 100,000 people had left us during the last year. What did that represent? They learned from the reports of the Minister of Agriculture, that every emigrant to Canada represented a cost of about $50, so that the loss of 100,000 people to the Dominion represented an annual loss to the wealth of the country of $5,000,000 which was an alarming amount considered from that point of view. More than that, they would notice that every individual member of our population represented to the revenue of this country at least $6 per head per annum; so that the loss of 100,000 people annually meant a loss to the revenue of $60,000 a year. What he would have expected the Minister of Agriculture to have done, when these serious statements were made by hon. gentlemen on this side, would have been to make a careful investigation of the matter, so that he would have been able to place before the House reliable and satisfactory evidence that the exodus did not exist. The effect of this exodus upon those people who feel disposed to settle in our country must be injurious. Hon. gentlemen opposite must not blame members on this side if they called attention to the facts. The Government and its supporters were quite ready to call attention to the expatriation of thousands of Canadians as they called it, under the late Administration, and they said they were doing their duty as an Opposition in so stating their views with regard to the matter. Were hon. gentleman on this side doing less when they warned the Government that the expatriation was going on still, and at a very rapid rate? If the statistics of the United States Customs officers were correct they had the astounding fact that while, during the five years of the late Administration, 120,937 people left the Dominion for the United States, during the two years of the present Government, 130,602 had left the Dominion, or a greater number by 10,000 in two years, than during five years of the late Administration. Now, if this statement were true—and it was well authenticated—it required the earnest consideration of the Government—it required more than to be pooh-poohed by hon. gentlemen opposite. When the report went already to the Old Country that Canada was a country not to be desired, that it was a country from which our own people were fleeing, and fleeing rapidly, month by month and year by year, everybody knew what the effect would be, that we would receive less than our share of the immigration from Europe. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that members on this side should extol their country. It was not involved in this discussion whether they should extol or decry their country. They were dealing with a particular question, and the question was whether there was or was not such a large emigration as that to which attention had been called in the House. It was not a matter of importance at the present moment whether the exodus was due to the National Policy or to some other cause. The great question was did the exodus exist? And the answer to that question should be established by reliable evidence. He had here a statement from a newspaper published in Manitoba in the interests of the Government, in reference to one single party of emigrants that left in charge of Mr. Taylor of Ottawa. It was as follows:—

"Four hundred and ten Canadians left Ontario on Wednesday, October 8th, in charge of Mr. Taylor the Ottawa immigration agent and, of these, only about one hundred and fifty came to this Province. The remainder two hundred and sixty were distributed at various points of the United States, but principally in Dakota. The proportion, as nearly as may be, was one third to Manitoba and two-thirds to the United States. * * * The start was made from Ottawa on Wednesday, the 8th October, at 8.30 a.m., and reached Brockville the same afternoon, where the train was fully made up and which here consisted of two baggage cars, seven passenger coaches, and some ten cars of freight and stock. Calls were made at Port Hope, Whitby, Toronto, and one or two minor places, which augmented the train to three cars baggage, ten coaches of passengers,—in which there were 410 souls. * * * At Chicago the first break was made; nearly a whole coach of passengers getting off at that city. There was no more left the train until St. Paul was reached when a large number got off, having tickets via Northern Pacific for Jamestown, Mapleton and Fargo. A number of freight cars were detached there. The start from St. Paul was made with three baggage cars and nine passenger coaches only, the freight and stock following nine hours afterwards. A few passengers having left the train at Alexandria and Glyndon, but by far the greatest number got off at Urookston, bound for Dakota, a couple of the baggage cars being also detached here. The journey was continued until St. Vincent was reached about six o'clock yesterday morning, when a considerable number more left the train for Northern Dakota. Not over 100 out of the original number came to this city and only about 150 to the Province."

He was quoting from the Winnipeg Times, a paper published in the interests of the hon. gentlemen opposite. These were statements made on the spot where the information, no doubt, was tolerably accurate, startling as it was. It was due to the opposition that the hon. the Minister of Agriculture, who had charged the late Administration with neglect of duty, in not stopping the exodus which he said then existed, to see now that the proper steps were taken to investigate and settle this question. If this exodus was taking place, then the Government should take steps to remedy the evil. This question ought to engage our serious attention. Such a drain on our population must have a very serious effect upon our future prosperity, and upon our ability to bear the heavy strain involved in the heavy financial burden now existing and to be increased. Last year they called the attention of the hon. gentlemen opposite to the peculiar advertisement contained in some pamphlets that were circulated under the authority of the Department of Agriculture. He was not sure that he might not be able to show that there was a connection between the pamphlets circulated so freely under the imprimatur of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture and this great exodus. The intention of these pamphlets, no doubt, was to disseminate information about the Dominion of Canada, but they did more, for they showed in the most tempting way, the great inducement which Dakota, Montana and Northern Minnesota offered to the settler. Was it possible that this large exodus from Canada was the fruit of the industry of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture in that direction? Had he been sowing the wind and reaping the whirlwind in this matter? Had we here a proof that the hon. gentleman was qualified to fill the high position he occupied, because he was capable of sending a large number of our population to a foreign country than in inducing foreigners to settle here?

Mr. COURSOL said the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) had recommended the House to discuss this question from a high point of view, and not from a party point of view. It was to be regretted that his advice had not been followed by his own friends. The arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite were evidently aimed at the National Policy. He was not in a position to deny the statistics produced by the hon. gentlemen opposite, but he believed they had been greatly exaggerated, and would so be found if they were thoroughly sifted. There was unquestionably a large exodus from this country to the United States. Many reasons had been assigned for this, though, perhaps, they would not be equally convincing to both sides of the House. One fact which could not be denied, was that the great prosperity of the United States, and the high prices paid for wages since the last twenty months, had attracted a good deal of emigration thither. But it must be remembered that this movement was from a country moderately protected, to another country much more highly protected, and where the people were more largely taxed than we were. The National Policy was only in its infancy as yet, but it had already accomplished much in the way of encouraging manufactures. If, as he hoped, the present Government remained in power for a long time to come, and maintained the National Policy, he was confident it would accomplish very much greater results in building up native industries and affording employment to the people. No one will deny but that, in the Province of Quebec, this policy has built up numerous manufactories. In Montreal and other cities thousands of people had been afforded employment in manufactories that had been established under the fostering care of the National Policy. What could be the reason given by hon. gentlemen opposite for this pretended exodus to the United States? Was it on account of the policy of the Government? Was it on account of our institutions? Was it because those hon. gentlemen had been painting in such bright colors the land of the stars and stripes? Or was it because the people of Canada were becoming less loyal and more Americanized than before? Were they leaving the country because they preferred American institutions to ours? He did not believe that. He believed the people of Canada were emigrating to the United States because they wanted money, and because some of them preferred the comparatively easy and well paid work of the manufactory to the laborious and precarious work of the farm. It was impossible to stop emigration in any country. The census of last year would show that even in the United States, emigration was taking place from the east to the west. It was a delusion to attribute this emigration to the National Policy, which hon. gentlemen of the Treasury benches might be proud for having inaugurated, and which the people would support them in maintaining. The hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard) had cited the local election for the county of Rouville as an evidence of dissatisfaction with the National Policy. That hon. gentleman must know better than any one else how that election was carried, as he had, if he (Mr. Coursol) mistook not, taken a most active part in that election; yet he could not deny that the county of Rouville was progressing and had been benefitted by the National Policy. That election had nothing to do with the National Policy; not one word was said about the Federal Government; but the issue was a purely local one. Every means was used to defeat the candidate of the Local Government, and the opposite party knew what kind of corruption was exercised for that purpose, and what efforts were made to injure the popular and talented leader of the Quebec Government. That election was no test of the National Policy. The real tests were the elections which had taken place for this House since that policy had been inaugurated. In the Province of Quebec no less than five elections had taken place, within short periods of each other. In the counties of Joliette and Brome, the candidates favoring the National Policy were triumphant by large majorities; in the county of Bagot, the hon. President of the Council was elected by acclamation; in the county of Quebec, the hon. Minister of Militia was also elected by acclamation; and in the county of Montmorency, the National Policy candidate was elected by an immense majority, although it was predicted that the people there would go against it. These were facts showing clearly that the National Policy was the policy of the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite might say—and he supposed that explained the position they took now—that if they got back to the Treasury benches, and brought back free-trade, not one soul would leave this country for the United States. This was a question which should be looked into calmly, and coolly, with the view of finding some process which could be put into operation to stop this emigration; and if hon. gentlemen opposite could suggest such a process, they might fairly claim to be regarded as benefactors of their country. But he thought it was impossible. Canadians, like other people, emigrated when it pleased them, and when it was to their interest to do so; and he believed the only effectual way to keep them in the country was to maintain the policy we had inaugurated, to build up our industries and extend our manufactures, and from the moment we could give our people work all the year round, the country would prosper and the people would stay at home.

Mr. GILLMOB agreed with the last speaker that it was impossible for any Government to prevent people emigrating when it was in their interest to do so. He had not heard any gentleman on this side of the House say that the National Policy had caused people to emigrate, and he did not think it had driven many people out of the country. The point taken by the Opposition was not that the National Policy had driven the people away, but that it had failed to keep them in Canada. Any hon. gentleman who had been in the House while the late Government was in power could not have forgotten the chapter of lamentations, mourning and woe expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to people leaving the country. They said that when they got into power they would build up the industries of the country, find employment for our young men, and that the exodus would be stopped. The Opposition claimed that the policy of the present Government had failed entirely; that in reality the exodus had increased. He did not know how much it had increased. He knew it was very hard for them to live in the country and feed and clothe their families. His hon. friend from Middlesex stated it was necessary for them to look this matter in the face. It was impossible for them to prevent people going to a country where they could better themselves. They did not claim that that could be done. They only remembered what the present Government had said when they were out of power, and only referred to the matter to prove that their assertions had been groundless. They had deceived the people with the cry that if they got into power they would give employment to everybody, and that no person would be compelled to leave the country. People were found leaving faster than ever. In the county he represented, in a great many instances the able-bodied men were going to the United States. He would like any hon. gentleman from New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island to rise in his place and say that the exodus is not greater than ever before. The hon. the Minister of Finance does not say that they are not going away by thousands, he only says that two thousand came back. He (Mr. Gillmor), would be surprised if any representative from New Brunswick would rise in his place and say that the exodus from that Province has not been astonishing. He believed it was the same with respect to Nova Scotia. He did not believe that any hon. member from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island would rise in his place and say the people were not going away in thousands. He had been informed that in two years 1,000 able-bodied men had left the county of Carleton; they could not leave at the same rate in the future. He did not know whether the National Policy would keep them there or not; but they were not there to go. He did not blame the Government for not stopping them. It was out of their power to do so, they cannot prevent them. It might be that increase of business would stop the exodus for the present, because it would give more employment. But will any hon. gentlemen have the hardihood to tell an intelligent people that they had anything to do with increasing the price of lumber. Would they dare to do it? No. What had they done to keep people in the country? The National Policy had started some manufactories, it had started one factory in the county he represented. It was a soap factory and gave employment to three or four men, but that was a small number of people in a county with from 25,000 to 30,000. Hon. gentleman opposite sing a different song now. Formerly the statement was dragged into every speech that the people were leaving the country. Now Quebec was quite satisfied, every body was well to do. Nevertheless, in Maine they were appointing postmasters who could speak French in order to meet the requirements of French settlers. People left the country to better their condition, because they received higher wages in the United States, and because it is more prosperous than Canada. He regretted the fact, but no Government could prevent emigration, but hon. gentlemen opposite when before the people at the last elections endeavored to convince the people that they could do so. There was no policy, which a Government could adopt to keep its people within the country, except that of making the taxation as light as possible; and any Government which imposed heavy taxes humbugged the people and did not deal honestly with them. There had never been at any previous period in New Brunswick, such an extensive exodus as had taken place within the last two years; and no member from New Brunswick, on either side of politics could truthfully say to the contrary. In both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick the same state of things prevailed. Hon. gentlemen opposite did not wish to refer to this question now, and probably there was nothing practical to be gained by it; but it was pleasant as a set-off to the charges brought against the late Government. Our young people were emigrating to the United States, because it had a less burthen of debt than Canada. In spite of an enormous war, its debt was only $38 per head, as against $40 in Canada, without any war, army or navy expenses, while here taxes are imposed on the bread, fuel and clothing of the people. Yet the hon. gentlemen opposite still promise that a blessed time is coming. That had been the promise of the Finance Minister for twenty-five years. There was always a good time coming, if we lived long enough; meanwhile the public burdens were being rolled up, and the people were being crushed. The people were leaving the country, and they were acting rightly if they could better their condition.

Mr. WALLACE (South Norfolk) said that hon. gentlemen opposite were continually expressing regret at the great emigration from this country, yet they never lost an opportunity of giving publicity to it. It was desirable that the real facts connected with—if it was true—that statement should be brought down by the Minister of Agriculture, in which he promised to prove that the great exodus was not correct, as was alleged by the returns of the Custom-house officer at Port Huron. He (Mr. Wallace) could not agree with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that there was a great emigration from the north riding of that county last year. The hon. member for North Norfolk has placed the emigration at from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 per cent. of the population. Taking the population of the county at 30,000, that would amount to from 1,000 to 1,500, or from 200 to 300 families. He could not believe that there was anything like that emigration from the county of Norfolk. He thought that the statistics would prove that that was altogether over-stated. The emigration from the country was not as great during the last two years preceding the advent to power of the present Government as it had been during the past two years. He thought if hon. gentlemen would reflect for a moment it would be very easy to account for that fact. They left their country to better their condition. Now, what was the condition of the American industries between the years 1873 and 1878? Every man knew that there was a commercial depression, that during that period workshops were closed to a very large extent. They know, as stated by the people of that country themselves, that the United States was filled with tramps. He would ask what inducement there was to any man to leave Canada and go to a country, where such a state of things existed, to look for employment, and go there without a hope of bettering his condition. He thought that fact alone would account for the lesser emigration during that period. The manufacturing industries of that country give a greater diversity of employment to our young men, who, not wanting to go into farming, find a better scope for their abilities. By developing the industries of this country, thereby giving employment to everybody, increasing the wages, and inducing immigration to the country, will be found the diversity of employment required to keep our young men here. That was what was contemplated by the National Policy, and that he thought it was doing. Hon. gentlemen said that the country was being ruined. If that were true, if the industries of the country were not being fostered as they had been during the last two years, would the emigration from this country be less or greater? It would be greater, because if they could not be employed in the manufacture of goods in this country they would have gone to the United States, or some other country. He held that gentlemen, in arguing as they had, were illogical. They contended we were driving people out of this country by high taxation into a country where all admitted the people were higher taxed than they are here. The thing is a positive absurdity, yet these were the arguments hon. gentlemen opposite brought forward to show the exodus was due to the National Policy. What evidence had we that the country was more prosperous than it was. During the regime of hon. gentlemen opposite our trade and revenue declined. To-day both are increasing. Could we have better evidence of the prosperity of a country than the fact that its trade and revenue were increasing.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I am sorry to see the means that are resorted to in order to justify the position taken by the members of the Liberal party, with regard to the National Policy. They think to justify themselves by casting discredit on the Province they represent, and they endeavor to show that far from having derived any benefit from the introduction of protection, we are still in the period of depression. I am able to contradict that statement, because I am in a position to see what is taking place in one of the most important centres of population. I am ready to assert that, in Montreal and the neighborhood, not only there is no such emigration as is stated, but that, on the contrary, there is a homeward tendency. Every day we can see by the papers that property in and around Montreal is going up to former prices, that manufactories are being opened, that the manufactories abandoned under the policy of the preceding Administration are again working under conditions of greater prosperity than ever. And not only are former manufactories taking a new lease of life, but new ones are being established nearly every week. In the county that I represent, the manufactories have more than doubled; the great cotton manufactory at Hochelaga, that was established in spite of the indifference of the Liberal Government, has doubled within two years; and not only has it doubled, but they talk of adding another extension that will treble its producing capacity. On the other hand, in the western part of the same county all the manufactories are in full operation, and thousands of working men find there to-day steady and paying employment. We well remember, Mr. Speaker, that in 1874, 1875 and 1876, the working population was obliged either to abandon Montreal and the neighborhood or else to go and work on the Lachine Canal, that was then being widened, at 50 cents per day, that was paid to them not in money but in goods. If, during the last two years, there has been a continued and large emigration of working men from certain parts of the Province, it was in consequence of the policy adopted by the Liberal Government, and not on account of the policy inaugurated by the Conservative Administration. The present policy has the effect of repairing the evil, of stopping emigration that the policy of the Mackenzie Government did nothing to suppress. To day, thanks to the establishment of these manufactories, we see the houses that were abandoned from 1874 to 1878, once more inhabited; we see families again occupying these homes that were worth nothing to the proprietors that built them. At Hochelaga, for instance, not only are all the houses occupied, but they are obliged to build a good many more to meet the constant demands of the working people who come and swell the numbers of our population. Well, since such a movement is going on in the principal centre, it is evident that, by the very force of circumstances, it will spread to all parts of the country. The establishment of manufactories, their prosperity, their capacities increasing to a considerable extent, the consumption in the country will also increase, and, consequently, agriculture, as well as all other industries, will soon profit by the prosperity resulting from this policy, and ere long we shall see the population of the Province growing; this movement of emigration, begun under the Liberal Administration, is coming to an end, and a homeward movement is springing up that will fill the void created in our midst by the scourge of emigration.

Mr. McCUAIG said the statements with reference to the the exodus from Canada were utterly fallacious. Any person at all familiar with the passage and transport trade of this country would laugh at the statements made here to-night by hon. gentlemen opposite to prove the Dominion was going to ruin because of the people leaving it for the adjoining Republic. With reference to the Federal debt of the United States and Canada he (Mr. McCuaig) had compiled from official documents a statement showing the true position of the United States and Canada up to December, 1879. The statements made here in this connection by some of our public men were highly improper, because such statements were calculated to injure Canada as a country. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to use his own language, "urged that the country would not be populated as represented, and that the revenue anticipated by the Government from the sale of lands was greatly exaggerated, and taking the United States as a standard, he came to the conclusion this Dominion was on the verge of ruin," &c. He (Mr. McCuaig) would endeavor to draw a comparison between the financial position of the United States and this Dominion with a view of demonstrating that the fears of the hon. member were not well grounded. The total debt of Canada, on 1st July, 1879, was (see Public Accounts, pages 16 and 17) $183,974,753; less sinking fund, cash assets, &c., $36,493,683—net debt, $147,481,070. To form a fair comparison as to our relative indebtedness with that of the Federal Government of the United States, we should deduct subsidies payable to Provinces, say $3,442,764 annually, or representing an amount capitalized, at four per cent., of $86,069,100. Net debt, irrespective of subsidies, $61,411,970, of which Canada paid for the Administration of Justice in the several Provinces yearly, (see Public Accounts, pages 73 to 84.) $511,782; for maintenance of Penitentiaries over and above the revenues derived therefrom, $252,367; for the salaries of the several Lieutenant-Governors, $73,000; making a total of this item of $837,149, payable annually by the Dominion Government which, under the United States system, would be payable by the separate States. The capital sum represented by these payments was $20,928,725, making a balance of debt of $40,483,245, which under a system of Confederation similar to that of the United States, would be the total liabilities of the Dominion, on 1st July, 1879. Against this liability we had assets (see pages 27 and 28, Public Accounts): Welland, St. Lawrence and other canals, $30,000,000; railways, including the Intercolonial, and the railways in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, &c., $40,000,000; Pacific Railway expenditure to 1st July, 1879, $13,000,000; expenditure on harbors and light-houses, $4,000,000; expenditure on Ottawa Works, Grenville Canal, &c., $3,000,000; purchase money for the North-West Territory, including expenditure of its organization, $3,000,000; expenditure on Public Buildings at Ottawa, Dominion streams, roads, bridges, &c., $4,600,000, say in round numbers, $100,000,000. The public debt of the United States on 1st December, 1879, was $2,068,849,545; and the Dominion debt on 1st July, 1879, deducting subsidies and allowances to Provinces, for comparison was $40,482,342, or estimating the present population of the United States at forty millions, and that of the Dominion at four millions. The public debt of the United States would form a charge of $50 per capita on their population; while only $10 per capita would meet the debt of the Dominion. He appealed with confidence to hon. members of this House that such an exhibit was sufficient to justify the course of the Government, and he held it justified him in the vote he had recorded upholding their declared policy.

Mr. BERGIN said two things were apparent from the method of treatment of this question by hon. gentlemen opposite. These were the depreciations of this country and its prospects, and the glorification of the United States. He was not surprised, therefore, that hon. gentlemen opposite should become not only annoyed, but infuriated, that any one should doubt the authority they produced from the United States in support of their statements and of their attempts to discredit their own country. The member from Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) said hon. members on this side deprecated discussion on this question. Well, conducted in the tone in which those hon. gentlemen conducted it, they did deprecate it. Hon. gentlemen on this side believed their time could be better spent than in detracting from the merits of their own country, even if it was not as prosperous as it should be. He was glad a gleam of reason appeared to have shot athwart the mind of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) who admitted we ought not to depreciate our own country; that if we published to the world that it was not a good country to live in, it was not to be wondered at there should be an exodus from it and difficulty experienced in drawing to it immigration from the older countries.

Mr. MILLS. Hon. gentlemen opposite did that for five years when they were in Opposition.

Mr. BERGIN said he could not admit that was true; but if it were these gentlemen who possessed all the wisdom of the country ought to be ashamed to follow an example of that kind. The hon. member for Middlesex differed from his leader, and he (Mr. Bergin) had hopes the hon. member would yet come to this side, when he told us that some incentive should be offered by the Government to induce our own people to remain here and people from the older countries to come in. These five years—bright for the hon. member for Bothwell—were spent by him and his colleagues in educating the people to believe that Governments were mere flies on the wheel unable to do anything to advance their interests. We were told by the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) that our bread and fuel were heavily taxed.

An hon. MEMBER. It is true.

Mr. BERGIN said it was not true that the bread and the fuel of this country were taxed; and when hon. gentlemen made these statements they showed that they were true to their own instincts, though they were not true to Canada. They had these statements from hon. gentlemen who had not the same blood in their veins as the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who said that if there was an exodus, he regretted it. When hon. gentlemen spoke of the exodus being so great, they spoke of something which he (Mr. Bergin) did not believe. So far as the exodus from Quebec was concerned, he knew of thousands from that Province, who were said to have gone to the United States, who had settled in Ontario. In Stormont there were two very large—he was going to say very large—settlements of French-Canadians, and they were worthy settlers, who were adding to the wealth and prosperity of that county. In his own town there must be at least 100 families of French-Canadians, and the people there welcomed them because they were among the most thriving and industrious members of the population. From the county of Soulanges, the first of the counties of Quebec adjoining Ontario, there had gone in December of last year, to the State of Ohio, a great many men to work in the lumber shanties, but they would come back in the early spring, bringing back money to assist in supporting themselves and their families during the year. Labor was becoming scarce in the United States; that country is not so full of tramps as it was a short while ago; and it will not be long, under the present policy of this country, before labor will become scarce here—very scarce—unless the doctrines of the hon. gentlemen opposite should be believed outside of the Dominion. It struck him that when the hon. member for North Norfolk told the House, with apparently the greatest delight, that the great bulk of the immigration into the United States was from Great Britain and her colonies; while he was telling the House of the exodus from Canada, that he gloried in the progress of the United States, and that the great business connection that he boasted of having with the United States led him to desire the increase of the population and the wealth of that country even at the expense of the country in which he lived. He (Mr. Bergin) did not think it came very well from any member of this House to depreciate Canada or to do anything which would bring disgrace or discredit upon her. He knew this was the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, but it was a most unwise and unpatriotic policy. If there had been one thing more than another which had cropped up in the present debate it was that hon. members from Liberal counties were the only men that said there was any exodus to the United States. If the exodus to the United States was so great as these hon. gentlemen would have the House believe, were hon. members on the Government side so blind to the interests of the country as not to have discovered it? It might be that there was a large exodus from the Grit counties. He could well believe there was. If the laborers in the counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite were told day by day, by men whom they regarded as leading men in the country, that this country was one in which the laboring man ought not to live, that his bread and his fuel were over-taxed, that it was impossible for him to make an honest living in it, was it to be wondered at that the laboring man should follow the advice of hon. gentlemen and go to a country which, according to them, was a better country for the poor man? Though he did not suppose that hon. gentlemen opposite would pay much attention to anything that came from this side, he would tell them—and they might depend upon it—that before two years had passed they would be taught by the people of this country that the way to their hearts was not by the defamation of the country and its Government.

Mr. YEO said he did not intend to have spoken on this question at this late hour, but he felt bound to notice some of the remarks which had been made by his co-member from Prince county (Mr. Hackett). That hon. gentleman had stated that not many people left that county except such as had been induced to leave by friends in the United States. In the campaign of 1878, that hon. gentleman was loud in proclaiming that the people of Prince Edward Island, from one end of the Province to the other, were leaving for the United States. He told the people that if they would only put his party in power and give them a chance of inaugurating the National Policy, prosperity would return, we would have a cheap country to live in, and our people would come back from the United States. Some people who were preparing to join their friends who had emigrated to the United States, were induced to remain, but to their great disappointment they found that their bread, their clothing, and nearly every other article they consumed, was taxed under that same National Policy. He (Mr. Yeo) believed, from his own observation, that for every person who left Prince Edward Island under the late Government, five were leaving it now, and they were not going there to get labor and return, but were selling their farms at low prices, for the purpose of becoming permanent settlers in the United States. He regretted very much that such was the case. In his own county he had tried his best to induce those who intended emigrating to remain, but to no purpose; the outflow still continued. He had come up from the Island on two occasions this winter, and both times he had noticed many persons on the steamer who were bound to the United States. He had spoken to them in favor of going to Manitoba and had given them pamphlets upon the advantages of that country; but it was of no use. There were some people who had gone from Prince Edward Island to Manitoba and traveled over the whole of that Province and finally settled in Dakota, whence they had induced many of their friends to follow them. My hon. friend from Prince County (Mr. Hackett) must know this very well, as many of them wore from his part of the riding. A great many more are preparing to go—a fact which I sincerely regret, for I do not make these remarks for any political purpose. The bulk of them are going from Prince county and from Queen's county.

Mr. MACDONELL (Lanark) said that a considerable exodus had taken place from his own constituency, though he did not attribute it directly to the Government. When the statement was made some time ago that upwards of 90,000 of our own people had emigrated to the United States, he was considerably surprised, and in order to ascertain how far that applied to his own neighborhood he wrote to the Grand Trunk agent at Almonte, T. W. McDermott, to ascertain the number of tickets he had sold. This agent was a Conservative and opposed him in his election. The agent answered that he had sold during the year 133 tickets to people going to Manitoba, and 316 to people going to the western United States. He had asked the agent how many of these returned to the country, and got reply that nine or ten had returned from Manitoba and about as many from the United States. He simply mentioned this fact, not as having anything to do with the National Policy, because it had not. The people leaving that section were not driven away by the National Policy. He would give the credit to the gentlemen opposite that, so far as his town was concerned, they were satisfied with the National Policy. When there were some nine or ten manufacturing establishments in his town, they had reason to be satisfied. But eastern Ontario was now thickly settled. There were very few openings for settlers, and as the young people grew up they looked around for the most advantageous country in which to establish themselves. Some went to Muskoka, some to Manitoba and others to the United States. Being asked the cause of so many people going to the United States, they had replied that it was because the land regulations in Manitoba were not as advantageous as those of Dakota. If a majority of our people went to the United States it remained for the Government to devise some means to prevent it. As was pointed out last Session, the land regulations in the North-West were oppressive, and settlers who had gone into our North-West had even crossed over to Dakota. These were facts which were for the Government to rectify. He simply threw out this suggestion, by no means in a party spirit, but as a reason why we should do something for our own people. If the hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. White) would go into the southern section of his county he would find his own people by hundreds going to the western States, their farms being swallowed up by mortgages. It was unfair to charge the Opposition with being unpatriotic and decrying their own country because they pointed these evils out to the Government. When the Mackenzie Government was in power, and the then Opposition called attention to the emigration to the United States, he did not remember that they were charged with being unpatriotic. It was a patriotic duty to point these things out, with a view of finding a remedy; and the present Opposition would be unfaithful to their duty and unfaithful to their constituents if they failed to draw the attention of the Government to a movement of Canadians to the United States which all must deplore.

Mr. SPROULE said it was a little singular that all the testimonies of an exodus to the United States came from hon. members sitting to the left of the Speaker. That was not the experience of a large number of the members of this House. He had come to the conclusion that those hon. gentlemen who had this experience in their own neighborhoods, had become individual emigration agents in favor of the United States. He could testify that as concerned his own county, there was not such exodus as had been spoken of. A few years ago, when the country was going down, year by year, when the revenue was growing less, when our debt was becoming larger and our trade becoming smaller, when the people were seeking for bread and could not find it, the emigration to the United States began. At that time, the people out of employment here were not, as a rule, agriculturists, but people engaged in the various branches of manufacturing; at that particular time the manufactures of the United States were going down. But now, when a time of prosperity had come, and these manufactures were springing into life again, people who could not find employment here went there. A few years ago in his section of the country men could easily be hired for $1.00 or $1.50 a day, whereas last summer the same class of men got $1.75, $2.50 and sometimes $3 a day, and were difficult to obtain at that. If, as the hon. member for North Norfolk stated, 10 per cent. of the people of his own locality had gone to the United States, and every man was worth $40 to the country, he thought that hon. gentleman had a just claim on the Government of the United States for something like $60,000 for having by his eloquence induced that large number of people to go to the United States. There was one argument which hon. gentlemen opposite would appreciate. They would find that the exodus among the Reformers of this country would continue, because they would believe them, and as they would ultimately be unable to find enough of that class of politicians to return them to this House they would probably be left at home. Some of the methods used in this House to prove that the people were going away were rather novel. The last speaker had stated that the number of passenger tickets sold was one evidence of the number. It was well known that if a person bought a ticket to Detroit, or some place in western Ontario, he would pay more, proportionately, for it than one to Chicago. Consequently, a great many people bought a ticket for a longer distance, and when they reached their destination sold their tickets. He thought that would account, in a large measure, for the number of tickets sold for the United States. He had crossed the line forty or fifty times, and he had yet to learn that any person went about taking account of the number of people who went to the United States and to Manitoba. A passenger was very rarely asked where he was going. But almost every train moving westward was infested with immigration agents working in behalf of the western States, and he believed the way they had diffused their information accounted, in a great measure, for the number of people going there. We might reasonably ask ourselves why they were going there. Hon. gentlemen opposite said it was owing to the National Policy. If so, they would be leaving a country with a 20 per cent. tariff for one with a tariff of 40 or 45 per cent. Again, it was said the land regulations of the United States were better than ours. That was not the species of argument adopted by the same gentlemen only a few weeks ago, when they were trying to show that the Syndicate would make a large amount of money out of the lands granted to them. They stated that although the lands of the western States were much inferior to ours, they had been sold for $4, $5, $10, and, in some cases, as high as $40 an acre. When we compared the prices of these lands with the prices the Government were asking for ours, we had the best evidence to show that our land policy was much more liberal than that of the United States. Consequently, the people could not be going there to seek homes as agriculturists. The only cause he could assign for the emigration was the diversity of employment they found in the United States, and the commercial policy adopted in Canada was likely to accomplish the same result here. Again, our trade had increased year by year, and there was every evidence of prosperity, and every month the trade was larger than during the corresponding period two years ago. The failures had not been so large; the payment of accounts had been more regular, and there were few men out of employment. Those were the best arguments to prove the inaccuracy of the statements of the Opposition, made night after night, that the country is declining. The agencies established through the action of the Opposition afforded the only reason he could assign for the large exodus declared to be going on from the several constituencies as represented by members of the Opposition in this House.

Mr. HESSON said the question might have been much better discussed if the papers called for in the first instance had been brought down. A great deal of irrelevant matter had been introduced into the debate, and he would not have spoken except he had been pointedly referred to by an hon. member opposite. An inspection of the statistics published by Dun, Wyman & Co., showed: In 1877, failures 1,892 with liabilities $25,523,903; 1878, 1,697 failures, with liabilities $23,908,677; 1879, 1,902 failures, with liabilities $29,347,937. The large number of failures in 1879 was, no doubt, due to the proposed repeal of the Insolvent Law. In 1880, the failures numbered 907, with liabilities amounting to $2,012,783, or about 100 per cent. less in number and about 200 per cent. less in liabilities. That should be a very reasonable answer to any reasonable man as to the results of the National Policy. He was sorry to hear the exodus cry raised in the Lower Provinces. In his own county the population had largely increased, as well as the wealth of the people. In 1871, the last year of the census, it had a population of something over 25,000. The town he lived in, which had in 1811 a population of 4,386, had now more than 9,000; Listowell had increased in population from 976 in 1871 to over 1,800 to-day; Palmerston, which in 1871 was only a cluster of houses, not large enough to be called a village, had to-day a population of something like 2,000. The census when taken would show an increase of over 25 per cent. throughout the whole country. The same progress was noticeable in the adjoining counties. In the whole of his county there was not a vacant farm, and lands there were worth $50 an acre. The National Policy had accomplished what was anticipated of it by its supporters. If it had not kept everybody in the country, it had not driven a man out. Most decidedly people would not leave this country to go to a country more highly taxed. The strongest point made against the National Policy was that it would impose a high taxation on this country similar to that in the United States. It was an absurd proposition to say that these people were moving from the country from the effects of the National Policy. He was not prepared to say but that probably some had left the country from the feeling that they had not accomplished all they had anticipated, but he was also prepared to say that there were now many thousands of people in this country earning a livelihood that would not have been able to do so but for the introduction of the National Policy.

Mr. BAIN said he had quietly listened to this discussion feeling all through that perhaps his own position on this particular question, differed from that of other hon. members on this side. When hon. gentlemen now on the Treasury benches occupied a place in Opposition to the late Government, they were never tired of stating that the emigration policy of that Government was an extravagant one, and they even went so far as to say that they had more population in our country than we could offer remunerative employment to, and that we should therefore cease our efforts to induce immigration from Europe. This cry was repeated by their organs, and he remembered that some of the journals of his party felt inclined to indulge in that view. Remembering this, he had always felt inclined to stand by the Minister of Agriculture in his efforts to induce emigrants to settle in this country. Although he might have felt disposed to taunt these hon. gentlemen with going back on the promises and statements they made in Opposition, when they got into office, he had felt at the same time that the future salvation of this country depended entirely on our drawing to our shores as large a producing population as possible; but he could not forget that, while they were on the Opposition benches, these hon. gentlemen had told the Government that they were flies on the wheel, that they could not keep our people in their own country, and that Canada was going to destruction. They had told the people that if their party had an opportunity of inaugurating the National Policy all would be changed. But they found, to-night, that there was not one hon. gentleman on the other side who would venture the statement that the exodus from Canada was less now than during the regime of the Mackenzie Government. Hon. gentlemen were attempting to discredit the very same official returns which they had been in the habit of quoting against their opponents in days gone by. He (Mr. Bain) thought it was rather too thin for these hon. gentlemen to cover the defeat of their policy by alleging that facts which they found useful when the late Government was in power, were now utterly unreliable. How did the record stand when the hon. gentlemen opposite held office previous to the Mackenzie Administration? Did the exodus to the United States cease? By no means. He found, on looking at comparative statistics for the five years of the Mackenzie Administration and the five years previous, that the number of people who emigrated from this country to the United States during the Conservative Administration was double the number that left under the Mackenzie Administration. He looked forward with a great deal of interest to the development promised by the Minister of Agriculture, for the reason that if they showed the returns made last year to be exaggerated, it would be a source of great satisfaction to us all. Hon. gentlemen opposite admitted that there was a large exodus going on from the older Provinces; but they contended that it did not go to the United States, but rather to our own North-West. He admitted that the revival of business in the United States had much to do in attracting emigrants from this country. Only the other day he heard a gentleman quoting the increased wages paid in the manufactories of his own riding as a proof that the National Policy had benefitted mechanics, whereas if he had stated the whole fact he would have said that the employers of labor in that town had been obliged to increase the pay of the mechanics in order to keep them from going to the United States. It was not because the National Policy had increased the local business, but because better wages were paid on the other side of the line. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not dispute figures showing the amount of acres and the amount of money that had been paid for homestead pre-emptions in our own North-West. He had consulted a return brought down in relation to that matter, and he found that in 1879, 1,096,800 acres were pre-empted, and that the fees alone on the sales of that year for homestead pre-emptions amounted to $34,706. In the return brought down to the end of the month of October of last season, which was practically the end of the emigration year, did they find anything to substantiate those glowing predictions made by the hon. Minister when he told us that by his scheme of appropriating 100,000,000 acres of land for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway 25,000 people would go into that country during the past season? Instead of the immigration rising to that figure he regretted to say that, including everything in the shape of land transactions, only 682,000 acres of sales, homesteads and pre-emptions, had been taken up, and the homestead fees had shrunk from $34,000 to a small fraction over $17,000 clearly showing a decreased immigration. That was convincing proof that there must be a screw loose somewhere in our land regulations in the North-West, and there must be a strong reason why there had been such an enormous shrinkage. People had been leaving the older Provinces, not for the North-West, but they had dropped off on the way and found locations on the other side of the border. But we had been told that the National Policy had created a great improvement in our condition, and one hon. gentleman had the coolness to tell us that, so far as breadstuffs and coal were concerned, we were not a taxed people at all. That hon. gentleman must have been exceedingly oblivious of the official returns laid on the Table by the Minister of Customs only a short week ago. They showed that half a million dollars were collected as a coal tax alone in the Dominion for the last fiscal year, and that nearly $350,000 was collected on breadstuffs. On the single article of cornmeal, which was largely imported into the Maritime Provinces, nearly $70,000 was collected last year. But had the National Policy given the agriculturists of this Dominion an increased price for their products? He found that their exports had risen very largely, from the fact that they had been favored by Providence with a bountiful grain crop. There had been a large increase of the exports of agricultural produce, animals, and their produce, to the extent of from $14,700,000 in 1879, to $18,500,000 in 1880, an increase of $3,800,000; and the cash derived from the increased sale of produce had gone into the pockets of the farmers. They found that the exports of their grain had risen from $25,900,000 to $32,300,000, an increase of $6,400,000 in one year. When this money was put into circulation increased prosperity followed, because he need not tell hon. gentlemen that when the farmer got increased crops he gets more money which, being put into circulation, paid debts, gave employment, and added materially to the substantial wealth of the country. But this could not be claimed as the result of the National Policy. It was the result of a bountiful Providence, notwithstanding the exodus of our population, which he regretted to see, and which he thought was the best proof that the National Policy had not been the panacea it was claimed to be. They had thriven in spite of the National Policy, and not in consequence of anything it had done for them. The hon. gentlemen now occupying the Ministerial benches when in Opposition said that if they got into power the prices of everything would be increased; the farmer was told that oats would be five to ten cents per bushel higher, and that everything would immediately receive a stimulus. But when they crept into office, and the expectations of the farmers and the people generally were not realized, they said: "Wait a little longer; everything will revive after awhile." He thought that those gentlemen ought to have come squarely down to business and admitted that they had crept into office under false pretences; but they meant to hold on as long as Providence favored the country with good crops. He regretted as much as any gentleman could the large exodus to the United States, and he commended to the careful consideration of the supporters of the Government that they were losing people from the older Provinces while it was patent from our diminished lands sales that these people were not taking up lands in the North-West. He asked hon. gentlemen to consider these facts aside from party issues, and he could assure the House that any efforts made by the Government in the direction of stopping the exodus that undoubtedly existed, and of attracting settlers to our North-West, would meet with his hearty support. He did not like to impute motives, but it seemed to him that if the hon. member for Cardwell had been anxious to elicit all the facts he would not have been so anxious to confine his motion to this one particular point. He hoped before the Session was over we would have all the facts.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) said, as far as regarded this motion, it was a matter of indifference to him what effect the National Policy had on the country; but if the country was more prosperous than it had been, there must necessarily be more opportunity for the employment of labor; and we might ask these hon. gentlemen how they were going to account for the fact that there was greater emigration at a time when employment was more abundant and the country more prosperous than when it was less prosperous. The statement made by the hon. gentleman who had just sat down that this motion ought to have been more general in its character, was answered by the circumstances which gave rise to it. What caused the motion to be made was the statement to the effect that, at a particular point in this Dominion, a certain number of emigrants had passed into the United States during the year. If true that would mean practically the depopulation of this country, because it could not be supposed that all the emigrants from this country went out of it by that particular route. If we could establish that at the particular point selected as an illustration to prove the great emigration that had taken place from this country, the emigration was so much less than the extent stated that it proved the statement to be grossly incorrect, then the conclusion might be fairly drawn that the general statements as to the rest of the country were equally unreliable. For that reason this motion was proposed. It was impossible the hon. Minister could obtain information on general statements, so as to establish their accuracy or inaccuracy; but he could ascertain whether any particular statement advanced was correct or not, by sending officers to enquire into the matter. They had the hon. Minister's statement that, from the enquiries made, so far from its being possible that number of emigrants had gone out at that port, it was larger than the entire number of passengers that passed through that port altogether; while the difference between the number coming and going was not very much more than one-tenth of the number who were alleged to have gone out of the country to settle in the United States. He thought it would have been much better if the motion had been allowed to go to-night, that full reports should have been obtained, that these reports should be referred to the Committee on Immigration and Colonization, so that all the information should have been before the House before further discussion took place. It had been charged by way of tu quoque that during the five years that hon. gentlemen opposite occupied seats on this side of the House, the Conservative party, then in Opposition, were constantly exaggerating or, at least, certainly magnifying the emigration from this country, and that they were doing it as an element or a weapon in party warfare against the hon. gentlemen who were then on this side of the House. The supporters of the Government were told that hon. gentlemen opposite were now doing no more than had been done by hon. gentlemen now sitting on this side of the House when they sat on the other. But there was a very remarkable distinction between the two cases. In the first place, according to the statements made by the hon. gentlemen opposite, the number of alleged emigrants who left the country during the five years the hon. gentlemen were in office, only amounted to 25,000 a year, distributed over the whole country. There were no allegations that such numbers were going out at particular ports as to make it a physical impossibility that the statement could be true. There was a general statement that a large number of emigrants were going out of the country. That was the statement of the Conservative party while in Opposition. It was true that a large emigration was taking place; it was true that a large emigration was taking place to-day. In the very nature of things a considerable emigration would be always going on. The people of Canada were a migratory people to a considerable extent. The same thing was true of the people of the United States. The State of New York, with a population about equal to that of Canada, had lost up to 1871, according to the United States census, over one million of its native population who had gone to the western States of the Union, passing from one part of the country to the other, and the same process would go on here. If hon. members would take the case of the county of Bruce, which, if he remembered aright, was surveyed in 1853, they would find, if they asked the people of that county where they came from, that, to a large extent, they came from the older counties of Ontario. A few of them—of course a considerable number of them were persons who had come to work upon the Great western or the Grand Trunk, and when those roads were completed, went into the newer counties of the Province, of which Bruce was one, where they took up land and became industrious and well-to-do settlers. But that sort of settlement had to come to an end, because these newer counties had become settled, and there being no more of them the people naturally drifted towards the North-Western States. But now we had our own North-West, where, we hoped, with the railway facilities which were likely to be afforded to that country, our people would go in the future. There was no doubt, however, that there had been that sort of migration. But the position which had been taken by the Conservative party in Opposition was that largely in consequence of the want of a policy which would give employment to our own people, they were leaving this country for the United States. That idea might have been right or it might have been wrong; he was not going to discuss the National Policy on this motion. He thought the discussion on that point had been irrelevant to a large extent. That policy may have been wise or it might have been unwise; it may have resulted beneficially or otherwise, but at all events it was a policy advocated as a means of remedying an evil which had been pointed out. Did hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to recommend any such policy? He supposed they would say: "Go back to free trade." That was a suggestion which two or three times he had heard to-day. That must mean pro tanto, at any rate the injury of the manufacturing interests and the losing of labor in the different centres of population. Let them take Montreal for instance. That policy would close the large sugar refineries there. He did not say for the purpose of this argument that they should or should not be closed, but at any rate the closing of those refineries would throw out of employment some 400 heads of families, and that means a population of nearly 2,000 persons who must go somewhere else for employment, and who would probably go to the refineries of the United States. The Conservative party said there was a serious emigration from this country which would be largely prevented by a policy which would give employment to the people of Canada within their own country. That was the ground upon which—

Mr. KILLAM. You should not discuss the National Policy.

Mr. WHITE said he was not discussing the National Policy, he was simply showing what was the position of the Conservative party on this question. What he said was that they quoted these statements in relation to emigration with a suggestion of a remedy to prevent it, while hon. gentlemen opposite were doing nothing of the kind. More than that they had taken statistics compiled by American authorities, over whom we had no control, which, in the very nature of things, could not be true, because people could not be carried over at that particular point and within the time given to the numbers mentioned by those

hon. gentlemen. The object of this motion was simply to find out whether we had any information in relation to that emigration. He entirely agreed with the hon. member for West Middlesex, that it was the duty of the Government to enquire into this matter. He had reason to believe that the Government did enquire into it, and the object of the motion was to get the result of those enquiries on the Table. When they were brought down the proper course would be to refer them to the Committee on Colonization and Immigration, where they could be analyzed and sifted by those hon. gentlemen of the Opposition who were members of the Committee. There would always be an emigration westward, both to our own territory and to the American States, but he was satisfied that when this information was brought down it would show that emigration had not been at all equal to what the hon. gentlemen opposite had stated it was.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. gentleman for Cardwell said that when his hon. friends made allegations in Opposition as to the amount of emigration from this country, they did so justifiably, because they suggested the adoption of a policy to prevent the continuance of that state of things. The hon. gentleman had stated that the Opposition were not justified in making statements as to emigration because they did not propose the same remedy.

Mr. WHITE said he had not stated that they had not proposed the same policy, but that they had not proposed any remedy.

Mr. BLAKE said they proposed to revert to a set of things which would diminish the emigration from the greatly increased figures which resulted from the change of policy adopted by the hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman had said that he had succeeded in achieving a change in the policy which he pledged himself would reduce emigration. Well, they contended that it had not reduced emigration—that whatever other merits might be attributable to the policy, that particular merit was not attributable to it. The hon. gentleman said that there could not have been so great an emigration since the adoption of this policy, but they maintained that it had had a contrary effect to the one predicted by the hon. gentleman and his friends. The question was one of the utmost interest to this country. It was of the utmost interest that we should know what were the facts—not merely to-day, not merely for the last year, but for a great number of years—with reference to the emigration from this country. The hon. gentleman opposite stated that his friends indulged only in general statements, but he (Mr. Blake) maintained that whenever allusion had been made to this subject in the past, that allusion had been based upon just the same results upon which the allusions made on this side of the House, within the past year, had been based. The hon. member for Cardwell, in former debates, referred to the number of native Canadians settled in the United States. Where did he get his figures?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I got them not from the Customs' office returns, but from the census.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. member got them from United States statistics, the only place where he could get them, and where any figures obtained at any time with reference to the emigration from Canada to the United States had to be obtained. He was not aware that any attempt had yet been made to publish a record of that emigration in this country. Yet figures had been indulged in from year to year, and results had been ascertained. To what figures had hon. gentlemen appealed during this long series of years? Why, they appealed to the American statistics appearing yearly, and he maintained that the result as a whole would be discredited if it turned out that there had been gross, wilful, manifest error at any one point. What the hon. gentleman complained of was that they on this side should have stated the result this year which he and his friends had been stating for many years past; while it was laudable and justifiable for hon. gentlemen opposite to advert to United States statistics, it was unjustifiable and improper for them on this side to assume that these statistics, which they credited, and which they made the foundation for many diatribes, continued to be credited in this house. He should be very glad if they could be discredited; he should rejoice to know that they were inaccurate. If they were we ought to attempt to establish some system of our own which would enable us to ascertain, with some degree of accuracy, what the flux and reflux of emigration into the country really was; but he said it was disingenuous, unfair and uncandid, for those who for many years credited and used these papers—and used them without rebuke, because their accuracy was never challenged—to say that those who chose to assume that there had not been a sudden change from correctness to incorrectness; that the system which had produced approximately correct results for so many years had become a failure, and that those who used the same figures derived from the same source, and on the same subject, were guilty of improper conduct. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said the Minister of Agriculture was not called upon to deal with anything more than the specific statement, because the reference was made to a particular port, and he said the Minister was able to obtain information with respect to that port. Everyone knew where the information was received. It was contained in the public documents which are scattered through the country, and could be obtained by all who desire it. The Minister cannot for a moment say he did not get the United States quarterly and annual reports.

Mr. POPE. I say I get something else.

Mr. BLAKE. A good deal else; I am going to give the Minister something at this moment. He cannot say he does not get those returns or examine them—it is his duty to examine them. In each quarterly return there is a statement of the emigration for each of the ports at which returns are collected in the United States, and therefore he had every opportunity in the proper discharge of his duty to obtain information, not with respect to one isolated point, but with respect to all the places, so that we may arrive at a sound conclusion as to what the real extent of the emigration from this country was altogether.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. BLAKE. I apprehend there are some points at which it would be difficult, but there are other points at which the information could easily be obtained.

Mr. POPE. Name one.

Mr. BLAKE. The Canada Southern.

Mr. POPE. I have it.

Mr. BLAKE. You have not stated it. You have given the Grand Trunk and two divisions of the Great Western.

Mr. POPE. I will give you the Canada Southern.

Mr. BLAKE. I say you have not given it.

Mr. POPE. Name another.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not going to proceed to name them all. I have given the Minister one case in which he did not give the returns, and that is enough for this purpose. It seems to me that the figures of the hon. gentleman prove too much altogether.

Mr. POPE. Too much for you.

Mr. BLAKE. Not enough for me, but too much for the Minister. It is said by the hon. gentleman that the returns he gave us were a true test of what the emigration to the western States and the North-West is to take the number of passengers over those railways.

Mr. POPE. I did not say so. They would make more than the whole number of persons who passed over the road altogether.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman did not content himself with saying that, but he went further, and proceeded to give as the number of persons east-bound as well as west-bound, and proceeded to deduct the east from the west and draw a conclusion. What was the conclusion?

Mr. POPE. The conclusion was above 6,000 difference.

Mr. BLAKE. And what did that amount to? It was not 6,000 but 16,000.

Mr. POPE. About 6,700.

Mr. BLAKE. That is on the Grand Trunk alone. The difference on the Grand Trunk alone is 7,951. The hon. gentleman is rather off his calculation.

Mr. POPE. You made a mistake.

Mr. BLAKE. At any rate the total number of passengers:

(Via Grand Trunk Railway.)

Total passengers from Canada to all points West, including Manitoba	30,826
Total passengers from Western States to Canada	24,739
Difference	5,887

(Via Great Western—Sarnia Branch.)

Total passengers from Canada to Western States	1,719
Total from Western States to Canada	1,262
Difference	457

(From U. S. Consul at Sarnia.)

Total emigrants with Consular certificates, from estimates of Consul at Sarnia, 700 certificates or 4½ persons per certificate ..	3,050

(From Canadian Customs Collector at Sarnia.)

Total outward entries at Sarnia and its outports, 858, or at 4½ persons per entry, for 12 months ended June 30th	3,861

(Via Grand Trunk Railway.)

Total number of passengers from all points of Europe, the Eastern States and Canada to all western points, including Manitoba ..	53,627
Total from West to East at same point	45,676
Difference	7,951

That is the statement the hon. gentleman made.

Mr. POPE. I said nothing of the kind. I have not got the figures here but I can get them.

Mr. BLAKE. I am reading from the hon. gentleman's statement in the Hansard under the head of January 5th, 1881.

Mr. POPE. I cannot state what is in the Hansard, but I made the difference about 6,700 between the passengers coming to Canada, taking out those going to Manitoba west.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. No. The hon. gentleman expressly throughout his statement always said including Manitoba. He did not give us any statement or estimate of those who went to Manitoba separately from those who went to the States. The result was, as the Hansard shows and my memory shows me, that the total was over 14,000 for the year ending 30th June last.

Mr. POPE. I will try and settle that with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know how the hon. gentleman can settle it except by giving the figures he gave before. Perhaps the hon. gentleman can give us fresh figures. I do not know what figures the hon. gentleman gave except as stated in the report. I say this, that whatever the hon. gentleman says, whether the difference was 14,000 or 6,000 he meant the House to come to the conclusion that the difference, whatever it was, approximately represented the difference to the United States and Manitoba by these routes.

Mr. POPE. I will tell the hon. gentleman the exact figures I gave. The total difference was 6,705.

Mr. BLAKE. That is the balance. How do you make it? Give us the figures by which you arrived at the balance.

Mr. POPE. The total number of passengers from all points of Europe, Eastern States and Canada to all western points, including Manitoba, 53,607. That is by the Grand Trunk. Total from west to east, 45,676, by Grand Trunk. Total passengers from Canada to all points west, including Manitoba, 30,026. Total passengers from the western States to Canada (and I want the hon. gentleman to remember that), 24,739; the difference being 5,887. There is no mistake in that. Total passengers from Canada to the Western States, 1,719, by the Grand Trunk. Total from the western States to Canada, 1,267, difference 452. From the United States consular certificates as given on the other side, 3,050; from the Canadian Customs authorities, 3,861. Ours exceed theirs a little under that head. Difference between eastern and western passengers in and to Canada, 5,887.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. BLAKE. But the hon. gentleman gave us returns over the Grand Trunk a little below in his statement.

Mr. POPE. Migrants with outer entries at Sarnia, and outports, 3,861. Total 10,005 less migrants and emigrants to Manitoba, being a proportion of a total of 13,500 and 16,000, bringing the total emigration from Canada to the western States, through Port Huron, 6,705.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly; but the hon. gentleman did not give that latter statement in his former speech.

Mr. POPE. I did not say there were 13,500; but I gave exactly the 35,000.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman gave the 3,050 from the consular figures at Sarnia, and 3,861 from the collector's figures at Sarnia, but did not say there were 13,500 in all to Manitoba, and that there was a certain smaller proportion of those that went by the railway. The only difficulty was that the hon. gentleman did not go further down in his paper. His purpose was to lead to the conclusion that the difference between the eastward-bound traffic was less than it really was. His figures were not correct, if we took into account the amount of emigration that must have taken place from all outlets in Canada.

Mr. POPE. How do you know that?

Mr. BLAKE. We know it because we know that many people have left every part of this country. The other day the hon. gentleman told us, when he was enlarging in reference to the estimate of this year, that Manitoba had 25,000; and he said that more than two-thirds of that number had gone, and that would be at least 17,000.

Mr. POPE. How many?

Mr. BLAKE. 17,000.

Mr. POPE. I said two-thirds.

Mr. BLAKE. You said more than two-thirds, and that would be at least 16,000 or 17,000. There is, of course, those that go by the Collingwood route by boat, those by Sarnia, and those by Kincardine, and there would also be some going by the Canada Southern Railway. And looking at all this—

Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. POPE. How do those people go by the Canada Southern?

Mr. BLAKE. I do not know how they go, but those who emigrate from along the line of the Canada Southern would be pretty sure to go by that road to the border. I say, Sir, that if we consider these various means of outlet, if we consider the emigration that has taken place to the western States, and the emigration which the hon. gentleman alleges has taken place to Manitoba, numbering about 17,000, he must come to the conclusion that these figures which the hon. gentleman has given are incorrect in this sense at least, that they do not bear out his deductions. I do not mean to say they are not borne out by the facts, or that the railway companies have not given him the returns which he says they have.

Mr. POPE. Do you doubt the correctness of the returns?

Mr. BLAKE. I say that I have no doubt that these figures are the figures which these companies have presented to the hon. gentleman, but I say that he cannot deduce from them the conclusion which he proposes to draw.

Mr. POPE. You cannot draw the conclusion you proposed to draw.

Mr. BLAKE. I have drawn no conclusion. I have simply assumed as correct the figures which the hon. gentleman in past years assumed as correct, the figures which both sides have always assumed to be correct. If I were to draw a general conclusion it would be the immigration for the past year was larger than for previous years. From ordinary sources of information, from enquiries I have made through the country, from enquiries which I have made from hon. gentlemen as to the state of things in their constituencies, I say that that is the conclusion which I should draw. Hon. gentlemen opposite have all professed to speak in a cheery tone. They say there has been no such large emigration. It is out of the question to talk in that way. We know what has taken place in the Province of Quebec. We know that in the pastoral letter or the amendment—or whatever may be the proper term of the deliverance—the Archbishop of Quebec deplored in the strongest terms the emigration which is going on from that Province, and he called on the faithful, or those who are under his control, to desist from emigrating to a foreign country. We know from that letter to his flock that he felt that this exodus was an unusual character—that it was greater than usual—and—

Mr. POPE. It was the usual exodus.

Mr. BLAKE. Why then this unusual step to check it? Why such a strong remonstrance on the part of the head of the church in that quarter?

Mr. POPE. It is done every year.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Not at all.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all. I do not think it is done every year. I do not remember myself to have read of it, but I do not profess to be well informed on the subject, but I can appeal to the hon. gentlemen from Quebec—

Mr. HOUDÉ. It has been done for more than twenty years.

Mr. BLAKE. Every year?

Mr. HOUDÉ. The Bishops of the Province of Quebec have been telling their people almost every year not to go to the United States.

Mr. BLAKE. That is not what I said. I said there had not been, to the best of my information, such a mark, such a significant mark, of the extraordinary character of the emigration going on from that Province as that to be found in a public document of the Archbishop of Quebec issued a few months ago. And if I am not mistaken in my recollection, another of the Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, within a later period, has also published a remonstrance on the same subject. How was it between 1861 and 1871? Did not the population of the Province of Quebec remain almost stationary? That if we accepted the increase that took place in the cities, particularly in Montreal and its neighborhood, you might almost literally say, if the census were correct, that the population had remained stationary. If it were so between 1861 and 1871, still more would it likely to be so in these later years. With reference to the Maritime Provinces, we had heard statements made to-day that were not capable of contradiction. He did not mean to say that many of those persons who had gone away would not return. He hoped they would. The system of ticket scalping might have something to do with the railway returns, making them, to some extent, inaccurate. But speaking of this subject generally, he maintained that it was not possible to dispute the proposition that there had been a very large, an unusual, an excessive and a much to be lamented emigration. Let him refer to a speech of the Finance Minister himself made in Toronto a little while ago, where he said :

"I admit that there has been a large emigration. It would be madness for me to attempt to deny it, and I deeply regret it."

That was the language of the hon. Minister of Finance the fall of last year in Toronto. But it was not madness now to attempt to deny it, and there was nothing to regret.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is the exaggeration we object to.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman admits there has been a large emigration, and what the hon. Minister has thought to be madness has been done here the whole evening.

Mr. POPE. We never denied that emigration had been going on, but we said the returns hon. gentlemen had been quoting were entirely wrong.

Mr. MILLS. You say there are not 7,000.

Mr. POPE said they contended that 135,000 had not gone from Canada to the United States during the 15 months past. If it were possible that such a thing could be, the country would be depopulated. There could be no mistake about that. When he rose to-night he did not intend to say that people were not going to the United States, but he affirmed that the arguments and the figures put forward by the hon. gentleman when he spoke before on this question, were entirely erroneous, and that the hon. gentleman procured them from an official who depended for his salary and his living upon the amount he could make out in this direction. That official himself had admitted that he did not go into the cars himself, and these figures were furnished by his men. Indeed, if these figures were correctly, stated twenty men could not collect them. Mr. Sandham, the gentleman from whom the Opposition were quoting, got $2,500 salary at that port, and it was to his interest to make these figures large.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT said he had received within the last three days some statistics which would go very far to confirm the statement made by the hon. member for West Durham, and to show what sort of depopulation had been going on under this blessed National Policy throughout the better portions of western Ontario. He had the returns of six important townships in the county of Huron, which showed that the population of the Township of Howick had fallen from 5,420 in 1878 to 5,193 in 1880; in the Township of Hallett, from 3,394 in 1878 to 3,378 in 1880; in the Township of Hay, from 4,119 to 3,644 in one year; in the Township of Stanley, from 2,883 to 2,373 in one year; in the Township of Grey, from 4,207 to 4,002 in one year; and in the Township of West Wawanosh, from 2,555 in 1878 to 2,352 in 1880.

Mr. POPE. Where did you get these returns?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. From the Reeves of the different townships. They are taken from the assessment returns.

Mr. POPE. Where have they gone to?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I fear they have not gone to the North-West, but I fear that the legislation of hon. gentlemen opposite have driven them to Minnesota, Dakota, and other western States.

Mr. POPE. Can you say they have gone to the United States.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I can say that a great proportion of them have.

Mr. POPE. How do you know?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Because I have been in the neighborhood and have been told so by the people, and because I have been in Minnesota and Dakota; and I know that a great many of these people have gone there. I mention these facts in order to show that out of these six townships in one large county of Ontario some 1,500 souls have left the country.

Mr. BOWELL. Is not the hon. gentleman aware that a large portion of that section of the North-West from Winnipeg to Portage la Prairie is settled by people from the very townships to which he has referred.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Not that portion.

Mr. BOWELL. I say it is; for I have been there.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. But I have been there and much later than the hon. gentleman.

Mr. KRANTZ said granted that this emigration to the United States was going on still and that this country was not so prosperous as the United States, he believed, and it was the opinion of the majority of the people of this country, that the present Government was bringing about a better state of affairs. People would remain in a country and would immigrate to a country where there was plenty of employment for the artizan and the laborer, and where the agriculturist could obtain cheap and fertile lands. The policy of this Government was just the policy to secure this condition of things. The fiscal policy had given employment to a large number of the people. He was not speaking from hearsay, or from what he read in the papers, but from his actual knowledge. In the county which he represented there were tanneries, last manufactories, button factories, woollen factories, foundries and machine shops, flax and other industries. Every one of them has increased its capacity during the last two years. During the past six months there has not been a man unemployed in the county who was willing and capable of working. The policy of the Government in building the Pacific Railway, by means of a private company, would also prove beneficial to immigration. By handing over to the Syndicate a large quantity of land fit for settlement, it would be able to compete with American land speculators, and beat them with their own weapons. No Government emigration policy was able to compete with the means which a private company and a strong railway company had for settling up the country.

Mr. CASGRAIN said it was astonishing that the Department was not able to give the House data for the emigration from 1867 to the present time. The approaching census was about to be taken as badly as last time; and Parliament would be unable to know the number of people who had left the country each year. He could ascertain within two weeks the total emigration from his own county; but the Department did not know whether 700 or 135,000 people had left the country, and yet the Department was well paid.

Mr. DAWSON said there had been general complaints of an exodus from Canada, but in his district, Algoma, the population had increased very rapidly for some years past. In 1871 the population was 7,000; now it was estimated at 23,000. That result had been obtained without possessing any special advantages, for the district was badly supplied with roads, and even now the mail was carried from Parry Sound to Algoma by dog-sleighs or on men's back, although it often amounted to 800 lbs. The population was increasing every day. In Manitoulin, about five years ago, there was a population of a little over 2,000; now it was estimated at close upon 8,000. The people of the American towns took much greater interest in their immigrants than our people did in ours. They drove them out to the lands and did all in their power to give them a favorable impression of the country.

Mr. RYMAL read an extract from a gentleman who left his (Mr. Rymal's) own riding and went to the North-West, where he purchased a quantity of land and settled there with his four sons. The extract was as follows:—

"It is too bad that through the bungling, or worse, of the Government thousands of the very best settlers should be driven from the country into the United States; but we cannot expect anything better from such a pack. Their friends have to get the pick of the lands first, and after that the people may get a chance. One thing that has done a great deal of ill out there this summer was the Order in Council that came in force on the first of May; it was to this effect: that settlers would not be protected in their rights on neither odd nor even numbers. Now, that you may fully understand what effect this would have, I would say that a large part of the land is yet unsurveyed within the last year or so, is yet withheld from market, and consequently the people were afraid to locate not knowing whether they might be turned off or charged two prices for the land. Now, under the late Government people were not only encouraged to go on to the land, but they knew that no other person could get it if they were on the land or had any improvements on it. They had the first chance, for before any person could take up this land they had to make oath that there was no person living on the land, and that there were no improvements on it. This Order in Council has driven thousands into Dakota this summer. And again, though the Agent was appointed last winter, or early this spring, it was this fall before he was prepared to take entries for the land. But there was he and an assistant, drawing about two thousand dollars a year for doing nothing. It seems the Government are afraid that the country is being settled too fast. A very strong supporter of theirs in Emerson told me that if they were the paid agents of the American Government they could not do more than they were doing to send settlers to Dakota and Minnesota."

Now, he knew nothing further than this: That he knew the writer of the letter well, that he knew that he was a man of strict integrity, and that he was a British subject to the bottom of his heart. He was a man that would sooner see thousands of Americans coming to this country, along with all the Canadians who were settled in the United States, than see one Canadian settle in the United States.

Mr. McCALLUM. Name, name.

Mr. RYMAL. No; I am not at liberty to give his name. It is a private letter.

Mr. HESSON. Then why read it?

Mr. BLAKE. Hear, hear.

Mr. RYMAL said why should he not read it? The writer of the letter was a candid, straightforward man, whose word was as good as his bond, whose word was as good as that of any Minister either in the past or present Government. With regard to the exodus from our shores hon. gentlemen were speaking of what they knew. There had not been a great deal of moving from his constituency, and the number who had gone to our own North-West was about equal to the number who had gone to Kansas, Arkansas, Dakota, Minnesota, Idaho and other States. A few who had gone to our own North-West had become dissatisfied with the land regulations and with the conduct of our agents in that country. He was told that these gentlemen put on a haw-haw style, and did not care to be accommodating to the people who asked them questions, and they must know the people who went into that country were obliged to ask a great many questions. He was under the impression that these agents were sent there for the purpose of giving information. If the information he had got was true the facts were in strong contrast with what had been stated by the hon. member for Algoma. The American agents were obliging; they could not do too much for the emigrants; they could not be too accommodating; they could not extend too much civility. If our Government were wise they would send a better class of agents to meet the settlers, for he was satisfied from what he had heard that many valuable settlers had left our North-West just on account of the land regulations and the incivility with which they had been met by the agents of the Government.

Motion agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock, a.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

FRIDAY, 4th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT.

Mr. McDONALD (Picton) presented the annual report of the Minister of Justice, as to Penitentiaries in Canada, for the year ending 30th June, 1880.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. POPE (Queen's) presented a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

"LORNE.

"The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, copy of the correspondence on the subject of the gratuitous transfer from the Imperial to the Canadian Government, of Her Majesty's steam corvette Charybdis for training school purposes.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 3rd February, 1881."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 45) to further amend the Patent Act of 1872.— (Mr. Pope, Compton.)

Bill (No. 46) to prevent and punish wrongs to children.— (Mr. Richey.)

Bill (No. 48) respecting the Canada Consolidated Gold Mining Company.— (Mr. White, Hastings.)

MARITIME JURISDICTION IN ONTARIO.

Mr. McCARTHY introduced a Bill (No. 47) to amend the Act establishing a Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario. He said: The Bill is intended to define the limit of the jurisdiction of the Courts with respect to seamen's wages. By the Maritime Court Act of 1877, all jurisdiction belonging to the Vice-Admiralty Court is conferred on that Court. By the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, the right of a seaman to sue for wages in a Maritime Court is limited in this way: Either the amount must be beyond fifty pounds, or the owner of the vessel must be bankrupt or insolvent, or the vessel under arrest at the time, or she must have been sold by the Court. In those different cases the Admiralty Court, by the Merchant Shipping Act, had jurisdiction to entertain claims for seamen's wages. By an Act which was passed in England in 1863, the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court was defined and extended, and in one respect the words that are used are ambiguous. Section 10 of the Act says: "Claims for seamen's wages" It has been held by the Judge of the Court of Ontario that the effect of the words I have read from the Act of 1863 is to do away entirely with the terms of the clause in the Merchant Shipping Act, so that seamen who have a claim for a mere trifle, $10, $12 or $15, or any sum whatever, have a right, under the decision of that Court, to have the vessel arrested, notwithstanding the owner may be perfectly solvent, and there is no special reason for the interference of that extraordinary power. I propose, by this Bill, to declare that the jurisdiction of the Court is as was defined by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and unless the amount exceeded $200, or unless the owner should be bankrupt or insolvent, or unless the vessel be under seizure, or unless the seaman has been put ashore at a distance from the residence of the master or owner exceeding 20 miles, the Court shall not have jurisdiction.

Bill read the first time.

INSPECTION OF SMOKED HERRINGS.

Mr. MOUSSEAU moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved,—That the Act passed in the forty-third year of Her Majesty's reign intitled: "An Act to amend 'The General Inspection Act of 1874,' and the Act amending it," be amended by repealing the tariff of fees to be collected for the inspection of smoked herrings, contained in the third section, and substituting the following:—

- (a) For each box of smoked herrings—one cent.
- (b) For each half box of smoked herrings—one half cent.
- (c) For each quarter box of smoked herrings—one quarter cent.

Resolution considered in Committee and reported.

Mr. LONGLEY said he had scarcely had time to read the resolutions, but if the intention was to reduce the fee for inspecting smoked herrings from two cents to one cent per box, he quite concurred in the proposed amendment of the Act. He would like to have an option, but as that might not be the better course and might be considered a departure from the principle pervading the Act, he would offer no objection.

Mr. GILLMOR said when the recommendation was made last year he was informed by the Minister of Inland Revenue that inspection would not be compulsory. This regulation would be a very onerous one to his constituents. He supposed that about 300,000 boxes of smoked herrings were produced in his county, and with a tax of half a cent per box the burden would be very serious. Up to the present time there had been no inspection, and he could see no possible good to be derived from an inspection of smoked herrings. The previous Minister of Inland Revenue Department had assured him that inspection would not be enforced unless the county decided that it should be done in the public interest. If he could have such an assurance as that now, he would make no objection. He assured the House that this tax would be found a serious burden and could serve no possible purpose. Most of this fish went to the West Indies and to the United States; very little indeed was consumed at home. The tax would be enormous. The boxes cost about 5 cents each and contained 7 to 8 lbs. of fish, so a tax of half a cent on each box would be unbearable. He was sure the Government would not impose this burden if they understood the circumstances, for it would be one of the most unfortunate things the Government ever attempted.

Mr. LONGLEY said he could appreciate the objection of his hon. friend. At the same time, looking at the matter from his own stand point, he was fully satisfied with the conditions of the Bill. The only argument that could be used against the imposition of the inspection fee, as relating to the class of fish in which his hon. friend was interested, would relate to their inferiority or lesser value than those caught in the county he (Mr. Longley) had the honor to represent. Possibly in relation to the particular class of fish caught in the Grand Manan, the inspection would be of less value than in respect of fish worth two or three times as much. In regard to the inferior class of fish, the inspection would have the effect of improving their quality, and in the end a benefit would accrue to those who cured the fish. He had no hesitation in saying, in respect to the class of fish caught in the Digby Basin, the inspection would be worth a good deal more than it would cost. There would be one cent per box paid for the inspection, and sooner or later the curers of fish would reap an advantage of, perchance, five cents per box, in consequence of the standard of fish being raised. He hoped that the inspection would be of advantage to all smoked herrings caught throughout the Dominion. The fish caught in the Digby Basin were known abroad, where they sometimes brought very high prices, and it was an industry of such magnitude that it deserved to be fostered in every possible way. He was mis-reported the other day when this subject came up when he was made to say that the annual catch of fish in the Digby Basin amounted to 25,000 boxes; what he did say was that in certain years the catch had reached that quantity. He assumed that upon an average the catch of fish there would not exceed 12,000 boxes. When it was considered that this fish was worth from fifty to seventy or eighty cents per box, the House would see the importance of the matter. He apprehended that the inspection would raise the character of the fish to the extent of five cents per box, and if the curers of fish, by paying one cent per box, could reap this advantage, they would have occasion to be satisfied.

Mr. GILLMOR said he was aware that the character of the fish caught in his hon. friend's locality was different from that caught in his own county. They were put up in larger boxes and were a more valuable fish. He could not believe that the Government had received any information from the county he represented that this inspection was at all necessary. He thought it all came from his hon. friend's desire to have some inspection for the fish caught in the Digby Basin. In the county of Charlotte there were 300,000 or 400,000 boxes of fish put up yearly, and the proposed tax upon these boxes would prove an intolerable burden. He would like to have an explanation from the Government of the reason of this tax. The average price of smoked herrings, taking one year with another, was not more than thirteen or fourteen cents a box, and the box did not cost less than five cents, so that the fish on which they were paying half of a cent did not bring, on the average, more than eight cents. The only effect this measure could have was the appointment of officials to go among the fishermen to annoy them. Nobody in the country complained of any grievance, as ninety-five per cent. of our smoked herrings went to the United States, and from there they were exported to the West Indies and South America. He thought it was a great error, and a most unpopular one, for the Government to put a tax on this struggling industry which they ought to protect.

Mr. KILLAM congratulated the Government on the confidence reposed in them by the hon. member for Annapolis. That hon. gentleman seemed to be satisfied that, although the tax on smoked herrings was not altogether correct, yet the matter was quite safe in the hands of the Government.

Mr. ANGLIN felt it his duty, as representing a county interested in herring fishing, to join the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) in his protest against this measure. It was evidently introduced to meet the wishes of the hon. member for Annapolis, who seemed to be such a great protectionist, that he thought the quality of the herrings in the Digby Basin would be greatly improved if they were taxed a little. In no other part of the country had there been a demand for the inspection of smoked herrings, and in no other section was an inspection considered necessary. If the Government would confine the operation of this Bill to fish caught in the Digby Basin and sold for exportation at Halifax, then those who represented other constituencies would have no reason to object. But they had objected last year, and they objected again, to any attempt to impose a tax on this small industry, which the people engaged in it did not find over profitable. They would feel the tax as an oppressive and onerous one, and they would avoid the inspection as of no value whatever, and they would come to regard this Parliament, not as interested in their welfare, but as choosing to meddle in their business without justification. The present Bill was to reduce the tax, and therefore he would support it, because he was opposed to any imposition at all, and he preferred the smaller charge to the larger. The Government would only render their administration obnoxious by interfering in this petty way with this small industry, as it would not in any way improve the character of the fish or promote the welfare of those engaged in it. He would have no objection to such a measure, provided its operation was confined to those districts, the representatives of which chose to say the inspection would be of advantage to the trade.

Mr. RICHEY said the Halifax Chamber of Commerce concurred in the expediency of such a measure as this, as they had some years ago addressed a memorial to the Government in favor of it, in the interests of the port of Halifax and of the fishery business. If the inspection of fish at all was necessary, it appeared proper to extend the inspection to smoked herrings as well as other fish.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD could not agree with the doctrine laid down by the hon. member for Gloucester, that a provision for the inspection of any article of commerce should be subject to the opinion of the representatives of those districts which might be more particularly interested in that article. He thought this was a question of public policy, which must be settled irrespective of the wishes of some constituencies. It was very hard to get any class of persons engaged in any industry to put a limit to their power of sale. They had an instance in Canadian butter. There was no reason why Canadian butter should not command the highest possible price, because we had all the facilities for making good butter as were found anywhere else, yet the producers objected to having their butter inspected. They were like the old ladies interested in the butter trade, who would like very much to have their poorest sample put in the market as well as their best. At one time Irish butter was very poor in quality, but through a rigid system of inspection it became the finest butter in the world. The whole of the navy and the army were supplied exclusively from Ireland with butter during the long Peninsular war, its standard had become so improved; yet the inspection measure was most tremendously opposed when introduced. The hon. member for Halifax said the Board of Trade there were in favor of this measure. It was easily understood that fishermen, or any other persons immediately employed in any particular industry, could not be expected to look far distant, and make up their minds to a little sacrifice by taking more care in their work and excluding an inferior article altogether.

Mr. MILLS said the case of butter cited by the hon. member was not to the point. A certain amount of artistic skill was required in the manufacture of butter, which was not regulated in the curing of fish. They were taken from the sea, and whether they were superior or inferior in quality was wholly independent of the fishermen. If the inspection of butter imposed a tax of ten per cent. on the butter trade, however much the butter might be benefited, it would be impossible that inspection would be had. The inspection of fish, according to the hon. member for Charlotte, imposed the enormous tax of ten per cent. on the value of fish. This was a sufficient reason for opposing the measure.

Mr. ANGLIN said the law for the inspection of butter did not require its inspection for the home market, and he did not know of any law to prevent the exportation of butter not inspected. It was to determine the quality of the butter, the standard of which was then branded on the tabs.

Resolution agreed to.

Mr. MOUSSEAU introduced a Bill (No. 49) to amend the General Inspection Act of 1874, and the Act amending it. Bill read the first time.

PREVENTION OF CRIME.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 30) further to continue in force for a limited time the better prevention of Crime Act 1878.

Mr. ANGLIN asked what reasons the Government had for continuing this Act. Many entertained the opinion that the Act had not worked as well as was expected by the hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he had not considered really whether or not the Bill was as perfect as any one that could be framed. It had done no harm and could remain on the Statutes.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend the Minister of Justice observed that the Bill did no harm, and, therefore, there was no reason why it should not remain on the Statute-book. His own opinion was that it was designed to meet an exceptional state of things, and ought to be continued only on the responsibility of the Administration, which was responsible, of course, for the prevention of crime. It still appeared that there was some reason for its continuance, and perhaps it should be allowed to remain on the Statute-book for another year. It was, when introduced, not only justifiable but desirable, owing to the excited state of feeling that prevailed in certain parts of the country. But as that excited feeling had fortunately passed away, there would be very good reasons for its removal from the Statute-book after a limited time.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he did intend to let the Bill drop, but certain circumstances transpiring elsewhere made it desirable for the present to retain it for at least another year, beyond which it would probably not be wanted.

Mr. ANGLIN said he was sorry to hear the reasons alleged by the hon. Minister for the renewal of this law. His own feeling was that very great restrictions should be placed on the practice of carrying arms, which created a temptation for their improper use. He must object to the reasons given by the Minister for his course as reflecting upon a large portion of our people. He did not think there was any reason for passing any exceptional measures in Canada. There was no reason to expect that any portion of our people would with any object resort to an improper use of arms. He was sorry that the Government saw any reason to apprehend any danger requiring exceptional legislation of this kind.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD said if there was reason for the passing of the Act in 1878, there was reason for its maintenance now. The fact that the Act had been on the Statute-book and had not operated so far, did not justify the statement that it was unsuccessful. The same reason applied now for keeping it on the Statute-book that applied for the passing of the Act.

Bill reported.

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE IN COURT.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 33) to amend the law respecting documentary evidence in certain cases. He said that this Bill related to the admission of documentary evidence in the Courts. It was really a transcript of the Imperial Act, passed, he thought, in 1868, with regard to the admission of documentary evidence in Courts, and was supplementary to the several Statutes on that subject in the several Provinces. It provided for the admission of proclamations, Orders in Council, and public documents of that kind.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, and reported.

HALIFAX INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

Mr. RICHEY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 3) to amend chapter 32 of the Acts of 33 Victoria (1870), entitled: "An Act to empower the Police Court in the city of Halifax to sentence juvenile offenders to be detained in the Halifax Industrial School." He said: The Halifax Industrial School was an institution originating in private benevolence, established for the purpose of assisting in educating poor and friendless boys. It had proved very useful in that direction, and as no reformatory existed in the city of Halifax, there was no place to which youths who were brought before the Police Court and found guilty of petty crimes could be sent, except to the city prison. It was therefore thought desirable that youths of that description should be committed to the Halifax Industrial School and placed under the direction of its board. An Act had therefore been passed by the Legislature of Nova Scotia, previous to Confederation, reciting that "for the further promotion of the benevolent design of such society it is desirable to authorize and empower the Police Court of the said city to sentence juvenile offenders to such Industrial School, and to provide for their support while there." The institution was one the management of which was in the hands of the Protestant portion of the community, and the Bill provided that:

"Whenever any boy being a Protestant and a minor, under the age of eighteen years, shall be convicted before the police court or the stipendiary magistrate, of any offence of which, by law, he would be liable to be sentenced to imprisonment either in the City Prison or the City Juvenile Reformatory, the Police Court or Stipendiary Magistrate shall have power to sentence such boy to such term of confinement in the said Industrial School not exceeding five years, as to the said Police Court or Stipendiary Magistrate may appear proper, provided such term of imprisonment shall terminate when such boy attains the age of twenty-one years."

He might say that the reformatory was only a room set apart in the city prison, and not a separate institution. The Bill also provided for an amount being paid by the city of Halifax for the support of each of those boys while in the institution; that the premises should be open to the inspection of the mayor, aldermen or Stipendiary Magistrate. With regard to the escape of such boys, it provided as follows:—

"If any boy so sentenced as aforesaid shall escape from the said industrial school, he shall, on proof of his identity before the Police Court or stipendiary magistrate be remanded to that school, there to serve the remainder of his original sentence, with such additional term as to the said Police Court or Stipendiary Magistrate may appear proper; and in case of any boy escaping a second time he shall not be remanded to the industrial school, but he shall, on proof of his identity as aforesaid, be sentenced as incorrigible by the said Court or Magistrate to such term of imprisonment in the City Prison, not exceeding five years, as to the said Court or Magistrate may seem proper."

The difficulty which it was proposed to remedy by the present Bill, was the inducements offered to the boys by persons outside of the institution, to escape. The clauses of the Bill were identical with those of an Act relating to the Reformatory School of Quebec. He should say, however, that in 1870, an Act was passed by this Parliament—33 Victoria, chapter 32—precisely similar to the Act of the Nova Scotia Legislature to which he had referred, in order to quiet any doubts that might arise regarding jurisdiction. In 1869, the Act 32-33 Victoria, chapter 34 was passed, respecting juvenile offenders within the Province of Quebec, and he proposed to apply certain provisions of that Bill—with regard to the punishment of persons assisting in the escape of boys from certified reformatories, or harboring them after escape—to the Halifax Industrial School.

Mr. BLAKE. Are the penalties the same?

Mr. RICHEY said they were.

Mr. BLAKE said there could be no objection to such legislation as the hon. gentleman proposed, as the institution to which the Bill referred was one which had been legalized by an Act of this Parliament. He thought, however, that there was no reason why they should depart from the very wholesome principle of our Criminal Law—the very principle on which the Criminal Law had been brought within the purview of this Legislature—the principle of uniformity or generality of application. As there were so many institutions of the kind referred to by the hon. gentleman, springing up in all the Provinces—for instance, the Mercer Reformatory of Ontario, which was recognized by an Act of last Session—he suggested to the Government that it would be well to introduce a general law providing appropriate penalties against the commission of such offences as those against which the present Bill was directed.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) said he agreed with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, and that in view of the numerous applications which were now being made for special legislation on the subject, he thought the time had perhaps arrived when a general measure should be submitted to the House.

Mr. BLAKE said a general Bill in the general line of the one before the House might be brought down this Session.

Mr. McDONALD. I think, however, that the Bill of the hon. member might in the meantime have the second reading.

Mr. MILLS said he thought that provisions of the same character as those proposed in this Bill were included in a Bill passed by the Local Legislature of Ontario last Session. This would seem rather to be a police matter as an incident to the establishment of a school system for the reformation of boys, than a part of the Criminal Law.

Mr. BLAKE said his hon. friend would observe that this matter was a reformatory measure in one sense, but it was also a measure for perfecting a system of confinement for persons who were convicted of crime. This was a particular mode of imprisonment with a view to reformation, but it was certainly dealing with Criminal Law.

Bill read the second time.

THE SUPREME COURT ACT.

On the order being called for the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to repeal "The Supreme and Exchequer Court Act" and the Acts amending the same,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to this item, although the first reading was moved by an hon.

member who is now no more, any other hon. member can take it up.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would intimate that unless some hon. member takes it up at the next sitting, he will move for its discharge.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

FRAUD IN CONTRACTS INVOLVING THE EXPENDITURE OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mr. CASGRAIN, in moving for the second reading of Bill (No. 5) to better prevent fraud in contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, said: I do not know to what extent the legislation I propose will be able to put a stop to frauds of this kind. These frauds are a kind of poison that creep into the social body; it is very difficult to reach them, and still more difficult to eradicate. Nevertheless, I deemed it my duty to introduce a Bill which, I think, will not only meet with the approbation of this House, but also the approval of the country. I would have wished to see the present Government take up this measure; I think they would be rendering a great service to the country by bringing down such a Bill. On the other hand, as on the first reading, I made the same proposal, which was not accepted, I think I am fulfilling my duty as a member in introducing this Bill, which has three principal objects. Among others, in the first place, to prevent what are called middlemen or brokers from interfering with public contracts. We all know, and unhappily it is only too true, that these brokers, in order to lend their influence in favor of individuals, exact what we call in French petite douceurs. I am of opinion that such a business is direct corruption. That is why, by the first clause of the Bill, I propose making these different acts a misdemeanor, punishable as such upon conviction before the ordinary courts. The second object that I have in view is to prevent tenderers in public contracts from withdrawing their tenders for certain considerations, in order to help other tenderers, thus depriving the country of a profit or unduly obliging it to pay considerable sums that might otherwise be saved. This kind of fraud is not provided against by our legislation. It is, nevertheless, provided against by the legislation of the Province of Quebec. I would mention, in support of this statement, the case of public sales by the Sheriff. All the bidders are held to be independent one from another; to be bound each by his respective bid. When they form a ring to acquire a property at a low price, the sale is fraudulent and voided by the courts of justice. This legislation is based upon sound morality and upon true reason; it is made in order to prevent what might be called indirect stealing. All public contracts tainted with such fraud should be declared void, and all such tenderers should be deprived of the right of obtaining or carrying on any contract with the Government. I will endeavor to introduce a clause in that direction, if, as I hope, the Bill comes before the Committee of the Whole. I, moreover, wish to protect public officers against attempts that might be made to captivate their kindness as to corrupt them in the execution of their duty, and to punish those who would make them either offers, gifts or promises of any kind, so as to induce them to disclose the secrets of the public departments. As these different acts are tainted with fraud, it is necessary to suppress, as far as possible, such abuses. I, therefore, make a misdemeanor of such cases, and there is not only a pecuniary penalty attached to these acts, on conviction, but moreover, there is a brand of infamy, that is to say, an imprisonment, so that this infamous stain may deter all those who might be tempted to corrupt a public officer, or commit any of these offences. Another clause contemplates preventing all public contractors, or those wishing to become such, or those who are entrusted with the execution of a public contract, from contributing either directly or indirectly to general election funds, or for political objects, from heavily subscribing, as examples have been seen, and guarding against a repetition of what has unhappily already occurred in this country. I do not think that too severe restrictions can be established, nor too exemplary punishment be inflicted upon those who should attempt by this means to corrupt the electorate, so I call such acts misdemeanors and I want them to be punished as such, and also punished by a fine or an imprisonment, at the discretion of the Court. I do not wish to dwell at any length upon the facts that have induced me to introduce this measure. I think that it has become absolutely necessary, and that in these, our times, this kind of corruption is extending all over America. Not only do we need such legislation in this country, but I also observe that even in the United States, since the introduction of my Bill, a like measure has been introduced in Congress, in order to protect public officers, and to prevent public contractors from unduly influencing these officers. With the remarks, Mr. Speaker, I make my motion. Without saying anything further about this Bill, at the same time I am well aware that the measure is susceptible of amendment, and I shall be happy to receive any suggestion coming from either side of the House; but, under the circumstances, I wish to make the Bill as severe as possible, and I think I have fulfilled my duty as a member in bringing it before the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is now a measure of a very drastic and severe character before the Imperial Parliament for the purpose of preventing fraud by all proper means. The Government propose to see that measure before dealing with the whole subject, and to extend the provisions of our present Election Law which, in some respects, are so severe as to be inoperative, and in other respects are too lax. As regards the fourth clause I think that must be excised from my hon. friend's Bill. I have no objection to the second reading of the Bill, and that it shall stand for Committee of the Whole, but, at the same time, I am convinced that he had better let it go to a Select Committee. The second reading might be taken now, and before moving to send it to Committee of the Whole, if my hon. friend agrees with me, we may settle upon a Select Committee to consider the Bill.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I am willing to accept a Select Committee. At the same time I think the last clause meets a want not provided for in the General Election Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It ought to be provided for in the General Election Act.

Mr. CASGRAIN. But it is not, and in the meantime I desire to put that clause in the Bill in order to make it perfect.

Bill read the second time.

INSOLVENCY.

Mr. McCUAIG, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 39) to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, and amending Acts, said: The object of this Bill was to repeal a clause introduced last year by the hon. member for West Durham, which gave an insolvent the option of paying fifty cents on the dollar before getting a discharge. He wished to repeal that clause and revive the one which gave Judges a right to discharge where there was no fraud. He had no direct interest in this matter, and no case, direct or indirect, in his own county. He thought that power should be again given to Judges to discharge those who have been unfortunately in the Insolvent Courts where there was no fraud proven. It must be evident to this House that the mere fact of paying 50, or 60 or 70 cents on the dollar, was no evidence of a man being dishonest. There were cases in which men paid almost nothing, and yet were perfectly honest; there were other cases in which men paid 75 cents in the dollar, and yet were not honest. He believed that since the Insolvency Act had been repealed, it was better to give power to the Judges, when they were satisfied there was no fraud, to grant an insolvent his discharge.

Mr. BROWN said he could hardly see the force of an amendment to a Bill that did not exist. He thought the repeal of the Insolvency Act last Session was a move in the right direction, and he did not believe in tinkering with it now, before it had a fair trial. The farming community derived no benefit from an Insolvency Act. If a farmer aided a young man to start in business by endorsing a note for him, and the young man failed, he might go through the Bankruptcy Court, get his discharge, and start business again, while the farmer had to meet the debt to the last dollar. He hoped the Government would allow no tinkering with this matter. In the course of a few years more, a comprehensive Insolvency Act might be necessary, but at present he saw no reason for this Bill, and he felt it his duty to vote against it.

Mr. BECHARD said that last year the Insolvency Act, which had been in existence in this country for many years, was repealed, except in regard to cases then pending. One of the reasons for its repeal, was that it gave too much facility to an insolvent to defraud his creditors. To remedy that evil, a clause was inserted in the Act, in 1875, that no debtor could obtain a discharge unless he paid fifty cents in the dollar, though it was left to the Judge to discharge him, if he came to the conclusion that the debtor was unable to pay that amount. In 1877 the latter provision was repealed, and the debtor thereafter could not obtain his discharge unless he paid fifty cents in the dollar. The present Bill, he thought, was in contravention of the well-expressed opinion of the House last year, and the well-expressed wish of the people. They had no reason to believe that the people had since changed their minds. Cases pending should be settled according to the provisions of the repealing Bill. He moved:

Mr. McLENNAN said he had seconded the motion for the second reading of the Bill upon what he conceived to be very good ground for proposing a repeal of those restrictions now placed upon a Judge in granting a discharge. It was true, the Insolvency Act had been repealed last year with the common consent of Parliament; but there were parties who were not entirely free from the operation of the law, and the object of this Bill, as he understood it, was to give relief to those parties who were left, as one might say, betwixt earth and heaven, whose estate had been taken out of their hands, and who were left subject to some very hypothetical conditions. He had only to read the provisions of this Act to show that the law could be very ambiguous. For his own part he was convinced, with the cheerful monarch who lived some time ago, that it was desirable to know no more of the law, if this was its character, than a private gentleman ought to know. The conditions proposed to be repealed are these: "That the Judge may only grant a discharge in one of the cases: 1st, that a dividend of not less than fifty cents on the dollar has been, or will be, paid out of the insolvent's property." That was a fair subject for proof before a Judge, but when they came to the next condition: "that such dividend might have been paid but for the negligence or fraud of the assignee or inspectors, or that the insolvent had, prior to the institution of proceedings in insolvency, mailed and registered to the address of each of his creditors, so far as known to him, a declaration acknowledging his insolvency and that no proceeding in insolvency had been instituted against the insolvent for more than one month after the mailing of such notice, and that such dividend would have been paid but for circumstances for which the insolvent cannot justly be held responsible, arising more than one month after the mailing of such declaration," it was difficult to imagine what process of law or what length of time would be necessary to discuss questions of so much uncertainty as were involved in these two conditions. He was not going into the question of the advantage or disadvantage of an insolvency law. Here was a class of people left in a state of great uncertainty, subject to conditions that should not be perpetual in their operation. Were these people to be left forever subject to the misfortunes that had overtaken them under the action of that Court? He believed the time had come when they should be left to the untrammelled judgment of a Court that could deal with their cases on ordinary principles of law, and give them a discharge where no fraud was alleged in their dealing with their property.

Mr. BLAKE said the House would remember that from year to year, during the continuance of the Insolvency Law, complaints were made as to its operation, one of the principal of which was that it was a law by which men went into insolvency and got their discharge from the payment of their honest debts without proper precautions having been taken to show that they were entitled to a discharge. The law, as it stood in 1875, which was more stringent than the previous laws, was framed more stringently to meet that objection. It was found not to meet it. The practical experience of those merchants and lawyers who had to do with the law was, that under its operation, as under that of former laws, nearly everybody obtained a discharge. With a view of meeting the growing feeling that the Insolvency Law ought not to be so framed as practically to admit of men going on in business long after the period at which they ought to be stopped risking property which they knew was their creditors property and not their own, and then, when their estates had been dissipated, going into insolvency only to obtain almost invariably an immediate discharge, an effort was made in 1877 to provide that there should be some substantial difficulty placed in the way of their getting a discharge, unless there had been a reasonably early going into insolvency. The idea was that as soon as men perceived their affairs were in such a state that they could not pay twenty shillings in the pound, they ought to put their property into the hands of trustees for their creditors, and permit it to be worked out for their benefit—in fact, that the property was no longer theirs, but their creditors. Well, the provisions then established by Parliament were those that the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) had read. The discretion of the Judge was restricted, first of all by the provision that he should not be able to grant a discharge unless satisfied that fifty cents had been, or would be, paid out of the property, and that a dividend of that amount would have been paid but for the negligence of the assignees or the inspectors. If the hon. member for Glengarry had been in the House during the discussion on the Insolvency Law, he would have known a great grievance was that fraud was exercised by the assignees and inspectors which resulted in the depreciation or sale at great sacrifice of the property. The question whether there had been fraud or negligence on the part of an officer or trustee, and what loss had resulted from such negligence was not as difficult as many other questions submitted to the decision of a Judge or jury. If the assignee or inspector had been guilty of such fraud or negligence as to cause a loss of $5,000 to the estate, that $5,000 would, for the purposes of calculation, be added to the assets as they came from the hands of the insolvent, in order to decide whether, with that amount, they would have realized sufficient to entitle the bankrupt to a discharge. But it was also said that the insolvent ought not to be placed in that position, inasmuch as the Insolvent Act being abolished, it was no longer in his power to go into insolvency voluntarily, and, therefore, knowing that his estate was worth less than twenty shillings in the pound, feeling that insolvency was the only remedy, he might find himself in that position that his creditors would not choose to take the initiatory proceedings, and in the meantime his estate would be depreciating from day to day to the injury of all parties. That was remedied by the third clause, which put it in the power of the insolvent to say: "If you do not choose to take proceedings against me in insolvency within thirty days after I made you acquainted with the fact that my affairs were embarrassed, and if that delay has been such that my estate, which then would have paid fifty cents in the dollar, can now only pay a much smaller sum, I am entitled to my discharge." Those were the three conditions prescribed by the Act of 1877. The feeling against the Insolvent Act grew stronger and stronger. It was found that that feeling was not to be overcome even by those restrictions, and ultimately, after one attempt had been made in the first Session, in the second Session of this Parliament the repeal of the Act was effected. Then was the time, if it had been intended as to pending cases, to modify the conditions in the late law and to have proposed modifications. If any special legislation was to be made with reference to the persons who remained under the operation of the law, it should have been made at the time that Parliament was dealing with the question and abolishing the laws. In no such proposal was there made, that he could remember—at any rate none was pressed to a division—but now it was proposed, after the Insolvent Law had disappeared from the Statute-book, as to all but those old cases, that they should relax the conditions of discharge with reference to those who had come under its operations, and that for all practical purposes, in the light of all past experience, they should declare that all existing insolvents should be discharged. It would be a simpler and more beneficial thing for everybody but the lawyers, if his hon. friend would modify his Bill and say that all undischarged insolvents are hereby discharged. In some instances if a case came before a Judge and nobody would proceed with his restrictions, there would be a discharge, after some expense and trouble, for all the insolvents that remained undischarged. Before a measure of this kind was passed, it would have been proper for his hon. friend to have obtained statistics and other information, to enable them to judge of the persons in regard to whom, and the circumstances under which, there had been a failure to obtain relief. They would thus possess information which would enable them to form a better judgment as to why this measure should be supported. Without knowledge of this kind the hon. gentleman was practically proposing to re-enact that clause of the old Insolvent Act found most objectionable, and to bring things back to that condition which produced the repeal of the Act—the condition enabling a person to go into insolvency after he had dissipated the whole of the assets, and then by a decree of the Court escape from further liability from his debts.

Mr. COLBY said that the Bill before the House was not of the nature understood by the member for West Hastings (Mr. Brown), or which would in any way revive the old Insolvent Act. It simply dealt with the class of pending cases for which provision was made in the Repeal Act of last Session. He would agree with the hon. gentleman if there was any endeavor to change substantially the condition of things created by that Act; for he thought that no law was ever enacted by this Parliament, that had given greater satisfaction to the country and done more substantial good than that repealing the Insolvent Law. He did not agree with the remarks of the hon. member for West Durham. The Act which it was proposed to modify only stood upon the Statute-book three years. The Bill introduced by the member for West Durham, when Minister of Justice, was passed in 1877, and the Insolvent Act was repealed in 1880.

that the member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) desired was to give to the debtors now in the Insolvent Court that measure of relief which existed under the law when their debts were contracted. Nearly all of the debts now represented in the Insolvent Court were not created during the existence of the Act of the hon. member for West Durham, but during a prior period, either under the Act of 1869 or the Act of 1875, the provisions of which were sought to be revived. He (Mr. Colby) believed that this Parliament was responsible in some degree for the condition of that debtor class. The argument of those who endeavored to repeal the Insolvent Act was, that its tendency was to induce persons not fitted for trade to embark in it, and encourage speculation and recklessness in trading, and to promote precisely the evil condition of affairs which existed. Now, if Parliament was responsible for that condition of affairs, he thought it was simply due to those who had suffered thereby to give them that relief which existed under the law which was in force at the time the debts were created. That was simply what was achieved and nothing more. The member for West Durham said that if you revive this law you discharge the debtor as a matter of course. He must have forgotten the very stringent provisions of the law of 1875 with regard to the discharge of a debtor, requiring the consent of a majority of the creditors representing three-fourths of the indebtedness, as also the requirement that the applicant should show to the Court that he had been honest in his transactions, and also careful, and had kept regular books, and that the consent of those creditors had not been obtained by fraud, collusion, or misrepresentations. That was not an evidence of an open door, or broad mode of egress, or a very easy whitewashing method. The law was very stringent, making it extremely difficult for a debtor complying with its conditions to get his discharge. He had been always opposed to that principle of the law, which the member for West Durham introduced, respecting the debtor's discharge. But while they had an Insolvent Act—he (Mr. Colby) did not believe in such an Act at all—but while it existed, and it provided a mode for the discharge of a debtor, it was not reasonable to insist that an estate must pay fifty, sixty, or seventy-five per cent. before he was discharged. It was simply a question of honesty—whether he should be discharged or not. They all knew how estates dwindled away in the hands of official assignees. Hon. members who entertained those views and opposed the Bill introduced by the hon. the Minister of Justice, were voted down by a solid majority. Yet they made out a clear case that the majority of the estates sold would not pay fifty cents on the dollar—the smaller class of estates particularly—after they had been filtered through the assignee's office. Experience showed that it was difficult even for solvent estates to pay fifty cents on the dollar. Consequently a double injustice was done to the debtor, by the stringent clause which the hon. member now sought to modify, and which was incorporated in the Act of 1867, whereby the House departed from the humane principle of the Insolvent Act, and compelled a debtor to do what it was impossible for an honest debtor to do, under the circumstances, which were incident to the winding up of estates. The creditors had it in their power, under the Insolvent Act, at any time when the debtor was unable to meet his liabilities, to bring him under the operation of the law. The creditors having the power to do that which the debtor had not the power to do. Parliament having abolished the principle of voluntary assignments, under which a fifty cent clause might be somewhat logical—because if the debtor had that privilege and neglected to avail himself of it, he might be punished for that neglect—if they neglected to take action until such time as the debtor's estate would not pay fifty cents on the dollar, it was not the fault of the debtor. Under those circumstances, particularly as the cases which were now in the Insolvency Court were, as a rule, those of debtors whose debts accrued at a period antecedent to the passage of this law, he very heartily supported the proposition of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig), which simply meant that there should be the same mode of granting discharges to insolvents as existed under the law which was in force at the time the debts were contracted.

Mr. BÉCHARD. Did they intend to pay or to save themselves under the operation of the law as it existed?

Mr. COLBY. I do not know. There are, of course, honest and dishonest insolvents.

Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were severally read the second time:—

Bill (No. 19) To enable the Manitoba South-Western Colonization Railway Company to extend their line of railway, and for other amendments to their Act of Incorporation.—(Mr. Ryan, Marquette.)

Bill (No. 34) to incorporate the Dominion Salvage and Wrecking Company, Limited.—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate "The Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company."—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

Bill (No. 41) to incorporate the Hull Mines Railway Company.—(Mr. Cameron, Huron.)

Bill (No. 42) to amend the Act incorporating "The International Railway Company."—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 44) to incorporate the Association known as "J. Winslow Jones and Company, Limited."—(Mr. Brooks.)

House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 7th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILL.

Mr. McCARTHY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 10) to remove doubts as to the true construction of section 12 of The Northern Railway Company Act, 1877.

Bill read the second time.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS FROM HALIFAX.

Mr. BORDEN enquired, Whether any progress has been made in the matter of the shipment of the two cargoes of grain at Halifax, as promised by the Minister of Railways, in a telegram sent to Mr. Doull, President of the Halifax Chamber of Commerce, on the 29th November, 1880; and if so, when the two cargoes will be shipped?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. One cargo has been shipped, and I expect another cargo will be shipped at an early day.

RATES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether there has been any correspondence between any member of the Government and the Toronto Board of Trade on the subject of rates to be charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway? Whether any agreement has been made on the subject? At what date such agreement, if any, was made; and whether it will be laid on the Table?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A communication was received from the Toronto Board of Trade suggesting a clause which would provide for equal mileage rates for the traffic going from Toronto on Ontario railways. That proposal, made by that Board of Trade, as to what would meet their views, was considered unobjectionable and has been agreed to. The date on which that communication was made by me to the President of the Toronto Board was, I think, the 2nd February. I do not see any objection to laying the communication on the Table.

COAL ON THE SASKATCHEWAN.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Is the Government aware of the fact that the Hudson's Bay Company have lately given a contract for the getting out of 600 tons of coal on the River Saskatchewan, in the North-West Territories, near Edmonton; and if so, under what conditions have the Hudson's Bay Company been authorized to do so?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No application has been received from the Hudson's Bay Company in connection with mining in that locality, and no authority has been granted.

COAL OIL MONOPOLY.

Mr. ORTON, in moving for a Select Committee to investigate the alleged monopoly in coal oil, and ascertain what legislation can do to remedy the evil, with power to send for persons, papers and records, said: The subject of this motion is one of considerable interest to a large portion of our people. For a considerable time last year the price of coal oil rose to a very high figure, and that, compared with the cost of production, must have given an immense profit to the small number of men who were engaged in the production and refining of coal oil. The opinion amongst the people of the country, and especially amongst those most deeply interested, namely, the rural population, was that a coal oil ring existed, and under the operation of the protection given to the coal oil industry by the Bill of last Session, the inspection was so much increased above what Parliament had decided would be fair, that the result was the formation of a ring which derived an undue profit from the business. Now, it is a well known fact that coal oil can be produced at about nine cents per gallon. It was retailed a few years ago by the refiners at nine cents per gallon, and they did not suffer any loss. Why coal oil should have risen, therefore, to the extraordinary price of thirty-five or forty cents per gallon is certainly alarming to the consumers of that article. I think that there must be something wrong, and in order to have this matter thoroughly investigated I have given notice of this resolution. I wish to point out how the protection of six cents per wine gallon, given by the Parliament of Canada a few years ago, has been increased through the operation of the Bill passed last Session. In the first place, the cost of inspection of American oil is greater than the cost of inspection of Canadian oil, which gives a difference of two-fifths per cent in favor of Canadian oil in the cost of inspection. I am informed also that the difference in the flash test between American and Canadian oil gives a considerable additional protection above what was considered in the interest of that industry, and the result is that to-day we have a protection in favor of the coal oil industry of close upon ten cents per gallon. During the administration of the late Government one of the strongest cards of the Opposition was the unfairness of giving to the coal oil industry a protection of over 100 per cent. It seems to me rather inconsistent on the part of the present Government, and I regret to state it, to allow the same protection virtually to exist in favor of the coal oil industry which existed under the late Government, and which the Opposition so strongly denounced. I, for one, feel that I would not be consistent if I did not call the attention of the House to this matter, because, when in Opposition I denounced this unfair protection on several occasions. We recollect that during the late Administration, there was a coal oil monopoly by which millions of money were wrung out of the pockets of the people. There are particular circumstances connected with the coal oil industry which do not exist with regard to any other industry in the country, why that business should not have so large a measure of protection. This industry is not subjected to competition like other industries. When the woollen industry is protected, every man in the country possessing capital and enterprise can participate in the profits on that industry, should he desire to invest, and the result is that competition brings down the price to a proper level. But with the coal oil industry it is entirely different. It rests in the hands of a few men, and they have the power of forming a monopoly. I think nothing could be more disastrous to the National Policy than to allow an industry such as this to wring out of the pockets of the people more than a fair profit, as I maintain has been done during the past summer. We find that the amount of coal oil consumed in Canada is something like 3,656,365 gallons. It was retailed at thirty-five cents per gallon, and in some districts as high as forty and forty-five cents, and the amount of profit upon these sales, over and above what is fair and legitimate, would be for the year $806,800. With regard to the flash test, of course, we all desire to see every safety possible afforded to the public; but I think what is safe for the American people ought to be safe for us, and that 115 degrees of temperature, which is the point at which Canadian oil must explode before it can be put on the market, might also be applied with fairness to the American oil. I do not see why there should be any distinction. Upon looking up the various Acts of Parliament I find that in 1868 a law was passed providing a uniform test of 115 degrees. In 1877 the leader of the then Government passed a measure, making the test 105 degrees, and making it uniform. I am informed that there was some Order in Council which I have been unable so far to obtain, by which there was a distinction made between the American oil and the Canadian oil. I suppose the result of that was somewhat unsatisfactory, and last year Parliament passed a new law establishing a low test. I am also credibly informed that the character of our oil has not been improved to any extent by the operation of the Act of last year. Dealers have told me that a great deal of inferior oil has found its way into the market. It becomes, therefore, a matter of grave consideration whether the Government should continue to give this unusual protection to this industry. One of the reasons assigned by coal oil men for so high a protection is that from American crude oil 75 per cent. of live petroleum can be obtained, while from Canadian oil only about 37 per cent. can be obtained. Upon enquiry at the department, I could not ascertain that any scientific test has been made by the department to ascertain whether this is the case or not; but I think we ought to have some definite information on that point. It is also said that in consequence of the lower specific gravity now required, the cost of production has increased. From enquiries I have made, I am of opinion that the public interest does not require a specific gravity lower than 8.07 or, at least, 8.05. The specific gravity could be increased from 8.02 to that point without deteriorating the coal oil, and, I am informed, at much less cost, and the industry could then do with less protection than it has now. It, indeed, becomes a question whether it is advisable to maintain an industry which costs so much. I have been told by persons coming from England to reside in Canada, that the cost of coal oil is greater here than in England, where it is not produced at all. When an industry has so high a protection, and those connected with it abuse their privilege, they ought at any rate to be taught a lesson. I draw attention of the Government to this matter more particularly in the interests of the rural population. We hear a great deal about the manufacturers and their interests; we hear that protection to manufacturers caused the creation of the National Policy. I do not wish to detract from the credit due to our leading manufacturers for their efforts in that great movement, but it was the great change which took place in public opinion among the rural population which enables this Government by so large a majority to carry into effect that policy of which we are so proud, and it is with the desire of perpetuating the National Policy that I draw the attention of the Government to the anomaly which exists in the case of coal oil, and which may do more to bring odium on the National Policy than anything else. I am informed that I shall not receive the support of the Government in the view I take, which I regret very much, although I understand that they intend, by means of a new instrument, to secure more uniformity in the flash test. This will not strike at the root of the evil, however, and I should like to see them go very much further.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. My hon. friend deserves great credit for the energy and activity with which he always attends to the interests of his constituents, and especially those of the farming community. In this instance the hon. gentleman in his zeal has done injustice to the policy of the Government. Mr. Brunel, in his able report, clearly exposed the difficulties which were met with in treating this important matter. In fact, in their tests the inspectors could never obtain any certainty or exactness as to results, and it has been conclusively proven, as the consequence of numerous experiments with the same oil made in Ottawa and in Toronto, the difference in results varied from five to twenty, or fifteen degrees. It is impossible such a state of things can be allowed to continue, and to remedy the evil the Government have ordered a number of Dr. Edwards' improved instruments, which are fully described on page six of Brunel's report of last year, and their superiority made manifest. It will be very difficult to decide on any change in policy until, at all events, decisive tests have been made with the improved means at the disposal of the Government. The Government will introduce a measure this Session to authorize the use of these instruments. A law must be enacted in this regard as has been done in England, authorizing the use of Taglioni's pyrometer, and which describes the instrument and various modes of using it. A similar enactment must be provided in this instance. Tests have been made with Edwards' instrument, of both Canadian and American oil, and if results prove accurate, the Government will be very happy to put both oils on the same footing with regard to flash test, though this will not probably be done until next Session. For these reasons I would ask my hon. friend to have the kindness to withdraw this motion.

Motion withdrawn.

NOVA SCOTIA RAILWAYS.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for copies of all papers and correspondence between the Local Government of Nova Scotia and the Department of Railways in reference to the proposed future management of the lines of railway now controlled by the Western Counties, Windsor and Annapolis and Eastern Extension Railway Companies, together with copies of all proposals recently submitted to the Dominion Government by Messrs. Holmes, White and Troop, members of the Nova Scotian Government, said it was rumored the Government of Nova Scotia intended taking possession of these lines, and that they had asked, during the past month, very important exceptions in the way of running powers over the Intercolonial. It was also rumored a minor Syndicate had been formed to take charge of these roads and run them in the future. He had no positive information on the subject, and made this motion to ascertain all information that could be obtained. Heretofore the Treasury of Nova Scotia was supposed to be in a very poor state, yet this Session no less than two important delegations from that Government had come here, the first of which partook more of the nature of a pleasure than a business trip.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIAL ASSIGNEES.

Mr. VANASSE moved for a statement shewing:

1. The number of official assignees, appointed under the Insolvent Act of 1875, and the Acts amending it, from the 1st June, 1875, to the 17th September, 1878.
2. The number of cases of insolvency in the Districts of Richelieu and of Montreal, during the same period.
3. To what insolvent cases these official assignees were appointed.
4. The number of cases of insolvency discharged by those two districts.
5. The names of the official assignees who have obtained their discharge, in conformity with the provisions of the Insolvent Act of 1875, and the Acts amending the same.
6. The names of the official assignees who have paid over to the Government of Canada the dividends remaining unclaimed in the said cases of insolvency, and the amount of each dividend thus paid over to the Government.

Mr. BLAKE. The motion of the hon. gentleman is in part directed to particular districts, but in part is general in form. The first statement asked for, namely, the appointment under the Act of 1875, and the Acts amending it, from the 1st June, 1875, until September, 1878, till the repeal of the Insolvent Act, might be useful. The second, third and fourth statements are special, and I do not interfere with them. But the fifth ought to apply as well to the assignees appointed since as before the date mentioned, namely, those who obtained their discharge since 1878, as well as before that year; and the motion might be amended as regards the sixth statement, in a similar sense, to cover the period from the 17th September, 1878, up to the repeal of the Insolvent Act.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I have no objection to amend the motion in the way suggested.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

DOMINION PURCHASE OF THE Q. M. O. & O. RAILWAY.

Mr. BÉCHARD, in the absence of Mr. LAURIER, moved for copy of all correspondence between the Government and the Provincial Government of Quebec, concerning the purchase, by the Dominion of Canada, of the Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa and Occidental Railway, or the subsidizing of the same. He said: During the course of last Session, the hon. member for Quebec East proposed the same motion, when the answer given was that such a correspondence did not then exist. I do not dispute the accuracy of that answer; but I have reason to believe that, since last Session, such a correspondence has taken place between the Dominion and Quebec Governments. For, in the Budget Speech of the Provincial Treasurer of Quebec, made during the last Session of the Quebec Legislature in June, occurs the following passage:—

"We, therefore, laid our views before the Dominion Cabinet for consideration. I contend that we are as much entitled to aid towards the cost of the Government railway from Quebec to Ottawa as the Canada Central to the Dominion subsidy paid that road. While the building of that road may, and doubtless will, benefit the North Shore Railway, this latter road is equally necessary, as affording the shortest and most direct route to the ports of St. John and Halifax from the West, and is equally entitled to help from the Dominion Treasury. We, therefore, ask either that the Dominion assume the Q. M. O. and O. Railway as part of the Canada Pacific Railway, or that we be paid a subsidy equal to that paid per mile to the Canada Central. These questions are under consideration at Ottawa, and we wait a decision thereon."

Now, from this passage anyone would infer that such a correspondence had taken place between the Dominion Government and the Quebec Government since the last Session of the Federal Parliament. It is for a copy of such correspondence, therefore, that I have the honor, in the absence of the Hon. Mr. Laurier, to propose this motion.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The inference drawn by the hon. gentleman from the speech of the Treasurer of Quebec is quite reasonable. But, perhaps, the hon. mover might also draw the conclusion that, without actual correspondence, there might be simply communications between the two Governments—might be no correspondence after all. I am not sure whether there is any. Nevertheless, I have no objection to the motion, and will bring down any correspondence that may exist. If a correspondence is actually proceeding, of course the hon. gentleman will understand that the answer to the motion will have to be delayed till the correspondence is completed.

Motion agreed to.

BOUNDARIES OF ONTARIO AND QUEBEC.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for return of all correspondence which has taken place within the past year between the Government of the Dominion and the Imperial Government, on matters relating to the boundaries of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, said: When this question came up last year I endeavored to show that, as it was not generally understood, a Committee was necessary to investigate it. A Committee was appointed, and its report now before the House will, I think, be found to contain a good deal of valuable information. Just before the recess the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) took occasion to bring up the question on a motion for a return of applications for timber limits north of the boundary of the former Province of Quebec, as constituted by the proclamation of 1763, but I cannot see what bearing his motion had on the question. On that motion the hon. member went into a long argument in which he brought up the opinions of eminent men who had taken part in the debate on the Quebec Act in 1774, as reported in the Cavendish debates, to show that a certain line was the one intended for the western boundary of the enlarged Province of Quebec; but I am of opinion that in seeking for an interpretation of the Act we should not go beyond the Act itself. If, as the hon. gentleman says, it came down in one form, as it no doubt did, from the House of Lords, and was finally passed after full discussion in another, we must take it in its amended form, in the form, in fact, in which it became law. The hon. gentleman endeavored to show that if the due north line from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi is to be adopted the line alone must go north and not the whole territory to the east of it, and that, therefore, the Province of Quebec must still be bounded on the north by the line indicated in the proclamation of 1763. What he means by this it is hard to conceive, and I do not think he will find many to coincide with him in such an extraordinary opinion. The Act is very clear as to the whole territory going north to the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, and that description as to a northern boundary must hold good wherever the limitary line on the west may be whether it be the Mississippi, the due north line, or, as defined in the later commissions to Governors, a line at the entrance to Lake Superior. The hon. gentleman has said and written a great deal about the former possessions of France at Hudson's Bay, and her claims to that country on account of priority of discovery; but all her claims, whatever they might have been, were finally settled by the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713, and the Attorney General of Ontario commenced his argument before the arbitrators, by saying very properly, as I think, that the Treaty of Utrecht afforded the only rational and true basis for ascertaining the boundary, that is, as between the French and English possessions. Unfortunately the question has, as I have often said, been encumbered with a great mass of extraneous and irrelevant matter. We have histories of the early occupation of the French at Hudson's Bay, of Indian treaties, of what the Right Hon. Edmund Burke said and did in reference to the boundaries of the State of New York of which he was the agent; but if we are to abide by the Act of 1774 and succeeding Acts, I do not see that all these opinions, histories, and extraneous matters are of any great value to the discussion. The hon. member for Bothwell and the Attorney General for Ontario, claim that their book of documents and other productions contain everything of value bearing on the subject, and it has been stated in another Legislature that:

"The arbitrators had before them all the evidence obtainable from the most diligent researches both in America and Europe, or brought to light during the many discussions bearing on the subject that have taken place during the past century."

This may, perhaps, be the case from their point of view, but whatever may be the merit of their works regarding the past century, the labors of the Committee of last Session showed that there was a great deal which their books did not contain in reference to the present century, and that much of what they did contain was rather mixed, and not arranged in such a manner as to admit of a very clear conception of the case being arrived at by the ordinary reader. A great deal that was wanting in the book of documents can be found in the report of the Committee of last year, or in the evidence accompanying it. The book of documents is rather silent with regard to the state of things west of the water-shed during a certain very interesting period. We see nothing in it which would lead to a clear conception of the colony of Assiniboia, or of its being recognized by the Imperial Government—there is nothing in the book of documents of the country west of the height of land having been formed into a Bishopruck, or of some other acts of recognition under the sanction of the Imperial Government—nothing of Sir John Coape Sherbrooke's celebrated proclamation, which fixed so clearly the locality to which the Act of 1803 respecting the Indian territories was intended to apply and did apply. The book of documents does not give very fully the opinions of counsel on the Hudson's Bay Company's claims from the days of Lord Mansfield down to the time of Lord Abinger, but all these are supplied in the report of the Committee of last year. In fact, they were considerably and kindly furnished to the Committee by the Hon. Donald A. Smith, a gentleman whose opinions, I am sure, my hon. friend from Bothwell will receive with respect. This book of documents is, in fact, as remarkable for what it does not contain as for what it does contain, and if it was the only source of information, it is not to be wondered at that the Legislature of Ontario should have been led to pass a series of resolutions which, with better information, it may be assumed it would not have passed. This is a question removed from ordinary politics, a question which must be judged on its merits, a question which rests on the doings of by-gone generations and on Acts of Parliament and the exercise of the royal prerogative in former years. I shall confine myself on this occasion to a particular view of the subject which, in my humble opinion, has not hitherto received sufficient attention, except in one instance, when it was brought forward by the Attorney General for Ontario in his statement of the case and in his very able argument before the arbitrators—I refer to the Acts done under the royal prerogative, to the importance of which sufficient attention has not, I think, been hitherto directed. The Attorney General for Ontario very properly claimed that the Act of 1774 provided for the exercise of the royal prerogative, and that all Acts of prerogative under that Act were as much law as the Act itself. In order to understand this it may be well to quote from the Act which runs as follows:—

"That all the territories, islands and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until, in the same latitude, it meets the River St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario; thence through the Lake Ontario and the river commonly called Niagara; and thence along by the eastern and south-eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected; and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries of the said Province, until the said western boundary strike the Ohio; but in case the said bank of the said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north-western angle of the said Province of Pennsylvania; and thence, by a right line, to the said north-western angle of the said Province; and thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strike the River Ohio; and along the bank of the said river, westward, to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such territories, islands and countries, which have, since the tenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, be, and they are hereby, during His Majesty's pleasure, annexed to, and made part and parcel of the Province of Quebec as created and established by the said Royal proclamation of the seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three."

The Act of 1774, the House will thus see, while it indicated a certain boundary, also provided for the exercise of the prerogative, and left to the King the power of arranging the boundaries at his pleasure. On this subject the Attorney-General for Ontario expressed himself very clearly and with great force; it is only to be regretted that he had not followed his own reasoning to its logical conclusion. In the statement of the case for Ontario, page 5 he says:

"The Crown had an undoubted right to add to the boundaries of the Province, and that if the boundaries given to it by the Commissioners are not the identical boundaries which the Statute provided for, and which were thereby to continue during His Majesty's pleasure, and if the Commissioners assigned to the Province a larger area than the Statute had described, the Crown had a right to make, and did make, the addition."

And in his argument before the arbitrators he remarks as follows:—

"Because the Crown had a right to add to the territory of the Province. If the Statute did not give the territory to the banks of the Mississippi, the Crown had, by virtue of the Royal prerogative, a right to add to the limits of the Province; and the Commission in which territory up to and along the eastern bank of the Mississippi was given to the Province, had the effect of giving to it that boundary, supposing that the Statute had not given it."

Further, he says:

"Because the Crown had the right to place the territory in the Province, though it could be made to appear that the territory in some sense belonged to the Hudson's Bay Company, they were only private persons. If the Crown had chosen to put the whole of the Hudson's Bay territory into the Province, the Crown had a right to do so."

A little further on, he says:

"The Crown would not be interfering with their property by placing it under a certain government."

And he goes on as follows:—

"I have said the Crown had a right to include additional territory beyond that given by Statute if the Crown thought proper. An illustration of this prerogative is afforded by the Act of 1774, which provides for additions to the Province of Quebec as theretofore given by the proclamation. The Act provides that these additions, which Parliament itself was making, were to continue during His Majesty's pleasure only; although Parliament was making an addition, the prerogative in regard to even that territory was not interfered with; and a fortiori the prerogative right of giving still further territory to the Province was not intended to have been interfered with by the Act. As the Statute provided that the additions thereby specified were to be during His Majesty's pleasure, if His Majesty's pleasure should interfere with that provision being carried out it would so far be in effect a repeal of the Act, and would be a stronger exercise of the Royal prerogative than a further addition to the territory provided by the Statute would be."

Again he says (page 10):

"The Constitutional Act of 1791, implies the same right of the Crown to exercise the Royal prerogative in the arrangement of territorial limits. That Act was passed in contemplation of the division of the Province of Canada into the two Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and it made provision for the Government of each of those Provinces. But the Act did not itself make the division; it provided that when the division was made, the Government should be as the Act describes. This is the enactment. 'His Majesty has been pleased to signify, by his Message to both Houses of Parliament, his Royal intention to divide his Province of Quebec into two separate Provinces,' etc. It was to be done, if done at all, by the Royal prerogative. His Majesty might divide the Province into two in any way he chose; and all that Parliament did by the Act of 1791 was to provide that, in case of such a division by the Crown, each of the two sections should be subject to the Government which the Statute provided for it. Another illustration of such an exercise of the prerogative is in the proclamation of 1763, whereby the Crown created four new Provinces: Prince Edward Island, or St. John's Island, as it was sometimes called in those days with the lesser islands, were added to Nova Scotia by the same prerogative."

Again (on page 10):

"Mr. Burke's letter to his constituents [printed in the book of documents] contains a reference to this matter—the paragraph is towards the foot of page 385. He says: 'My next object of enquiry, therefore, was upon what principles the Board of Trade would, in the future discussions which must inevitably and speedily arise, determine what belonged to you and what to Canada. I was told that the settled uniform practice of the Board of Trade was this: That in questions of boundary where the jurisdiction and soil in both the litigating Provinces belonged to the Crown, there was no rule but the King's will, and that he might allot as he pleased, to the one or the other. They said also that under these circumstances, even where the King had actually adjudged a territory to one Province, he might afterwards change the boundary; or, if he thought fit, erect the parts into separate and new governments at his discretion.'"

"Mr. Burke did not approve of the extensive claims of the Crown in the matter of prerogative, as maintained by the Board of Trade; he thought the doctrine was carried too far; still, he admitted that it was the uniform settled practice of the distinguished persons who constituted the Board of Trade to act on that principle. I find nothing against that view; there seems to be no doubt that the Crown had the legal power stated, and that, if the Quebec Act did not give the Province of Quebec as large a territory as the commissions of the Governors afterwards provided for, these commissions were sufficient to give the additional territory to the Province."

On page 12 he remarks as follows:—

"In seven commissions, from that issued to the Earl of Durham, March 30th, 1838, to that of Lord Elgin, October 1st, 1846, and also in the two commissions to Sir John Colborne, and the Right Hon. Charles P. Thompson, as Captain-General and Governor in Chief of Upper Canada, dated respectively December 13th, 1838, and September 6th, 1839, the line of division between Upper and Lower Canada is stated to reach the shore of Hudson's Bay by a line drawn due north from the head of said lake [Temiscaming] until it strikes the shore of Hudson's Bay.

"These seven commissions use the word 'shore.' It is not to be supposed that there was a mistake in substituting the word 'shore' for the words 'boundary line.'"

On page 13 he goes on:

"The Crown had power to include within the limits of the Province part of the territory of the company, as well as that of any private owner of land, if such was the Royal will."

And on page 24, says:

"If there should seem to the arbitrators to be too much doubt on the subject to enable them to determine with absolute precision the northern boundary of the Province, a boundary should be assigned, which would give to the Province the full territory which the commissions to the Governors definitively provided for."

These views are remarkably clear, and on reference to the Act of 1774 it will be seen that it did not carry the northern boundary of the then Province of Quebec north of the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, and it is equally clear that the first commissions issued under it described the territories of the Merchant Adventurers of England as coming as far south as the Mississippi, at least. These territories, in fact, were to be found on the Mississippi according to these commissions, and the Attorney General, in so far as he claims that any extension further north must be based on commissions issued under the Royal prerogative, is perfectly logical; it remains for us to see what these commissions say on the subject. The first commission issued subsequent to the passing of the Act was on the 27th September, 1774, to Sir Guy Carleton, which runs as follows:—

"And further know you, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Guy Carleton, of our especial grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, the said Guy Carleton, to be our Captain General and Governor in Chief in and over our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all our territories, islands and countries in North America, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until in the same latitude, it meets with the River St. Lawrence; from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario, thence through the Lake Ontario, and the river commonly called Niagara, and thence along by the eastern and south-eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary granted by the charter of the Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected, and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries to the said Province, until the said western boundary strikes the Ohio; but in case the bank of the said lake shall not be found so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north-western angle of the said Province of Pennsylvania, and thence by a right line to the said north-western angle of the said Province, and thence along the western boundary of the said Province until it strikes the River Ohio, and along the bank of the said river westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward along the eastern bank of the said river to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay; and also all such territories, islands and countries which have, since the tenth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland as aforesaid, together with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging."

The next was the commission of 18th Sept., 1777, to Sir Frederick Haldimand, and it is precisely the same as the last. It is quite evident that, taking these commissions by themselves, and supposing them to be an expression of the King's will, which, in an official way we must believe them to have been, they most decidedly, as in the Attorney General of Ontario's view of the case, carried the western boundary of the then Province of Quebec to the Mississippi; and (always admitting the authority of these commissions) the Mississippi continued to be the western boundary of Quebec until the success of the War of Independence swept the whole country to the south and west of the great lakes into the territory of the Confederacy of the United States. In 1783 the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States was concluded, and in 1786 a new commission with an entirely new description was issued to Sir Guy Carleton, then once more Captain General and Governor in Chief of the Province of Quebec. This description followed the wording of the treaty, and ran as follows:—

"And further know ye that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Sir Guy Carleton, of our especial grace certain knowledge and mere motion, have thought fit to appoint you, the said Sir Guy Carleton, to be our Captain General and Governor in Chief in and over our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all our territories, islands and countries in North America, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the north-westmost head of Connecticut River; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on the said latitude until it strikes the River Iroquois or Ojatarqui; thence along the middle of the said river into Lake Ontario; through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication into the Lake Huron; thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior, thence through Lake Superior northward of the Isles Royal and Philippeaux to the Long lake; thence through the middle of said Long Lake and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most north-western point thereof and from thence on a due west course to the River Mississippi; and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the Merchant Adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay; and also such territories, islands and countries which have, since the 10th of February, 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, together with all the rights, members and appurtenances whatsoever thereunto belonging."

I may here remark that a great deal has been said about the Mississippi, and the line running westward to it, and I have been accused of ignoring the treaty of amity between the United States and England which took place in 1794. All that that treaty did was simply to leave the Commissioners at liberty to amend a discrepancy by drawing a line which would meet the views of both nations. It was merely permissive, and I have yet to learn that a line adopted under such circumstances, in 1794, could affect the boundaries of a Province as described in a commission, in 1786, more especially as, at the time the treaty was concluded, the commission in question had been completely and absolutely revoked. The admirable map produced by the Government of Ontario, shows very clearly where the Mississippi of those days was supposed to be, and Mr. Kitchen's very elaborate map, which will be found published in one of the volumes produced by the hon. member for Bothwell himself, shows conclusively that the line running due west from the Lake of the Woods was not intended to strike, and could not have struck, the Mississippi, but was meant to be carried on to the Missouri, which was the Upper Mississippi of those days; however, to let that matter pass for the present, as not bearing on the particular point under discussion, it is quite evident that the commission of 1786 to Sir Guy Carleton, did carry the boundary of Quebec to the northward of the St. Lawrence water-shed and westward to the Mississippi, and the Attorney-General for Ontario is quite logical in claiming that it did so, always assuming that the commissions gave expression to the Royal will. But in 1791 there came another change, and the Province of Quebec was divided by what is now known as "the Constitutional Act," into the two Provinces of Upper and Lower

Mr. DAWSON.

Canada. The commission of 22nd April, 1786, was then completely and absolutely revoked, and a new commission, limiting the Province of Upper Canada to so much as was left of the former Province of Quebec, as existing previous to the date of that revoked commission, as lay to the westward of the dividing line, issued. That revoked commission is the only one in which the description, without doubt, carries the boundaries of the old Province of Quebec to the northward of the water-shed. On the 12th September, 1791, a new commission was issued, and it is the most important one in the whole series of commissions as, in fact, the description therein contained was not altered for a period of forty-seven years. I shall read it to the House, and I would ask particular attention to it:

"Whereas, we did by Our Letters Patent, under Our Great Seal of Great Britain, bearing date the twenty-second day of April, in the twenty-sixth year of Our Reign, constitute and appoint you, Guy, Lord Dorchester [then Sir Guy Carleton], to be our Captain General and Governor in Chief in and over our Province of Quebec, in America, comprehending all Our Territories, Islands and Countries in North America then bounded, as in Our said recited Letters Patent was mentioned and expressed.

"Now Know Ye, that we have revoked, determined, and by these presents do revoke and determine, the said recited Letters Patent, and every clause, article or thing therein contained.

"And whereas, we have thought fit by Our order, made in Our Privy Council on the nineteenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, to divide Our said Province of Quebec into two separate Provinces, to be called the Province of Upper Canada and the Province of Lower Canada, by a line to commence at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis at the Cove West of the Pointe au Baudet, in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit to the direction of north thirty-four degrees west of the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil; thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north twenty-five degrees east, until it strikes the Ottawa River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming, and from the head of the said lake to a line drawn due north until it strikes the boundary line of Hudson's Bay; the Province of Upper Canada to comprehend all such lands, territories and islands lying to the westward of the said line of division, as were part of Our said Province of Quebec, and the Province of Lower Canada to comprehend all such lands, territories and islands lying to the eastward of the said line of division, as were part of Our said Province of Quebec.

"And whereas, by an Act passed in the present year of Our reign, intitled "An Act to repeal certain parts of an Act passed in the fourteenth year of His Majesty's reign, intitled 'An Act for making more effectual provision for the Government of Quebec, in North America, and to make further provision for the Government of the said Province,' further provision is hereby made for the good government and prosperity of our said Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada.

"Further Know Ye, that we, reposing especial trust and confidence in the prudence, courage and loyalty of you, the said Guy, Lord Dorchester, of Our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, have thought fit to constitute and appoint you, the said Guy, Lord Dorchester, to be Our Captain General and Governor in Chief of Our said Province of Upper Canada, and our said Province of Lower Canada, respectively, bounded as hereintofore described."

This commission cannot be construed as carrying the boundary to the north of the water-shed, and taken in connection with the instructions issued under it, which are as follows:—

"With these Our instructions, you will receive Our Commission under our Great Seal of Great Britain, constituting you Our Captain-General and Governor in Chief in and over our Provinces of Upper Canada and Lower Canada, bounded as in our said Commission is particularly expressed."

It is perfectly clear that no enlargement was intended, but simply the division of the former Province into two. Now, whether Upper Canada would be bounded according to this commission by the Mississippi line or as much of it as remained to Great Britain or the due north line, may be an open question; the due north line has the decision of eminent judges in its favor, but they went entirely by the description in the Act, and do not seem to have been much impressed by the commissions; however this may be, there can be no doubt that the description we have been considering held good from 12th September, 1791, until the 30th March 1838, when an entirely new departure was taken by the Imperial Government in the matter of the boundary descriptions, and the following commission issued to the Earl of Durham :

"Our said Province of Lower Canada; the said Province being bounded by the adjacent Province of Upper Canada, and the boundary line between the said Provinces commencing at a stone boundary on the north bank of Lake St. Francis, at the cove west of the Point au Baudet, in the limit between the Townships of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit in the direction of north, thirty-four degrees west, to the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil; thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north, twenty-five degrees east, until it strikes the Ottawa River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming; and which said Province of Lower Canada is also bounded by a line drawn due north from the head of the said lake until it strikes the shore of Hudson's Bay.

"Our said Province of Upper Canada; the said Province being bounded on the east by the line dividing that Province from Lower Canada, beginning at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis, at a Cove west of the Point au Baudet in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit in the direction of north, thirty-four degrees west to the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil, thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north twenty-five degrees east until it strikes the Ottawa River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming, the said Province of Upper Canada being also bounded by a line drawn due north from the head of the said lake until it reaches the shore of Hudson's Bay; the said Province of Upper Canada being bounded on the south, beginning at the said stone boundary between Lancaster and Longueuil, by the Lake St. Francis, the River St. Lawrence, the Lake of the Thousand Islands, Lake Ontario, the River Niagara, which falls into Lake Erie, and along the middle of that lake; on the west, by the channel of Detroit, Lake St. Clair, up the River St. Clair, Lake Huron, the west shore of Drummond Island, that of St. Joseph and Sugar Island, thence into Lake Superior."

This description was continued in all subsequent commissions in which descriptions of boundaries were given. It will be observed that in the commission of 1766 the description ran as follows: After describing the eastern section it continues:

"Thence along the middle of the said river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of the said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie, through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of said water communication into the Lake Huron; thence to the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior; thence through Lake Superior northward to Isles Royal and Phillipaux to the Long Lake; thence to the middle of the said Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the said Lake of the Woods; thence through the said lake to the most north-western point thereof; and from thence on a due west course to the River Mississippi."

That commission was, as I have stated, revoked, and it will be seen how very unlike the description therein contained is to that of the commission of 1838. In the latter it will be observed that the description runs as follows:—

"The said Province of Upper Canada being bounded on the south beginning at the said stone boundary between Lancaster and Longueuil by the Lake St. Francis, the River St. Lawrence, the Lake of the Thousand Islands, Lake Ontario, the River Niagara, which falls (leads) into the Lake Erie, and along the middle of that lake; on the west by the channel of the Detroit, Lake St. Clair up the River St. Clair, Lake Huron, the west shore of Drummond Island, that of St. Joseph and Sugar Island, thence into Lake Superior."

The Attorney General for Ontario in his argument before the arbitrators, said that no one could suppose that the southern boundary of Ontario was to stop there, but it is not a southern boundary that was being described at that particular point, but a western boundary; on reference to the description it will be seen that the southern boundary stops at the head of Lake Erie, and then the description goes on as follows:—

"On the west by the channel of Detroit, Lake St. Clair, up the River St. Clair, the west shore of Drummond Island, that of St. Joseph and Sugar Island, thence into Lake Superior."

And that is in reality a boundary on the west as will be seen on reference to the map; the words "on the west" would not apply to a boundary carried completely through Lake Superior, inasmuch as over a very long distance in that lake, between Isle Chapeau and Pigeon River, the course of the International boundary line is to the south of west, and how could a boundary on the west run to the south of west? It will be observed, also, that the expression "north of Isles Royal and Phillipaux," as used in the Treaty of 1783 and in the commission of 1786, is entirely dropped, and it cannot be supposed that the dropping of that expression and the limiting of the western boundary line to the entrance of Lake Superior was not intentional. No one who looks closely into the matter can suppose it to have been otherwise than intentional, for the description was evidently drawn with great care and circumspection. I shall now leave this boundary line on the west at the point where, according to the description in the commission last quoted, it goes "into Lake Superior," and ask the House to accompany me for a little while to another region where, as I shall presently show, circumstances had arisen which rendered it impossible that the line could have been carried through Lake Superior; which make it quite evident, in fact, that the Imperial authorities had no intention whatever of running it so far to the westward as to interfere with then existing rights, with judicial decisions or the Acts respecting the Indian territories. Let us for a moment consider the condition of the North-West Territories at the end of the past and the beginning of the present century: We will find there two great rival companies struggling for the mastery—the North-West Company of Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company. At that time the Hudson's Bay Company had been greatly reduced by the long continued opposition it had met with in its operations. The North-West Company was great and prosperous and it was under the guidance of men of pre-eminent ability, some of whose names are likely to live for ever in the history of the country. The rivalries between the two companies had led to bloodshed and war, and disturbances were rife from the shores of Lake Superior to the plains of the West. In 1803, the Act 43 George III, chapter 128 was passed, and the preamble of that Act runs as follows:—

"Whereas crimes and offences have been committed in the Indian territories and other parts of America, not within the limits of the Provinces of Lower or Upper Canada, or either of them, or of the jurisdiction of any of the Courts established in those Provinces, or within the limits of any civil government of the United States of America, and are therefore not cognizable by any jurisdiction whatever, and by reason thereof great crimes and offences have gone and may hereafter go unpunished and greatly increase."

There can be no question as to the localities where the crimes which led to the passing of this Act were committed. Lord Selkirk gives a detail of many of them. Sir Alexander Mackenzie refers to disturbances on the tributaries of the Red River, and on reference to the report of the Committee of last Session, it will be seen that the Hon. Donald A. Smith, than whom no one should have a more thorough acquaintance with the affairs of the North-West, says that disturbances were general over the territory, and that several officers of the Hudson's Bay Company were killed on the waters of the Moose and Albany. Notwithstanding this Act, which gave jurisdiction to the Canadian Courts in the Indian territories of the North-West, the disturbances continued to extend and increase. In 1809, one McDonell, a prominent fur trader, was killed at Eagle Lake, and his slayer, one Mowat, was taken down and tried at Montreal, where he was found guilty of manslaughter, the crime being held by the Court to have been committed within the Indian territories, and beyond the boundaries of Upper Canada or Lower Canada, or either of them. Eagle Lake, I may say, is now a station on the Lake Superior section of the Pacific Railway, and it is far within the territories covered by the award of the arbitrators in 1878. War and bloodshed continued throughout the territories, and culminated eventually in a battle at Assiniboia, in which the Governor lost his life; and in 1816 a proclamation, which runs as follows, was issued by His Excellency Sir John Coape Sherbrooke:—

"Whereas in and by a certain Statute of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, made and passed in the forty-third year of His Majesty's Reign, intituled: 'An Act for extending the jurisdiction of the Courts of Justice in the Provinces of Lower Canada and Upper Canada, to the trial and punishment of persons guilty of crimes and offences within certain parts of North America, adjoining the said Provinces, it is amongst other things enacted and declared that from and after the passing of the said Statute, 'All offences committed within any of the Indian territories or parts of America not within the limits of either of the said Provinces of Lower or Upper Canada, or of any civil government of the United States of America, shall and be deemed to be offences of the same nature and shall be tried in the same manner and subject to the same punishment as if the same had been committed within the Province of Lower or Upper Canada.'

"And whereas, under and by virtue of the above in part recited Statute, justices of the peace have been duly nominated and appointed with power and authority to apprehend within the Indian territories aforesaid, and to convey to this Province of Lower Canada for trial, all and every person and persons guilty of any crime or offence whatever:

"And whereas there is reason to believe that divers breaches of the peace, by acts of force and violence, have lately been committed within the aforesaid Indian territories, and jurisdiction of the aforesaid justices of the peace:

"I have therefore thought fit, and by and with the advice of His Majesty's Executive Council of and for the Province of Lower Canada, to issue this proclamation, for the purpose of bringing to punishment all persons who may have been or shall be guilty of any such act or acts of force or violence as aforesaid, or other crime and offence whatever, and to deter all others from following their pernicious example, thereby requiring all His Majesty's subjects and others within the said Indian territories, to avoid and to discourage all acts of force and violence whatsoever, and all proceedings whatever tending to produce tumults and riots, or in any way to disturb the public peace:

"And I do hereby strictly charge and command all justices of the peace so as aforesaid nominated and appointed under and by virtue of the above-mentioned Statute, and all magistrates throughout this Province, and do require all others of His Majesty's subjects, generally in their several and respective stations, to make diligent enquiry and search to discover, apprehend and commit, or cause to be committed to lawful custody for trial, in due course of law, pursuant to the provisions in the above-mentioned Statute contained, all persons who have been, or shall be guilty of any act or acts of force or violence as aforesaid, nor of any other crime or crimes, offence and offences within the said Indian territories, to the end that the laws may be carried into prompt execution against all such offenders, for the preservation of peace and good order therein."

This was clearly an official act under the highest authority then existing, fixing the localities where the disturbances had been committed as Indian territories beyond the boundaries of Upper or Lower Canada or either of them. In the same year two commissioners were appointed by the Government of Quebec, which had the supreme jurisdiction to inquire into the causes of the disturbances within the Indian territories and they held their investigations at Red River which was then the very centre and focus of these disturbances. Time went on. The two rival companies became incorporated as one in 1821, and a further Act, 1st and 2nd Geo. IV. Cap. 66, was passed. It was confirmatory of the Act of 1803 and extended the jurisdiction of the Canadian courts to the Hudson's Bay Company's territories as well as to the Indian territories. After this, peace prevailed for a long period in the North-West, but nearly all intercourse both with Upper and Lower Canada was shut off. The united companies carried on their trade by way of Hudson's Bay, and in the peaceful times which followed the height of land was generally accepted, in the public estimation, as the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories. The colony which had been established by Lord Selkirk in storm and tumult in 1811-12 was at last quietly prospering, and the Hudson's Bay Company was ably represented both in the territories and in England. It is well known that that company has always had among its members men of high political position in England, and at the time to which I refer it was represented by one of those extraordinary men who impress their character upon their time and generation, and whose actions have sometimes a marked influence on the future—I allude to the Right Hon. Edward Ellice. He had a seat in Parliament. He was possessed of almost unbounded wealth and was allied by marriage to Earl Grey and some other eminent men who did much to shape the policy of Great Britain in those days. He was known as the Minister maker, and it required a man of no small ability and tact to be a Minister maker in England, at a time when there were actors on the political stage who have not since been equalled. I mention this for the purpose of showing that the Hudson's Bay Company's interests were not likely to be lost sight of, seeing that they were in the hands of a man so near the Government and of such influence and consummate tact. In 1838, the Company applied for a renewal of their lease, although it had then three or four years to run, and, as explained in Judge Johnson's evidence, there was at that time some idea of forming the colony of Assinaboia into a Crown colony. It had become a colony, in fact, as will be seen on reference to the evidence of the Hon. Donald A. Smith, who was at one time Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, and of Judge Johnson, a former Governor of the Colony of Assiniboia. I mention all this so that the House may be in a position to see that in the period intervening between 1821, the date at which the companies were amalgamated, and 1838, when the commission to Lord Durham was issued, a new state of things had arisen in the North-West. I should mention, too, that in 1818, the de Reinhart trial had taken place, the question as is well known hinged on the matter of territorial jurisdiction, and the Judges were unanimous in the decision that Upper Canada was bounded on the west by the prolongation of a line drawn due north from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi and on the north by the height of land, or southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories. To return again to the matter of the boundary line, the description in this commission (Lord Durham's) carried the western boundary of Upper Canada, as we have seen, into Lake Superior, but not one step further, and why it was not carried through can be easily seen from what I have just stated. The rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to the country to the west and north of the water-shed, were being ably maintained by one of the most eminent men of the day. A colony recognized by the Imperial Government had grown up, and the boundaries of that colony came to the height of land, and it was within the territories which had been defined by two Imperial Acts as being Indian territories beyond the boundaries of the Provinces. The Imperial Government had before them, moreover, the unanimous decision of the Judges in the de Reinhart trial, and, in view of all these circumstances, it would have been impossible for them to carry the boundary of Upper Canada through Lake Superior. Had they done so they would have ignored their own action in relation to the colony of Assinaboia, the Indian territories, and the Hudson Bay Company's territories. They would have ignored, too, the opinions of the most eminent English counsel, and they would have over-riden the decision of the highest Canadian Court then existing. There were, besides, other circumstances in operation, which must lead anyone, who bestows attention on the subject, to believe that everything, at that time connected with Canadian affairs, received the deepest and most earnest consideration of the Imperial authorities. In this country there were troubles on all hands in 1837 and 1838, and the minute care with which the description in the commission to Earl Durham is drawn, shows that the matter of the boundaries of Upper Canada had received the most careful consideration. But the same commission which carried the boundary line on the west only into Lake Superior, in other words, to the entrance of that lake, carried the northern boundary to the shore of Hudson's Bay. So that a line from the entrance of Lake Superior drawn due north to the shore of Hudson's Bay would, in conformity to the commission, be the boundary line of Ontario on the west, and a line from the head of Lake Temiscaming to the shore of Hudson's Bay the boundary line on the east. If commissions to Governors are to be taken as giving legal definitions of boundaries, as emanating, in fact, from the Sovereign, whose prerogative is provided for and guarded in the Act of 1774, I do not see how you are to get over this description of the boundaries of Upper Canada, a description which was not altered from 1838 down to the date of the Confederation of the Provinces. Here is the description as repeated in the Commission of 1846 to Lord Elgin. Let this House and the country study it well in connection with the decisions of Courts and the action of the Imperial Government in recognizing the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company and the colony of Assinaboia, before they give way to the assumption that Upper Canada should have extended by right over the plains of the North-West:

"Our said Province of Canada, comprising Upper Canada and Lower Canada, the former being bounded on the east by the line dividing it from Lower Canada, commencing at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis, at the Cove west of the Pointe au Beaudet, in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of New Longueuil, running along the said limit in the direction of north 34 degrees west, to the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil, thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north 25 degrees east until it strikes the Ottawa River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming by a line drawn due north from the head of the said lake until it reaches the shore of Hudson's Bay; and being bounded on the south, beginning at the said stone boundary between Lancaster and Longueuil, by the Lake St. Francis, the River St. Lawrence, the Lake of the Thousand Islands, Lake Ontario, the River Niagara, Lake Erie, and along the middle of that lake; on the west, by the Channel of Detroit, Lake St. Clair, up the River St. Clair, Lake Huron, the west shore of Drummond Island, that of St. Joseph and Sugar Island, thence into Lake Superior. The said Province of Lower Canada being bounded by the adjacent Province of Upper Canada, and the boundary line between the said two Provinces, commencing at a stone boundary on the north bank of the Lake St. Francis, at the west of Pointe au Beaudet, in the limit between the Township of Lancaster and the Seigneurie of Longueuil, running along the said limit in the direction of north 34 degrees west, to the westernmost angle of the said Seigneurie of New Longueuil, thence along the north-western boundary of the Seigneurie of Vaudreuil, running north 25 degrees east until it strikes the Ottawa River, to ascend the said river into the Lake Temiscaming; and which said Province of Lower Canada is also bounded by a line drawn due north from the head of the said lake until it strikes the shore of the Hudson's Bay."

Mr. Speaker, I have been accused of wishing to curtail the boundaries of Ontario, but this is a most unjust and unfair accusation. I have only done my best to explain where, in my opinion, the law has placed the boundaries; but apart from this, surely whatever is most in the interests of the Dominion at large should be most in the interests of Ontario in particular. For a very long period the height of land was looked upon as the northern and western boundary of Upper Canada. In 1850 the United Provinces made a treaty with the Indians of Lake Superior in which the height of land is defined as the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay Company's territories, and that it formed the northern and western boundary of Ontario was the general belief at the time of the Confederation of the Provinces. If, therefore, the extent of Ontario should be doubled by adding to it the territories described in the award, how can this grand scheme of Confederation be carried out? Supposing that the State of Maine together with the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick could be added to the Province of Quebec, it would be something like adding this vast territory to Ontario, for it will be eventually filled with population, and anything that destroys the balance of wealth, power and influence in the Provinces must seriously embarrass the working of our institutions. The question is narrowed down to one of two things. We must either take the description in the Act, or we must be guided by the commissions issued under the Act. If by the Act alone, Ontario cannot go north of the height of land. Let those who suppose that she can read the opinions of the English Law Lords as submitted with the evidence of the Hon. Donald A. Smith, from the days of Lord Mansfield down to modern times, and they will perhaps come to a different conclusion. It is clear to my mind that if you take the description from the Act alone Ontario must be bounded on the north by the height of land, whereas, if we are to be guided by the commissions, although she is limited on the west to the entrance into Lake Superior, her northern boundary is the shore of Hudson's Bay. In the one case, she would have a narrow strip on the north coast of Lake Superior; in the other, a territory, notwithstanding all that has been said to its disadvantage, of very great value. She would have a region with a fair extent of agricultural land, with rivers navigable for hundreds of miles, with forests of valuable timber, with coal fields of considerable extent, and with sea ports and sea fisheries which may become of immense importance in the future. I do not therefore wish to curtail Ontario, but to extend her to the very fullest measure that the descriptions have defined in the commissions to Governors which, in the opinion of the Attorney-General of Ontario, are in fact the law. The hon. member for Bothwell concludes his elaborate writings by expressing himself as follows:—

"The limits of the Province of Ontario, then, are the International boundary upon the south, westward to the Rocky Mountains; the Rocky Mountains, from the International boundary, northward to the most north-westerly sources of the Saskatchewan eastward, until it intersects the boundary line midway between Lake Winnipeg and Port Nelson at the mouth of Nelson River; and upon the north-east the line already indicated, drawn midway between the posts held by England and France just before Canada was ceded to Great Britain."

And yet the hon. gentleman is prepared to see Ontario swept of all these vast regions which he believes she ought of right to have and confined to the comparatively narrow boundaries set out in the award. For my part I would not be inclined to relinquish one acre of what Ontario ought to have. I think she will have a much better and more valuable territory by claiming her right under the commissions, as her Attorney-General does, than she would by throwing aside the commissions and confining herself to all that she would be able to obtain under the description in the Imperial Act of 1774. In all I have said in reference to the prerogative as expressed in commissions to Governors, I am sustained by the opinion of the Attorney-General of Ontario, as given before the arbitrators and in his statement of the case. He did not, however, follow his own argument to its legitimate or logical conclusion, and if I have endeavored to do so for him, no doubt he will feel greatly indebted to me for the attempt. But there are other views as to the western boundary of Ontario, and the unanimous decision of the three Judges in the de Reinhart trial must command respect. They decided that a line drawn due north from the point of junction of the Ohio and Mississippi was, according to the Act of 1774, the western boundary of Upper Canada, and three other Judges of equal eminence who appeared before the Committee last year were of the same opinion. So that the due north line, as it is called, has the unanimous opinion of no less than six Judges of the higher Courts in its favor; but with every deference to the opinion of men so eminent, I may say that either the due north line or the Mississippi line may have been the true western boundary line in 1818, and nevertheless ceased to be so in 1838. The Judges do not seem to have attached much importance to the Royal prerogative as expressed in commissions to Governors. But the Attorney-General of Ontario, who had been himself a Judge and whose ability as a statesman and constitutional lawyer is everywhere acknowledged, has given decided expression to the opinion that the commissions issued under the Act are, by virtue of the Royal prerogative, as much law as the Act itself. My opinion may not go for much, but I decidedly incline to the view of the Attorney General. If his view is to hold good, the whole question is narrowed down to the finding how far into Lake Superior the western boundary shall run. My own opinion is, and I think any one on looking at the map and comparing it with the description in the commission, will come to the conclusion that the eastern end of Lake Superior was intended as the western boundary of the old Province of Upper Canada; more especially when the circumstances which had then arisen in the North-West are taken into consideration. The hon. member for Bothwell always brings forward the Cavendish debates, and tells us what certain members are reported to have said in these debates; but we must remember that in those days the parliamentary debates were not reported, and that the work of Sir Henry Cavendish, who took notes simply for his own amusement or information, first saw light sixty-five years after the date of the debate which it purports to give; we have no means of knowing it may not have been a highly ex parte report, but we can easily see that the Parliament of those days had good reason for refusing to allow its debates to be published, if the work of Sir Henry Cavendish may be taken as a specimen of the reports of the time. Why, Sir, the debate as there reported would not do much credit to any legislative body in the Dominion—I had almost said, to a county council. I will read to the House Judge Johnson's opinion on the matter. On being interrogated as to the value of these debates as an authority, he said:

"The Cavendish papers were published in 1839, sixty-five years after the debates of 1774, and were never considered to be of any importance, but rather hazy. They would have the authority of any report, if published at the time, subject to contradiction or correction by people who could contradict or correct them. But when published sixty-five years afterwards, when the people who could contradict or correct them were dead, they could not possess any value. They were looked upon as the gossiping production of an old gentleman who was not very eminent, Mr. Henry Cavendish, afterwards Sir Henry Cavendish."

Others, however, may have a different opinion of these debates, but whatever value may attach to them as a historical record, it does not appear to me that they should be made use of to explain away or over-ride an Act of Parliament. As an instance of the way in which even intelligent men may be led to coincide in assumptions which have nothing to sustain them in history or in fact, I may allude to the Attorney General of Ontario making use of the word "cede" when speaking of the Treaty of Utrecht and the territories restored by France. Whether the word "cede" or "restore" should be used was a matter which came near breaking off the negotiations and plunging two great nations into all the horrors of war. The word "restore" was finally used, and yet the Attorney General said:

"By the Treaty of Utrecht, 1713, the bay and straits of Hudson, together with all lands, seas, sea-coasts, rivers and places situate in the bay and straits and which belong thereto, were finally ceded to Great Britain."

I would be sorry for a moment to suppose that the Attorney General of Ontario would willingly have given a construction to the most important part of the treaty calculated to lead the arbitrators astray; but, to say the least, he committed a mistake in stating the case, which may have had a most important bearing on the award. France claimed vast territories on Hudson's Bay as belonging to her by virtue of first discovery and subsequent occupation, England denied that claim and insisted that France should acknowledge her right by restoring, not ceding, the territory in dispute. France did so, and that should for ever have settled all questions arising from priority of discovery or first occupation. Yet, in face of this, the volumes laid before the arbitrators base the claims of Ontario, in great part, on the occupation of the French at Hudson's Bay, although the French themselves had given up all claim on that ground. And the Attorney General of Ontario supported what is so set out in these volumes by supposing, himself, and leading the arbitrators to suppose, that the territory was ceded and not restored to England. And what is it that was restored? Simply all the lands looking towards Hudson's Bay; the words in the treaty as explained by the learned Judge Armour are spectantibus ad eadem, which have been construed by Sir Travers Twiss and other high authorities on constitutional law to mean all the lands looking towards the waters within the water-shed of Hudson's Bay. No wonder that the three gentlemen who made the award, notwithstanding their high position and great ability, were led to a conclusion so extraordinary, seeing that they only had a few days to study the matter and had nothing better than such statements and assumptions as those to which I have just referred to go upon. As to the merits of the award itself, if the arbitrators had the power to make a boundary between the territories of the Dominion and the Province of Ontario, nothing can be said further than that with the best intentions they have made a most extraordinary award, and it would still be a question whether it was within the constitution to confer on them such powers as could have enabled them to override and ignore Acts of the Imperial Parliament, Acts of prerogative and commissions to Governors, and that too without so much as saying to the Parliament of this Dominion, by your leave. But I apprehend that the reference to them left it only in their power to indicate an existing boundary. And in this view, which is no doubt the correct one, they failed most lamentably, for the boundary they have indicated has nothing whatever to sustain it in history, in law, or in fact. If they intended to go by the descriptions in commissions to Governors, they were in error in not carrying the whole province of Ontario to the shores of Hudson's Bay, and in not describing the western boundary as entering into or touching Lake Superior merely. If, on the other hand, they took the description in the Act of 1774 as their guide, they ignored that description in carrying the northern boundary of Ontario north of the southern boundary of the territories of the Merchant Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay. In either case, they were manifestly in error in carrying the northern and western boundaries of Ontario into the Indian territories, which are described in the Imperial Acts of 1803 and 1821 as being beyond the limits of Upper Canada, and they should at least have kept wide of the boundaries of the old colony of Assinaboa, which, as shown by the evidence of Judge Johnson, one of its former Governors, and that of the Hon. Donald A. Smith, who was for a long period Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, had been recognized by the Imperial Government, and was de-facto a colony having an autonomy quite distinct from that of Upper Canada. But it has been claimed that, as the arbitrators were three most distinguished gentlemen, we should not on account of their high position assail their award. But the case is quite too important for considerations of this kind. No one can be more ready than I am to admit individually and collectively the high position and great respectability of the gentlemen who formed the Board of Arbitrators, but they have themselves set an example that even Acts emanating from an authority still higher than theirs may sometimes be cavalierly treated. They have, in their award, over-ridden commissions issued under the Royal prerogative, have ignored Acts of the Imperial Parliament, turned aside from a judicial decision emanating from the highest Court in the land, and have favored us with a boundary which is not in accordance with any line ever existing, or even suggested. The fact is, they had not considered the matter; their session lasted only three days. On the first they adjourned; on the second they heard the arguments of counsel, and on the third gave their decision. They had not had time even to read the wonderful book of documents, and, in fact, one of them has since admitted as much. Under these circumstances we cannot reasonably be censured for criticising an award which, should it be adopted by this House, must exercise, for many a day to come, a serious influence on the affairs of this great Dominion. In attempting to show where the Royal prerogative, through the commissions to Governors, had fixed the boundaries, I have confined myself to one branch of the subject, and may take another occasion to refer to matters equally deserving of consideration, and among these to the fact that Ontario was a consenting party to the formation of the Province of Manitoba, and to the Rupert's Land Act, which latter, in fact, admitted the full claims of the Hudson's Bay Company to the territories north of the watershed, and should, as Judge Johnson says, have settled the matter forever. I fear that I have occupied the time of the House too long, but must crave the attention of hon. members for a moment longer, while I draw their notice to a rather ungenerous expression which has been made use of by a prominent member of another Legislature. It is that the Committee of last Session was hostile to the claims of Ontario. If so, they certainly took a strange way of showing it, for they called before them every person suggested to them as being likely to give evidence of any value in favor of the views that had been put forward on the part of Ontario, and among them were the Hon. Justice Armour, who had been employed by Hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Government on the case; the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall), who had written a very able report in favor of the claims of Ontario; the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), whose views are well known; the Hon. D. A. Smith, a supporter of Hon. Mr. Mackenzie's Government; Mr. Thomas Hodgins, Q.C., who was one of the advocates employed by Ontario, and others, not one of whom had ever taken a position hostile to Ontario. Besides which the very names of the gentlemen composing the Committee should have saved them from such an imputation. For my own part, I have striven for a construction of the Acts of Parliament and Imperial commissions which would give to Ontario the very utmost extent of territory possible under the Acts and commissions; and the Attorney General of Ontario, for whom I have always entertained the highest esteem—should what I have now said come to his knowledge—will see that I have done my best to sustain his views in reference to the Royal prerogative and the importance which should be attached to the commissions issued under that prerogative. I have striven to show that his logic is absolutely and completely unanswerable, and that, to follow it to its unavoidable postulate, Upper Canada entered Confederation with her western boundary carried simply into Lake Superior, as in the words of a long series of commissions, and with her northern extended, as in the same commissions, to the shores of Hudson's Bay.

Mr. MILLS. It is not my intention to delay the House at this moment. I moved for the papers mentioned in this motion a few days ago, and the understanding then was with the First Minister, that any discussion to take place would take place after the papers came down. I do not feel disposed to engage in a discussion on a motion which, on its face, does not indicate to the House that it was intended to enter into a detailed discussion on this important subject. I do not propose, however, that the hon. gentleman shall make the motion, accompanied by the speech he has given, which is intended to prejudice the case against the Province of Ontario, without any observations in reply. The hon. gentleman forgets that when this arbitration was appointed, it was not for the purpose of establishing a conventional boundary. That has been sometimes said in this House, but the statement is calculated to mislead. It is true that the Ontario Government in passing the Act took power to establish a conventional boundary, if a boundary should be agreed on between the Dominion and that Province. It was thought that the matter might be settled in that way without the necessity of an expensive enquiry and survey of the limits that might be marked out under an arbitration appointed to enquire into the case upon its merits. But whatever the policy of the Ontario Government might have been in that enactment, there can be no doubt that the arbitration that was appointed was appointed not to make or suggest a boundary which would be a conventional boundary, but to ascertain where the actual limits of Ontario were upon the north and the west; and the decision of the arbitrators showed what that boundary was. In that view it was a simple departmental matter and nothing more, to ascertain where the boundary was. It did not require the sanction or interference of Parliament. It was a simple enquiry for the purpose of ascertaining a particular fact, and the arbitration simply stated what it believed the facts were. When it was appointed, we asked for an appropriation to pay the expenditure that would be necessarily incurred in this enquiry. The House made the necessary appropriation; so that Parliament gave its sanction to the course adopted by the Government, and it seems to me that if we are to recognize the principle of continuity in Government at all, if it is not the intention of one Administration and one Parliament to wholly disregard what has been done by another Administration and another Parliament, there is nothing better settled on every principle of public policy than the boundary of Ontario under the provisions of that arbitration. The hon. gentleman has said that he will refer to the commissions which have been issued at various times, to show what the boundaries of Ontario were at those times, and what they are at present. I never knew that a commission determined the extent of a Province. I know that with the King it is a matter of prerogative, with regard to Royal colonies, or other than proprietary colonies, to fix the boundaries; and the boundaries of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, under the provisions of the Act of 1774, were not at all made inconsistent with the subsequently exercise of the prerogative. On the contrary, the Act expressly provides that the boundaries therein set forth are to remain the boundaries of the Province, until the king himself shall otherwise determine. But while that is the case, I think that prerogative has never been exercised in any other way than by a Royal proclamation or an Order in Council. We have an important decision upon this question in the case of the dispute between the Provinces of Georgia and Florida, with regard to the boundary line between them. A commission had been issued to Governor White, of the Province of Georgia, stating where the boundaries of that Province were, and another commission had been issued to the Governor of Florida, fixing the northern boundary of the Province of Florida some two degrees further north than it had been before, and to that extent within the Province of Georgia. That question came up at a subsequent period for consideration. It was argued before the Supreme Court of the United States, and old Orders in Council and proclamations were produced, and a decision of that Court had, which, although it may not be binding here, is, after all, a decision which must be respected by us.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Were those commissions issued while the country was under the Royal rule?

Mr. MILLS. The commissions I refer to were issued while Florida and Georgia were provinces of Great Britain, and to the Governors of those provinces. The King, in his commission to the Governor of Florida, included territory embraced by the charter of Georgia within that Province, and also embraced in the commission to the Governor of that Province; and the Supreme Court held that the Crown never exercised its power to change the boundaries of the Province otherwise than by Royal proclamation or by Order in Council. Florida was not included in the United States in 1783, but was ceded to Spain from whom it had been acquired twenty years before. Spain claimed the southern part of Georgia, while the United States maintained that Spain had acquired Florida with its ancient limits. After the United States acquired Florida from Spain, the case came before the Supreme Court and the decision was as I have stated. I think that that decision, after a very full investigation of the whole case and lengthy and well considered arguments before the Court, is pretty conclusive as to the law in the matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Dawson) says that the word "northward" applies to the whole territories and not to the western boundary. That is my opinion, and I am glad to see he has come to that conclusion. But if so, then the word "northward" cannot mean due north. But you have in the Act a description of the boundaries of the Province of Quebec as it was proposed to fix them, extending upon the south from the Bay of Chaleurs westward to the Mississippi River; and it is said that all the territories, countries and islands within those limits, so bounded on the south, extending from that line northward to the Hudson's Bay, is to constitute the Province of Quebec. There is no boundary mentioned on the west, and you might just as well say that the boundary upon the east, at the Bay of Chaleurs, was a due north line, as that the boundary on the west marked a due north line. Then as to the Act of 1774, it says that the French colonists scattered through the Indian territory were left without any civil government, and that it was to extend civil government to those colonists that the boundaries of Quebec were to be extended. Well, if the boundaries were extended for that purpose, you cannot give it a western boundary that will exclude all those settlements which the Act was passed to include. The hon. gentleman refers to the boundaries upon the north. I am not going to enter into a discussion of that question at length; but I will say that the boundary on the north is not the height of land. There is not a particle of evidence in favor of any such contention. On the contrary, the evidence is conclusive, that the boundary on the north stretched far beyond the height of land. The Hudson's Bay Company in defining their limits for many years, in their propositions submitted to the Government of Great Britain, set forth the wish that the boundary between them and the French should begin at Cape Partridge, at $58\frac{1}{2}$ degrees north latitude and extending south-westerly from that point to Lake Mistassiny. And let me say that boundary is far to north to the height of land, and although you find in modern maps that the boundary of Quebec is marked along the height of land, it is perfectly clear that the height of land was not known or, until recent times, taken into consideration; and here was an astronomical line to be drawn on the map, extending from the north-west point of Labrador to Lake Mistassiny, which was to be the line between the eastern part of the French possessions and the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company. Then if you look at the charter of that company, you will find it never put forth any such pretension as this of recent years until after Great Britain had acquired possession of the country under the Treaty of Utrecht; and no portion of the territories in dispute was ever in possession of the Hudson's Bay Company until after Canada was surrendered by the French to Great Britain. It is true the King granted a charter to the Hudson's Bay Company, extending its possessions indefinitely into the interior, but when you look at its provisions you will see that there is a territory spoken of over which the company only had a right to trade, and there is another territory to which they have the title in free and common soccage, after the manner of holding lands in Kent. That provision is in the charter, and if you give to this charter the construction given in recent times, there would be no territory upon which it could operate—the whole territory would be included in the grant. It has been pointed out that the territories granted were within straits and bay, as mentioned by Lord Brougham and Mr. Spankie—territories to the south and west which the company have recently claimed, were territories without the Bay to the west and south-west, but to the soil of which they had no grant, over which their license to trade was to extend.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

Mr. MILLS,

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MILLS. When the House rose I was making a few observations in reply to the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) in reference to the question of the boundaries of the Province of Ontario, and at the time you left the Chair I was referring to the fact that the height of land was in no case recognized as the boundary between the possessions of the French and the possessions of the English to the north. We know that even the territories in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, at the time the charter granted by Charles the Second to that Company, were granted by France as well as Great Britain, and that the Government of France, prior to that charter, granted to the Company of One Hundred Associates a charter extending over the whole country northward to the Hudson's Bay. The English, however, subsequently, under the provisions of that charter, built trading posts at various points on Hudson's Bay, of which for the time they held possession. But at the close of the 17th century, about 1693 or 1694, the French sent expeditions from their settlements in Canada overland to Hudson's Bay, and took possession of these posts; but at the time the Treaty of Ryswick was negotiated, all the country about the Bay, which included all these posts with the simple exception of Fort Albany, were recognized as a possession and it continued to be a possession of France until the war began. During the period of that war some of them were taken possession of by England, and at the close of the war, by the Treaty of Utrecht the French Government surrendered those posts to the Hudson's Bay Company. Although the article surrendering those posts is pretty comprehensive in its form it was not understood to embrace the whole country to the height of land. On the contrary, the correspondence between the Count De Torcey and Mr. Prior, the poet who was acting for the English Government at Paris, shows that the English did not claim the country so far south as the Hudson's Bay Company subsequently claimed, and that all they wanted was to acquire possession of the posts in the vicinity of the bay for the Hudson's Bay Company. The Foreign Secretary, Lord Dartmouth, seemed to be under the impression that if the Government of France made a surrender, not to the Government of Great Britain, but to the Hudson's Bay Company, the principle of postliminium would apply. I will not now discuss that question, because we will have an opportunity at another time of considering it more fully; but I would simply say that any one who has taken the trouble of looking into the question, or has consulted the opinions of the law officers of the Crown in a number of similar cases, and especially their opinions with regard to the charter granted to the Duke of York for the State of New York, will see that when the country is taken possession of by conquest by an enemy, and is not surrendered at the close of a war, the principle of postliminium does not apply, and that parties who might have political rights or interests in the country did not have those rights restored to them by the restoration of the country at a subsequent period to the Government which was first in possession. As I said before, the case of the Duke of York is a case in point. His brother, Charles II, granted him a charter for the Province of New York. The Dutch conquered the country, and established civil government. By the Treaty of Breda the country was again restored to the English; and it was recognized by the law officers of the Crown that as the Dutch had complete possession, and did not hold it merely by military force or occupation, but had administered civil government in the country, the restoration of the country to the English did not restore the Duke of York to his rights, and that a new charter was necessary. I will not, however, stay to discuss that question as it is not material to my arguments.

I think it is clear—if it be taken for granted that the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company was properly granted in the first place, which, however, I do not admit—that the cession of the country to France by the Treaty of Ryswick would prevent the restoration of the company at a subsequent period—by the Treaty of Utrecht—to their original rights. But if you look at the correspondence since that took place between the Hudson's Bay Company and the Government of England and between the Government of England and the Government of France, it is pretty clear that the sovereignty of the country in the interior was not regarded as passing to the Government of England by the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht. On the contrary, when the articles of the treaty came to be submitted, the Count De Torcey called the attention of Mr. Prior to the fact that the article was seemingly much more comprehensive than the understanding between the parties intended it should be. But they accompanied the article with a map on which each party drew a line where he thought the boundary ought to be, and it is said in the correspondence that there was little difference between them as to the location of the boundary. It is perfectly clear from the correspondence that the boundary was marked in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, and without any reference to the conformation of the country or to the height of land of which the English Government, at all events, had no knowledge at the time. For the purpose of showing what were the claims of the Hudson Bay Company at various times, I will read an extract taken from the papers which they submitted to the English Government immediately after the Treaty of Ryswick, but before the boundaries were arranged. Commissioners were appointed by the Government to adjust the differences between the two Crowns. The Hudson's Bay Company were invited to state what they would be willing to accept as the southern limit of their territory, when they addressed to the lords of trade the following proposal :

"The limits which the Hudson's Bay Company conceive to be necessary as boundaries between the French and them, in case of an exchange of places, and that the Company cannot obtain the whole straits and bays, which of right belong to them, namely :

"1. That the French be limited not to trade with wood-runners, or otherwise, nor build any house, factory or post, beyond the bounds of 53 degrees, or Albany River, vulgarly called Chechewan, to the northward, on the west or main coast."

The country which the Company claimed as their possession was the country within the Straits and Bay of Hudson, the country to the west of the bay and the country to the south of it, they claimed for the purpose of trading, and Lord Dartmouth, after he gave directions for the surrender of the country to the Hudson Bay Company, accompanied the surrender with a statement that it had reference to trade only. Now, if you look at what transpired afterwards you will see how the two Governments interpreted the Treaty of Utrecht. It was understood by the provisions of the treaty that a Commission was to be appointed for the purpose of settling a boundary in accordance with the provisions of the treaty. Lord Bolingbroke, who was First Minister in England, and his associate, Mr. Harley, were both driven from power after the treaty was concluded. They had been the principal parties in the negotiation of the treaty. The correspondence that took place between the Governments of England and France seems to have been lost sight of. A second application was made to the Hudson's Bay Company for a statement of their rights. This was immediately before the meeting of the Commission at Paris. The Hudson's Bay Company made a statement, and in that statement they give a description of the same line from Partridge Cape in 58° north latitude in a south-westerly direction to Lake Mistassin. They did not however stop there, where they stopped in the first description; but they continued it on to 49° north latitude, and say that parallel is to be the boundary between the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company and of the French for the future. What it is important to notice is this: That south of Lake Mistassin no boundary had ever been extended before the negotiation of that treaty; that after the negotiation of that treaty the Hudson's Bay Company claimed a further extension of territory, and it is perfectly obvious that the claim could not be upheld; but whatever rights the Hudson's Company had or other English subjects possessed, were rights that must have been determined by the provisions of the treaty itself. In fact, they lost sight altogether of the manner in which the boundary had been drawn. Lord Bolingbroke, the principal party in the negotiation of the Treaty of Utrecht, was banished from England at the time, and it is only fair to presume that the Government which succeeded were in ignorance of the correspondence that had privately taken place between Mr. Prior and Marquis De Torcey and Lord Bolingbroke and the French Ambassador in England. The Commission failed. They were unable to agree. No boundaries were settled in accordance with the provisions of the treaty; but the French continued to hold the forts they had established until Canada was surrendered to Great Britain in 1750. Take for example the post of Abbitibbi, a long way north of the water-shed; Fort St. Germain up Albany River, that was built some distance from the mouth of the river; and the Hudson's Bay Company held the post at the mouth of the river. But the fur trade flourished on the shores of Albany River from the time that the Treaty of Utrecht was negotiated until the country of New France was surrendered to the Crown of Great Britain. Again, if you look at the posts which France subsequently established, you will find that the Verendryes, La Corne, St. Pierre and others were sent there by Governors from Canada, and that they established posts at Winnipeg and on the Saskatchewan, where an extensive fur trade was carried on, and, according to M. de Bougainville, upwards of 700 fur traders were there at the very time Canada was surrendered to Great Britain. It is perfectly clear, when you look at the correspondence which took place between the Governments, and the explorations that took place over the whole of this country in the North-West now known as the North-West Territories, that the whole of the country as far north as Albany River, except the posts on Hudson's Bay, was in the possession of France and continued to be part of New France and governed by Governors from France until the fall of Quebec. There is not a single instance of any Hudson's Bay Company's trader going into the north country or coming near it until nearly forty years after Canada had been surrendered to Great Britain. It is absurd to suppose that the Hudson's Bay Company would, under the provisions of their charter, claim a territory in the possession of a foreign Government and which was not in their own possession for more than 100 years after the charter had been granted. An examination of the provisions of the Company's charter will disclose the fact that it was precisely the same as the charter granted to the London Company, to the Cabots, Gilbert, and to Mr. Oglethorpe and others in the Southern States. In all cases the Government of Great Britain, following the example of other Governments in Europe, granted charters to companies conferring on them a right in fee simple to territories of which they had not yet taken possession; but the Government in fact treated such charters not so much as grants as powers. Those to whom they were granted were great political corporations whose interests in the country, if given effect to all, stood or fell with the Government that created them. You have many instances of that. There is the charter given to Sir Walter Raleigh and others. The Government did not treat the charter as actually conveying property, but it gave a power which, if the party to whom it was given actually went into the country and took possession in accordance with the principles of international law, their rights as property-holders can attach and not otherwise. With the Hudson's Bay Company it depended on due diligence. For 120 years they never went away from the Bay. Any country has just as much right to occupy and settle the western territory as Great Britain had, did her people go into the interior and take possession in accordance with the well settled rules of international law. The people of France did this; they occupied and held it until acquired or taken from them by conquest. The title of Great Britain to the whole of the country lying north of the height of land, as far as the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, was a title acquired from the Government of France, and anyone who will go into the Library and look at the third volume of the Landsdowne papers, not published at the time my report was made, and a map that Lord Landsdowne prepared—and Lord Landsdowne, it will be remembered, was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at the time the Treaty of 1763 was negotiated—will see by that map that the whole of the country beyond the sources of the Mississippi west to the Rocky Mountains is marked as Canada, a territory acquired by Great Britain by the Treaty of Paris in 1763. If the title of the Crown of Great Britain to the North-West country, and this territory, now Ontario, rests upon the provisions of that treaty and the surrender by the French commander at Montreal, it is perfectly obvious that the Hudson's Bay Company could have had no right whatever to this territory, and the Government of Canada therefore had against Ontario no right whatever except that which they have acquired from the Hudson's Bay Company. I am not going into a discussion of the question in detail. I might give many instances where this principle is recognized. The hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) said, quoting a passage from Judge Armour, that a country which has taken possession of the shore has a right to the country to the height of land, and that the English Government having had surrendered to them by the Government of France, by the Treaty of Utrecht, the country in the vicinity of Hudson's Bay, acquired the right to all that country up to the height of land. The hon. Judge also quoted a passage from Phillimore to that effect. Phillimore is a high authority, but there are higher authorities than Phillimore, there are the State papers which describe this transaction, and which show that the country restored was what had been before in the possession of England—the shore of the Bay. And I might mention other State papers which represent the transactions occurring between various States with respect to this very principle. Let me give the House one instance, and it will serve to illustrate the whole case. The United States when they claimed the valley of the Oregon river, did so on this ground: Mr. Gray had discovered the mouth of the river and taken possession in the name of the United States Government. Did the English Government recognise the principle that a Government which had a right to the mouth of a river had a right to the whole country drained by it? They utterly repudiated it, and contended that while taking possession of the mouth of a river might give a right to the entire basin; if it is the only means of gaining access to the interior (because you could not go into the interior without committing trespass), yet if you could reach that country in any other way than the height of land is no impediment, and the Government would have no right to the possession of the interior, to the height of land. Now, that was exactly the principle that existed with regard to this height of land lying north of Lake Superior and north of Lake Huron. The Government of Great Britain, acquired by the treaty of Utrecht, the right to the shores of the Hudson Bay—France had a right to the valley of the St. Lawrence. The possession of the extent of country between those two places depended upon the diligence of each country. It was open to the English

Mr. MILLS.

Government, if they had taken possession and settled the country around Hudson's Bay, to have come south of the height of land; it was open to France to go north of the height of land if by due diligence, by pressing forward her settlements or occupation of the country, she had seen proper to do so. As a matter of fact she did, as I said before, establish Fort Abbitibi; she did that before the Treaty of Utrecht was signed. She held it till the year 1761. She did the same thing with regard to Fort St. Germain, and all those posts that were established by the French traders, because that country was held by them until after the conquest of the country and its surrender of Canada, within which they were established. After the surrender, the Pontiac war intervened, and the country was, for a time, abandoned. But subsequently fur traders from Montreal and Albany organized companies and took possession of these old French posts and occupied the country, and any one who will look at "Harman's journal" of that country—and Mr. Harman was in the employ of the North-West Company for twenty-seven years—will see that the North-West Company were long in the possession of the country before the Hudson's Bay Company's traders appeared there at all. It was not until long after the surrender of that country as a part of Canada to the Crown of Great Britain that the Hudson's Bay Company entered the country. It was impossible that they could acquire any right or interest in any part of Canada under their charter. The extent of the power which they obtained under that charter, even if they had obtained any right to the soil depended upon their diligence. There was no Act of the Crown of Great Britain that could at all interfere with the rights of the Sovereign of France to go on and take possession of any portion of North America that had not actually been occupied in some way by the Crown or subjects of Great Britain. I have said that in looking at the Act of 1774 the boundary was fixed on the west at the Mississippi River, and that boundary remained the boundary of the Province of Quebec until 1791. Anyone who will look at the opinion given by Chief Justice Draper, who had looked carefully into this subject, will see that he had no doubts in his mind that Quebec extended westward to the Mississippi River. By the treaty of 1783, the Government of Great Britain surrendered the southern part of this Province, that is the portion lying between the Ohio River and the Great Lakes, to the Government of the United States. After that surrender, of course, there was a new southern boundary, and they described that boundary in the commission to Lord Dorchester after the Treaty of Versailles, in 1783, had been negotiated. And where did they extend that southern boundary? Why, they extended it westward through those lakes, westward through Pigeon River, through Long Lake, and due west to the River Mississippi. Why go to the Mississippi River? Because the Mississippi had been a boundary under the Quebec Act of 1774. Then when you look at the Acts of State by which the Province was divided, you will see that, at all events, it was impossible that the arbitrators could have given to the Province of Ontario narrower limits than it possesses under the award. We find it stated over and over again that this word "northward" used in the Quebec Act means due north. If you apply it to the boundary line you must apply it to the southern boundary, because there is no other described. Let me just read this particular portion of the Act:

"That all the territories, islands and countries of North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south"

What is bounded on the south? Why, those countries, territories and islands.

"by a line from the Baie des Chaleurs along the highlands."

Describing it along the lakes, along the Ohio River westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and northward to the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory. What is northward? In my opinion the countries, territories and islands, beginning at one point and extending to the other, and from that base northward to the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company. That gives you a boundary on the north. But if you say it means a line bounding this country on the south, then this southern line will extend northward, and it is impossible that it can be a due north line or other than the Mississippi. There are no words in this paragraph, there is no statement in this Act such as "bounded on the west." But if it applies to a line, it is a line that begins at the Baie des Chaleurs, and extends westward to the banks of the Mississippi, and then northwards. If it means the southern boundary, then that southern boundary extends northward to the Hudson's Bay Company's territory. The southern boundary extending northward is the southern boundary of the country lying west of the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, that is; the western boundary of the territory lying south of these points. But it is the southern as well as the western boundary, and if the word "northward" is applied to a line at all, it is applied to a line bounding this country on the south. Then this is a description of the Mississippi as the southern boundary, and you could not, under any circumstances, make a due north line a southern boundary. Then there is the principle I already mentioned, that you are to interpret every Act in such a way as to give effect to it, and not to defeat its object. What is the object? To embrace the settlement. If you say the boundary is due north, you exclude those settlements and defeat the object of the extension of the Province westward. Then there is another rule well recognized in law, that when you reach a natural boundary you are to follow it, unless there are special and obvious reasons for departing from it. What is the position in this case? The boundary was extended westward, along the bank of the Ohio, to the banks of the Mississippi. The Mississippi was, at this time, the boundary between the possessions of Great Britain and those of France, and is it reasonable to suppose that a stretch of territory 700 or 800 miles in length, and in many places not 50 miles in width, containing the population it was intended to embrace, was intended to be left without a Government? By the construction of this Act, they would be excluded from the Government that was intended to include them. Then you have another well recognized rule, that in every Act of State the interpretation given to it by the Government must be followed. You have many instances of this in the reports of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, where the East India Company was engaged in negotiating treaties with the native princes. How did the Committee deal in these cases? Did the Committee undertake to adjudicate upon them? They held that they had no jurisdiction; that the Company had acted in dealing with these princes, in their political capacity and that the Courts had nothing whatever to do with them. The same principle is laid down in two or three decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States with regard to the construction of certain treaties between the United States and Spain, regarding Florida and Louisiana. The Supreme Court says that the political department of Government has interpreted this treaty and that the Courts will follow its construction. What was the position with regard to the Quebec Act? That the same law officer of the Crown that introduced and carried that Act through Parliament, issued the commissions under it, and it is the duty of the Courts, as it is the duty of this and every other Government, to follow the construction that the Government at the time put on the Act. If you look at this Act, you will see that it does not limit the authority of the Crown. In describing the boundaries it says they are to remain the boundaries during His Majesty's pleasure. The King, at any time by Order in Council, or by proclamation, might have altered the boundaries established by that Act. The Act did not interfere with the prerogative he possessed in that respect. The reason for the Act was very obvious. At the time this Quebec Act was introduced into the Legislature, Lord Mansfield had just given his decision in the case of Campbell vs. Hall, a case involving the right to tax one of the West India colonies, which was a conquered country. The King had given the country a Government, and after he did so, undertook to impose a tax on the country. The Lord Chief Justice said the King has the right to govern a conquered country as he pleased; but once he confers on the country a Government, he exhausts his power, and he cannot interfere a second time. Well, under the proclamation of 1763, marking out the limits of the Province of Quebec, the King had given the Province of Quebec a Government. It was not in his power to alter the constitution which he established; Parliament alone could deal with that matter; but the King could enlarge or contract the boundaries. The Government of Quebec continued under that Act till 1791. The King then intimated his pleasure to alter the boundaries again, and establish two Provinces where there was then one. But he could not alter the Government which had been established, and it was necessary, therefore, that Parliament should again intervene. Parliament did intervene, and declared that, in the event of the King dividing the country and establishing two Provinces where before there had been one, this new constitution should come into effect, and it did. How was that division effected? An Order in Council was passed providing for the division. The Council authorized the Secretary of State to issue a description of the boundaries of the new Province to be established on the west. That description is forwarded to the Governor in this country, and it is embraced in a proclamation issued by the acting Governor, Mr. Alured Clarke. This is the description of the country that is embraced in Upper Canada:

"Along the said Ottawa river to the River Temiscaming, and by a line due north until it strikes a line north of Hudson's Bay, including all the territory westward and southward of the said line, to the utmost extent of the country commonly called or known as Canada."

Not "known as Quebec." I am not going to discuss this question this evening; but let me call your attention to the words: "all territory westward and southward." By the suggested interpretation of the Quebec Act, southward would mean due south, and westward due west. Therefore, you would begin at the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, and you would go to the boundary line of the Hudson's Bay, and you would take the country due west, lying between these parallels, as the Province of Upper Canada. Such a construction would exclude from the Province of Ontario all the country from Kingston westward and southward. It is perfectly obvious that such a construction is improper, as it would not embrace the territories intended to be embraced. I think I have said enough to show that French Canada, at all events, extended northward of the height of land, and that all the territory west of this line, except what was ceded to the United States, was embraced in the Province of Upper Canada; and when the arbitration decided that the boundary of Ontario should not extend farther westward than the Province of Quebec had extended, they put the very narrowest construction on the words of this proclamation, defining the boundaries, that it was possible to put upon it. Whoever else may complain, it is perfectly obvious that the Dominion of Canada has no ground of complaint, and the arbitration were warranted in going as far north as the Albany River, and fixing as the northern boundary the line which they did. Let me say another word with regard to convenience. Four years ago the Governments of Canada and the United States had a correspondence with regard to the establishment of a boundary along the Alaska frontier. When we came to make enquiry as to the cost of surveying a boundary between Canada and the United States, we found that the establishment of that boundary, where there was no immediate necessity for it, would cost the country between $1,000,000 and $2,000,000. There is no doubt whatever that if we had not, as the northern boundary of Ontario, obtained the natural boundary, such as the Albany River, which requires no large expenditure to ascertain its direction—if, instead of that, we had taken a mathematical line and undertaken to establish it by a careful astronomical survey, it would have cost Ontario and the Dominion at least $500,000. I therefore think that even though the Albany River boundary was not one that could have been upheld by strict and careful examination into the law and facts, it yet would have been in the public interest, both of the Dominion and of Ontario, to accept it as a boundary. In doing so, they will get rid of a large expenditure indeed. I need not say any more on the subject. I have only taken a very cursory view, and have done so merely for the purpose of establishing what I think might be regarded as a prima facie case in favor of the view taken by the arbitrators and the claims that are still maintained by the Province of Ontario.

Mr. MACDOUGALL (Halton). I am sure the House, at all events those hon. members of it who have given any attention to this subject, must be gratified with the very clear statement which the hon. gentleman has just made in respect to the reasons that led the arbitrators to select the particular boundary which they did select. It is, of course, inconvenient to engage in a discussion on a technical and historical question of this kind, involving a great many enquiries and details, on a mere motion for papers which, I apprehend, when the return comes down, will be very few; for I have not seen any intimation, in any quarter, of any correspondence having taken place between the Dominion and the Imperial Governments, in respect to the boundaries of Ontario, nor do I see any reason for such correspondence unless it might be enquiries made in some of the Government Departments in London for evidence which might be helpful to the settlement of the question. I understand the hon. member for Bothwell has moved for the correspondence which has probably taken place between the Ontario and the Dominion Governments, and when that correspondence is before us we will be in a better position to engage in a discussion on this subject than we are at present. For my part, having given some attention to it for some years, I am very anxious, as a member of this House and a representative of Ontario, that a solution should be arrived at as soon as possible. Questions of great local difficulty are constantly springing up and are likely to spring up in that country, which is now no man's land, as we do not know to whom it really belongs; and some very serious question, arising out of the administration of criminal law there, may arise at any moment. It is, therefore, on every ground, desirable that the Government should take the matter in hand; they alone can properly deal with it. I trust, before the Session ends, the Government will take steps to have the dispute settled. Ontario, looking at it as a mere political question, feels great interest in its settlement, and the political opponents of the Government will have a very good question to canvas the country with, if by mere delay and indifference occasion is given for discussions of that kind. It seems to me that either the decision arrived at by the arbitrators should be affirmed, or a case should be agreed upon between the Dominion and Ontario Governments for submission to some judicial tribunal. From the statements made by the hon. member for Bothwell, it is pretty evident that on the north no mere judicial tribunal can find a boundary, for no such boundary has ever been described in terms which would enable a court to define it or a surveyor to mark it on the ground. Therefore, whatever decision may be arrived at in reference to the western boundary and the meaning to be attached to the word "northward," it would not solve the question. We are still without a boundary on the north, and that can only be arrived at by agreement. The hon. gentleman has given, I think, the strongest reason for selecting the Albany River, and no doubt it was the reason which induced the arbitrators to come to that conclusion. That reason was, that the Hudson's Bay Company themselves had at one time agreed to accept that as a boundary of their territories on the south; and though it was never formally agreed upon by the then high contracting parties, still the fact that the Hudson's Bay Company at that period made no claim to any country farther south seems to me to be a very reasonable ground to justify our selection of that boundary to-day. Of course the Dominion inherited the title of both parties. We have succeeded to the French title, whatever it was, and have possession of the English title, whatever that was; so there need be no great difficulty in coming to a conclusion, so far as we are concerned. That question is, however, only important as bearing upon the western boundaries of Quebec as settled by the Act of 1774. It is not necessary for us now, for any other purpose that I am aware of, to ascertain where the limits of Rupert's Land or the Hudson's Bay Company's country was to be found. We carefully avoided that question in the purchase of the North-West Territories. It will be seen by consulting the correspondence on that occasion that two distinct territories or purchases, so to speak, were contemplated: one, Rupert's Land, which was the Hudson's Bay Company's property—the country, wherever it could be found, which belonged to them,—and the North-West territories which, it was assumed, were not conveyed to them by the charter; and these two distinct territories were kept in view in the arrangements with the Imperial Government, for the purchase of the Hudson's Bay territory. We purchased the North-West Territories and the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company in Rupert's Land for one price. We did not discriminate between them; there seemed to be no purpose to be served by so doing. We had their rights in both territories, whatever they might be. Well, that question which had agitated the Parliament and Government of Canada for many years was unnecessary to be solved, because we bought the whole country. It became ours and there was no purpose to be served in drawing that line, and I see no purpose now in drawing it because, so far as the question of the Hudson's Bay Company is concerned, it appears they were willing themselves to fix upon the Albany River as the boundary on the south east. However, the question of the boundary of Ontario must be settled, and it is desirable it should be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. It cannot be of any great importance to Ontario to have the jurisdiction and control over the extensive country that is now a wilderness, and that in the opinion of many persons does not contain any great elements of wealth, certainly not as a grazing or a grain growing country. It would probably be a burden to them as it is to the Dominion. If Ontario has not administrative powers and jurisdiction over the country it must fall to the Dominion, and, as it is seen at present, it is of no great advantage to the Dominion to retain control for administrative purposes over such countries. We do not propose, I apprehend, to establish another Province there. That might become necessary, and we know the expense of similar Provinces since the establishment of Confederation. A very disproportionate expense as compared with that of the government of large Provinces, is incurred for the very small; and I am sure that public opinion, so far as I can understand it, does not consider it expedient to establish new Provinces of very limited territorial extent in future. We had better give them a larger extent, for the cost of administration and government will equal that incurred for larger territories. Moreover, I see no room for a second Province, even assuming the law should decide that the word northward in this case means a line due north from the junction of the Ohio with the Mississippi, and that a portion of Lake Superior and Prince Arthur's landing with all that adjoining country be held to belong to the Dominion. It would be necessary either to attach it to Manitoba, if that Province is to be enlarged which is reported, or to Ontario, or to establish another small Province, small in population and likely to continue so for a great many years. Looking at it from a Dominion stand-point, I can see no advantage in holding the country in its present condition with any idea that we can create a Province, and escape the burden of administering its affairs with any advantage. Upon grounds of economy, political expediency and justice, it seems necessary to have a speedy adjudication and settlement of this matter.

Mr. DAWSON. With regard to what the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has said, if Upper Canada possessed any just claim to the enormous extent of country to the west and north of Lake Superior claimed for her by him, there can be no stronger argument that the award was wrong. In the concluding paragraph of his published work he claimed that the boundary of Ontario extended to the Saskatchewan. Well, if he was right in that contention the arbitrators were certainly wrong. The hon. gentleman has stated that it was only through Orders in Council that the Royal prerogative could find expression; but I could point to passages in his works where he attaches as much importance to commissions as the Attorney-General for Ontario does.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Mr. DAWSON. In any case I consider that the Attorney-General for Ontario is as likely to be right as the hon. member for Bothwell, and he claims that commissions to Governors must be taken as expressions of the Royal will, as being in fact Acts of prerogative. The hon. member for Halton asserted that the Albany had been at one time the boundary chosen by the Hudson's Bay Company themselves; but in this he was mistaken. Subsequent to the Treaty of Utrecht the Hudson Bay Company always claimed a large extent to the south of that. The Treaty of Utrecht really settled all matters between France and England as regarded the immediate confines of Hudson's Bay at least. As to General Alured Clark's proclamation, of which so much was attempted to be made, let anyone read it and it would be found to be meaningless. It was to embrace in Upper Canada all the country known as Canada to the south and west of the boundary line, notwithstanding that all of Canada to the south had fallen to the United States. The instructions and the commission issued to Lord Dorchester in September, 1791, were perfectly clear, and General Clarke had simply made a mistake. However, there will be ample opportunities for discussing all this, and when the question comes up again I shall be ready to meet all points that have been touched upon to-night.

Mr. ROYAL. Mr. Speaker, if we refer to the numerous documents printed as a sequence to the report of the Committee appointed by this House last year; if, moreover, we refer to the speeches delivered on this subject, we at once reach the solution arrived at by the Commissioners appointed by the Government of the Dominion of Canada. This decision, come to by the arbitrators three years after their appointment, strikes anyone who is of an observing turn of mind as being almost absolutely similar with the boundaries which the Government of Ontario had conceded as a compromise in its negotiations with the Government of the Dominion of Canada. The boundaries defined by the Commissioners of the Dominion of Canada, and suggested in the official communications of the Government of Ontario to the Government of the Dominion, are almost identical. For that reason should we be careful not to accept the Commissioners' decision of 3rd August, 1878, without exercising the greatest caution. A second solution of the difficulty is also to be found in the report of the Commissioner for Ontario, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). The western boundary, claimed by the Province of Ontario, reaches as far as the Rocky Mountains; in other words, Ontario, after having been four years in the Confederation, after having concluded a treaty with the other Provinces with regard to its supposed boundaries at the time of its joining the Confederation, comes forward and carves a large slice out of the North American territories, and takes unto itself a territory seven or eight times larger than the rest of the Confederation. A third boundary is that assigned by the Act of 1774, and is a result of the legal discussion of the matter. Last year we were told by the Government of Canada that the question was to be referred to a judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, because it was essentially a legal one, and that so important a Statute should be interpreted by lawyers. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, there is a law in these matters, and that law has been frequently invoked by those who have pretended with some show of reason that the question should be decided according to law, to justice, to common sense, and especially according to the spirit and the letter of the Federal Treaty of 1867. It will not be amiss, Mr. Speaker, to briefly examine the decision of the arbitrators, without fully discussing this important question of the western boundaries of Ontario. In 1871, the two Governments of Ontario and Canada agreed to appoint certain arbitrators to stake off the western boundary of the Province of Ontario. Later on, in the following year, the Government of Ontario having learnt that its Commissioner had received certain instructions from the Government of Canada, asked the latter for a copy of the same instructions. In those instructions the Government of Canada declared that it accepted as the western boundary of Ontario, the interpretation of Chief Justice Sewell, in his judgment in the Reinhardt case, rendered 18th May, 1818, accepting without reserve the interpretation of the Court of King's Bench at that date as to the western and northern boundaries of that Province. The Province of Ontario, which, at that date already, had encroached on that part of the domain of Canada, immediately instructed its Commissioner to cease acting, and negotiations came to an end. A short time after, the two Governments agreed upon a middle course, and it was then decided, or rather suggested—the suggestion was agreed to by the Government of Canada—to refer the solution of the difficulty to a judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. Unfortunately the Government which succeeded to the one that had agreed to the suggestion, did not consider it advisable to follow it. On the contrary, in 1875, a Commission composed of men residing on this side of the Atlantic, was instituted by the Government of Canada with orders to “determine and decide” the question. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, as indeed it has often been noticed, that this Commission was appointed by a simple administrative act; there was no law authorizing the Government to act thus. The most the Government could do was to order an investigation to be made. Nevertheless, this Commission was appointed in 1875, and remained some three years without taking any action. Suddenly, after the Province of Ontario had piled up documents upon documents, reports on reports, the Commissioners met one fine day to listen to the pleas, and on the day following, the 3rd of August, 1878, they rendered their decision, which will, for more reasons than one, remain famed in political annals. When I say that that decision is extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, I am making use of a very mild term, of a euphemism, for that decision sets aside both historical traditions and facts, the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, and the interpretation of the Imperial Statute of 1774. This decision is extraordinary for another reason, and it is that the Commissioners merely copied with some slight alterations the boundaries suggested as a compromise by the Government of Ontario to that of Canada. By that decision, Mr. Speaker, the Commissioners gave to Ontario a territory at least equal to the one which it possesses to-day. When, but a few moments ago, the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) was depreciating pretty freely that portion of the coveted territory, it seemed to me that I was hearing the employees of the Hudson's Bay Company depreciating the company's territory. These are more tactics, to depreciate what one covets in order to obtain it more easily. We have formerly heard the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson), on more than one occasion, extol the importance and the richness of the country which forms the valley of the James' Bay, basing his dicta on official reports. Now, the decision of the arbitrators of the Dominion would give to Ontario a territory at least equal in extent to the one it possesses to-day, a rich domain that would make of Lake Superior and James' Bay two upper Canadian lakes. We must bear in mind that in a matter like this, there is some cause for surprise that the Province of Ontario should put forth its pretensions at so late an hour; that it should put them forth precisely at the time when the treasures of the North-West have been discovered; at the precise time when political influence is about to abandon the valley of the St. Lawrence for the vast plains of the West. One should not seek for motives, but I say that the fact that that Province covets to-day, fourteen years after the Federal Treaty of 1867, a part of the vast territories of the West, should awaken our suspicions and cause us to proceed with the examination and solution of the difficulty with the greatest possible prudence. The second boundary is the one referred to by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and in this regard I will say that the hon. member for Bothwell was the only one who showed himself to be logical during the discussion of that important question. He said: "If by virtue of Lord Dorchester's proclamation, to divide the old Province of Quebec into Upper and Lower Canada, the Province of Lower Canada is composed of that part of the Province of Quebec situated north-east of the region of Lake Temiscamingue, and if the Province of Upper Canada is composed of all the country that constituted the old Province of Quebec, to the west of the same boundary, I am perfectly in the right when I claim the Rocky Mountains as a boundary for Ontario." Now, as there is more than one French traveller who states that at that time France possessed and claimed the territory, not only as far as the Rocky Mountains, but as far as the Pacific, I do not see why, if the hon. member can go as far as the Rocky Mountains, he should not push on as far as the Pacific. He would then have been as logical as it is possible to be; nevertheless, it is to be regretted that this pretension, which I admit to be logical, if one accepts the premises of the hon. member, should be thrust forward so late; especially after Canada has paid a million and a half for certain rights which the Hudson's Bay Company had over the same territories; especially after a Province has been created out of these territories; after a district has been organized; after we have concluded five treaties with the Indians; especially after the enormous expenses which Canada has incurred to organize these territories. It is to be regretted, I repeat it, that this pretension should be thrust forward at so late an hour, and I can fully understand that the Province of Ontario, which, more than any other in the Dominion of Canada, watches the development of the North-West, should have asked so much, in order to have at least the Lake of the Woods as its boundary. Well, Mr. Speaker, this boundary of the Lake of the Woods cannot hold good, neither in the face of history nor in that of the rights possessed and exercised by the Hudson's Bay Company in the valley of the Red River, on the valley at Lake Winnipeg, and on certain portions of Hudson's Bay. If, now, we set aside this pretension, extraordinary, to say the least of it; if we likewise set aside the decision rendered by the arbitration in 1878, which decision was illegally rendered by them, as they had no right to draw a conventional boundary, there remains, Mr. Speaker, the Statute of 1774, which carves a territory out of those constituting formerly La Nouvelle, France, organizes it, and out of it creates the Province of Quebec. I will not, Mr. Speaker, pause to relate under what circumstances the Province of Quebec was divided into the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. Those who know history, especially that of Lower Canada, know that that division was directed against a certain part of the population, as occurred in many other instances, when a division of territory took place. At any rate that Province was divided by proclamation, in 1791, and, as Chief Justice Sewell said in 1818, the Province of Quebec was divided, and not enlarged; consequently the Province of Upper Canada should be found within the limits of the old Province of Quebec, in the same manner as is the old Province of Lower Canada. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read the judgment rendered by Chief Justice Sewell in 1818. Formerly the Province of Quebec was bounded on the west by a meridian drawn north of the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. That boundary terminated at the lands which were then considered the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory. This is what gave rise to this judgment: Outside of the limits that I have just mentioned there was a certain unorganized territory over which the Act of 1803 gave Upper and Lower Canada a concurrent jurisdiction. Reinhardt, during the troubles that took place between the North-West Company and the Hudson's Bay Company with regard to the free trade, had been guilty of murder; this murder had been committed at a place called "Les Dalles." Reinhardt's lawyers raised for the first time the question of jurisdiction; they maintained that the prisoner was accused of a fact that had taken place, with admission of the accusers themselves, in a place situated outside of Lower Canada, this territory being in Upper Canada, and, consequently, did not fall under the jurisdiction of the Courts of Lower Canada. Here is the judgment of Chief Justice Sewell, who is looked upon rightly as one of the greatest legists that we have ever had in Upper or Lower Canada:

"The Court are most distinctly of opinion, on referring both to the Act of 1779 and that of 1774, that the argument of the defense must fail. What was the object of each Act? Amongst others that of 1774 was to enlarge the Province of Quebec, which had been created in 1763. That of 1791 was to separate or divide the Province of Quebec into two Provinces, to be denominated Upper and Lower Canada, and make each respectively independent of the other by giving a Legislature to each respectively, but still retaining between or within the two Provinces the same extent of country, the same space as the one Province contained."

I will draw the attention of the House to this point. The question is this: Had the Act of 1791 the object of increasing the former limits of the Province of Quebec, or of merely dividing it into two Provinces?

"What is the Act? What is its object, its avowed object? To repeal certain parts of the Act of 1774; and what is the part repealed? It is that part of it which gives authority to the Council of the Province of Quebec; and what is the reason assigned for so doing? Why, that His Majesty had signified it to be his royal will and pleasure to divide his Province of Quebec. To assert that he intended by this that the limits of the Province should be extended by the separation appears to me repugnant to the plainest of common sense, and, therefore, I cannot consent to it. The short history of the Act of 1791 is briefly this: The King signifies to Parliament his royal intention of dividing his Province of Quebec, and he calls on the Legislature to provide for this alteration by granting an Act adapted to the change. The Legislature pass an Act providing for the due government of the two Provinces and under the authority of this Act, and the Royal Proclamation, the Province of Quebec was accordingly divided, the Royal Proclamation being an exercise of sovereign authority. His Majesty in that Act, by and with the consent of his Privy Council, declared what should be the line of separation between Upper and Lower Canada, and how much of the former Province of Quebec shall belong to the one, and how much to the other. The object of the Act, and the object of the Royal Proclamation are so clearly expressed that we cannot for a moment doubt upon the subject. What says the Act? His Majesty having been pleased to signify his royal will and pleasure to separate and divide the Province of Quebec. What says the Proclamation? Why, the very same words. To divide the Province of Quebec, not to add to it, any more than to take away from it. Therefore, Upper Canada, in the purview, could include only that part of the Province so divided as was not contained in Lower Canada; but it could not extend beyond these limits which constituted the Province of Quebec, otherwise it would certainly have been an Act to enlarge, rather than an Act to divide. In delivering this opinion I am speaking our unanimous sentiment, for we have consulted our brother Perrault upon the subject, and he clearly concurs with us. According to our understanding of the Act and the Royal Proclamation, we are bound to say that we consider the argument of the gentlemen concerned for the prisoner, though presented with great ability and ingenuity, must fail, because the western boundary of the Province of Upper Canada is a line drawn due north from the confluence of the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers till it strikes the boundary territory line of Hudson's Bay.

"The question of fact will remain with the jury. It is they who are to say whether this place, the Dalles, is or is not to the west of the line which we now declare to be the western boundary of His Majesty's Province of Upper Canada. If they are of opinion that it is within, or to the east of this western line, then it is in the Province of Upper Canada, and not within our jurisdiction; but if they are of opinion that it is to the west of this line, then I am giving you our unanimous opinion when I declare that the Dalles are in the Indian Territory, and not within the limits of the Province of Upper or Lower Canada, but clearly within the jurisdiction of this Court, by the Act of the forty-third of the King Chapter 138, which extends our power to 'the trial and punishment of persons guilty of offences within certain parts of North America.'"

Such is the judgment of the Court, a judgment that has established the jurisprudence upon the point, and which was quoted later in other trials for offences committed in the same territory. In 1803, as the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson) remarked this afternoon, one Mowat was brought to Montreal; he was accused of a misdemeanor committed in the country situated to the west of Lake Superior. This person was accused of manslaughter. He was brought before the Courts, found guilty, and underwent his sentence. Later, in 1818, there were two trials, one at Three Rivers, I think, Reinhardt's trial—the other the trial of McLellan, accused of murder likewise committed in the above-mentioned territory. The question of jurisdiction was not raised this time; this question was raised at Reinhardt's trial. McLellan, who was tried some months later, was acquitted. Later, in Upper Canada, Brown, accused of the murder of Governor Semple, was brought to York, now Toronto, and there the question was raised in an incidental manner; that did not, however, prevent the Court from taking cognizance of the indictment, proceeding with the proof and going on with the trial, which ended by both prisoners being set at liberty. It is not my intention to examine this question exhaustively. That would require much more time and especially much more attention than the House is generally disposed to grant to speeches and questions as dry as this one. However, I think that I have said enough on the subject in order to show the importance of proceeding with wisdom and prudence in the settlement of this question. The Canadian Government has stated on several occasions that this is essentially a legal question; it is a question of interpretation of Statutes; it is a question that has often been decided by the highest tribunals of the country, and we should respect this jurisprudence. We should not set aside the series of official acts that are conformable to this jurisprudence. There is another question intimately connected with the discussion that is now occupying our attention, I mean the political question. Let us always remember that the Confederation Act was essentially a treaty between the different Provinces. Each Province entered into Confederation with a known population, with well defined limits, knowing full well in what sphere its energies, its influence and its rights were to be exercised. It was in 1867 that Lower and Upper Canada, in order to obviate a crisis that was threatening to render all government impossible, determined to try Confederation. If at that time the Provinces of Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had perceived that one of these Provinces was, at the end of ten years, to ask for an increase of territory twice or three times as large as these Provinces, I would like to know whether the Act of Confederation would have been possible. We were discussing a few days ago what was justly called, I think, the crowning of the Federal structure. We have found the means of uniting the two oceans by a line of railway destined to overcome the natural obstacles that, in the opinion of the opponents of Confederation, formed an insurmountable difficulty in the way of building up the Federal structure. The Canadian Confederation will be consummated by this gigantic undertaking. Now the territorial pretensions of Ontario are necessarily calculated to re-open the whole question. All will have to be begun over again, should the Parliament of Canada accept the decisions of the Commissioners rendered the third day of August, 1878, as the extravagant conclusions of the member for Bothwell. Ontario came into Confederation with superior population and wealth; its territory was known; the Quebec Act defined its limits, and a judgment of the King's Bench interpreted this Imperial law, taking away even the possibility of a doubt. Is it reasonable to suppose for a moment that the Provinces of Lower Canada, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, who were already very reluctant to cast their lot with a Province stronger and more powerful than either of them—is it reasonable, I say, to suppose that Confederation would have been possible if the other Provinces had for a moment imagined that Upper Canada would repudiate its western boundary as it was then defined, in order to set it 400 miles farther back? Sir John A. Macdonald declared in 1855, and later this principle was solemnly affirmed in the first resolution of the Quebec Conference, that the Confederation was a treaty of which all the details were weighed and discussed at length. By claiming a territory of more than 50,000,000 acres to the westward, Ontario is breaking the Federal pact, and is trampling under foot the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. This is a dark spot on our horizon; it is the storm whereof we hear the first mutterings. Already public opinion is growing ardent and threatens to set fire to everything, if, as the hon. member for Halton said a moment ago, the Government do not soon see to it, by confiding the solution of the difficulty to a tribunal who will render a judgment which cannot be suspected by any one, and which will forever settle the dispute in the interest of the Confederation of the Provinces of British North America.

CANADIAN CATTLE IN ENGLAND.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to ask a question relating to a matter of great public interest. It is stated that an Order in Council was passed in England, directing that all Canadian cattle shall be slaughtered, after arrival, in any English port. As this is a matter of the greatest public interest, and is connected with a great and constantly increasing trade, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has received any official information or any information with regard to this subject.

Mr. POPE (Compton). I will say, in reply to my hon. friend, that I saw in newspapers that such was the case. I also received private letters in hands of individuals, stating that an Order in Council of this kind would go into effect a week ago. I immediately telegraphed to Sir Alexander Galt, and the answer was that there was no such Order in Council, nor was any such Order contemplated, or any change in the manner of receiving shipments of cattle.

IMPORTS OF IRON AND STEEL.

Mr. JONES moved for a return of the quantity of iron and steel imported into Ontario, Quebec, Halifax and New Brunswick, distinguishing the quantities of bar iron or steel, round or square, sheet iron or sheet steel, hoop iron or steel, during the last financial year.

EXPORT OF SILVER ORE.

Mr. JONES moved for a return of the number of tons of silver ore exported from Ontario, during the past five financial years.

DEPOSITS IN GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANKS.

Mr. JONES moved for a return of the number of depositors in the Government Savings Bank of sums under $10 during the last financial year. He said: My object in making this motion is to draw the attention of the Post Office Department and of the Government to a system which has been adopted in England with very great success. The deposits in the Government Saving Banks in Great Britain, as hon. gentlemen are doubtless aware, were limited to a minimum of one shilling sterling, but this amount was found to be too large for the poor classes whose pennies and halfpennies instead of being saved were too frequently spent in gin and whiskey. A scheme was inaugurated by which forms were provided having twelve divisions, into each of which a penny postage stamp could be placed, and when these forms were filled they were received as deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks. The plan was brought into operation on the 13th September, in ten counties situated in different parts of the United Kingdom, and during the seven weeks it has been in operation the success obtained has been so marked that it has now been decided to extend it to the entire country. This decision will take effect on Monday the 15th November. On and after that day, at every post office in the United Kingdom, forms for the making of small deposits in post office savings banks will be issued gratuitously. Each of these forms, which are about the size of an ordinary check, will have twelve divisions, in each of which a penny postage stamp can be placed. When a form has thus been filled with twelve stamps it will be received at any post office at which there is a savings bank as a deposit of a shilling. During the seven weeks that the experiment has been in operation more than 14,000 of these forms have been received, and more than 7,000 new accounts have been opened through their agency. As the selected counties contain less than one-tenth of the entire population of the country it may be fairly assumed that if the plan had been applied in the first instance to the whole country, it would, during the period referred to, have led to the opening of more than 70,000 new accounts. The forms after being received at the local post offices, are transmitted to the general post office; they have come to hand in remarkable good order, most of them presenting the appearance of perfect newness, and it has not been necessary in a single instance to return any of the forms on account of their being damaged or defaced. I am of opinion that a system based upon that which has been so successful in Great Britain would be a boon to the poorer classes in this country, though fortunately they are not so numerous as in the old country, a card might be used having say ten or twelve divisions into each of which a three cent stamp could be put and when the card is filled it might be taken as a deposit for the amount it represents. My attention was drawn to this subject by a gentleman in Toronto, who takes a great interest in all matters for the benefit of the poor, and I therefore thought it desirable to bring the matter before the Government and the House.

Mr. McCUAIG. I have received a communication from an Englishman, Mr. H. J. Love, on the subject of the sums charged for the transmission of money orders from this country to England. He complains that we discriminate against England in this matter, as while it only costs ten cents to transmit say $10 to the United States, twenty cents is charged for the transmission of that sum to England.

Mr. JONES.

With regard to the motion before the House, I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Jones), because our circumstances are quite different from those which prevail in England. Our population is not so dense, our laborers are as a class better paid, so that I think a minimum deposit of $1 is none too high.

Mr. PLUMB. I think we are indebted to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Jones) for bringing this matter before the House. This system of taking small deposits, I think, was due to Mr. Fawcett, the present Postmaster General. It is a thing we ought to take into consideration and which we might imitate. I do not quite agree with the hon. member from Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) that it would entail a large expense and give great trouble, and for that reason it ought not to be considered by the Government. I think anything that accommodates the people and encourages them to make deposits, no matter how small, should be sedulously encouraged by the Government. There is no question that the limit of the deposit may prevent the accumulation of sufficient money to make the deposit which is required, but this difficulty is obviated by the system of making small deposits by means of postage stamps upon cards, as in England. The sum accumulated might be or might not be less than $1, but the system of cards for the sums deposited in that way is really a great improvement, and it is to this, I have no doubt, that my hon. friend desires to call the attention of the House. The deposit need not be paid until the card is filled by a certain number of stamps and those cards be transmitted, so that all who wish to make small savings may avail themselves of the Government plan without receiving checks. It makes no difference after all how small the sum is. The suggestion of my hon. friend struck me when I first saw it as being one of remarkable ingenuity and likely to prove most salutary in its operation. I think it should meet with the consideration of the Government. I do not suppose it would be of great benefit to the public finances, but it would be of great benefit to the classes that should be encouraged by every possible means to habits of thrift and economy.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I will only add to what has just been said by my hon. friend for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) that so far as the Government is concerned every means that will induce the people to economize even very small sums of money, will be encouraged by the Post Office Department, provided the cost to the country will not be such as to make the scheme too expensive. This new scheme may require a good many entries and a good deal of labor on the part of the officers of the Department, and therefore may prevent its being extended throughout the country. Nevertheless, the minimum amount now received in the post offices might be reduced; at all events it is a matter that has not escaped the attention of the officers of the department. I am glad my hon. friend from Leeds has called the attention of the Government to this matter, and I can assure him that it will not be lost sight of.

Motion agreed to.

THE CASE OF J. B. EAGER.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved for statement in detail of the amounts which have been paid to J. B. Eager, late Clerk in the Hamilton Post Office, since the date of his superannuation; copies of all correspondence, certificates, etc., with the Postmaster-General or the Post Office Department, in reference to the superannuation of the said J. B. Eager, and the cause of said superannuation. He said:— I make this motion because of the gentleman named in it, after being a clerk in Hamilton Post Office for some years, was superannuated by the late Government, and his superannuation amounts to within 44 cents of $500 a year. His salary for the three years previous was something over $1,000 a year. I am told that in a course of a few days after he was superannuated, he applied for and got a situation in one of the insurance companies in Hamilton, where his salary was $1,000 a year. He was quite able to attend to his duty as an agent of that Insurance Company, but he was not able, apparently, to attend to his duties as a clerk in Hamilton Post Office. Now, that matter has been discussed a good deal in the city of Hamilton, it has become a scandal there, and I think it is high time that notice should be brought to the Government of the state of the case. This gentleman is, to all intents and purposes, enjoying as good health as men ordinarily. I have the pleasure of seeing him every day when I am at home, and he attends to his duties religiously and is quite able of attending to them properly. While receiving $1,000 salary he is at the same time a pensioner of this Dominion for a sum equal to 50 per cent. of that besides. I move for these papers with the view of showing that, in the first place, as I am told, the superannuation was granted on the representation made to the Government of the day, by gentlemen who really must have known the state the man was in. He was not in the state represented to the Government and which induced the Government to superannuate him. I, therefore, hope the Government will bring down the papers, and will, if Mr. Eager is able to attend to his duties, ask him to go back into the Post Office.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I cannot charge my memory with the facts relating to Mr. Eager's superannuation, although I think the papers will show that the late Government acted in this matter upon medical certificates, showing Mr. Eager to have been apparently in a very bad state of health before he was superannuated. But if the facts be as represented, and as I have no doubt the hon. member believes, the Government, if I recollect aright, under the terms of the Superannuation Act, have it in their power to remedy any wrong that may have been committed; because I think they can require Mr. Eager to resume service at any time, either in the Department from which he was superannuated, or any other Department of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC.

Mr. MILLS, in moving for a return showing the number of passengers who travelled on each of the railways of Canada for the year 1880; the number who might have been carried, had the accommodation afforded been fully occupied; the number of tons of freight carried; the number of tons which might have been carried with existing rolling stock, said: The reason I make this motion is to ascertain to what extent the rolling stock of the railway companies in the country would be available for increased travel and traffic, and to what extent the increased travel and traffic would be accommodated. From information afforded by the different railway companies in England and Scotland, we know that a diminution of charges is accompanied by a corresponding increase of travel and traffic—that, in fact, the rule which has been found to hold good in regard to the Post Office Department holds equally good in regard to these railways. I have no doubt that the same rule would prevail in this country, and that the railway companies would actually lose nothing by a change. The information collected by Mr. Galt and others who have given special attention to this subject in England shows that a diminution of charges has not affected dividends, as the companies would not apply a rule that would be disadvantageous to themselves and the public, and my own impression is that a very considerable diminution in railway charges might be made in this country without ultimately impairing the dividends which the companies are able to declare. On the contrary, I think it would in the end effect an increase in the dividends, as well as a very great advantage to the country. With the object of obtaining information on this point, I put the motion in your hands.

Mr. PLUMB. I differ considerably from the hon. gentleman in his views about railways. I am not aware that the railway companies in this country are paying such dividends on their capital stock that they could very well afford to reduce their charges. It is news to me that any railway company in Canada is paying a dividend on its stock at all, and I cannot see how any railway company can make a return of the possible business they might have done, or the number of tons of freight, or the number of passengers they might have carried under possible contingencies I regret to see, as I think I have seen, a disposition to attack the corporate interests of Canada. I regret to see it because I believe capital is exceedingly timid, and anything that looks like a disposition to meddle unduly with vested interests will alarm capitalists, whereas we ought in every possible way to show capital that it is secure in coming here, and taking up our projects for the improvement of the country, especially by means of railways. The whole history of railway investment in Canada has been one of disaster. It is true it has been urged that there have been in many cases imprudencies in the letting of contracts, and losses in the capital that ought not to occur. But there are enterprises in which there are no such losses. I do not think anyone can pretend that the Great Western Railway, or many of the railways incorporated by the Ontario Government, have squandered their capital. But I have failed to see any of them pay a dividend. In fact, the history of railways in Canada from beginning to end is one of disaster, and I do not think it is desirable that the Government should interfere in the way suggested by my hon. friend; for this return amounts to nothing if it is not intended to lead to some sort of legislation. Up to the present we need not be guided by English precedents, but we can afford to let railways be governed, in their business by the same rule that governs other businesses. They will do business at the lowest rate they can afford, because they know, as well as my hon. friend that the lowest fares bring the most business. They are compelled to take rate for the purpose of meeting competition which would not otherwise be remunerative; but when a railway is there with its plant, business must be kept going at any price. I see great objection to this tendency to meddle in railway legislation, and to interfere with legitimate business carried on in a legitimate way. This is a proposition made which looks toward the undue hampering of capital. No railway can tell us what its possible amount of business will be under certain circumstances. My hon. friend may know of some mysterious method of getting at the information he seeks, but when got it will not be worth the paper it is written on. I could not allow such a motion to be made, accompanied by the remarks of my hon. friend, without entering my protest against it.

Mr. JONES. I can agree with a great deal that has been said by the hon. member for Niagara, but I do think that many of the railways in this country discriminate very unjustly between different points, perhaps not so much in charges for passage money as for freight. On this subject I will read a letter I received to-night from a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church in Manitoba, a gentleman whom I know very well, and who is a missionary out there. In this letter he points out the imposition practised on immigrants. The letter is as follows:—

"I promised to write you concerning the freights into the country, and have delayed so as to be able to give you figures—a friend was to send me a copy of the railway tariffs, from Montreal and points west to Winnipeg, but it has not reached me; at all events, let me just in a word point out some facts."

"The distance from Montreal to Winnipeg via Chicago, is 1,711 miles; Montreal to Chicago, 850 miles; Chicago to St. Paul, 409 miles; St. Paul to St. Vincent, 390 miles; St. Vincent to Winnipeg, 62 miles."

"In round numbers, freight from Montreal to Chicago, 70 cents per 100 lbs.; Chicago to St. Paul, 70 cents per 100 lbs.; St. Paul to St. Vincent, 140 cents per 100 lbs.; St. Vincent to Winnipeg, 25 cents per 100 lbs. These are not the exact figures, but they are very near, and represent the proportions. That is, the Grand Trunk carry double the distance for the same money as the Chicago and St. Paul Railroad, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba charges four times Grand Trunk rates; nor is this all—no private person can tell what he will have to pay in extras when his goods arrive at Winnipeg. A man may make whatever bargain he pleases in Ontario, and get it in writing; when he comes to seek his goods here, every other immigrant on an average has to pay ex ras, and can get no explanation or satisfaction. These extra charges vary from $2 in every 100 lbs., up to $100 per car load. These over-charges are very discouraging to immigrants, and should be the subject of Government enquiry, they are doing great harm to the country, and are nothing less than frauds. The agent at St. Boniface told me they are regularly put upon. The people and immigrants have neither the time nor the money to contest them. Suppose a traveller comes by the lake to Duluth, rates can be had as follows:—Toronto to Duluth, via Collingwood, 933 miles, freight, 15c. per 100 lbs.; Duluth to Glyndon, 250 miles, 50c. per 100 lbs.; Glyndon to St. Vincent, 154 miles, $1 per 100 lbs."

Of course, the country is but partially settled, and freights must consequently be right, but what I complain of is that when the immigrants get there, they are imposed on by somebody. It may not be the railway, but the railway officials; and a man who wants to get out to his farm cannot stay over five or six days to contest an imposition of $5 or $6. I wish I had this letter a week ago, and I would have said something on the Canadian Pacific Railway question, on which I did not speak. Had I this letter, I would certainly have spoken about it. It is just in time to prevent the immigrants going into that country being imposed on by officials, for I do not think it is possible the railway companies imposed on them, though, of course, they will get all the freight they can make their roads pay. The writer continues:

"You can bring freight from Toronto to Glyndon, a distance of over 1,200 miles, for 65c. to 85c. per 100 lbs., while for the next 154 miles over the St. Paul road, you pay $1—not a cent less for any kind of freight, or eight times the rate of the rest of the route. When I came through I arranged for the freight on two parcels at Toronto to be delivered at St. Boniface for $1.80 per 100 lbs. When they arrived here there was an overcharge of $15.96 on 500 lbs., or $3.19 per 100 lbs. No explanation; pay or do without your things. The Rev. J. Lawdon, Rapid City, had a cutter sent from Toronto by Prettie's party. The freight paid there was $12. The receipt read, "freight on cutter $12 paid." He had to pay $39 extra charge. The Rev. J. Hewitt came to Portage la Prairie last August. He had four cases of household goods. The extra charge was $40—no explanation. I could go on multiplying almost indefinitely. I wrote to all the companies and all have replied and refunded but the St. Paul and Manitoba road, they give no redress. The conduct of this road towards this country has been such in the fact that you can easily imagine the feelings of the people towards the Syndicate, and nothing but the great anxiety to get a road soon through our own country could keep them quiet concerning the monopoly for a time given to the Company. In the interests of the country there should be an immigration office at Winnipeg, or other suitable point on the road, with power to investigate all complaints and guard the interests of the people. We have the making of a fine country here, and I hope in a few years we will be able to look better to our own interests. It will take time and capital to develop the resources we have. There is another point in which there might be great improvement, namely, the homestead duties. Many persons have taken up land under the Act which compels residence and cultivation. There are many, too many, who make no attempt at either. They are simply holding the lands for others. Would it not be well for the Government to demand residence with the cultivation of a certain number of acres per annum; say two to five to be broken and cultivated each year, and appoint an inspector of homesteads for each land office. Good men could easily be obtained; in fact, if the Government could get no others, some missionaries might be found willing to act."

I think that is a most important letter, and with regard to those ruinous freights, I think some means ought to be taken to prevent immigrants into the North-West being imposed upon by the railroad officials; for I scarcely think the roads themselves would endeavour to make such enormous overcharges as one mentioned in this letter.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. You had better send that letter to the Senate. It is not too late to do them some good.

Mr. JONES

Mr. JONES. It has gone to the press, and I hope the Senate will take cognizance of it.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not see how we can give all the information the mover wants. An order showing the number of passengers who travelled on the railways of Canada for 1880 might be given; but as to the number who might have been carried had the accommodation afforded been fully occupied; the hon. gentleman must see this information is not possible. Where would we put the cars—at what stations, with a view to all this information? The number of tons of freight that might have been carried suggests the question—where was the rolling stock? While disposed to give all the information possible, these questions cannot be easily answered, because we cannot only say where at certain times the rolling stock was found, or what freight or passengers might have been offered at any particular points. If the hon. gentleman drops the two very difficult parts of his motion, we will try to comply with the remainder.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think there is the difficulty in dealing with the whole of the motion imagined by the hon. gentleman opposite. I have seen returns which seemed to me to implement the reasonable meaning of the motion. I will suppose what my hon. friend means is this: take any one railroad company, it has carried some tons of freight and so many thousand passengers a mile. Now, what is the average number of passengers to a car and tons of freight carried? For instance, you find as the general results in regard to a great many railways in the United States, that not more than thirty passengers are carried on an average in their passenger car, which, if full, would carry sixty or sixty-five. As a general result on the freight cars of the old small capacity of ten tons, more than six or seven tons are carried. So the company is able to say what the average amount of paying freight is per freight car, and what is the average number of passengers to each passenger car in use. It is not a question as to the whole rolling stock a company may have possessed at a particular date at any particular place, but as to how much they were actually using from year to year to do such an amount of business, compared with what amount they might have done if it had been used to its full capacity.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I understand that, but do not see the object of the parts of the motion to which I have objected. For instance, there is a passenger car which, instead of carrying sixty passengers, has only carried twenty. Well, you cannot take the rolling stock of a whole company and always fill the cars with the exact number of passengers, or amount of freight they can carry. Therefore, I do not see the object of this motion, though I could see the object of asking the amount of the rolling stock owned by a company and the amount of work done by it.

Mr. MILLS. I spoke to the Minister of Railways when I put the motion on the paper, and he told me he would do his best to facilitate the acquisition of the railway. He not only made no objection to the motion, but on the contrary showed he was quite ready to endeavor to obtain for me that information which, from my point of view, is valuable. Our railway statistical returns are perhaps more scanty than any others I am acquainted with. If the hon. gentlemen opposite would consult the railway returns from Ohio and Massachusetts, he would find that a great deal of this information, if it is not given every year, is frequently given, and there can be no difficulty such as the hon. gentleman suggests, because if you have a train running, say with five passenger coaches, and fifty passengers on the train, the company can have no difficulty in stating how many more they can carry. And so with regard to freight traffic; I think this information would be valuable. I mentioned the case the other day with regard to certain railways in Scotland. There were two railway companies running between Greenock and Edinburgh; they ran in competition for a year and a half, and though rates were reduced to one-eighth of what they were before, there was scarcely any appreciable reduction in the dividends or in the amount received by the companies. Now, until we have the information which I ask for in this motion, we could not take the first step in the consideration of the question of the reduction of freights. I do not say we ought to decrease rates. I do not discuss that question now, but I say that the House should have all necessary information on the subject, if an hon. member should choose to bring it before the House. We could not enter into a discussion of that subject with the imperfect knowledge which our railway companies afford us in the returns they make. I think the whole system of our railway returns ought to receive the careful consideration of the Minister, and that we should have more complete information with regard to the internal trade of the country than we do at present.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think the hon. gentleman will see that if he could get the information which he wants, it would be exceedingly misleading to the public and, therefore, not valuable for the object he has in view. The peculiarity of our railway freight traffic is that there are certain seasons of the year, as for instance, when the crops have to be moved, when the rolling stock of the railway companies is more than fully occupied for probably three or four months of the year, and when every train, and especially those which are eastward bound, and come over the line to the points of ocean shipment, are all full. Then there are other periods of the year, and perhaps large periods, when there is no such traffic. The effect of the figures which my hon. friend wants would be this, that taking the year all round, it would appear that the rolling stock of the companies would not be fully occupied—their cars would not be entirely filled, and the consequence of that would be the creation of an impression in the country, that if the rates were only reduced, there would be a larger amount of traffic, and the companies would realize that much more, when in reality the effect was due to another circumstance, namely, that during a certain period of the year, their rolling stock was more than employed, while at other seasons there was nothing like so large a quantity of freight to be moved. The effect, therefore, of the figures, if brought down in the bald manner in which they are asked for in the motion of my hon. friend, would be to mislead the public mind on this question, and any arguments based upon them would therefore be fallacious. There is another thing to be borne in mind. As I understand, what the hon. gentleman desires to get by this motion is the amount of freight actually carried on particular trains partially filled, and how much such trains could have carried. That, as I understand it, is what the hon. gentleman asks; but I do not think that is quite what he asks for in his motion, because he asks for the capacity of the companies, having regard to the rolling stock they have altogether, and the amount which is actually engaged in carrying traffic. The difficulty in the way of getting such information is this: that under the present system our railways, the Grand Trunk, the Great Western, the Intercolonial and other roads are perpetually interchanging their cars, and the question of how much they could do with the cars they have would depend entirely on the control they have over those cars, and those cars for a large portion of the time are entirely beyond their control, they are under the control of other companies over whose lines they pass and with which the companies owning them have business relations. So that it would be utterly impossible in that sense to get anything like a statement which would be an accurate one. So with regard to the passenger traffic. The hon. gentleman must know that the return to his motion would not, if it was in literal accordance with the terms of the motion, give him the information he seeks as to the capacity of the companies as to rolling stock. The same principle applies with regard to the rolling stock of passenger traffic as to that of freight. There are certain periods when the rolling stock is amply occupied, and there are other periods when it is not so well occupied, and when in the nature of the business of this country it cannot be so well occupied. So having regard to these facts in connection with our railway traffic, it seems to me that the information the hon. gentleman seeks to obtain would not be of any real value, even if the railway companies were willing to go to the enormous labor which would be involved in attaining it; in fact, so far from being valuable, it would be entirely misleading to the public mind and might lead to the advocacy of a particular line of railway policy which had no justification in existing condition of our railway traffic.

Mr. MILLS. The less we know the more we know.

Mr. WHITE. Not by any means. We have now two or three important sources of information. We have the reports made to the shareholders of the different railway companies; we have in these the number of passengers they carry and the mileage; we have the extent of their rolling stock, the freight they carry, and the prices per ton, per mile, at which it is carried—in fact, all the information which the hon. gentleman expects to obtain; except the particular analysis of this information which the hon. gentleman now asks for. We have this further fact, and it is an important one, in relation to the reduction of freights. As my hon. friend from Niagara (Mr. Plumb) pointed out, with all the enormous increase of business in this country, our great trunk line has not been able yet to pay a dividend, even on all its preference stock and certainly not on its ordinary stock, and, until it does it would ill become the Government or the Parliament of this country to interfere with its management.

Motion negatived.

THE CLAIM OF THEOTIME BLANCHARD.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for all correspondence relating to the claim of Theotime Blanchard, late Inspector of Weights and Measures for the counties of Gloucester and Restigouche, N.B., for the payment to him of the portion of his salary withheld as his contribution to the Superannuation Fund. He said: The House will probably remember the change made by legislation in the mode of inspection, and in the staff of inspectors; and the question was raised in this House with respect to refunding the amount of money withheld out of the salaries of those officers, in order to pay their contributions to the Superannuation Fund. The Department seemed at first indisposed to refund any sum, the defence set up being that they had not been displaced or removed, but legislated out of existence. A member of the Government, and some hon. members, held the opinion that because those officers were not removed in the ordinary course they had no claim even to have any amount contributed by them refunded. The opinion of the House was, however, so strong that the then Minister of Inland Revenue consented that the money should be refunded. That was done in several cases; but in other cases it had been refused. I ask the attention of the House to one case, the facts of which I am personally cognizant of. In my own county, Mr. Blanchard, who at the time was a member of the Local Legislature, was appointed inspector. He held office until he was legislated out of existence. During that time a certain portion of his salary was withheld on every quarter-day by the Department, under the authority of the Superannuation Act, for the purpose of creating a fund out of which under certain circumstances he would be entitled to a large allowance. That money was unquestionably his own; the full quarter's salary was unquestionably due to him. It could not be withheld by authority of Statute except for the specific purpose prescribed. I never could understand why this particular claim was refused, for in equity and justice it was clearly established. It is now alleged, with respect to this and other similar cases, that the officers did little work, and therefore the Minister was authorized to withhold this money, which, as I allege, belonged to the officer, and was not public money. I have made application on his behalf to more than one Minister of Inland Revenue. They invariably at first admitted the equity of the claim, and were apparently willing to have the matter settled; but owing to some influence in the background—I do not doubt it was owing to the peculiar view held by the Deputy—the Ministers changed their opinions and declined to pay the amount. This was the case with regard to the late and the present Minister. I have waited on the latter also, and the Minister acknowledged the fairness of the claim; but a few days afterwards, determined that it could not be admitted. I bring the matter before the House that it may be discussed, and that hon. members may be satisfied that the claim was one that ought not to be refused. I think the Government will give this matter their serious consideration, as it is one which deeply concerns the gentlemen affected. The case is so clear and evident that I think the Government, if they will reflect upon it, can not possibly refuse to pay the sum asked for.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I shall not dispute the importance of this question by saying that it is a question of $50. Mr. Blanchard was appointed as Inspector of Weights and Measures in a district when there was no occasion for his services. He never inspected any weights and measures, so that in being relieved from his appointment he has not been relieved from his occupation. He was dismissed because there was nothing for him to do. He claims compensation for services not rendered, for duties not performed. The Government have no objection to the passage of this motion.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister was mistaken in saying that this was a district in which no Inspector was needed, but he was not mistaken in saying that the officer did very little. But the reason why he did so little was that he was not supplied with the standards. For some reason there was a difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of standards of weights and measures. He was kept waiting for them, and in the meantime held himself ready to obey the instructions of the Department. If I am not mistaken he never was furnished with the standards up to the last, but that was not his fault. He held himself aloof from all other occupations and resigned his seat in the Provincial Assembly for the purpose of accepting the appointment. This was a very considerable loss in a peculiar point of view. My contention is that if he were displaced because he had nothing to do, or that the appointment was not necessary, then from the date he was so displaced he could have no equitable nor legal claim; but he continued to be the officer and continued to receive his salary, quarter by quarter, minus only this sum withheld, which was just as much his money as the money he received.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:55 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. ANGLIN.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

TUESDAY, 8th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BANK ACT AND AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. LANGEVEN, in the absence of Sir LEONARD TILLEY, introduced a Bill (No. 50) to correct a clerical error in schedule B, to the Act 43rd Victoria, chapter 22, being the list of banks whose charters are continued by that Act. The Bank St. Jean, he said, was omitted from the list, and the Bill was for the purpose of correcting that error.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier) introduced a Bill (No. 51) to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. GIROUARD. The best explanation I can offer is to read the Bill, which is brief, and is as follows:—

"1. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada is abolished in all cases where the matter in dispute relates to property and civil rights in any of the Provinces, and to matters of a merely local or private nature, and coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Legislature of any of the said Provinces, according to the meaning of the British North America Act of 1867 and Acts amending the same.

"2. This Act should not apply to cases decided by the Exchequer Court of Canada, nor to cases where the matter in dispute affects the constitutionality or validity of any Act or Statute of any of said Provincial Legislatures, which cases shall continue to be subject to appeal to the said Supreme Court as now or hereafter shall be provided for.

"3. This Act shall not apply to appeals already instituted or pending before the said Supreme Court."

Bill read the first time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Mr. BOULTBEE introduced a Bill (No. 52) to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878. He said: The provisions of the Bill if they become law will make it necessary, before the Canada Temperance Act goes into effect, that the voters should be a majority of the whole voters of the district.

APPOINTMENT OF QUEBEC JUDGES.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) moved, that the House do now go into Committee of the Whole, to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That whereas by an Act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec passed in the year 1880, entitled 'An Act to amend the Law respecting the Court of Queen's Bench,' provision is made for the appointment of an additional Judge to the Court of Queen's Bench in the said Province of Quebec, and whereas by an Act of the same Legislature passed in the said Session of 1880, entitled 'An Act to amend the Law respecting the constitution of the Superior Court,' provision is made for the appointment of an additional Judge to the said Superior Court of the Province of Quebec in addition to the number now authorized to be appointed to that Court, it is expedient to make provision for the salaries of such additional Judges.

2. Resolved, That the salary of the said additional Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench shall be five thousand dollars, and the salary of the additional Judge of the said Superior Court shall be five thousand dollars a year, payable out of any moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

He said: The resolutions themselves contain the grounds upon which I rise on behalf of the Government to propose to the House, a proposition for the salaries of two additional Judges for Quebec. The Legislature of that Province having in view the better administration of justice has determined that it is necessary that an additional Judge shall be appointed to the Superior Court of that Province, resident in Montreal, and also an additional Judge to the Court of Queen's Bench of that Province. I am given to understand, by those familiar with the requirements of that Province, and with the work actually done by the Judges at Montreal and the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the additional assistance proposed by the Bill passed by the Local Legislature is absolutely necessary. I have reason to believe that the fact of the required assistance in the higher Court of Queen's Bench and in the Superior Court of Montreal will not probably be disputed, but I believe it is the opinion of some hon. members that the required assistance, especially in the Superior Court, might be obtained by a readjustment of the judicial strength already available in the Province, and that by such readjustment the salary of an additional Judge might be saved. I believe the fact is, that some years ago a correspondence on the subject took place during the time the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Blake) was Minister of Justice. That correspondence did not result in any definite action in the shape of readjustments in the Province of Quebec. The Legislature and the Government of the Province did not seem to have taken the view suggested on that occasion, that it would be wise to so readjust the available judicial power as to make it unnecessary to appoint an additional Judge for that Province. However that may be, the fact is, as exemplified by the passage of the Act of 1880, that the Legislature and Government of Quebec have not concurred in the view that any such readjustment of judicial power and strength could be made available with benefit to the administration of justice in that Province. I am very glad that some of my colleagues in the Government, and some of my friends in the House who are prominent members of the Bar in that Province, will be able to go into the question more in detail than it can be expected that I can, and therefore, at present, I will content myself with moving that this resolution do pass.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the propositions on the Table for new and increased judicial salaries, form a very curious commentary on the very violent attacks which were made on the late Government, previous to and during the last general election for their increases to the vote for judicial salaries, during their tenure of office. We all remember the extreme acerbity and acrimony with which that subject was prosecuted in the public prints, by orators on various occasions, and in pamphlets widely disseminated by a gentleman who is now a prominent member of the Government. The very fact that there had been large increases in the vote for judicial salaries, without reference at all to the considerations which had influenced the Government in proposing these increases, was pointed to as conclusive. The figures were given as indicating criminal, wasteful extravagance. It is exceedingly satisfactory, I am sure, to those who have survived that storm of attack, to find themselves justified in the view that there had probably been no great extravagance in what was done, by observing proposals on the Table to-day for an increase in the expense of the judiciary of this country, amounting, I conjecture, to about $30,000 a year. I do not speak of this proposal alone, which is limited to $9,000, but to all the proposals which are before us. Now, the late Government felt themselves unable to deal with some of the questions with which the hon. gentleman is about to deal, as they desired, in consequence of the financial condition of the country at that time. The revenue was inadequate to meet the expenditure, —and hon. gentlemen opposite may assert that the condition of things has so changed that it is right now to look at this question from an altogether different standpoint. It is true that in one aspect the condition has changed. The revenue is no longer inadequate to meet the expenditure. It is also true that that change is partly produced by the improved condition of the country; but it is further true that a very large portion of the increase in our revenues is due to the excessive addition to our taxation which has taken place, and but for that excessive addition to our taxation the condition of affairs with reference to the balance of revenue and expenditure—having regard to the large increase which is about to take place in the permanent charge for interest on public debt, and so forth—would, I venture to say, present a very different aspect from that which it presents to the superficial gaze today. To those of us who remember that the promises of the late Opposition before the electors were, that their changes in taxation would be simply readjustment, and not addition on the whole; who remember that the excuse which has been given for a departure from these promises was that the condition of the country was so much worse than the hon. gentlemen who made these promises conceived it to be, that they found themselves obliged, in order to redress the balance between revenue and expenditure, to impose, contrary to their intentions when in Opposition, an increased total taxation, it will be tolerably clear that a prime duty on the part of these gentlemen is, once that balance has been redressed, to lower the taxation which, for that specific purpose, they have increased, contrary to their pledges made to the people before the general election. And the general interests of this country, do, in my mind, require—upon every occasion in which an increase of expenditure is proposed and is attempted to be justified by the fact that we have a surplus—that we should recall to mind that that surplus is, in its largest measure, produced by an abnormal and excessive rate of taxation, imposed for a specific purpose, and which ought to be lowered the moment that purpose has been attained. While I make these general observations, which appear to me to be proper to be made on the first occasion on which, this Session, an increase proposed is to be made to the ordinary public charge, I am quite content to admit that one of the prime duties of Government is to secure to the people governed a due administration of justice, and that any expenditure which is essential in order to secure a due administration of justice is an expenditure not merely excusable, but justifiable in the highest sense. Putting aside, therefore, our financial condition, and assuming that we have a surplus capable of being vindicated as due to a normal and proper rate of taxation, and not to an excessive rate of taxation, and that we are free to act on this occasion, the second, and I frankly admit the larger question is, whether this particular expenditure is under the circumstances needful. If it be needful, it is certainly justifiable. Now, I have always contended for our right, when we were called on to grant a salary for a new Judge, to enquire into the circumstances of the case, and to ascertain whether it was fitting that the additional charge should be imposed on the revenues of Canada. Our constitution, defective in my mind, defective in that it confers upon one Legislature the power to appoint Judges, while it imposes on another Legislature the burden of fixing and paying their salaries, has always naturally led to a too plentiful creation of Judges on the part of that Legislature which has the pleasing function of creating these Judges, without being checked by the consideration that those who have the creating power must bear the burden of paying the officers. I have, therefore, felt it my duty to combat the idea that this Parliament is bound to provide the salary for any Judgeship which may be created by any Local Legislature. At the same time, we are met by many difficulties in dealing with this topic, because it is not within our competence, even if we believe that another means, another mode of legislation, another system would obviate the evil, to give that means or legislation in spite of the Local Legislature; and I am sure no one will suppose that I am suggesting to the House that we should admit any such change in our Constitution as would give us that power. We are beset with the difficulty that this is a case for concurrent action, and that the greater part of the action necessarily falls within the purview and must be decided by the free vote of the Local Legislature. Still, though we may not legislate so as to give what we consider to be the proper remedy, I am sure I am in the right in saying we have the full discretion and power to suggest the proper remedy, to correspond upon the subject, to discuss the question here, to discuss it as between Parliaments and as between Governments, and if it be possible to reach a solution which may involve a less charge upon the Federal Treasury, at the same time that it gives equal, and in my opinion on this occasion might give much greater satisfaction to the people of the Province concerned. The First Minister himself, when he formerly held that office, did not feel that it was beyond his purview to communicate with the Ministers of Provincial Governments of the West suggesting to them legislation with the view to an increase of the number of judgeships. His opinion was that great evils would befall those remote and sparsely settled countries if they had less than three Judges, for two might differ and there would be no possibility of settling the case; and so, although their population was insignificant, although one Judge alone would be able to do perhaps four times the work, in one of the Provinces at any rate, the suggestion was made by him that there should be legislation for an increase of the number of Judges, in one case, I believe, from one to three and in the other from two to three; and that suggestion was adopted. I am not quarrelling now with that suggestion, I merely mention it as an instance, given very early in our history, of a communication with reference to the judiciary of a Province between this Government and a local Government regarding a change in system. If it be within our competency to impose an increase, it is in our competency to propose some other change which shall not involve an increase; and that is all I am just now arguing for. I believe this question involves considerations which ought to make us hesitate before adopting these resolutions, even if we were not prepared to suggest by correspondence any change of system at all. I will tell you why before I proceed to a consideration of a possible change of system. Prima facie, all the arguments are against any increase in the judicial staff of the Superior Court. The judiciary of Quebec consist of, firstly, stipendiary magistrates for certain districts appointed and paid by the Provincial Government, officers who, I think, were wholly created after Confederation; or, if not wholly created, at any rate, much enlarged in the number after Confederation, and the principal charge on the Treasury, in respect to whom, was created since Confederation.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). They have been abolished.

Mr. BLAKE. Not wholly. They have been in part abolished, but the hon. gentleman will find, I think, that the salaries are reduced to about one-half.

Mr. GIROUARD. There are only two or three remaining.

Mr. BLAKE. There are, I believe, four remaining. There were none at the time of Confederation. They were introduced after that. The number was increased to a very large number, and has now been reduced; and those that remain are, so far as they do remain, an addition to the judiciary of the Province since 1867. The next branch of the judicial system are the Superior Court Judges, who sit as the Circuit Court, the Superior Court, and the Court of Review. Lastly, we have the Court of Queen's Bench with certain original and also certain appellate jurisdiction. The staff, as it stood in 1867, comprised, so far as I know, no stipendiary magistrates. It now comprises a certain, although a reduced number of stipendiary magistrates. It comprised, in 1867, five Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and that number has not been changed, the first proposal to augment it being that now on the Table. It comprised eighteen Judges of the Superior Court; in 1869, two years later, that number was increased to nineteen; in 1871 it was increased to twenty; in 1872 it was increased to twenty-six. Thus there was an increase between 1867 and 1872 of eight Judges, or very nearly one-half, forty-four per cent. in the judicial strength of the Superior Court. The proposal now, so far as the Superior Court is concerned, is further to increase its staff by one additional Judge, making a total increase of nine, or fifty per cent. of an addition to the strength as it stood in 1867. This increase is not, as it ought not to be, due to any increased incapacity or infirmity of the Judges; because, having regard to the creation of so many new judgeships in recent years, the removal by death of several of the Judges, and the extraordinary number of removals by the operation of the provision for retiring allowances, there has been a very great infusion of new blood in the Quebec Bench. The Bench may be said to be almost wholly new. The number of Judges appointed to the Superior and Queen's Bench Courts must, since 1867, be somewhere about twenty, making almost an entire renewal of the Bench, owing largely, as I have said, to the relief obtained by the infusion of new blood through the extraordinary use made, perhaps unnecessarily, but made, at any rate, of the provision for superannuation. In 1867, the Quebec Judges who were pensioned, numbered two; in 1868, they numbered three; in 1871, four; in 1872, five; in 1874, seven; in 1875, eight; in 1876, nine; in 1877, ten; and, notwithstanding the removal of some by death, they stand to-day at that number, ten. There has been consequently a continuous increase in the number of Judges of Quebec who have been pensioned by the operation of this law. The number amounts now to one Judge out of every three. For every three Judges who are in active service, you have one who has retired on a pension, and your pension list for Quebec amounts to-day to $29,666 a year. Compare that with the state of things in Ontario. There you have over sixty-one judgeships, the incumbents of which are, under certain circumstances, susceptible of retirement upon allowances. Of those sixty-one judgeships, the incumbents of two only are, at this moment, under retiring allowances—two out of sixty-one, or one out of thirty, instead of ten out of thirty-one, being one-tenth the proportionate number of those who are retired in the Province of Quebec. The amount expended in Ontario pensions is $3,200 as against nearly $30,000 a year for the Province of Quebec, the amount of money spent being, therefore, in round numbers, one-tenth, for the larger Province with the greater judiciary, of the amount spent in Quebec. Now, I am a believer in the view, however unpopular it may be, that the public interest in the highest sense does require a retiring allowance for Judges, because, unless you have such an allowance, there will be an irresistible temptation to continue on the Bench after their usefulness has ended, Judges no longer able to serve the public. But I do not hesitate to say that if such a use of the retiring power as has been, perhaps, necessarily made—I am not alleging any impropriety in the using of it at present, but bringing forward, simply, the facts—in Quebec, were to become general throughout Canada, you could not retain the retiring allowance provision for a single Session. It would be utterly impossible to resist the argument that there must be abuses in a provision which gave you one pensioned Judge for every three Judges in actual service—which gave you an expenditure in one and that not the largest Province of, in round numbers, $30,000 a year of the public money in retiring allowances; and as a friend, therefore, of this provision, in the public interest I think it important we should point out, that such extraordinary and abnormal results have flowed from its exercise in order that we may, if we can, ascertain the reason of this, and guard against such results in the future. Whether this occurred from improper appointments at the start, from improper retirements at the close, from such very great disagreeabilities, as I frankly admit there have been surrounding the position of the Judges in Quebec for some years past, and to which one of the learned Judges of the Supreme Court has alluded in a communication—or from chance, or from the operation of all these causes combined, I am not now about to enquire. But the fact is there, and it is a grave, important fact, well deserving of our attention. At any rate, I think I have proved by these figures, that it cannot be said that the demand for additional Judges in the Province of Quebec can be in any sense due to the circumstance that the Judges have become latterly more infirm, since I have shown you that a most liberal use of the power of superannuation has been made—that very many of the Judges are new appointments—that several have been removed, by death, and that, therefore, you are dealing with the case of a practically remodelled Bench, so far as the men are concerned. If that circumstance has nothing to do with it, have any other circumstances to do with this demand? Is there any increasing litigation due to an increase of population? Certainly not. The population of the Province of Quebec, as I observed the other day, as shown by the census of 1861 and 1871, is almost stationary. The increase in that decade was very trivial. It is quite true that a large proportion, almost the whole of that increase, took place in certain urban populations, and that, therefore, might be a reason for additional judicial strength being required in those cases. But, take the Province of Quebec as a whole, and there can be no doubt there have been no such changes in its circumstances as far as population goes, as would not be vastly over-supplied by an addition to this Superior Court equivalent to 44 per cent., without raising it 50 per cent., which is the present proposal. And while that is the state of things from 1861 to 1871, it is probable that the population has not exhibited any greater increase of population in the current than in the last decade. Well, is there any increase in the litigious spirit of the people? I know an old French monarch once said that the warlike spirit of the French nation exhibits itself in times of peace by these civil or private wars waged among the inhabitants in the Courts, and therefore, whatever be the litigious spirit of the people, it is tolerably ancient in its origin. There is no reason to believe that there is any increase in the character or intensity of that spirit. Is it by reason of any greater facilities for litigation? I think not. There is one important diminution in the matters litigated—I allude to the abolition of the Insolvency Laws—and I am not aware of any other subjects in which there have been given to the people of that Province materially greater facilities for litigation than formerly existed. But I am prepared to abide by the facts in the case, to enquire what the condition of litigation actually is in the district in which it is said additional strength is required, and to be judged by those facts as justifying me, or the reverse, in the position I take. Now, the fact is, that in the district of Montreal there has been not only no increase, but a most marked and tolerably graduated decrease in litigation in the past five years. The Montreal business, as evidenced by the writs issued in the Circuit and Superior Courts for that district is as follows—

Mr. BLAKE.

1876	In the Circuit Court	14,000
1877	“	12,200
1880	“	8,200

So that there were 49 per cent. more writs issued in the Circuit Court in 1876 than in 1880. Now, in the Superior Court, the numbers are as follows. Writs issued in

1877	4,300
1878	3,600

So there were 58 per cent. more writs issued in the Superior Court in 1876 than in the year 1880, in which the Provincial Legislature has proposed to add to the number of Judges to discharge the duties of that district. And you must remember that while the business has been diminishing, the staff has been increasing irrespective of the enlargement now proposed. Now, I have shown that in the Circuit and Superior Courts taken together the business was more than 50 per cent. greater in 1876 than in 1880; but you must add to this the fact that the insolvency business, which pressed heavily on the Judges in 1876, 1877, 1878 and 1879, has also been removed. It pressed so heavily that, as I shall show presently, the Judges proposed the appointment of a special Judge in Insolvency for the district of Montreal, whose whole time was expected to be devoted to that work, and, considering the work of the Judges on the basis of numbers, upon him would have been thrown one-sixth of the whole judicial work. This enables us to judge of the great reduction in the judicial work. Besides, within four years the Montreal Judges have been relieved of some of their outside work; the Terrebonne district, formerly assigned to and taken by the Judges of Montreal, has been joined to that of Beauharnois, and therefore the Montreal Judges have been, as the Bar suggested they should be some four years ago, relieved from the discharge of some outside duties which, during the high tide of local business which prevailed in 1876, they were burdened with. You must add to this the further fact that besides being relieved of that outside duty, they have been given, under Provincial Legislation, to which I shall presently allude, a greater measure of relief, that the law which provides for other Judges being brought into requisition to assist them has, during the same period of time—in 1877, if I remember rightly—been so amended as to give greater elasticity to its provisions, and to enable the Superior Court, as a whole, to avail itself more largely of the services of outside Judges to supply deficiencies in the judicial power than at any former period. So that there has been an enormous reduction in the amount of labor and a considerable increase in the strength of the judiciary through the power of calling in outside Judges to assist. Now, Sir, under these circumstances, I think I might ask the hon. Minister to consider whether there is not strong ground to believe that this is not precisely the time at which we should add another Judge to the Judges of the Superior Court of the district of Montreal. If the work could be got through at all in 1876 and 1877, when you had more than one half as much work again as you now have—much more than one half considering all these ingredients—can you not get along with the largely diminished work without adding now to the staff? There is one more test which I will apply to this question—the test of the actual results with reference to the lists. Take the list of cases inscribed for review in Montreal in September last. The number was not less than eighty cases. You are aware that it is competent for practitioners to add from time to time fresh cases to the list, and these cases with those undisposed of at the preceding term form the list for the succeeding term. The list for November last was only fifty-four, showing that there had been a very large diminution in the number of arrears. The list for December was only twenty-seven, showing that there had been a still greater diminution, and that the Judges had been able, not merely to keep pace with the current inscriptions for review, but also to clear off practically the arrears which seemed to have accumulated. And I am informed by a learned Judge, that these twenty-seven cases, of which a considerable number were actually disposed of during the December term, would have been altogether disposed of if it had not been that my friends and colleagues of the Bar of Quebec, were, as they sometimes are in other Provinces than Quebec, not quite ready to go on; and so a few of the cases remain undisposed of. That was the condition in December of the inscriptions in review—that the work was up to time, and that there were really no arrears; that, on the contrary, the arrears had been worked off and there was nothing to complain of. Now, Sir, I wish to refer to the opinions of authorities which are, in my view, of very great consequence on this subject. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice has adverted to the correspondence that took place during the time when I held his office on the subject of the judicial staff of Quebec, and as that correspondence has been brought down, I have to trouble the House with a reference to it. The first paper in that correspondence is a representation which was made to His Excellency by the section of the Bar of the district of Montreal through the medium of the Bâtonnier, Mr. Kerr, on the 4th November, 1876. I call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the date of this representation, because I have pointed out what was the state of business in that and the following years. I have given you a comparative statement of the amount of business doing in the district of Montreal, and I have shown you that the business which was before the Court at the time these representations were made was very much larger than the business now before the Court. Now, Sir, this representation says:

"That the judicial affairs of the district of Montreal require the unceasing labor of the six Judges appointed to administer justice therein."

There is no allegation that they want more than that number of men to do the very large amount of work that was to be done at the time. Then we have this suggestion:

"That none of those Judges should be called upon to fulfil duties out of the city of Montreal, and that any of the honorable Judges who is, or becomes unable to perform his share of duties for any cause whatever, should be temporarily or permanently replaced."

The learned Judge, to whom the next resolution refers, has since died, and I am sure no one will desire that I should read his name. There was a difficulty created by a mistaken judgment on the part of the learned Judge, of the duties he was to perform. Now, the importance of this representation may be judged by the character of those who promoted it. I find that it was promoted, in the first instance, by a requisition, calling a meeting of the Bar of the section of Montreal, and on it I find the names of a great many gentlemen; I find the names of all of those who are at all known to fame—108 members of the Bar altogether. I dare say every member of the Bar who has a seat in this House, from the district of Montreal will find his name upon it. The adjourned meeting at which the resolutions were adopted, was also attended very numerously by fifty-eight members of the Bar, and I find there are also many eminent names among those who attended that meeting. The resolutions passed at that meeting were the basis of Mr. Kerr's representation. They declare: "That the judicial affairs of this district require the unceasing labor of the six Judges appointed for it," and they call upon the Government to arrange, if possible, that none of these six shall be called upon to perform outside duty. The memorandum to Council upon this memorial signed by me, said:

"The importance of the interests involved and the weight to be attached to the representations made are very great. The undersigned has been for some time aware, from the ordinary sources of information, that difficulties of a grave character were attending the administration of justice in the district of Montreal.

"These difficulties appeared to him to proceed mainly from the unsatisfactory distribution of the available judicial strength of the Province of Quebec, but in part also from the views of Mr. Justice Mondelet as to his judicial duty referred to in the petition.

"The undersigned is fully sensible of the limited extent of the powers of the Canadian Government in this matter. That Government has not the wish any more than it has the power to interfere with the constitutional rights and responsibilities of the local authorities; and the undersigned feels sure that the intention of any suggestions which may be made will not be misunderstood.

"To the Local Government under the Union Act is committed the constitution, maintenance and organization of the courts of justice, and the administration of justice; but Canada (which is called on to determine whether effect should be given to any local law for the creation of additional judgeships, which fixes and provides the salaries of the Judges, and makes their appointments, and whose laws are administered by the Provincial Courts) has so great an interest in the efficiency of the system that it may not be improper, in view of the representations of the petition, to call the attention of the Local Government to the pressing difficulties which exist, and to some suggestions for their alleviation.

"To entirely remove these difficulties, and to place the judicial system in the highest state of efficiency may possibly require extensive and radical changes which the undersigned does not presume to suggest. He limits himself to the suggestion of some simple amendments which may, pending the consideration of a larger scheme of reform, lessen at any rate, though they do not altogether remedy, the more glaring evils.

"The undersigned has already referred to the unsatisfactory distribution of judicial strength. The business done in several districts, to each of which separately is assigned a Judge of the Superior Court, appears to be very small and quite insufficient to occupy any considerable proportion of the time of the Judge.

"The cost of the administration of justice in these districts is thus unnecessarily large. At the same time, the business in the other parts, at any rate in the district of Montreal, is very heavy, and apparently over-taxes the Judges specially assigned to that district. Thus, while the undersigned has no reason to believe that the whole judicial strength of the Province would, if properly applied, be at all inadequate to the whole judicial work of the Province, he is led to the conclusion that the present distribution prevents the satisfactory accomplishment of the work devolving on the Judges."

Then I proceeded to make certain minor suggestions to which I have already referred, proposing that more power should be given to the Chief Justice and Judges of the Superior Court to utilize the available strength where it was required, and proposing also that attention should be called to the view that none of the Judges of Montreal should be asked to do work outside their district. Not long after a paper was presented to myself, on the 20th of February, 1877, by five Judges of the Superior Court, residing in and performing their duties in the city of Montreal. That statement was this:

"We, the undersigned justices of the Superior Court for Lower Canada, sitting in the district of Montreal, have the honor to represent that the exigencies of the administration of justice in this district urgently require that the Judges in charge of this district should have additional aid in the performance of their duties, and that such aid would be materially supplied by the appointment of a special Judge in Insolvency for the district of Montreal."

That was signed by all the Judges of the Superior Court except Judge Rainville, who was at that time, unfortunately, too ill to discharge any duty. Upon that I pointed out, as is shown by the report in the papers of the 27th of February, 1877, that ameliorative provisions had been already passed by the Legislature of Quebec in the sense suggested, and that the circumstance that Judge Rainville was ill, being temporary in its character, did not justify a permanent change in the judicial system, but rather pointed to temporary arrangements to meet a temporary disability. I pointed out, further, that neither the petition of the Bar to which I have referred, nor under the circumstances of Judge Rainville's illness, the representations of the Judges, showed that more than six Judges were required for the discharge of the judicial duties of the district. I also pointed out that, if that were established, there remained the question whether the proper distribution of the whole judicial strength of the Province would not remedy the evil. I added:

"If I am not misinformed, the Attorney General of Quebec stated, in his place in the House, his opinion that the whole judicial strength of the Province would, if properly distributed, be adequate to discharge the judicial duties of the Province."

Well, Sir, this subject engaged the attention of the Government of Quebec, then led, I think, by Mr. DeBoucherville, and a despatch was sent by the Lieutenant Governor, of the 24th of April 1877, giving the deliberate conclusions of that Government in the same sense; and I refer to this despatch more particularly because the hon. the Minister of Justice seemed to be under the impression that these representations had been wholly fruitless. I have pointed out that they were not wholly fruitless, but that they were fruitful in that they produced some amelioration, and they were also fruitful in producing a consideration and a decision upon a main branch of that subject, the proper distribution of the judicial strength of the Province; although ultimately it did happen that that decision was not availed of by the Government, still there was a period, as I shall show in a moment, at which they had determined to take a better course. The Governor wrote on the 24th of April, 1877:

(Translation.)

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
"QUEBEC, 24th April, 1877.

"Sir,—With reference to your despatch (460 on 283), dated 7th March last, I have the honor to represent to His Excellency the Governor General that one of the causes of the difficulties which have arisen in relation to the administration of justice in the district of Montreal, pointed out by the Minister of Justice on the 8th November last, is the defective distribution of the staff of Judges of the Superior Court.

"With a view for providing a remedy for this evil the Legislature of this Province, during its last Session, passed the Act 40th Victoria, chapter 13. By this Act the Chief Justice of the Superior Court is empowered to call upon one or more of the Judges of districts, other than those of Quebec and Montreal, temporarily to perform the duties of their office in such district. The 4th section of that Act further provides that the Judge officiating in the district of Beauharnois, should likewise officiate in the district of Terrebonne, hitherto assigned to Judges resident at Montreal.

"The carrying into effect of that enactment will have the effect, if not entirely doing away with the existing evil, at least of greatly diminishing it.

"I further consider it expedient to point out that, in accordance with the law, a Judge of the Superior Court must reside in the County of Bonaventure and another in the County of Gaspé. The removal of Judge Caron to Quebec has created a vacancy in the County of Gaspé. That vacancy should not be filled; one Judge will suffice for the administration of justice in the two counties. The Judge to be appointed in lieu of Judge Caron might be called upon to discharge the duties of his office at Montreal. The Government of Quebec are prepared to amend the law accordingly. By this proposition the number of Judges of the Superior Court would not be increased, and the inconvenience complained of at Montreal would be done away with.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"(Signed) L. LETELLIER,
"Lieutenant-Governor.

"The Hon. Secretary of State, Ottawa."

Now, Sir, it is therefore very plain that at that time, namely on the 24th of April, 1877, the Government of Quebec was ready to recognize, and did itself propose to recognize the view that there was an improper distribution of judicial strength, and that the provincial law should be so modified, as that the Judges assigned to districts in which there was nothing to do should be made available for districts in which there was something to do, whereby, without increasing the total number of Judges, all the judicial work might be accomplished. The answer of the Government of Canada to this despatch is to be found in an approved report from myself on the 3rd of May, saying:

"I believe that this suggestion is worthy of adoption. As far as I have been able to learn, there is really hardly anything for the Judge of Bonaventure and Gaspé to do, and the Local Government of Quebec having properly taken upon itself the responsibility of proposing that the law should be altered so that one Judge should discharge the duty both of Gaspé and Bonaventure, and that the judgeship abolished at Gaspé should be transferred to Montreal. I think that the Government should do nothing which would interfere with so considerable a reform."

My successor in office, in the month of October, 1877, adverted to the same subject, and pointed out that it was important to communicate to the Government of Quebec, that this Government agreed in their view and was prepared to do all in its power to carry out that view. Well, Sir, you find thus an acknowledgment at that time on the part of both Governments, that the system was defective, that it involved a waste of judicial strength, and that, without increasing the expense or the number of the Judges, changes might be made which would give to the people all the relief desired. I contend that the figures I have given to the House show that no additional Judge is wanted, even under the present system, in the district of Montreal, that those figures as to the business indicate this result conclusively, unless there be some other consideration contradicting these figures in a manner which it is impossible for me to anticipate in any way. But I contend that if additional help is wanted, we are not going the proper way to get it. I contend that if you do not adopt my view, that there is no necessity in the present state of legal business in the district for more help; if you determine that there is a necessity for more help, you still are bound to look a little further afield before you determine that this is the way to give that help; you are bound to look back and forward. This communication of the Government of Quebec indicates the concurrence of opinion between the two Governments on the general principle which ought to apply. I say that by a proper use of the Superior Court Judges in the rural parts, all difficulty would be removed on this score; and I say much more than that. I say that the efficiency of those Judges for the work they have to do in the rural parts and in the central parts would be very much promoted by such a use of them. To so arrange the business that those men should have a share of the central work would be the best guarantee you could have for their remaining conversant with the law and affairs generally, and doing their duty in the districts to which they are assigned more efficiently than you can hope they will do under the present circumstances. What are these circumstances? Take the respectable district—respectable in point of the number of litigations as compared with some others—of St. Hyacinthe. Within that district the terms of the Circuit Court last four weeks, and of the Superior Court four other weeks, eight weeks in all; fifty-six working days in the year comprise the extreme judicial work of the Judge in that district. The number of Superior Court contested suits in that district was, in 1877, 8; in 1878, 33, and in 1879, 34; and I need not say that it was extremely easy for the Judge to dispose of that number of suits within the period I have referred to. In the district of Saguenay, the number of contested Superior Court cases was, in 1877, 3; in 1878, none, and in 1879, 5. In Gaspé and Bonaventure the number was, in 1877, 1; in 1878, 1, and in 1879, 5. Of course, there is some other work to be done, work which requires, in many places, a local judge, but this is the most important, and I need hardly say, that if this is the extent of the important work to be done in these districts, there does not seem to be any great necessity for the men to work the whole year round. If you compare the whole work done in the Province with that done in Montreal, you will arrive at similar conclusions, indicating that if there be an over-employment or an adequate employment in Montreal, there is certainly a very much under-employment outside of Montreal. The number of contested cases in the Superior Court in the whole Province in 1877, was 1,739; in Montreal 952; and adding, as the book from which I make these extracts (Mr. Pagnuelo's book) proposes to do, the cases in the Court of Review, and multiplying them by three, the number of Judges in those Courts, we find a total number of cases in the whole Province in 1877, of 2,516, and in Montreal of 1,450; in 1878, the number in the whole Province was 2,544, and in Montreal, 1,353; and in 1879, the number in the whole Province was 2,678, and in Montreal, 1,307; so that, speaking in round numbers, Montreal takes more than half of the whole of that business. The number of contested cases adjudged in seventeen rural districts, with fifteen or sixteen Judges, was, in 1877, 404, but in Montreal alone, with but six Judges, 1,450; in 1878, in the rural districts 382, but in Montreal alone 1,358; and in 1879, in the rural districts 504, but in Montreal alone, 1,807. So that it is perfectly clear that the work done outside, even were the staff equal, would bear no comparison with the work done in Montreal. The result, practically, of course is that the Judges outside of Montreal in almost all of the districts, are very much underworked. And there is another court, the Lessor and Lessee Court, in which the disproportion of the work done in Montreal and in the outlying districts is perhaps more marked. Now, I do not hesitate to say, that, under these circumstances, the natural tendency of the Judges is to deteriorate. The less they have to do, the less they will do. The less work you impose upon them, the slower they get; they do not add to their knowledge of law; they rather diminish than add to it. I am not speaking of the Judges of the Province of Quebec specially, for I do not pretend to any special knowledge, but I am speaking of my knowledge of what Judges generally become under similar circumstances. I say they are not better lawyers or better Judges, but worse lawyers and worse Judges for each year you keep them idle and unemployed. They rust. They do not keep themselves informed either on law or on general affairs, which is a most important part of a Judge's duty. It is most important that a Judge should be au courant with the course of affairs—I do not mean political affairs of course. I do not suppose they will know anything of this debate, for they will not read it, but I mean the course of business affairs, and so forth, a knowledge of which is an important part of the acquirements of a Judge. How are you to expect that of these persons, resting in a country village, occupied with little trifling matters only during the whole year round, and moving in a very narrow circle? There is also an evil experienced even under a system which is not at all so much exposed to it as the system to which I am referring. So guarded are those who have considered this point, that it is, as we know, the rule in England that the Judges in the high Courts—men occupying the highest positions in the realm—do not go to the same assize twice consecutively. They go to the same assize only at intervals; that has been the rule from time immemorial. So in Ontario the Judges are not expected to visit the same towns years after year; but there is a sort of rotation, by which the visits of the same Judges to the same towns are made only at long intervals. But in the present case, you find the Judges not only doing the whole business of a place which is small, but doing no other business, mixing with the same men, with a comparatively small Bar and a comparatively small society, with all the little gossips, cliques, intrigues and prejudices that grow up in a long series of years in such a society; and I say you place your Judges in a different position from what you ought, if you do not endeavor to separate them for a time from those associations, and give them other work in a different sphere, so that they may compare their work with the work of others, see the modes in which other Bars and other Judges conduct their business, and mix more in large matters than they are able to do in the narrow circle in which you condemn them to revolve. I say, therefore, that if you went no further than to make some provision by which your Judges in the Superior Court could be called upon, more systematically than at present, during the long leisures which they have in their own districts, to take a part in the work of the judicial business centres, you would not merely have sufficient judicial strength, but you would make these men better Judges than they can be under the system which condemns them to this isolation. Now, if there is to be no more radical change at all, if you are to limit your aspirations to this, this gives you an adequate and sufficient remedy. It not merely dispenses with the necessity of a new Judge, but I say it gives you an added judicial strength of three or four Judges, because it improves the position of your rural Judges so much that their real strength would be enhanced to that extent. Your system does not work well. There is no question about that. I will apply one test which, I think, may be accepted everywhere as a sound test of whether a judicial system works well or not. I refer to the degree of confidence which the Bar and the suitors evince in the decisions of the tribunal, of first instance, as proved by the proportion of appeals from those decisions. There is no more easy, practical, obvious test than that, and I say that the Province of Quebec, as is shown by the statistics in the little work to which I have referred, occupies a very unfortunate position in that particular,—a position not paralleled, so far as I know, by that of any other civilized country in the world. The judgments in the Superior Court in 1877 numbered 1,737. Of these there were 262 appeals to the Court of Review, and 259 to the Court of Queen's Bench, or a total of 521. In 1878, the judgments numbered 1,851, and the appeals were 237 to the Court of Review, and 227 to the Court of Queen's Bench, a total of 464. In 1879, the judgments numbered 1,955, of which 241 were appealed to the Court of Review, and 199 to the Court of Queen's Bench, or a total of 440. I am quite aware that appeals cannot be taken, in a certain class of cases, from the Court of Review and the Court of Queen's Bench; but, for general purposes, it is not necessary to go into minor details. I am merely, in a general way, showing the large proportion of appeals from judgments in the first instance. I stated, last Session, that out of 1,500 decisions, given almost entirely by single Judges in the Court of Chancery in Ontario, there were twenty-five or thirty appeals. I ask you to contrast those figures and consider what they mean. It is not possible to measure the significance of this disproportion of appeals to judgments in the first instance. Be it one-fourth, or one-fifth, or whatever it may be, it means an inconceivable amount of misery, uncertainty, expense, delay and difficulty to suitors, and the prolonged duration of that acrimony and trouble that attend litigation while it is going on. All these things we may speak of, but it is extremely difficult to measure in figures the amount of misery and distress occasioned to the people by their judiciary being in such a condition, that so large a proportion of the decisions of Judges in the first instance, are not accepted as satisfactory and final. As a general rule, I am not one who goes very much for restricting the right of appeal in particular cases. I go rather for seeing that your system of administering justice is such that the people are as a rule, satisfied with the decision of a Judge of first instance, than for preventing them, when dissatisfied, from going further. What I want this House, and particularly the hon. members from Quebec to address themselves to, is this serious question, whether there is not something wrong and vicious in a system which produces such results as to the degree of confidence in, and finality of their decisions of the courts of first instance. How much more judicial strength—and that is a minor question compared with the happiness of the people, because it is only after all a question of a few thousand dollars—yet how much more judicial strength, and therefore, how much money, would you save, if you could so arrange your courts of first instance, as that their judgments would command more confidence. Looking at the large amount of business your Court of Review does, the business of the Court of Queen's Bench, in its appellate jurisdiction being largely diminished, you will see at once that your judicial strength, instead of being insufficient, would be more than adequate to the emergency. The Quebec system of jurisprudence has no doubt very great advantages. No one can undervalue, no one ought to undervalue, who looks at the subject at all, those advantages. No one can undervalue that great monument of human wisdom and experience from which your code and system are drawn, the Roman law. And we who are somewhat without its influence, do not—I beg you, Sir, to believe, because we are not completely governed by it—at all undervalue it. On the contrary, I quite admit that you have theoretically very great advantages over us, and we in Ontario are endeavoring to remove some of our relative disadvantages. It is a disgrace to us as a people, in my opinion, that we should so long have permitted ourselves, in glaring contrast with you, to have a double system of jurisprudence, one conflicting with the other, one to correct the errors into which the other fall. I admit all that, and while I say we are now engaged, and have for a long time been engaged, in endeavoring to overcome that difficulty, and to bring our system in theory and in principle into something like the advantageous position in this particular which yours enjoys, I go further, and say that we are perhaps more and more building, year after year, as new and untried cases arise, on the foundation of the Roman law on which yours is based. But I may be permitted, perhaps, to suggest that in the practical working of a system much more defective in theory than yours, we have found some methods which are not wholly unworthy of your attention. I may be permitted to suggest that there are some things in practical work in which we have achieved greater success for our people, in spite of our defective system, than you have yet done. Your civil code is one thing; your code of procedure is quite another. There are things which are well worthy the ambition and energies of law reformers everywhere. While we are endeavoring to make our system in theory and practice more perfect, we have gone far already to practically simplify our procedure. We have got rid of your exceptions dilatoires, your exceptions à la forme, your system of enquête. We do not hear any longer these demurrers, these technical objections, these lawyers' difficulties which go so far to confuse and mystify the real question at issue between parties, and substitute for it some question in which only the lawyers have any interest at all. Our rule is that the Judge is bound by the law to make such amendments in the pleadings as will enable the real question at issue between the parties to be decided then and there in the case before him, and that he is bound to give his decision according to the very right and justice of the case. These are the fundamental principles towards which we work in a practical use of the more defective system under which we are living, and thus it is that we have shortened procedure very much. We are sooner in coming to an issue, we are shorter in trying the issue, and shorter in reaching a determination. We find no man turned out of Court, to commence again another suit for the trial of the same question. We find the whole thing settled, and quickly settled, in one suit; according to our system as it is worked, there are no public grievances, as in Quebec, with regard to delays. But I think that everybody who looks at the procedure in that Province must be cognizant of the fact that there are most serious delays which, in many cases, are equivalent to denials of justice; and there is a class of cases in which the slowness and tardiness of justice in Quebec crops out in a way which makes it conspicuous sometimes to the members of this House. We but need to look at the election trials and the length of time it takes for a Quebec Judge first to try an election case and then to make up his mind after a slow trial, we need but to compare the returns which come from Quebec with the returns from Ontario and other Provinces, to see there is a habit of slowness and retardation which is very fatal indeed to efficiency. While such is our practice, we have also, I think, even in the matter of carrying out our laws, advantages which the Province of Quebec does not possess, and which touch closely the topic which we are now discussing. We have combined to a very great extent the advantages of centralization and decentralization, because there are advantages in both. What have you got? I say that half the time of your Superior Court Judges is occupied with the discussion of trivial affairs which ought to be dealt with by local Judges of an inferior Court altogether. I say the adoption of the system of inferior Judges or magistrates, appointing, of course, men of ability, probity and integrity, while still not of the standing required for high class work, would enable you, without increasing the public charges, to increase the efficiency of the administration of justice. It does not suit to have high class Judges, who have to decide complicated and knotty legal questions involving long arguments, and which are to be settled according to the settled rules of laws, engaged half their time in petty affairs which have to be decided according to some sort of rough justice, to what is called equity and good conscience, and not according to law. The mere labor, irrespective of the character of such work, is enough to divert the ability of the Judges from the special work for which they are needed, the high class work. We have, therefore, local Judges which reside in the localities where they officiate, and who have a very considerable civil and criminal jurisdiction, under which they perform a large amount of work; and, I believe, under some of the amendments contemplated in the Ontario Legislature, our local Judges are to have a very considerable amount of work to do in questions that arise in the progress of suits, in the Superior Courts, with questions of pleading and other interlocutory proceedings. We do not centralize to any avoidable extent: we do not require writs to be issued in only one locality. Writs are issued anywhere—in the locality in which the suitor lives, the intermediate proceedings are largely conducted there by local bars, and the trial takes place in the most convenient place; all inferior matters of justice are managed by the local Judges in the different districts, and all more important matters are also managed largely on the spot by high class Judges, who make their circuits, and who are constantly engaged in the different parts of the country doing the same class of important work, and who come practically to every man's door to dispose of his litigation. Now, the improvements which have taken place in locomotion from the increased number of railways and other facilities for travelling, by which the Judges can go to distant parts of the country, are not to be left out of consideration. When your system was adopted originally, the condition of all the Provinces in this respect was entirely different, and it would be extremely easy now to make arrangements, which would then have been quite impossible, for utilizing the Judges more extensively, and enabling a small number of high class Judges to do the work all over the Province. In this way legal facilities can now be supplied at little cost in all cases, both great and small. You might thus get justice administered on the spot, and local judges in every district where there was sufficient business. Thus one County Judge might do all the ordinary and inferior business of a considerable district. He or some other legal officer would attend to all the matters of pleading. The trial would take place on the spot, and for any important trial you would have a high class judge. By this system you might use your Judges more, and distribute them better than now. You would then require fewer Superior Court Judges. You would be able to pay them a compensation more worthy of their work and larger than you can now propose; and that is one of the evils of the present proposition, that it would defeat any readjustment otherwise practicable by the creation of new offices of a character which ought not to continue, and would defer that justice which might be done the Judges were a proper system adopted. I believe there need be no increase of charges to the public. I believe the ultimate adoption of this plan, which might be adopted gradually, by putting into the local districts, as Superior Judges were removed, local Judges of inferior jurisdictions at smaller salaries, would enable you to accomplish great results without any increased charges. But if there were an increase, I would cheerfully vote for any reasonable amount which would be productive of truly beneficial results in the admini-tration of justice. My object has been to try to point out other methods which ought to be considered before we go further in a direction I think erroneous, and I think that we ought to endeavor to put the system, so far as our limited power extends, on a really sound, instead of continuing it on an unsound basis, and extending the unsound foundation on which it now rests. I intend to say very little about the additional Judge for the Court of Queen's Bench. You will have observed, I think, that from my point of view that step is also premature, because I have been pointing out that the number of appeals is entirely in excess of what it ought to be under a proper system; and if you are going to change the system and diminish the appeals, you would be diminishing the work of those Judges. But that is not all. One of the Judges of that Court not long ago published some memoranda on the subject, and that in view of the proposed Provincial Legislation. I shall trouble the House with an extract or two from these memoranda which have been published in the Legal News. Here are the suggestions made by Judge Ramsay:

"It is generally admitted that the Court of Queen's Bench, with its terms, as at present organized, is unable to deal with the work before it. If any evidence of this were required, it is to be found in the fact that there were about 120 cases ready for hearing in the district of Montreal in the March term of 1874, and that to-morrow we shall find ourselves in face of a roll of eighty-four cases. Of these cases we shall probably hear thirty. In a little over six years, we have therefore only made up our leeway to the extent of thirty-six cases. Evidently this is too close to be pleasant. Again, there are only two terms of the Criminal Court, and they have expanded into terms of from five to six weeks."

"The practical question that presents itself is as to the remedy to be applied. It is impossible to devise a remedy without having some positive knowledge as to the cause of the complaint. If a Court cannot keep down arrears, it is at once proposed to name more Judges, and the superficial observer is immediately satisfied with this expedient. If, really, the Judges of the Queen's Bench had too much to do, an addition of their number might, perhaps, be necessary. But I contend that the Judges ought to be able to do all the work before them, and are able to do it, if the Government and Legislature were content to give them leave to manage their time according to the requirements of suitors. In a word, the real difficulty arises from the existence of terms on the appeal side, and from their infrequency on the Crown side of the Court."

He says again:

"I have accompanied my criticisms with suggestions of amendments of a very simple kind, which I venture to affirm would enable five Judges to dispose of all the appeal cases likely to arise in the Province for the next twenty years. Second, that a change is now contemplated which, if anything, aggravates the evils of the present system and adds a new one."

He says further on:

"The scheme I have proposed, and which has met with the concurrence of the Bar, is to make the quorum of the Court four without any faculty, to name a fifth Judge, the judgment being either confirmed where there is an equal division of opinion, or a rehearing in chambers before the fifth Judge, to abolish all terms and to permit the Court to sit on such days at Quebec or Montreal during eight or nine months of the year as the Court or Judges shall from time to time fix and appoint."

In the second letter he says:

"The proposition to increase the number and to protract the length of the terms is totally delusive. It fills the eye of an uncritical public, but it does not do the one thing needful, it does not give the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench greater facility for getting through their work than they have at present."

He points out the reason:

"The only hope I see is that the badness of the measure now before the Legislature may lead to some change in practice, which it is not easy at present to foreshadow. This is not a very promising way of considering the matter, but it is all the consolation we can expect, for the measure is sure to pass. The luxury of creating a new office is too dear to the Government heart to be readily abandoned. With a bad measure the sixth Judge is almost a necessity; with a good measure no apology can be offered for his existence."

That is the view of that gentleman, a member of this Court, so much overworked. He declares it is entirely unnecessary to appoint the sixth Judge, because other remedies which he points out would answer equally well. I might say that there seems to me—looking at it from another point of view, I admit—a great deal of reason in the view that a modification of the law as to the terms of Court would be of great importance. In the Province of Ontario we have terms, in one sense, that is to say: there are fixed days on which the Court of Appeals should sit, but it is entitled to sit on other days, and it is entitled to protract its sittings until the business before it has terminated. It is not limited to a fixed number of days within which it must finish the business before it, but it is given the utmost elasticity in order to accomplish the duties which it does accomplish. I say that in the face of such a letter from one of the Judges of the Court, I think the subject ought to be further considered, and if it be true that a more extensive plan of reform would diminish the appellate labors of the Court of Queen's Bench, on that account alone it is not convenient, in my view, at this time to adopt this measure. I shall not attempt to discuss the details of proposed changes. Various changes have been proposed at various times. I feel my incompetency to enter into the discussion of those questions of detail; in truth, I have felt that it was an extremely delicate task for me to interfere at all in this matter, but I have felt at the same time that my hon. friends would recognize the spirit in which I have attempted to deal with the subject, as one which, however imperfect my observations might be, was not at all invidious. My desire has been to give such suggestions, as from my experience—widely different though it be from theirs—it seemed to me might be useful to the Province of Quebec, and to my fellow-members of the Bar from that Province, upon a subject of importance to all, but of extreme importance to them in regard to the administration of justice in that Province. All I suggest—and I may say I have no intention of enforcing my recommendation by any hostile proposition, at least, at this stage—is that the case is one for pausing. It was not until June last that the Provincial Legislature determined to create these Judges; that Legislature will shortly meet again; and if the discussion which is to take place at this and later stages of this measure should lead to the conclusion in the minds of my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec, that there are serious evils in the administration of justice in the Province not likely to be remedied by this measure, and that these evils required some more searching measure of reform, would it not be well to postpone, at any rate for one Session of our Legislature, the adoption of a plan which does not appear, so far as I can judge, to be rendered necessary by the present state of business—which does not appear to be urgent in that sense—of a plan whose adoption, followed by the filling of these judgeships, will necessarily create fresh embarrassments instead of rendering easier the path of reform. I have to apologise to the House for having addressed it at such a length; but I may say that from an early period I have taken a deep, though I admit, a very imperfectly informed interest in the administration of justice in the various Provinces—an interest which was naturally deepened when I was Minister of Justice, particularly with reference to the Province of Quebec, when I had occasion to meet the representatives of the Bar and Bench as I have stated, and also to deal with other matters in connection with the judiciary of that Province. I hope that the members from Quebec will not so misunderstand me as to suppose that I desire to put any undue pressure on the Local Legislature of that Province. I should resent that kind of pressure, if it were sought to be applied to the Legislature of my own Province; and I should, as I hope my hon. friends believe, equally oppose its being exercised against the Legislature of Quebec. But I think, charged as we are with the duty of creating a Judge and of fixing his salary; knowing as we do that a large portion of the laws administered by these Judges are our own laws, I think it is not out of place for us carefully to consider any proposals for additions to the judiciary of any Province, and to see whether the steps we take are really in the direction of permanent reform, or whether they are not calculated to be even palliative of the evils which it is desired to remedy.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. —There are two very distinct divisions in the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. One portion of his speech is specially directed against the resolutions before the House, and the other is a general attack upon the system of administering justice in the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman complains of the mischievous effects of a position of affairs under which we have the power to create new Judges, but have not at the same time the power of providing for their payment. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is a very good argument to ask for an amendment of our British North America Act, but it is not at all an answer to the resolution submitted by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. That Act was a compact, it was a result of a national treaty entered into by four Provinces, and cannot now be touched on the mere resolution of my hon. friend, because in its operation it may occasion some inconvenience displeasing to the hon. member for West Durham. The Constitution is so clear in its terms that it was impossible for that hon. gentleman to speak seriously against the resolutions of the hon. the Minister of Justice, according to the request of the Provincial Legislature to pay the additional Judges it deemed necessary. The hon. member for West Durham took another course which may be very clever, but it is one, according to my humble opinion—and I venture to express it most respectfully—which is not worthy of him. Instead of facing the difficulty, instead of saying to the Province of Quebec, you shall not get your Judges paid by us, he made an onslaught on the system of the judiciary in order to induce the House to refuse to pay those Judges. He says it is impossible for the Dominion Parliament to consent to pay for such a system, for such an administration, and for such Judges. I repeat that it is unworthy of my hon. friend, and ought not to be found in his mouth. Section 92 of the British North America Act, section 14, positively says:

“The administration of justice, including the construction, maintenance and authorization of the Provincial Courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, including procedure in civil matters in those Courts.”

Here is laid down the compact accepted by the four Provinces. It was accepted because they wanted security under the new system, and they agreed in thinking that the Provinces should have the absolute right of providing for the administration of justice, and that at the same time the central authority, which received large portions of the Provincial revenues, should provide for the payment and maintenance of the Courts created by the Provincial Legislatures. For this reason, a few sections later, it is provided that the Judges then acting, as well as those thereafter appointed by the central authority, should be paid by the Dominion Government. In accordance with these provisions of the Constitution the Province of Quebec introduced a Bill last Session to increase the number of Judges of the Superior Court and the Court of Queen's Bench. This is not the first time that this subject was before this House. Last Session, when the hon. the Minister of Justice introduced a similar resolution for the payment of two new Judges created by the British Columbia Legislature, there was a debate and an expression of opinion by several hon. members, and I think the principle I have stated was entirely acknowledged on both sides of the House, not only by the hon. leader of the Opposition, but by the right hon. leader of the Government. The hon. Minister of Justice, in introducing his resolution, said:

“I presume the House will feel that the Legislature of British Columbia is more competent to determine the judicial requirements of that Province in the ordinary administration of justice, than this House could possibly be. I therefore move the resolutions.”

The hon. leader of the Opposition took exception to those resolutions, and, in the course of his observations, he said:

“I quite agree that as a general rule, unless there are good reasons otherwise, great weight ought to be attached to a proposal deliberately made by a Provincial Legislature.”

The same ground was taken by the leader of the Government. Now, I would be disposed to go even further. I can understand the hon. gentleman taking such a position as this: If it appears that the Act of the Provincial Legislature creating new Courts and appointing new Judges, was passed with intent to defraud the Dominion chest, without there being any necessity for these new Courts and Judges, then this House would be justified in refusing to pay the salaries of the Judges. Did the hon. member for West Durham dare to say that the Quebec Legislature passed this law only for the purpose of extorting from the Dominion chest $10,000 a year? No. Instead of saying that, he took the ground that the Province did not need any more Judges. But the House will observe that he did not, as he did last Session, propose an amendment opposed to the sense of the resolution. He contents himself with opposing the resolution on the ground that our system is bad and that we can do without other Judges. Well, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that he acted very prudently. As I shall have occasion to show, there is a real necessity for more Judges in the Province of Quebec. We have the best authority for stating there is such a necessity. I will venture to say that though the hon. member for West Durham is very clever, very skilful, and knows everything, there are persons in Quebec who know as much about this question as he does, and perhaps more. I am glad to inform that hon. gentleman that in the Quebec Legislature we have a splendid area of talented young men, very clever and very eloquent, and many of them well versed in the hon. gentleman's own profession. That Legislature formally declared that there was necessity for a sixth Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, and for an additional Judge of the Superior Court to sit at Montreal. There was not a dissenting voice in that Legislature as to the necessity of these two new Judges. Indeed, that body was similarly unanimous on this matter in 1878-79, when party spirit ran very high in that Province. However, the necessity of appointing those new Judges was so recognised and admitted by every one on both sides of the House, that the Bills passed unanimously, as will be seen by referring to the journals. An amendment was proposed by Hon. Mr. Irvine, and at once withdrawn, after having heard the explanations of the Government. When we remember the intensity of party feeling in Quebec at the time, owing to the Letellier matter, and notice the unanimous feeling displayed respecting this measure, it must be held that its necessity was proved, and that the Province was really in need of increased judicial strength. Before coming to the details of the speech of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I desire to lay down some principles, and cite some historical facts which will enable the House better to understand the question. For many years complaints have existed in Quebec, with respect to the administration of justice. The changes were not very frequent. The first instance was in 1777, the next in 1797, which was amended and improved five or ten years afterwards. About 1845 or 1846 there was a demand in our Province for what they called at the time décentralisation judiciaire,—judicial decentralization. A great clamor was raised, and both parties in the press and on the hustings demanded this measure. Public men did not at once obey the demands and comply with the request. The question was submitted to the people, it was discussed in Parliament and elsewhere, and the result was that in 1857 there was a unanimous demand in favor of the new system—in favor of decentralization—and Sir George

Cartier, complying with that universal feeling, introduced a Bill to give effect to it. I have before me the first speech on the subject, delivered by Sir George Cartier, that great statesman, who labored earnestly for his country's welfare. In that speech, which was delivered on 23rd April, 1857, he explains why the demand of the people ought to be satisfied, and he gave a historical sketch of the various preceding systems and concluded by showing the necessity of the new system. There was in the House at the time, Hon. Mr. Dorion, now Chief Justice, Mr. Papin and all the Liberals who were elected at the general election of 1854. All those gentlemen admitted that the principle of the Bill was correct; they did not obstruct the measure; on the contrary, they assisted in amending it so as to make it as perfect as possible. So that we have, from 1845 to 1857, a unanimous feeling demanding the new system of judiciary decentralization. Well, it was quite right. There for a long time existed three districts in the whole Province, which were really kingdoms in their extent. In 1857 they were increased to eighteen or nineteen. If the House would listen to the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) and accept the lessons of his lecture, the whole Quebec system would have to be surrendered. It is, however, too well known for the Province to go back on it. I do not presume to say anything more about its character, more than that of the system of Ontario or other Provinces. So long as justice is administered by human beings it will be full of imperfections. It is so in Quebec as in the other Provinces. Our Judges are not perfect; they are not models of virtue and activity not more than we are; but on the whole our system is nearly perfect. The measure introduced by Sir George Cartier was before the House many days. Mr. Drummond, Mr. Dorion, Mr. Papin and others, unanimously acknowledged the principle of the Bill, and did not oppose but sought to perfect it. Those hon. gentlemen moved some amendments in Committee of the Whole, and most of them were accepted by Sir George Cartier with a view to perfect the Bill. The hon. gentleman quoted many figures and extracts; but there are certain principles of legislation which cannot be governed by these details. It was something like a paper in Montreal, the other day, trying to prove that we ought not to accept the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme, because by taking one dollar bills and placing them side by side, they would, to make up the cost of this railway, go around the world. The hon. gentleman seems to me to have spoken in that way. It is not by citing a number of cases that the hon. gentleman will prove to the people of Quebec that they should give up their system which is demanded by the whole population of both political parties. In listening to the hon. member for West Durham, one would imagine that the Province of Quebec was most unfortunate in its judicial system. We heard him complaining bitterly that our Judges are already too numerous. Well, if we take the census of 1871 and compare the number of Judges, according to population, in Ontario and Quebec, we shall have some startling results. The Province of Ontario, which is smaller in extent than the Province of Quebec, has 61 Judges, while Quebec, with the two new ones, will have only 34. The whole cost of the judiciary of Ontario, in round numbers, is $200,000, while the cost of the judiciary of Quebec, is $153,000, a difference of $46,000 or $47,000; but if the increases in the salaries of the Ontario County Court Judges asked for are granted, this difference will be increased to $66,000 or $67,000. Yet the hon. gentleman says that we have already too many Judges, and that this Parliament ought not to pay the salaries of these two new Judges. Now, I want to point out some of the good results obtained from the system of décentralization judiciaire. It created new opportunities for good men, who became not only good lawyers, but good public men, and good Judges. It taught the rural districts to depend on themselves. We know that if we have so many able lawyers and eminent men, it is due to our system. We know that one district in the space of fifteen years furnished one Minister, two or three members of Parliament and five Judges, one or two of whom came to Montreal and were not inferior, certainly, to the Judges taken out of the Montreal Bar. This is an illustration of the great benefit which the Province of Quebec derives from that system which the hon. member for West Durham would like to see completely abolished. As I said in the beginning, I shall not contend that everything is perfect in our Province, that nothing in the present order of things should be disturbed. If the hon. member for West Durham could have made his speech in the Quebec Parliament, it would have been better. It is not within our Province to set up those grounds, nor to refuse to pay the Judges created by the Quebec Legislature. What the hon. member for West Durham said was already said by many members of the Montreal and Quebec Bar. In no country are the litigants, lawyers and Judges all satisfied. The Judges are often inclined to think that their salaries are too low. We often receive complaints that the Judges salaries are too low, and again that they do not work enough. It has become a proverb that a lawyer should be allowed twenty-four hours to curse his Judge. There is a class of people that will always complain of a judicial system, the class of litigants who lose their cases. When a man has lost his case after appealing it from an inferior court to higher courts, and finds he has to pay costs of several hundred dollars on a case of $100, he feels inclined to curse the system, lawyers and Judges. As the hon. member for West Durham has moved no amendment to these resolutions, no doubt he acknowledges that the principle is right, that Provincial Legislatures have the right to create new Judges, and that it is our duty to provide for the payment of their salaries; so that the last part of the hon. gentleman's onslaught on our judiciary is only theoretical. He has not been very happy in the choice of his arguments. Take the Court of Queen's Bench. He quoted in great satisfaction the opinion of Mr Justice Ramsay. I had the honor to study under that Judge. He is a personal friend of mine, and a man of high culture and ability as a Judge, but that does not make him infallible. He may have committed a mistake, and his opinion in this instance has against it the decision of the Quebec Parliament, both Conservative and Liberal, in which are men of high attainments in the legal profession. This Parliament, both Rouge and Bleu, declared unanimously that the Province of Quebec required a twenty-seventh Judge of the Superior Court and the sixth Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench. Mr. Justice Ramsay argued that the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench might have done more business by having longer and increased number of terms. That was tried, and what was the result? The Chief Justice held the Criminal Court in Montreal on the 24th September last. On the 28th October that term was over, and, on the 2nd November, he began sitting in the Court of Appeal and attended it regularly until the last day of November. He then went to Quebec and sat in the Court of Appeal there from the first to the ninth of December, after which he came to Montreal when he sat in the Court of Appeal from the 11th of December to the eve of Christmas. The result was that the Chief Justice's health became nearly broken up, and it was to avoid occurrences so disastrous that the Quebec Parliament determined to increase the number of Judges. Since that time Mr. Justice Ramsay has partially changed his opinion. The hon. member for West Durham did not perhaps read the Bill when he made his speech. That Bill did not increase the number of Judges of the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal would sit as formerly with the same quorum as before; so that there is nothing changed. We have the Court of Queen's Bench sitting in appeal in civil cases and writs of error, and why is it done? Because it was impossible for the Court of Queen's Bench to hold criminal assizes in Quebec and Montreal, with eight, ten, or twelve terms of the Court of Appeal for civil cases. If we had not done so, we should have exposed the Judges to break down with excessive work. You will find nobody in Quebec, Montreal or the rural districts against that reading of the law. We desire a sixth Judge, who will be a criminal Judge to hold criminal assizes and let the other five members of the Court sit in appeal in civil cases. There would thus always be a sixth Judge of the Queen's Bench who would have the right to sit in the Court of Appeal; but the Court of Appeal would not be changed, there will always be a spare Judge to represent the others in the assizes, or the other Judges in the country when there were difficult cases. You see now how mistaken was the hon. member for West Durham in making so lengthy an attack on our judicial system and coming to such conclusions. If he had read our law very well and known our system as well as his own, he would have avoided that mistake. I speak from an experience of twenty-one years practice in the Courts of Quebec, and can say that our Superior Court Judges should not have been so denounced. He told us a long story about the action of Judge Mondelet when he was Minister of Justice. If I recollect well, the period was 176 and 1877, when our late lamented friend the Judge conceived the idea that he could not conscientiously sit in courts created by the Dominion, or try Dominion cases, and he considered that the Election Law was of this nature. This hobby or aversion also extended to the Insolvent Law. This amounted to a choking off of justice, cases accumulated, and at meetings of the Bar great complaints were made. At the time the court business required all the activity of the six Judges. The late Judge was succeeded by Judge Rainville, who fell sick at one time, when complaints and representations were sent to Ottawa to have the six Judges always available. These facts form a strong illustration of the need of a seventh Judge in Montreal. If the hon. member for West Durham had practiced there like me he would have reached a different conclusion—if he knew, for instance, that some of the Judges have twenty, fifty or even eighty cases en délibéré, he would not only say that we required a seventh Judge, but, as Judge Terrance lately said, not one but two more Judges were needed. The Superior Court of Montreal had an enormous amount of work to dispose of, it sitting from the 1st of September to the 31st December, and from the 16th January to the 7th July each year. Our Circuit Courts sit daily as do our Superior Courts, in their different branches, including Review and enquête, practise and enquête and merits, so that our six Judges are entirely incapable of accomplishing the work as required.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Mr. POPE (Compton), delivered a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

"LORNE.

"The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, copy of a minute of Council of 5th November, 1880, on the subject of assisted emigration from Ireland to Manitoba and the North-West, together with copy of the despatch from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting the same, and Lord Kimberly's answer acknowledging the receipt thereof.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 8th February, 1881."

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. Since the House rose I have prepared some statistics bearing on the subject upon which I was speaking, and I will read them to the House. The expenses of the Ontario Courts, including the Admiralty Court, is $199,069, the expenses of those of Quebec $153,291, or a difference in favor of the latter of $45,848. The proposed scheme of increasing the salaries of the County Court Judges, will involve a cost of at least $20,000. The proposed increase in the number of Judges in Quebec will involve a cost of about $10,000, so we have a total of $55,848 as the difference between the two Provinces in this respect; and I do not think it gives any reasonable ground of complaint. The hon. gentleman had only made his complaint with regard to the district of Montreal; but, on the other hand, an hon. member of this House has brought up a memorial from the counties of Chicoutimi and Saguenay, complaining that all the advantages in connection with the administration of justice go to the great centres like Montreal, to the detriment of the rural districts. The memorial states:

"Je vous dirai seulement: voyez là ce grand centre de colonisation qui y est en activité; voyez cette population de 30,000 âmes: voyez ce commerce très considérable; voyez les autorités religieuses qui y ont mis le siège d'un évêché. Avec ces faits, il n'y a pas un homme d'expérience qui ne puisse dire qu'il n'y a pas là des affaires suffisantes pour y occuper un juge qui y résiderait. Ne serait-ce pas un honneur pour un juge d'administrer la justice dans un district aussi important et de tant d'avenir, et de rivaliser de zèle avec notre digne évêque pour y remplir ses devoirs, et contribuer au bien être et à l'avancement de ce district?"

Un juge n'est pas utile seulement pour présider les termes de la cour; il a encore une foule de fonctions administratives et judiciaires très importantes à exercer en dehors des termes,—par exemple: les pouvoirs que lui donne la loi contre les détenteurs illégaux des terres dans les townships,—pour juger les requêtes en cassation de brefs de capias, ou de saisie-arrest simple,—pour donner la possession provisoire des objets saisis revendiqués,—pour le séquestre, les poursuites entre locataires et locataires,—pour la contestation de listes électorales,—pour les brefs de prérogative,—pour l'habeas corpus au civil et au criminel,—pour les compulsoirs,—pour les assemblées de parents,—pour la vente des biens des mineurs,—pour l'apposition et la levée des scellés,—pour régler les difficultés lors de la confection des inventaires, pour les enquêtes,—et pour mille autres sujets.

Voici une population de 30,000 âmes dans le district de Chicoutimi, qui est privée des secours d'un juge dans tous ces cas.

Avec un juge résident, le district de Chicoutimi aurait des termes au moins tous les deux mois; il y aurait de plus des circuits dans deux endroits du lac Saint-Jean. Je remarquerai que les plus beaux établissements du lac Saint-Jean se trouvent à 80 milles de Chicoutimi, ce dernier endroit est à 90 milles de la Malbaie, et à 150 milles de Québec. La justice y sera distribuée promptement, sans précipitation, et sagement: elle sera à la portée de tous. Les frais seront de beaucoup moins considérables. Les colons auront une plus grande protection; plusieurs d'entre eux, ne pouvant prendre possession de leurs lots à moins d'un long et ruineux procès, ont, à ma connaissance, quitté le Saguenay, et sont probablement maintenant aux Etats-Unis. Ces lots sont encore en bois debout, et appartiennent à des spéculateurs.

Je n'ai aucun doute que l'honorable procureur-général de Québec rendra justice à Chicoutimi, et, par là, secondera les efforts de M. le seigneur l'évêque de Chicoutimi pour l'avancement de ce district.

NOTE.—Le district de Montréal a une population de 210,803 âmes. Le gouvernement lui donne sept juges, soit un par 30,114 âmes.

Le district de Québec, dont la population est de 159,397 âmes, possède 4 juges, soit un juge par 39,849 âmes.

Le district de Rimouski, avec une population de 27,418 âmes—plusieurs mille âmes de moins qu'à Chicoutimi—possède un juge.

Le district de Gaspé, ayant une population de 33,652 âmes, a l'honneur d'avoir 2 juges, soit un juge par 16,826 âmes.

Les districts de Kamouraska, d'Arthabaska, de Bedford, de Beauharnois et de Saint-Hyacinthe, dont la population n'est pas beaucoup plus considérable que celle de Chicoutimi, ont chacun un juge.

Et Chicoutimi, avec une population de 30,000 âmes, qui dans cinq ans sera peut-être de 40,000 âmes, isolé, à 150 milles de Québec pour les endroits les plus près, et à 250 milles de Québec pour les établissements du lac Saint-Jean, n'a pas de juge!"

We must consider this matter from the highest point of view, and we must admit that, in order to remedy the evil complained of, it is not necessary to change a system which has operated so beneficially. I notice that the hon. member for West Durham endeavored to persuade the House that by that increase of the number of judges, and by the increase of the salaries of other judges, our conduct was clashing with our promises on the hustings, and with the blame we cast on hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. But I wish to inform him that our party is not a party of promises, and that it is a party which, when in power, is not forgetful of the promises it makes in Opposition. We never intended to decrease the salaries of the Judges or of anybody else. We are of the opinion of the electors expressed on the 17th of September, 1878, that the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they occupied the Government Benches, failed entirely in operating those economies and retrenchments which they had been promising to effect during the twenty-five or thirty years of their Opposition life. These resolutions are forced upon us by the requirements of the public interest in the Province of Quebec. That Province wants more Judges, and because she wants them well paid, other resolutions will have to be submitted with regard to the salaries of County Judges. The leader of the Opposition seems to have forgotten that there is a law passed by the Quebec Legislature to meet the very difficulty pointed out by that hon. gentleman, and which provided that assistance should be given by the country Judges to those sitting in Montreal. In 1877-78 the Quebec Legislature passed a law providing that when the judicial business of Quebec, Montreal, or any other centre, required additional judicial assistance it should be rendered by other Judges sitting in the country districts. I believe that that has operated very well, and has already remedied some of the inconveniences complained of. At one time I have seen as many as five Judges who came from the country districts to assist their brethren in Montreal. It was in carrying out that scheme that the Judge of Beauharnois was made a Judge of the district of Terrebonne. The hon. gentleman quoted this instance with much glee, supposing that the change had the effect of depriving Montreal of the judicial assistance which was available in the person of that hon. Judge. The fact is that before going into the district of Terrebonne, Mr. Justice Belanger spent a great deal of his time in rendering help to the Montreal Judges. The hon. gentleman has drawn very incorrect inferences from the superannuation of the Judges. This provision was made at a time when there were many young Judges, specially in Ontario. In Ontario there are sixty-one Judges, while in Quebec there is only one-half that number, thirty-three or thirty-four. In ten or fifteen years hence, when the young Judges of to-day will have grown old and become fatigued, they will be superannuated, and then the balance will be against Quebec. The hon. member for West Durham made a number of quotations which do not affect the case at issue. The number of litigants and of cases in the Province of Quebec at any period does not explain their increase or their decrease. The state of business, whether prosperous or depressed, generally has a controlling influence in deciding the extent of judicial business. For instance, during the existence of the Insolvency Law a great number of cases arose under the operation, but they gave but little trouble to the Judges, and took but little time in proportion to their number. That class of cases has now disappeared, but it may be followed by other cases of a civil nature, or arising under the old French law, which give vastly more occupation to the Judges. It may not be out of place for me, as many of the members of this House are unacquainted with the system of judiciary in the Province of Quebec, to give some account of the functions of our Judges. Formerly we had what were called Circuit Court Judges, but in 1857 these were made Judges of the Superior Court. Now, Circuit Court cases are adjudicated upon and disposed of by the Superior Court Judges. In Montreal there are six in number, and the Circuit Court cases they have to dispose of amount in some years to 12,000 or 15,000, and even to 18,000. That Court sits every juridical day during the month, and every month in the year except during the legal holidays from the 9th of July until the 31st of August. The business in this Court is so great that Judges from the rural districts have to come to Montreal to assist Montreal Judges. Among these

Mr. MOUSSEAU.

I may mention Judges Laframboise (who spends most of his time in Montreal), Caron, Plamondon, Sicotte, Bélanger, and sometimes Chagnon from St. Johns. In fact, there are ten or twelve Judges that come from rural districts monthly to help the Montreal Judges. Then there are the Superior Court cases, which average from 4,000 to 6,000, according to circumstances, arising from commercial conditions and other circumstances. The extent and importance of the business which come under their jurisdiction is something startling. First, there are debts which vary according to the thousands of circumstances which give rise to them. Then they have the probate of wills, inventories, tutorships, and sales of minor estates which sometimes take place in Chambers and give them a great deal of trouble.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Not to the Judges.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. Yes; to the Judges in Montreal. Those cases require much time and study. In those cases it is a question usually of selling large estates of minors, under the pretence of paying off debts, or of improving the estates. Municipal matters also come before the Judges and often occupy much time. They have also before them motions to quash writs of habeas corpus. We also go before them with contestations in respect to voters lists. School matters in various forms come before them. They have the election cases, which are not only troublesome, but lengthy, sometimes throwing the Judges into a state of exhaustion, which compels them to give up work and take two or three months rest. There have been also special cases, in Montreal especially, which have occupied much time. There have also been cases in connection with the expropriation of property for street purposes, by the Montreal municipal authorities. Then there were cases between private parties and the railway companies, some of which were so hotly contested they occupied not months, but sometimes years. Those were some of the important matters which were dealt with by the Judges of Montreal. An opinion prevailed in some quarters, that in the increase of the number of the Judges of Queen's Bench, the six Judges would have to preside in the Court of Appeal; but, as I said before recess, the sixth Judge of Queen's Bench would be to help the other five; but the Court of Appeal, which took the most important cases, would stand as before. I have read very carefully the letter written by Mr. Justice Torrance to the Minister of Justice, a short time ago. He suggests some changes; he said an increase would be necessary, but not an increase of one Judge, but of two, three or four, if we cannot secure the assistance of the country judges. All parties agree on this point, which is the important one, that the number of Judges sitting in Montreal should be increased. It had been suggested that Judges should be brought in from the rural districts to sit in Montreal. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has thought himself sufficiently wise to give advice, and to tell the Quebec Bar, Government and people what they should do. One Government has, however, anticipated him, and have declared there is no effective remedy except that of appointing two additional Judges, one to the Superior Court and the other to the Court of Appeal. The hon. leader of the Opposition has sought to discuss the question from a Quebec standpoint; but he may calm his patriotic zeal with the reflection that other people more conversant with the object are already at work; that the Judges are endeavoring to find a remedy, and the Government of Quebec have already applied a remedy. With all these persons there is combined sufficient talent to bring about a proper remedy. Some other parties hold that the number of Judges is sufficient, but that they should be compelled to reside in Montreal—that 18 or 20 should reside in that city—and that they should be sent out every three or four months into the rural districts. That remedy, I am afraid, is entirely impossible, because the judicial decentralization system has produced splendid results. The Province likes it, and there is not a single district which would be willing to lose its Judge. Not only is this the case, but because the Judge in Chicoutimi and Saguenay absented himself, the hon. member for the county was so much pressed by the electorate that he was compelled to memorialize the Quebec Government in order to compel that Judge to reside in his district. The same feeling will be found to exist in all the rural districts which have the advantage of resident Judges. Some gentlemen have suggested the establishment of County Courts and the appointment of County Court Judges, as in Ontario. To a certain extent we have those already. In each district, which is usually composed of three counties, the Judge of the Superior Court, who lives in the centre of the district, sits as a Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, in criminal matters, and holds the Superior Court every three or four months. The hon. gentleman advanced as another reason against the increase of Judges, that the number of cases for review have decreased in October, November and December. If my hon. friend knew more of legal affairs in Montreal, he would know that the cases did not decrease, but the Judges increased the days of their sittings; instead of sitting two or three days as they used to do, they sat five, six, or seven days a month, and they held an additional term in order to clear off the list. I think the hon. gentleman was unfair when he said the less work a Judge had to do, the less he would do. So far as I know, our Judges are not disposed to be idle. They all go to Montreal or Quebec to consult their brother Judges; they have their libraries, and they do a great deal of work. Some of them employ their leisure in writing books and valuable works, such as Hons. J. J. Loranger and Taschereau. My hon. friend said that in England the Judges never sit twice consecutively at the same assize. A debate which arose in this House last Session on this subject, brought out the suggestion that we should not choose a Judge for a district in which he had practised as a lawyer, or where he had social or business relations. We have suffered to some extent from that anomaly, but that does not prove that a Judge may not reside in one place for many years without injury to the cause of justice. The hon. gentleman did not say precisely in so many words, but he implied that the number of appeals coming from our courts, especially from Montreal, indicated a want of confidence in our Judges. Well, I have statistics showing that the number of appeals, compared with those from other Provinces, are not disproportionate to the number of cases; and we cannot therefore infer that our judiciary are not in possession of public confidence. In some cases there is a want of confidence which comes from the passage of an Act, of which, I think, all parties are guilty. I refer to the Act by which we divested ourselves of our jurisdiction over our own members and gave it to the regular Judges. When the similar Bill was introduced into the Imperial Parliament, the late Chief Justice of England wrote to Mr. Gladstone, who was then Prime Minister, deprecating the passage of the Bill on two grounds: first, because Parliament had no right to divest itself of one of the most sacred of its privileges, the power of declaring the disqualification of its own members; and, secondly, because the carrying out of such a law would be most detrimental to the cause of justice. You will never find the losing party satisfied. In election cases which ever party loses the case will accuse the Judge of being biassed by his political views. In other civil cases the losing party will always have some ground for complaint. Then would commence the great evil of loss of prestige, respect and esteem, which should always surround the Judges; then would be the great evil, for a good judiciary is the best bulwark of our liberties. Take away their prestige and respect and authority will disappear, and dissolution of society will set in.

I think I will not be gainsaid by anybody, when I say that if, in some parts of the country, confidence in Judges is not so great as it ought to be, it is specially due to those election cases. Now, there are statistics and comparisons which have been forgotten by the hon. member for West Durham. If, instead of studying the Official Gazette, he had taken bank returns or even the Montreal Directory, he would have seen the explanation, through the immense capital invested in Montreal, of the great number of cases in appeal, which he used as an argument against our judiciary. There is no city in the Dominion in which so large a business is transacted and so much capital invested as in Montreal. The hon. member for West Durham, full of friendship for our poor Province, which he declared to be so unfortunate in its judiciary, said that in our Courts there was much slowness. I would be quite surprised that in any place, with the same number of Judges and the same number of cases, there was less slowness. I know of another Court, created by the hon. gentlemen opposite, in which there is greater delay in giving decisions. I will finish by trying to give a lesson of modesty to the hon. member for West Durham. I shall say nothing bad against the judiciary of Ontario, though I know, perhaps, more about it than he does about the Quebec judiciary. He would have done better to have delegated his powers to the French-Canadian leader of the Province of Quebec. I think the hon. member was somewhat jealous. It appears whenever there is a new leader of the Grits he must have some kind of platform. The first one came with a standard of public morality; this leader waves the standard of judicial perfection. That perfection is, I think, impossible. I would prefer the old way of being as perfect as we can. I do not want to be understood to say, speaking as a Federal Minister, that we have no right, under any circumstances whatever, to question the advisability of a law passed by a Province to create a Judge. It is my personal opinion that when such a law as that is passed by a Local Parliament in which both parties agree, after full debate, on the necessity of the creation of the new Judge, we would assume a dangerous authority by refusing such a demand. In this case what the hon. member said is a corroboration of the wisdom of the Quebec Parliament in its action. All are agreed that there ought to be more Judges in Montreal. I am sure, if any remedy is required, the Quebec Parliament will take the means to find it out. I beg, therefore, to give my support to the resolution.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). I have listened with much pleasure to the brilliant address which has been delivered by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I as a member of the Province of Quebec, and as a member of the Montreal Bar, think the Province of Quebec owes its thanks to the hon. gentleman for the accurate manner in which he has presented his case; a manner, I believe, which is worthy of the admiration of the most severe member of the Quebec Bar. We owe him thanks also for having brought to the discussion a broad, liberal spirit. In my humble estimation he has shown himself not only an able lawyer but also a true lover of justice. This is not a party question, and I was glad to see the hon. gentleman treat it not from a party point of view. So, in 1857, when this question of the decentralization of the administration of justice in Quebec, came before the Canadian Parliament, we saw both political parties united in forming what was considered at the time as the best measure to promote the administration of justice in that Province, and to-day we are examining, not the question of a few thousand dollars for the salary of a sixth or seventh Judge in Montreal, but a more important question than that—the whole system of judicial affairs as it has existed for some twenty years. It is best that this question should be considered only in the light of the interests of our Province. I believe I am not exaggerating in stating that in it there is in my Province a great deal of dissatisfaction over the administration of justice, which does not, however, go so far up as the personnel of our Judges. Most of them, no doubt, are men of great learning and hard workers, although both political parties have been too often controlled by political exigencies in the selection of judges to make room for unfortunate, perhaps useless, politicians. It is, perhaps, also due to that cause that we find so many Judges on the pension list. Another cause may be that our Judges work too hard for too small salaries—I am referring to the districts of Quebec and Montreal where living is very expensive; and, of course, being entitled to a pension after ten years service of two-thirds of their salary, they asked for it not as a matter of discretion, but of right, preferring to retire to private life to killing themselves on the Bench, and even to practice as avocat consultant. I was very glad to hear the member for West Durham eulogizing our civil code. As a student of the Roman law, as a chancery lawyer, he had occasion during his professional career to admire the great principles of that law which is the basis of our civil code, of which our Province is justly proud. But I must say, as a member of the Bar of Quebec, I am not as great an admirer of our code of civil procedure. It was based no doubt on an ordinance great for its time, that of 1667, and also upon the commentaries of an old commentator on that ordinance, Pigeau, but those rules of procedure, correct no doubt 200 years ago in a community not commercial, cannot so well apply to a community like ours. I subscribe also to the remarks of the member for West Durham, that we can with great advantage borrow, from Ontario and other Provinces, measures which would be an improvement to our rules of procedure. In examining this question we can only make suggestions. Our jurisdiction in this Parliament is very limited under the British North America Act. We have only the power to appoint Judges and provide for their salary; the organization and maintenance of the Provincial Courts are left altogether to the Provincial Legislature, so that we have to act but as an executive body to carry out their wishes; we are almost in the position of a banker against whom a depositor draws for funds; we must honor their cheques. But at the same time it cannot be denied that if we must grant the salaries of judges, we have the right to offer suggestions without unduly interfering with their functions, and the more that they would come from a very disinterested body. The whole difficulty is not, in my opinion, the nomination of a seventh Judge, who must be appointed at any rate, as he is needed in the district of Montreal; but before two or three years the same need will be felt again, as the system is bad. The decentralization of justice, which was much needed in 1857, does not now exist to the same extent. In 1857 the Province of Quebec was traversed only by one railway, from the western frontier to the Eastern Townships, the Grand Trunk, when the means of connection with the large centres was very difficult to the rear districts. People residing some thirty, forty, or fifty miles from Montreal had to take two days to reach that city and then decentralization was necessary. But to-day the whole Province is covered with railways. St. Lin, for instance, which belongs to the district of Terrebonne, has more easy communication with Montreal than with the chef lieu. We might say the same of Joliette, and many other districts. The question is not to abolish the decentralization of justice, but to modify and reform it. In 1857 we had seven judicial districts, Montreal, Quebec, Sherbrooke, Three Rivers, Ottawa, Kamouraska, and Gaspé. Cases were then decided by three Judges; appeals were less numerous than to-day considering the amount of population, and for the simple reason that the decision by those three Judges satisfied the public. In 1857 the whole Province was divided into twenty judicial districts. A Superior Court composed of about eighteen or twenty Judges was created. It was to be presided over by one Judge. Montmagny, Beauce and Chicoutimi were not provided with Judges. Since 1870 a Judge was added to the number at Montreal, making a quorum of five, and in 1871 another was added, and another in 1872, when the Superior Court Judges were increased to twenty-six. Appeals had to be granted in consequence of those decisions being rendered by one Judge only, and the Court of Review was established to consider his decisions. We have also a Court of Appeal composed of five Judges. The leader of the Opposition made a slight mistake in mentioning the jurisdiction of the stipendiary magistracy. It has been abolished, there being now, perhaps, only four such magistrates left, who serve in very remote districts. With regard to the effects of this decentralization, I think it is important to look at the figures, for I do not agree with the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Mousseau) that figures mean nothing; on the contrary, I think they mean a great deal, and I believe in them. I shall read a few statistics from a valuable manual compiled by a very careful lawyer in Montreal, Mr. Pagnuelo, which go to show that many of these judicial districts are not now needed if they ever were needed. I shall not give those cases which go by default, because, as hon. gentlemen know, under our code these cases can be settled by the Prothonotary or the Clerk of the Court, and I shall also confine myself to Superior Court cases. In Arthabaska, in 1877, there were thirty-eight cases; in 1877, twenty-nine, in 1879, forty-eight. In Beauce, forty-eight in 1877, twenty-six in 1878, and twelve in 1879; in Beauharnois, twelve in 1877, twenty-seven in 1878, and sixteen in 1879. In Bedford, in 1877, forty-eight; in 1878, forty-seven, and in 1879, seventy. In Chicoutimi, in 1877, there were no contested cases; in 1878, one, and in 1879, fifteen.

Mr. CIMON said the report of the prothonotary for Chicoutimi had not been received and consequently the figures did not appear.

Mr. GIROUARD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman himself will give us the figures. They cannot be very large at all events, seeing there was only one case in 1878. In Gaspé, which is composed of two counties and has two Judges, there was in 1877 only one case; in 1878, one, and in 1879, five. In Bonaventure there was not a single case either in 1877, 1878, or 1879. In Iberville, in 1877, there was twenty-one cases; in 1879, twenty-four; and in 1879, thirty-four. In Joliette there were five in 1877; eight in 1878; and sixteen in 1879. In Kamouraska twenty-nine in 1877; forty-seven in 1878, and twenty-nine in 1879. In Rimouski nineteen in 1877; six in 1878, and nineteen in 1879. In Montmagny there were eleven in 1877; twenty-six in 1870, and thirty-three in 1879. In Montreal there were 952 in 1877; 890 in 1878, and 860 in 1879. The hon. leader of the Opposition said there had been a decrease in business in Montreal; this is true. This fact was the consequence of the repeal of the Insolvent Acts, and, secondly, of the increased prosperity of the country—the result of the National Policy. But this decrease consists only of collection cases which were contested only for delay, and do not in the slightest degree affect the burden of the work of the Judges. If we look at the figures for the Court of Revision we will find that it is a very important element in the judicial business of that district. In 1877 there were 166 cases; in 1878, 156, and in 1879, 149. It is quite clear from these figures that several of those Judges who reside in the country districts might be brought back to Montreal and Quebec to help their contreres in those cities without doing any injury to the rural districts. The consequence of having only one Judge to preside in trials has been that an enormous number of appeals have been taken. From statistics published in Mr. Pagnuelo's manual I find that the per centage of appeals to the total number of cases in the Superior Court is about 19. The learned gentleman gives the percentage of appeals in other countries, and his statements on that point are very instructive. In Geneva the percentage of appeals was 7 from 1817 to 1835; and in 1865 the percentage was 10. In France, from 1841 to 1845, the percentage was 15; in 1846, 14 per cent.; in 1847 13; in 1849 12 per cent., and from 1866 to 1870, 11 per cent. The reason they are so low in that country is simply that decisions are not rendered by one Judge but by two or three. In the Dutch States the percentage of appeals is 7½; in England, 8. My hon. friend from West Durham said that perhaps the large number of appeals in our Province was due to the character of the French race, and he mentioned to the House the dictum of a French monarch who said the French were so fond of war that in days of peace they went to law with one another. This reproach has been answered by Mr. Pagnuelo, who says that statistics show that in the Province of Quebec the English population is as fond of litigation as the French. It is a fact that in proportion to their numbers more law suits are taken by the English population than by the French. Several remedies have been suggested for the crowded state of the judicial business in the district of Montreal. Mr. Pagnuelo, who has given a great deal of attention to the subject, has suggested that a law should be passed by the Local Legislature providing that a certain number of Judges should live in Montreal, to act there, and at the same time to go into the country districts when required. I will not undertake to suggest the proper remedy, but it is evident that the present system is bad, and the consequence is the justice is badly administered and gives general dissatisfaction to the people of that Province. Something must be done. The whole system must be remodelled, so as to render necessary the decisions of our Courts by three Judges, instead of one. The hon. leader of the Opposition has quoted from papers which have been laid upon the Table of this House from time to time, containing suggestions made by the Judges and Bar of Montreal. In 1877 a demand was made for a Judge in Insolvency, and it was meant that he should be in addition to those already appointed. It was then represented by Mr. Justice Johnson, Mr. Justice Mackay, Mr. Justice Torrance, Mr. Justice A. Dorion, and Mr. Justice Papineau :

"That the exigencies of the administration of justice in the district of Montreal urgently require that the Judges in charge of that district should have additional aid in the performance of their duties, and further representing that such aid would be materially supplied by the appointment of a special Judge in Insolvency for the district of Montreal."

At that time the Judges felt that the appointment of an additional Judge was necessary to the efficient conduct of the business of the Insolvency Court. But notwithstanding the repeal of the Insolvency Law, the business of the Montreal Courts is so enormous that the administration of justice really suffers for the want of additional Judges. For instance, let us take the Chamber business which is a very important element in the administration of justice. That business in Montreal is done from half-past ten o'clock to eleven, and the Judge who sits in Chambers is obliged to take possession of a Court which is known as the Third Division, sitting from eleven to four o'clock. Between those hours it is frequently impossible for members of the Bar to have access to the Judge in Chambers. Sometimes they must wait with their clients for hours to the serious inconvenience, and sometimes the serious loss of the litigants. We all know that these matters in Chamber require to be conducted with celerity, and it is important that the Judge should be accessible at all business hours. For that reason alone it is evident that a nomination of a seventh Judge is necessary. It is true that Judges come from the country districts to the assistance of the Montreal Judges, but suppose one of them, through illness or any other uncontrollable cause, is not able to attend, what is the consequence? Parties are there with their witnesses but cannot be heard for want of a Judge. Cases of that kind happen too often. One word about the Court of Queen's Bench. The hon. member for West Durham has quoted Mr. Justice Ramsay, who is of opinion that four Judges will be sufficient to do the business of that Court, leaving the fifth Judge to attend to the criminal business. As a member of the Montreal Bar, I am personally aware that lawyers and litigants object to submit their cases to four Judges. They do not like to run the risk of the inconvenience and expense of a rehearing. They want the deliberations of the full Court, being confident that their cases will be better examined and decided. I know that is the public feeling in Montreal, and in the Court of Appeals the lawyers generally refuse to submit their cases to four Judges. The nomination therefore of a sixth Judge is a necessity. The Hon. Justice Ramsay suggests another mode of clearing the roll of the Court of Appeals, which is always crowded. He suggests that it should sit from day to day until the business of the Court is exhausted. This plan has been adopted, and the Court of Appeals sat from the 1st of November last until about the 23rd, and then adjourned to Quebec to hold the term there. On the 11th of December it came back to Montreal and sat until Christmas. That Court is now sitting and has been for the last fifteen days, and, strange to say, the roll seems to be just as crowded to-day as it was the first day they sat in November. After this month it will be impossible for that Court to sit again till next May, because one Judge of that Court is bound to sit in the Criminal Court from the 24th of March; and unless we provide for the salary of a seventh Judge, and permit that Court to sit from day to day until the business is exhausted, it will be impossible to do justice to the claimants and to the rights of the population of Montreal. I hope every member from Quebec will express his views upon this subject. I believe I am expressing the general opinion in that Province that there is a desire not only for a better administration of justice but also to decrease the expenditure of the Province, that the administration of justice should be modified and remodelled. The reason why we have not been able hitherto to do it is owing to the weakness of the succeeding Local Governments in Quebec. They cannot pass a Bill of that kind without exciting local opposition from country members. But here we have no such political complications. A Government with a majority of eighty at its back can well afford a free discussion on this important subject, especially as the hon. leader of the Opposition has placed the question on such a broad and liberal basis, and has removed from the region of party politics. I say that every member from the Province of Quebec should impress upon the public of that Province the importance of having their system of judicial procedure remodelled. We should bring back the country Judges, and set them at work in Montreal or other large centres where there is so much work to be done, which would not only be for the good of the people, but also for their own good.

Mr. CIMON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I should address this House, for I feel some hesitation in doing so, after what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). I am but a country lawyer, practising in a district wherein, as has been said by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, there has been but a single case of litigation in 1877, and none in the year following. I must therefore be but a half-starved, hungry and thirsty lawyer. Another reason causes me to tremble, and it is, that the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), who has spoken this afternoon, has drawn so sad a picture of an educated man residing in the country, that really I feel somewhat ashamed at finding myself this evening in a House composed of so many intelligent men. The hon. member for West Durham has said: "Why appoint a Judge in the country? Why withdraw him from the city? There is not an educated man in the country! His intellectual powers will wane! His knowledge of things will diminish! He will fast become an incompetent Judge, intellectually and otherwise. Therefore it is better that Judges should not be allowed to reside in the country;” and the expression used by the hon. member in this connection was, that in the country, a man’s intelligence got rusty, and that in this case the man who lost his intelligence was a Judge. Verily do I regret the conduct of some Judges in the rural districts of Lower Canada, especially in the country below Quebec, which conduct justifies what the hon. member has said. I regret that the Judges appointed by the Federal Government, and who are compelled by a local enactment to reside in their districts—I regret, I say, that they should take the liberty of leaving the country and residing in town; they thus give cause to the hon. member for Durham’s assertions. But because the Judges do not perform their duties, because they act contrary to law, because these Judges neglect the administration of justice in the places where they are bound to, it does not follow that such administration should cease to become necessary. More remains to be said. What is the conduct of those Judges who should remain in their districts? They take up their residence in the district of Montreal. With the system which they have adopted of preventing the transaction of business in the rural districts, there is nothing to be surprised at if that business should be so small; especially when one sees a Judge, who lives in the district of Montreal, and who should be residing 500 miles further off, in the district of Gaspé, on learning that proceedings have been instituted in his district, hastens to send money to the plaintiff in order to avoid going down to his district. I maintain that with such a system there is no cause for surprise at the cases in rural districts being but few, nor is there anything to be surprised at that one should hear the hon. member from Jacques Cartier exclaim that the Judges should be made to return to town from the country. But, Mr. Speaker, was the hon. member for West Durham thinking of his friend, who sits so closely to him, when he spoke as he did this afternoon in this House? Was he thinking of the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), who resides in the county of Arthabaska, who practises in that county, and who has become the French-Canadian leader of the Liberal party in this House? Was he thinking also of one who was for a long time the leader of the Liberal party, and whom Providence has just been pleased to call from amidst us? Was he thinking of the Hon. Mr. Letellier, who was looked upon by the Liberal party as a man of great intellectual powers, which fact I do not dispute, and who was a highly-educated man? And where did that man cultivate his mind? Whence did he derive his talents? Why, in the country, in the district of Kamouraska. Many others are there who have distinguished themselves at the bar, in politics, in all the other professions and positions of life in the country; men who were in the first rank, and whence did they come? Why, from the country. I remember, Mr. Speaker, a name illustrious in Lower Canada, a name that is recalled to the mind with reverence, and before which all bow, that of Sir Etienne Pascal Taché, who was the leader of all Canada for a number of years. Whence had he derived all his knowledge, and where did he develop that high intelligence so characteristic of him? In the county of Montmagny. I might quote a number of other instances. I might even name a number of lawyers practising in country districts. I might name the lawyers of the Eastern Townships and of the district of St. Hyacinthe who sit in this House, and I would ask the hon. member for Jacques Cartier if they are deficient in intelligence. Why then, Mr. Speaker, deprive the country districts of a Judge? By depriving them of a Judge, you deprive them of the members of the Bar, of a prothonotary, of a number of educated men, who, on the administration of justice being centralized, will leave the country because they will not be able to make a living there. One must not imagine that the country populations are void of intellect and education, and that it is a disgrace to live amongst them. The decentralization of justice has been considered a great advantage, because it has encouraged many to have higher aspirations, and has given them the chance of making their mark. A number of young men have gone into country districts, where they have succeeded in building up a practice, and in developing their intelligence; a thing they could never have done in a crowded centre, and where they would have been lost among the large number of members of their profession. Where did these young men develop their intelligence? In the country districts, whilst pleading in the presence of the educated and intelligent Judges appointed to administer justice in those districts. I pretend that judicial decentralization has encouraged education in the country, has developed our country districts, and has aided in more rapidly spreading immigration into Lower Canada, for it is an encouragement to educated persons to go and settle in the country; and when there are ten, fifteen or twenty educated persons in a district, they necessarily dwell among the people, and accustom them to politics; and thus it is, Mr. Speaker, that, to-day, the population of Lower Canada is educated, and that it is acquainted with everything that goes on in Canada, and in the world. But, Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why it is that the hon. member for Durham has risen this afternoon to oppose the resolutions proposed by the Government. I do not see why it is that he has seized this opportunity of lecturing the Province of Quebec and its Legislature; and I fail to see why the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who should be jealous of the rights of his Province and of its independence, opposes the Federal Government, and joins issue with the hon. member for Durham on this occasion. The latter has said: “It is we who pay the Judges, therefore we have the right of giving advice to the Quebec Legislature; we have the right to say: ‘We are going to suspend the salaries of these Judges until such times as the Local Legislature shall coincide with our views.’” And how much farther has he gone from that point? Even to speaking of the Civil Procedure, which does not in the least concern the Federal Government, but which belongs to the Province of Quebec; even to give the hon. members of the Local Legislature a lecture on Procedure; even to say to them: “You must amend the Code of Procedure; you must expunge the exceptions to the form, dilatory exceptions, and many other things that exist in your Rules of Procedure; and, until this is done, we are going to suspend the salaries of your Judges.” With such a system, with such logic, Local Legislatures lose their independence; they become the mere instruments of the Federal Government; for at any time it may say: “We are going to stop your supplies, because you are doing what does not please us.” I am, therefore, pained to see the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who should be jealous of the liberty of his Province—for we, members of the Province of Quebec, should be more jealous of the liberty of our Province than the hon. members of the other Provinces—I am pained, I repeat, to see that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier should have embraced the views of the hon. member for West Durham, and I say that both have displayed a want of logic in the profound speeches delivered by them in this House. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier wishes to bring all the Judges to town. The reason is easily understood. The hon. gentleman resides in Montreal, where he has his practice, and naturally he would gladly see business increase in the city of Montreal. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier would like to see, besides the two or three thousand cases which come before the Superior Court every year, all those also that are taken up in the rural districts; it would increase his practice. There is assuredly nothing to be astonished at that the lawyers of the city of Montreal should be in favor of judicial centralization. I will thank, in a special manner, the hon. President of the Privy Council, who is a Montreal lawyer, for having treated this subject from a broader point of view than a sectional one, for having done justice to the country districts, and for not having shown the egotism displayed by his confrères whose practice is in cities. We must consider that there was another reason for this judicial decentralization, and it is that when it was brought about, it was in order to bring justice within the reach of those requiring it. The Province of Quebec is one of great extent, and the cities of Montreal and Quebec cannot pretend to constitute the whole Province. There is, for instance, the district of Chicoutimi, which is at least 200 miles from Quebec; we have no railways to communicate with the city of Quebec, which we can only reach when navigation is open. Well, Sir, at Chicoutimi there is at present a population of 30,000 or 40,000 souls; much activity reigns there, and there are many cases, yet there is not any Judge. When it is necessary to institute proceedings, when the authority of a Judge is required, one is obliged to go to Quebec, 200 miles distant, and to go thither it takes three days, and three days to return. I say, therefore, that it is unjust that the residents of the district of Chicoutimi, requiring the authority of a Judge, should have to travel to Quebec to ask for it. It has been said that there are not many cases in the country districts, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has quoted statistics. The hon. member found it an easy task to quote statistics, but he did not take the trouble of looking up the official statistics, of turning over the leaves of the Official Gazette in the Library. He contented himself with using a tabulated statement, taken from a book published by a member of the Montreal Bar. I say that those statistics, in so far as the district of Chicoutimi is concerned, are totally incorrect and incomplete. I cannot give the exact figure of the number of cases in the district of Chicoutimi, because they are not at hand; but I reside in that district, I am cognizant of what takes place there, and I will give the number of proceedings instituted in the Court of Chicoutimi. In the city of Chicoutimi there are generally 600 or 700 Circuit Court cases taken up per annum. There is a Circuit Court at d'Hébertville, 18 miles from Chicoutimi, where about 200 cases are taken up per annum. Here there are about 900 Circuit Court cases in the county of Chicoutimi alone. In the Superior Court at Chicoutimi there are generally about 35 to 45 cases a year. Thereto must be added a like number of Circuit Court cases in appeal, and which in Montreal come within the jurisdiction of the Superior Court. Moreover, there are all the incidental proceedings which occur at Chicoutimi as well as elsewhere, and which are considerable. There are likewise, as well as elsewhere, divided opinions as to the validity of municipal elections; often, as well as elsewhere, there are divided opinions as to the validity of electoral lists. Well, it is impossible for us to control municipal elections, or to control electoral lists, for in order to do that we should have to go to a Judge residing in Quebec. The Judge visits us three times a year, for it is but a visit that he pays us; he calls upon us at the end of May, in October and in January; each time he remains at most ten days, or in other words, there are but thirty days in the whole year, when we have the opportunity of having recourse to the authority of a Judge. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has said that the Montreal Judges are far more occupied, that they have much business in chambers, that there are a thousand proceedings to be carried on in chambers. "If," says he, "an application to quash a capias has to be made it is necessary to make application to a Judge in chambers, and the Judges are busy from morning to night; therefore another Judge is required in Montreal." I would ask the hon. member for Jacques Cartier how he can expect that we should have chamber business in Chicoutimi, when there is not any Judge? I do not blame the Judge; the law has only appointed three terms for him; the proclamation, which fixes three terms only for the district of Chicoutimi, dates as far back as 1857, and the Judge holds these terms regularly. Justice is well administered by him; his honesty and integrity are above suspicion; he is a man who does honor to his position; he is a man whom we like and whom we would like to see among us. We hold him in such high esteem that we would like to have him amongst us from year's end to year's end. I will give a case in point. Let us suppose that three months before the term, three months consequently before a Judge is to be had, unscrupulous litigants—and there are such men—put their heads together and say: "The Judge cannot be with us for another three months; let us take out a capias against our debtor and put him in prison. Sooner than remain therein three months he will give up his goods to us; he will give us his horse, his cow, and his other goods; he will prefer to surrender them to remaining in prison." In this way do unscrupulous creditors collect their debts. Were a Judge present, and were an application made to him, the debtor would get justice. But there is more than that. There is that class of plaintiffs who have doubtful debts. What is their conduct? Well, two or three months before the term, knowing that it is impossible for the debtor to obtain justice, they will take out a saisie-arret before judgment; they will seize all his goods, they will even seize the goods that are exempt from seizure according to law, such as his horse and his cow; they will take his chattels and will appoint a guardian who is their friend, and the unfortunate debtor will give up to them his horse and his other goods to get back his cow, which is the only support of his children. And thus does one say that there is no business in those districts. I am going to mention a number of instances where the presence of a Judge is required. A Judge, Mr. Speaker, is required not only to preside at terms, but he has, moreover, to fulfil a number of administrative and judicial duties out of term. I will mention, for instance, the power conferred on him by law in the case of those unlawfully holding lands in the township; in the case of judgments on applications to quash writs of capias or of saisie-arret simple; in that of giving provisional possession of chattels seized and revendicated, in that of sequestration, in that of suits between landlord and tenant, in that of contested election lists, in that of writs of prerogative, in that of civil and criminal cases of habeas corpus, in that of compulsories, in that of family councils, in that of the sale of minors' effects, in that of the application and removal of seals, in that of settling disputes in the making out of inventories, in that of enquêtes, and in that of a thousand other things. And here is a population of from 30,000 to 40,000 souls, in the district of Chicoutimi, which is deprived of the assistance of a Judge in all those cases. And, after all that, people will say with the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that it is necessary to recall the Judges to town. More remains to be said. I will now take up the contested cases, and will show the enormous injustice arising from the present state of things in the district of Chicoutimi, and all because judicial decentralization is not complete. We have a term three times a year: six days of Circuit Court, six days of Superior Court. Generally speaking, it is impossible for us to proceed with the preliminary investigation in cases contested in the Superior Court otherwise than before a Judge. What follows? Why, that a case is entered for enquête and for examination on its merits, the Judge arrives, the term commences, it is the first case on the list, a large number of witnesses are called, the enquête is commenced in the morning and is continued all day and the next and so on for the next six days.

During the whole of the term this case has stopped all the others because it was the first on the list, and that the parties were going on with the enquête. I will appeal to my hon. confrères of the Bar. They know how long an enquête lasts, when there is a number of witnesses; they know that six, or even twelve, days do not represent much time, for they know that an enquête sometimes takes twenty-four and even thirty days before it is closed. Here is, therefore, a single case, which may have taken up the time of the Court for two years, and during all that time, all contested cases are standing over; at each term witnesses have to be called, so that the case shall not go by default, and the term is closed without there having been any possibility of going on with the proceedings. That is the kind of justice we have at Chicoutimi. Once more, this is not the fault of the Judge; he does his duty; it is the fault of the system. There should be a Judge at Chicoutimi, and a Judge at La Beauce; they are now the only two districts that do not possess a resident Judge. I will now, Mr. Speaker, apologize to the House for having taken the liberty of addressing it for so long a time. I beg its pardon, I, from the country, a poorly-educated, not very intelligent man, whose intelligence has grown somewhat rusty after but nine years of practice, for having dared to address an assembly composed of men as intelligent and as educated as those who constitute the present House.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Before this motion is passed, I should like to make a few remarks. It may seem presumptuous on my part, after the speech that has just been delivered by the hon. member for West Durham, to make these remarks, but I am encouraged after hearing the speech of the hon. President of the Council—

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The Archbishop of Saragossa.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, I think the Archbishop of Saragossa is beginning to spin out his homilies, and it is time Gil Blas should be behind him to make him cut them shorter. To come back to the question before us, I say that it simply amounts to this: Is it urgent to appoint a Judge in Montreal on the request that has been made us by the Quebec Legislature? I am given to understand that the lists have for some time past been more than full, but I see to-day that these lists are far less so, especially since we sent to Montreal Judge Caron, who has despatched business with a promptitude unknown until then, and I think we could dispense with appointing another Judge. There is no doubt but that the judicial system of the Province of Quebec, i.e., the form of procedure in vogue is excessively long, that it is the cause of delays detrimental to the interests of the public; under it there are cases pending before the tribunals for years and years, and I could mention a number of such. I do not wish to take up the time of the House in naming any particular cases, but I assert as a fact that there is to-day, spread throughout the whole Province of Quebec, a desire, a wish, a feeling that it is necessary to adopt a Code of Procedure entirely different from our present one, and I think we should have had it a long time ago, had we but taken pains to give satisfaction to the wants and wishes of the population. I must tell the House that about two years ago a new system, likely to abridge the length and shorten the delays of the present Procedure was prepared, but the Attorney-General of the day, Mr. David Ross, went out of office, and was thus unable to accomplish the task he had set himself. I hear that to day the Attorney-General for the Province of Quebec has expressed his intention of substituting a system for this one, and it is even said that he would wish to adopt for the Province of Quebec the Code of Procedure in use in the State of New York. That would be making a grand move in the right direction. For a number of years we have been floundering about in our old system of Procedure, which goes back two hundred years -- to that of Pigeau. In these days

we do not live as we did two hundred years ago; now that we have such rapid means of transit, we live in a year what we formerly lived in twelve. We wish to expedite business considerably; we want to go into a court of justice as into a bank and say: "There is so much coming to me and I want it." It is all very well to laugh about it, but in the Province of Quebec we have fallen even behind the old French Procedure. In those days, one said to one's debtor: "Pay me what thou owest," and one could get out one's execution in a moment. Nowadays, in the case of a debt for a determined amount, one has to ask the Clerk of the Court for a summons enjoining upon the party to appear at such a date; then there are eight days to file a plea, another eight days to appear, two days to inscribe for enquête, and when, after all this a judgment has been obtained, one has to wait another fifteen days before taking out an execution. As a consequence, persons having claims dare not press them before the tribunals, but prefer making large sacrifices. Such a system is defective. In holding Circuits, the facility there is of approaching the places where they are held should be taken into consideration. The Clerk of the Court of Louisiana explained to me once the manner adopted in that State for following circuits and administering justice; it was by following the line of railways. There is another great disadvantage in allowing Judges to reside in the country. It is said, with some show of reason; that the Judges get "rusty" in the country; no one will deny it. There is a very good reason for this, and it is that Judges and lawyers cannot in the country enjoy the advantages which they derive from libraries to be found in cities. What a lawyer residing in the country earns for three, four, or even ten years will not suffice to build up a library. Young men living in the country have not the means of buying books, and this is an important point if one does not wish to get absolutely "rusty." In order to give another idea of the judicial system such as it exists to-day in the Province of Quebec, I desire to call attention to the number of jurisdictions within the Province of Quebec, and I would ask the hon. President of the Council if he can point out to me the number of jurisdictions in the Province of Quebec; meanwhile, in order to edify him and the Bar, I will proceed to enumerate those tribunals whose decisions are final and executory. There is, in the first place, the Court of Commissioners, Justices of the Peace for rural wants, Stipendiary Magistrates in certain localities, Circuit, Superior, Revision, Appeal and Supreme Courts, and the Privy Council. There are the various stages of appeal in these courts; so that one may, so to speak, start on a round from the Circuit Court and reach the Privy Council, or, in other words, pass through seven or eight different courts. Is that the judicial system of a civilized country? In criminal jurisdiction, there are the Quarter Sessions, the Criminal Court, presided over by a Judge of the Superior Court, the Court of Queen's Bench in ordinary session, the Court of Queen's Bench sitting in Error, the Police Court, the Recorder's Court, in Quebec the Admiralty Court, the Trinity Board in Quebec for the harbor trade; Commissioners who tax property for the erection of churches and the priests' houses, and whose judgments are executory; official Arbitrators for the Dominion; one has also an appeal from the whole of the Arbitrators, an Election Court, a Court of Exchequer, and, lastly, you are going to have a Railway Commission. Well, this makes twenty-three jurisdictions for the Province of Quebec. Is this not an enormous abuse? One would imagine that three or four jurisdictions would suffice for any civilized country. If I make these remarks, it is to show that it is of the most absolute and immediate necessity that some reform should be introduced in the system of the procedure of the Province of Quebec, and to point out that because a system is bad, one ought not to make the Dominion bear a burden easily avoided if one would but reform existing abuses. The President of the Council was just saying that as the Province of Ontario spends $200,000, the Province of Quebec may well spend $150,000. I do not think that is a suitable way of reasoning. It is as if man and wife, common as to property, should each spend their share; the consequence would be that the whole of their property would soon disappear. If one acts on that principle, it is certain that it will not take long to exhaust the public Treasury. I do not think that such an argument will meet with the approval either of the House or of the country. The system of judicial decentralization, which it was sought to bring about in 1857, might, up to certain point, have had its raison d'être. There were, certainly, at that time a few abuses, but matters were pushed too far; more districts were created than were necessary; the population has not increased in the same ratio as the districts created, and the consequence is that, from a judicial point of view, the districts have not done anything. I think, therefore, that it is necessary to remodel the districts, to enlarge those which are easy of access by rail, and to give those which are deprived of facilities of communication, such as the Magdalen Islands and Labrador, a special jurisdiction. I do not think if we seek to bury educated and able Judges in the country, at a salary of $3,200 per annum, that competent men will accept the position. Another abuse to which I would draw the attention of this House—and in doing so my words may possibly reach the members of the Quebec Government—is, that the judicial system should be immediately so amended as to ensure the prompt distribution of moneys by justice. In the Province of Quebec, there is the Registrar's certificate created, it would seem, purposely to prevent people from being paid; it is one of the greatest abuses that have come to my knowledge, in the system that I am complaining about to-day. It is not astonishing that this abuse should exist, for the system in vogue is in direct violation of the elementary principles of law; for the Registrar's certificate represents the rights of those who will not look after their own interests. As matters exist to-day, one cannot obtain this distribution through the tribunals, until one has done away with claims that have no real existence, or which delay those persons interested in the case.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt but that one of the greatest faults committed by the Liberal party was the desperate struggle they made for the abolition of dual representation. If dual representation existed to-day, the Province of Quebec would greatly profit thereby, and the voice, whose melodious notes we have heard this evening, would not be obliged to invoke the echoes, for it would itself resound powerful and persuasive in the legislative halls of the Province of Quebec. If here, in Ottawa, the hon. member for L'Islet cannot, in spite of the trouble he gives himself, palm himself off as the leader of his party, at least, in the city of Quebec, he would shine. Who has not read the words of the poet:

"Tel brille au second rang qui s'éclipse au premier."

After having heard the hon. member for L'Islet, one is at a loss to know whether the complaint he has just made against the administration of justice in the Province of Quebec is of recent date or not. No, Sir, he has taken us two hundred years back, probably to the days when his ancestors came to the country, when the Province of Quebec was first open to colonization. In those days, it would seem, the administration of justice gave rise to the inconveniences which the hon. member has just mentioned. But if these inconveniences are so numerous, why did not the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, and which was some time in power in Quebec and here in Ottawa—why did not this party remedy the evil? No, Sir; in those days, instead of diminishing the number of Judges, more were appointed. In those days the hon. member for L'Islet was in the House, and when his party appointed Judges in different districts—at Quebec and at Arthabaska—he clapped his hands. And by his position in this House, and by the support that he gave the Government of the day, he approved unreservedly what he now condemns. The hon. member hopes that echo will carry his voice into the Province of Quebec. But it will only be the echo of an echo, for he is only himself the echo of the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition; and willingly he reports, after his leader, that our country Judges should naturally grow rusty by their contact with the population among which they live. And why? "Because," says he, "there are no libraries in the rural districts." Oh! what a fine discovery! Sir, without wishing to at all play upon words, I would say that if these gentlemen grow rusty when they go to live in the country, it is probably because they are iron-shod with regard to law, (bien ferrés sur le droit), for rust has no hold except on iron. That is the only way to answer the artless pretensions of the hon. member for L'Islet, who surely never found in a library the weak reasoning he brings forward in support of his thesis. And what does he next say? After this very grave charge brought against our country Judges, the hon. member attacks our whole judicial system. For the requirements of the case, he raises with great pain a special structure which he calls "jurisdiction;" then he comes and leads us to the entrance of this new building, and invites us to visit this enchanted palace which he drags along after him. He begins by the first flat: there we find the Commissioners Courts, from there he goes up to the Justices of the Peace, from there he ascends to the District Magistrates, to the Circuit Court, to the Supreme Court, and from story to story, he takes us up to the twenty-third story which is the crowning part of his structure, and this story, which is a splendid cupola, he calls the Privy Council, I think, but he means the Supreme Court. Is he not wrong, Sir, to show us the Supreme Court on this occasion? When we heard this afternoon the hon. leader of the Opposition, figures in hand, tell us that in the Province of Quebec, in certain districts, there were not two law suits, and that for this reason these districts should be wiped out, in order to bring back the administration of justice to a more central point, then I naturally ask, what are we to do with the Supreme Court? The statistics that we have since its establishment, and the statistics that you asked for yourself, Mr. Speaker, when the Liberal party were in power, prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that this Court has no longer its raison d'être, at least if the reasoning of the hon. leader of the Opposition is worth anything, and if, as usual, we can draw the conclusion from the premises laid down. Now, Sir, I have only one word to add. I ask, and I ask with you, Sir, what remedy the hon. member wishes to apply to the existing evils? He has suggested none. Does he declare himself in favor of the motion now in your hands? Not at all. Only, he says that he will allow it to pass provided that reforms are introduced into the judicial system of the Province of Quebec. There is, however, one consolation for the hon. member and that is, he says that the Judgeships in the Province of Quebec are occupied by first-class men, and a moment after he says that first class men cannot be found with the present salaries. Let the hon. member not try to deny an assertion that the whole House has heard, that with $3,200 first-class men could not be found. At all events, Sir, I understand his fears and his tremblings; he deserves to be soon appointed. With these remarks, Sir, I hope that, in spite of what the hon. member for L'Islet has said, the motion now in your hands will meet with the approval of this House, and that the Province of Quebec will have, as she has a right to have, the new Judge she asks for.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions read first and second time, considered in Committee, and ordered to be reported.

House resumed; and (at 10:35 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

WEDNESDAY, 9th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. BROOKS moved that the 21st Rule be suspended in relation to a Bill to amend the Acts incorporating the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway Company.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following Bills were severally introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 53). to amend the Acts incorporating the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway Company.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 54) to amend the Act incorporating the Accident Insurance Company of Canada, and to authorize a change of the name of the said Company to that of the Accident Insurance Company of America.—(Mr. Gault.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that when the House rises at six o'clock, it stands adjourned to three o'clock to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN SHIPMENTS FROM HALIFAX.

Mr. BORDEN enquired, What is the rate per quarter, received by the Intercolonial Railway as its share of the freight on the grain loaded at Halifax by the barque Chili, and whether such rate is merely experimental, or has been adopted as a general rate for such business?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The rate received by the Intercolonial Railway as its share of freight is 30 cents per quarter; that is the general rate adopted for through grain traffic to Europe. The cargo loaded by the Chili was a fraction of a cent below that figure. I would like to correct the answer I made on a previous day to a question put by the hon. gentleman in which he asked with respect to two cargoes. One cargo has been shipped and negotiations are in progress for further cargoes—not for another experimental cargo, but for further cargoes.

CAMPS OF MILITARY INSTRUCTION.

Mr. THOMPSON enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to establish camps of military instruction this year; if so, when, where, and of what strength; also the number of days?

Mr. CARON. In answer to the hon. member, I beg to state that the matter upon which his question is based is now under the consideration of the Government.

THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. RYKERT enquired, Whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to the fact that no provision has been made for the turning of vessels of one hundred feet keel and upwards, in the Welland Canal; and if so, whether it is the intention of the Government to remedy this serious defect before the final completion of the canal?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The principal business on this canal, for a number of years at least, must be through trade; therefore there will be no mills, or factories, or other places where vessels will be at all likely to unload or receive cargo on the new line, which is about one mile and a half from the old canal, except at Port Dalhousie and near the town of Thorold. The local business between St. Catharines and Lake Ontario will, in all probability, be done by the old route for years; a all events, that seems to be the opinion of the corporation and those gentlemen who have made application for the second lock of the old line to be enlarged. It has, therefore, not been considered necessary to incur the expense of forming a basin of the capacity for the largest class of vessels to turn round, inasmuch as the works for that purpose can be done at any future time with equal advantage as when forming the canal. The new channel is nowhere less than 100 feet wide at bottom, and in short reaches where there is a curve in the line the width is greater, so that small vessels can be turned round anywhere. If a period of ten or twelve years is likely to elapse before the local trade would derive any benefit from the outlay necessary to form a basin for large vessels to turn round, the interest on the amount would, by that time, be nearly if not wholly sufficient to do the work. Besides, the inconvenience of floating or other unwieldy bridges on the towing-path for that period will be avoided.

Mr. RYKERT. That is an argument, not an answer to my question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not presented an argument, but simply given the hon. member an answer, and the reasons for the answer. I have said there are no such places on the canal.

REPORTED OUTBREAK OF CATTLE DISEASE IN MERIGONISH.

Mr. McISAAC enquired, Whether Professor McEachran, of Montreal, has concluded his investigation of the causes and character of the cattle disease which prevailed last summer at Merigonish and adjoining districts in Nova Scotia; and if so, whether his report will be laid on the Table and published?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I beg to say that an investigation has been made, and I am glad to say it has been ascertained there is no pleuro-pneumonia or lung disease among the cattle of that district.

THE HALIFAX COMMISSION.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), in moving for copies of all correspondence between His Excellency and Professor Henry Y. Hind, in reference to alleged inaccurate statistics submitted to the Halifax Commission, appointed under the Washington Treaty, said: This matter has attracted considerable attention in Canada and the United States during the past year. The gentleman who preferred the charges against that award of the Halifax Commission was an important witness before that body, and at the close of its session was employed by the representatives of both the English and American Governments to prepare an index of the proceedings of that Court. In June, 1878, he addressed a letter to the Department of Marine and Fisheries, stating that he had discovered glaring inaccuracies in the statistics submitted to the Commission. The Marine and Fisheries Department took no notice of the letter at the time. He afterwards addressed letters to members of that Commission and to the British and American Governments on the subject. I think it is the bounden duty of our Government to give a direct and official denial of the charges preferred by Professor Hind. I have paid some little attention to this question because my constituents and the people of my Province are deeply interested in it. As I take it, there were four points to be settled before the Halifax Commission, namely: the value of the American market to the Canadian fishermen; the value of the Canadian market to American fishermen; the value of the American fisheries conceded to Canadian fishermen, and the value of the Canadian fisheries to American fishermen. The first two points, the value to each of the market of the other, was settled by the fishery statistics contained in the navigation returns of each country. I am informed that statistics prepared by both Governments very nearly agreed; but to satisfy myself on that point, I have compared the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States with those of Canada for some years past, and I find that so far as the quantity of fish imported into the United States is concerned, both reports very nearly agree. It is true the values differ, but that may be easily accounted for, the values in the United States being made up from the market prices at the time the fish were received there, while in the Canadian returns they are made up from the invoices of shipments. There may be some other slight differences easily accounted for, such as losses in transshipment of fish, or through the manner in which fish were cured, rendering them unsaleable on reaching the American market, but on the whole the reports agree very closely. The point as to the value of the Canadian fisheries to the American fishermen was settled wholly on the testimony of important witnesses, summoned by both Governments; the Trade and Navigation Returns had nothing to do with it. The conclusion I have arrived at is that Professor Hind has no ground for the wholesale charges he has preferred against the department and the Government officials. There is one point, however, to which I desire to attract the attention of the Government, not in a spirit of fault-finding, but simply in the interests of the fisheries of the country, and that is the manner in which our fishery statistics are annually collected. I believe the returns submitted in our Fisheries Report this year, do not give the exact annual value of the products of our fisheries. The fault cannot be laid at the door of the department in Ottawa, for they have to make their return from the statistics furnished by the fisheries officers all over the country. But one reason for the mistakes committed is, that in many instances the officials are not appointed for their special fitness or qualification for the work, but rather because of their political leanings.

Mr. POPE (Queen's). There is no objection to furnishing the correspondence asked for. It has created a great deal of excitement both in England and the United States, and I was going to say in Canada also. The charges made by Professor Hind are so outrageous in themselves that I think the correspondence will convict him of some improper motive rather than a desire for the correction of errors in these returns. Doubtless, in making up returns, errors may have occurred; but no one would believe that the member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) could be guilty of the conduct charged by Professor Hind. The effect of the alterations spoken of might be altogether against the interests of Canada. Therefore, Canadian officers could not be expected to have worked against those interests, and in favor of the United States. In the pamphlet published by Professor Hind, he states:

"In a printed letter addressed to Sir Alexander Galt, bearing date, Windsor, Nova Scotia, November 10th, 1879, in reply to a letter addressed by Sir Alexander Galt to myself, I have shown that this table, alleged to represent the produce of Canadian fisheries from 1869 to 1877, is a gross forgery; that it only alters the quantities, the prices and the denominations of the items in the Fishery Reports, from which it is falsely alleged to be taken, but it presents in the aggregate a shamefully concocted contrivance framed to deceive. I have shown that, among many other falsifications, it cuts off more than 1,000,000 pounds of haddock from the catch of 1869, annihilates 100,000 barrels of mackerel in 1871, adds 100,000 barrels of herrings in 1874; introduces eels at $1.78 per pound, alters quantities, denominations and prices, and is 'cooked' from 1869 to 1873."

Now, the charge made by Professor Hind is that those accounts have been cooked and falsified for the purpose of benefitting Canada—that the whole thing is based upon fraud. He says the returns of one year show an error to the extent of 100,000 barrels of mackerel. I believe when the Commission was sitting at Halifax, a table was made up in the Department of Marine and Fisheries—no record I can find gives much information on the subject—but I believe, before the case was argued, the incorrectness of this table was discovered, and the whole conclusion was based on the return of statistics prepared by the proper officers. I do not believe the incorrect return affected the case in the slightest degree, but if it did, it was to the injury of Canada. Canada, however, is not complaining. I am happy to say the United States Government is not taking the matter up, and the British Government does not think it worth while to notice it. In the first place, if fraud had been designed, it would have been necessary to increase the exports from this country to the United States, because the comparison made relates to the value of our fisheries to the Americans. If you lessen the quantity of fish exported from this country to the United States, you injure our case. If, on the other hand, you increase the exports from the United States to Canada, you lessen our claim, and benefit the case of the United States. The reduction of our mackerel exports would, therefore, injure the Canadian case. One of the charges is that furs and skins have been added to the quantity of fishery exports from the United States to Canada, as of "furs and skins of marine animals." Well, anything added to increase the exports from that country to Canada operates against us. The effect of the whole of Hind's argument is that errors have been committed by us, which, on examination, would really injure us. He says:

"In the Customs Returns for 1874, in the items 'furs, skins and tails, undressed,'—a terrestrial item—amounting to $110,258, is changed to 'furs and skins of marine animals,' and introduced as such into the alleged average imports of fish and fish products from the United States."

Well, the effect of that action on our part would have been injurious to our argument. Among the first of his charges we have statements that go to increase the exports from the United States to this country, and which would benefit the case of the Republic. He says:

"In framing the averages of exports of Canada to the United States during the duty period, 1867 to 1873, the compiler lessened the official record of exports from Prince Edward Island to the United States, and increased the official record of exports to other countries. In some cases this alteration of records of Government was made to a very large extent."

He goes on:

"The effects of these various artifices in framing the averages of imports from the United States during different fiscal periods, is to lessen enormously the apparent value of Canadian importations of fish and fish products from the United States during the duty period, and to increase enormously the apparent imports of fish and fish products from the United States during the free period, or since the working of the Washington Treaty."

He says further:

"First.—During the duty period, from 1867 to 1873, the items, oysters, (excepting the year 1873) whale oil, lobsters, preserved fish, furs and skins of marine animals, etc., are omitted—but in framing the averages from 1874 to 1877, all these items are introduced.

"Second.—In the Customs' Returns for 1874, the item 'furs, skins and tails, undressed'—a terrestrial item—amounting to $110,258, is changed to 'furs and skins of marine animals,' and introduced as such into the alleged average imports of fish and fish products from the United States.

"Third.—The prices and quantities of imports of fish and products of fish from the United States, as stated in the Customs' Returns from 1874 to 1877, are in many instances absurdly high and enormously large, suggesting false entries.

"Fourth.—The imports of Manitoba and British Columbia are included in the imports of the year 1877, but in no other year; 'these Provinces not being included in the Treaty of Washington.'

"Fifth.—While hake oil is rejected during the duty period, it is introduced in the free period, and 'crude oil,'—a terrestrial product—is introduced as a marine item during the duty period, but rejected during the free period."

He says further on :

"By the introduction of manifestly absurd entries into the Customs Returns, the fish exports to foreign countries are largely increased. The object of this artifice appears to be antagonistic to the object of the preceding alterations, but it is susceptible of satisfactory explanations.

"The compiler has largely increased the fish exports of Prince Edward Island to other countries, and lessened the official record, showing exports to the United States

"The effect of the artifices and frauds is to increase the apparent exports of fish and fish products to other countries, in comparison with the exports to the United States."

Now it is not my intention to discuss this matter at all fully at the present moment, as the whole of this correspondence was conducted, and the whole of the business transacted, during the time when the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith) was at the head of the department. The matter may or may not come up between the two Governments; I do not think it will, but, in the meantime, I do not think it necessary to enter into a lengthy discussion on the subject. Looking at Professor Hind's outrageous charges against the officials of that time, it seems to me that his own words are sufficient to condemn him and to make it apparent that he is not actuated by kindly motives, nor in view of the best interests of this country. The member for Westmoreland could give the House much more information on this subject than I can. His services at the time the Commission was sitting were recognized by Her Majesty, and he received a great deal of credit for the able manner in which he conducted the investigation of the Commission, and I am sure that everything in connection with the matter will be fresh upon his memory. There is nothing in the department which would enable me to throw any light upon the matter. I believe when the charges are sifted they will be found to be entirely without foundation; but, nevertheless, it is necessary that we should be careful in any statements we may make on the subject.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Having been charged with the general management and conduct of the Fishery Commission which sat at Halifax, it seems fit that I should make some observations with reference to the charges made, not only against me, but against almost every person connected with the Commission. My predecessor, and several other departments of the Government, fall under the whip of the Professor. The charges when divested of a great deal of verbiage amount to this: that the Imperial Government and the Government of the Dominion, through their agents and officers at Halifax, falsified statistical returns and reports, fabricated testimony and used false evidence at the Commission in order to secure an award. Now these are grave and serious charges, and if true should cover the perpetrator with infamy and disgrace. But, Sir, the charges are not true; there is no foundation for them whatever. What the motive of Professor Hind may be I cannot say. He seems very desirous of obtaining notoriety, and in that he has certainly succeeded. It would seem, also, that he is desirous of entangling the two countries in difficulties, but I think in that he will utterly fail. So far, at all events, he appears to have made very little progress. Professor Hind was a witness at Halifax, and I am quite prepared to say that he gave valuable and useful testimony on behalf of the British Government. After the Commission was closed, it was suggested that we should have an analytical digest of the whole matter, and Professor Hind was jointly employed by the two Governments to prepare an index—that was his business and nothing more. It seems, however, that in the preparation of this index he discovered that there were some inaccuracies and discrepancies in the returns and statistics, not only of this country, but of the United States. Now, it would have been fitting for him, being employed by both Governments, if he discovered errors or discrepancies which, in his judgment, had influenced the deliberations of the tribunal, to have submitted the facts to both Governments; and it would then have been proper for those Governments to have acted upon them or not. And having done that, I think he would have done all that he ought to do. But, instead of doing that, we find that he has been pursuing this thing with a pertinacity which is really a wonder. He went to England at his own expense, and spent several weeks there in negotiations with the Foreign Office, but I believe he received very little encouragement, and came home a disgusted man. Since he returned he has been writing letters against, and persecuting I might say, everybody connected with the Commission. Now, if Professor Hind had any valid objection in this, I think he would have adopted the course I have suggested; but so far as I have seen he has never suggested a solution of the difficulties which he says exist; he does not suggest whether the award should be refunded to the United States—in fact, he has apparently no other object than to persecute those who have had to do with the Commission and to endeavor to get the two countries into difficulties. Now, the persons who, on behalf of the United States, had a knowledge of this subject, are Mr. Foster,—who was the accredited agent and representative of the United States—and he had associated with him Mr. Trescott and Mr. Dana, two very distinguished lawyers of that country. Now, I have been waiting with some interest, and not without some anxiety, to see whether Judge Foster would speak on this subject; but up to the present hour, so far as I have been able to see, he and his two associates have remained silent. It would, therefore, seem to me to be a fair and reasonable inference from their silence that they considered there was no foundation for these charges in fact. That seems to me to be the fair and reasonable conclusion from the silence of those gentlemen who knew all about the matter, and who, I have no doubt, were communicated with by Professor Hind. I am satisfied the matters he refers to had no influence whatever on the deliberations of the Commission. That is quite clear, because I am quite sure that if there was any reasonable ground to find fault with the way the business was conducted the Commissioners would have taken cognizance of it. The case on the part of the British Government was prepared by four lawyers, assisted by Mr. Forbes, Mr. Whiteher, and myself. This case required a great deal of care and deliberation. That portion of the case which refers to the statistics had reference to the reports made from time to time to our own Government, and we made frequent allusions to the returns, statistics, and reports of the United States. As provided for the treaty of Washington, these exhibits were produced before the Commission, and were laid upon the table where they were open to examination and criticism, and the American gentlemen found no fault. There was no keeping back of papers, no concealment of the truth, no suppression of evidence. Everything was free, open and straightforward, to the entire satisfaction of the American gentlemen who conducted the case on behalf of the United States. Now, it seems to me that if there was anything concealed, as alleged, the American Government would have taken action, because I have no doubt that Professor Hind has communicated his information to that Government. I am glad to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries state that the American Government had taken no action in this matter. One or two members of Congress have made inflammatory speeches on the subject, but as I understood before, and as I am glad to know now, the American Government have not considered this matter of sufficient gravity to take action upon it. I am not going into the details of this matter. There may have been discrepancies and inaccuracies, but I am quite sure they had no influence upon the deliberations of the Commission or the amount of the award. I may say that those proceedings were conducted in the most friendly manner throughout. The most friendly relations existed until the end. Professor Hind has communicated with Mr. Delfosse and Sir A. T. Galt, and he has published their answers to him, and they say distinctly that the subject referred to by him had no influence whatever upon the decision of the case. He has also communicated with Mr. Kellogg, the other Commissioner, who, however, is silent on the subject, as well as the American agent. Under all these circumstances it is extremely doubtful whether this matter is deserving of parliamentary attention at all. To show the way in which the business was conducted, and to show that the American gentlemen were well satisfied with it, I will just refer to a quotation from the closing speech of Mr. Dana, a gentleman well known in the United States and in this country. He says:

"We have been fortunate, gentlemen of the Commission, that no misfortune, no serious accident, in the long period of three months, while so many gentlemen have been together, has fallen upon us. The shadow of death has not crossed our path, nor that of any of ours at a distance, nor even has sickness visited us in any perilous manner. We have been sustained all the while by the extreme hospitality and kindness of the people of this city, who have done everything to make our stay here as agreeable as possible, and to breathe away any feeling we might have had at the beginning, lest there should be some antagonism which would be felt beyond the legitimate contests of the profession. The kindest feeling and harmony prevails among us all."

Mr. Thompson, who is now unfortunately no more, in his closing remarks, said:

"What shall I say to my brethren of the United States? To their uniform courtesy, tact and kindly feeling we chiefly owe it that this protracted inquiry has almost reached its termination without unpleasant difference or dissension of any kind."

This shows the entire satisfaction of the American gentlemen with the way the business was conducted on our part. Now I may say that this case was not decided materially by reports and statistics, but by oral testimony and by sworn affidavits consented to by all parties, and at the suggestion of the United States that this mode should be adopted. During that long and protracted inquiry of nearly four months we examined 83 witnesses and read 319 affidavits; the United States examined 78 witnesses and read 280 affidavits. This oral testimony and these written affidavits covered the whole ground of controversy, and I have no hesitation in saying that these returns and statistics that Professor Hind speaks of had no influence whatever on the decision. Both Sir A. T. Galt and Mr. Delfosse have stated that the deliberations were influenced by the oral testimony and the written affidavits that were produced before the Court. If that be the case what becomes of Professor Hind's charges? They are worthless, they are scarcely worth a consideration in my judgment. But while I say that, I am also prepared that inasmuch as this matter has received the consideration of a large portion of the press of the United States, and has attracted considerable attention in England, as I understand, from some of the public officers who are somewhat anxious about this matter, I may say that if I thought the American Government entertain an opinion that this Government or its officers or agents were capable of acting as Mr. Hind says they acted, I would a thousand times rather that the whole amount of this award should be paid back than that they should entertain any opinion of that kind. I repeat that if the American Government believed that we were capable of falsifying returns, of fabricating evidence, of using false testimony with a view of overreaching the Government of the United States in this controversy, I would much prefer that the whole amount should be given back. I will venture to suggest that if this Government and the Imperial Government have any idea that the American Government believe there is a reasonable foundation for the accusation of Professor Hind, an inquiry should be instituted, and particularly if the American Government desires it. If this Government believes that such is the opinion the United States, I will suggest that they themselves propose that an inquiry should be held upon these charges. As for myself, I have great pleasure in saying that I am ready at anytime, and at all times, to meet an inquiry. In saying this I am sure I speak the sentiments of my colleagues in the late Government, and of Mr. Ford and Mr. Whitcher, and the other gentlemen who took an active part in the proceedings. I believe that my predecessor and the members of the then Government, would also accept the suggestion that if the American Government desire it, a full and strict investigation should be made into this matter. I am not going to say anything more. I feel that it is due to the American Government, that if they believe such a statement, that a wrong has been done them, we should give them every satisfaction, and should take every means to vindicate the honor of our own country. I will only say, in conclusion, that I desire to declare and affirm in my place in Parliament, that the charges and accusations made by Professor Hind are absolutely and entirely baseless, and that the case on both sides was conducted in a manner becoming to the dignity and honor of both countries.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. It is much to be regretted, I think, that it should be in the power of any official, especially one of the class to which Professor Hind belongs, to create a feeling of dissatisfaction and doubt in the minds of the people of this country, as well as the neighboring country, with respect to the bond fides of a great international arrangement such as that of the Fishery Treaty. But for some reason, which one can only guess at, this gentleman has labored assiduously—I judge from the great number of documents, and correspondence of one kind or another which have been printed, I suppose at his expense, and distributed, I presume, among the members of this House—to prove something; and I have tried, by a cursory examination of these documents to ascertain what it is—what specific charge Professor Hind has to make against the department and against the hon. gentleman opposite—because I see his name is mentioned, and Professor Hind says he had communicated to the hon. gentleman these alleged frauds before he left office—I say I have failed to discover or ascertain, to my own satisfaction, what it is that Professor Hind charges against the Canadian Government. He attacks Mr. Whitcher, an officer of the department, and, perhaps, from the letter I have before me, he regards him as the chief sinner or person who ought to be exposed. Well, if Professor Hind and Mr. Whitcher had conducted their correspondence privately and assailed each other to their hearts' content, I suppose no member of this House would have felt any anxiety about the matter. But Professor Hind has taken pains to cause his charges to be spread everywhere. Not only has he gone to the Colonial Office, but he has found access to numerous journals of the United States, and, as we know, the matter has attracted the attention of Congress. I say it is peculiarly unfortunate that it should have been in the power of any person in his position to bring about such results, because we know that the treaty will expire in a year or two, and it will be necessary to renew the treaty or make a new one, or enter into some friendly arrangement with reference to this same matter. Therefore it is a grave case, and I entirely agree with the suggestion of the hon. gentleman opposite, that if the Fishery Department or its officers have been able to discover any foundation whatever, any material, for the charge that any facts have been misrepresented or misstated, which could have influenced in any degree the action of the Fishery Commission, it is due to our own honor, and to the interests of the country, that the matter should be investigated, and that the truth with respect to it should be ascertained and made known. It is satisfactory to observe that the American Government have not been much startled by the statements of this gentleman; for I have not observed that they have found any reason to enter into correspondence with respect to it. At the same time public opinion in the United States has been affected to a considerable extent by the allegations made by this gentleman who puts "professor" to his name, and who has figured in our history very creditably hitherto. I had the pleasure of knowing Professor Hind for many years, and I formed a high opinion of his ability and talents; but my own impression on reading these documents, is that the gentleman is reaching that period of life when, either through disappointments or decadence of mental power, he is not entirely responsible for what he says. I am sorry to be obliged to find that solution as applicable to this case. But it appears to me that enough has been said to justify an inquiry. We cannot ignore statements received as these have been, and commented on in official, or at all events parliamentary circles, and it would be desirable to put an end at once, if possible, to even a suspicion of the bona fides of the Canadian Government in this transaction. In the first place, it strikes me that his whole case is at fault in this; that the frauds which are alleged to have been perpetrated by the officers of the Fishery Department would be to the disadvantage of Canada. If they were relied on for any purpose in the adjudication of this case, I cannot see that their effect on the arbitration would be to increase the amount demanded from the American Government for the privilege of fishing in Canadian waters. If we have exaggerated the catch of fish, how can anyone believe that the American counsel, or the witnesses they produced, would have been influenced by that circumstance? They have their own statistics of the catch of fish by their own fishermen on our shores, and I apprehend they relied on their own evidence, and not on anything that Mr. Whitcher might state. On the other hand, I suppose it might be said that the advantage to us was greater by reason of the privilege of sending our fish into their markets free of duty. If we caught twice as much fish as they, I suppose that would be an advantage to us; but that would lead to a diminution in the amount of money to be paid to us. So that on both sides of this question it appears to me, that Professor Hind is entirely mistaken in regard to these mistakes, or blunders, or frauds. They could have no influence or effect on the award itself. It it were proper to argue that two wrongs would make a right, I think the people and the Parliament of Canada might go back a little in the history of international arrangements, and might find plenty of evidence to justify them in saying that in the case of the Geneva Award statistics must have been used that subsequent investigation proved to have been greatly exaggerated, because it is notorious that a very large sum of money, amounting to several millions of dollars, remains in the hands of the American Government unclaimed to-day, and the amount of the award must have been based on some evidence of the extent of damage that was done. I apprehend, therefore, that if we are to have an international inquiry, it ought to affect both cases, and we might find that we could set off any excess on the one hand by a large excess on the other. This matter ought, at any rate, to be investigated, the facts ought to be known, and this false charge, as I think it appears to be on its face, ought to be exploded.

Motion agreed to.

SELLING OF HAY.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved for copies of all correspondence and telegrams relating to the selling of hay through King's
Mr. MACDOUGALL,

County, in the Province of New Brunswick, on the Intercolonial Railway; copies of notices asking for tenders for the purchase of hay and tenders received; also all orders issued by the officials on the Intercolonial Railway for the selling of hay, permits given to officials to cut hay for their own use, authority for issuing such orders, and all papers relative to the withdrawal of such orders and tenders. He said: The matter which I have to bring before the Minister of Railways is one which is not so much departmental as a question of right. When the first portion of the Intercolonial was constructed, that portion known as the European and North American Railway, it started from the city of St. John, passing through the counties of King's and Westmoreland and finishing at the place called Shediac in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The people whose lands the railroad traversed, in those days prior to Confederation, gave the right of way, in many instances, for nothing. As far as I can learn an Act was passed authorising the Government to take the lands, and compensate the people in some way for the right of going through, at the same time giving the Government power to take deeds of the lands by a certain form laid down to be registered at the Registry Office. For twenty years the people had enjoyed the privilege of cutting hay free on the lands traversed by the railway, and for which it is claimed they never got compensation, the right of way having been given the road free, on the ground that the people would derive great advantage through having a railroad passing their doors, and on the understanding that they would not be interfered with in regard to the hay. Last year, however, a pre-emptory order was issued stopping the right to cut hay, thus bringing the question at once to the issue of testing the rights of the people along the road. I do not propose to find fault with the Government, but wish to have this matter settled. If the people gave the right of way, on the understanding they were to have the hay, and were not paid for the land, and enjoyed the right of cutting the hay for twenty years, it seems hard that at a moment's notice that right should be taken from them. The argument has been brought forward that this order applied, not only to the Province of New Brunswick, but the whole country traversed by the Intercolonial, and therefore the people of King's and Westmoreland had nothing to complain of. I am not prepared to accept that doctrine, because the railroad when first built only passed through those counties. The sole difficulty arose in King's county, because in that county the road passed through hay growing districts. In my opinion their rights should have been considered. This question should be tested with one or two, and not with every farmer on the line of the road. When the Government asked for tenders for the sale of the hay, none of the farmers would tender, because every man was interested in getting the hay along the line close to his own property, and one farmer would not interfere with another. As to outsiders, it was impossible for them to cut the hay, because if they had tendered, and their tender had been accepted for the purchase of the hay, they could not have got the right of way to take it off the banks of the Intercolonial within the fences. The Government should select some one person in a county and test the question with him. When I found this order existed, I appealed to the Government, and the Government very properly stopped what I considered to be an injustice to my people. The matter rests there, and now I bring it before the hon. the Minister of Railways in order that some settlement may be arrived at. I know the hon. Minister will give it attention and justice, notwithstanding the criticism in some of the local press of my Province, to the effect that the hon. the Minister of Railways was hostile entirely to any of my constituents interests. I offered the authorities of the road to make the question a test one between them and myself, so that it would do away with any necessity for the farmers along the line of the road to go to law. To attempt to defend their rights by law would be very improper, and, besides, when they got through with the law there might be nothing left to themselves, they might lose their farms as well as the hay. I thought it better, therefore, to make this motion and have their rights looked into.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt that the hon. member for King's is quite in his right in bringing up this matter which constitutes a very considerable local grievance, not only in the county he represents, but in many parts of Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Although, perhaps, not a very important matter in itself, it is one that affects a very large number of people, and which has created a good deal of feeling in persons whose lands lie contiguous to the Intercolonial. I am not prepared to admit the premises of the hon. gentleman that, in acquiring the right of way for the Intercolonial, the Government ever recognized any right on the part of the proprietor to retain any right or interest in reference to the lands through which the Intercolonial runs. It would be manifestly not only improper, but fraught with the greatest possible danger, if every one whose lands have been taken for the road, reserved the right to enter upon those lands again. No such right can be recognized. The difficulty, however, arose in this way: it has been the practice of the managers of the road for many years past, in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec, to allow the section-men along the line of the Intercolonial the privilege of cutting the hay on their sections; while the station-masters could cut the hay on the station grounds, and in some places there was a considerable amount to cut. That practice, which prevailed along the whole line, would not have been disturbed only that when we purchased the River du Loup Branch of 126 miles, we found the practice on it had been different. All the hay grown along that branch had been regarded as a perquisite, not of the section men, or of the station masters, but of the track masters. It became necessary, therefore, to adopt some uniform rule applicable to all the sections of the road. Otherwise the section men, station masters and track masters of one or other portion of the road would have considered their rights infringed, had they been refused a privilege enjoyed by similar officials elsewhere. We therefore adopted the principle of asking for tenders for the hay along the sections, as a means of placing all the parties upon an equality. It was considered that none of those officers had a right to that privilege, as the Government were paying for their services quite irrespective of any such privilege. Of course, the parties thus deprived advanced pretensions and raised a great many questions of dispute. I have no objection to the motion, and can only assure my hon. friend (Mr. Dozville) that I shall be extremely glad to find a satisfactory and just solution of the whole matter.

Motion agreed to.

CLAIM OF C. HORETZKY.

Mr. ANGLIN moved for copies of all correspondence with the Minister of Railways, the late Chief Engineer of the Pacific Railway, and all other correspondence and documents respecting the claim of C. Horetzky, for higher compensation than he has received for his services in exploring the region between the Skeena and Peace Rivers, in the year 1879. He said: It will be recollected that, in the Session of 1879, hon. gentlemen opposite announced that they did not think the exploration of the Peace River district sufficient to justify them in coming to a conclusion with respect to the Pacific Railway terminus, and they had resolved to obtain further explorations. We knew from their report that, in consequence, they did send out parties for that purpose, and one of them was under the charge of Mr. Horetzky, whose name is familiar to most hon. gentlemen who have studied the railway reports. I think it was generally understood that his services were of a very valuable character. Very great importance appeared always to be attached to any report he made, and any information he supplied appeared to be always reliable and to possess great influence with the Chief Engineer, and through him, I presume, with the hon. Minister of Railways for the time. He was in this case employed to take charge of one of these expeditions. He alleges that he had the most difficult part of the work to do, owing to the more rugged character of the country, and that his services were in themselves of a more valuable character, because of the fact that he had to explore a country of that description, without rendering it necessary to make a comparison between himself and the other gentlemen on the survey. He made no arrangements at that time about his salary, and after reports came to be made and he came to speak of the question of remuneration, he found that Mr. McLeod was paid at the rate of $200 per month while he was only paid at the rate of $160 per month. He made a claim accordingly, but he was informed by the Chief Engineer that the matter must be settled by the Minister. He applied to the Minister of Railways and he was told that if the Chief Engineer recommended that a larger sum be paid, it would be paid, or at all events the recommendation would be favorably considered. He proceeded to press his application applying now to one of these gentlemen, now to the other, until in the end he succeeded in obtaining from the Chief Engineer the following letter:—

" CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
" OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER IN CHIEF,
" OTTAWA, June 1st, 1880.

" C. Horetzky, Esq.,
" 470, Albert Street.

" DEAR SIR,—In closing up my correspondence I find a letter from you of the 4th May respecting your salary.

" As I never had any power to fix salaries, my only course is to refer your letter to the Minister for his favorable consideration.

" Yours truly,
" SANDFORD FLEMING."

When I was asked to bring this matter to the attention of the House and the Government, I did not feel at liberty to decline, though I did not know Mr. Horetzky otherwise than by the reports I had heard of him, and they were of a very favorable character. I hope the matter will receive the favorable consideration of the Ministry. Though Mr. Horetzky is not called an engineer professionally, though he was employed from time to time as an explorer, yet on this particular occasion he was engaged on work which he was as well qualified to do as probably any other gentleman in the public service. It does seem to me somewhat invidious, that when he was employed on that special service, after having been at various times in the employ of the Government before that time—though not since—he should be paid at a lower rate than a gentleman, who, though I do not question his capacity at all, was doing similar work to that which Mr. Horetzky performed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say in reference to this matter, that, as the House is well aware, under the Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway, no payments can be made of any description unless the amounts are certified to by the Chief Engineer. The services of Mr. Horetzky were obtained by the late Government from time to time, and he was also employed by the present Government. When these salaries were fixed the practice was, under the late Government, I believe, as well as under the present, for the Minister of Railways and the Chief Engineer to go over the names of the persons to be employed, and to discuss what would be proper salaries to pay for their services they were called upon to discharge. The salaries were fixed in that way and paid in that way. The Chief Engineer has stated correctly, in the letter which the hon. gentleman has read, that he had no power to fix Mr. Horetzky's salary; but, on the other hand, the Government had no power to pay except on the certificate of the Chief Engineer. Mr. Horetzky's salary was fixed in that way, and when his services were performed he was settled with, and he gave a receipt in full for the amount he had received. He subsequently made a claim on the department for a larger amount, on the ground, as the mover of the resolution has correctly stated, that he found that some other officer, who was an engineer, had been paid at a higher rate than that at which he had been paid. I, of course, referred Mr. Horetzky to the Chief Engineer, or to the gentleman who had been Chief Engineer at the time, and he gave Mr. Horetzky the letter which has just been read by the hon. member for Gloucester. The Chief Engineer very properly says that he had not power to fix the salary, but when he adds that he would refer the letter to the Minister for his favorable consideration he does not go far enough, because the Minister had not authority under the law to pay a single additional dollar on that letter. After Mr. Horetzky had been paid and had given a receipt in full for all the services he rendered, I said that it would be necessary for Mr. Fleming to state the additional amount, if any, to which he thought Mr. Horetzky was entitled on a review of the question, and that if Mr. Fleming would do so the Government would give his recommendation very favorable consideration. Mr. Fleming declined to certify to any larger amount, and, of course, it was not proper for the Government, under these circumstances, to pay any larger amount, Mr. Fleming considering that he had had a suitable salary assigned to him, which he had received in full for services rendered. I have no objection whatever to all the correspondence relating to the matter being brought down.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not know anything about Mr. Horetzky's accounts, but as his name has been mentioned I would take this opportunity of saying that, judging from his explorations, I consider him a very capable and energetic officer. He did what I consider a very plucky thing, something like the voyageurs of old time, when, in 1872, he went to the Peace River, and with very little assistance, with only two men with him, and in the commencement of winter, he crossed over the Rocky Mountains and made his way to the Pacific Ocean. It was a most extraordinary feat, one that we do not see performed every day. When he came home he wrote a most interesting work, containing the best information we had up to that time upon that country, and I would be very glad if the Government could see its way to remunerating him on a scale commensurate with his services.

Motion agreed to.

COST OF EXPLORATION IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. ANGLIN, in moving for returns showing the cost of each expedition employed in exploring the country in the neighborhood of the Peace River and the Skeena, and the northern routes, for a railroad to the Pacific Ocean, said: I think this motion will show that the services rendered by Mr. Horetzky in his explorations were very valuable, and that he economized carefully, doing almost as much work as Mr. Fleming, at a much less cost. Many hon. gentlemen have read the very interesting report by Mr. Gordon, and his account of the services rendered by that expedition. I have no doubt the gentlemen employed in that expedition did the best they could to carry out the instructions of the Government, that they ascertained as far as possible the character of the country through which they passed, and that it was not a mere pleasure excursion on their part. They seem to have been delighted with the appearance presented by the flora of that country, and altogether it seems to have been, in the early part of it, one of the most delightful trips they could have undertaken. I think, in the other case, there was a good deal more labor and hard work, attended with much inconvenience and perhaps some suffering. At all events the reports will show that Mr. Horetzky conducted his share of the work in the most careful and economical manner, and was therefore all the more entitled to a fair remuneration.

Motion agreed to.

THE DISMISSAL OF D. J. MORSE.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) moved for copies of all correspondence in reference to the dismissal of D. J. Morse, from the position of Sub-Collector of Customs at Bear River, in the county of Annapolis, together with all reports of Inspectors of Customs, and others, and any other correspondence bearing upon the subject. He said: This motion refers to the dismissal of the Sub-Collector of Customs in the county of Annapolis. I do not believe there has been a dismissal in the western part of Nova Scotia for many years, that has attracted so much attention as this. Newspapers, on both sides of politics, have blamed the Government in connection with it. This Mr. Morse was appointed Sub-Collector of Customs at Bear River sometime in 1877. From the time of his appointment until his dismissal, the revenue at that port continued to increase. I make that statement because one of the charges against him is that he was negligent in the discharge of his duty. In July, 1878, Mr. J. J. Kerr, Inspector of Customs for Nova Scotia, was sent to Bear River to report upon eight charges made against that gentleman. The report of Mr. Kerr states that there was no foundation whatever for those charges. Shortly after this Mr. Morse submitted evidence to the department at Ottawa, charging the owners of a certain vessel in that locality with violation of the revenue laws, and upon the evidence he submitted, being the sworn affidavits of a number of the seamen of that vessel, he was instructed to seize the vessel and lay a fine upon it, and to demand payment from the owners for a certain amount of the cargo that had been smuggled by these seamen. Subsequently, after considerable correspondence with the department, indulged in by some members supporting the Government in the western part of Nova Scotia, the department advised the Sub-Collector to release the vessel and to make no further demand upon the owners for the fine. In December, 1879, a Mr. Wolff, a gentleman, I believe, in the employ of the Customs Department, was sent to Bear River to inquire again into certain charges preferred against Mr. Morse, and after he had examined the books and papers of the Collector, he expressed himself as perfectly satisfied with everything in connection with the management of the office. He expressed himself thus both to Mr. Morse and to other gentlemen in that section of the country. Mr. Wolff returned to Ottawa, and on the 21st of January, he addressed a private letter to Mr. Morse, written, one would say, from one friend to another, in which he made no reference to the fact that he had reported that the charges preferred against Mr. Morse were correct. On the 21st of March, nearly three months after Mr. Wolff's visit to Bear River, the Commissioner at Ottawa addressed a letter to the Collector of Customs at Digby, the superior officer of Mr. Morse, instructing him to remove the Sub-Collector at Bear River from his position. This was three months after Mr. Wolff made his report. This gentleman was dismissed without having any opportunity to reply to the charges made against him. After his dismissal, I am credibly informed, a certificate was forwarded to the department, signed by all but two of the merchants and importers of Bear River, stating that he was

"Strict in the discharge of his duties, especially in his collection of all demands he might have against us as importers, also courteous and obliging in his business relations; that the steadily increasing revenue of the port is a fair answer to the charges of being inactive for the prevention of smuggling." I believe if the facts were known, it would be found that it was because of his political leanings, rather than want of efficiency in the discharge of his duties, that he was dismissed.

Mr. WADE. I wish to state that the member for Digby had nothing to do with the matter at all. It was wholly and solely the doing of the hon. member for Annapolis.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). This gentleman was a Sub Collector at the port of Digby.

Mr. LONGLEY. I think the hon. member for Shelburne is mistaken in saying that Mr. Morse was a Sub-Collector at the port of Digby. He is a resident of the county of Annapolis, and I presume I shall be obliged to bear all the blame of his dismissal, if, after full investigation, there is found to be any blame to be attached to anyone. The papers, I think, will show that Mr. Morse was not dismissed at my suggestion, but on the report of this very Mr. Wolff to whom reference has been made. To show the moderation that has characterized my action, I need not tell the House that, during the regime of our opponents, they made all the appointments they possibly could, and that we have a great preponderance of them among the office holders in the county of Annapolis. Yet I am not sensible of having desired to dismiss any man on purely political grounds: first, because it is a vicious principle, and, secondly, because it usually tends more to the injury of those who are instrumental in the dismissal than anybody else, for, after you get a man dismissed your difficulties just begin. Even before the dismissal is made, in long anticipation of it, you have about one hundred and fifty applications for the vacant position. So looking at the matter in all its aspects I do not think there is any great desire in the mind of any representative even for the dismissal of his political opponents.

Mr. BOWELL. There is no objection to bringing down the report of the Inspector on which Mr. Morse was dismissed, and I think, when it is read to the House, they will come to the conclusion that he was very properly dismissed. I can assure my hon. friend for Shelburne that he was not dismissed on account of his political opinions. I can readily understand why no particular noise has been made about the dismissal of any other Customs officer in Nova Scotia, because I take it for granted that my hon. friend for Shelburne would not make any noise about any dismissal that happened to be a deserved one. There have only been two dismissals of Custom-house officers in Nova Scotia—one a strong Conservative, and this one who, I now learn from my hon. friend, was on the other side of politics; and when I tell the House that Mr. Morse was reported to have allowed goods to go out of bond, and to go into consumption without collecting duty on them, I think they will admit that to be sufficient to justify the removal of any Customs officer; and when a Collector of Customs is instructed to ask an importer to amend an entry which has been improperly made, and which, when amended will cause him to pay a higher duty, and he holds out to that importer an inducement that if he amends this entry and pays the duty on this article he will make it up to him on some other article that he imports, I think that is sufficient to justify the dismissal of the officer. These are the two charges principally upon which Mr. Morse was dismissed. The latter charge is sustained by the affidavit of the importer to whom the proposition was made by the Collector of Customs. If that can be tolerated in any part of the Dominion, I have yet to learn it will be in the interests of the Customs Department, or any other department, to retain such officers in their employ.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman is under the impression that the dismissal was made by the Government; but the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) is under the impression that the dismissal was made by him. The hon. gentleman held himself responsible for that action and has told the House of the difficulties arising in consequence of the dismissal: that he had 150 applicants for the position as soon as the vacancy took place.

Mr. BOWELL. I did not so understand the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley). If he did make that statement I may say that the dismissal did not take place upon his representation. Neither was it upon any complaints he made to the department in respect to the conduct of this officer, but altogether in consequence of the representation of merchants and others who resided there.

Mr. MILLS. There is a delusion somewhere.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The delusion is attempted to be made by the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) distinctly stated that he had not asked for this dismissal, and was quite prepared to assume the blame and the responsibility, which might attach to the party who had revived the investigation into the conduct of the officer; but the hon. gentleman had distinctly stated that he had not even asked for his dismissal. Therefore a delusion was attempted to be created by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

Mr. KILLAM. The hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) may have been misunderstood. He stated first that he would be quite willing to take all the blame for the officer's dismissal, and a short time afterwards he said he had nothing to do with it.

Mr. LONGLEY. I think I stated, as distinctly as it was possible to state anything, that I had asked for a second investigation, and that I was willing to bear the responsibility of that request. I said, if blame was to be attached to any one, I would bear it; but we have not reached that conclusion.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). What I complain of is that Wolff was sent to report on the case in December, 1879, and after examining the office at Bear River and all the papers, he reported there was no ground whatever for the charge that had been made against Mr. Morse. That statement was publicly made known in the village, and afterwards published in the Nova Scotia press and not denied. On January 21st, 1880, Wolff wrote to Morse from Brockville:

"Will you kindly advise me of the result of departmental instructions in re smuggling in the Maggie Blanche? Is the vessel seized, and have you received the fine from Bogart and Miller; and what other evidence did you or the collector receive in regard to the matter? I want to know all about the matter for my own private information."

Mr. Wolff did not visit Bear River after he wrote that letter' but three months after receiving that report the Government dismissed the officer at Bear River without giving him a chance to reply to the charge. That is the charge I make against the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman has referred to a conversation at Bear River, and has said that Mr. Wolff made certain statements. I had not a spy there to ascertain what Mr. Wolff said. The department received the report of its officer, and I know nothing of correspondence between Wolff and Morse on any other matter. It did not come under the cognizance of the department. Neither am I aware of any conversation he may have had with Mr. Morse, nor is there any record in the department which will justify the statement made or the impression which the hon. gentleman endeavored to leave on the House that Wolff had reported that he was perfectly satisfied as to the way Morse's office was conducted. There is no such document in the department. All I know of the result of the investigation is from Wolff's report presented to the department, whether it was three months before I am not prepared to say. I think the hon. member is mistaken as to the date of the report. It may not have been made immediately on the return of Wolff; that is a point of which I have no knowledge just now, but the papers will show. I am not responsible for communications made by Wolff in a private letter; neither is the Government nor the department, unless the hon. gentleman will show improper correspondence with an officer, and when such is brought to the notice of the department, Wolff will be dealt with like any other officer.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne). When Mr. Kerr, of Nova Scotia, was sent to investigate the case, the Government took no action, because he said there was no foundation whatever for the charges. When the case was re-opened, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), the department did not again send Mr. Kerr but an officer from Ottawa, who is not employed on that special work.

Mr. BOWELL. He has been so for twelve months.

Mr. ROBERTSON. On the report of that officer no action was taken until three months had elapsed, and the officer at Bear River was never given an opportunity of replying to the charge.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all correspondence between the Hudson's Bay Company, or any person acting on its behalf, or between any other person and the Government, in reference to the land on the north and south sides of the River Qu'Appelle, near its confluence with the Assiniboine; and also, in reference to the land on the east bank of the River Assiniboine, at or near its confluence with the Qu'Appelle, and for all papers, Orders in Council, etc., in relation thereto.—(Mr. Drew.)

Correspondence, papers and Orders in Council respecting claim of settlers on lands set apart for the Hamilton Colonization Company in the Bird Tail Land district, to be allowed to take up their pre-emption on odd or even numbered sections at $1 per acre; and for all correspondence, papers and Orders in Council respecting the admission of other settlers to the same privileges.—(Mr. Drew.)

Copies of all correspondence in reference to the claims of persons whose lands have been expropriated for the Selkirk crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway.—(Mr. Schultz.)

Copies of correspondence in relation to the deepening of the River Nicolet, and a harbor of refuge at the entrance of that river; also the plans and reports relating to the said undertaking.—(Mr. Méthot.)

Copy of all returns furnished by railway companies in Nova Scotia, under Vict. 38, Cap. 25, entitled "An Act to amend the Law requiring railway companies to furnish returns of their capital, traffic and working expenses."—(Mr. Rykert.)

Copies of the report of the engineer who conducted the survey of the harbor of New Carlisle in 1880.—(Mr. Beauchesne.)

PUBLIC BILL.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved that Bill (No. 5) for the better prevention of fraud in relation to contracts involving the expenditure of public moneys, be discharged, and that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee, composed of the following members: the Minister of Justice, Messieurs

Mr. BOWELL.

Girouard (Jacques Cartier), Brooks, Guthrie, Cameron (Huron), Kirkpatrick and the Mover.

Motion agreed to, and Bill discharged.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. BOWELL, in the absence of Mr. WHITE (Hastings), moved the second reading of Bill (No. 48), respecting the Canada Consolidated Gold Mining Company.

Bill read the second time; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

THURSDAY, 10th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILL.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 55) to amend the Acts relating to the New Brunswick Railway Company.—(Mr. Weldon.)

CARRIAGE OF CORDWOOD TO WINNIPEG.

Mr. ROYAL enquired, Whether it is within the knowledge of the Government that the instructions given last autumn, by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, to T. J. Lynskey, Superintendent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, at Winnipeg, with the object of assisting the working classes of Winnipeg and St. Boniface, by providing as many cars as possible for the use of those desirous of bringing in cordwood from the east of the Province, have been interpreted by the said T. J. Lynskey in such a way as practically to give to the Hon. Gilbert McMicken, Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, a monopoly of the entire carriage of cordwood, and that instead of lowering the price of cordwood, that monopoly has been the source of considerable profit to the said Hon. Gilbert McMicken, and against the instructions mentioned in the letter of the hon. the Minister dated the 31st ult., addressed to Captain Thomas Scott, Member for Winnipeg.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have to say, in answer to the question put by the hon. gentleman, that instructions were given to reduce the charges for bringing cordwood into the city of Winnipeg; but they were not given in such a way, as to discriminate in favor of any parties. The Superintendent was directed to furnish carriage for all cordwood without reference to any individuals, and the Company with which the Hon. Gilbert McMicken was associated had no advantage over other parties bringing in cordwood. I did not understand that that gentleman was at all interested in any other way than as a member of a company engaged in furnishing cordwood. Instructions were given to provide all facilities for carrying cordwood into Winnipeg at reduced rates to those previously charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

NAVIGATION OF THE ASSINIBOINE.

Mr. DREW enquired, Whether the Government is aware that a bridge erected by the Hudson's Bay Company across the Assiniboine River at Fort Ellice, prevents steamers passing up the stream above that point, and whether they will take steps to secure such alterations in the bridge, by placing a swing or draw in it as will remove the existing obstruction to navigation?

Mr. LANGEVIN. The only communication received by my department on this subject is one from the Department of Marine, calling attention of the Minister of Public Works to this case. It appears that for many years the Hudson's Bay Company have maintained a bridge at that point in order to communicate with their different posts. The present structure is built on piles and completely obstructs the passage of steamers above Port Ellice, to which point they now ply from Winnipeg. If this bridge were removed or a draw provided, the upper part of the Assiniboine might be navigated. As it stands, the bridge is an obstruction to the navigation of the Assiniboine; there is no doubt about that. The only question that arises is, whether the Dominion Government or the Hudson's Bay Company should do the work; and that question is now under consideration.

INSOLVENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. McCUAIG moved the second reading of Bill (No. 39) to amend the Insolvent Act of 1875, and amending Acts.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, read the third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT.

Mr. LANDRY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 4) to repeal the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act and the Acts amending the same, said: There are many objections to the Supreme Court, especially in the Province of Quebec. Last year a promise was made by some Minister, that some change would be made in regard to this Court, in order to do justice to the Province of Quebec. A year has elapsed, and we are still awaiting some amendment in this direction. Nothing has been done, however, and I think, under these circumstances, it is our duty as representatives of this Province, acting in the interests of our constituents, to bring forward this Bill this year. We see every day judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench, Court of Appeals and other Courts reversed by, practically, two Judges of the Supreme Court, only two knowing our civil law, and their colleagues being obliged to accept their advice and opinions. So the judgments of five Judges in our Superior Courts are liable to be set aside by only two Supreme Court Judges, and when the two Judges do not agree, such judgments are really reversed by only one of them, the other Supreme Court Judges being on his side. Another fact well known to every Quebec member is, that all our provincial rights have been impaired by the judgments of this Court. I was glad, the other day, to hear the President of the Privy Council speaking in approval of judicial decentralization; but one of the greatest obstacles to the full realization of this reform is the maintenance of the Supreme Court. In a few years, should its judgments resemble those of the past, we shall see all our provincial rights diminished, and the administration of justice in our Province impaired to a great extent. I think, therefore, it is the duty of Quebec members to support this Bill. I hope the Minister of Justice will do me the justice to support it, and if he is willing, I shall gladly leave it in his hands.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). I regret that the hon. member should have thought it his duty to ask the House to read this Bill the second time. I regret it all the more, because I think it is always a matter of regret, that in the High Court of Parliament of this country, a great institution like the Supreme Court should on any occasion be made the object of criticism, which tends in some degree to disparage the character and standing of that Court in the country, and to lessen its authority and dignity. I am proud to think that a large majority in this House, and a large majority in the country, do not concur with the hon. gentleman in believing that it would be desirable in the interests of Canada that this Bill should pass, and that the Supreme Court should be abolished. I do not intend at this time to go into a discussion as to the position of the Supreme Court, or the mode in which it discharges its high functions in relation to the several Provinces of the Dominion. I am quite well aware that in Quebec, as in perhaps one or two other Provinces, there are occasions when there is some friction, and when the decisions of the Court are not quite so readily accepted as we hope by-and-bye they will be. But I am quite satisfied—I think it is universally recognized that, year by year, as the Court grows in familiarity with the institutions of the various Provinces, as the Court has an opportunity of showing to the people of this country the zeal, energy and industry with which it discharges its high functions—I say and think it will be admitted that as the time passes by, the Court will become more satisfactory to all the Provinces, and I hope I need not except the great Province of Quebec. I am quite well aware that the peculiarity of the institutions of that Province may make the distinction greater, with reference to the authority of the Supreme Court in that Province, than in the others, but I think from the number of cases brought before the Supreme Court, from the character and nature of the question then raised, and from the general acceptance with which the decisions of that Court, at any rate those of late years, have been accepted by the Bar and the general community of that Province as well as of the rest of the Dominion, that my hon. friend will see that he will only have to wait a short time to find the decisions of the Supreme Court of the Dominion received even in Quebec with such authority and such acceptances as those of the eminent Courts of that Province, more especially adapted perhaps to its institutions. Before sitting down I ought, perhaps, to remark upon an observation made in one of the public papers—an influential newspaper of the day—some time ago, with reference to the Court itself. And I do so because I am quite certain that that influential paper would not willingly—would not without information which, however, I know to be unfounded—have given utterance to reflections upon an institution that, at any rate, deserves fair consideration and fair dealing from the press, as well as from the Parliament of this country. It was stated in the Montreal Gazette, a week or two ago, that the Supreme Court deserved the reprehension of the country, owing to the delays which occur in that Court. I have not the memorandum beside me just now, which I obtained on that occasion from the gentleman who presides over that Court, but I am able to say, from memory, that up to the time at which I obtained that memorandum—before the Court met, to-day, to render judgments and reduce the number of cases then standing for argument—up to that time there was not a single case standing for judgment, excepting those which had been argued at the last November and February terms of the Court. Now, I think anyone who understands how important it is that the judgments of that Court should be of a character to command confidence—whether they received that confidence or not—will admit that the Judges of that Court ought at any rate to have ample time for deliberation and consideration. I think every lawyer will feel, and every layman who understands at all the work of our institutions will acknowledge, that a Court which has kept its arrears up to within three months of the time of delivering its judgments is discharging its functions in that respect at any rate in a manner that ought to be satisfactory to the country. I may say that the labor of this Court is of a very serious character. The Judges in considering their judgments have to consider an enormous mass of testimony taken in the Courts from which appeals come; they have to consider the arguments of those Courts of high standing in the several Provinces and the labor and consideration necessarily involved in the proper consideration of their conclusions must be of no inconsiderable character. I think, therefore, the complaint that the Court is behind in its work is not deserved. Under these circumstances, I feel that my hon. friend, after giving expression to his own views, with reference to the working of the Court in his own Province, will not desire further to press his motion for a second reading of the Bill. At all events, we see by the motion placed on the paper by the hon. member from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), that that hon. gentleman proposes, in another form, to remedy some of the difficulties which the Bar of Quebec feel with reference to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not propose to take up the time of the House but for an instant. I wish only to refer to one observation of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), which I think deserves some remark, the more so as this is not the first time that the observation has been made in this Chamber, and it has been circulated tolerably extensively elsewhere. I concur in the view that if the remark had been well founded the Bar and the people of the Province of Quebec would have a reasonable cause of complaint, in regard to the mode in which their judicial matters which come before the Supreme Court are disposed of. But I have seen no evidence at all which leads me to the conclusion that the remark of the hon. member is well founded. I refer to the statement made by the hon. gentleman that the decisions of the Supreme Court, so far as they dealt with appeals from the Province of Quebec, were the decisions of two Judges only, by which I understood him, of course, to mean of the two Judges who came from that Province. I say I quite agree with that. If it were true that in substance the decisions of the Supreme Court upon such appeals were the decisions of the two Judges who happened to belong to the Quebec Bar, there would be grave cause of complaint, because I think we must all agree that it is the duty of the Judges of the Supreme Court from the different Provinces to participate in any judgment delivered by that tribunal, to master the questions involved, the laws upon which it is dependent, and to render their own best judgment on that subject. I think they would not be discharging their duty if they gave simply a formal accedence to the judgments of other Judges, without giving their own independent judgment on a question coming before them. What I complain of is, that my hon. friend should have, upon evidence which I have not at all been able to perceive, made a statement which is calculated to be, what in fact is, a very severe reflection on the Judges of that Court who come from other Provinces than that of Quebec. I say their duty is to deliver judgments based on reflection, on study, on the ascertainment of the law to the best of their ability, no matter of what Province that law may be, and no matter how difficult the research may be. I believe the Judges of the Supreme Court discharge that duty to the best of their ability. I believe that in this particular the complaint of my hon. friend, which, however, does not come from him alone, is not well founded; and I did not wish the discussion to close without reference to that which, if true, would be a serious subject of complaint, but which, not being founded, is no subject of complaint at all.

Mr. LAURIER. If it were proper for me to advise the hon. gentleman who has charge of this Bill, I would say that his best course would be to suspend its reading until the House has had an opportunity to consider the Bill brought forward by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). As far as I understand the argument of the hon. gentleman for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), it is not directed against the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court as a whole, but only so far as its jurisdiction conflicts with the Civil Law of the Province of Quebec. The logical conclusion of his position would be, although he did not express it, not to abolish the Court altogether, but to curtail its jurisdiction, and that is exactly what is proposed by the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. Therefore, I think it would be more proper for my hon. friend not to press his Bill any further, until after the House has dealt with the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and if that is not satisfactory then my hon. friend from Montmagny can proceed with his Bill.

Mr. CAMERON (Victoria). I trust my hon. friend for Montmagny will be induced to withdraw this Bill at the present time. I feel, as I have said on a former occasion in this House, that the existence of a Supreme Court for the whole Dominion is necessary to complete our Confederation, and without such a Court as was contemplated by the Confederation Act, the Dominion as a whole is not complete. I quite agree that if the Supreme Court is not now satisfactory, it ought to be made so in every Province of the Dominion, and ought to be so constituted as to deserve the confidence of suitors in every part of the Dominion. I do not propose at the present time to enter into the objections that have been urged against it, more particularly from the Province of Quebec; but I feel so strongly that it ought not to be abolished, that if necessary it should be improved and made satisfactory to every Province of the Dominion, that I trust and hope my hon. friend will, in view of the Bill that is proposed to be introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and which, I believe, is intended to remove some of the objections to the Court which exist in the Province of Quebec, withdraw this Bill. There is no doubt the Supreme Court, if it be not now entirely satisfactory to every Province, ought to be made so; and I think there is no doubt that it can be made so. It is not desirable or proper, rashly, to say anything in reference to the constitution of any of our Courts, or to make any remarks that would tend to impair the respect in which they are held by the inhabitants of this country. For that reason I defer entering into any discussion of the details of any amendments that may be thought necessary, as I think this is a matter that rather lies in the province of the Government than in that of any individual member.

Mr. BOURBEAU. Two years ago we were called upon to vote on a similar Bill decreeing the abolition of the Supreme Court. This Bill was introduced by an hon. member now deceased, and I gave it my support. The same Bill was presented last year, but was withdrawn at the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works, in order to allow of the hon. Minister of Justice modifying the constitution of the Supreme Court in such a manner as to do justice to the demands of the Province of Quebec. To-day the hon. Minister of Justice rises, but he does not go so far as to say that the Supreme Court will be abolished, or that certain modifications have been made during the vacation, but his words imply that that Court is most useful, that it is necessary, and that there are no means of doing without it. I am not sufficiently acquainted with matters concerning the administration of justice, to undertake a discussion on the subject, but I am in the habit of acting up to my promises; and as I have promised my electors to vote for a Bill that would bring about the abolition of the Supreme Court, I rise to say that I will support the Bill moved by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), and I will vote in its favor.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not agree with those members who believe that the Supreme Court is all we should expect it to be. Far from it. If I am not mistaken, to-day, perhaps at this moment, judgment is being rendered in that Court in a case which has been standing over for months. Delays such as this are one of the reasons why that Court—we must say it, because it is in the mouths of the people—has not become a popular Court. As the hon. member for West Durham once said—not this Session, but in a previous Session—it is our duty to let the Judges know what is the feeling of Parliament and of the people, and we should therefore let them know that these delays, sometimes extending to a year or fifteen months or eighteen months, are not calculated to strengthen that Court. The hon. member for Montmagny remarked that many of the cases from the Province of Quebec are believed to be decided by two Judges only, whom we must understand to be the two Judges from that Province. Of course we have no legal evidence of such being the case, but we cannot close our eyes to the fact that there is a conviction in the Province of Quebec that in the large majority of cases it is so. How that conviction has arisen I cannot say; but it is another reason why the Court is unpopular in that Province. I do not say that it is a very popular Court in the other Provinces; on the contrary, I think that in many of the Provinces the same feeling exists towards it. It is certainly very unfortunate that the highest Court in Canada does not possess all the regard and confidence which courts of justice should have. I desire to be careful as to what I say, not only because I am speaking as a member of Parliament, but because of my position as a Minister of the Crown. I do not charge these Judges with dereliction of duty, which is charged against them outside, because I have no evidence of it. I wish to show, however, that the complaint made by the hon. member for Montmagny does not come from him alone, but is felt throughout the whole Province of Quebec, that the judgments of that Court are not really rendered by the whole Bench, but are the result of the deliberations of the two Judges from that Province. This is unfortunate, and I hope the matter will be considered in order that the evil may be remedied. The question is a very important and difficult one, and therefore I must ask my hon. friend from Montmagny to withdraw his motion, so that the House may consider the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), and then, if he is not satisfied with the decision of the House with respect to the measure, he will be perfectly free to bring in his motion again.

Mr. VALIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Public Works has told us that he was none too fond of the Supreme Court. Nor am I too fond of it, Sir. That Court is unpopular in our counties. Every one knows that our young country can dispense with that Court, for it costs too much, and the Judges only work a very short time every day; as a matter of fact, they come into Court every day at a very late hour—the greater part of the time they begin sitting at noon, and even later. Why should they not, Mr. Speaker, keep better hours, and sit from ten in the morning to four in the afternoon; they would then be able to get through their work in time, and would be able to render their judgments far more promptly. But, Mr. Speaker, we pay those Judges very high salaries, and they might consequently sit from ten to four o'clock; so that persons having business in that Court would not be kept waiting so long. Moreover, the time that they take to render judgment is long beyond measure, and the country suffers therefrom. It seems to me that they could have rendered judgment far sooner, and that would have been to the advantage of those who to-day hold turnpike trust bonds. Mr. Speaker, I need not tell you that the Supreme Court is not popular; every one says so; every one cries out against it. I hope, therefore, it will be abolished.

Mr. COURSOL. As the Bill introduced two days ago by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier has not yet come up for discussion, I think the present Bill should be allowed to stand until we hear the discussion on that measure; and then if the hon. member for Montmagny wishes to move that the Supreme Court be abolished, he will have the opportunity to do so. I believe that many members of the House were not aware that the hon. member intended to bring up this matter to-day, and are now taken by surprise. I hope, therefore, that the hon. member will see that it is the desire of the House that the Bill should be suspended until another day.

Mr. HOUDE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). Before you put that motion, Mr. Speaker, will you allow me, for the benefit of my hon. friend and colleague, to state the contents of the memorandum I referred to a moment ago? At that time there were fourteen or fifteen cases standing for judgment from the Maritime Provinces, five from the Province of Quebec, and six from the Province of Ontario. In the three Maritime Provinces' cases, the one was argued on the 26th October, the other on the 26th and 28th October, and the third on the 29th October last. The Quebec cases were argued, the one on the 4th and 5th November, the other on the 6th November, the third on the 8th November, the fourth on the 9th, 10th and 11th November, and the fifth on the 12th November. In the cases from the Province of Ontario, the arguments began on the 16th and terminated on the 22nd November. So that my hon. friend will see I was strictly accurate in the statement I made. This return which I received from the Chief Justice of the Court is of course an accurate statement of the state of business there. With one exception, therefore, no case was standing up to the meeting of the Court this morning, which met to give judgments, earlier than the 26th October last. The one exception is the Exchequer case, called "The Queen vs. Bell," which was argued in this Court on the 17th or 18th May, and that case is one of very great importance, involving the investigation of a large amount of facts standing over from the first May last until the present time. With that one exception, I think no complaint whatever can be made against the time occupied by the Court.

Mr. L'ANGEVIN. I may say that that case which was argued in May, had been before the Court for over a year—I think fifteen months—before judgment of one Judge was given, and now this same case has been ten months again before the Court before being decided.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not desire to enter upon a discussion of this question at this time. As a layman I would feel great delicacy in discussing it at any time; but in the case just referred to, the proceedings in the Supreme Court at this moment show one feature in regard to which the public at large, I believe, desire to see a remedy applied. Judgment is being given in that case at this moment, and so far as we can learn there scarcely appears to be any agreement among the Judges in relation to it. We are going to have some four or five judgments. All of the Judges are presumed to be very eminent in their learning; on this subject no two of them entirely agree with each other, the effect of such disagreement in opinion will be to destroy very largely the confidence of the public in this Court. Looking at the question simply from a layman's point of view, I think that something ought to be done to prevent the rendering of dissenting opinions in that Court. The judgment of the Court ought to be the judgment of the Court as a whole. When you find the judgments of two learned Judges given, both judgments equally able, elaborate and apparently the result of painstaking investigation, and each in direct opposition to the other, the tendency in the public mind is to believe that, after all, the judgment of the Court is a mere accident not founded on any solid ground of reason. Under these circumstances, I should like very much to see the judgments of the Supreme Court made the judgments of the Court itself, and not the judgments of the individual Judges of that Court,

Mr. McCARTHY. The remarks that have just fallen from the hon. member for Cardwell have been heard before in this House, and I think we all agree in the sense and substance of these remarks. The Privy Council adopted the rule to which the hon. gentleman referred, not that all the Judges should agree, but that the opinion formed by the majority of the Court should be delivered by one Judge, so that the public would not be distracted by the conflicting opinions delivered by Judges who may be all equally eminent. However, I think it is premature to discuss this question now. We have a Bill introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) which certainly is deserving of great consideration, and which, perhaps, meets the difficulty that is found in the Province of Quebec in regard to this Court, better than anything suggested elsewhere before. It is certainly an amendment that will deserve the consideration of this House when the time comes to adopt that Bill. What I have to say at present—and I shall ask the hon. Minister of Justice whether it is not the better course—that this debate be not adjourned. I think the majority of this House have no intention to repeal the Act constituting the Supreme Court. Although I quite agree that the complaints made against the Court should be heard here, still we have had those complaints already very recently before us, and the Court having, perhaps, acted on what has already been said here, there has been more celerity than hitherto in the judgments. The case referred to by the hon. Minister of Public Works is a case of much importance, involving a very large amount. The case, therefore, offered, perhaps, some excuse for the delay that has taken place in the delivery of that judgment. In the other cases judgment was to be delivered to-day, although they were only argued at the last sitting of the Court. After the discussion which has taken place, and hearing of the Bill of the important character proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, I submit, whether it would not be much better to at once discharge this order, and discuss, this Session, the amendment suggested in the Bill to which I have referred, with the view to seeing whether the Court could not be made more satisfactory to Quebec. I see that the reason that Province is dissatisfied is that the judgments of these two Judges, who come from their own Bar, are apt to be overruled by the majority of the Court. I certainly agree with the hon. member for West Durham, that there is no ground for supposing that all the learned Judges do not discharge their duty to the best of their ability, in deciding every case that comes before them. I think it would be better, under the circumstances, that this order should now be discharged.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise to second the view of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). I think that, inasmuch as the Government, last Session, announced itself in favor of the maintenance of the Supreme Court, and declared as the hon. Minister of Public Works has declared more than once, that they were about to introduce the following Session a remodelling measure, thereby declaring the existence of the Court to be a necessity, and, inasmuch as the hon. Minister of Justice has declared that the Court is a necessity, the Government is putting that Court in a position in which it ought not to be put, by addressing supplicatory remarks to the hon. member for Montmagny to be pleased to suspend execution by consenting to an adjournment of the debate. Let us decide this afternoon whether we are prepared to abolish the Supreme Court or not, and if we decide that we are not prepared to abolish it, let us proceed to consider whether it can be amended.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that you hold a fresh motion, one to adjourn the debate. I would have gladly acquiesced in the wish of my hon. friends to suspend the debate for a few days; but, as a motion to adjourn the debate is brought forward, I understand that the motion asking for the abolition of the Supreme Court loses its place in the Orders of the Day, and that it must necessarily come after the Bill of my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier. Under the circumstances, I agree entirely with the views expressed by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I think that the question should be disposed of at once. For these reasons do I oppose the adjournment of the debate, and I hope that the House will at once express an opinion on the measure. I do not think I was quite understood by the hon. leader of the Opposition, when he pretended that the Province of Quebec objected to the Supreme Court merely because the judgments rendered by that Court were rendered by a single judge. What I intended saying was this: As the Supreme Court is actually constituted, the Province of Quebec is represented by two Judges, and I do not know if my opinion is correct, but at any rate I think with the Province of Quebec, and with the majority of the electors of the Province of Quebec, that those of the hon. Judges constituting the Supreme Court, who belong to other Provinces, are not as familiar with our Civil Laws as our people would like to see them be. Under these circumstances, the judgments rendered by the Judges are somewhat anomalous. For instance, a judgment rendered by the Court of Queen's Bench in Quebec, by a tribunal composed of five Judges, is submitted to the Supreme Court. In that Court there are two Judges who perfectly understand our Civil Laws, our old French legislation, and those two Judges are called upon to decide if the five Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench have been right or wrong in their judgment. Well, if that is not an anomaly, I do not know what the meaning of the word is. Now let us suppose that the two Judges of the Supreme Court do not agree; that one should hold an opinion different to that of the other. Well, then, the opinion of the five Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench will be repealed or confirmed by the opinion of a single one, for I understand that under these circumstances the opinion of the other Judges will be formed on that of the two Judges who in the Supreme Court represent the Quebec element. I think there is an anomaly there, and it was so well understood last year, that the Government could not but promise the House that it would this Session bring forward a measure that would improve the position of the Province of Quebec. And yet we do not see the Government come forward this year and bring forth any such measure. Another reason for which was asked the abolition of the Supreme Court was that it had the effect of destroying judicial centralization. That opinion was expressed in this House on the 27th March, 1875, when

Mr. Ouimet moved, seconded by Mr. Caron, That all the words after "That," to the end of the Question, be left out, and the words, "the effect of this Bill being,

1. Of virtually depriving each Province, in a very great proportion, of the administration of justice, the control of which is, by the Constitution, reserved exclusively to the Local Legislatures and Governments, at least in so far as relates to laws respecting property, and civil rights, and civil procedure in each Province:

2. Of removing that administration of justice to Judges indiscriminately taken and selected from the whole of Canada, whereas by the Federal compact the Judges of each Province, except the Province of Quebec, are to be selected from the respective Bars of those Provinces, so long as their laws remain unconsolidated; and as to the Province of Quebec, in particular, its Judges are always to be selected from among the members of the Bar of that same Province:

3. Of submitting the laws relating to property, to civil right, and to civil procedure in the Province of Quebec, the causes and the fate of citizens of that Province to Judges, who, for the most part, are strangers to their language, their manners, their usages, and their customs, to the origin of their codes and to the numerous commentators thereon, and to the practice of their courts:

4. Of substituting and attributing to the said Supreme Court the management and control of matters which are not common to the whole country, That it is inexpedient to create a Court of Appellate Jurisdiction in cases involving questions relating to property, to civil rights, and civil procedure," inserted instead thereof.

There you have another inconvenience in connection with the Supreme Court, and yet no one opposed the reason I gave just now. Several hon. members have manifested their sympathy for the Supreme Court. The hon. Minister of Justice himself has thought it necessary to refute my speech by extolling the abilities and the laborious spirit of the hon. Judges. I have never denied their laborious spirit. On the contrary, I am ready to admit that the hon. Judges who occupy the position of Judges of the Supreme Court of the Confederation are unexceptionally able and extremely laborious men; they are perhaps not killed by work, but at any rate they are up to the mark, and know how to fulfil their duties. And this reminds me of what was said last night in this House by the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain). Were I allowed to repeat his words I would do so. I would say that for $3,200 one cannot find first-class men, but I think that for $7,000 first-class men can be found. I will, therefore, vote against the motion asking for the adjournment of the debate. I would have been ready to suspend the reading of the Bill, but as this new motion rejects my Bill and places it on the Orders of the Day, where I would not like to see it relegated, I will vote against the motion asking for the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HOUDE. After what has fallen from the lips of the hon. member, to the effect that he is ready to suspend his motion until the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has been taken into consideration by the House, I have no objection to withdraw my motion.

Mr. LANDRY. I think that the hon. member for Maskinongé has not well understood me. I never said that I was ready to suspend my motion on condition that my Bill should be discussed after that of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. There is before the House a motion to adjourn the debate; the effect of that motion is to reject my Bill after that introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. The present Order of the Day places as No. 4 the item which we are now discussing. The motion for an adjournment would result in relegating me after item No. 14, and that is what I do not wish. I desire that in the Orders of the Day for to-morrow and following days the Bill that I have the honor of introducing to this House should occupy the place which it occupies to-day, and that it should consequently come before the debate on the Bill of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I understand that the hon. member for Maskinongé suggests the withdrawal of his motion, and in that case the hon. member for Montmagny will withdraw his own. This motion being withdrawn, the Orders of the Day will remain in statu quo, so that the hon. member for Montmagny will not lose the place he occupies on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. OUMET. I am disposed to vote for the motion to adjourn the debate, or for any that will leave this matter before the House till the Bill of the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) is disposed of. Having opposed the Supreme Court Bill when first presented, I have come to the opinion, as I stated last year, that a Federal Supreme Court is a necessity of our system for the final disposal of all matters belonging to the jurisdiction of this Parliament. But I do not believe this Court ought to meddle with matters belonging to the jurisdiction of our Provincial Legislatures, unless its constitution be made satisfactory so as to give the Judges of Quebec the disposal of the cases that come from that Province. For instance, as the Government intimated last year, if the Court were reconstructed so as to have enough Judges from our Province to form a quorum for the decision of Quebec cases, in this case I would say that a large Supreme Court here would be very useful, a large centre of legal ability and learning of a nature to facilitate the assimilation of our different provincial laws, and which would have a great influence on even the civil law legislation of each Province. As the hon. member for West Durham said the other day, the Civil Law of Lower Canada is certainly superior to that of any other Province. On the other hand, the practical mind of our English fellow citizens has taken the lead in a great many modern matters in our late Civil Law. I think it would be possible, by bringing in contact legal men of the different Provinces, to exert a strong influence in the direction of the assimilation of the legal systems and legislation of the different Provinces, even in civil matters. I think this would be a great improvement, but one we cannot expect so long as the constitution of the Superior Court be not amended. The Court is an absurd one, not on account of its Judges, but of its constitution. The Judges of the Superior Courts and of the Courts of Appeal are generally the best lawyers and Judges procurable; but that is not a sufficient guarantee. The guarantee which a proper Court of Appeal gives is the number of its Judges. When five Judges sit to review the judgments of, say one Judge, you will say that the five heads have more knowledge and experience than the one. At least the superior number is the only guarantee of the fact. What have we now? As regards the Province of Quebec, we have but two Judges in the Supreme Court to review the judgments of five Judges in the Provincial Courts. And as regards Ontario and the other Provinces, the Law Times has just published an instance of what occurs before the Superior Court. A judgment had been rendered by the different Courts of Ontario, I think all the Judges being unanimous. What happened? The judgment was reversed in the Supreme Court by three Judges, two of whom were from Quebec and one from New Brunswick. Are the gentlemen of Ontario now satisfied with the jurisprudence of this Court? I should say they cannot be. The member for West Durham says that the duty of the Judges of this Court, from Ontario or New Brunswick, is to master the laws of the different Provinces, and to discharge their duty to the best of their ability. That, however, is not a sufficient guarantee to the suitors. Why? The law requires that the Judges of Ontario, Quebec or New Brunswick, be lawyers of at least ten years standing. Well, these Judges from Ontario never learned or practised our Quebec laws, in respect of which they are to decide any cases brought before them. It is absurd to expect that those Judges can, by merely opening our Civil Code, or any of our French books—some of them do not understand or read French—can understand our law. I, therefore, say the constitution of the Court is vicious and absurd. I will vote for its maintenance if properly remodelled. I am even disposed to allow to it final appeal in civil cases, if it is reconstructed so as to give us the guarantee possessed through our Provincial Courts of Appeal. As to the general complaints against our Quebec judicial system, I think it would be very important to consider them, and that it would be well if our different Provincial Governments and best lawyers came together to create a Commission to examine the different systems, and take from anyone what is best fitted to amend the others—to try not only to remodel the judicial systems of the different Provinces for themselves, but in relation to the constitution of this Supreme Court. That might render a great service not only to the Provinces, but to the Dominion itself, should a good report be made and acted upon by the different Legislatures. Such a Commission has been proposed by the whole Bar of Montreal and the Province of Quebec. The Federal Government was asked to share in the expense, the Government of Quebec not being very rich. The proposal was refused, for what reason I do not know, but I think it was an improper refusal. We should reconsider our Provincial judicial terms in relation to the constitution of the Superior Court, so as to arrive at some regular system and not to rest satisfied with an absurd Court as the present. Well, Mr. Speaker, to wind up my remarks, I will only say that I am disposed to vote for the existence of this Court if it is properly reconstructed, but if it is not, I am disposed to vote against it as I have before.

Mr. STRANGE. I venture, as a layman, for a moment or two, to trespass on the attention of the House, because, when I was before the electors, I found that the question under discussion was one of great importance in the mind of almost every elector. It was felt that the Courts of this country were more than the requirements of the people demanded. It was felt among my own constituents—and I believe it is felt among the constituents of other hon. gentlemen—that the expenditure necessarily involved in the maintenance of these Courts was more than the resources of the country could well tolerate. The question was put to me whether, in the event of this question coming before the House, I would apply myself towards favoring the repeal of the Supreme Court Act. I took the ground that we have in Ontario a Court of Appeal to which any cases from the inferior courts might be referred, and that in my opinion—an unprofessional one, of course—so far as that Province was concerned, the Supreme Court was unnecessary, and therefore, that I should have no hesitation in voting for its repeal. I believe, Sir, that on this question, as on every other question before this House, the popular will ought to be supreme. Lately we had a very important question before this House and before this country, and hon. gentlemen occupying the highest positions in the House have asserted that the popular will ought to control that question irrespective of Parliament. Well, Sir, here is a question—the question of the repeal of the Supreme Court Act—upon which, I believe, if the electors had an opportunity of pronouncing upon it next week, they would, by a vote of five to one, declare that the Court should be abolished. I have, therefore, no hesitation in saying that if we are to have a vote as to whether the Court shall be continued or abolished, I shall vote for its abolition.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. After the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I feel it necessary to say a word or two with respect to the subject now before the House. I do not agree with my hon. friend from North York (Mr. Strange) in his interpretation of the will of the people upon a question of this character. I have had some little experience for now some thirty years in discussing, through the press and as a member of Parliament, public questions of great concern to the people of this country, and the conclusion I have arrived at with respect to technical questions of this kind—questions of administrative or of political machinery—is, that it is absurd to say that the will of the electors—as it may be expressed in conversation, or at public meetings called by political candidates—is hardly the true will of the people with respect to questions of that kind. We must admit that this is a technical question. The Supreme Court is a part of the machinery for the administration of justice in this Dominion. The framers of the Constitution wisely, as I believe, provided for the establishment of a Supreme Court—a Court of final appeal from the other Courts of the several Provinces of the Dominion, and, so far as my recollection enables me to judge, I think that was regarded as a very important provision in the Constitution. Indeed, it seems to me that the Constitution would be imperfect, that it could not be satisfactorily or successfully worked, unless we had within this country machinery under our own control to dispose of litigated questions, especially those involving the interpretation of the laws of this Parliament, and of the Local Legislatures when they may come in conflict—constitutional questions, questions of the interpretation of the laws of the Dominion, or questions arising upon matters in which this Parliament has exclusive control. It seems to me that, whether you would call it by the name of a Supreme Court or any other name, there must be a tribunal which has power, under the law, to determine finally the meaning, the true interpretation of these laws, and of settling questions which spring up in the course of their administration. For my own part, when the Supreme Court was first constituted I felt that a better system might have been devised. As a member of the Government of that day, I was strongly of opinion that a simpler plan might have been resorted to. Under the circumstances, I thought we might have constituted a Court, composed of the Chief Justices of the various Provincial Courts, to assemble at Ottawa, as the most convenient and central point, for the purpose of considering and determining questions of a constitutional character. It seemed to me that that would be a very high court, that it would lead to the very result which my hon. friend beside me pointed to as a desirable result, uniformity in the laws of the civil and criminal jurisdiction of the Provinces; for it is certainly a great contradiction that when we pass over the boundary between one Province and another, we find a different system of laws regulating the ordinary affairs of life. A person removing from one Province to another—and every man must be a lawyer to some extent—finds an entirely new set of laws, and therefore it occurred to those who discussed this question at the time of Confederation, that that was a result to be aimed at—to secure as far as possible a uniformity of law with respect to the civil rights of the subject in all the Provinces of the Dominion. A provision was made in the Constitution for bringing about that result. No action has, so far as I know—

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). Quebec was excepted under that Act.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Yes; I know there was, but it was hoped that even in Quebec—and I am glad that hope was justified by the remarks we heard from an eminent gentleman in this House from that Province—it was hoped, I say, that even the civil system of Quebec was capable of improvement, and that whatever improvement might take place—and I think the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) uttered sentiments of that kind—would be in the direction of the adoption of these reforms which have taken place in the English system. As was said, we are living in a modern period; many new questions have arisen; many laws are now in force in the Province of Quebec which never entered into the minds of the juriconsults of Rome or Paris. We are necessarily assimilating in our habits of thought and our habits of life. Therefore, I say it was a wise provision which looked to the assimilation of the laws of the different Provinces, though out of respect to the tender feelings of the Province of Quebec and their civil system, the framers of that Act did secure to the people of that Province that exception in their favor, which they prize so highly. But, looking to the future, it seems to me that it is desirable to frame a system of jurisprudence which will tend as far as possible to bring about the uniformity to which I have referred. The Supreme Court is a very able Court I think. Some of the judgments rendered by these gentlemen, not previously acquainted with active politics, not accustomed to consider questions of politics in the way that members of Parliament must necessarily consider them, show that they have grasped the spirit as well as the spirit of the Constitution, and they have laid down fundamental principles with great perspicuity and great accuracy with respect to the interpretation of our Constitution. There may be other Courts which would have arrived at the same result in the manner in which this Court has done; but, at all events, it is an established Court. It is one of the institutions of the country; and I regret that members of this House—I will not say in a spirit of levity or indifference to the settled institutions of the country—but that they have, at all events, put motions on the paper contemplating the abolition of one of the most important of these institutions. I think it is to be regretted that members of Parliament should not consider the effect of action of that kind. It weakens the authority of the Court, it raises suspicion in the minds of the people, for this House to enter into discussions upon a proposition that there is something wrong, that there is something vicious in the very principle upon which that Court is founded, and that it is an unnecessary expense to the people. It is in that view the hon. member for North York, I have no doubt, has considered it, and it is upon that ground that the objections he has made have chiefly been levelled. The spirit of economy we know prevails much in times of election, and here is an expensive institution that did not exist at Confederation, and the question is asked, is it necessary? Lawyers even say it is unnecessary; lawyers in Ontario say that there is in that Province a Court of Appeal, a very high Court, composed of very able Judges, that is sufficient for the final determination of questions that arise in that Province. In Quebec there may not be the same confidence—I do not know how that may be—but I have observed some discussion indicating that there was not the same confidence in the ability and in the judgments of the Superior Courts of that Province. But I object, for one, to any action which implies an opinion in this House that the Supreme Court is not a desirable institution—unless that opinion really thus prevails; but I do not believe it does prevail. I do not believe that upon discussion it will be found that a majority, or that a large number of members have made up their minds that this Court ought to be abolished. Therefore, I think it is undesirable that we should have such motions, that we should entertain them at all, unless we are prepared seriously to entertain the proposition of abolishing the Court. Of course, that would be a very short process; but are we prepared to substitute something in its place? We cannot, according to my view, considering the circumstances in which we are placed, carry on the affairs of this great Dominion without an ultimate tribunal of appeal upon questions of a constitutional character, and upon the laws of this Parliament, that may arise. As for the motion which my hon. friend for Jacques Cartier has upon the paper, it is a very proper one. That does not indicate a desire to extinguish the Court; it is in the direction of amendment, and I believe that Court is susceptible of amendment. I believe that in the direction which has been pointed out by my hon. friend for Laval (Mr. Ouimet), some amendment may very properly be made. It does seem, on the face of it, rather absurd to appeal from the judgments of a Court of five Judges, especially upon questions arising out of the Civil Laws peculiar to the Province of Quebec, to a Court of six Judges, only two of whom have any real knowledge or acquaintance with the principles of those laws. It seems more absurd still when an appeal is taken from the judgments of Courts in Ontario, that in this Court, although the two Supreme Court Judges from Ontario may concur, that their judgment should be overborne by the opinions of the Judges from the other Provinces who are not familiar with the laws of Ontario.

Mr. BLAKE. What about the Judicial Committee?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. My hon. friend may think that one evil is justified by citing another.

Mr. BLAKE. We have that alternative.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I think that distinguished lawyers and writers upon the judicial systems of England and other countries, have not hitherto expressed the greatest satisfaction with the constitution of the Judicial Committee. But this is to be said, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England is a very learned body; it is composed of men of very large experience, of very extensive knowledge of other matters than law. They are for the most part statesmen, they are for the most part men who have filled high positions. The Judicial Committee is composed of men who understand languages; they can hear arguments in French, and they are familiar with the laws of France at the present time. From their high position, from their great attainments and experience, they are probably the best qualified of any body of men that could be found for investigating in an enlightened manner the learned and exhaustive arguments that may be presented to them; and they have plenty of time to consider them, and they give a decision which is final and to which we must submit.

Mr. OUIMET. They render judgment in French.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I do not think we can compare any Court that can be established in this country with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I have had occasion to read one or two of their judgments on one or two points of law which have arisen from questions coming from the East Indies, and their familiarity with the laws of that country, the exactness with which they cited laws in both the French and English languages, and the great learning displayed in their judgments, filled me with astonishment. But, although these men are great men, I do not think the suggestion of the hon. member for West Durham is a sufficient answer to the point I was making. But coming back to the question before the House, I would ask hon. members to consider the effect of keeping a motion of this kind upon our Order paper. I think it is unfair to the Court, unfair to the country, and to the institutions of the country, to have this standing reproach every Session made against one of our most important institutions. If the Court is defective it ought to be amended, and this discussion will not have been useless if it induces the Government to take up the question, and to consider in what direction and to what extent modifications may be made in this Court in order to make it satisfactory to all parts of the country.

Mr. McCUAIG. Speaking entirely in a practical sense, the opinion entertained by the majority of the inhabitants of the county I represent is this: We have a Supreme Court composed of six men, two from Ontario, two from Quebec, and two from the Maritime Provinces. As I understand the matter, the two Judges from Ontario are not at all familiar with the laws of Quebec, while the two Judges from the Maritime Provinces are not familiar with the laws of either Ontario nor Quebec. Now, in Ontario we have an Appeal Court, composed of four Judges of high legal attainments, and well qualified to decide finally upon most every case that comes before them. But a case taken from our Court of Appeal, presided over by four of the best Judges of Ontario, may be taken to the Supreme Court, and their judgment overruled by the four Judges from Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, not at all familiar with our laws. That is not at all calculated to create any confidence in the decisions of the Supreme Court. I am told that in Quebec the Court of Appeal is composed of five Judges, and they are certainly better qualified to decide according to the laws of that Province than the four Judges of the Supreme Court can be who come from the other Provinces. The dissatisfaction with this Court is not on account of its expense, but that the people want an ultimate Court of Appeal composed of men whose judgments will carry confidence in their justice. There are only two Judges on that Court familiar with the laws of Ontario, yet their judgment may be overruled by the four Judges from the other Provinces. It is not only members of the legal profession who have doubts as to the ability of this Court, but the inhabitants generally have not that confidence in the decisions of this Court which those decisions ought to inspire. Now, I contend that it might be very proper that all constitutional questions should be submitted to this Court once a year, and for that purpose a Court could be constituted much less expensive and composed of men of great ability and attainments drawn from the Appeal Courts of the various Provinces. If these Judges came together at the Capital once a year to determine our constitutional questions alone, I believe it would be more satisfactory to the country at large and save a large amount of money.

Mr. BRECKEN. I entirely agree with the remark of the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) that it is a matter of regret that Session after Session a measure like the one proposed by my hon. friend for Montmagny should be brought into this House, because it is assailing one of the highest institutions in our country. I also agree with the remark that without a Supreme Court for the Dominion our Confederation would be incomplete. There is no doubt that many hon. members from Ontario feel that their local judiciary is quite sufficient to dispose of all questions that come before it, and I can feel the force of the objections urged by hon. members from the Province of Quebec that the judiciary in that Province, composed of men who are trained to understand the French Code, is perhaps a more reliable tribunal to decide questions arising under their system of jurisprudence than some of the Judges of the Supreme Court. But, speaking from the standpoint of the Maritime Provinces, I may say that there is no more popular institution in the Dominion of Canada than the Supreme Court. There are questions frequently arising of a Dominion or a national character, that can only be competently decided by a tribunal of that kind. I know that in the case of Prince Edward Island, when the celebrated land question came up—though we have a very able and honest and independent judiciary in that Province—had it not been for the Supreme Court, Prince Edward Island would to-day be still burdened by a system of landlordism. I merely mention this as an illustration of the benefits derived from the existence of the Supreme Court. I do not mean to say that this Court is not capable of amendment. I know that it is a source of difficulty in establishing a Supreme Appellate Court, that we have in this country two divers systems of jurisprudence. I regard this agitation as a misfortune, because, although the people, if they are not satisfied with their representatives can send them about their business. When you place distinguished and learned gentlemen on the Bench, and trust to their decision in matters affecting the highest welfare of the people, that tribunal ought to be above suspicion; and when the representative of a large and influential constituency stands on the floor of this House and impeaches, not the honor but the ability of the Judges of that Court, I think he is likely, though unintentionally, to do a great deal of harm. I, therefore, hope this Bill, which was so strenuously and honestly advocated by an hon. member who is now no more, will be withdrawn by the hon. gentleman who has taken his place.

Mr. WELDON. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject are chiefly from Ontario and Quebec. Our position in the Maritime Provinces is somewhat different. Other Provinces have their Courts of Appeal, but in the Maritime Provinces, prior to the establishment of the Supreme Court, we had no Court of Appeal, and we were obliged to go to the Imperial Privy Council. But the expenses of going there were so enormous that they practically, in a great many cases, prevented appeal. One feature of the scheme of Confederation, therefore, was that the Supreme Court was to be established for the Dominion, and its establishment has already produced beneficial results, so far as the people of those Provinces are concerned. A good deal has been said with regard to the difficulty connected with these Judges at Ottawa reversing the decisions of the Judges of the Courts of Appeal in Ontario and Quebec, contrary to the opinion of the majority of the

Mr. McCuaig.

Judges in those Provinces. If we turn to the House of Lords, the highest appellate tribunal in England, we find that they have sometimes reversed the decisions of lower Courts, contrary to the opinion of the Judges. The House of Lords was the Appellate Court from the Scottish Courts, although for a long time none of the members were acquainted with the Scottish law, and although the same objection was raised against them on that account as is now raised against the Supreme Court with regard to cases from the Province of Quebec. During the last few years great changes have taken place in the Courts in England, yet the right of appeal to the House of Lords has never been questioned. The same may be said with regard to the Privy Council. It is true, as the hon. member for Halton says, they are men of learning and ability, and a very large body. But practically, we find but four members deciding appeals from the Colonial Courts, although their knowledge of Colonial Civil Law must be much less than that of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. It is very important that we should have some tribunal from which we can obtain uniform decisions on constitutional points respecting the different Provinces. We have found the Courts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Ontario adopting different views on certain questions; and in that case it is essential that there should be some Court which would be a final Court of Appeal in the Dominion, whose decisions would be binding on all the Provinces. I regret that a discussion on the Supreme Court is continually coming up, because it tends to impair the usefulness of a very valuable institution. If there are defects they can be removed. But this institution, which I regard as one of the bases of Confederation, provides an opportunity for the people, particularly in the Lower Provinces, to have their appeals determined at far less expense than they could under the old system.

Mr. MILLS. We have had this measure before the House, I think, at every Session since the last general election, and in every instance it has been supported by some gentlemen on the Treasury benches. On the present occasion the Minister of Public Works has himself expressed very great dissatisfaction with the Court, and he is satisfied that in the country the people are almost universally dissatisfied with it. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken; but I think the line taken by him is calculated to produce precisely the condition of things which he professes to deprecate. And, in my opinion, a more unfortunate course could not well be taken than the one that has been adopted by the hon. gentleman, and some other hon. gentlemen in this House, who constantly attack this Court, no matter how able the gentlemen on the Bench, no matter what industry and attention they may give to every question before them. If hon. gentlemen make it a point every Session to criticise, and to criticise in a hostile spirit, the conduct of the Court, there can be no doubt whatever that in time they will succeed in making a considerable section of the people of the country dissatisfied with its decisions. I do not quite agree with some observations made by the hon. member for Laval, and by the hon. member for Halton. It seems to me they have taken a Colonial Office view of the position of the judiciary of this country. I am not willing to admit that gentlemen occupying seats in the Supreme Courts of Canada are inferior to gentlemen who occupy seats in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. In my opinion, Sir, the people on this side of the Atlantic come into this world with an intellectual capacity quite equal to the intellectual capacity of gentlemen on the other side, and it seems to me the judicial training they receive, and the attention they are called upon to give to the consideration of legal questions in adjudicating upon them, serves to discipline their minds and fit them for the discharge of their duties as Judges quite as well as does the training of hon. gentlemen who sit on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Then the hon. gentleman expressed his astonishment at the extraordinary legal knowledge possessed by these gentlemen. But, Sir, how did they become possessed of it. The members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, when a case is appealed to them from the Province of Quebec, are obliged to consider the Civil Law and the customs of the Province in relation to the particular case before them. In a case brought from India, it may be the Mahommedan law which they are called upon to administer. If they display a very considerable knowledge of different systems of jurisprudence in the exercise of their judicial functions it is simply because the laws of every country are founded on the broad principles of natural justice. There is very little difference when you examine the first principles of jurisprudence whether you look at them in the old Roman law, the modern Roman law, or the English common law. Everywhere they are the same. The distinguished gentlemen who are called upon to adjudicate upon questions coming from India, from Lower Canada, or from other of the Colonies, before they become members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council acquire a special knowledge of English law and equity which they are called upon to administer while they are upon the Bench. The training which they receive in the administration of the law of their own country prepares and fits them for the consideration of the laws of other countries which they are called upon to administer. There is no doubt that precisely the same effect will be produced in the Supreme Court here. Hon. gentlemen of the Bar of Halifax, of the Bar of New Brunswick and of the Bar of Ontario, when appointed to seats upon the Supreme Court Bench here—when they are called upon to consider questions involving principles of the Civil Code—will bring to bear their legal training and discipline in the consideration of legal questions arising under that Code. They are, in my opinion, likely to administer justice quite as fairly as those who have had special training in the law they are called upon to administer, and in that system alone. In fact, I believe it is an advantage to gentlemen who are called upon to administer one system of jurisprudence to have a previous knowledge of some different system. I believe they take larger and more comprehensive views. There can be no doubt whatever that the knowledge gentlemen in the Supreme Court have of English common law, and of the English system of equity jurisprudence, will be no detriment in the administration of Roman civil law in cases coming up from the Province of Quebec. We know that what we know as Roman law originated in this way. What is now called Roman law, is not the old Quirinal law, but a system of jurisprudence derived from the jus quotienne as administered by the Republic and the Empire. The hon. member for Halton spoke about the provision which authorizes Parliament here, with the consent of the Provinces, to establish uniform laws relating to the question of property and civil rights. That was a principle introduced into the Constitution at the time the Constitution was framed by those who favored a Legislative Union. It provides, if the principle is once adopted, that the right to legislate on the subject of property and civil rights shall no longer be vested in the Provinces, but in the Government here, and I do not think it is at all to be deplored that that provision of the Constitution has never been acted upon. On the contrary, I see no necessity for having a uniform system of procedure in the various Provinces. Everywhere the law will grow up and adapt itself to the wants and necessities of the community. The very object of having Local Legislatures is to enable them to adjust the laws with greater efficiency to local requirements; and if a Statute in the same words in the Province of New Brunswick is found to be differently interpreted from the provincial Statute of Ontario no inconvenience can arise from it. But there would be a great inconvenience if we had no common tribunal for the purpose of interpreting the laws of Canada. If you found one construction placed upon a law of Canada in Ontario, another in Quebec, and a third in the Maritime Provinces, great inconvenience would arise. The people would not know what the law was. The same law, intended to work uniformly in the entire country, would be differently interpreted in the different Provinces. I remember very well, a few years ago, that there was a Statute in the Province of Ontario, requiring the registration of judgments in certain cases. That law was construed in one way in the Court of Common Pleas, and in a different way in the Court of Queen's Bench. Great inconvenience would arise from a practice like that if there was no common tribunal giving a uniform interpretation to the law. For that reason, under a Federal system of Government you must have a supreme tribunal for the purpose of finally interpreting the Federal law, and I believe you have in the Supreme Court a very satisfactory tribunal. I think, considering the circumstances under which it was constituted, that it is a matter of surprise that the Supreme Court has worked as satisfactorily as it has so far. In a few years you will have a wholly different state of things to that which you had in the first instance. That there should be some difficulty and some friction is not a matter of surprise, but we can easily produce great mischief to this Court, and great mischief to the country, by attacking the Court every Session. The hon. member for Laval has spoken of the impropriety of having matters relating to the laws of the Provinces referred to the Supreme Court. I never entertained any other opinion on that question. According to the 101st section of the British North America Act, this was to be a final Court of Appeal for Canada, not for the Provinces. I never saw any impropriety in making it a Court of Appeal for the Provinces. If we recognize the principle well laid down by Mr. Chancellor Kent in his commentaries, that it is desirable to arrive at a final conclusion as soon as possible, and that greater mischief is done to the community by numerous appeals than by a wrong judgment occasionally being given, I think the highest Court of each Province ought to be the final Court of Appeals for the affairs of that Province. But the same objection that lies against the Supreme Court as a Court of Appeal in Provincial cases lies in a stronger degree against appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman who proposes to withdraw provincial matters from the consideration of the Supreme Court ought to be consistent, and insist further on the withdrawal from the consideration of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I am opposed to the postponement of this discussion, I am opposed to keeping this question in suspense, I am in favor of seeing a vote taken, and if a majority of this House are in favor of the abolition of the Supreme Court the sooner we know it the better; and if not, as I believe not, the question ought to be disposed of, and mischief ought not to be done by inviting opposition and arousing discontent in the country.

Amendment (Mr. Houde) to adjourn the debate, negatived on the following division:—

AFTER RECESS.

On the motion for the second reading of the Bill,

Mr. VALLÉE. Mr. Speaker, the question now before the House is so important a one that I consider it my duty to say a few words in explanation of the vote I am about to give. The question is not a new one; it has several times come up before the House, which has already given its opinion and has made known its views on the subject; and we must infer from the votes cast, and from the debates that have taken place in this Parliament since 1878, that the opinion of the country, as manifested in the speeches of the representatives of the various Provinces, is certainly opposed to keeping up the Supreme Court such as it is constituted to-day. Last year, I cast my vote against the passing of the Bill, upon the Government declaring that it would this year meet us with fresh legislation on that point. But we have not had that legislation, and it is not even promised to us. I, therefore, do not consider myself bound any longer by the engagement I made last year, whilst voting against that Bill; and to-day I resume the position I occupied towards the electors of my county, when I came before them to ask them to honor me with their trust, and when I explained my political programme. Then, Mr. Speaker, as now, my opinion was against retaining the Supreme Court. I bound myself before my electors and before the country to labor in this House to abolish that Court, which I consider to be not only useless but dangerous to the institutions established by the Act of Confederation. The question is not one of party; it is not a matter of supporting or countenancing friends; a more grave and serious question is at stake. We have certain institutions; we are a nation placed under exceptional circumstances; we have certain rights and privileges; we have local institutions; we have Federal institutions, and each has its powers within its limits. But the Canadian political world naturally follows the ordinary motion of the world; the strongest wants to lord it over the weakest, or rather the strongest will end in lording it over the weakest, i.e., the Federal system will end by taking away all the rights we enjoy as citizens of the Provinces, by taking away all our special and defined privileges. If there is an institution that is likely to cause us some anxiety; if there is an institution that is likely to threaten us with a change which I do not wish to take into consideration at present—and that I hope never to have to take into consideration during my life, for I hope that it will not take place—it is the Supreme Court. I maintain that the Supreme Court is a great danger to the privileges which we have preserved since Confederation. It will be enough, Mr. Speaker, for me to quote a single instance. Since the Supreme Court has been established, a question has arisen before our tribunals and our public meetings, viz., the contestation of the constitutionality of each Act introduced in and passed by our Local Legislatures. That tribunal has, since its constitution, sought to concentrate into its hands and under its direction all judicial administration; that tribunal has even sought to curtail local power, and has attempted to put into the hands of Federal authority the greatest amount of executive power possible. This has been apparent in several instances; it has taken place in all the Provinces. Has not every Provincial Act of any importance been impugned and appealed against before the Supreme Court; some have been confirmed, others quashed. I maintain that therein is a danger which is increasing daily, for general and private interests will always join issue. Nowadays it is left to the Supreme Court to decide these questions. Nowadays it is no longer, as stipulated in the Act of Confederation, the Minister of Justice or the Governor-General, who have alone the right to sanction or to annul the Acts passed by Provincial Legislatures. The power thus conferred is a very great one, yet it is conferred by the Act of Confederation. At present, this power is duplicated; not only are the Acts of Local Legislatures controlled to-day by the Federal Executive, but they are controlled by a strangely different power, one that is not subject to the approval or the disapproval of the body of electors, and which is independent in its action, and from which there is no appeal. This new tribunal is the Supreme Court, which has to-day the power of deciding the legality or illegality of laws passed by the Provincial Legislatures. I repeat that therein lies no inconsiderable danger, and I remember that during the debate that has taken place on this question, several speakers, abler than myself, showed all the dangers inherent to such an institution. I will, therefore, abstain from enlarging on that point. This is one of the reasons which will cause me to vote in favor of the Bill introduced this evening. But, Mr. Speaker, there is still another reason, and it is that of economy; this is a serious question. Whenever we seek to aid in the progress of the country; whenever we wish to develop the resources of the Dominion of Canada; whenever we ask for various improvements, we are met with the objection that the Budget is already too heavily taxed, that the expenditure is already too considerable. It is a well-known fact in this House and elsewhere, that when important and practical improvements are in question, the public Treasury is always discovered to be too poor and not sufficiently replete with funds. But, Mr. Speaker, when it is a matter of establishing new courts of law, or of increasing judicial expenses, there are always enough funds in the Treasury; the resources of the State are ever equal to this increase of expenditure, and for the past few years a considerable increase is noticeable. I do not blame any particular Administration for this; it is a general censure that I am passing; it arises from a want of attention on the part of our legislators, who, without being aware of it, vote year after year amounts which burden the Budget to a considerable extent. Now the Supreme Court of Canada absorbs annually about $50,000 of the Budget of the Dominion, and I do not, Mr. Speaker, think that we require it at present. What is the need of this Supreme Court, which costs so considerable an amount, and which does not give satisfaction to the Canadian people? Why has there been such a hurry to establish this tribunal, when a short time before a Ministry thought it unnecessary to introduce a Bill instituting the Supreme Court? I am of opinion that the creation of this Court took public opinion by surprise, that it was a surprise for the body of electors, that the Supreme Court was established to meet party views, and rather as a method of patronage than to meet the wants of the people. At the time that Court was established, we could have dispensed with it. Up to that time, the affairs of the country had been well administered; the Acts of the Local Legislatures were controlled by the Federal Executive, and the few questions in dispute, now submitted to the Supreme Court, could be decided by the ordinary tribunals of the country. I wonder also why expenditure should be incurred to keep the Supreme Court, when we can appeal to a tribunal which does not cost Canada anything. I refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. We have there at our disposal a Supreme Court of Appeal, which does not cost us anything, whose decisions have ever been accepted and have been ever entitled to respectful consideration. Nothing prevents us from taking thither the cases decided by our tribunals, if their decisions do not give us satisfaction. The contending parties alone have to pay for this, not the people. Well, as that Court exists, and as I think it will always be in existence, I do not see what objection there is in abolishing the Supreme Court, and allowing things to be as they were before. Let contending parties, who are dissatisfied with the judgment of our Courts, and who wish for a new decision, go to England. It is said that the Supreme Court does not prevent an appeal to the Privy Council. But appeals from the Supreme Court can only be taken in exceptional cases; moreover, if there is an appeal from the Supreme Court to the Privy Council, what need is there of a Supreme Court? There is no longer any reason for its existence, as the intention of Parliament was to establish a tribunal, final in its judgments. I think, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in voting for the abolition of the Supreme Court for three reasons: first, on account of the danger with which that Court threatens us; secondly, on a question of economy; and lastly, because we can dispense with it by carrying our cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There remains, perhaps, a reason of secondary importance, which I have found in the remarks which fell from one of last year's members. It was said that were the Supreme Court abolished, we should not attain the economy we were looking after; we should have to keep the Judges, continue paying them their salaries, or at least pay them a large sum by way of compensation. It seems to me that such an objection has not any weight, and that it is easily answered. Other situations can be found for those Judges of the Supreme Court; Judges will have to be appointed in every Province; vacancies will occur from time to time, and as they occur, justice can be done to the Judges of the Supreme Court by appointing them to the other tribunals of the country; thus no injustice will be done them, and we shall realize a considerable saving. For those reasons, I will vote for the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Montmagny.

Mr. MILLS. Nothing could be more monstrous than to say that the laws of Canada should be construed one way in one Province and another way in another Province. It is just as necessary that we should have a Court whose decisions should give a universal construction of the laws over the Dominion, as that Parliament should have power to pass laws which should operate throughout the whole Dominion. That being my opinion, and I believe the opinion of the House, I beg to move:

That the Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be read the second time this day six months.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). Before the amendment is put I desire to say that I entirely concur in its terms and will vote for it. I exceedingly regret that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) did not see it to be in his line of duty to accept the suggestion made by me during the discussion in the early part of the evening, viz., to allow the question to stand in connection with the proposition made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard). It has been admitted by every hon. member who has spoken on the question that it is the desire of the Government, while accepting the proposition that a Supreme Court of Canada—in the words of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Ouimet)—is a necessity to our Constitution to make the Court, so far as it is possible, acceptable to every Province of the Dominion, and more particularly the Province of Quebec. I need not remind my hon. friends from Quebec that the leader of the Government last Session, when this subject was discussed in this House, made it his opinion, and, of course, the opinion of the Government, that the measures suggested by hon. members from that Province should be met as far as it was possible to do so. Under the circumstances, I regret that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) did not see that all he could possibly hope to accomplish, could have been accomplished by accepting the suggestion thrown out. Now that a vote is to be taken on this question, I trust the amendment of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) will be carried; but, at the same time, the House will remember that it will have to consider the extent to which the constitution of the Court can be amended, if amendment be required, by the Bill before the House of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), or by any other Bill affecting the constitution of the Court in that direction, without striking directly at the life of the Court, which may be introduced by any hon. member during this or future Sessions. I, therefore, trust the House will adopt the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. COURSOL. I feel it to be my duty to say a few words before the vote is taken and mine is recorded. I was not prepared, and I believe very few hon. members were prepared, to have a discussion on this question this day. No one was aware, so far as I know, that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) was to take up the Bill which had no proposer on the notice paper in consequence of the death of Mr. Keeler. Therefore, but few hon. members were prepared to discuss it. I thought that the subject should have been discussed on its merits at the proper time, although I am not prepared to say that I would not ultimately have voted for a measure to abolish the Supreme Court entirely, if changes were not made that would be satisfactory to the Province of Quebec and the Dominion at large. I must express my regret that, notwithstanding the promise made by the Government last Session, that the matter would be considered and made the subject of well-digested legislation this Session, the House is now in the same position as last year. If the matter had been thus dealt with, hon. members would not have been in this unfortunate position—I call it unfortunate to a certain extent—that when it is the means of bringing before the press and the public charges made against the Supreme Court of Canada which ought to have the confidence of the country, and have proper respect shown it. But, in this instance, I cannot avoid saying that there are loud complaints, in Quebec especially, regarding the administration of justice by that Court; whether the fact is due to the system I cannot say, but loud complaints have been made, and they have been admitted, by the Minister of Public Works, to be well grounded. If the House were to vote on the simple question, I would, after what I have heard, feel it to be my duty to vote in favor of the abolition of the Court in toto; but before wiping out an institution that has been in existence six years, I want to satisfy myself in what manner redress can be had, to know what amendments will be brought up, and to judge myself whether such a Court is necessary or not. If a Court of this description does not answer the object for which it was created, how would you replace it? Certainly constitutional questions ought to be decided by a Supreme Court and not by the different Courts of the different Provinces. Except we found some other suitable institution we should not throw the present aside. I believe the proper course to follow would be when the motion of the member for Jacques Cartier comes up, and if it is shown the Court is useless and too expensive for the country, then the House would be in a position to express an opinion on its merits. If, on the contrary, amendments are made to render this tribunal acceptable to all the Provinces, no more will be said on the question; the Court will remain and retain the prominence it ought to possess, which will prevent all complaints in future. One hon. gentleman remarked that, on a popular vote, nine-tenths of the population would vote against this Court. That may be; but we are not here to decide such points. We are now called upon to say whether a Court of this description is necessary or not. I admit there are defects in the system, for it is next to impossible, for French-Canadian lawyers, not fully acquainted with the English language, to appear before that tribunal, only two of whose members can speak French. The other Judges do not understand French, and when you have to plead a case of importance in that Court in French, it is a singular position for a lawyer to have to plead in this Court, before only two competent Judges, as regards French law. It has been remarked that in cases which have been brought before three Judges in the Court of Revision, afterwards before the Court of Appeal, and subsequently the five Judges of the Queen's Bench, presided over by as able a Judge as there is in the Dominion, Sir A. A. Dorion, and which judgments have been obtained in those Courts, those decisions may be reversed by a majority of the Supreme Court, only two of whose members are French-Canadians. Therefore I will vote against the main motion, reserving to myself the right to hear the discussions hereafter, and if the amendments are not satisfactory, and if I do not see amendments of such a nature that they will give justice to our Province, I will say without doubt that the Court, in my opinion, is useless.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, that this question is not one to be submitted to the people any more than any other that comes before this House. We have been elected for the purpose of dealing with all questions that come before Parliament, including such as the present. Though on this question such a popular vote might be obtained as the hon. gentleman has said, that is no reason why we, the representatives of the people, with all the facts and arguments before us, should vote in that sense. We have our responsibility and, of course, will have to do what is in the interest of the country at large. The hon. member for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol) has alluded to the promise made last year by the First Minister, and, I think, confirmed in as strong language afterwards by me at a later period of the debate on this question. I regret the right hon. gentleman is not in his place, because I am sure he would say that any promise he made, or authorized his colleagues to make, would be fulfilled. We have not been in the habit of making promises to Parliament and not fulfilling them. Since the beginning of the Session, nearly two months, we have been discussing the great question of the Pacific Railway, which had to be proceeded with to the exclusion of every other matter. It is still before another branch of Parliament, and we, as the Executive, cannot be indifferent about what is going on in that House any more than in this, in a matter of this kind. If hon. gentlemen will only consider the very few days that have elapsed since that matter was disposed of, and that my hon. friend from Montmagny never intimated to the House or the Government that he was to bring this measure up to-day, they will admit that we must all have been taken by surprise, and unprepared to deal with the question to-day. I regret that the hon. gentleman, even in the interest of his cause, has not thought proper to delay this business till another day. What is the consequence? We have here a motion of the member for Bothwell to practically throw out the Bill. The member for Montmagny will see that those in favor of the maintenance of the Supreme Court—not out of love to it, but taking the broad view of its being one of the institutions of the country, and that though it may be defective or unpalatable as to its constitution or personnel—will say, before we pull down the house because of its defects, we should see whether we cannot remedy them, in order to keep it standing. Under these circumstances, I think that hon. gentlemen who are in favor of amending the constitution of that Court, or even of improving its personnel so as to do justice to the different Provinces, and especially to the Province of Quebec, which complains so bitterly of its working, will admit they will but do us justice by giving us a chance to consider the matter, to see whether we cannot amend that Court in a way to do justice to all the Provinces. I would, therefore, ask such hon. gentlemen as can conscientiously take that course, not to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Montmagny, but to give us a little more time. The Session will not end to-morrow, and we shall have plenty of time to consider the whole question, and the Government will be ready, when the matter comes up again, to say what they will do with regard to the motion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BLAKE. The observation of the hon. member calls for some comment. It is admitted that promises of a very distinct and significant character were made with reference to this institution; and those promises, made as I thought at the time a little rashly, were that during the recess the Government would consider the question and bring down a measure during the Session of Parliament to remedy the grievances which were alleged to exist by some hon. gentlemen. From the statement which the hon. gentleman has now made it appears that the consideration was not to be during the recess, but during the Session of Parliament, and that the time of the House having been occupied from day to day and from hour to hour for the last two months with the other business of Parliament, they have not had an opportunity of considering what measure they will bring down to redress the grievance. So seemed to be the state of the case from another statement of the Minister of Justice at an earlier stage of this debate, when he told us, as a reason why we should take a particular course with reference to this matter, that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) had a measure which, perhaps, might be satisfactory, showing that there had been no consideration of the question on his part—

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). I said that we ought to await that discussion.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman said, which might be satisfactory—I think I caught his phrase—showing that there had not been that consideration of the question by himself or the Government which was necessary in order that they might have reached, before the regular business of the country had commenced, a decision as to what changes they would propose in this Court. I say that such a pledge, given unfortunately, in my opinion, but given solemnly and formally, is not redeemed in its spirit by the statement that when two months of the Session have elapsed the Government will begin to consider how that pledge shall be redeemed. I say it was then their duty to have formulated a policy during the recess, and that they should be ready, when they met the people's representatives in Parliament, to bring down that policy at an early day.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I think it was somewhat questionable whether the establishment of this Court was an advantage to the country or not, and it is more than questionable whether it fully carries out the objects which those who established it had in view. I also think that it is a matter for grave consideration whether we have not too much litigation in the country caused by the multiplication of Courts, and whether the people would not be better served if we had fewer Courts—whether it would not be better to have matters in litigation, small in amount as they generally are in this country, tried before a Judge of Assize, for instance, and a jury, and then go to the full Court for final decision, instead of having them brought before a Court of Appeals and then to the Supreme Court. The truth is, that in many instances railway and insurance companies, and other litigants of that kind, keep on litigating for the purpose of having their own way and driving out of Court those who are unable to stand such litigation. I think it ought to be fully and carefully considered whether it would not be well to do away with this Court altogether and provide some means of deciding constitutional questions, and I think they could be decided, perhaps, quite as well as now, and certainly at less expense. This and the question of whether this Court can be so altered with regard to its administration as to be more satisfactory to the country, are matters for grave consideration; but I agree with several hon. members who have spoken, and notably members of the Government, that we cannot deal with questions like these in the way in which they are sought to be dealt with by this Bill. I think it would be improper for a legislative body suddenly to legislate away a Court like this on a short debate, and by a Bill which makes no provision for many necessary matters which would have to be attended to if the Court were abolished, such as the settlement of pending claims and other matters of that kind. I shall, therefore, vote for the amendment.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, an hon. member who has lately spoken, has pretended that I had taken the House by surprise. Has he then forgotten that ever since 1878, the question, we have taken up to-night, has come up every year? He had, therefore, better keep his surprise for another occasion, and waste less of it on the subject now before us. A moment ago I also heard some one say that I had not given notice, either to the House or the Government, of my intention of taking the place of the hon. member, who first introduced this Bill, and who wished to ask the House to abolish the Supreme Court. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that I did not inform either the House or the Government of the intention I had of taking this step, but if my information is correct, if I have understood the words spoken in this House, it seems to me that it was agreed that when the second reading of the Bill should come up, the Bill was to be allowed to fall through of itself, if no one would, at the time, take it under his protection; on the contrary, if any one was ready to take charge of it, and propose its second reading, it was to be taken up as introduced by its original framer. The House, the Government, every member, Mr. Speaker, had consequently reason to expect that this Bill would come before us to-day in some shape or the other; that it would come before us to die or to be subjected to a debate in this House. No one could be taken by surprise, as every one was expecting this. A certain promise of the Government has been mentioned. When we discussed this question last year, there was a considerable amount of uneasiness in the House; the greater part of the members rose and expressed an opinion adverse to the Supreme Court; the same thing takes place to-day. Last year the members from the Province of Quebec would no doubt have voted against keeping up the Supreme Court, and for the measure then introduced, but the hon. Minister of Public Works rose and asked us to vote in favor of keeping up the Supreme Court, promising us that the time was not far off when the Government itself would grant the remedy asked for these evils, or at any rate an efficacious remedy. Well, Mr. Speaker, the Government has had sufficient time between last Session and the present one to prepare that measure; yet what does it say to-day? That since the beginning of the Session all its time has been taken up with the debate on the Pacific Railway, and that it has not yet prepared the measure promised last year. Now that the Bill is before the House, what is the Government waiting for? It waits that another Bill, introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, should be discussed, in order to be able to decide what it shall do. That is not, I think, what Government promised us last Session. If, in the interval between the two Sessions, it has not had the time to prepare that measure which it had, nevertheless, solemnly promised us, I do not think that now, when its time is all absorbed with getting its Bills carried and with enforcing its policy, it has the time to prepare what is expected of it. But there is more. When the Government asks us for another delay, when it asks us to wait, at least, for the reading of the Bill which the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is about to introduce with regard to the Supreme Court, it does not even give us the assurance that it will adopt that measure. The Government is cognizant of its tenor; it knows what that Bill asks for; it is not ignorant of the fact, that if passed it would do away with one of the strongest objections brought against the Supreme Court by the Province of Quebec, and by the other Provinces of the Confederation. Nevertheless, the Government has declined to bind itself; it has not declared that it would adopt the measure now introduced. Under these circumstances, I think that we, members of the Province of Quebec, must enforce our rights. I heard the hon. Minister of Public Works say that the question was not one that should be submitted to the people. I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, that we have come hither with a mandat impératif, but after the elections of 1878 we made promises to the people in order to gain its confidence. With regard to certain questions, which had become subjects of public discussion, we had to make sacred promises, which we are in honor bound to keep. We promised to the people that we would work against the Supreme Court when we should be here, and that, for several reasons; not only with the object of diminishing the expenditure, but also to cause to disappear the wretched state of affairs now existing, and about which all the members who have risen in this House have expressed their discontent. Who is the member who has spoken this afternoon to defend the existing state of things? All agreed to say that it could not be allowed to exist any longer. Well, if it cannot exist any longer, then let us vote for the Bill that I have the honor of introducing to the House. It simply asks for the sweeping away of the Supreme Court, and with it will be swept away all obstacles which have been raised by its creation. An hon. member, the one for Montreal East (Mr. Coursol), has asked, I think, what tribunal we should substitute for the one which we wish to abolish? Well, Mr. Speaker, what was the tribunal which the Supreme Court superseded? Before it existed, where was the tribunal that it could have superseded? Nowhere. And yet, in those days, the country was not more in debt than it is to-day; the country was making just as rapid strides towards progress. Several members seem desirous of veiling their decision and of rallying in favor of the cause of the Supreme Court; but let them not forget the hostile votes cast against the institution of that Court; let them not forget that several of them introduced motions, and made speeches against its creation; and yet it was not sought at the time to fill a gap, which assuredly did not exist in the minds of those hon. members. Why, then, is it asked to-day which is the tribunal that is to take the place of the one we are asked to abolish? As the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) has said, Mr. Speaker, we have already the tribunal that we require; we have the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England. In that Court, the contending parties have to pay the costs of suits, and the people are not required to spend their money, an advantage greatly appreciated by them. If I look at the question from a pecuniary point of view, it is the people themselves who pay most of the expenses; it is the people who pay the Judges' salaries; it is the people who pay the working expenses of that Court, and those expenses amount to at least about $60,000 a year. And, as has been remarked by the hon. member for Portneuf, that Court has cost since its creation more than $300,000 without our deriving any advantage therefrom. Last year, and this year, there have been nothing but complaints about it, and next year it will be the same. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) tell us that there was one advantage in taking a case to Her Majesty's Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and that was that of being able to plead in a language which one appears to ignore or which one cannot understand in the Supreme Court. Better justice is thus rendered to litigants before the Privy Council. There are men in the Privy Council who are statesmen, who understand languages perfectly; men before whom we can plea in our own language in the interest of our clients, and who are certain to understand us. Such is not the case in the Supreme Court. There are a thousand reasons for the abolition of the Supreme Court, and I do not see any that can justify the actual state of things. The hon. Minister of Justice and the hon. Minister of Public Works have expressed their regret and my not consenting to the proposal of suspending the second reading of that Bill. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, of the agreement entered into. I could not consent to a delay in the reading of that Bill, when it was agreed, and such was the agreement, that it should fall through of itself, unless some member rose and asked the House to be allowed to foster it. I was thus naturally obliged to take it under my protection, in order to prevent its falling through. Having done so, I had resolved, as I said this afternoon, to suspend its reading, when an amendment supervened asking that the debate be adjourned. We were nevertheless still willing to suspend the reading of the Bill, on condition that the hon. member for Maskinongé should withdraw his motion for the adjournment of the debate; the hon. member consented, but there was a member who refused his consent, and you are aware that when an amendment is put to the vote, it can only be withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the House. Consequently, the blame thrown on me, for refusing to accept the proposal of the hon. Ministers of Justice and of Public Works, is not founded on fact, as the reasons I have given point conclusively to the contrary. Under these circumstances, and considering that the Government has noways introduced a measure in conformity with the promises made by it last year, I think it is my duty to vote against the six months' hoist proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell.

Amendment (Mr. Mills), six months' hoist, agreed to on the following division:—

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 12) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, said: It is, perhaps, necessary that I should add something to what I said when I had the honor of introducing this measure to the notice of this House. It is difficult, perhaps, to approach this subject—not because there is not a great deal to be said about it, but because the subject is of so wide a character, and embraces so many considerations, that it is almost impossible to limit oneself to any particular point, and because it is almost impossible to embrace the whole subject within the limit of an ordinary address. I do not propose to inflict upon the House a speech of any great length on the subject, because I think the main feature—the principle of the Bill, that is the establishment of some tribunal for the determination of railway matters and matters concerning the difficulties which arise between railway companies and individuals—is sufficiently well known and sufficiently appreciated as to render it unnecessary that I should take up the time of the House at any great length. But it is, perhaps, proper that I should make a few observations in asking the House to make a change of this kind. It has been said more than once during this afternoon's debate—if it is not improper to refer to the fact—that we have in this country a great many courts, more, in the estimation of some hon. gentlemen, than are essential to the wants of the people; but many courts as we have, I think I can safely say that we have no Court that has the requisite and proper machinery to deal with the difficulties that arise in connection with railway companies; and though, as I shall show in a moment or two, the law requires railway companies to do many things which they do not do, I think I am safe in saying that we have no adequate means of enforcing the law. If it be a fact, as I think I can show, that while there is now, and while there has been for many years back, a law requiring the railway companies to give, for instance, facilities to other railway companies in the interchange of traffic, requiring them not to deal unfairly or inequitably with individuals carrying on business with them; if it is a fact that there is no efficient means by which railway companies can be compelled to obey that law—if in point of fact the railway companies are substantially above the law—then I think I make out a case for the constitution of some kind of tribunal in order that that law may be made effective. Now I shall refer to the existing law, because, though it is well known to lawyers, it may not be so well known to the general public; for, although it has been the law for many years, it is practically a dead letter. The second sub-section of the 60th section of the Consolidated Railway Act provides:

"But every railway company shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable facilities to any other railway company for the receiving and forwarding and delivering of traffic upon and from the several railways belonging to or worked by such companies respectively, and for the return of carriages, trucks, and other vehicles; and no company shall give or continue any preference or advantage to, or in favor of any particular company, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, nor shall any company subject any particular company or any particular description of traffic to any prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever; and every railway company having or working a railway which forms part of a continuous line of railway, or which intersects any other railway, or which has any terminus, station, or wharf of the one near any terminus, station or wharf of the other, shall afford all reasonable facilities for receiving and forwarding by the one railway all the traffic arriving by the other, without any reasonable delay, and without any preference or advantage, or prejudice or disadvantage, and so that no obstruction may be offered in the using of such railway as a continuous line of communication, and so that all reasonable accommodation may at all times, by the means aforesaid, be mutually afforded by and to the said railway companies; and any agreement made between any two or more railway companies contrary to the foregoing provisions, shall be unlawful, null and void."

Now, a consideration of that sub-section shows that there is this positive enactment that railway companies shall so carry on and conduct their business, that, in point of fact, one railway company, although managed by one board of directors, shall give to another railway company, managed by another board of directors, the same facilities as if both were under the management of one board; in other words, that railways, which have now become the great highways of this country as in other countries, are to be, as the law declared they shall be, public highways to be used, not for the purpose of simply making money and paying large dividends, but to be used for the benefit and behoof of the people at large and for the purpose of facilitating traffic; to be used for the convenience of the public and as if all the railways in the Dominion were under the control of one board of management and one company. There is another sub-section also which establishes the same joint principle, that is the latter part of sub-section 6, Section 17, which declares:

"The same tolls shall be payable at the same time and under the same circumstances upon all goods and by all persons, so that no undue advantage, privilege or monopoly may be afforded to any person or class of persons by any by-laws relating to the tolls."

That may be called the equality clause. It provides that tolls shall be the same to all who require to use the road. The other clause I read requires that railway companies shall so conduct their business that traffic shall be interchanged and cars run with such speed and at such time as to afford the shippers of goods the means of transit from one end of the country to the other, although these roads may be under different managements. Although this has been the law for many years—it has not been incorporated for the first time in the Act of 1879—I think I can appeal to every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House, to say whether, from his own experience, he does not know that each and every railway company, according to its means, be it a large or small company, and whatever its opportunities may be, violate that law and decline to interchange traffic with one another, unless it suits their convenience, and do not carry on their business upon equal terms and rates to all their customers, but deal as to them seems meet for the purpose, not only of increasing their dividends, but perhaps for the purpose of crushing out rival enterprises, or gratifying spleen or malice against individuals or companies, and there is no redress. Now, why do I say there is no redress? Because all that can be accomplished under the law as it stands to-day in Canada is this: If a man is made to pay more tolls than he ought to pay, he may get back what has been improperly exacted from him, but we all know that he gets no compensation as intended by law, and that it is no compensation for a man to be told: "You pay the money now and you can go into Court afterward and recover the excess of payment we have exacted from you." I do not think their is any other redress open. What is the result? The result is that railway companies take the litigant from Court to Court, from the Court where the suit was first instituted to the Court of Appeal and then to the next higher Court, and so on, leading him as they say, such a dance as would probably deter him and others in the future from attempting to enforce the law or secure a redress of his grievances. Now this subject has been considered in the Mother Country, and I think it would be unwise to attempt any legislation here to remedy these evils without having some reference to the means that have been attempted in the motherland to accomplish the same end we desire to attain. In the Commons' Paper of 1872, is to be found a very instructive report of a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament, where the whole subject is very fully reviewed. We find there that at a very early period the difficulty we complain of grew up there, and from time to time Committees of one or both Houses were empowered to consider these questions. These reports are all collected in one Joint Report of a Committee in 1872. One of these reports was made in 1846, and stated:

"After mature consideration your Committee has come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary that some departments of the Executive Government so constituted as to command general respect and confidence, should be charged with the supervision of Railways and Canals with full power to enforce such regulations as may be from time to time indispensable for the accommodation and general interests of the public * * *. Your Committee entertain no doubt that a department so constituted, might, in addition to those duties, afford material assistance to Parliament in relation to legislation. It might save, by preliminary investigation as regards facts, much expense to parties applying for Bills, and much of the valuable time of both Houses, without in any way interfering with the paramount powers of Parliament and its sole adjudication as to the rights of property."

The result of that was that a Commission was appointed in 1846, something in the nature, it seems, of the Committee of our Privy Council. There were five members of the Commission, of whom three held seats in the House of Commons, and they were instructed to report on special cases referred to them, and also upon Private Bills, and generally to deal with cognate matters. Now, some people think that if larger powers were given to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, it would be unnecessary to appoint the Commission proposed by this Bill. But we find that the experiment has been tried in England in the most elaborate form, where a Committee was constituted, composed of railway experts who were specially delegated with those duties which the Committee of our Privy Council discharges; that is, they were political in their nature, and that necessarily distract their attention from the determination of matters of this kind. This Commission was appointed in 1846, and in 1854 it was that a Committee of which Lord Cardwell was chairman, made these two propositions at the conclusion of their report:

"That every company should afford proper facilities for forwarding traffic, and that no preferences should be given."

On these two propositions that clause in the sub-section I read a moment ago is founded, and is substantially the same as the English Act Well, by that legislation, by the Canal and Traffic Act of 1854, they abolished the Commission which had acted from 1846 to 1853. They found that it had not effected what it had been designed to effect, and they proposed that one of the Courts of the country should deal with the subject. That proposal has found advocates in this Parliament possibly, and certainly in the press. It has been suggested, why not hand over to one of the Courts, with the authority to delegate some power to an engineer or a barrister, the powers it is proposed to confer on this Commission. Well, if we are to be guided by the experience of the old country, we find that the Court of Common Pleas failed to give satisfaction. The result of the action of this Court is stated in this report as follows:—

"The latter of these principles is an amplified statement of the general law relating to carriers, and no fault has been found with the decisions made by the Court in respect of this part of the Act. But complaints have been made that the difficulty and expense of taking a case before the Court of Common Pleas are such as to deter any but wealthy traders who have a great interest at stake, from contesting cases with the powerful railway companies; and questions of undue preference are often so technical, so dependent on special circumstances of railway management, and so closely connected with questions of "due facilities," as to lead the Committee to the conclusion that even this part of the Act has not been as much brought into play as it would have been, if speedy and summary reference could have been made to a tribunal having practical knowledge of the subject."

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. What subject did they deal with?

Mr. McCARTHY. They had power to deal with all subjects relating to railways, to issue injunctions to the companies to afford facilities for traffic, and so forth. When the Bill was before the House of Lords, Lord Campbell uttered these words, which were afterwards found to be prophetic:

"That was not a code which the Judges could interpret; it left them altogether to exercise their discretion as to what they might deem reasonable. They were, besides, to form a just judgment on all matters of complaint relating to railway management that might come before them, and they were to lay down a code of regulations for the government of railway companies. The Judges, and himself among them, felt themselves incompetent to decide on these matters. He had spent a great part of his life in studying the laws of his country, but he confessed he was wholly unacquainted with railway management, as well as the transit of goods by boats; he knew not how to determine what was a reasonable fare, what was undue delay, or within what time trucks and boats should be returned. He believed he had correctly represented the feelings of all his learned brethren on the Bench, in reference to this Bill, with one exception, whom he mentioned with honor, respect, and reverence; he meant the learned Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas."

And again:

"He (Lord Campbell) would humbly suggest, that if the discharge of the duties imposed by the Bill should devolve on the Court of Common Pleas, where there were Judges as learned as ever sat in Westminster Hall, it would give satisfaction to the country; at the same time, however, he did not propose to throw on other Judges a task which ought not to have been imposed on any of them. They should have a lay tribunal for the decision of questions of the nature contemplated by the Bill, and not one composed of the Judges."

With reference to the proposition to create a Court of Railway Commissioners, the report states:

"How such a body should be constituted is a further question. No existing institution possesses the necessary qualities. The Board of Trade has not the requisite judicial character or means of action; a Court of Law fails in practical knowledge and administrative facility; and a Committee of the Houses of Parliament has no permanence. A new body ought, therefore, in our opinion, to be constituted for the purpose, which might be called the "Railway and Canal Commission." It should consist of not less than three persons of high standing, one of whom should be an eminent lawyer, and one a person well acquainted with railway management."

That Commission was tried for some years and was found to be a failure; then one of the Courts was given increased jurisdiction and arbitrary power, and after several years experience that was also found to be a failure; and finally, after the matter was gone into in a most exhaustive and thorough manner, it was found that the only way to deal properly with the railway companies was to appoint a board of men of practical experience and knowledge who would be able to deal promptly and effectively with the grievances complained of with respect to railway companies. Now, has that Commission given satisfaction? It has been in force since 1873. If it has not given satisfaction it would not be proper to propose here, as I do in this Bill, to re-enact in substance the provisions of the Railway Commission Bill of England. Well, what do we find? We find that this Commission, who are bound to report to Parliament every year what they have done in the preceding year, have been able to settle most of the questions which had puzzled all the existing bodies, whether legal or administrative, who had attempted to deal with them. We find that they have compelled railways to carry out the law of the land practically, efficiently and inexpensively, and when the time came for its renewal—for it was originally proposed to remain in force only five years—the Government proposed not only to renew it, but to give it increased powers. The late Government of Lord Beaconsfield announced that to be their intention, and I notice that the other day Mr. Chamberlain, in answer to a question, stated that the present Government intended to take the question into consideration, and deal with it in the same spirit. I need not take up the time of the House in showing in what way this Bill proved to be efficient. I would refer any hon. gentlemen who are curious on that point, to Mr. Hodge's work on railways, one of the leading authorities on the subject, from which I will read an extract:

"The Railway Commissioners have now exercised the jurisdiction transferred to them in 1873, for more than three years. It seems desirable to attempt to form some estimate of the law which they have administered. It may be observed, at the outset, that the cases which have been brought before the Commissioners already, nearly equal in number those which were brought before the Judges under the Act of 1874; that, whereas the Judges frequently deferred in opinion and pronounced separate judgments, the Commissioners have always co-ocurred in one unanimous judgment; and that, although the judgments of the Commissioners nowhere directly conflict the decisions of the Judges, and made reference to the principles laid down in those decisions, the Commissioners have, in no case, referred to a particular decision by name."

On reference to the reports of the Commissioners, it will be found that in no case but one has an appeal from their judgment been allowed.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Are any of them lawyers?

Mr. McCARTHY. I think two of them are not lawyers and one is. One has only to read the reports submitted to Parliament and their judgments to see that they thoroughly understand their business—that they know perfectly well the railway laws as well as the practical working of the railways. It is true that recently there have been some applications by way of prohibitions, that the railway companies have felt that the Commissioners have been trenching beyond the limits assigned to them by Parliament, and in one case, not very long ago, at all events, it was decided that the Railway Commission had gone beyond the limits assigned to it by their Commission in directing companies to construct larger stations and provide in that way more facilities for the people. Still, it is quite different to say that within the limits of the Act of Parliament their judgments have ever been successfully denied. I propose to transfer by this Bill most of the powers which are vested in the Railway Committee of the Privy Council to this Railway Commission. I do not propose that they should all be transferred. I do not propose, for instance, that the right should be taken from the Committee of the Privy Council to say when a railway should be open for traffic. I think that is a matter of such vital importance, that perhaps it is proper the Government of the day should be charged with the responsibility of saying where a railway should be open for traffic, or when, having got out of repair, it should be closed.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Does the Commission give that power?

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot say. It is possible it does. There is not, of course, a Railway Committee in the English Privy Council. This, I think, should be a Court formed for the purpose of determining the disposition of matter rather than administering them. It is in its nature a practical tribunal, but it is not for the purpose of deciding matters of that kind until it is formally brought before them. I also thought that the power of closing railway companies when the roads are out of repair, should be left with the Government, but that in most other matters the jurisdiction should be handed over to this Commission—in point of fact, that the Commission should do all that is necessary to be done, in order to show that the law is carried out. If the House will pardon me, I will read the conclusions arrived at by this Railway Committee of 1872, upon the various suggestions made as to how roads should be managed. It was proposed—I, myself, had the suggestion made to me—that it was in the power of Parliament to fix absolutely the tolls, to determine on the Statute-books how much a railway should charge for fares and freight. After discussing that matter very fully the Committee reported as follows:—

“ Pressed by these difficulties, the proposers of equal mileage have admitted that there must be numerous exceptions—e. g., where there is sea competition (i. e., as above stated, at about three-fifths of the railway stations of the United Kingdom), where low rates for long distances will bring a profit, or where the article carried at low rates is a necessary, such as coal. It is scarcely necessary to observe that such exceptions as these, whilst inadequate to meet all the various cases, destroy the value of ‘equal mileage’ as a principle, or the possibility of applying it as a general rule.”

Then it was said that the rates should be fixed by relation to cost and profit on capital, and that is the only provision we have in the law, viz.: that when a railway company was proved to be earning a certain profit the Government should have the power to determine its rates of toll. That was not found by any means to be practicable, and the view of the Committee was as follows:—

“ But the data thus assumed are very difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain. The original cost of the particular line; the cost of carriage of the particular goods on that portion of the line, as compared with the cost of carriage of other goods on the same line; and of the same on other goods on other portions of the line; and the proportion of all these to the whole charges and expenses of the company, are items which it might be difficult for the companies themselves to give, and impossible for a Committee or Government department to ascertain. Still more difficult is the determination of profit. The companies are now entitled to make as much profit as they can, so long as they do not exceed their maximum rates and any attempt to establish a standard of charge depending on profit involves the necessity of determining by law or authority what shall be the maximum dividend. The difficulties attending any proposal of this kind are more fully considered below, and are shown to be practically insuperable.”

“ The proposal to fix a standard for rates and fares by relation to cost and profit may therefore be dismissed as impracticable.”

Then it was proposed there should be a revision of rates and fares. The Committee concluded also that was impracticable. Thus almost every proposition that I have seen in print or heard in discussing this subject with railway men and others, was considered as late as 1872 by this Committee of both Houses to be impracticable after they had taken evidence of the engineers and the principal railway and business men. The result was that the Committee resolved that the recommendation of the Royal Commission as to the publishing of rates—which is one of the clauses of this Bill—should be adopted. The rates were to be published at the railway stations. The suggestions adopted, and adopted on the evidence of Mr. Broughton, then manager of the Mid-Wales Railway—now, I believe, general manager of the Great Western Railway here—Mr. Price, chairman of the Midland Railway Company, Mr. Allport, its manager, and Sir E. Watkin, chairman of the Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway, were as follows:—

“ Every company is to have the power of making a through rate for goods to any place on any other line. The companies over whose lines the goods are sent are to forward them without delay or obstruction. If there is any difficulty about the proportion in which the charge is to be divided between the sending and the owning companies, the question is to be settled by the court above referred to, which is also to have the power of enforcing the law, and of settling every question between the companies.”

Then they determined that a new tribunal should be established:

“ One thing, at any rate, is obvious from the previous discussion of the proposed suggestions for regulating the relations of railway companies to the public, viz., that it is difficult to provide any fixed or self-acting rules which will, through the medium of self-interest or of the ordinary action of law, do what is necessary to protect the public. Consequently, almost every witness, whether representing the commercial or the railway interest, has suggested the appeal to some board or tribunal, which shall settle disputes, and, in fact, do what self-interest or the law itself cannot do. What this tribunal should be, and what its functions, are questions on which witnesses differ.”

I do not propose to read all the suggestions, but only those more pertinent to my subject:

“ The fourth function would be that of investigating complaints of fairness or unfairness between traders, or between towns and districts, so far as they can be raised under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act. The decisions of the courts as between different classes of traders have, as noticed in an earlier part of this Report, been satisfactory in principle, and there seems no reason to suppose that any tribunal specially constituted would come to sounder conclusions. But then it is urged that the expense of going before the Court of Common Pleas is so great as to give the wealthy companies great advantages over private traders; that the absence of publication of rates prevents the trader from knowing whether he has a case or not, and that a court constituted of persons specially acquainted with the subject would settle questions of this kind without the expense and difficulty which is necessary in order to obtain decisions from a court of law. It is further urged that questions concerning the fairness of charges are matters of administrative policy rather than simple questions of law, and would be better dealt with by a special tribunal. There is considerable force in these statements; and if it is found desirable to establish a special tribunal for the purpose of settling other questions arising under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, it seems also desirable that it should decide questions arising under this part of it.”

The fifth function is as follows:—

“ The fifth function of such a tribunal would be to see that proper facilities are given for the forwarding of passengers and goods under that part of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act which relates to this subject.”

“ This is much insisted on by various railway managers, and especially by Mr. Broughton, Sir E. Watkin, and Mr. Price. They point out that the Act in question has not operated directly for want of administrative efficiency in the tribunal; and, as incident to a general scheme of through rates, facilities, and running powers, they would give the court power to settle all questions between different railway companies concerning the interchange of traffic; the terms on which through fares rates are to be divided; the charges for the use of stations, sidings, warehouses, and servants; and, when running powers are given, the various questions arising out of them. They would also give this court the power, in cases where proper facilities are refused, of giving running powers against the defaulting company; and even in some cases, not very clearly defined, of acquiring joint stations, new junctions, or additional lines.”

I observe the railway managers do not insist on it here in the same way, because nearly every railway company has petitioned against this Bill in language which is strikingly similar. Here Mr. Broughton, Sir E. Watkin and Mr. Price were very strong in favor of a tribunal being established which would see that proper facilities were given for the forwarding of passengers and goods under that part of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act which relates to the subject. The sixth function was defined as follows:—

“ The sixth proposed function of this tribunal would be the control of tolls on canals in the hands of railway companies. If, as above suggested, power is given to canal companies to make a through toll, and if provision is made for putting an end to bar or compensation tolls, questions arising under such a law might conveniently be referred to the same tribunal. And there seems to be no reason why it should not decide, in the case of canals, any questions similar in character to those which it has to decide in the case of railways.”

Now these were in substance the conclusions arrived at by the Committee, which were embodied in an Act of Parliament, and which I have substantially copied in the Bill before the House. I have already pointed out that the Act has on the whole, given satisfaction both to the railway companies and the business public.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Was it opposed by the railway companies?

Mr. McCARTHY. Both business and railway men agreed that the attempt to administer the Railway Acts, as desired by the Parliament and in the spirit of its legislation, had proved to be utterly abortive.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. The railway companies did not say that.

Mr. McCARTHY. They agreed it was necessary, but differed as to the tribunal; but the Committee agreed it should be a tribunal as created by that Court. If it be true that we have laws that be not carried into effect, and that the railway companies are practically beyond all law, by reason of the want of a proper tribunal to carry it out, it does appear to follow, as naturally as night follows day, that Parliament is bound to create such a tribunal as will administer the laws enacted. It is said there can be no such tribunal—that you can get no men in the community of such character and standing as to give confidence to their decisions—that they would be either bought up, be influenced, prejudiced or worked on, in the interest of this or that company. I would be sorry to make such a humiliating statement, or to say that you cannot get men outside the profession to which I belong, because it is admitted that the Judges are above corruption, that among the railway men and men experienced in business cannot be found men honest and honorable enough to administer the law justly, uninfluenced by bribes. Therefore, I think that suggestion should be scouted. It has been proposed to confer jurisdiction on the Supreme Court or one of the higher Provincial Courts. The ready answer is that it has been tried in England, and the learned Judges of the Court of Common Pleas found themselves incapable of administering the railway law. It being not a matter of law, but a matter of administration, shows the correctness of my view. The same difficulty will be found here. It has been suggested that the Privy Council could be made use of. I think that if any hon. gentleman who belongs to that honorable body, and is a Privy Councillor, would consider the workings of the Railway Commission in England, he would be satisfied that dealing in this matter with railway companies is wholly beyond and outside the sphere of a Privy Councillor, in connection with the Government of the day. I think it would be impossible for my hon. friend, who so well administers the department of our Railways and Canals, to devote the time necessary to sit in judgment from day to day and determine questions of this kind, that have to be determined between traders and railway companies and between different railway companies themselves. I think such matters have to be disposed of speedily, or justice is practically denied. The investigations I have made have satisfied me, and would satisfy anyone, that it is practically impossible to substitute for this tribunal any Committee of the Privy Council. Besides, it was tried as an expedient in England in 1846. Their first plan was almost identical with that one. It was a tribunal composed of men partly engaged in public life, and of business men and others, who were found utterly inefficient for the practical administration of the Railway Act. It comes to this: we are here incapable of enforcing our laws, and are we to have said, and said truly, that railway companies will not obey our law? So we have to give to the people some tribunal by which our railway law can be carried out. I heard the member for Bothwell say the Bill was ultra vires. I have considered that point also, and think the hon. gentleman will find, though I know he is a very high authority on constitutional points, and all matters of a theoretical character, that this is not beyond our power. This is a measure dealing with matters of trade and commerce, which belong to this Parliament. I go further, and say that, in my humble judgment, it will be found we have power not only to regulate the traffic on railways incorporated by this Parliament, but to deal with all railway companies, no matter were they obtained their charters; because we should be dealing substantially with matters of trade and commerce which are within the purview of the powers given by the British North America Act.

Mr. MILLS. Suppose a railway was owned by a local Government, or a canal?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not think that will make any difference. If we have power to deal with trade and commerce, even should a Local Government go into trading, we should have rights over it also. My hon. friend will not contend that a Local Government would not, in that case, be subject to taxation, or such other action by this Parliament. It certainly could not legislate itself out of the jurisdiction of Parliament by going into a business wholly and entirely foreign to the duties prescribed by the British North America Act—

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How are the Commissioners in England paid?

Mr. McCARTHY. Out of the Consolidated Fund; £5,000 is the salary paid to the Chief Commissioner in England. I propose to draw the attention of the House to some amendments to the Railway Act. Section twenty-six confers now very considerable powers. Section twenty-eight enacts in the words and terms of the English law, a clause which has been in force there for many years. It is called in England the equality clause, and we have something like it, though not in its entirety, in sub-section six of section seventeen of the Railway Act, which I will read. The latter part of sub-section six, says:

“But the same tolls shall be payable at the same time and under the same circumstances upon all goods and by all persons, so that no undue advantage, privilege or monopoly may be afforded to any person or class of persons by any by-law relating to the tolls.”

The new section I propose to add to the Railway Act, is this:

“And whereas it is expedient that a railway company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railways so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company or of particular parties; therefore it shall be lawful for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in their special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorized to be taken, either upon the whole or upon any particular portions of the railway as they shall think fit: Provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton, per mile or otherwise, in respect of all passengers and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine passing only over the same portion of the line of railway under the same circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favor of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway.”

This clause is what is what is called in England the equality clause. Hon. gentlemen will find it in the Imperial Act VIII Victoria Cap. 27. They will find that it is commented upon by Judges and explained to be an alteration of the old law with regard to carriers. The old law was that a carrier was bound to carry whatever was offered, that he was to charge no more than a fair and reasonable rate, but there was no law by which he was bound to carry for A.B. at the same rate as for C.D. But the railway law of England and the law practically in existence in this country for many years was, that these carriers should carry on equal terms for everybody; and this clause on the proposed Bill is only an enlargement of the clause which I read, one which, should the Commissioners be appointed, will enable them to refer as a guide to the English law and the decisions which have been rendered upon it by the Judges. I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any greater length further than to refer to the manner of paying this Court. If these Commissioners are to command the respect they must be well paid; if they are to be above suspicion—and they ought to be above suspicion—they should be sufficiently compensated to make them independent of the supposition or the possibility of their being open to receive bribes. It is not for me to suggest how they shall be paid; I have proposed a plan here—it may not be a good one, but as I take it that if this Bill is to become law, it must practically be taken by the Government. They will doubtless be able, in that event, to deal with the question of remuneration. I have provided that the Commissioners shall have power, under the authority of the Governor in Council, to fix a scale of fees, and I may say in passing that this clause has been grossly misrepresented. It has been stated that the Bill provides that the Commissioners shall have power of imposing fees to pay themselves, but this is not the meaning or the intention of the clause. The power which they are given of fixing a scale of fees, is simply the power which is given to the Judges of any other Court; but they are not given the power of assessing upon railway companies or individuals. Any other fees than those which shall be fixed under the authority of the Governor in Council, and these costs they are to distribute according to the justice of cases which may come before them. I admit that the method proposed is not a very satisfactory method, and I doubt if sufficient could be realized from the fees to pay these gentlemen a sufficient sum to compensate them for the duties they will be called upon to discharge. But I venture to throw out a suggestion in the hope that it may meet the favor of the powers that be. When the insurance companies were put under the control of this Parliament by an Act of this House—when they were required to have licenses, and to make returns and so on—the tax which was put on the premiums earned by these companies, was found to be nearly enough to pay for the officer who was appointed to act on behalf of the Government in looking after these companies. It would not take a very large tax on the earnings of railway companies to provide the funds for the payment of the members of this Court. The gross annual earnings of our railway companies is about $20,000,000, and a tax upon that sum, at the rate of one mill on the dollar, would form a fund more than sufficient to pay the Commission which it is proposed to create by this Bill. But perhaps hon. gentlemen may take a higher ground. If this Court is necessary in the interest of the country at large, it may be decided that its expenses shall be paid, like those of other tribunals, out of the public revenue; that the costs should be funded and the fees paid by stamps, and to such an extent go towards meeting the expenditure. These, however, are matters of detail. If the public think there is a necessity for creating this Court, they are not going to be deterred by any costs that may be involved, from agreeing to its establishment. In conclusion, I may say that I have endeavored to show why I think this Bill should become law, my principal reason being that we really have a law now which we have no power to administer, and that there is no other means, so far as experience has shown, of securing the administration of that law, except by the creation of such a tribunal. I may refer to what is going on in the neighboring country. I believe that Congress at this very Session is engaged with a question of this kind. I believe that three of the State Legislatures—that of Pennsylvania is one, I forget the others—are also dealing with the question. I find from a late number of the American Law Review the report of an address by the President of the English Law Society, commenting on the necessity for such legislation. We know from our own individual experience in our respective localities that something of the kind is necessary in this country.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has the report of the Select Committee of the Legislature of New York which was quite lately appointed to deal with this subject; and if he has also the Bill which was passed by that Legislature?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have it here.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The Bill is short and it covers the whole ground, I think.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it has not passed.

Mr. CASGRAIN. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. He will find that it was passed.

Mr. McCARTHY. No. The Committee reported the Bill, which passed through the Lower House, but was lost in the Upper House. It was re-introduced, having been recommended by the Governor in his Message this Session. I think the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) read a passage from it in his speech in the railway debate.

Mr. BLAKE. I think that perhaps the hon. Minister of Railways will favor us with the views of the Government on this important question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that the Government have not considered this measure, but there is no doubt that the question which has been brought to the notice of the House is one of great importance. The very interesting statement which has been made by my hon. friend shows that he has given very careful and exhaustive consideration to the subject with which he proposes to deal. But I think there are some points of difference between the administration of the railway lines in England and those of this country, which would strike hon. members as placing us in a very difficult and different position in relation to the administration of such laws. The British Islands, of course, are not in any immediate competition with any foreign country in relation to their roads. It is well known that many of the Canadian Railways are placed in a position to encounter the sharpest possible competition with the lines in the adjoining Republic—great lines of railway owned by powerful corporations and wielding an immense amount of influence—and that any measure that would tend to hamper the administration of Canadian railways in competition with those of the United States, may be attended with very great disaster to the trade and business of Canada. That is a feature of the question to which my hon. friend did not seem to address himself, in the remarks which he made to the House, to-night, and I think it is an important feature. Then there is the question raised by my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills): I am afraid that there will be found a good deal of difficulty in that direction. The Railway Committee of the Privy Council, as my hon. friend knows, under the present operation of the law, is entirely confined to Dominion railways. We have never exercised, and have not claimed the power to exercise, any control over railways that are not under the control of this Parliament. No railway that is constructed under the authority of this Parliament can be open or operated without the approval of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. Any number of railways may be constructed in any of the Provinces under the authority of local charters, and we have no voice in their construction or administration. The law that imposes upon the Dominion Government a proper regard for the safety of life and property does not at all apply to the administration of the local railways, and if my hon. friend is right, the law, as at present administered, falls very far short of the powers that ought to be exercised by the Governor in Council as at present understood. I have no doubt that we have no power to deal with any portion of the railway system of this country except such portion as is under the control of this Parliament, otherwise it would place us in a very anomalous position in carrying out such extreme powers as are here alluded to. Then there is the question of expense. It is not the most important question, perhaps, but still it is important. The hon. gentleman has stated that these powers cannot be delegated to any of the existing Courts, that it is necessary to create a new Court under his Bill. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that any person who takes the trouble, as he has taken trouble, to investigate the action of the Railway Commission in England, would arrive at his conclusion that it would impose upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council duties so onerous that I am afraid they would hesitate to assume them. It is just a question whether considerable additional power might not be delegated to that body to be used in the way they use their present power. But if you are to have a new Court to whom these powers are to be delegated, if you are to select three men whose knowledge of railway management and business is sufficient to give them a standing and character, it would be necessary, in order that their decisions might carry confidence with the great railway corporations and the public, to provide very large salaries for these Judges. When we consider that railway managers in this country have enjoyed salaries of $20,000 or $25,000 per annum for their services, and that the knowledge and information that would be demanded of the Judges of this Court ought to be equal to those of the best railway administrators in this country, I think my hon. friend will come to the conclusion that to obtain the services of such men very large salaries would require to be provided, especially as they would be required to discharge these duties more efficiently than the ablest Judges we now have in the country could discharge them. I am quite satisfied that he would have to abandon the idea of levying such fees as would enable the expenses of this Court to be properly met, because it would become so onerous as to bring an amount of odium upon an attempt to arrive at a solution in that way which, I am afraid, would be greater than it could bear. I do not propose, however, to go into any lengthy discussion on this matter. It is one of the greatest possible moments, and I think the principle of having some such tribunal recognized, may be conceived by the House without any difficulty, and the question itself remitted to the Committee on Railways and Canals, after hon. gentlemen present have expressed their opinions upon the Bill at this stage. When the Bill is sent to the Committee it can undergo a much closer investigation, and we will have an opportunity of calling to our aid the experience of the ablest men in the country who have been charged with the duty of managing railways. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the second reading of this Bill or of committing the Government in any way to its support, but I see no objection to the measure receiving its second reading and being then sent to the Railway Committee.

Mr. McCUAIG. I have arrived at the conclusion that we have already in this country a sufficient number of Courts to do justice to all parties who appeal to them for redress of grievances. I find that we have 49 Judges in Quebec, 61 in Ontario, and 138 in the whole Dominion, making, with the six Supreme Court Judges, 144 altogether. We have in Ontario a Division Court, a County Court, a Court of Common Pleas, a Court of Queen's Bench, a Chancery Court, an Appeal Court and a Supreme Court besides.

Mr. RYKERT. And a Maritime Court.

Mr. McCARTHY. And a Court of Appeal from assessments.

Mr. McCUAIG. It does appear to me, as a commercial man, we have Courts enough, and I am opposed to the creation of a new Court and new Judges to try these cases. If there is any deficiency in the law, if it is discovered that these Courts have not sufficient jurisdiction, or that there is ambiguity of language in the framing of these laws, they may be properly amended by this Bill. But I am opposed to this Bill altogether. I find in Mr. Mousseau's speech, last night, and there is no better authority, that though the Province of Ontario is smaller than the Province of Quebec, it has 61 Judges, while Quebec has only 49. The whole cost of the judiciary in Ontario in round numbers is $200,000, while in Quebec it is $153,000. If the increase of salary is granted which is asked for by the Ontario County Court Judges, it will necessitate an increase of $66,000 per annum. I have noticed that when men are engaged in trade or in any branch of the public service, however meritorious their conduct may have been, and though their services may have extended over a period of many years, no provision is made for them in the event of their being disabled from performing their duties, or in the event of their services being dispensed with. Many years ago, when the country was not so far advanced in civilization as it is now, and when the Crown interfered with the course of justice, it was thought proper to surround the Judges with certain safeguards against interference by the Crown. We learn from history that in the past the Crown did interfere in England with the course of justice, by intimidating or bribing men who occupied high judicial positions. But at the present day we have nothing to fear from that. I believe the Judges of this country, as a class, are not more respectable in their private character or their general intelligence than men occupying positions who are considered inferior socially; and when it comes from the mouth of the gentleman who introduces this Bill that this country is afraid to give power to two Judges because they may be bribed, I think that is one of the strongest arguments which can be used against the Bill. I think we are much safer in the hands of about 128 Judges than we should be in the hands of two. Now, I find that in a recent action brought by the South Eastern Railway Company against the Railway Commissioners who had endeavored to force the Company to erect new station buildings at Hastings, the Lord Chief Justice of England, in giving judgment in favor of the Company, remarked as follows:—

"Still less can I bring myself to think that legislation could have intended to place such a power of unfettered discretion, involving interests so large, in the hands of three gentlemen, without any appeal from its exercises, however serious the effect of their decision affecting the interests of the Company."

That is the opinion of the highest tribunal in England against the establishment of such an arbitrary court as this. The Grand Trunk Railway, instead of extorting extravagant rates for freight, are carrying freight to-day, owing to competition with the lake navigation, at rates that do not pay expenses. I can speak authoritatively on that point, and I challenge contradiction. We know that the capital sunk in railway companies in this country has been almost entirely lost, and that although they have received large bonuses from the Government, they have not paid working expenses, and I have failed to learn that any railway company in Canada has yet paid a dividend on its capital stock. And yet this Bill asks you to appoint two men to regulate this great interest. It is perfectly preposterous. Many municipalities have voted large sums of money for investment in the bonds of railway companies; they have invariably lost money. The Province of Quebec is laboring under a similar difficulty to-day. So great has the evil been in Ontario, that Mr. Mowat has been obliged to bring in a Bill to prevent any grants being made by municipalities to railway companies unless they are carried by a majority of the voters. The gentlemen who are so anxious about the freights which will be charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway Syndicate, have only to look at the map and they will see that in four or five months in the year there will be open navigation through Hudson's Bay and Davis Straits to compete against the Syndicate and prevent them from charging excessive rates. I am not afraid of monopoly, and I think that no one will say that the railway freights charged in Canada have been extortionate. The railway companies have charged rates which have never enabled them to pay a dividend. Hundreds of men in England have been ruined in consequence of investments in the Grand Trunk Railway. And yet you talk about placing the whole of this great interest under the control of two men. Why, it is preposterous; I am ashamed that such a proposition has been brought before the House at all. I have, on the whole, great confidence in the Judges of this country, and I say if they have not sufficient power, give it to them, but establish no more Courts. I appeal to the commercial men of this House to sustain me in attempting to prevent the establishment of a new Court like this, as we have already more Courts than we need. I move:

¶ That the said Bill be not now read a second time, but be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. MILLS. It is rather extraordinary to hear the hon. gentleman say that he has much more confidence in the Grand Trunk Railway Company than in the Government. He must certainly have either a very high idea of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or he cannot have a very high idea of the Administration. I am sure that many hon. gentlemen in the House concluded, from the experience of the last two months, that his confidence in the Administration was unbounded; and if he has such extreme confidence in it, what must be the extent of the hon. gentleman's confidence in the Company? I am not going to make any observations with regard to the practical utility of an institution such as the one the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill proposes to create. There is an advantage in bringing forward this measure. I think the discussion of it will be attended with beneficial results. In my opinion this question of the regulation of railway tolls, if not a very important question at this hour, will be the important question of the future. I do not know that this House can do itself or the companies better service than by giving some attention in the House and in the Committee to the measure which the hon. gentleman has submitted for consideration. Without expressing any opinion on the tribunal which the hon. member proposes to create, without saying whether his proposition is the best that could be submitted to the House, I beg to say that I do not think this House has any power to create a tribunal for the purpose of regulating and controlling the railways that are chartered by the various Provinces. The Local Governments and Legislatures have the power to create railway corporations, or they have not. If they have the power, they have the right to say on what conditions those corporations shall exist, what their franchises shall be; and they have the same right to regulate and control the corporations they create that the Parliament of Canada has to control those which it creates. The hon. gentleman has given to the expression "the regulations of trade and commerce," upon which he bases his authority to introduce so comprehensive a measure as that now before Parliament, a much more comprehensive meaning than, in my opinion, the provision of our constitution will warrant him in doing. If there were no other expressions in the Act relating to the subject in which he proposes to deal, there might be some ground for his contention. Let us take the case of shipping, for instance. Shipping is, in a certain sense, an instrument of commerce, yet the terms of the British North America Act do not assume that the regulation of trade and commerce by this Legislature was sufficient to enable the Parliament to legislate on the subject, though it is as much an instrument of commerce as a railway train or a locomotive. Unless the hon. gentleman can find some other provision than this, I do not think he will find this provision is sufficient to uphold his contention. A railway train is no more an instrument of commerce than a horse and waggon, and the hon. gentleman would not say we have the right to legislate on the subject of dealing in horses and the keeping of vehicles of all sorts, simply because they may become instruments of commerce. By the construction the hon. gentleman gives to these words, we would have the right to regulate the tolls on ordinary highways, yet we know quite well we never contemplated legislating on this subject. Then, although railways are now the properties of private persons, the Government, in any Province, may make them public property by purchase, and although they were instruments of commerce, that would not authorize the Dominion Government to exercise a supervision over them, such as is proposed in this Bill. It is not done in regard to shipping. The provision in regard to commerce does not give us the right to deal with the subject of navigation. There is an express provision in the Constitution for that purpose. Why? Because the power to regulate commerce is not a power to deal with the highways of commerce, with the vehicles of commerce, or with the property in the articles which are the subject matter of commerce. I am strongly convinced that these provisions in the hon. gentleman's Bill, if they become law, would be ultra vires, and be disallowed in Court. I am of the opinion of the hon. Minister of Railways, that even if we had the power it would be found a very difficult matter to undertake to deal with the subject in the manner proposed without modifications in the Bill, when we consider that a large number of our railroads depend mainly on the traffic to and from the United States. Take, for instance, the Canada Southern or the Great Western. Suppose you undertook to regulate the rates of freight—and the rates are put down on the roads south of Lake Erie at a much lower rate than what you have fixed here—you would ruin those roads unless you allowed them to regulate their freights accordingly. You must take into account the condition of traffic and the regulation of freights on roads wholly outside the country, because they exercise a potent influence on the trade and commerce of the roads within our country. I shall not vote for the six months' hoist, but for the second reading of the Bill to allow it to go to the Railway Committee, but at the same time I believe those provisions relating to Provincial railways are ultra vires, and I vote for the second reading without committing myself to an opinion on the particular provisions the hon. gentleman has inserted in this Bill.

Mr. JONES. I am sorry to hear the hon. member for Bothwell state that he thinks that we have no right whatever to regulate the tolls of railways in this country.

Mr. MILLS. I did not say that.

Mr. JONES. I am very glad I am mistaken. The argument of the hon. gentleman in regard to the North-West railways was that we had not the right to regulate tolls, and that this Government was about to place regulations for tolls there.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman has misunderstood what I said. I said we had no right to regulate the traffic on the railways, in the manner proposed, that are chartered by the Provinces. I quite admit our right to regulate and control railways chartered by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. JONES. I cannot go into subtleness like that. I only hope we have the right to regulate tolls, not only in the Provinces but in the whole Dominion. The hon. member for Prince Edward County (Mr. McCuaig) has said the Grand Trunk has made no money whatever—that no road in this country has paid anything to its stockholders. Why is it? Because they were built in the most extravagant way, and because the stock has been watered. Although I will not vote for the motion of the hon. member for Prince Edward, I cannot support the Bill as it stands, because I believe it is too complex and cumbersome, yet I think it should be discussed by the Railway Committee; and if it were amended so as to include some provision to regulate the tolls, it will be of great advantage to this country. I am not one of those who do not think that the Grand Trunk and other roads are doing benefit to the country; I am not one of those who declare that the municipalities are ruined and embarrassed by railways. There is not a single municipality that has railways passing through it, although it may have given thousands of dollars, that has not indirectly benefitted more than the amount of money voted for that purpose. How is it that every day you see bonuses given to railways passing through different townships and going to various towns? Because the people know they will greatly benefit thereby. I cannot vote for the six months' hoist, because I approve of some measure for the regulation of railways. There is no way by which we can exercise control over the railroads of the country. The clause in the General Railway Act respecting a 15 per cent. dividend is a perfect farce. When will the Grand Trunk pay 15 per cent? Great discrimination is made by railways in favor of different points, and more particularly by the railway which has conferred the greatest benefit on this country—the Grand Trunk. The company is discriminating against this country to such an extent as to prove detrimental to its interests. What is the reason that farms in Western Ontario can be purchased for a less sum than six or seven years ago?

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Because of the National Policy.

Mr. JONES. No; because that policy is benefitting the country, and the hon. gentleman in his heart knows it. Farms in western Ontario which five or six years ago sold for $60 or $70 per acre, could now be obtained for from $10 to $15 less. The reason was this: In Illinois, lands equally good, more easily worked, could be obtained for $30, $40, $50 or say even $60 per acre, and the farmers got freights through from Illinois to Portland cheaper, or, at all events, as cheap as the farmer in western Canada. That is the reason why people are selling their farms in Ontario and going to the North-West and western States—because they can obtain through freights and as good prices for their grain as in this country. I am very sorry to have to speak in this way, but I hope the Bill will go before the Railway Committee, because the more the subject is discussed the better. I do not wish to speak disparagingly of our railways, but they should not make discriminating freights against our own people. The present Bill is too complex and voluminous for this country. What we want here is a simple measure. We do not want half a dozen additional Judges at great expense, but an Act by which the Government could regulate railways if they thought fit in the interests of the country, not in a spirit of antagonism to those roads, for I should be very sorry to act harshly against them, but to equalize matters between the people and the railway companies so that the former may get something in return for the money they have put into the road. It is said that people in foreign countries have invested their money in our railways and lost immense sums. Granted; but they did it with their eyes open. We have put our money into the Grand Trunk and have placed our debt behind that of other parties; but I trust this country will never relinquish that debt, and always have some hold on this immense corporation, in order that it may be made to deal justly with this country. I will be happy to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. McLENNAN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. JONES

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 11th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Mr. O'CONNOR presented the annual report of the Secretary of State.

INSOLVENT RAILWAY COMPANIES.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

REGULATIONS RESPECTING FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. POPE (Queen's). During the last Session of Parliament an Act was passed with respect to the navigation of Canadian waters, for the purpose of adopting the same regulations as were in force in England, the United States, France and other countries. For some reason or other an Order in Council was passed in England, suspending some provisions of those regulations. This fact was brought to the notice of the Dominion Government by a despatch dated 7th December last, and upon that we are acting. It merely suspends article 10 of that Act until 1st September next. That article applies to fishing vessels, and so far as we are concerned it scarcely applies, as the class of boats it is intended to exempt, namely, those employed in drift-net fishing, are scarcely used on our coasts. Sub-section c of article 10 says:

"A fishing vessel, when employed in drift-net fishing, shall carry on one of her masts two red lights in a vertical line, one over the other, not less than three feet apart."

The next sub-section applies to the trawlers; and I do not know that we have any. Possibly there might be some vessels so employed, and as those in charge of them might be under the impression that the regulations were the same here as in England, and difficulties might arise, and loss to boats and schooners, it is as well that the Act in force here should be precisely similar to that in force in England. The Bill is merely to suspend article 10 of the Act passed last year, and adopt article 9, which is almost similar, except the two sub-sections to which I have referred, which are not included in the first Act. I, therefore, move, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair, and the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution:

"That in view of the suspension by Her Majesty in Council, of the article of the Imperial Regulations, respecting lights to be carried by fishing vessels until the 1st of September next, it is expedient to suspend until the same time, the corresponding provisions of the Act 43 Vict. Chap. 29, and for the meantime to revive the provisions of the former Act, 31 Vict., Chap. 58, on the same subject."

Mr. BLAKE. When the Bill which the hon. gentleman proposes to amend was before the House last Session I think his attention was called by the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. Robertson) to this very point, and he suggested that some such amendment as the present should be made. I suggested at the time that it would be well to amend the Bill as regards fishing vessels so as to give the Governor in Council power to suspend the operation of the law from time to time and to bring it into force when necessary. The Minister stated that he would endeavor to have the amendment made in the Senate, but as that was not done I presume the present amendment is intended to carry out the arrangement. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, however, that he should take a general suspensory power, such as has been taken by the authorities in the old country, instead of one for a limited period, or the hon. gentleman may get into trouble again during the recess. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will amend the resolution in Committee in the direction I have suggested.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. I think a general suspensory power should be taken, such as has been taken under the Imperial Act. I would like to ask if there is any reason given in the communication from the Colonial Office for this suspension.

Mr. POPE (Queen's.) I intended to have made the amendment in the Bill last Session, but I found that it had passed the Senate before I had an opportunity of suggesting the amendment: hence the necessity for introducing it now. I quite agree as to the desirability of making in Committee the amendment suggested by my hon. friend from West Durham. I may say, in reply to the hon. member for Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), that the despatch from the Colonial Office does not assign any reason for the suspension.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. POPE (Queen's) moved that the resolution be amended so as to read as follows:—

"That in view of the suspension by Her Majesty in Council, of the article of the Imperial Regulations, respecting lights to be carried by fishing vessels until the 1st of September next, it is expedient to give the Governor in Council power to suspend, from time to time, the corresponding provisions of the Act 43 Vic. Chap. 52, and for the meantime to revise the provisions of the former Act 31 Vict. Chap. 29, on the same subject."

Resolution amended, reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. POPE (Queen's) introduced a Bill (No. 57) to give power to the Governor in Council to suspend the operation of certain provisions of the Act 43 Victoria, chapter 29, respecting the Navigation of Canadian Waters.

Bill read the first time.

PUBLIC BILLS.

The following Bills were read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 30) further to continue in force for a limited time "The better prevention of Crime Act 1878" (from the Senate).—(Mr. McDonald Pictou.)

Bill (No. 33) to amend the Law respecting Documentary Evidence in certain cases (from the Senate).—(Mr. McDonald Pictou.)

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) moved to receive the report of Committee of the Whole adopted on the 8th instant on certain resolutions respecting the salaries of additional Judges of the Queen's Bench and Superior Court of the Province of Quebec.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) introduced a Bill (No. 58) to provide for the salaries of an additional Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench, and an additional Judge of the Superior Court in the Province of Quebec.

Bill read the first time.

PRIZE FIGHTING.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) moved the second reading of Bill No. 29, entitled an Act respecting Prize Fighting (from the Senate.) He said: I have only to observe that this Bill was suggested from occurrences which took place on our borders during the season just passed, of a very disgraceful character, in which a number of people from across the border sought to make the soil of Canada the battle ground for a disgraceful, lewd prize fight. It was found that the law was defective in reference to the vindication of public morality and the peace of the people, and this Bill was introduced to remedy that evil.

Mr. ANGLIN. What do you propose to do?

Mr. McDONALD. In the first clause of the Bill the words "Prize Fight" are defined. The following are the principal provisions of the several clauses of the Bill:—

"2. Whoever, within Canada, sends or publishes, or causes to be sent or published, or otherwise made known, any challenge to fight a prize fight, or accepts any such challenge, or causes the same to be accepted, or goes in training preparatory to such fight, or acts as trainer or second to any person who intends to engage in a prize fight, is guilty of an offence against this Act, and upon summary conviction thereof, is liable to a fine of not less than $100, nor more than $1,000, or to imprisonment of not more than six months, or to both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the Court.

"3. Whoever, within Canada, engages as a principal in a prize fight is guilty of an offence against this Act, and on summary conviction thereof is liable to imprisonment for not less than three nor more than twelve months.

"4. Whoever is present at a prize fight as an aid, second, surgeon, umpire, backer, assistant or reporter, or advises, encourages or promotes such fight, is guilty of an offence against this Act, and on summary conviction thereof, is liable to a fine of not less than $50, nor more than $500, or to imprisonment of not more than twelve months, or to both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the Court.

"5. Whoever, being an inhabitant or resident of Canada, leaves Canada with intent to engage in a prize fight without the limits thereof is guilty of an offence against this Act, and on summary conviction thereof is liable to a fine of not less than fifty dollars, nor more than four hundred dollars, or to imprisonment of not more than six months, or to both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the Court.

"6. If, at any time, the sheriff of any county, place or district in Canada, any chief of police, any police officer, or any constable, or other police officer, has reason to believe that any person within his bailiwick or jurisdiction is about to engage as principal in any prize fight within Canada, he shall forthwith arrest such person.

"7. If any sheriff has reason to believe that a prize fight is taking place, or is about to take place, within his jurisdiction as such sheriff or that any persons are about to land or cross into Canada at a point within his county, from any place outside of Canada, with intent to engage in, or to be concerned in, or to attend any prize fight within Canada, he shall forthwith summon a force of the inhabitants of his district or county sufficient for the purpose of suppressing and preventing such fight, and he shall, with their aid, suppress and prevent the same, and arrest all persons present thereat, or who may land in or cross into Canada as aforesaid, and shall take them before some person having authority to try offences against this Act, to be dealt with according to law, and fined or imprisoned, or both, or compelled to enter into recognizances with sureties, as hereinbefore provided, according to the nature of the case.

"8. Every person offending against any of the provisions of this Act, except the principals engaged or intending to engage in a prize fight, shall be a competent witness in any proceedings under this Act, and may be compelled to appear and give evidence in the same manner and to the same extent as other persons."

Mr. PLUMB. I think everyone in this House must be glad to see an Act of this kind come down from the Senate. It is desirable that we should in every way conserve the peace. There are a few matters which I think, should come within the purview of this Bill that have not been introduced. I think that there are fights for prizes that are going on, not merely in the fistic ring but in a larger arena, which ought, perhaps, to be recognized, and which ought, perhaps, to be brought within the limits of an Act of this sort. The fiercest though not, perhaps, the bloodiest encounters are those that are constantly taking place among those who are wrestling for the prize of positions in this House and elsewhere, but I cannot see that there is any provision made here, when the ring is formed and when the prize is to be contended for, that those gentlemen who may engage even in the most severe bloodless encounters, can be arrested by the Sheriff for breaches of the peace. I have seen, in the course of my short political experience, encounters which caused more ill blood than can be caused by any which come within the purview of this Bill. I have no doubt this Bill is well intended. It comes with great propriety to us from a body which is removed from and looks down on those scenes of strife to which we ourselves are subjected. I hope before this Bill passes the House it may be amended so as to include the subjects to which I have referred. I have no doubt that it is desirable, in the interests of peace, in the interests of that true civilization, in which the muscle does not count, but the mind is everything, that we should endeavor, so far as we can, to reduce that preponderance of muscle over mind which was the characteristic of a milder era and a less complete civilization. As it has been found that as the refinement of mind increases the less the muscles of the body are trained, that which gave a man the greatest prominence in the civic game is now looked on as a criminal offence. I observe, however, that with a wise discrimination the Senate has confined the operation of this Bill to those who contest, not for a champion's wreath, not for a crown of honor, but for the reward of money. That being the case, I have no doubt this House will receive this Bill with the consideration which is due to every proposition which emanates from that body for which we have so much respect, and which we on the Conservative side of the House consider the balance wheel in the legislation of Parliament. I observe with great regret that there is a tendency in the Radical mind—if I may use that expression without offence—to under-estimate the influence and the advantage of that body. But when we find Bills like this emanating from that House, it shows that it is not the effete body which it is called by a Radical and an irreverent press, but that it is still mindful of its duties to the country, mindful of the great mission which has been confided to it, and that it is ever ready in the interest of public peace and public safety to elaborate and bring down an Act like this, in view of the occurrences which have taken place near Long Point, in the county of Norfolk, near the town of Simcoe. These scenes were not at all such as I hinted at. They were simply brutal contests, and I hope Parliament, in this discussion, will view the necessity of protecting the territory of Canada inviolate from the roughs and the rowdies of the neighboring country, who fancy that they can make raids on our territory when they like, and that we are not able to prevent them. They found their mistake when they made their descent on the county of Norfolk, and they will make a greater mistake if they make a similar attempt after this Bill becomes law, as I trust it will.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think we have to thank the patrician order for sending us down this Bill; I think we have also to thank the hon. Minister of Justice for introducing it; and I think this Legislature should do all in its power to prevent the recurrence of those brutalizing exhibitions against which it strikes. They are the survivals of a barbarous age, the relics of a bygone time, when cock-fighting, bull-baiting and bear-baiting were popular amusements, which are incompatible with the full light of the Nineteenth Century. The other night, when the hon. leader of the Opposition made that magnificent speech, which I am sure appealed to the hearts of everyone of us, in which he pointed out the differences between the legal systems of Quebec and those of Ontario, emanating in the one case from the Roman law and in the other from the English system, I think we all felt that that hon. gentleman did every justice to the theme. But a melancholy reflection has come across my own mind that this great system, costly and magnificent as it is, did not obtain the desired object; that, after all, this magnificent edifice did not give warmth, light and protection to a great number of our people, to whom it was only a magnificent mausoleum, a whitened sepulchre filled with dead men's bones; for what is the object of every legal system but the protection of life and property; and I ask every hon. gentleman in this House, recollecting the Biddulph tragedy which has recently been brought under our notice, whether our legal system is what it ought to be? I think this is a subject worthy the consideration of the Minister of Justice and the leader of the Opposition. After all, justice must underlie any great system: it must underlie every State constitution. The business of the State is to see that injustice is not only restrained, but punished. The only legal right any man has, is that of being protected in the peaceful exercise of his liberty. His first duty is to pay due regard to the liberties of others. I would ask this House and the country whether our legal system is that what it ought to be? I am sure the great majority of this House and of the people feel that the grand legal system of ours is intended; unhappily, more for a class than for the great body of the people—more for the lawyers than the laymen. I would leave this unpleasant theme, throwing out the remark to the hon. the Minister of Justice, which I trust will be considered by the legal element in this House—all gentlemen of great legal ability, and from whose deliberations I am sure good results will arise—that under our system, complicated and magnificent as it is, we feel, after all, there is less substantial justice obtained than in the rude tribunal of any mining camp in the Sierra Nevadas. I speak unhappily with too much knowledge of the circumstances of the case. The Bill, as I have said, is a most important one, and I have no doubt it will be sustained by the great body of the members of this House. As the special custodian of the rights and privileges of the House, we have especially to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the kindly and generous manner in which you afforded us great pleasure during the recent prize fight—or tournament, as we may more properly term it—on the floor of this House. We are aware that if a member who was not noble—if a common commoner had ventured to violate the rules and regulations of the House as did the knights on that occasion—he would have been threatened with all the pains and penalties of being named or having his words taken down, whatever they might be. But in that kindly courtesy which you have always manifested, you, after the fight was over and the knights had retired to their tents to bind up their wounds, said the whole discussion was irregular. We thank you for having adopted that kindly tone, and for not having put a stop to the joust, thus affording us the great pleasure of witnessing a pleasant and interesting contest. It reminded us of the great tournament at Ashby. The fierce Sir Richard, whom we may call the disinherited knight, from his having been disinherited by his constituents and forced to take refuge in the wilds of Huron, swept down on the Conservative champion opposite, who, armed in his panoply of proof and clothed in his robe of white sarsenet, emblematical of his purity of life, he successfully resisted the assault of his fierce opponent who, Protean like, changing his coat, appeared in the character of the knight of La Mancha, and attacked two windmills—windmills in this case driven by water. It was with much pleasure that we saw the stout knight of Westmoreland brace on his armour and proceed to viscerate his enemies. We felt that, representing as he did the Maritime nobility, a little element of a certain portion of the chivalric idiom of Billingsgate and "Wapping Old Stairs" was not inappropriate. It was with extreme pleasure we saw the two knights, Hospitaller and Templar, sharpening their lancet and scalpels, and proceeding to cut and anatomize their opponents in an eminently allopathic and scientific manner, according to the rules of Pharmacopœia. It would have afforded us extreme pleasure if the leader of the Opposition had been qualified by his rank to enter into the arena to engage in a contest with the leader of the Government. It would have been an epoch in the history of the legal profession, in fact the apotheosis of Gs. 8d. A recent French writer has painted a picture which for realistic power could hardly be excelled. The scene is laid under the very shadow of the Cathedral of Notre Dame, and by the side of the great River Seine, where a number of washerwomen are engaged in cleansing the linen of the great metropolis from its vile impurities. By the realistic power of the painter, every foul stain is made manifest in such a clear, distinct manner, that the very odor and reek of all the sins and crimes of the great city are made manifest. I might, perhaps, suggest that our political linen be cleansed in private instead of in public. A few years ago, when the Conservative party occupied the position which the Liberal party occupies now; when it was but a miserable remnant, a broken band, or a "corporal's guard," as was pleasantly stated by the leader of the Opposition, we all recollect that many differences took place on the floor of the House. It was suggested by a friend of mine who takes a great interest in mortuary matters, and who had studied the literature of "worms, tombs and epitaphs," and who, unfortunately, is not now a member of this House, that some pleasant spot might be selected where hon. members should arrange these little differences without interfering with the dignity and comfort of the House. Accordingly a pleasant little glade was selected in the heart of the forest which, for seclusion and sylvan sweetness, could hardly be excelled. It was a spot that would have pleased the ancestor of the hon. member for Niagara, Aaron Burr, and the four gallant Frenchmen, Athos, Porthos, Aramis and D'Artagnan. It was a sweet spot. Every arrangement had been made by my hon. friend for the comfort and convenience of gentlemen who might choose to frequent it, but, unhappily, owing to circumstances over which we had no control, those arrangements were not carried out. Man proposes but another power disposes. "The best laid schemes of mice and men gang oft' a-gley." There was one member of this House who, by his chivalrous character, his ardent patriotism, prevented the consummation of our pleasant little Beechwood arrangement. We all know that thirteen is a fatal number at the festive board; it is a number which has been fatal to many Ministers; it was the fatal number of the Committee room to which this member invited his mortal foe. We have all been dreamers of dreams. We have fancied that we would build up on this northern part of the continent a great Dominion—to borrow an expression often used—with its foundations laid broad and deep, in which we might erect a stately and beautiful edifice, which would afford a beacon light to the nations. We thought that we should have different classes and conditions of men—that we would build up an aristocratic system which would counter-balance the fierce democracy in the south. My hon. friend from Bothwell the other night, in a forcible and eloquent speech, such as we are accustomed to hear from him, and which proved that the Mills of the Grips grinds slowly but he grinds exceedingly fine, objected to the establishment of a feudal aristocracy. I should ask the House why the present Ministry should not have the privilege of establishing an aristocracy? The late Liberal Government founded a great piscatorial aristocracy. Why should not this Government found a great territorial, or Syndicatorial, or muskratorial aristocracy? I do not see why we should not revive the ancient Earldom of Fitz Stephen, of him who rode at the right hand of the Conqueror, in favor of a namesake who has ever been distinguished by his bravery, ability and chivalrous qualities, and has won for himself broader lands and mightier domain than ever the Conqueror or his Normans ever dreamed of. Why not revive the ancient Scottish titles of Angus and Morton, and those other grand old titles of which we have read so much? And why not, in honor of the great commercial metropolis of the Dominion, create the title of Duke of Montreal in favor of one of its most prominent merchant princes, and in honor of the mighty Nimrods of the north, the mighty hunters before the Lord, create the title of Marquis of Minks and Muskrats. That is a matter which might be very well considered by the members of the Government. You who are well acquainted with French literature, will remember that a great prince, to reward the faithful services of one of his followers, gave him all the country of the Thélème on the River Loire, to within two leagues of the great fortress of Port Husack. There was founded that great city which has been dear to every country where the lovers of the True, the Good and the Beautiful are found. Everything base, low and mean, was eliminated from this city, in it was realised the dream of Plato's Republic and the Utopia of Sir Thomas Moore—all the men were brave and loyal, and all the women beautiful and true. To my friend on my left, our little city, since Parliament met in it, has been a veritable Abbey of Thélème. We have never regarded any man's political opinions—we have always respected his honest convictions—and we have many pleasant recollections respecting that great House in which met the founders of Confederation. Regarding those able men we have many pleasant memories, but many saddening memories as well. In many a country churchyard, under a little hillock of snow, sleep some of the best of the men who laid the foundations of this Dominion. I cannot see why we should have these differences and difficulties in our views which so unpleasantly divide us. — You may honestly believe in every man holding his own opinions manfully and well, but without ill feeling or prejudice whatever. For my part, I have never believed in an aristocracy in this country; I believe that the man who comes here and founds a home in the wilderness, the lumberman and the axeman, are our best and bravest men—are nobles of the truest sort. I believe that the public men of this country, of both sides, whom I have always honored for their purity and patriotism, will compare favorably with the public men in any part of the world. The reward a public man has here is very poor. In this country there are no political prizes in public life. The result is, as a rule, he is paid in abuse and calumny. I have the highest possible respect for the public and private men of this country, for I believe that after all, they are nobles by right of an earlier creation, and nobles by the interposition of a mightier hand.

Mr. PLUMB.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that this Bill will, in all probability, interfere with the rights of the press in a serious and unwarrantable manner. I would direct his attention, first, to section 2, as follows: "Whoever, within Canada, sends or publishes, or causes to be sent or published, or otherwise made known," and so forth. Now, it is not to be supposed, if a prize-fight is likely to come off, a matter of public notoriety, that the press would abstain from noticing that fact; and I apprehend that that section would render a newspaper liable to the penalties of this Act, if it noticed, as a matter of news, the fact that a challenge had been sent. I think that in this respect the right of the press is not properly guarded. I think there can be no objection to a newspaper noticing the fact. And again in section 4, it is provided that "Whoever is present at a prize fight as an aid, second, surgeon, umpire, backer, assistant or reporter," shall be liable to the penalties provided. Now, if a prize fight is likely to come off, enterprising newspapers, such as that at the head of which is placed my hon. friend from Wexford (Mr. Bunting) would be likely to have a reporter present to report the proceedings. I do not know that there would be anything criminal in that; so I think the right of the newspaper would, by this provision, be somewhat infringed. I think, also, it would be proper to have a physician on the ground, as he might thereby be able, sometimes, to save life, which might not be possible if time were lost in sending some distance for him. Allusion was made by the member for Niagara to the prize fight, last summer, in Norfolk county; but there is a matter in connection with it which I wish to bring under the attention of this House. That prize fight took place on Long Point, a wilderness, an uninhabited section of the county; and the end of the Point, where the fight took place, is twenty-five miles from the mainland. It was necessary for the Sheriff, in order to suppress that infraction of the laws, to charter a steamer, as the place was inaccessible in any other way. The Sheriff did, therefore, charter a steamer, the Annie Craig, and employed to assist him a portion of the 39th Battalion. They proceeded in the steamer to Long Point and suppressed the fight, the Sheriff deserving great credit for his action. In doing so he incurred an expense of several hundred dollars which he has been left to pay out of his own pocket. The authorities of the Dominion and of Ontario both refused to pay that expense, claiming that the act did not come within their jurisdiction; and without venturing to advance any opinion on the matter, I beg to call the attention of the Government to the fact, that the Sheriff of Norfolk county is yet out of pocket several hundred dollars for having discharged his duty in this respect.

Mr. McDONALD (Picton). I fancy that my hon. friend from Welland will not, at least I hope he will not, ask the privilege and protection of the press which the hon. member for Norfolk seems so solicitous about. My own impression is that after this Bill passes, should a reporter be sent to it from my hon. friend's newspaper, both the reporter and the hon. gentleman would deserve the punishment which the Bill seeks to impose. And I am quite certain that he would be not only very careful, but very anxious to obey the law, so far as the great influence of his paper went, and would endeavor to impress the importance of the law upon the general sentiment of the public. I dare say when the Bill goes to Committee there may be some amendments suggested by hon. gentlemen, and so far as these will tend to perfect the Bill and carry out the common object we have in view in relation to it, it will give me great pleasure to accede to them. I do not intend to make any observations whatever as to the very eloquent, happy, and humorous speeches which we have heard from the member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) and the member for Ottawa (Mr. Wright). I presume they seized the opportunity of showing how keen their blades were, how readily they could set their lances in rest, and how, if they do not indulge in the more demoralizing contest of a prize fight, they were ready to enter the intellectual arena and show with what skill, energy, and keenness they would contest the battle of intellectual strife.

Bill read the second time.

House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on said Bill.

(In the Committee.)

On clause 4,

Mr. PLUMB. I think that one of the worst features of the prize fight is the brutal report of it which frequently appears in the newspapers; and these reports are all the more to be reprehended, because, if they were not published, those who engage in, and attend these contests would be deprived of one of the chief incentives to such encounters. I do not think that my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. Bunting) would choose to make his paper—the leading paper in Canada—the medium of giving prominence to reports which are prized by the sort of people who attend these brutal and demoralizing contests. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) is no doubt a stickler for the freedom of the press, but I think that that freedom should be kept within such limits as to prevent such reports being brought before the public, by the punishment of the person who writes the disgusting and demoralizing details in common with all others connected with the prize ring. I do not think my hon. friend would himself attend a prize fight, even if there were one, as there was one, contiguous to his own residence in Norfolk. I do not think he would lend his countenance to such contests, and I think he would be one of the first to prevent the perusal in his own family of the brutal and disgusting details of the semi-savage encounters of the prize ring. I, therefore, hope that anything which has been said by him will not induce the Committee to strike out that part of the Bill which would prevent the ubiquitous reporter from earning the small fee which he would be paid for reporting so demoralizing a spectacle as a prize fight.

Mr. CHARLTON.

On clause 10,

Mr. LONGLEY. I have not paid much attention to the Bill, but I have presumed it to be correct in every respect; and as I am by no means in favor of the prize ring, I am gratified that such a measure has been introduced. I desire, however, to seize the opportunity of making an observation or two upon a subject which, as I think, has a tolerably direct connection with the one under consideration. It is, indeed, a brutal spectacle to see two men engaged in a pugilistic encounter, pummelling one another until they are scarcely recognizable. But I conceive there is something, usually associated with such exhibitions, of a still more demoralizing character. We usually find that the persons who attend such exhibitions are of the most degraded description, men of vicious propensities and accustomed to sensual indulgence of almost every kind. But there is, speaking generally, no particular feature connected with such exhibitions of such a revolting character as that which proceeds from the bottle. I might be excused if I expressed the gratification which I experience, when I see the readiness on the part of the bulk of the hon. members of this House to discountenance pugilistic encounters and to give their support to a measure calculated to do away with such exhibitions. I only wish that I could see gentlemen occupying important positions in society, and in most of the relations of life, setting a very excellent example, perhaps, to their neighbors and friends, take half the interest in a question far transcending in importance to this question, and then we should not have to struggle so hard in this House and out of it in order to promote that particular object. I venture to say that if you could do away with the use of intoxicating liquors, before a very long time such would be the elevation of humanity at large, that you would not have to frame laws to prevent prize fighting. It is a resort to the bottle, the depraving influences that result from the liquor traffic, the use of intoxicants by high and low, that give to prize fighting all its revolting character; in fact, I may say it is that which, in a very large measure, incites to such exhibitions. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to avail myself of this opportunity to deliver a temperance lecture, because I believe that a good many hon. gentlemen here, for whom I have a very high respect after all, do not listen with a great deal of patience to such lectures. Still I am not without hope that they may benefit in some slight degree, at any rate, in the gentle admonition which I have ventured to give them. At least I do trust that they will take into account all that relates to the happiness and progress of society, and the well being of people for this world, and the world to come, connected with the drinking customs of society, and that on a more suitable opportunity we may witness the good results of this gentle admonition.

Mr. BOULTBEE. I am not able to speak with the same clearness in the narration of the features of a prize fight as the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), because I never was present at one—

Mr. LONGLEY. I thought as much.

Mr. BOULTBEE. That hon. gentleman is able to depict even the appearance of their faces very graphically, and is also able to say that they generally partake largely of intoxicating liquors, so I suppose he must have been an eye witness of a prize fight, at least we have a right to suppose that he is telling us something from his own knowledge. I have not the slightest doubt that he has seen a prize fight, because he is a pertinacious sort of fighting man. He never gives up his point. If he has anything on his mind he lugs it in by the head and shoulders on all occasions. We have heard a good deal of his views on temperance and sobriety. The trouble with the member for Annapolis is, that he is scarcely a sober or a temperate man. He is not charitable. He forgets the lessons that were laid down by our Saviour: he does not understand that you are to cast the mantle of charity around your neighbors, that you are to accord to others holding different opinions from your own the same degree of liberality that you claim for yourself. I know that the member for Annapolis thinks that I am so far steeped in the gall of iniquity that I am not fit to associate with him in the dark, but only in a House like this. To tell the honest truth, in old days when men were influenced by the strong hand, when those hereditary predatory robbers—that the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) described as the ancestors of the leader of the Government and the Speaker of the Senate—wrought their will among their fellows, there was something of manliness among them after all. Do not understand me to be saying anything in favor of the degrading spectacle of prize fighting, which must be so shocking that I am sure if the member for Annapolis has seen one he will never go to another. But in the old fighting days, when men contended by the strength of their hands on a fair field in the characteristic manner of Englishmen of the olden time, there was something better and more manly than the way warfare is conducted now. We see melancholy examples of what things have grown to in this polite and gentle age. We see men on the floor of this House, even, within a few feet of each other, call each other liars, and have it disseminated through the press; call each other thieves, charge each other with every base crime and have it circulated far and wide through the country; and yet, in a short time afterwards, they will get up in a most parliamentary manner and declare that they said nothing of the kind—that their words were not intended to bear this construction at all. There was nothing of this kind in the good old days. It is not so long since that an old fashioned fight absorbed the attention of both sides of the Atlantic, when the Americans, the mighty descendants of our own mother land, thought they would tackle her at her favorite mode of settling disputes on her own soil, and it was recorded by one of their own poets that:

"The fancy of America
By all creation swore,
The British champion round his loins
The belt should wear no more;
They chose a man straightway,
And felt his arm, and saw him hit,
And leaped and cheered, cursed and spit,
And sent him to the fray."

Such was the idea then; but, unfortunately, anything of good there was in the manliness with which those old fights were conducted is done away with now, and a different mode of warfare has supervened. As related by another poet, talking of this same thing:

"The belt which once the champion graced,
When boxing honor reigned,
In modern time has been disgraced,
And all its glory stained."

The quicker we can do away with these disgusting exhibitions the better; the quicker we can arrange to settle our disputes by some other means than by fighting them out by mere brute force the better it will be for society. Had the hon. member for Annapolis looked into the matter a little farther he would not have got up, in the prosecution of his favorite hobby, and characterized that as an argument in favor of total abstinence, because I have read something in books and papers to the effect that people who indulge in prize fighting are exceedingly temperate; in fact, the training they are obliged to go through enforces temperance upon them, and they are unable to drink, leading, I suppose, in that respect better lives than either the member of Annapolis or myself. I will conclude these remarks by asking the member for Annapolis, who improves all occasions to air his special opinion, to have a little more regard for the opinions of men who do not look on things exactly as he does. He is a good party-man, a good Conservative, a man whom I respect in the highest degree, and I only wish he would be a little more reasonable, a little more charitable, and a little more temperate in the expression of his opinions.

Mr. LONGLEY. I do not propose for a moment to follow the hon. member who has just sat down in the spirit of banter in which he has chosen to indulge, for I would have to confess, before I began, that in that respect I could not hope to be any match for him. But his remarks have suggested to me an idea, which I did not consider it necessary to elaborate when I was on my feet before. We know what broils, growing out of intemperance, are witnessed around the grogeries. Many men, infuriated with liquor that will kill at forty rods—I will not say that the hon. member who has just sat down is a strenuous advocate of it, because he would probably require good liquor—these men, made absolutely insane, poisoned and embittered, are not content with using their fists. They are rather fonder of using the knife, and sometimes, unfortunately, they go the length of killing. Is the hon. gentleman unacquainted with the fact that, in the estimation, not of temperance advocates, but of men connected with his own profession—Judges, leading members of the Bar, Attorney Generals and State prosecutors—men in the most favorable positions for witnessing all the iniquity and all the terrible results which flow from the traffic—nine-tenths of the crime which they are called upon to adjudicate upon, result either directly or indirectly from the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The hon. gentleman has done me an injustice, although I feel that I can stand it. I can inform him that I have never witnessed a pugilistic encounter. I am not the man to encourage such exhibitions. My associations have been widely different, I am happy to say. To one observation of the hon. gentleman I wish to draw his attention, and also the attention of others who are under the delusion that intoxicants impart strength and vigor to a man who engages in such encounters. He has informed us that those men who are degrading enough to pommel one another until they are not recognizable, are nevertheless notable for their temperance principles, if not in the main, at least in preparation for the encounter. Does not that sweep away the nonsense that is talked about intoxicating liquors imparting vigor to the system, and prove that a man is better without the inebriating draught than with it? This is not true alone, with regard to the men who train for pugilistic encounters, but also with regard to men who train for foot races, and men who have to undergo any continuous fatigue. These are facts, not because I give utterance to them, but they are facts which are proved from a knowledge of the properties of alcohol, from the fact that it cannot assimilate with the human system, that no nourishment can be derived from it, according to the testimony of the most eminent physicians, not in the Dominion alone, but all over the world. If the hon. gentleman will, the first opportunity he has, tell us what good intoxicating liquors have, I shall be better pleased with his statement than with the banter he has seen fit to indulge in on the observations I have made.

Mr. PLUMB. I think one of the peculiar characteristics of the advocates of temperance, is the great intemperance with which they urge their particular principles. My hon. friend for whom I have the greatest respect has taken up the time of the House for some considerable length, in an entirely irrelevant discussion upon a matter which had nothing to do with what my hon. friend was talking about. I suppose my hon. friend was disappointed in not being able to make a temperance address in the Convention which has been going on, and where I see the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) spoke with his usual eloquence, and that speech which was perhaps bottled up in the Convention, has been, on the first opportunity, presented here. Had my hon. friend waited a day or two he would have had an opportunity, on Bill (No. 52), entitled an Act to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, to air, legitimately and in order, his eloquence and propound exactly what he said here to-day. But I cannot see how it was possible for any but a temperance man who is always intemperate, since he drinks like a fish, to introduce the temperance question in this discussion. I do not pretend that because my hon. friend drinks like a fish he breaks his temperance rule, but that he carries out his cold water principles. My hon. friend has brought forward in a most extraordinary manner, the example of prize fighters. Everybody knows it is necessary for those men, in order to succeed in their not very meritorious career, to abstain when training from drinking. My hon. friend, with great triumph, points this out; but if it is an argument against the use of alcohol, it is equally an argument against the use of vegetables, for some of those also are forbidden to prize fighters in their training regimen. I am sure no such discussion as that which my hon. friend introduced in this Bill would have been permitted were it not for the great respect in which the House holds the hon. member. Had the Speaker been in the chair he could not have gone on for one moment with his temperance tirade, if called to order. My hon. friend will remember that, although he has been indulged, on this occasion, in making a temperance address in an epigrammatic form, if you like, but still a condensed temperance address, for I recognize it—the hon. member for West Middlesex can get one off at any moment, he has a hundred of them cut and dry, which he has delivered all over the country—he has not the right to make temperance addresses on every occasion, whether pertinent or impertinent. We shall be glad to hear from the hon. gentleman, as no doubt we will from the hon. member for West Middlesex, on the proposition about to be made. I shall be glad to hear these hon. gentlemen attempt to discuss, on a principle of fairness, the opposition which I know they will make to that proposition.

Mr. BLAKE. I call the hon. gentleman to order. He has no right to discuss the provisions of a Bill not now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN ruled the whole discussion out of order. Nothing but a personal explanation would now be allowed.

Mr. LONGLEY. I do not rise for the purpose of speaking out of order, nor to say a single thing not pertinent; neither do I think I have said anything not quite pertinent to the question. But if I were ruled out of order in that particular, I apprehend there is not a gentleman in the House, who entertains any fair sense of justice, who would preclude me from the privilege of remarks of an exceedingly pointed character. I have as great respect for the hon. gentleman who has undertaken to give me a lecture, as any man in this House, still I scarcely think it comports with the position of any hon. gentleman in this House to undertake to lecture everybody. It would be rather an arduous task for any one to take upon himself to keep everybody in order; that is a task which the member for Niagara has taken upon himself, for the first time, to do. Now, I hope that you will allow him an opportunity of pointing out how the remarks which I made were inappropriate, inaccurate, and so forth. You might have known, from what has occurred, that the liquor interest was in danger to-day, just because the member for Niagara, and one or two other friends on the other side, started up to lecture me, in the hope that I should be placed in a false position and not understand what I was talking about. I think that about thirty or forty years of experience, of active work in the temperance cause, ought to make me, although a much humbler individual than those hon. gentlemen, and not assuming the superiority they sometimes assume, a tolerably fair judge of what I have been talking about.

Bill reported without amendment, read a third time and passed.

GENERAL INSPECTION ACT.

Mr. MOUSSEAU moved the second reading of Bill (No. 49) to amend "The General Inspection Act of 1874," and the Acts amending it.

Bill read the second time.

BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the second reading of Bill (No. 50) to correct a clerical error in Schedule B to the Act 43 Vict., Chap. 22, amending "The Bank Act" and continuing the charters of certain banks.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, read a third time and passed.

FLOATING OF CORDWOOD.

Mr. VANASSE. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor of moving the second reading of Bill (No. 2) having for its object the regulating of wood over the non-navigable part of the St. Francis River. The Provincial Legislature passed, in 1876, an Act, 40 Victoria, chapter 67, to regulate the floating of cordwood over the unnavigable part of the River St. Francis. It is in order to complete this legislation that I have introduced the present Bill. There is a considerable trade in cordwood on this river and its tributaries, and the cordwood dealers are obliged, in the spring, to bring their wood in cribs to that portion of the river accessible to barges. As the legislation passed by the Quebec Legislature cannot be put into force on account of one part of the river being navigable and the other part not being so, considerable difficulties arise. Every year the traders engaged in this commerce get into trouble, and the question is finally settled in the law courts. It is in order to obviate these difficulties that the present Bill has been introduced. We ask that the legislation passed by the Quebec Legislature be confirmed by the Federal Legislature, inasmuch as it applies to the navigable part of the St. Francis River. The Quebec Statute provides for the appointment of a trustee, whose duty it is to see the quantity of wood that is floated upon the river, in order to prevent difficulties arising. When the wood reaches the place where the river becomes navigable and accessible to boats, the wood is withdrawn from the river, and it is ordinarily there that the difficulties begin. Those who have floated a quantity of spruce, or a quantity of hard wood, generally withdraw the contrary amount. With the appointment of a person who would know the quantity and the quality of the wood put into the water by each proprietor, these difficulties would be overcome.

Mr. BLAKE. I think the attention of the Government should be directed to this measure which, it seems to me, although it may be proper that some relief should be afforded to the parties, is of a very extraordinary description. I observe the recital of the Bill is, that the floating of cordwood is as a rule over non-navigable waters altogether, but the floating must be completed over a small portion of the navigable portion of the river; and it is because it is to be continued over that small portion of the navigable portion of the river that the Bill is introduced to our attention, I presume.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is on that account.

Mr. BLAKE. There is a great mass of legislation which has taken place upon parallel subjects, particularly, I think, in the Province of New Brunswick and also in Nova Scotia. There have been a great number of Acts passed by Local Legislatures for regulating the floating of wood down streams and rivers, both navigable and non-navigable. A question arises as to the jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures to pass those Acts in so far as their provisions interfere with the navigation of rivers, but not otherwise. It is, to my mind, questionable whether it would not be better, inasmuch as the Bill is not supposed to interfere seriously with the navigation of rivers, to leave Local Legislatures to deal with those cases, subject to the observation that any Act they pass which obstructs the navigation of rivers will, of course, be beyond their powers. But if it is proposed to legislate here, I think the clause of the Bill that proposes to confirm an Act of a Provincial Legislature, in fact to re-enact it by reference, is very objectionable. It seems to me that if we are to legislate, we ought to legislate ourselves, and not to legislate by confirming any previous Act. Every clause of the Bill may be correct in the sense that it will be proper to make it law; but if it be proper to make it law, it ought to be made law by our enacting the provisions of our own authority, of course retaining power to alter and amend the provisions. It is an inconvenient practice, to say no more, that we should confirm Acts of the Local Legislatures, and so be obliged, in order to find out what the law of Canada, is to search among the Acts of the Local Legislatures for the Act that has been confirmed by the Dominion Parliament, in order to find out what the law is. In point of form, if not in substance, we ought to have before us all the Bills which we propose to enact. There are several other provisions which rather come within the sphere of the Local Legislatures than of this Parliament, and it would be very much better, I think, that the hon. the Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the consideration of these questions, should, if he has not considered the Bill, consider it before another stage is taken. The general cast of the Bill and several of its provisions seem to be equally objectionable.

Mr. BOURBEAU. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to say a few words in support of the Bill of my hon. friend, the member for Yamaska (Mr. Vanasse). It is well known that the St. Francis River is one of the most important rivers in the Province of Quebec, and upon which a great quantity of wood is cut. All the different kinds of wood that are in the trade are floated on this river; a great many wood dealers are engaged in the trade, and as my hon. friend, the member for Yamaska, has explained, it happens that this wood gets mixed while going down the river, and when it reaches the navigable part of the river, where the boats come to get the wood, if there is no law to prevent difficulties, the mixing of the wood often causes difficulties that bring on law suits. The Bill that is now before the House provides for the settlement of these difficulties, and I think that this honorable House should take the Bill into consideration and support it. As I have already stated the St. Francis River is one of the largest rivers in the Province of Quebec, and upon which there is a considerable trade in wood, and by passing the Bill proposed by my hon. friend, the House would be rendering a service to this hon. member and also a great number of wood merchants who are interested in this trade, and who reside in the Province of Quebec. And it should not be forgotten that this river flows through a large territory—I might mention the counties of Wolfe, Richmond, Drummond, and Yamaska. This river flows through all those counties. It is, Sir, a very considerable river, and for a long time back difficulties have been arising among those engaged in the wood trade. I think it is time to adopt some wise means of coming to their assistance. Thus, for these reasons, I trust the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Yamaska will be adopted, and I shall vote for its second reading.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. There are several provisions of the Bill which are ultra vires.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). The mover of the Bill, as well as the hon. the President of the Council, submitted this measure to me before it came on for second reading, and I therefore had an opportunity of considering it. I have arrived at the conclusion that so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned there is no difficulty. I understand the objection of the leader of the Opposition to be to the form of confirming the Act of a Local Legislature, and there may, as a mere matter of form, be something in that; but after all, so far as regards substance and the effect it would have on the legislation of this House are concerned, there is no difficulty whatever. The phraseology is as follows:—

“The said Act of the Province of Quebec, 40 Vict., Chap. 67, intituled ‘An Act to regulate the floating of cordwood in the innavigable portion of the River St. Francis,’ is confirmed in so far as the powers of the Parliament of Canada extend in the matter, and all the provisions of the said Act, within the purview of the powers thereof, shall have the same force and effect as if the said Act had been passed by the Parliament of Canada.”

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Is the local Act confined to the non-navigable portion of the river?

Mr. McDONALD. My hon. friend will see my view as I proceed. I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition, that so far as giving force and effect to an Act of the Quebec Legislature, by re-enacting it, it is unnecessary, because if it possessed the jurisdiction to pass the Act referred to, then the Act will take its power from the jurisdiction of the Legislature of Quebec, and not from any authority which we pretend to give it. If they had no authority to make the enactment, our action would not, so far as they are concerned, give any additional power, as we do not pretend to confirm it, except in so far as it may have involved control possessed by the Dominion Parliament. Then the only question is, whether the Dominion Parliament has the jurisdiction which they are asked to exercise by this Bill. It appears to me that it turns on the question whether the words “navigable water of that river,” which I understand is a large and important river flowing into the St. Lawrence, throw the jurisdiction on this Parliament or the Local Legislature. Under the Common Law the word “navigable” means the waters of any river, to the extent to which the tide ascends and affects the current of the river. It has been decided by the Ontario and Quebec Courts, and confirmed by the Supreme Courts, that so far as regards the St. Lawrence and the large rivers running into it, that the word “navigable” is not restricted in that sense in the old Province of Canada, where the old civil law jurisdiction still prevails to a large extent, but is used in the ordinary sense of the word. I understand, from the mover of the Bill, that the portion of the river which will be affected by the Bill is of that character and description; and, therefore, if I am correct in the definition and in the enlarged purview of the word “navigable,” which prevails with respect to those rivers, this Bill will be entirely within the competence and jurisdiction of this Parliament, and not within the competence of the Provincial Legislature. So far as I have read the Bill and understand the locality, I do not see how the rights sought to be given by this Bill would affect any public or general right of navigation which prevails on that river.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, the Bill introduced by my hon. friend the member for Yamaska has its raison d'être, and is even absolutely necessary. It is especially brought in in order to avoid those continual law suits that would arise first in Sorel, then in Montreal, and would finally go to England. This is not the first time such a measure has been introduced in this House. On a great many occasions when any doubt arose as to the interpretation of the legislation of this Parliament or that of the Local Legislature—on many and many occasions, I say, Bills passed in Ontario, New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, has been confirmed here. And, Sir, it is very important that the Parliament of the Dominion should grant these requests, for it is far better to expend a few farthings here in order to give jurisdiction to the Local and Federal Legislatures than that persons and trade should be ruined later by law suits. I do not think that the hon. leader of the Opposition is aware of the important facts that have been submitted to the hon. Minister of Justice; that is, that the St. Francis River is perfectly navigable, according to Common Law, certainly, and according to jurisprudence, very surely, especially according to Acts passed in Quebec, Ontario, and even here. This river is navigable as far as the place where they want to appoint a syndicate; above that it is full of rapids, and further up there are large lakes where trade is carried on. The only serious objection raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition is that we are confirming local legislation. Well, that is a question of parliamentary practice that may be rectified in Committee; but as to the principle, I think that it is better to pass an Act, the necessity of which may be questioned, but of which the result for the country will be to obviate long and costly law suits.

Bill read the second time, considered in Committee and progress reported.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BOULTBEE moved the second reading of Bill (No. 20) respecting the Northern Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. ANGLIN. What does it mean?

Mr. BOULTBEE. It means that the railway company wants to raise money for equipment, as the Bill states.

Mr. BLAKE. This is a Bill which, I think, requires consideration, for it means a little more than was stated by the hon. gentleman. As I understand it, it means that the company who now have a number of different grades of stock, shall have power to issue further stock on the authority of those stockholders who have everything to gain and nothing to lose by the improved equipment of the road, but above the heads and irrespective of the independent votes of those who may have something to lose. This, it seems to me, is contrary to ordinary usage and sound principle, and I think there ought to be some provision for obtaining the independent votes of those who hold securities above which it is proposed to place the new issue.

Mr. BOULTBEE. As I understand, these are matters of detail which may properly be discussed in Committee, but not at the second reading. The principle of the Bill is to regulate the securities of the company, and it is unusual to enter into a discussion of the details of a Private Bill at the second reading.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree with the hon. member who has charge of the Bill, that it should be read the second time and referred to Committee, as I believe that the true rule is that the House does not accede to the principle of a

Mr. McDONALD (Picton).

Private Bill by giving it a second reading. At the same time, I do not pledge myself to support in Committee the Bill as it now stands, because the rights of the parties over whose heads these bonds are to be issued ought to be protected.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not mean to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but I think we should proceed cautiously with a measure of this kind.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I suppose the hon. gentleman only called the attention of the House to this special feature of the Bill, in order that the attention of the Government, as well as the members of the Railway Committee, might be called to this matter. I do not suppose there can be any objection to the second reading, and when the Bill is referred to the Railway Committee, composed of more than half of the members of the House, most likely advocates on both sides will put their case before the House.

Bill read the second time.

CREDIT FONCIER FRANCO-CANADIEN.

Mr. GIROUARD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 31) to enlarge and extend the powers of the Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien.

Mr. VALLÉE. Mr. Speaker, I must oppose the Bill asking for an extension of the powers of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien, because that Company is incorporated under an Act of the Provincial Legislature, which sets forth in an indisputable, or rather in an absolute manner, that this Company shall transact business in the Province of Quebec only; and under its Act of incorporation and by its existence itself, it should transact and carry on business in the Province of Quebec alone. The Statute referred to defines its powers in the most absolute fashion; the Provincial Legislature has given it immense powers by that Statute, and granted to it a most extensive privilege; it has even declared that no other society of its kind should be established in the Province of Quebec for fifty years to come. By reason of its Act of incorporation itself, I maintain that the Company may not come before this House and ask for an extension of its powers. In the first place, we have not the right to extend them; neither have we the right to entertain the Bill, for the reason that the Company is not recognized by the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada. If the Company wishes to obtain more extended powers, if it believes that it is empowered by its Act of incorporation to obtain leave to extend its operations throughout the Dominion of Canada, it should ask for a new Act of incorporation, it should seek a constitution under the Federal principle, so as to be enabled to enjoy its powers throughout the Dominion. There is another objection to the Bill, and it is that the one submitted to this House asks for powers more extensive than those conferred by the original Bill. We are asked to give to the Company the right of lending money on all real estate, whereas the Act creating the Company specifies the loans which it shall make, as well as those which it shall not. No such distinction is made in the extension of powers which we are asked to give to-day; it is simply stated that the Company shall have the right of lending money on all real estate in the Dominion of Canada. Were we to give such a power to the Company, there would be a clashing between the power thus conferred on it and that embodied in its Act of incorporation; for, according to the Act which created it, it is said that the Company shall only lend on such and such estates, and yet by the Bill which we should pass, the Company would be free to lend on all real estate. There is consequently an insurmountable reason forbidding us to adopt this measure. There is more, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to call your attention to it: We are asked for an extension of powers; it is a company not incorporated by us which asks this favor of us; consequently this Bill must be considered as letters-patent, and it is the general rule that, in order that such letters-patent be confirmed, it is necessary that they should be contained in the Bill itself. I submit, therefore, that the present Bill should have contained the Act of incorporation of the Company; that the Act incorporating the Company in the Provincial Statutes of the Province of Quebec should have been included in the Bill submitted to us, in order that by the Act we should pass, we might extend and confirm such powers if we had the right so to do. I will now quote a couple of precedents in confirmation of what I maintain. I find the following in Ellis:—

“That when any Bill shall be brought into this House for confirming of letters-patent, there be a true copy of such letters-patent annexed to the Bill.”

I find the same opinion expressed in May, page 681, where it is said that the promoter of a Bill like the present one was obliged to withdraw it because the letters-patent had not been annexed to the Bill.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Would the hon. gentleman be so kind as to read that passage of May?

Mr. VALLÉE:

“The Committee on a Bill for confirming letters-patent are to see, in compliance with the standing orders, that there be a true copy of the letters-patent annexed to the Bill.” This copy should be attached to the Bill when first brought into the House; and if its omission were noticed in the House, at any time before the Bill was in Committee, the Bill might be ordered to be withdrawn.”

For the above reasons, do I call for your decision, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, we have not, according to Civil law, the right of passing this Bill; secondly, we have no right to pass it, because it is not recognized by this House; because the Company is incorporated under a Provincial Statute, that its powers are defined by that Legislature, and that we have no right to interfere with the latter's powers; thirdly, because the Company asks for powers more extensive than those it derives from the Act creating it; fourthly, because its Act of incorporation and its letters-patent should have been annexed to the Private Bill. For these reasons do I ask for your decision, and that the Bill should be declared out of order and withdrawn.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman, who has just spoken, objects that this Bill cannot be brought before this Parliament without having letters-patent annexed to the Bill; and, secondly, that this Bill is not in order, because it affects civil rights, and ought, therefore, to be declared out of order. As to the letters-patent, I think the hon. gentleman is quite wrong. This Crédit Foncier Company was not incorporated by letters-patent, but by an Act of the Legislature of Quebec. Those Acts are public Acts, they are as well known as our own Acts, and their publication in the Official Gazette, and in the Statutes of that Province, is a sufficient notice to the whole world of the existence of that Company. The reason why petitioners should be called upon to annex letters-patent to every petition for a Bill of this kind, is that these letters-patent may not be known as an Act of Parliament, and therefore it is important that those who may have to sue the company may know exactly what are its powers and by what instrument it was constituted. In the present case it is not so. This is an Act of the Legislature of Quebec, and being a public Act there is no necessity to annex letters-patent to the Bill. My hon. friend goes further, and says that this Bill affects civil rights. It may be that certain provisions of this Bill affect civil rights, but that is not the basis of the Bill. The whole Bill is for quite another purpose, it is in fact “An Act to enlarge and extend the powers of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien.” The preamble reads:

“Whereas, the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien, incorporated by the Statute of the Province of Quebec, passed in the Legislature of that Province, held in the 43rd and 44th year of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 80, intituled ‘An Act to incorporate the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien,’ has prayed for an extension and enlargement of its powers so as to allow it to transact business throughout the Dominion, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of its petition.”

That is the object of the Bill, to allow this Company to transact business throughout the Dominion, and not to affect civil rights. If there are provisions in that Bill that may affect civil rights, when the Bill comes before the Banking Committee these provisions may be modified or expunged. The “Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien” is incorporated by an Act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec. Now, this Act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec is published in the Quebec Official Gazette; it is published in the Statutes of the Province of Quebec, and that is, in the eyes of the law, a sufficient notice for everybody of the existence of this Crédit Foncier Company. That it is the basis of its existence, and it is so much so that it only needs to be stated that the Statute exists, and unless it can be shown that there has been falsification, that the volume is not a volume of the Statutes, this volume is evidence of the existence of the Company. It is very different from what it would be if we had letters-patent, because letters-patent would not have the same publicity as the Act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, and we would apply the ordinary rule that requires letters-patent to be annexed. As to the second point, namely, civil rights, I maintain that the object of the Act is not to affect them. The object of this Bill is merely to extend the powers of the “Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien,” as incorporated by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, to the whole Dominion of Canada. Well, if in this Bill there be anything affecting civil rights, the Banking Committee will strike out such provisions and then the Bill will remain without them. If the Banking Committee do not strike out these provisions affecting civil rights, nothing will prevent my hon. friend, the member for Portneuf, from moving an amendment to have such part of the Bill struck out. But, at all events, I do not think that the Bill should be thrown out on account of the remark made by the hon. member.

Mr. GIROUARD (Jacques Cartier). After the remarks made by the Minister of Public Works, almost nothing is left for me to say. The Crédit Foncier Canadien was incorporated by the Quebec Legislature last year, with certain powers limited to that Province. The Company now ask that its powers should be extended to the whole Dominion, but not with regard to property or civil rights, which, of course, come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Local Legislatures. There is a great deal of force in the objection raised by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée). It may be that, within the meaning of the British North America Act, lending money on the bonds of municipal or school corporations, or on real estate, is a civil right; but, because that clause is objectionable, that is no reason why the whole Bill should be rejected. The principal clause in the Bill is that empowering the Company to lend money on bonds, debentures and other securities of the Dominion. It is true that investment companies have in the past been incorporated by this Parliament with power to lend money on real estate, and the question was never raised as to the power of this Parliament to grant that privilege. If the Committee and the House come to the conclusion that we have the power, then this charter is all right; but if they decide that we have not the power, then the Crédit Foncier, in order to lend money in any Province, will be obliged to apply to the Local Legislature of that Province. The Company have a Bill before the Ontario Legislature at present, authorizing them to lend money on real estate in that Province. As to the objection that the Crédit Foncier Canadien has no legal existence in this House, I find that a Statute of 1880, passed by this Parliament, gave certain powers to the French Atlantic Cable Company, which was incorporated in France; and yet we are told that a company incorporated by one of our own Local Legislatures has no legal existence. I can see no technical or constitutional objection to the Bill. Whatever objection can be raised against the Bill it will be time enough to raise it when it comes before the Committee, and I think it should now receive its second reading.

Mr. BLAKE. I do not think there is anything in the point of order and the other objections such as should prevent the second reading of the Bill. As the hon. gentleman says, it is quite in our power to recognize the existence of any corporate entity, no matter by what legislative power that corporate entity may have been created, and to give it powers which we might give to any corporation incorporated by ourselves, although that is not a principle which I should desire to see very extensively applied. The question of powers may very well be left to the Committee, but I would say that if this Bill be not for the purpose of empowering the Company to lend money in other Provinces, I cannot see what its object is. If it is merely to give the Crédit Foncier the power of purchasing the bonds and other securities of the Dominion, I very much doubt whether the Local Legislature could not give that power, if they have not got it already. With reference to the 7th and 8th clauses, I hope the Committee will see that they conform to the spirit of the principle we recognized last year, so that the borrower will know what he is paying in principal and interest.

Mr. GIROUARD. We intend to comply with that law.

Mr. BLAKE. Then the 12th and 13th clauses seem to me to be very singular clauses. They give this Company a private criminal law of its own. They declare that mortgaging without legal title, and falsely declaring that mortgaged land is free from encumbrances, on the part of a borrower, shall be misdemeanors, and shall render him liable to fine and imprisonment. These clauses should either be made general in their application or they should not exist for the benefit of this single corporation.

Mr. VALLÉE. It is stated in the Act of incorporation what are the powers of the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien. I therefore maintain that that Act should be annexed to the Bill now before the House, as letters patent, in order that we should be able to grant any privileges to the Company. Such has ever been the principle both in England and here, and it is carried out to prevent the passing of a Bill giving to a company powers more extended than those contained in the letters-patent, or in its Act of incorporation. The Legislature of the Province of Quebec has granted to the Company the right of existence in the Province of Quebec for 50 years, on condition that it should confine its operations to that Province, and now we are asked to grant to it the right of extending its operations throughout the other Provinces of the Confederation. I pretend that there is a serious danger in granting such a power; it would be tantamount to setting aside our provincial authority; those desirous of obtaining special privileges would go to the Provincial Legislature and say: "Incorporate us, as we wish to do so-and-so." Therefore, the Legislature would incorporate such a company, and would grant to it privileges, denying similar ones to any other corporation, for a term of 50 years; these privileges once secured, the company would appear before the Federal Parliament and ask for an extension of powers. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has said: "It is because these powers are too limited that we have come to ask you to extend them." Well, then, if your powers are too limited, go back to the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, where you were born; go back to the place whence you obtained your powers; go whither you have your existence and ask of that Legislature to grant you the authority to go further; it will grant you the permission of extending your operations elsewhere." But if the Federal Government grants such a privilege to this Company, what will take place? The Crédit Foncier will extend its operations to all the other Provinces, reserving to itself the Province of Quebec as a basis for future operations; it will make use of the funds of the freeholders of the Province of Quebec to speculate in the other Provinces. We are told that it is nothing new that companies should come and ask for an extension of powers. But there is no precedent for the present case, and I defy the hon. member for Jacques Cartier to instance a similar case. The hon. member has mentioned that of the Trans-Atlantic Cable Company. But the present case is that of a company incorporated by the Provincial Legislature, which has defined its powers, its privileges, and has said: "We have granted you an Act of incorporation so that you should invest your money in the Province of Quebec exclusively, and on those terms do we allow you to exist with the powers which we now grant you." Well, then, the Province of Quebec would be deprived of the advantages to be derived from a company incorporated by itself, should the Federal Parliament grant to it the right of existence in the whole Dominion of Canada. I repeat that is a serious danger, that this House has no right to interfere and to extend powers granted by a Local Legislature, when once they have been defined. I maintain that we cannot entertain this Bill; it is unconstitutional and opposed to the idea which has ever presided at law-making. I pretend that this private Company, which, on the strength of a Private Bill, asks for an extension of powers, should follow the rule, which consists in annexing the Bill itself to the new one asked for. It is, perhaps, the first time that the question arises, but precedents have not always existed. I think it is a measure of security for the future, and to that, Mr. Speaker, do I call your particular attention.

Mr. GIROUARD. I would like to correct a little error committed by the hon. member when he stated that the Crédit Foncier had the privilege of lending money during 50 years in the Province of Quebec. The only privilege it has is to have a Committee or Board of Directors at Paris. The Quebec Legislature bound itself not to incorporate another Company or Crédit Foncier, lending money on the same principle, which should have an office in Paris, but the Quebec Legislature may incorporate as many Crédit Fonciers as it likes, provided that these Crédit Fonciers or these companies have offices outside of Paris, in London or elsewhere.

Mr. VALLÉE. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier contradicts me on a certain point, and says I have made a mistake. The following is the clause upon which I base my assertion:—

"A privilege of 50 years, dating from the day of its final constitution, is granted to the Company. The said privilege consists in the fact that the Government of the Province binds itself not to authorize within its territory the formation of any other Crédit Foncier in any way represented in France."

Consequently, no other company of its kind may establish itself in Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. The objections raised by the hon. member for Portneuf are as follows: First, that this House has no jurisdiction, because the Bill before it affects civil rights; 2nd, that it gives larger powers than those granted by the Legislature of the Province of Quebec; 3rd, that the Bill ought to be accompanied by a copy of the Statute of the Province of Quebec, granted for the incorporation of the Company, which is in effect equivalent to letters-patent, which, according to the Standing Orders, must accompany the Bill. With the first two points I have nothing to do. Neither the question of jurisdiction, nor the other objection, that the Bill gives larger powers, can be decided by the Chair. These questions are decided by the House itself or by the Committees to which the Bills are referred. The third point is a question of order, but the fact is that the Bill is founded on a Statute of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec, and I cannot consider that the rule applies to such. We all know that every Session Bills are passed by the House conferring powers granted by the Local Legislatures, and it has never been considered obligatory that the copy of any Provincial Statute should be annexed to any such Bill. I, therefore, rule that the points raised by the hon. member for Portneuf are not well taken.

Bill read the second time.

DOMINION CRÉDIT FONCIER.

Mr. IVES moved the second reading of Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Credit Foncier of Canada.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not rise to oppose the Bill on its second reading, but the same objection has to be made to this Bill as was made to the other, so far as civil rights are affected by it. Of course, that is to be decided by the Committee. I only wish to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to that objection.

Mr. IVES. I have already very carefully looked into the objection, and shall have a good deal to say with reference to it when the Bill comes up in Committee. I am a little surprised that my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier should willingly give up all that there is in his Bill of any use. It looks as if it pointed more to my Bill than to his own. I have not the slightest doubt this Parliament has the power to incorporate a company, either to lend money on real estate, or buy and sell real estate.

Mr. MILLS. If the hon. gentleman is disposed to discuss that question, it ought to be discussed here rather than in Committee. It ought to be fairly considered at every stage of the Bill. I do not see that we have the power about which the hon. gentleman has no doubt. This House has larger power than the Local Legislatures, and I do not think hon. members should regard with indifference an assumption of power that belongs to bodies less capable of taking care of their own interests than this House. The tendency for many years has been to legislate on every subject introduced here with reference to the question of jurisdiction. The only question hon. gentlemen seem to think this House has to consider is whether the measure is good or not. There may be many excellent measures not within the cognizance of this Parliament. In my opinion the hon. gentleman has in this measure undertaken to deal with the subject in a manner that seriously trenches on powers appertaining to another body.

Mr. IVES. I quite think it would have been better to discuss in the House the question which will be raised in the Committee. I take this ground, because it seems to be understood that the Bill which preceded this and which asks for similar powers, should be referred to the Committee. Of course, whatever decision this Committee will report, the question of jurisdiction can still be raised in this House.

Mr. GIROUARD. The question raised by the presentation of this Bill of my hon. friend is a serious one, though I do not object the Bill should be referred to a Committee and its constitutionality examined. It is a copy, word for word, of the Bill incorporating the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien in the Quebec Legislature. Before that society was incorporated, the promoters insisted that the Dominion Government should declare whether the Bill was within the powers of the Quebec Legislature. The Government declared that it was. If so, it seems to me this Parliament has no right to give the very same powers. That question can be examined into before the Private Bill Committee.

Mr. VALLÉE. I think that if this Parliament has not the right to pass this Bill, we have not the power to extend the privileges given to a company incorporated by the Provincial Legislature for the same purpose. If we have not the power to incorporate, we have still less the power to extend.

Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time:—

Bill (No. 53) to amend the Acts incorporating the Montreal, Portland and Boston Railway Company.—(Mr. Brooks.)

Bill (No. 54) to amend the Act of incorporation of The Accident Insurance Company of Canada, and to authorize the change of the name of the said Company to "The Accident Insurance Company of America."—(Mr. Gault.)

NEW BRUNSWICK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John), in the absence of Mr. Weldon, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 55) to amend the Acts relating to the New Brunswick Railway Company, said: The object of the Bill is to extend the line from Edmonton to the St. Lawrence to the Intercolonial, and to give power to the Company to erect a bridge across the St. John at Woodstock.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I think the hon. gentleman should give us some more information as to the intentions of the Company. It was chartered by the New Brunswick Legislature, in the first instance, to build a broad gauge railway, to bridge the St. John, and carry the Quebec end to Rivière du Loup, and it got a very large grant of public lands, nearly 2,000,000 acres, to assist it. When the railroad finally got into operation it was made a narrow gauge road, and was then turned over to another company, whose members do not belong to the Province at all. So those New Brunswick lands, with vast timber limits, are now in the hands of strangers, and who can charge the people what they please in the shape of stumpage and other dues. I do not mean to say they will be induced to be unjust by charging excessive tolls, but they have the power. For years those lands were locked up, stumpage was increased, making it a great injustice to New Brunswick that its lands should have been thus disposed of. Before giving the Company any additional privilege we should have some guarantee of their bond fides and intentions. They have got up a joint stock company in England to get rid of the lands or colonize them. I think, therefore, the member for St. John, who is largely interested in the lands himself, and who, perhaps, intends well, should inform the House of the projects of the Company. I do not wish to throw any difficulty in the way of railroads, because the more we have of them the better, and I am pleased to think my friend from St. John and his colleagues are so enterprising as to extend this one, but before granting them the charter we should be informed whether they intend to make the road a broad gauge, or extend it to Rivière du Loup or Rivière Ouelle, for the benefit of the people of New Brunswick, whose rights are so largely concerned.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John). So far as the Company are concerned, the main portion of the railroad is owned in Canada still. But the Company intend next spring to widen the gauge of the road in the western section, and this Bill is to enable them to extend it to the St. Lawrence, I think to Rivière du Loup. We also ask authority to erect a bridge across the St. John at Woodstock. Our object is to make a thoroughly good broad gauge road, as good as any in New Brunswick, and to carry the enterprise through in good faith, and we shall have a bridge at Fredericton.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I wished to refer to the bridge over the St. John in the interest of the member for Carleton, who, with others, has complained of the bridge across the river at Woodstock, which obstructs navigation, by preventing the passage of steamboats up the river at that point. For years the river has been thus impeded. I hope my hon. friend from St. John will be able to assure the House and the people of New Brunswick, that such a bridge will be built as will meet the requirements of the people on the upper St. John.

Mr. ANGLIN. As usual, when any company asks Parliament for liberty to bridge a navigable river, proper precautions are taken in the interest of the public, one of them being that the plan of the bridge be approved of by the Governor in Council, the Minister of Railways or Public Works, before the building is commenced. Such a provision, I have no doubt, will be made in this as in all similar Bills. This Bill does not ask any other privilege at present, but the extension of the road to the St. Lawrence. It does not ask for the disposal of the lands obtained from the Local Government. While not approving of the gift of lands in this way, the Company have had them so long in their possession, and have fairly earned them under the conditions prescribed, that they have a perfect right to sell them without reference to the interests of the public of the Province. The Local Legislature has no power to grant the privilege sought for by this Company, which makes it necessary for it to come to this Parliament.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I do not object.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. member for St. John the contemplated distance between the present terminus of the road and the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. BURPEE, (St. John). About seventy miles, of which fifty miles is a well settled agricultural country.

Mr. GRANDBOIS. I wish to point out that if the Company only desire to arrive at the best terminus the Act and Charter of 1870 gives them that power.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These points will, of course, be raised in the Railway Committee, but in the meantime the Bill should go to the second reading.

Bill read the second time.

RATES ON CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether there has been any correspondence between any member of the Government and the Quebec Government on the subject of rates to be charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway? Whether any agreement has been made on the subject? At what date such agreement, if any, was made; and whether it will be laid on the Table?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. So far as I am aware there is no correspondence with the Quebec Government on the subject, and no agreement has been made. I may say that the matter is still under consideration.

BURROWING PITS IN THE COUNTY OF LISLET.

Mr. CASGRAIN moved for copy of the correspondence, evidence and award of — Simard, Esq. official arbitrator in the case of Lucien Morin, Antille, and several others of the parish of St. Roch des Aulnets, County of Lislet, claiming damages from the Government on account of burrowing pits for the use of the Intercolonial Railway, opened on their several lands during the last season. He said: The reason the Government gave the other day for not producing these papers was, that there might be some private and confidential matter in the report to the Government which ought to be held back. I think the hon. Minister will see that these papers contain an award and the report of the official arbitrator upon which the award was based. This report may hereafter be brought before the whole Board of Arbitrators upon an appeal, it is, therefore, a public document and I do not see that the objection is valid. As I remarked the other night, I consider that an injustice has been done to these parties, that they have suffered heavy damages which have not been either assessed or paid, and I, therefore, renew the motion.

Motion agreed to.

JUDICIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for a statement of the population of each county, union of counties or district throughout Canada, to which is assigned a County Court Judge, and for any available statistics as to the judicial work therein, said: It is obvious that this motion is directed to the propositions on the Table with reference to the salaries of County Court Judges. Our information as to the population of the districts is not very satisfactory as contained in the public documents, because the census districts are arranged more with reference to the electoral divisions than with reference to the counties and other judicial divisions. Besides, it would be convenient to have in a tabulated form a statement of the population of the various judicial districts, some of which are composed of groups of counties. There are, I am aware—because I was instrumental some years ago in procuring them—some statistics in reference to the judicial work performed by each of the County Judges in 1877. I am not aware whether they have been carried down to a later period. Having regard to the general tenor of the resolutions before the House, I think that the information for which I seek is not immaterial to the consideration of the scheme which the hon. gentleman proposes to ask our assent to.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES.

Mr. DAWSON, in moving for a return of all correspondence relating to the substitution of new names for ancient and historic ones in the North-West Territories, more especially along the route of the Pacific Railway, said he feared that but little correspondence could be brought down, and that it had been left to surveyors and engineers to give whatever names they chose to localities. However that might be, no greater outrage had ever been perpetrated. To discard the old and historic names for such new and outlandish ones as appeared on the maps of the Pacific Railway was to rob the country, in a measure, of its history. There was not a place or a district in the North-West Territories that had not a name already. The old names of places in a country were a sort of index to its history and the regions of the North-West had been occupied from time immemorial by Indians who had given names to every river and rivulet, and in fact to every place which had naturally any prominence. These names were some of them very beautiful, and all of them appropriate to and in some sense descriptive of the places to which they were given. The day was not far distant when all that would remain as a reminiscence of the once formidable but now withering Indian would be the names he had given to the haunts of his race, and were these to be swept away at the dictum of unappreciative and perhaps prejudiced men of a different origin, who sometimes assumed a superiority that the circumstances did not warrant?

The first civilized men who had penetrated to these regions, new so well known, were the enterprising and adventurous French who had come to this country before the days of chivalry had quite departed. They had had difficulties to contend with which could not now be estimated and had surmounted them all. Undaunted by wilds which seemed interminable, or by untamed savages—sometimes friendly but often hostile—they had penetrated to the interior of the continent; they had traced the Saskatchewan and the Missouri to their sources in the Rocky Mountains, and to their debouchment in seas until then unknown. Many of these explorers of a former day would live in history; their names were household words, and he would ask, where the names by which they had designated the scenes of their adventures and the places which, in many instances, had been consecrated by their blood, to be swept from the face of the land for which they had done so much, and replaced by others which had no connection whatever with the history of the country? Succeeding the French, or rather joining them, came the Scotch Highlanders, some of whom had come over from the neighboring Republic immediately after the war of Independence, leaving their all behind them rather than renounce their allegiance, while others of them were those, or the descendants of those who had left their native land on account of political troubles. Accompanied by the French voyageurs whom they found in the country, they crossed the Rocky Mountains and planted the British flag on the shores of the Pacific Ocean, and if British Columbia were to-day a part of the Dominion, it was due to the enterprise of those intrepid explorers, for it was by claiming the country on their discoveries that Great Britain was able, subsequently, to make good her right to that country in negotiations and treaties with the United States. The McKenzie, the Frazer, and a number of lesser rivers together with many a mountain lake, bore the names of these hardy explorers, but if this Vandalism in robbing a country of its history was to be permitted to go on, those names, like the old French and Indian ones, would be in time snuffed out and replaced by designations of a foreign and barbarous sound. He would run over a few of the new names to show the House with what strange sounds they must now become familiar: Lorfeden, Nordland, Linkoping, Upsula, Carlstad, Ostersund, Ingolf, Mounstrie, Varna, Donnocona, Buckstone, Raith, Hecla, and a host of others of equally foreign tone. Whatever might be the merit of these names, and some of them were those of obscure islands in icy seas, or of villages in the north of Europe with a population of 1,500 or so, they certainly had no connection whatever with the history of this country. Neither Swedes nor Russians had any claim to be commemorated in these regions. They were, however, in keeping with the spirit of Vandalism which seemed to have led to the blotting out of the old names for these new ones, for they had been taken, at least in part, from the early homes of the Goth and the Vandal. Our neighbors across the lines, although they sometimes adopted strange names, were careful, as a general rule, to preserve the historic ones, whether English, French, Spanish or Indian, or even Dutch. This was really an important matter, and he (Mr. Dawson) trusted that, in future, all names to be given to places should be submitted to the Government for approval before being finally adopted, and that every selection of a name made should be, as nearly as possible, that by which the locality was already known. It was over two hundred years since the first civilized men had reached the territories of the North-West, and yet the surveyors and engineers of the Pacific Railway treated these regions as a terra incognita, as a land which they had themselves discovered, and to which they were entitled to give names. Such impertinence on the part of mere employees in the public service should be at once and forever put a stop to.

Mr. GOURSOL. I rise to second the motion just made by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Dawson). I hope that he will thereby succeed in obtaining for himself and the country, relief from an abuse which has existed so long, and which has been so detrimental to the history of the country. The hon. member for Algoma has, by this motion, rendered a great service to his country. It is a fact that people attempting to travel by the old map of the country would never find their way to the shores of the Pacific. Everywhere have the names been altered; they have been disfigured, mutilated and rendered incomprehensible; names, which were an honor to the country, have been omitted or withdrawn, and in their place have been substituted names unknown to everybody. As an instance, this is how a few names have been translated: "L'anse Bérard," which is now the terminus of the Pacific Railway, has become Burrard Inlet; the "Lac de la Pluie," formerly called "Lac la Rinde," is now "Rainy Lake;" lake "Queue d'Oiseau" has become in English "Birdtail," which has been improved into "Bertle." It is not in such a manner, Mr. Speaker, that the historical souvenirs of the country should be preserved, especially when, as the hon. member for Algoma has pointed out, our American neighbors are doing all they can to trace back all such old historical names, instead of wiping them out. To show how carefully they preserve them, I will give an example. There was a place called "Pendant d'Oreille." The term popularly in vogue is "Pan d'Oreille." Headless of orthography, the Americans have placed it on their map as "Pan d'Oreille." The hon. member for Algoma rightly said that the country had been discovered by the French, and those who have read our history from the date of the conquest to the year 1870, would be surprised and astonished were they now able to find a single old name therein. What has become of the names of the old forts? It would have been easy to preserve names such as Iberville, Ste. Anne, St. Germain, Bourbon and Maurepas; all those names are to be found in history, but they have been mutilated, they have been changed; our employees have therein imitated a nation so great by its intelligence that I need hardly name it, the French nation, which has demolished the monuments whereon were inscribed the names of its victories and glories; they have cast these names aside in order to put others in their place. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this will not happen in our own country; I hope it will not be left to our engineers to name and designate the various localities. Let them make out the plans, but let the Government be the sole judge of the names to be given. Let the Government take the old maps and it will find names worthy of being given to every place; it will bear in mind the names of those who have discovered the country, of those who have shed their blood in fighting against savage tribes, and it will remember that the Scotch, with the French, conquered the country, and so powerfully contributed to civilize it. I trust, therefore, that the Government will not leave to the engineers the right of taking the names of their families, relations or friends, to designate the different places in the west; and if these engineers are ignorant of the history of the country, the Government will, perhaps, supply them with maps which will give them the necessary information.

Mr. BLAKE said he was glad the hon. member for Algoma had brought up this matter. He sympathized a good deal with the views of the hon. member, and hoped that the attention of the Government would not be confined to the names on the Pacific Railway only, but would be extended to that North-West line which was now known as "The Dawson Route."

Mr. LANGEVIN. I must say that some three or four years ago, the names of the proposed stations on the Canadian Pacific Railway as contained in the reports laid before the House by hon. gentlemen opposite, were all names strange to the country given by surveyors and engineers. I am glad the hon. leader of the Opposition now finds the old names given by the voyageurs and others should be retained. In British Columbia there is a lake called Lake la Hache, a name given it by voyageurs whose canoe loaded with axes became upset and the axes went to the bottom. That name is still retained, and there is no reason why it should be changed, as the name is easily pronounced. At another place a small river is called the River Tache, no doubt through its having been discovered by an ancestor of the venerable Archbishop of St. Boniface. At another place you find the River Mackenzie. Why change that name? We should keep the old names whether English, French or Indian, provided the latter are not unpronounceable. We should make it the business of officers not to destroy those landmarks.

Mr. MILLS. It was said by an old Roman writer, that when men were rising from the condition of barbarism, they left off their trade of cracking crowns and manufactured verbs and nouns. We are engaged very much in the same sort of business here to-night. Having no important measure to discuss, we have gone into a question of historical and geographical nomenclature for the North-West country. Are people who establish cities and villages there, to be of no consequence? Was the country to have no history between this and the day of judgment? It may be very important to retain those old Indian names. Many places have been misnamed. For instance, the most western county in Ontario, is called Essex; some antiquarian at some future period, may think that this was a settlement made from Michigan. So we have a county called Norfolk, which one might hereafter think was a settlement from the north side of Erie or Pennsylvania. Doubtless many European names have been employed and misapplied in this country; but the Government cannot undertake to regulate the naming of places in a country, nor can it preserve the names of places such as those given to particular localities in the North-West Territory. When you consider the vastness of the country and the small number of places particularly designated, you will see how very little Government have to do with the matter. When you look at the geographical nomenclature of England, you will see that every wave of settlement that came into the country, whether Roman, Saxon or Danish, impressed itself upon the geography of the country. So you can mark Danish settlements by places whose names end with the termination "by," such as Selby, Derby, etc., Roman settlements or camps by names ending with the termination "chester," "cester" and "caster." These people became an integral part of the population of the country. Subsequent events reach back to these indelible marks of their first settlement. But with what object are we seeking to preserve Indian names of places, or even those fixed by voyageurs? What important transactions have been connected with them to induce us to take a historic interest in preserving the particular nomenclature which they have given? The member for West Durham says we have a road called the Dawson. That was a very modern name, but my impression is that it is falling into desuetude, and others are still more likely to experience that fate. For the same reason the names given by the Indians and voyageurs who have gone to the North-West, will disappear. They are not the people who make a country or its history. At the same time, the principle of the survival of the fittest may be left to operate in the North-West. Names of historic interest will remain, and those of no importance will disappear. I was rather surprised at the instance given by the Minister of Public Works in dealing with this subject. He said that because a canoe was upset and some axes lost in the bottom of the lake, the event was of sufficient historic interest as to entitle it to give the name to a large sheet of water for all time. That may be his view, but it is not mine, nor do I think it will be the view of the great majority of the members of the House, or of the people who are to occupy that country. It seems to me we could employ our time better in the public interest than in undertaking legislation with a view to keep alive the names of the tribes of savages who have already become extinct. With regard to voyageurs and Indians, I think the matter of preserving their names may be left to take care of itself.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to pass without protesting. The hon. member asks with astonishment, and I understand his astonishment, whether he is not acquainted with the history of his country, and what good the pioneers of these vast regions have done. Sir, if he went back a little, if he studied a little the history of the past few years, he would find names worthy of his attention, facts that he might meditate upon, and men whose example he might follow. He maintains that it is not for a few Indian tribes that have perished, and a few pioneers, to give their names to the different places in the North-West. That hon. gentleman may say what he likes, but when the hardy pioneers, armed with the cross of their God, and holding in their hand the standard of their King, went through these immense solitudes, treaded the virgin soil of the great forest of the new world, climbed steep mountain sides—there often to leave their lives—we should at least respect the names that tradition has handed down to us, and if we find them on the soil beneath our feet let us not wipe out the glorious mark; and the hon. member should be the first to respect tradition and accept the accomplished fact. I ask you, Sir, if we were to listen to our hon. opponent and accept his views, what name would we have to give to our continent if Americus Vespucci had not given his name to it, and what would British Columbia be called if the glorious discoverer of the new world had not found this land and left it a name that is dear to us? The far west has also its history; we should respect it, and cherish as a tradition the ancient names found therein. That is, perhaps, the only legacy that we possess of those bygone days, and I think that the hon. member for Bothwell, instead of opposing this measure, should join with all the members of this House and ask for this correspondence, which only requests that the Government should take the means of securing the preservation of the names that exist in those far off countries discovered by our ancestors.

Mr. DAWSON. The hon. member for Bothwell is the very last person I should have expected to hear say that those historic names were not worth preserving. He had himself written something about the history of this country, and he now seeks to obliterate it—that he should say that those Indians and voyageurs had done nothing and that their names should be swept away, is extraordinary. The member for Bothwell has remarked that succeeding waves of population in Europe and England have left their names and other traces behind them. Very true, but such waves of population have not as yet come to our North-West Territories. The names which I complain of are taken from people who have never been near the country, and who have no connection with its history; from barbarous races and countries in the north of Europe, which many of us never heard of before. I think it is very absurd to adopt these foreign names. And as to the hon. gentleman's complaint about our occupying the time of the House in this discussion, I think it has not been very improperly occupied in considering this matter. The hon. gentleman seems to think this a question of no importance, but I consider it one of very great importance.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. My sympathies at least go with the mover of the motion to an extent, that compels me to say that I would rather see the old names preserved. Good taste is not always shown in the appropriation of new names. We are told that, in some places, owing to the respect paid to a great man, not only all the babies are named George Washington Smith, but all the places are called after that distinguished man. I think it would be far better, at least, that historic names should be preserved. And when one speaks of the history of the North-West, it would be better to speak of its traditions, for we do not know the history of that region. Then when names come to be selected, the question of pronunciation requires to be considered, for great injustice may often be done by indirect pronunciation. The names of the voyageurs have been spoken of, but they are sometimes very singularly pronounced. For instance, I remember, and I am not an old man, when travelling between Montreal and Quebec on the Grand Trunk, there was a place called Somerset, and I never passed that place but the conductor did not come to the door and cry out "Sain Morrissett." This is an instance of what may happen if unpronounceable names are given to places. I really sympathize with those who made and have supported the motion to this extent; but I think the beautiful, soft, liquid language of the Indians could be preserved in many cases as it has been, and if the history of the original settlers, the original pioneers, who performed the hardest labors and encountered so many perils in the early days of the country, could be preserved by means of suitable names, I would much prefer it to the modern practice of calling everyone such a name as Smith, because Mr. Smith happened to be a prominent man.

RATES ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for correspondence, telegraphic or otherwise, on the subject of the rates to be charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway, under the contract on the Table, said: It has been made to appear by the public prints, as well as by an answer given across the floor by the Minister of Railways to a question asked by myself, there has been some correspondence with the Toronto Board of Trade on the subject of rates to be charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway as affecting the interests of the Ontario railways, and it appears from the hon. gentleman's answer to my question that an agreement has been made on that subject, which arrangement he thought he would have no objection to place on the Table. That arrangement has been made public. It seems to be contained in a proposal from the Toronto Board of Trade submitted to the Minister, and a telegraphic response on his part, that it is unobjectionable and it is agreed to. I had supposed, from the same sources and other sources of information, there had been some correspondence between the Quebec Government and this Government on the same subject as affecting the interests of that Province and its Government railway, but the hon. gentleman's statement this evening has shown I was mistaken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said so far as I was aware.

Mr. BLAKE. I withdraw my statement. I understood the hon. gentleman to speak more precisely than he now appears to have done. I still suppose that some sort of correspondence has taken place, as I can hardly assume that all we know to have been going on has taken place without some discussion on the subject of rates as affecting Quebec very importantly. That there should have been an arrangement made by the hon. Minister as to the rates to be charged on the Canada Pacific Railway with the Toronto Board of Trade implies, I apprehend, some correspondence with the gentleman to whom he has agreed to hand over that railway. He has it not in his power absolutely to agree to a system of rates without discussing it with those gentlemen, and I therefore assume, inasmuch as the hon. gentleman did agree with the Toronto Board of Trade, that a certain system and mode of charging rates would be adopted, that he has had correspondence with the gentlemen who largely control the railway, who are forming the railway company, in which he obtained their assent. I am a little staggered in that view which I certainly entertained, when I placed the notice on the paper, by what I see in to-day's Toronto paper, which states that the members of the Syndicate have declined to accept the arrangement which the hon. gentleman made with the Toronto Board of Trade—because I can hardly suppose the hon. gentleman would have made that arrangement without, at all events, consulting his friends, the Company. But I will still assume, until the hon. gentleman informs me that I am in error, some correspondence with the Company or some of its members took place with respect to an agreement with the Toronto Board of Trade with respect to the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is quite another class of correspondence which would throw light on this subject, and the motion is directed to eliciting the facts and obtain the correspondence, if any. The House is aware that, in the course of the debate on the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway, a pledge was given that the General Railway Act was to be altered in many particulars to importantly affect the construction of the Pacific Railway under the contract, to affect it in such a way that the rates and fares on that railway might be very seriously altered by the proposed change in the Railway Act. I am desirous of knowing whether there has been any correspondence with the Syndicate or any of its members upon this subject as affecting the rates and fares to be charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and if there has been any such correspondence and an agreement they should be brought down. These are the reasons why I submit the motion.

COMMUNICATION WITH P. E. ISLAND.

Mr. YBO, in moving for correspondence with the Department of Railways during the past two years, in reference to building lines of railway from the Intercolonial Railway to Cape Tormentine and from Cape Traverse to the Prince Edward Island Railway, said: Under the terms of Union between the Island and the Dominion it was agreed that communication should be kept up with the Island both winter and summer by the Dominion Government. The subject has been many times before this Parliament, and promises have been made for the construction of a railway from the Intercolonial line to Cape Tormentine, and from Cape Traverse to the Prince Edward Island Railway. The late Government surveyed the line on this side, and expected to have commenced work immediately. The present Government then came into power; but although they have been three years in office, nothing has been done. Meanwhile the people of the Island are suffering; and during the present winter no mail crossed during a fortnight, which was a very serious matter to business men. It was altogether too bad that the Island should have been kept in this condition for so many years. Meetings have been held by the people all over the Island, as well as in that part of New Brunswick which is interested in this question, pressing on their representatives and the hon. Minister of Railways the necessity of at once beginning this work, and I trust that this will be the last time we will have to urge the matter upon the attention of the House; and that we shall find, when the Estimates come down, that provision has been made to begin this work at once. In fact, if nothing is done by the end of this Session the people of the Island are determined to appeal to the Imperial Government if the terms of the Union are not carried out. This is the unanimous feeling from one end of the Island to the other. The severity of the labor which these men have to undergo in crossing over in these small boats would not be believed by those who have never crossed the strait. I think the Government should provide for the building of sheds for the boats of these men; as it would only require a small amount, and as the men themselves are very poorly paid. The Government has nearly the united support of the representatives from the Island; there is only one member in opposition to them in this House and another in the Senate, and if they go on with this work I believe they would have the support of the whole Island. The Minister of Railways told us last Session that the surveys had not been completed; but that is not the case at the present time, and when the papers come down I hope we will have some light on the subject.

RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Return showing the cost of the surveys and location of the second 100 miles west of Red River of the Canadian Pacific Railway, from 1st January, 1879, to 1st February, 1881.—(Mr. Guthrie.)

Statement or estimate of the quantity and value of the iron for bridging on the Canadian Pacific Railway, from Selkirk to Kamloops, and for such information as to the number, length and character of the bridges as is in the possession of the Government.—(Mr. Glen.)

Correspondence in relation to the purchase of a property for the establishment of a Post Office in the Town of Sorel.—(Mr. Geoffrion.)

Return showing the names of all persons employed: 1st, as permanent French Translators; and 2nd, as Sessional French Translators, of this House, from the 1st of January, 1874, to the 1st of February instant, with the amount of money paid per month or per day, as salary or wages to each of them respectively, for each month within the same period.—(Mr. Scriver.)

House adjourned at 10:20 o'clock, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 14th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following Bill was read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 27) to amend the Act 43 Vict. Chap. 61, intituled an Act to incorporate the Assiniboine Bridge Company.—(Mr. Scott.)

THE LAND IMPROVEMENT FUND.

Mr. HESSON moved for copies of all papers and correspondence between this Government and the Government of Ontario, in relation to the debt said to be due by the Dominion to certain townships in the Province of Ontario, under the name of the Land Improvement Fund; also, for copies of that portion of the award made and confirmed between the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec, relating to the settlement of the Crown lands and Common School lands account, whereby so large a sum as $226,456.86 is said to be due to certain Ontario municipalities; also for all Orders in Council in relation thereto. He said: This is not the first time I have brought this matter to the attention of Mr. Yeo.

the Government. This Land Improvement Fund was established by 16 Vict. Chap. 159, Section 14 of which reads as follows:—

"It shall be lawful for the Governor in Council to reserve out of the proceeds of the school lands in any county, a sum not exceeding one-fourth of such proceeds, as a fund for public improvements within the county, to be expended under the direction of the Governor in Council, and also to reserve out of the proceeds of unappropriated Crown lands in any county, a sum not exceeding one-fifth as a fund for public improvements within the county, to be also expended under the direction of the Governor in Council; provided always, that the particulars of all such sums, and the expenditure thereof, shall be laid before Parliament within the first ten days of each Session; provided always that not exceeding six per cent. on the amount collected, including surveys, shall be charged for the sale and management of lands forming the Common School Fund, arising out of the one million acres of land set apart in the 'Huron Tract.'"

This 1,000,000 acres of land appears to have been set apart a short time previous to 1859, and the price was fixed at $2.50 per acre for the school lands and $2 per acre for Crown lands. Settlement proceeded very slowly. The country was then known as the Queen's Bush, the roads were very bad, and it was found necessary to establish a more liberal policy. That was done upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of Crown Lands, Doctor Rolph, by an Order in Council, and the price was reduced to $2 per acre for school lands, and to $1.50 per acre for Crown lands. Payments were made from time to time to the municipalities interested in this fund, under this Act, at the rate of one-fourth of the proceeds of the school lands, and one-fifth of the proceeds of the Crown lands, until an Order in Council was passed on the 6th of March, 1861, cancelling further payments from future sales. I contend that that Order in Council did not apply to the proceeds of any sales made prior to the Order in Council, that it could not be retroactive, and that the municipalities interested in that fund cannot possibly be deprived of the receipts arising, after 1861, from the sales made up to that date. I hope to have, in this matter, the assistance of the hon. leader of the Opposition, for I find that when that hon. gentleman had the honor of representing the county of Bruce, he made an effort to obtain, for the municipalities chiefly interested in that fund, their proper rights. On reference to the journals of the Legislature of Ontario for 1869, under date of November 25th, I find the following:—

"On motion of Mr. Blake, seconded by Mr. McKellar,"

"Resolved—1. That by the Land Act of 1853, it was enacted that it should be lawful for the Governor in Council to reserve out of the proceeds of the school lands in any county, a sum not exceeding one-fourth of such proceeds, as a fund for public improvements within the county, to be expended under the direction of the Governor in Council, and also to reserve out of the proceeds of unappropriated Crown lands, in any county, a sum not exceeding one-fifth, as a fund for public improvements within the county, to be also expended under the direction of the Governor in Council.

"2. That on the 7th of December, 1855, an Order in Council was passed, reciting that applications had been made for aid from the Improvement Fund created by the said Act, and directing that the Crown Lands Department should appraise the Inspector General of the amount at the credit of each county for the proceeds of sale of both Crown and School lands, so that the proportions accruing to the Improvement Fund might be set apart by the Receiver General for that purpose.

"3. That the petitions presented to this House on the subject of the Land Improvement Fund, be referred to a Select Committee, composed as follows:—The Hon. Messrs. Wood, Richards; Messrs. Ferrier, Finlayson, Galbraith, Pardee Boulter, McKellar, and Blake; with power to send for persons and papers."

I find that that Committee made a report, and I desire, for the information of this House, to read that report in order to support the claim I am now making on behalf of the municipalities that are asking to be paid the proceeds of the sales of lands made prior to 1861. The Report reads:

"REPORT of the Select Committee on the Land Improvement Fund.

"To the Honorable the Legislative Assembly of Ontario:

"The Select Committee to whom was referred the petitions relating to the Land Improvement Fund, begs leave to report as follows:—

"The Committee have held many meetings, and examined numerous witnesses and papers, and carefully considered the matter referred to them, and they find unanimously:

"1. That on the 7th of July, 1852, the Government of the day past an Order in Council in the words following:—Upon the memorandum submitted by the Commissioner of Crown Lands relative to the school lands in the Counties of Grey and Bruce, the Committee of Council recommend that the reduction in price from 12s. 6d. to 10s. an acre, as suggested, be approved, and that the regulations laid down in the said report be adopted, and further that a measure be submitted to Parliament to authorize the expenditure of a sum equal to 2s. 6d. an acre of the purchase money on the improvement of the roads and harbors within the said counties, and the Committee further recommend that not more than 200 acres be sold to any one individual, except upon special recommendation of the Commissioner of Crown Lands approved by His Excellency in Council.

"2. That by the Land Act of 1853, it was enacted that it should be lawful for the Governor in Council to reserve out of the proceeds of the school lands in any county a sum not exceeding one fourth of such proceeds as a fund for public improvements within the county, to be expended under the direction of the Governor in Council, and also to reserve out of the proceeds of unappropriated Crown lands in any county, a sum not exceeding one fifth as a fund of public improvements within the county, to be also expended under the direction of the Governor in Council.

"3. That at this period there were large tracts of Crown and school lands in various counties unsettled, and it was the policy of the country to encourage the settlement thereof as much as possible.

"4. That one of the greatest obstacles to settlement was the want of roads and bridges, and it was in order to induce the speedy settlement of the country, by providing means for the construction of such works that the said Order and Act were passed.

"5. That shortly after the passing of the said Act, large numbers of persons purchased and settled on the vacant Crown and school lands, and within a very few years they were well settled, four-fifths of the school lands having been settled in 1853, 1854 and 1855.

"6. That the general belief and opinion of the settlers was that they would be entitled to have one-fourth of the price of school lands, and one-fifth of the price of Crown lands expended within the municipalities in the construction of roads and bridges.

"7. That this belief and opinion was entertained by several of the Crown Lands agents who sold the lands.

"8. That several of such agents stated to the intending settlers, that if they became settlers, one-fourth of the price of school lands, and one-fifth of the price of Crown lands would be so expended as aforesaid, and that thus the price of their lands was practically less than the stated price by these amounts which would otherwise have to be raised by local taxation for the same purposes.

"9. That large numbers of settlers purchased on the understanding with the agent stated in the preceding paragraph, especially in the County of Bruce, where the population increased from 2,837 in 1852, to 27,494 in 1861.

"10. That the Government of the day, in an Order in Council, dated on 27th February, A.D. 1855, referred to the Improvement Fund as being established by the Land Act of 1853, and ordered certain expenditure thereon; and in another Order in Council, dated on 27th March, A.D. 1855, further assumed the existence and availability of the fund.

"11. That on the 7th December, 1855, the Government of the day in an Order in Council, referred to the said fund in the words following:—The Minister of Agriculture also brings under Your Excellency's notice that numerous applications have been made for aid from the Improvement Fund, created by the 14th section of the Land Act, 16th Vict., Chap. 159, which authorizes one-fourth of the proceeds of the sale of school lands, and one-fifth of those of Crown lands to be expended in the several counties in which the sales are effected. That none of this fund has, as yet, been set apart from the sales hitherto made, although an Order in Council has been passed for the expenditure of $25,000 thereout. That it appears requisite that the Crown Lands Department should be directed to appraise the Inspector General of the amount at the credit of each county for proceeds of sale of both Crown and school lands, that the proportions accruing to the Improvement Fund may be set apart by the Receiver-General for that purpose. Out of the Improvement Fund referred to, he recommends that the following sums be appropriated for the objects hereafter stated, viz:—(Stating several applications.)

"12. That on the 28th day of July, A.D. 1856, the Government of the day passed an Order in Council in the following words:—In reference to the Fund for Public Improvements, formed under the 14th section of the Act, 16 Vic., Chap. 159, the Committee recommend that the funds derived from the sales of lands in each particular township, or other municipality, and applicable to the purposes of this fund and not already apportioned, be applied to the making, maintaining, altering, or improving the roads or bridges in each of those townships or other municipalities, respectively, and be for this purpose distributed and disposed of by and through the Municipal Council of each such township or other municipality; each such Council to report to the Bureau of Agriculture the manner of expenditure of all such monies, on the first days of January and July in each year, and at any intermediate time within ten days after having been called upon so to do by that department.

"13. That on several occasions during the years 1857, 1858, 1859, and 1860, the Government of the day, by Orders in Council, appropriated to purposes of local improvement, moneys arising out of the Improvement Fund.

"14. That books were opened in the Crown Lands Department, labelled, 'Road Improvement Fund,' with a heading to each page, in the words, 'Statements of the amounts available for public improvements on sales of Crown Lands, Grammar School Lands and Common School Lands, under 16 Vict., Cap. 59, sec. 14, in each township, in the County of _____, in which books the accounts of the fund were kept.

"15. That on the 6th March, A.D. 1861, the Government of the day made an Order in Council in the following words:—'On the recommendation of the Honorable the Commissioner of Crown Lands, the Committee advise that the Order in Council of 7th December, 1855, authorizing the payment of the Improvement Fund created by the Land Act, 16 Vict., Chap. 159, be rescinded,'—but no order has been made rescinding that of 28th July, 1856.

"16. That no part of the Improvement Fund accruing since the 6th March, 1861, has been applied to the purposes of the fund.

"17. That large sums of money have since 6th March 1861, been received by the Government of the late Province of Canada, from the sales of Crown and school lands, made between the date of the passing of the Land Act, and the 9th March, 1851.

"18. That further, large sums have been received on account of such sales by the Government of Ontario, and further, large sums remain due on account of such sales.

"19. That large sums have been expended, and large debts incurred by the various municipalities for the construction of roads and bridges, which would otherwise have been in whole or part constructed by means of the Improvement Fund.

"20. The Committee beg leave further to report that they have appended to this their Report, the evidence of the witnesses, all of whom were persons of credit, and the material papers produced.

"21. The Committee beg leave, lastly, to report that they abstain from stating any opinion or making any recommendation, because they understand the order of reference to confine them to the ascertainment of the facts for the information of the Legislature.

"All of which is respectfully submitted.

"T. B. PARDEE,

"Chairman."

I desire, in connection with this report, to call attention to the provisions of the British North America Act, with respect to the management of the Trust Fund. Section 109 says:

"All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, in which the same are situate, or otherwise, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the Province in the same."

Section 111 provides:

"Canada shall be liable for the debts and liabilities of each Province existing at the Union."

Section 142 states:

"The division and adjustment of the debts, credits, liabilities, properties and assets of Upper Canada and Lower Canada shall be referred to the arbitration of three arbitrators, one chosen by the Government of Ontario and one by the Government of Quebec, and one by the Government of Canada; and the selection of the arbitrators shall not be made by the Parliament of Canada until the Legislature of Ontario and Quebec have met; and the arbitrators chosen by the Government of Canada shall be a resident either in Ontario or Quebec."

Under these sections by the British North America Act, arbitrators were appointed. I find that the following gentlemen were nominated for that position: Hon. D. L. Macpherson, for Ontario; Hon. Charles Dewy Day, for Quebec; and the Hon. John Hamilton Gray, for the Dominion Government. The arbitrators met from time to time, and on the 20th September, 1870, made their award. Clause 5 of the award reads as follows:—

"That the following special or trust funds and the moneys thereby payable, including the several investments of the same or any of them, are, shall be, and the same are hereby declared to be the property of and belong to the Province of Ontario, for the purpose for which they were established."

Amongst the various trusts named, some nine in number, I find the Upper Canada Land Improvement Fund, the one for which I now press this claim against the Dominion Government, who are but the trustees of this fund on behalf of the Province of Ontario, and are held to be responsible for its management. In a statement accompanying the award marked "A. A.," showing the debt of the late Province of Canada—under the head "Miscellaneous—liabilities payable in cash," I find the following sums, viz:—Due Upper Canada Land Improvement Fund prior to abolition of Order in Council, $5,119.08; one-quarters receipts of Crown lands sales during the existence of the Upper Canada Land Improvement Fund from the day of the abolition of that fund to the 1st day of July, 1867, $124,685.18; one-fifth receipts on Crown lands so sold and money so received, $101,771.68, making a total due of $231,575.94. To this sum I contend interest ought fairly to be added, as the municipalities are fairly entitled to the interest which is paid on their trust funds. In this connection, I am advised the Government have charged no less than 20 per cent. for the collection and management of those moneys. Whereas section 14, of 16 Vict., Chap. 159, says:

"Provided always that not exceeding six per cent. on the amount collected, including survey and management of Crown Lands Fund, shall be chargeable."

The Hon. S. C. Wood, Treasurer of Ontario, in a letter addressed to the hon. Finance Minister, says as follows:—

"The Government of Ontario are simply the agents through whose hands the money will pass, as when it is received from the Dominion, it will be immediately paid over to the different municipalities entitled to it. The two amounts of $124,685.18 being one-fourth of the school lands, and $101,771.68, being one-fifth of the Crown lands, make up a total of $226,456.86, and as I am in constant communication with the representatives of the various municipalities entitled to receive these funds, I shall be pleased to learn of your intention with reference thereto and as to whether you propose to take a vote in the Supplementary Estimates to enable you to make an early payment of these sums.

"I am, my dear Sir,

"Very truly yours,

"S. C. WOOD,

"Treasurer."

That an Order in Council was made, and that the Dominion Government considered themselves bound by the decision of the award, is further illustrated by a communication addressed by the Hon. E. B. Wood, late treasurer of Ontario, under date 1870, to the then Finance Minister, the Hon. Sir Francis Hincks, which reads as follows:—

"You will recollect the discussions we had on this fund, and the conclusions to which you informed me your Government had come, that inasmuch as the arbitrators in dealing with the Common School Fund would necessarily have to decide as to the allowance or disallowance to the Upper Canada Land Improvement Fund of one-fourth of the receipts from common school lands paid between 6th March, 1861, and 1st July, 1867, on school lands sold between 1st June, 1853, and 6th March, 1861, your Government would be bound by and follow that decision in respect of one-fifth of the receipts from Crown lands sold and paid during the respective periods above mentioned, and you informed me that an Order in Council to that effect had been passed. The arbitrators have decided that one-fourth of the proceeds of the common school lands shall be added to the improvement fund, therefore, your Government is bound by its solemn promise to add to the same fund one-fifth of the proceeds of the Crown lands."

This is now the third time I have brought this matter before the House, and I consider that there should be no further delay in doing justice to the municipalities interested, many of which are interested to a large amount; in Perth, for instance, the amount received by the Dominion Government on Crown lands having reached $58,265.91, and on school lands $107,457.57. The award made has been approved by the Privy Council. There is, therefore, no reason why the Government should decline any longer to pay that money to the Province of Ontario, which will then distribute it to the municipalities interested. I do not charge the delay alone against the present Government. The late Government held office for five years during which efforts were made to bring matters to an issue and have the money paid over to the Ontario Government. I can see no advantage to the Dominion Government in continuing this state of things, while they pay as high as six per cent. on trust funds, one-quarter and one-fifth of which respectively belongs to the country—five per cent. for a very large amount, and six per cent. for a smaller portion; while the counties and townships entitled to the money are paying six or seven per cent. in many cases for the money they require to carry on to completion the public works for which this fund was first created. I am further informed, in the communication to which I have already referred from the Hon. S. C. Wood to Mr. HESSON, the Finance Minister, that it was the intention of the late Government to have brought the matter to a final settlement immediately after the elections. The following is the statement:—

"The Government of Ontario are particularly anxious that a settlement should be arrived at as between this Province and the Dominion of Canada, and for that purpose pressed upon the late Finance Minister the necessity of a final adjustment of the accounts. It was the intention on the part of the late Government to take up that question immediately after the elections."

Not having been elected to office, the late Government cannot be held responsible for the present delay. I trust the Government will see the delay is not continued longer. It is beyond question that since the arbitrators have given their award, since the award has been approved by the Privy Council, this Government have nothing to do but either pay the money, or, at all events, the interest regularly until they are in a position to pay the principal. I am informed the Government are in possession of funds that are now deposited in various banks of the Dominion that are paying four per cent. It would be much wiser to pay that money over to the Province of Ontario, which will repay it to the municipalities. I see that this matter was brought before the Local House only a few days ago, and that the responsibility for the delay was thrown on the Federal Government. I am exceedingly sorry that it should be chargeable with a delay of this nature, when the only reason could be that the matter had not been properly brought to its notice. Perhaps I have not, myself, placed it as strongly before this Government as I ought. I feel on this occasion that I have discharged my duty to my constituents, and I hope I shall have the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite, as well as that of the Federal Government, in striving to save the various municipalities from being called upon again to make application to this or the Ontario Government for the payment of the dues to which they are honestly entitled.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This matter has been delayed in order to obtain from the Deputy Minister of Finance, some information for submission to the House. That officer has placed in my hands a memorandum which I shall read, and then hand to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hesson). It is as follows:—

"By the 7th clause of the award of the arbitrators, the sum of $124,685.18 being part of the Common School Fund is to be placed to the credit of the Upper Canada Improvement Fund. The clause is as follows:—

"VII. That from the Common School Fund as held on the thirteenth day of June, 1867, by the Dominion of Canada, amounting to $1,733,224.47, (of which $58,000 is invested in the bonds or debentures of the Quebec Turnpike Trust, the said sum of $58,000 being an asset mentioned in the fourth schedule of the British North America Act of 1867, as the Quebec Turnpike Trust) the sum of $124,685.18 shall be, and the same is hereby taken and deducted and placed to the credit of the Upper Canada Improvement Fund, the said sum of $124,685.18 being one-fourth part of moneys received by the late Province of Canada, between the sixth day of March, 1861, and the first day of July, 1861, on account of common School lands sold between the 14th of June, 1853, and the said 6th of March 1861."

"The balance at the credit of the Common School Fund is, by the Dominion balance sheet, $1,645,644.47, and is derived as follows:—

Balance, 30th June, 1867.	$1,733,224 47
Less amount, Quebec Turnpike Trust, Debentures	$58,000 00
Less amount, Quebec Turnpike Trust, Debentures	29,580 00
	$1,645,644 47

"How the amount $124,685.18 was arrived at I have no means of knowing, as all books, papers, etc., relating to the Crown Lands Department were transferred to the Provinces at the time of Confederation; but, I find the sum is detailed in a return, No. 26, of 1880, rendered by the Crown Lands Department to the Legislature of Ontario. With the exception of one letter from the treasurer of Ontario of the 22nd March, 1879, there is no correspondence, and that letter only mentions the amount payable under the award.

"By the 8th clause of the award the residue of the Common School Fund is appropriated between the Provinces, and it would be inconvenient, to say the least, to distribute any funds before a settlement is arrived at with the Provinces.

"I see, however, no reason why the Ontario Government might not, in anticipation, pay the sum over to the municipalities if they see fit."

This memorandum is signed by Mr. Courtney.

Mr. BLAKE. What are the conclusions of the Minister of Finance? Does the Deputy Minister of Finance represent his views on the subject? I do not enquire whom he represents as to the facts; but he favors us with his opinion—is that the advice tendered by the Minister?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Certainly not. We will not interfere with this matter.

Motion agreed to.

QUEBEC AND LAKE ST. JOHN RAILWAY.

Mr. CIMON, in moving for a copy of the report of A. L. Light, Esq., Chief Engineer of the Province of Quebec, addressed to the Government of Canada, at their request; and respecting the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway and the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company, said: I deem the occasion favorable for drawing the special attention of this House and of the Government to the importance, from a general point of view, of building a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John. It is quite certain that it is in the interest of this Government to grant a subsidy in order to hasten the completion of this railway. The first time that mention was made of this railway on the floor of this House, was during the Session of 1873. The late Mr. Wm. Price, who was then the representative of the county of Chicoutimi had recommended it to the Government. But the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), now leader of the Liberal party, remarked that the Federal Government could not build local railways unless they were to serve military purposes, and as a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John's was entirely foreign to all military movements in this country, it was not within the power of this House to deal with this matter. There was nothing surprising in this statement. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has always found reasons for opposing the great works required for the development of the country. Then, during the fall of 1873, the Liberal party comes into power. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) forms his Administration. I take the place, at the general elections, of the late Mr. Price. I was sent here by my electors to attend in a special manner to this project of a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John. But the Liberal Government was then in power, and as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) was one of the most important members of the Cabinet, and as he had already declared that the Federal Government could in no way help this railway, I had but little hope of seeing it aided. Yet I wished to do my duty, and during my first Session I mentioned before this House the importance of such a railway, but without success. During the following Session I obtained no better results. In 1876 I enquired of the Government whether it was their intention to help the railways of the Province of Quebec, and the hon. the first Minister (Mr. Mackenzie) said it was not. Later, during the same Session, I again drew more particularly the attention of the Government to the necessity of securing the construction of a railroad between Lake St. John's and Quebec. But the Liberal Government, that were to leave only ruins behind them, paid no heed. Then came the Session of 1877. I continued my crusade in favor of this national enterprise. His Grace, the Archbishop of Quebec, and several citizens had addressed a petition to the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), requesting him to be pleased to aid the construction of a railway from Quebec to St. John's. I hastened to ask, in the House, whether it was the intention of the Government to yield to the wishes of his lordship, the archbishop, and the other citizens. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) answered that such was not his intention. The following year, in 1878, I renewed the attack; and I experienced on the part of the Liberal Government the same disposition to do nothing for our railway. The Liberal Government had even refused to lend us the old iron rails taken off the Intercolonial. After the Session of 1878 the Government of the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie) went before the people, and they were condemned on account of their administrative misdeeds, their incapacity, and their bad-will towards the Province of Quebec, to ignominiously step down and out. I was, therefore, satisfied and my electors were rejoiced, to see that at length we were rid of that Administration. I had in vain asked them to help this great national enterprise of building a railway to Lake St. John. I had been received with nothing but energetic refusals. Then, however, I met in this House with friends of the undertaking, with friends of Lake St. John. During the same sitting I had the pleasure of seeing the hon. the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Langevin), the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Masson), the hon. the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Caron), the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), and several other members get up and speak eloquently in favor of the Saguenay, and of Lake St. John, and state that the Government ought to do something for Lake St. John. My efforts have not been useless, for I see to-day in the Government the hon. Minister of Public Works and the hon. Minister of Militia, both true friends of Lake St. John. I am happy that I have always supported them and had confidence in them. Since they are now in power, since they know, from the special point of view of Canada and from the special point of view of their Province, the immense benefit that would be derived from the construction of this railway from Quebec to Lake St. John, I am convinced that some day or another the Federal Government will help this undertaking. We must not cease, Mr. Speaker, to importune the Government, to even harass them, on this subject until at length our efforts are crowned with success. I have more confidence than ever, for never was the cause of a railway from Quebec to Lake St. John's so popular as it is to-day. The Federal Government and the Quebec Government both recognize its importance. All the members from Lower Canada ardently desire that this road shall be built; the clergy want it, and the people of the Province of Quebec are loudly asking for it. It must, therefore, be built. During the Session of 1879, the first, under the present Government, I saw with great pleasure the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Vallée) plead skillfully before this House the cause of this railway, and I hastened to thank him for having done so. Last year, the same hon. member for Portneuf spoke of it again, and I seconded him. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) was kind enough to support us on that occasion. We are, therefore, rejoiced to know that the hon. the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) wishing to make himself at once thoroughly acquainted with this railway scheme, entrusted an engineer with making a report for him. This is a decisive step. The Government of the hon. member for Lambton positively refused to take any interest in the question. The present Government not only promise that they will attend to the matter, but they are actually doing so. I believe this is the time to urge the matter more strongly than ever upon the Government and this honorable House. I have confidence in the spirit of patriotism and the practical spirit of hon. Ministers and of the hon. members of this House. The Federal Government must, of a necessity, help in the building of the Lake St. John Railway, and that they will do so, I am satisfied. And, why must the Federal Government aid the construction of this railway? I will state, in the first place, that the building of the great Canadian Pacific Railway is now assured and settled, and that it will be done without the Federal treasury being greatly affected. We have, therefore, the means left of helping other railways. We have, thanks to the good administration of our friends on the Treasury benches, money enough to satisfy the aspirations of the people of different parts of the country. The northern part of the Province of Quebec has never received anything. It is its turn now. That part of the country should have the preference. The Quebec and Lake St. John Railway offers itself as the most important scheme, and as the one that will produce the best results. Let us put faith and efforts in that direction. But there is a great political reason. I say that this Quebec and Lake St. John Railway is a natural enterprise. It is of the most urgent necessity that we should develop colonization in the great fertile valley of Lake St. John, and utilize its resources. We must, as soon as possible, pour in a large population there. And why? Because, in a few years, the North-West will contain a large population. In twenty-five years hence there will, perhaps, be three or four Provinces in the North-West. They will have a good many representatives in this House. And what will be the result? Why political influence will be going westward. The interests of a great part of the Province of Ontario will be identical with those of the North-West Provinces. The Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces will not offer, perhaps, a sufficient counterpoise to this influence coming from the North-West. And the Western Provinces will trouble themselves very little about the Province of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces; and, provided their own interests are protected, they will in no wise hesitate to send their products to New York or Portland, rather than to Quebec or Halifax. Confederation would then be threatened with dismemberment. We must consequently foresee such a result and provide the remedy beforehand, by increasing the resources and the population of the eastern Provinces. Now, there remains but little colonization to be done in the Maritime Provinces. It is only in the Province of Quebec where there remain vast regions to be opened to colonization, and the finest and most extensive of these regions is, without question, the Saguenay and Lake St. John district. There is no doubt but that if the Government were to build a railway to Lake St. John before long we would be able to form there a separate Province, as populous, as rich and as flourishing as any of the North-West Provinces. That would be one more Province in the east; and if we are to remain united as a Confederation, we require this Province to counterbalance the influence of the North-West. There is something more. Many complaints are made that Canadians in the Province of Quebec are leaving every year in great numbers for the United States. In opening, by means of a railway, this great region of the Saguenay to colonization, would we not be drawing all the Canadians in that direction? Would we not be turning their attention away from the United States? Would we not be performing a great act of patriotism? The Federal policy should not only tend towards bringing immigrants into the country; the Federal Government should also adopt the means of keeping the Canadians within Canadian territory. Since it is stated that it is the French-Canadians who are flocking in the greatest numbers to the United States, then we could not choose a place where they would like to go better than to the Saguenay and to Lake St. John, provided we give them easy means of communication with Quebec. But what is this great region of the Saguenay and Lake St. John? In 1832, as Mr. Bouchette tells us in his topographical dictionary, there were in this vast territory, besides the Indians, only ten families, employed by the Hudson's Bay Company in the fur trade. As late as 1842 this country was in the wildest possible condition. The Hudson's Bay Company had held this territory under a lease for many years. It was the finest hunting ground they had, and naturally enough they wanted to keep it. For that reason they endeavored to keep its resources hidden. They prevented, by all possible means, colonization from penetrating there. It was only in 1842 that the last lease expired. Until then, says the Minister of Crown Lands of that day, in his report of 1845, the Government had not ventured to have surveys made for colonization purposes, being under the impression that they had not the right to do so. It is not, therefore, astonishing, if during a long time there existed prejudices against the climate and soil of the Saguenay and Lake St. John. The Hudson's Bay Company, by spreading these prejudices, were following the line of conduct long pursued with regard to the North-West. Until the time when the Canadian Government acquired the North-West, this territory had a still worse reputation than the Saguenay. It was only looked upon as an ice-bound region, inhospitable and unfit for settlement. These prejudices have disappeared. Those against the Saguenay have likewise disappeared. The territory of the Saguenay and of Lake St. John, comprising all the territory between Quebec and Lake St. John, through which the road is to pass, the occupied and surveyed lands as well as those not surveyed, according to the data of the Quebec Crown Lands Department, embrace an extent of land fit for cultivation of about 3,500,000 acres. This figure is of some importance, as it will be seen, especially when we consider that the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, with a population of 670,000 souls, only have 2,800,000 acres under cultivation. But what is the climate and what is the quality of the soil of this immense territory? I will give this honorable House an idea of it. I shall cite an impartial opinion, that of Mr. Bouchette, who explored Lake St. John in 1828. In his topographical dictionary he says:

"The climate of Lake St. John is as mild or milder than that of Montreal."

In 1828, when all this territory was covered with forests and in a wild state, an experiment was made to test the quality of the soil and the climate, and Mr. Bouchette relates what follows:—

"On or before the 1st of May, ten gallons of peas have been sown which produced more than ten bushels, although from the wetness of the season about one-third of the crop was lost. On the 7th of May half a pint of wheat was sown, and when harvested on the 8th of September, produced full half of a Winchester bushel; two of the ears, without selection, were examined and found to contain, one 41, the other 46 grains of corn. On the 4th May, half a bushel of barley was sown and produced, 5th August, from five to six bushels. Not quite eight bushels of potatoes, produced 3.0 bushels."

During the Session of 1877, in order to make known to the hon. members of this House the nature of the Saguenay and Lake St. John district, the Committee on Immigration, at my request, summoned as a witness on this subject Mr. Siméon Lesage, Assistant Commissioner of Agriculture at Quebec. His Lordship the Bishop of Chicoutimi, also at my request, had the kindness to address to the Chairman of the Committee a letter upon the subject. This evidence and this letter are printed, and are annexed to the report of the Committee for that year. Well, here is what His Lordship the Bishop of Chicoutimi wrote:

"I cannot give a better idea of the fertility of the soil of the Saguenay than by citing the appreciation that an eminent man in the agricultural line, and quite disinterested, lately made. After having visited the whole of the Saguenay he said: I have nowhere else seen richer or more fertile lands than those of the Saguenay and Lac St. Jean."

"This judgment corroborates exactly that already rendered by the land surveyors, Hamel, Bouchette, Ballantyne, and others who had occasion to go through the great territory."

Mr. Siméon Lesage, in his evidence, said:

"Since 1867, when I was appointed Assistant Commissioner in the Public Works Department, I have had charge of the Colonization Department, and I have found, after visiting the Saguenay and several other parts of the Province, that upon the whole the Saguenay district is the best settling district that we have by far. There are some inconveniences, but I believe that before long the Saguenay district will prove to be the best part of the Province of Quebec, if not of the Dominion of Canada."

"By Mr. Cockburn.—Q. Is the land back of Lake St. John as good?—Yes, of good quality."

"By Mr. White (Newfrew).—Q. How is it with reference to the climate of Lake St. John, what is the length of the winter, I mean as compared with the summer?—I could not give an exact report as to the state of the thermometer at Lake St. John; but all reports go to show that the climate is much milder at Lake St. John and Chicoutimi than it is in Quebec. It would seem to me that it is more like that of Montreal than that of Quebec. Of course, the Laurentian chain might be the cause of that; because as soon as you have passed the height of land you find at once a difference; there is not so much snow on the north side of the Laurentian as there is on the south side.

"Q. I understand that; but my impression was that although the snowfall was not so great, the cold was more intense?—No, Sir, it is not the case. There spring generally begins at least two weeks and sometimes three weeks before we have it in Quebec.

"Q. What is the distance from the nearest market to Lake St. John?—The nearest market for the Lake St. John settlers would be Chicoutimi.

"Q. But that is a very limited market?—It is a very limited market. At the present time they have a surplus of wheat in the Upper Saguenay district which they have to carry to Chicoutimi, a distance of sixty miles, for those who are nearest to Chicoutimi; and a distance of upwards of a hundred miles for those at the upper settlements; and they only get one dollar a bushel for their wheat, and that the best wheat that can be found in both Canadas.

"By Mr. Hagar.—Q. I suppose that is altogether spring wheat?—Some farmers at the upper end of Lake St. John have tried fall wheat and they have done well. Mr. Price's farmer told me he thought fall wheat would do very well in the Upper Saguenay.

"By Mr. White.—Q. Do you know what is the average of bushels of wheat to the acre?—I could not exactly say, but I believe their average per bushel of seed is about fifteen; it is hardly lower than fifteen; very often it exceeds that. The depth of the clay in the Lake St. John region is something remarkable. Those who have only gone as far as Ha! Ha! Bay know nothing about the Saguenay region, because of the rocky borders of the river and bay. Even if you go by the river to Chicoutimi you do not know what the country is. But if you take the land route from St. Alphonse to go to Chicoutimi, a distance of twelve miles, there you will find ravines and gullies I suppose 150 feet deep, and nothing but clay from top to bottom. Sir William Logan and Mr. Robinson, I believe, have explored the Saguenay region for the Geological Department, and they expressed their opinion that there is nowhere to be found such a depth of alluvial soil—of clay—and under this there is a stratum of limestone all over. In fact the bottom of Lake St. John is nothing but limestone, and on the western side there is nothing but limestone on the edges of the lake.

"By Mr. White.—Q. Terre grise?—Terre grise, and there is a fair admixture of sand which makes it friable, it is loamy. It is quite friable every season of the year. The farmers there do not suffer from protracted droughts or protracted rains.

"By Mr. Hagar.—Q. It does not pack then?—Not at all; I have seen them ploughing with one horse, and sometimes a horse and an ox, that is all; of course, they prefer using a pair of horses when they can afford it.

"By the Chairman.—Q. It cannot be very stiff then?—It is not stiff at all, it is like yellow loam."

Rev. Father Lacasse, in his work Une Mine, writes:

"I am happy to tell you, my worthy habitants, that the climate of Lake St. John is preferable to that of Quebec. The Indians call Lake St. John the flat lake. Its waters, that are deep in a great many places, get warmed by the action of the sun, and all the valley feels the beneficent influence of its warm effluvia. Frosts along the shores of the lake are less frequent than in the valley of the St. Lawrence. There is frost that is felt there, it is true, but the settler hails it with pleasure. Sometimes the cold during the night condenses the vapors of the lake, the dew falls on the heads of wheat or oats, and in the morning a heavy hoar frost, or rather a kind of ice, surrounds the grain, the hope of the farmers. Let the stranger, however, be reassured, the sun will rise, the frost will disappear and be changed into a beneficent dew. The only effect of this frost will be to have imparted a new freshness, to have brought its quota of nourishment to the grain that is being formed, and to have consoled the farmer accustomed to this harmless frost. Seeding time is from the beginning of May until the end of June. Almost without exception, wheat sown about St. Peter's and St. Paul's day ripens. Even this year, with its cold and unfavorable summer, wheat sown on the 28th of June at Pointe Bleue will yield well."

If we now refer to the census of 1871, we find that the three most important counties of the Eastern Townships, in the agricultural line, Compton, Huntington and Stanstead, with a total population of 37,107 souls, produced 92,999 bushels of wheat, whilst the county of Chicoutimi, having only a population of 17,493 souls, produced above 136,114 bushels of wheat in 1870, and yet, in that year, we witnessed the great fire which was so disastrous. Thus, Sir, such a vast territory with such a fertile soil, such a mild climate, would necessarily be settled rapidly. Indeed, in 1842, as soon as the territory was freed from the bondage in which it had been kept by the Hudson's Bay Company, the first settlers began to put in an appearance at Chicou-timi. They first clustered around the saw-mills, and, in their leisure moments, they went to clearing the forest. Such was the beginning of Chicoutimi, which is now a flourishing town, with a promising future before it. But it was only towards 1850 the Rev. Curé Hébert, seriously penetrated into the forest and went in the direction of Lake St. John. He arrived there one evening, as the sun was setting, at the head of a few brave settlers. The day's work had been hard, and fatigue had not been wanting. A voyage through the forest was then very difficult; but, before taking any rest they wanted to fell the first tree; they desired at once, with the sound of the axe striking the tree, to awaken the echoes of the immense forest, and to tell them they would have to yield to the sounds of civilization. The Rev. Curé Hébert had the honor of striking the first blows. With the tree thus cut down they made a cross, at the foot of which they prayed that evening. It was taking possession as Jacques-Cartier would have done; and as the work of the latter has been fruitful, so also has the work then commenced by the Rev. Curé Hébert brought forth prodigious fruit. To-day, on the spot where the Rev. Curé Hébert brought his first settlers, we find the beautiful and large parish of Hébertville, having a population of several thousand souls, and producing wheat in extraordinary abundance. Since that time we have seen seven large parishes formed above Hébertville, farther into the forest. In 1851, in the county of Chicoutimi, there were hardly 4,000 souls; in 1861, there were 10,500, and the census of 1871 gave us a population of 17,500. To-day that county contains nearly 30,000. There, where thirty years ago nothing but the forest could be seen, we find the town of Chicoutimi, the fine parishes of St. Jean, St. Alexis, St. Alphonse, St. Fulgence, Ste. Anne du Saguenay, Notre Dame de Laterrière, St. François Xavier de Chicoutimi, St. Dominique, St. Cyriac, Notre Dame d'Hébertville, St. Joseph d'Alma, St. Gédéon de Grandmont, St. Jérôme du Lac St. Jean, St. Louis de Metabetchouan, Notre Dame du Lac St. Jean, St. Prime, St. Félicien, and the missions of Normandin and Tikanaby. This county is the seat of a bishopric, two court houses, of a large and a small seminary, and possesses two registration offices, a convent and eight schools, frequented by about 4,000 children. And to think that this great and rapid development of colonization was brought about exclusively by French-Canadians, who, having left the older counties quite poor, had nothing but their energy and their patriotism, without help, without any communication with the great centres. But they had for protectors the priests of their religion who, teaching them the love of God and their country, encouraged them in their hard labor, and shared their fatigues and their privations. There is not one foreign immigrant in the Saguenay. Yes, Sir, I proclaim it boldly, the colonization of the Saguenay and Lake St. John is exclusively the work of the Catholic clergy. The wonders that they have operated there give the most emphatic answer to those who accuse them of being wanting in progressiveness. I have myself seen these priests at work among the settlers, keeping up their courage, and making them love more and more the soil that they water every day with the sweat of their brows. I do not wonder, after that, at the influence they exercise over the settlers, and I assure you, Sir, that is not undue influence. I would like to know, Sir, whether Manitoba, that Province where the Government sink every year millions of dollars—I ask if Manitoba would have, if left to its own resources, attained, proportionately, such rapid and prodigious development as the Saguenay and the Lake St. John have done? No, Sir. If the Government had applied to the development of Lake St. John the money they expend in one year on Manitoba, we would to-day have at Lake St. John a population several times larger than the present population of Manitoba. The territory of the Saguenay and Lake St. John has thus developed itself without a single foreign immigrant having been drawn there, without a railway, without any great public works. Ah! if we had the railways of the Eastern Townships, or those that we have given to Manitoba, I answer for it, Mr. Speaker, that in twenty-five years hence, we would have in the great valley of Lake St. John a population of 250,000 souls. Yes, Sir, what we require is a railway, which starting from Quebec should be continued as soon as possible to the shores of Lake St. John. Once the road has reached the Lake, we will ask nothing more from the Government; private enterprise will find the means of building the branch lines to the north and to Chicoutimi. The Quebec Company have already begun to build the road. But their means are quite limited, and it is impossible for them, if the Federal Government do not come to their aid, to build the road through to the Lake with their own resources. The Government of Canada, I am sure, will secure the completion of a road so important for the whole Dominion. I come now, Sir, to the objections raised against the building of this road. Some one has said that there is no passage by the route chosen by the Quebec Company. Whoever said that was not serious. The idea of saying there is no passage when we are crossing the Rocky Mountains! In 1876, at the request of the Hon. David Price and myself, the Hon. the Commissioner of Crown Lands for the Province of Quebec, entrusted Mr. Sewell, and later, Mr. Dumais, surveyors, with making explorations in order to see whether there was a passage. These gentlemen did not discover any serious impediments. I am informed that the Company's engineer has found a very easy passage. This fact is set forth in Mr. Light's report, for a copy of which I am about to ask. It is again said: it is too far north. The other day, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) said that it would be just as worth while to build a railway to the moon as to Lake St. John. I cannot certainly congratulate the hon. member on his knowledge of the country. The hon. member must have paid very little attention to what has been going on in the Province of Quebec within the last few years. Luckily, the hon. member for Gloucester belongs to the Liberal party, upon which the country relies but little. It is a prejudice to say that it is too far north. Within a few years clearings have been begun in the township of Albariel, the spot the furthest north where colonization has so far penetrated. Here is what Mr. Dumais, who surveyed the township, says of it:

"Since I set foot in Albariel I have been experiencing one surprise after another. There is nothing finer than the woods that shade the dells and the hillocks through a great part of this township. The soil is very rich, and very easy to clear; the wood is of very vigorous growth, which is easily explained when we study the nature of the soil. It is a garden, neither more nor less. I think that I can find over 300 lots of first-class land in this place; with 100 lots more in Normandin, and at least 100 more lots, quite as good, in the vacant space to the west of these two townships, we will have 50,000 acres of fertile land, or 1,000 lots of 50 acres each."

Then he adds:

"I hardly know what one feels at the sight of the immense plateau where Albariel and Normandin stretch out, and invite one to come and breathe the life-giving air 'neath their magnificent and shady forests."

It was not long since the great explorer, Mr. Olivier Lachance, was telling me that he had penetrated nearly as far as Lake Mistassini, that there he had found the very finest of lands and a climate as mild as that of Lake St. John. He told me that he had walked during eight days over fine level land, and through a magnificent forest of the finest hard wood trees of different kinds. Let it not be longer said that Lake St. John is too far north. Facts destroy this prejudice. It is said: What is the Saguenay fit for? Every year some calamity happens. One year it is frost or hail; another year an inundation; another, again, there is a fire. Well, frost and hail are experienced elsewhere. Has there not been frosts in Upper Canada and even in Manitoba; and no one thinks of depopulating those Provinces. But the unfrequent frosts at Lake St. John are easily explained. I will let Rev. Father Lacasse speak for me:

"But, you will ask, how do you explain the frosts that are a drawback to the settlement of St. Prime, it is said? The answer is easy; former frosts are explained by explaining the absence of frosts now. Here is the explanation: The ground is flat, and though the rivers have a good fall. When there is but little clearing done, the water remains in the forests, retaining the dampness, so that the places that cannot receive the warm air from the lake are sometimes exposed to frost. Now that the clearings at St. Prime are more extensive, the frosts are less frequent. There are good ditches, more open spaces, the warm currents can circulate freely, and an era of prosperity is beginning for these settlers."

As for the hail, is there a place in Canada that is not sometimes visited by this scourge. Hail only did damage once in the Saguenay district, and the same storm that brought us that hail likewise ravaged a part of the Eastern Townships, Beauce, and a part of the Maritime Provinces. Hail has often caused considerable damage in Ontario. And yet we have only had it once in the Saguenay district, and only over a very limited extent. Bouchette, in his topographical dictionary, at the words Lake St. John, tells us that in 1828 the rust had destroyed nearly all the crops in the district of Montreal and in Upper Canada, yet the wheat sown at Lake St. John had produced a crop of excellent quality. The district of Montreal and Upper Canada had therefore had their calamity, and yet no one thought of abandoning them. I state, therefore, that frosts and hail are less frequent in the Saguenay district than in any other part of Canada. As to inundations, there have been two or three along the shores of the lake. They were caused by the extraordinary sudden rise of the waters of the lake. As it was natural to suppose, the settlers cleared first along the borders of the lake, and they alone suffered by the inundation. The settlers living beyond the first range did not suffer by these inundations. Rev. Father Lacasse says on this subject:

"Before visiting Lake St. John, it is necessary that you should know what it was formerly. It was a lake twenty times greater than it is now, there is no doubt about it, science is there to prove it. A fissure opened and the lake emptied itself out through the Saguenay. Before the Saguenay, this unique wonder of its kind, was formed, the lake emptied either by the River Ste. Marguerite, a dried up Saguenay, or by the St. Maurice. Both of these suppositions are admissible. The chain of mountains that surround the lake is cut in the two above mentioned places. It would be difficult to make persons, going from Lake St. John to St. Maurice, believe that the latter did not formerly receive the waters of the primitive lake. The valleys, the lay of the mountain, shows it at every step. But let us leave the beautiful St. Maurice and come back to Lake St. Jean which, when we left it, was pouring out its waters all at once through the Saguenay. The lake has dwindled down to what you now see it; and one fine morning the sun, to his great surprise, shed its rays over more than a million acres of land for the first time in its existence. This land was warmed up, and now you see it covered with a vast forest. The greater part of the lake was of uniform depth, and that is why the land is as level as a map. Through this vast basin, the waters from the melting snow and the rain from heaven opened their way through to the lake. There are fine large rivers, streams in every direction, that facilitate the draining of the soil. Some of these rivers are even larger than the outlet. So that when the snow melts the waters of the lake rise and overflow, during several weeks, lands whose fertility could not be surpassed by those of the Netherlands."

"There is a very simple and very cheap means of preventing this inundation: widen the outlet that is narrowed down by two rocky points. A little powder would widen the outlet more than forty feet by a depth of twenty feet. The Government, you may be sure, will not be long without making this expenditure, or some private individual will undertake the work for a small portion of the land that is now under water long enough to prevent settlement."

By the way, I would state that I asked the hon. Minister of Public Works to be so kind as to put into the Estimates a sufficient sum to do the work mentioned by the Rev. Father Lacasse. I trust the hon. Minister will grant us this sum. As you see, there is nothing alarming about this inundation. It only affects the first range along the lake, and not everywhere, only along the upper part. Moreover, this inundation can be prevented, and it has only occurred two or three times. Very often there are disastrous inundations in France, Spain, Holland and elsewhere, and yet no one thinks of abandoning those countries. We should not, therefore, speak of these inundations as a serious obstacle to the development of colonization at Lake St. John and make use of them as an argument against the usefulness of a railway to the lake. Now about fires. Yes, Sir, we had a fire once, on the 19th March, 1870. But it was a terrible fire. It was one of those unfrequent but terrible scourges that Providence, in its wisdom, visits upon some countries. Providence has its object in so doing, and we must bow down before the Divine decree. We hope and we pray that such another catastrophe will never again occur. But Manitoba, that much cherished Province, of which the climate, the soil and the advantages of all kinds are so much boasted of; has not Manitoba had its calamity? One year a cloud of grasshoppers destroyed the whole harvest. The Government was obliged, that year, to support the whole population. That was only five or six years ago. We did not put Manitoba outside the pale of civilization on account of this misfortune. We, therefore, see that all the objections raised against Lake St. John are reduced down to mere prejudices. Well, Sir, the Speech from the Throne announced that the finances of the country are prosperous. I profit thereby to urge the Government to help the construction of the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway. The Canadian Government have already helped different local railways. They paid $2,300,000 to the Northern Railway, $2,810,000 to the Great Western. They have granted a subsidy to the Canada Central, aided the building of different branches of the Grand Trunk, and several railways in the Maritime Provinces. It is only fair that we should have our turn now. The Government must help the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, and they will do so. By the construction of this road we secure the settlement of a vast and fertile region, capable of supporting a million of inhabitants, a region whose climate is like that of Montreal. Thereby we will retain in our midst thousands of Canadians who would otherwise go to the United States. We shall thereby open a vast field for immigration. We shall see a thousand new industries spring up in this region. The great population that will gather there will considerably increase the revenues of the country. Thus, while adding to the public wealth, the Government of Canada will have secured a counterpoise to the already threatening influence of the western Provinces, and assured the peace and harmony of the whole Dominion. Let us, therefore, favor the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway. We need it; we shall have it. I move, therefore, Sir, the motion I have just placed in your hands.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the whole of the speech of the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon), but I think he has forgotten something. He forgot to mention the name of the Price family who colonized the Saguenay; it is to that family that we owe the opening of the Saguenay. I do not wish to take away the merit of the other missionaries who followed and continued the opening of the Saguenay, among others the Rev. Curé Hébert, and if their success was a success in the way of colonization, it was not a financial one, and I can speak of it with certain knowledge. Although we should be grateful in a certain measure towards these gentlemen, yet I must say that the colonization movement, begun by Rev. Curé Hébert, proved to be a series of financial disasters.

Mr. LANDRY. Prove it.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Ask Mr. J. B. Renaud, of Quebec, how much he received for the sums he advanced.

Mr. LANDRY. I certainly had not the intention of rising to take part in this discussion, but the hon. member who has just sat down has made use of such strange and such unhappy language, that I deem it my duty to protest against these assertions, unjustifiable in every respect and highly insulting to our race. This is the first time I have seen in this House an hon. member depreciate the merit of his fellow-countrymen. This is the first time that I have seen in this House a man who boasts of his patriotism, who wants every one of his words to be heard by the country and to leave its mark, get up and endeavor to throw discredit upon the work undertaken by the Rev. Curé Hébert and the other priests who have labored to colonize the Saguenay. This is the first time that I have seen a man, like the hon. member for L'Islet, come before this House and exalt the merit of a stranger to his race, a stranger to his religion, at the expense of one of his own fellow-countrymen, to the detriment of those worthy missionaries who devote their time, their labor, their fortunes and their lives to the patriotic work of colonizing a country. Sir, in a House composed as this one is, I need not point out how insulting for us is the distinction drawn by the hon. member for L'Islet, for what motive I am at a loss to say. Is it a question of personal enmity, and is the hon. member pursuing, in this matter, a petty work of vengeance? I trust, however, that his unhappy language will not produce the result he expects. I believe this language was made use of without thinking, through forgetfulness and without forethought; at all events, the hon. member is rather to be pitied than blamed. Sir, I approve entirely of the speech made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi. He has treated the question so well and so thoroughly, that there is not a word to be added. No doubt the Government, who have announced, or at least given us to hope for, a considerable surplus, will take into consideration the request of the hon. member for Chicoutimi, and that the Lake St. John Railway will be afforded the same advantages as those we ask for the St. Charles Branch of the Intercolonial. In this case we can well say that the two make a pair, and that the interest of the country involved in these two roads will be taken care of in both cases. This question is of the gravest importance, and I trust that the Government will yield to the suggestion thrown out by the hon. member for Chicoutimi, and that we will have in our Province sufficient help to secure the complete development of our colonization.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry) will pardon me if I pass over the allusion he has just made to the St. Charles Branch. I am certain that he does not expect me to take notice of it. When the time comes to speak of this branch, certainly he will have an answer from the Government, as my hon. friend, the member for Chicoutimi, is going to have one with respect to Lake St. John. Mr. Speaker, the Lake St. John question is no new one; it has been agitated for a long time past, and I am not surprised to see the active member for Chicoutimi and Saguenay take it under his special protection. I am satisfied that a question of this kind could not be put into more skilful hands than those of the hon. member. If ever this question has a chance of succeeding, and I hope it may; if ever this road is to be continued to Lake St. John, I am convinced that the member for Chicoutimi will have largely contributed to the success of the undertaking. It is true that it is long since the work of colonizing the Saguenay was begun, but I cannot agree with the hon. member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain) when he insinuates that the efforts made in that direction, especially by the venerable priest of whom he spoke just now, were followed by financial disasters. It is possible that there may have been useless expenses incurred on certain occasions; it is possible that in certain undertakings all the success that was wished for, and was desirable, was not attained, but that was owing, I am satisfied, to the difficult circumstances surrounding the undertaking. It was a country nearly uninhabited at that time; it was a country where it was difficult to arrive at anything; the necessary articles of life and even agricultural implements had to be carried on men's backs; there being no other means of transportation than the backs of the settlers who went there; it was, therefore, impossible to promote agriculture as if there had been carriage roads, or as they might have done in the more civilized parts of the country. But that is no reason to throw discredit on the efforts made in those days; on the contrary, it is a reason to praise the efforts made by the missionaries and by the other pioneers of colonization in the Saguenay district. This question of the Saguenay cannot be a party question; it is a question that interests all the inhabitants of the country, whether we belong to the right or the left; and, consequently, in answering the hon. member for Chicoutimi upon this question, I must not consider it as a party question. The Lake St. John Railway, of which the hon. member has just spoken more particularly, is an undertaking that has a future before it, and I am satisfied that as the North Shore Railway, now called the Occidental, took over twenty years before it was finished, the Lake St. John Railway will also have its terminus, and that it will arrive at Lake St. John, as the North Shore Road has arrived at Ottawa. But if railway enterprises have all had their difficulties, the Lake St. John Railway has had advantages that the North Shore Railway has not had, because we have seen capitalists put their capital into it, in order to construct a part of it in the direction of what is called Lake Edward, which is on the line of the Lake St. John Railway. Now the hon. gentleman wishes to know whether the Government propose, or are now able to help this road. The question has already come under the notice of the Government, and the Government are not in a position to solve the difficulty at present. We have necessarily been absorbed with the great question of the Pacific Railway, which has also occupied Parliament, and we have been obliged to put to one side important questions, of which this is one, to devote ourselves to the great national question. Now to what extent we shall be able to help local lines—for their construction is a local undertaking on account of the services that are necessarily expected from them—is a question that has not yet been decided upon by the Government; and the hon. member cannot expect to have an answer upon a question of this kind in the absence of the hon. Minister of Railways, who, I regret to say, is very ill to-day. As to the other works alluded to by the hon. member, the works suggested by a missionary some time ago, I am convinced that the hon. member will have nothing to find fault with if I ask him to wait twenty-four hours for the answer. The Estimates will be placed upon the Table to-morrow, as I had the honor of informing the House last Friday, and the hon. member will see by the Estimates what we can bring down. If he does not find all he has asked for, he will have to wait, not twenty-four hours, but twelve months. I must congratulate the hon. member upon the researches he has made with regard to the Saguenay. His speech certainly does him great credit and will remain in Hansard as a monument of his work, and, at the same time, it will prove of great worth to all those who wish to make themselves acquainted with the progress of the Saguenay.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the hon. Minister of Public Works, and also the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), have quite misunderstood the remarks of my hon. friend the member for L'Islet (Mr. Casgrain). In speaking as he did, the hon. member for L'Islet had not the intention of depreciating the merit of any one of those who have taken part in the colonization of the Saguenay. On the contrary, it would be unbecoming of any man to entertain such an idea of any one. When the hon. member for L'Islet spoke as he did; when he said that financial disaster had accompanied the efforts of Mr. Hébert, I did not understand—and I am convinced that such was not his intention—that he wished to depreciate the efforts that had been made, but that he only desired to show what had been the difficulties of the undertaking. The hon. member for L'Islet had only the intention of remarking that the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon) had made a quite involuntary omission, and that this omission was that he had forgotten to mention, among the promoters of colonization of the Saguenay, one of those who had contributed the most to its development, namely the Hon. Mr. Price; and the hon. member for Chicoutimi will himself admit that this gentleman was one of the first promoters of the colonization of the Saguenay. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to say with regard to the merit of the question now under discussion. The hon. member for Chicoutimi will allow me to say, however, in all sincerity, that he has set forth the situation with a skill and with researches that do him credit. I think, however, that his work would have been more complete and more meritorious if he had refrained from speaking of the former Government, of the Liberal Government, with such bitterness. As the hon. Minister of Public Works remarked, this question is not a party question, it is a question that interests the whole Province of Quebec; it is not even a question of races, it is not even a question of nationalities, it is a question that interests all the inhabitants of the Province of Quebec; and I can state that upon this point the interests of the Province are identical with those of the Dominion, because it is in the interest of the Dominion that all the parts of this country that are fit for colonization should be colonized with the least possible delay. The valley of Lake St. John is evidently fit for colonization, according to the information laid before this House by the hon. member for Chicoutimi, and that is enough to make of this question a national question in the largest sense of the word. It would have been better, in my humble opinion, if the hon. member had spoken less bitterly of the former Government. The former Government would have been as happy as the present Government to have been able to help the work that the hon. member for Chicoutimi desires so heartily to carry out, but there are, now, obstacles in the way of the present Government, and I speak of this question without any reference to party, for I know that there are obstacles, and everybody must know that there are, in spite of the desire that the Government may have to aid the road. These obstacles existed before, and with much more force under the former Government, because now the country is delivered from the financial crisis that existed when the former Government was in power. For my part, I do not hope for a solution of this question this year. The hon. Minister of Public Works has put off the hopes of the hon. member for Chicoutimi another twelve months; I should be happy if those hopes were to be realized twelve months hence. At all events, I would advise him to be patient, and to repeat the well known words: "Knock and it shall be opened unto you; ask and you shall receive." I think the hon. member should renew his request, not only this year, but next year, and that even then he will not obtain what he now asks for.

Mr. VALLÉE. Mr. Speaker, as seconder of this motion I will add a few words to the eloquent remarks made by the hon. member for Chicoutimi. I have already expressed, on the floor of this House, my opinion upon the question now under discussion. I always understood that the great obstacle in the way of the Government was, as the hon. Minister of Public Works has remarked, that the road was a local rather than a Federal road. Sir, when the Company asked me to raise my voice in this House in favor of this road, I understood that it was a serious obstacle, for here our principal duty is to look after questions respecting the whole Dominion as Federal questions. When, for the first time, the Quebec and Lake St. John railway was spoken of in this House, I must admit that it was a purely local question, and we were perhaps wrong in bringing it before this House, and especially to urge upon the Federal Government to grant us a subsidy. But now the situation is changed: there is, beyond Lake St. John, immense territories, now belonging to the Federal Government; there are immense tracts of unoccupied lands containing minerals in considerable quantities, and products of all kinds. It is known that England has ceded to us the immense territories of Labrador, which stretch out to the eastern extremity of the continent. To-day, therefore, we possess a vast territory to the east of Confederation. As in 1872 we possessed territory to the west, in the North-West, so now we possess a territory to the east, in the north-east. The reasons that induced the country to build a railway in the North-West was that we had there a territory to open to colonization, to trade, to industry. Well, if that reason was good, in order to induce the country to vote millions upon millions for the construction of a railway to reach the North-West and British Columbia, to-day the same reason offers itself with regard to the scheme now before the House; the name of the Company is soon to be changed, it is no longer a local road, it will be called the "Quebec, Labrador and Hudson's Bay Railway." As can be seen, the reason alleged by the hon. Minister of Public Works no longer exists—and naturally the hon. Minister expressed his opinion as a Minister should always do—for he cannot disclose the secrets of his Government. But we have seen that the obstacle was, that this question was a local one, and that it should be referred to the Local Government. Now this obstacle has entirely disappeared, the construction of the railway to Lake St. John, or rather from Quebec to the territories that Canada possesses to the east and north of Lake St. John, becomes a necessity in order to reach this territory, and I draw the particular attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works and the Government to this point. It is no longer a local question, it is a Federal question, and this part of the country has a right to receive its share of the subsidies, in order to secure the development of its resources, as the North-West and British Columbia have the right to have millions voted in order to open up these lands to colonization. The only objection that can be raised is that Labrador is uninhabited, or nearly so; yet, by referring to the census, it will be found that there is already a nucleus of population there that will increase as soon as it is helped and protected. That is the new argument that I had to bring as my contribution to the important undertaking that would develop a great part of the country, and would put the Dominion in a position to have on all sides, from east to west, important communications with the territory that has just been ceded to Canada. I do not see why we should abandon that territory that has just been given to us; I do not see why we should not find, one of these days, an appropriation of several hundred thousand dollars, five or six hundred thousand dollars, in favor of the construction of the Quebec, Labrador and Hudson's Bay Railway. That is the argument that I bring in favor of the cause I am supporting in this House, and I trust that the Government will pay it their most serious attention.

Mr. VALIN. Mr. Speaker, I think that the Government should take under their most serious consideration the construction of a railway to Lake St. John. I am a little interested in this question. I am one of those who subscribed something in the first place to start this road. All the inhabitants of the city of Quebec, particularly, are interested in this great undertaking, without distinction of nationality. We can say, Sir, that the principal shareholders, at the present time, are persons who are not of our nationality; they are not all French-Canadians. We find among them Scotch, English and others, who understand the great necessity of having this railway in the interests of colonization. It is so much so that, to-day, the city of Quebec is languishing; Quebec wants an outlet, its commerce is gone, and the inhabitants of Lake St. John feel badly the want of direct communication with Quebec. They have plentiful harvests, great quantities of wheat and other produce, but it is impossible to sell them. There are, if you will, merchants in the different parishes of Lake St. John, but these merchants, Sir, are regular speculators; that is what keeps the settlers from progressing. The settler is obliged to sell their wheat at a sacrifice, and to pay exorbitant prices for all that he buys. I shall mention a fact that was related to me lately. A farmer of one of the parishes of Lake St. John told me this: "I am obliged," he said, "at the present time, to sell my wheat at a sacrifice for about fifty cents, and I am obliged to purchase syrup; for instance, if it is good, I will pay $1.20 per gallon, if it is not so good I will get it at $1.00." Well, the merchants profit by the wants of the settler, give him almost nothing for his produce, and that keeps the settler poor. This shows the absolute necessity of helping the settler, and that was what the merchants of Quebec were convinced of when they started the road. Mr. Speaker, two years ago I was called upon to form part of a deputation, or rather excursion, in which took part the hon. Minister of Railways the hon. Prime Minister and a great many others, and then it was understood that this road was a necessity, and that later it would have to be helped. Well, since we have been so generous towards the great Pacific Railway, I do not see why the Government should not make a slight effort to aid the Lake St. John Railway, because we can say that it is the Manitoba of Canada. There is, however, a difference and that is that under the present as well as the previous Government, our settlers cost us nothing, we do not have to pay to bring them from Europe, our settlers go of themselves; they have energy, they open up their lands without asking anything from anybody, either from the Government or anybody else. The whole has been accomplished, as the hon. member for Chicoutimi remarked, at the expense of the home of each one of the settlers; that is to say, that parents give as much as they can to begin with, to these settlers, and that public charity has taken some part in the work. The zeal of the Roman Catholic clergy has also largely contributed towards this colonization. Well, Sir, I think that we now have the means of helping the Lake St. John Railway, and that we should help it without further delay, because I see no necessity for delay; by delaying the work we would deprive also the Government from considerable revenue that would accrue from it. Sir, the Lake St. John people are almost without communication in winter. In summer there is navigation, but as soon as navigation closes these people are shut up, and they fall into the hands of speculators who prevent the development of colonization.

Motion agreed to.

CARRYING OF THE MAILS FROM QUEBEC TO LAKE ST. JOHN.

Mr. CIMON, in moving for copies of all correspondence since 1875, and of all documents concerning the carrying of the mails by the land route between Quebec and Lake St. John, said: My aim in making this motion is to have a peremptory answer to offer to those who accuse me, in my county, of being opposed to the carrying of mails by land from Quebec to Lake St. John. I am happy to see the Minister of Public Works in his place, as he always is, for that matter; he will be able to say how often I have fatigued him; how often I have harassed him with this question; and how often I have begged of the Government to grant me that the mails should be carried from Quebec to Lake St. John by the new road. With all the correspondence which will be laid before the House, I shall have an answer to those who have accused me of being hostile to this route.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Cimon) is perfectly right. I will not say that he has fatigued me, but the word harass is a good word. I think he has harassed as much as it was possible to harass a Minister; and if he is second to any one in this respect, it is only to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Fortin), who, for perseverance, is second to none in this House. But, joking apart, the hon. member is certainly right. Since the question of carrying the mails by the road to Lake St. John has been raised, he has not ceased to request that the mails should be carried by this route, and finally the Government consented. It was because the member for Chicoutimi applied to the Quebec Government, and set the influence of that Government to work upon the Ottawa Government. The Quebec Government having provided to grant a subsidy of $1,500, the Ottawa Government have granted a like sum to pay their share of the cost of carrying the mails by this route.

WATER LEVEL OF LAKE MANITOBA.

Mr. RYAN (Marquette), in moving for copies of any reports or surveys, made since last Session, upon the present water level of Lake Manitoba, and the estimated cost of lowering the same, said: During last Session the level of the water in Lake Manitoba was between three and four feet higher than usual, and as the land in the neighborhood of the lake is very flat, the unusual volume of water had the effect of submerging several thousand acres of land. To the south of the lake the land is of first class quality; in fact, it is not surpassed in any other part of the Province, and several of the farms in Marquette county were situated on the borders of the lake. The owners of these farms, who were amongst the first settlers of the county were, in many instances, driven from their farms. During the past season, the Government, very properly appreciating the magnitude of the damage sustained in the manner I have described, sent a surveyor to the outlet of Lake Manitoba—which is a small river—to examine the nature of the obstruction and to ascertain whether the level of the lake could be reduced by such an expenditure as might be considered justifiable. The name of the engineer sent out by the Government for that purpose was, I believe, Mr. Moshier. I have not seen his report, but I may say that its publication is very anxiously looked for by my constituents, who take a deep interest in the matter. It is for the purpose of obtaining the production of this report that I make the present motion; and I may be permitted to give expression to the strong desire on the part of my constituents that, if the report should disclose that the amount of the expenditure required would not be very large, a sum should be placed in the Estimates for the prosecution of the work.

Mr. LANGEVIN. This question has not escaped the attention of the Government, as the hon. gentleman will see by the fact that an engineer was sent to examine the locality. The matter is now receiving the best consideration of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

FRENCH SHIPPING BOUNTIES BILL.

Mr. BURPEE (St. John) moved for copies of all correspondence which the Government may have had with their agent in London, the Imperial Government, or other parties, relating to the French Shipping Bounties Bill, which has passed the Chamber of Deputies, and is now under the consideration of the French Senate. He said: In a discussion which took place in the other branch of the Legislature on a motion referring to the tariff on Canadian vessels going into France, the subject of this motion was alluded to by the leader of the Government in the Senate. The Bounties Bill referred to in the present motion is one which gives 20 and 60 cents per ton on the construction of ships in France, and it further grants a bonus of one and one-half francs per thousand miles traversed by French ships, the distance not merely being calculated from one French port to another, or to a foreign port, but between different foreign ports. Strong remonstrances have been made in Great Britain to this measure, and attention has frequently been called to it in the Imperial Parliament. My object is to have any correspondence that may have taken place on the subject with our authorities brought down. I trust that our Government will heartily join in any remonstrances that may be made by the Imperial authorities against the measure.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If there is any correspondence on this subject, it will be brought down. It is possible that correspondence may have taken place between the High Commissioner and the authorities there, though I am not aware of it at this moment.

Motion agreed to.

SALARIES OF JUDGES.

Mr. LONGLEY moved for a statement of the number of Judges in the different Provinces, whose salaries will be affected by the proposed resolutions of the hon. the Minister of Justice, dated the 31st January last past, as well as the amount of additional salary that will be received in each case, should a Bill founded on said resolutions pass this Parliament, discriminating between the different classes of Judges indicated in the said resolutions. He said: I desire, with the consent of this House, to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "Parliament," the words "also the date of appointment in each case."

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). There is no objection to giving the information asked for by the hon. member for Annapolis. An Order of the House has already passed, requiring a statement of the population of the several judicial districts, and that when completed will furnish my hon. friend with the information he requires. But the statement will be made and laid on the Table as soon as it can be prepared.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

POST OFFICE MONEY ORDERS.

Mr. FARROW moved for a return showing the amount of money sent by Post Office Orders to Great Britain and Ireland, during the past year, 1880, and the cost of the same; also, the amount sent by Post Office Orders to the United States for the same time, and the cost of the same. He said: The object of this motion I believe to be a very important one. It is no doubt a great convenience to send money from here to the United Kingdom at a cheap rate; and it is also a great convenience for parties residing in the old country to be able to send money here. We have similar advantages in sending money to the United States, but I find that we have not the same facilities for exchanging money orders with the old country that we have with the United States. We know that a great many people have emigrated to this country from England, Ireland and Scotland, and that the number is constantly increasing. In fact, we may call Canada, especially Ontario, a second edition of England, Ireland and Scotland. It is a fact that a great amount of money is sent from the United Kingdom to Canada. Sometimes it is sent by the more wealthy people there to friends in this country to help them to get along. It may be that a poor family has purchased a small farm, and being unable to pay for it, money is sent here from the old country.

Sometimes an emigrant to this country gets well off in a few years, and sends money home to his poor relations, it may be a pound note, a ten pound note, or a twenty pound note. Sometimes he may want to send money home to bring out his family. But I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that we cannot exchange money orders with the old country as cheaply as we can to the United States. I find that the rates for sending money orders to those two countries are as follows:—

Amount.	Cost to Great Britain.	Cost to United States.
$10 00	$0 20	$0 10
20 00	0 40	0 20
50 00	1 00	0 50

Now, I think it would be a great advantage to a great many people if they could send money as cheaply to the United Kingdom as they can to the United States, because it would be an additional inducement for people to send money to the old country, and for people of the old country to send money here. I wish to draw the attention of the Government to this fact. In Great Britain they are talking about reducing the rates to this country, and the present would be a favorable opportunity for our Government to act in unison with the British Government in the direction I have indicated. I trust the Government will look into this matter with the view of reducing the rates, and thus confer a great advantage upon the people of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE BOXES.

Mr. COURSOL, in moving for a statement showing the number of boxes, drawers and pigeon-holes in the Montreal Post Office; the number of boxes, drawers and pigeon-holes not let before the rent was raised, and the number of those not let since the rent was so raised, said: My object in making this motion is to ascertain whether the Post Office Department have acted wisely in increasing the price of boxes in the Montreal Post Office. The price of boxes and pigeon-holes was first increased from $1.50 to $2.50, and afterwards to $4; and the price of drawers, which at first was $2, was raised to $4, and is now $6. If the effect of these changes has been to diminish the number of boxes let, as well as the revenue collected by the department, the policy has been a mistake, injuring the city of Montreal without benefitting the Dominion. The city of Montreal is indebted to the Federal Government for the erection of a magnificent post office, but I am credibly informed that in many cases the high price of the boxes has induced citizens to abandon them and depend on the letter-carriers. Complaints on this subject are frequently made, and I believe that since the 1st of January a smaller number of boxes were let than when the prices were lower.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The statement the hon. gentleman moves for will, of course, be brought down. The hon. gentleman may rest assured that there was no intention of injuring the citizens of Montreal in any way. Should the system be found not to work well, the Post Office Department will be disposed to do the right thing. When the statement comes down the hon. gentleman will be in a position to confer on the subject with the Postmaster General, who will always be happy to hear him.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY, in reply to Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, stated that the Estimates would be laid on the Table to-morrow, and that he hoped to be able to make his financial statement on Friday.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

(1.) Copies of all tenders transmitted to the Government for the telegraph posts to be distributed on the Island of Anticosti, the Magdalen Islands, and on that portion of the north shore of the St. Lawrence included in the map submitted to the Government, with a view to show the advantage of connecting, by means of a submarine cable, that portion of the north shore and the said islands with the telegraph lines on the south shore. (2.) A statement showing the price or prices asked by each party tendering for a part or the whole of the contract. (3.) The names of the persons to whom a contract or contracts were awarded and the prices at which such contracts were awarded.—(Mr. Fiset.)

Return showing the claims of contractors and others, arising out of the construction of the Intercolonial Railroad, which have been made or reported upon since the report dated November 27th, 1880, made by F. Shanly, Esq., Chief Engineer Intercolonial Railway, the names of the claimants, the amount claimed, the nature of the claims, the report, if any made, and the amount paid or to be paid in each case.—(Mr. Anglin.)

Return stating in detail the names of the several persons to whom was paid the sum of $23,931, given in page 10 of the report of the Minister of Railways for the year ending June 30th, 1880, as the total sum paid for "construction of railways, old accounts" and charged to expenditure on capital account, the amount claimed and the amount paid in each case, and the report on which payment was made.—(Mr. Anglin.)

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 15th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RICHELIEU ELECTION PETITION.

Mr. SPEAKER said: After having given a most careful consideration to the petition of Edmund Ritter, and others of Sorel, representing that there has been a failure of justice in the matter of the trial of the election petition complaining of an undue return for the electoral division of Richelieu, and praying to be allowed to make proof before this House of the allegation therein made, I am of opinion that the same cannot be properly received, for reasons which I now propose to state. The petition sets forth, that on the 4th November, 1878, a petition was filed in pursuance of the Statute in the Superior Court at Sorel, by two duly qualified electors, contesting the election of the member elect for Richelieu for corrupt practices by himself and agents. Later in the same month a counter-petition was filed by the member elect against Mr. Barthe, his opponent at the said election. On the day appointed for the trial, Mr. Justice Gill dismissed the two petitions for want of proof. His judgment, declaring the sitting member duly elected, was forwarded to this House, in accordance with the law governing such matters, and was recorded in the Journals. The present petitioners now allege that the trial was not brought to issue in good faith, but that it was conducted collusively with the view of presenting any full investigation into the corrupt practices charged against the sitting member. They declare that had they been substituted for the original petitioners and permitted to come into Court, they would have been able to prove that the member elect had been returned to Parliament by means of corrupt practices committed by his agents and himself personally. They declare that he has no right to the seat he has occupied up to the present time, and pray the House to allow them to come forward and lay before it all the evidence necessary to prove their various allegations. In other words, they wish this House to re-open the whole case, and review not only facts previous to the judgment of the Court, but such evidence as they may desire to adduce with respect to the serious allegations set forth in their petition. Now the only question that this House has to consider is, whether this petition is not in effect a petition, questioning the return of a member, which, as it has been admitted on both sides, cannot be properly received by the House, in view of the fact that it has divested itself of its right of trying such matters by referring them to the jurisdiction of an independent judicial tribunal. In handing over this power to the Courts, the House still reserved to itself the right of taking notice of any legal disabilities affecting its members, and issuing writs in the room of members judged to be incapable of sitting—but the petition now under consideration, both in its terms and scope, is a petition questioning the return of a member, and not within the purview of this House. By the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 10, the House of Commons divested itself of its original jurisdiction for the trial of all matters growing out of the election and return of members having the right to sit therein, including the withdrawal and abatement of any election petition in consequence of alleged corrupt agreement between the parties concerned. That power now belongs to the Courts of Justice, which try all election cases in conformity with the Statutes in that behalf provided. The 63rd section of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874, expressly provides that all elections held after the passing of the said Act shall be subject to the provisions thereof, and shall not be questioned otherwise than in accordance therewith, showing clearly that the determination of the judicial body to whom that power has been delegated is final to all intents and purposes. Now the petition in question declares in express terms that the sitting member "has no right to the seat he occupies;" and were the prayer of the petitioners granted, the logical result would be the virtual resumption by the House of the jurisdiction which it has in its wisdom handed over to the Courts. It asks the House to sit as a Court of Appeal upon a judgment rendered by a Court of Justice, though such judgment ought to be final according to the law. If the petition should be received it would then be competent for any member to move that it be referred to a Committee; and if such a motion were agreed to, the various allegations in the petition would constitute the order of reference by which the Committee would be governed in its proceedings. In this way, a door would be opened to the indiscriminate reception of petitions attacking generally the return of members, though not governed by any of those formalities necessary even in those times when the House possessed full jurisdiction over controverted elections. To grant the prayer of the petition, would be to violate the general principle which lies at the basis of all the legislation adopted by the English Parliament since 1865, and by the Canadian Parliament since 1873, that the Courts should alone adjudicate on matters of controverted elections. When the law has been proved to be inadequate to provide a sufficient remedy in any case, then Parliament has always come forward, as the various Statutes in amendment of the Act of 1874 prove, and passed the Legislation necessary in the premises. The principle which guides Parliament in such cases can be understood by reference to a Statute passed in 1876. When no petition charging the existence of corrupt practices has been presented under the Act for the trial of controverted elections, then 25 or more electors of a district can sign and present a petition in which they state that corrupt practices have prevailed, or that they have reason to believe that such practices have extensively prevailed, at an election; but that petition must be accompanied by a solemn declaration under the Statute in that behalf, signed by the said electors stating that their allegations are true to the best of their knowledge and belief. They must also deposit with the Accountant of the House of Commons a sum of one thousand dollars. That petition must be presented within sixty days after the publication in the Canada Gazette of the return of the election if the House is sitting, or if Parliament is not sitting, within fourteen days after the next meeting of Parliament. Even in this case the House does not take cognizance itself of the allegations set forth in the petition. It may only present an address to the Governor General praying him to cause an enquiry to be made in such matters, and accordingly a Commission of inquiry is issued with such powers as determined by Statute. It will therefore be seen that this petition is irregular: 1st. Because it asks the House to sit in appeal of a judgment rendered in conformity with the provisions of the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, 1874; 2ndly. Because it is not in compliance with the requirements of 39 Victoria, chapter 10, "An Act to provide for more effectual enquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at Elections of Members of the House of Commons," nor with those of 42 Victoria, chapter 6, "An Act to amend An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of Corrupt Practices at Elections." In view, then, of the fact that the petition is in conflict with the letter and spirit of the law which governs the House in such cases, and does in effect question the right of an hon. member to his seat, I have to decide that the objection raised by the hon. member for Bagot is well taken, that the petition cannot be received.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Messages as follows:—

"Lorne,

"The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimate of sums required for the service of the Dominion, for the year ending 30th June, 1882; and in accordance with the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867,' he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 15th February, 1881.

"Lorne,

"The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, the additional Supplementary Estimates of the amounts required for the Service of Canada, for the year expiring the 30th June 1881; and in accordance with the provisions of 'The British North America Act, 1867,' he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

"GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

"OTTAWA, 15th February, 1881."

Ordered that the said Messages and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.—(Sir Leonard Tilley.)

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esq., Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

"MR. SPEAKER,

"His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honorable House in the Senate Chamber."

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

(In the Senate Chamber.)

His Excellency was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following Bill:

"An Act respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway."

And the House being returned,

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The following Bills were introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 59) providing for Harbor Improvements at Moncton.—(Sir Albert J. Smith.)

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Don River Improvement Company.—(Mr. Platt.)

REPORTS ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. DOMVILLE moved,

That, in accordance with the first report of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, the time for the reception of reports on Private Bills be extended for a period of two weeks from to-day.

Motion agreed to.

AN EXPLANATION.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to occupy a moment to correct a mistake I made a day or two ago with respect to the expenses incurred by the Sheriff of Norfolk county in putting a stop to the prize fighting at Long Point. I stated that the Dominion Government and the Ontario Government had both refused to reimburse him. The sheriff informs me that after the Dominion Government had declined to pay the expenses a second time, he applied to the Provincial Government, and they have provided for the amount in the Estimates of the present year.

INSPECTION OF SMOKED HERRINGS.

Mr. MOUSSEAU moved the third reading of Bill (No. 49) to amend the General Inspection Act of 1874 and the Acts amending it.

Mr. GILLMOR. Before this motion is passed, I wish to make a few remarks. On reference to the Inspection Act of 1874, I find that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, designate the cities, counties, towns and other places, or inspection divisions, in Canada, at and for which, respectively, it is expedient to appoint Inspectors of the several articles named in the Act. Although this Act has been on the Statute-book for many years, the Government have not thought it proper to enforce the inspection of smoked herrings. I am quite satisfied that if the Government understood this matter, they would not make the inspection compulsory. Last Session, when the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue occupied a seat on the floor of this House, he informed me that the inspection of smoked herrings would not be enforced, unless a municipality requested it, and under these circumstances I did not oppose the measure. As the hon. mover informs me, however, that the Government intend to put this Act in force, I believe I would not be discharging my duty to my constituents if I did not oppose it. No possible good can result from enforcing this Act. All the smoked herrings exported from New Brunswick to the United States amounts to 5,356,790 pounds, while from Nova Scotia, a constituency of which is represented by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), there are exported to the United States only 13,214 pounds, valued at $329; and I may say that 95 per cent. of all the smoked herring exported from New Brunswick go from the constituency I represent—the county of Charlotte. The quantity exported from New Brunswick would amount to 750,000 boxes, 95 per cent. of which are exported from the county of Charlotte to the United States. I am not surprised that the late Government did not deem it necessary, in the public interest, to enforce this inspection. I can see no good that can arise at all. It would entail an enormous burden on that struggling industry—a favorite term with hon. gentlemen opposite—of some $3,500 a year, even at one-half cent per box. I cannot conceive why the Government should deem it their duty to make this inspection compulsory when a greater part of the fish finds a market in the United States, and those who are engaged in this business which has been handed down to them from generation to generation, know how to manage it better than the Government or anybody else, and in their own interest must consult the taste and wishes of their customers. If my constituents found a market at home and the public interest demanded there should be inspection, I would have no objection to it. My hon. friend informed me the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, and the Board of Trade of Montreal petitioned for this inspection. Well, let an inspection be had in those ports, but it can be of no earthly use in Charlotte county, except as a tax of $3,500 on a portion of my constituents for the benefit of the inspectors into whose pockets the whole amount will go. I beg to move, in amendment, that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions that they have power to so amend the Bill as to make the inspection in no case compulsory.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. I cannot see why, after the agreeable relations which have taken place between the hon. member and myself on this subject, he should desire a vote of want of confidence. The hon. gentleman states the law has been long on the Statute-book without being put in force. I do not know how far his assertion is correct. The Boards of Trade complain of the quality of the fish and ask for an enforcement of the Inspection Law. My hon. friend complains that 5,000,000 pounds of smoked herring are exported from New Brunswick, 95 per cent. of which comes from his county; further, that if the Government could foresee the evil results that will flow from the enforcement of the Inspection Law, it would not press its passage. If the law, as my hon. friend says, has never been enforced, how can he say that its enforcement will produce bad results. The people engaged in the fish trade complain that the quality of the fish is not what it ought to be, and ask that the Inspection Law be more severely enforced. Should it be found the law produced bad results the Government do not intend enforcing it severely, but a trial must be had to see whether the Boards of Trade or my hon. friend are correct.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. Minister seems to think it is a matter of small importance whether those people are put to a great deal of unnecessary trouble or not while he is making his experiment—an experiment suggested by the Boards of Trade of Halifax and Montreal. I understood the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley) to say last year, that the Board of Trade of Halifax wanted the inspection for the purpose of having a standard quality of fish for the foreign market, and I really supposed there was a considerable exportation of herrings from Digby Basin through Halifax, until my hon. friend from Charlotte stated it was very small, the chief exportation being from his county. To render the inspection of value, an enormous amount of trouble must be imposed on the people who put up the fish. The fish are now put up as fast as possible in boxes, and shipped in small vessels to the United States, clearances being obtained to meet the demands of the authorities in such a way as to impose very little trouble on the shippers. If after the fish are packed in boxes, they must undergo inspection before the boxes are finally closed; if the inspector is to sort the fish, and see if they are of the proper size and weight, a great deal of trouble will be occasioned. It is almost impossible for any one who does not know anything of the trade to form an idea of what the inspection will amount to.

What regulations shall be enacted in the matter, whether they will require the fish to be of a certain size or weight, or whether it will be merely left to the inspector, by looking at the fish or handling them, to decide whether they belong to the first, second or third class, we cannot imagine. But we do know that a great deal of trouble will be imposed on these people, and that there is no commercial need of those regulations. The trade is almost entirely a local trade. Those engaged in it for many years know what is best in their own interest, in putting up this fish, and, therefore, what is best calculated to please their customers and procure the best prices obtainable. Perhaps there is some idea this smoked herring will be assorted also, and, if so, we should consider the amount of trouble that will be occasioned, leading to such small results. I do not know that any fish from the county of Charlotte comes to the Montreal market. My impression was it went almost entirely to the United States, very little coming to St. John. People leave out the idea of any inspection of smoked herring. Every man can choose for himself whether the herrings are of the better or inferior quality. There is no necessity of ascertaining whether the fish has been sent to the market in that condition. My conviction is that any inspection will be merely officious, harassing and annoying; and if it takes out of the county of Charlotte $3,000 a year, there is no good reason for imposing so heavy a burden upon a class who at present find it exceedingly difficult to provide the ordinary necessities of life for themselves. The Bill will affect but one or two localities in the Lower Provinces, but it will be found by them to be a very objectionable measure, harassing, annoying, vexatious and burdensome.

Mr. MILLS. The Minister who has charge of this Bill has not given the House any information as to its character. He is bound, however, to make out a case in its favor; the burden of proof is upon the hon. gentleman when he proposes a measure imposing restrictions on trade—to control and regulate an article produced by private parties, and deciding upon what conditions it shall be sold. But he has not done so, nor has he shown that the fish to be subjected to compulsory inspection is of less marketable value than the fish from other countries. If he had undertaken to show that the smoked herring caught in the vicinity of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are not as well cured as herring caught elsewhere, and, consequently, brought a lower price, owing to their inferior quality—that if differently classified, they would command a higher price, and that, comparing them with the fish caught elsewhere, they were inferior for the want of such inspection and classification, he would have made out a case in favor of that measure. But he has not attempted anything of the sort. He proposes to take a leap in the dark. He says the member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) does not know what the consequences will be, because a measure of this sort has never been tried. But we are not obliged to make experiments before we know the consequences. When you subject an article to a burden of ten or fifteen per cent. of its value, it should be shown that some great advantage is thereby to be obtained. If the hon. gentleman could show that, by this inspection, the fish would bring five per cent. more, in sale, he would not even then make out a case for the measure. To do so, he must show that this burden on the fishermen, occasioned by this inspection, will be a fair test of the additional price they will obtain in consequence of it. He has not, however, attempted anything of the sort. He has no warrant in the action of the United States, or any other country, for the course he has called on this House to take. He has been wanting in his duty to this House in asking it to support a measure of this sort, without having submitted a tittle of evidence to show it would be productive of any advantage to the people engaged in the trade.

Mr. DALY. I think the arguments adduced by the hon. members for Gloucester and Bothwell, rather tend to support the measure before the House, for this reason: that, instead of enacting an Inspection Law, we are now, in reality, asking the House to pass a measure for the amendment of the law hitherto prevailing. The inspection fee paid last year has been considered excessive. This Bill, I think, proposes a reduction from two cents to one cent per box; and if there is to be an inspection at all—and we think it desirable—the arguments of the member for Gloucester would go towards opposing the law and not the reduction contemplated. In the interests of the fishermen, which the member for Gloucester is advocating, we should support this Bill.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The philosophical gentleman who represents Bothwell has propounded a new law of evidence. He says the burden of proof in this case rests on the shoulders of the Government. To prove what? That the execution of this proposed law will produce no bad results. The hon. member for Charlotte says: "The law you are introducing is already in existence, but has never been executed; but I believe that, if carried out, it will produce bad results." Now, there is a provision here, in the first section, for an amendment of the law to secure a better inspection of fish. I believe, all things considered, and notwithstanding the objections of the hon. member for Bothwell, that a measure such as the present, to secure a proper and reliable inspection of fish is desirable, not only in the interest of the trade but in the interest of the public.

Mr. BLAKE. My hon. friend stigmatizes the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) by a title which I am sure we will all agree the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mousseau) will never deserve himself, because it is clear that his conduct with reference to this measure indicates that he is not animated by the philosophical spirit in dealing with matters of legislation. The law in question is a permissive law so far as the Government is concerned—it is of a general character, and applicable to a great number of articles of production. As to this particular article of commerce, or production, it has never been brought into execution at all. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Daly) has said, that the proposal before the House is one to mitigate in some particulars the severity of the law, but it is also true that the hon. Minister proposes that the law shall be no longer in this respect a dead letter. He proposes to enforce the law, and contemporaneously with its enforcement to mitigate the fees to be charged, and therefore we are to-day face to face with the question whether the law shall or shall not be enforced with respect to this particular article. The Minister has said that although not a philosopher, he is disposed to try an experiment, and he will try his experiment upon the fishermen of Charlotte and perhaps other counties, though I believe the County of Charlotte is the one mainly interested. But why is he to try his experiment upon them? To settle a question in dispute between those who are engaged in trade, and the Boards of Trade of Halifax and Montreal. He says the people at those ports think it would be a good thing to pass the law; the fishermen themselves say it would be a bad thing to pass the law, and the hon. gentleman, not being a philosopher, does not pretend to solve the question by an effort of reasoning, but he says, let us put the law in force; let us apply the test; and though I am not a philosopher, next Session I will have found out by experience, which is the only way I have of learning these things, how the law works.

Mr. DALY. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me if I interject the remark that we passed the law last year, and brought it into operation.

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. DALY. Yes; the law came into operation and fixed a scale of fees which we are now seeking to mitigate.

Mr. BLAKE. Will the hon. minister, who, though not a philosopher, will perhaps call himself a practical man—because it is said these qualities are antagonistic to one and other, though I do not understand how they can be—tell us whether the inspection is now going on?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. No; it is not.

Mr. BLAKE. Is the hon. member for Halifax satisfied?

Mr. DALY. There are inspectors of fish.

Mr. BLAKE. But I mean inspectors of smoked fish in Charlotte. I know there are inspectors of some kinds of fish in some localities, but we are speaking of this kind of fish in this locality. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), who knows of this subject, says that almost the whole production of this particular article is in his county, and he says the trade of these fishermen is almost exclusively with the United States ports, and that it does not reach Montreal or Halifax. This statement is not denied by the hon. Minister; he does not say that he has informed himself that this trade reaches the ports of Montreal and Halifax, and, therefore, I fail to see what interest the Boards of Trade of those cities have with the particular question, or why their verdict or opinion as philosophers that this is a good thing to be done, with reference to a trade which does not concern them, should be taken as a sufficient basis for putting a law into operation. Therefore, I say that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was right in saying that the hon. Minister did not lay a foundation for asking the consent of the House to this measure. The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor), and the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin), told us of the difficulties of the actual inspection of the vexatious character of the impost, and of what this burden will be in its mitigated form, but the only answer which the hon. member makes is to flourish a memorial from the Boards of Trade of Halifax and Montreal. As my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) says, this may be a small matter, but we are bound to deal with a measure which materially affects only a small portion of the population just as tenderly as if it affected a larger number of persons. And if you find that a small number of persons, with a narrow trade from which they obtain only a moderate subsistence, are to be burdened with an impost of a vexatious character and which involves a tax of five per cent. on their gross catch of this particular article, then I say that in this respect the question is a serious one. I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), that the hon. Minister has not made out a case for the enforcement of such a law, though I do not say that a case might not be made out.

Mr. LANGEVIN. This Bill which it is proposed to amend has not been amended in any particular since it was introduced, and it would be as well that the House should read the present Bill so that they may know for what they are voting, and what foundation there is in the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Bill consists of only one clause, and is as follows:—

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

The Act passed in the forty-third year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled: 'An Act to amend 'The General Inspection Act of 1874,' and the Act amending it,' is hereby amended by repealing the tariff of fees to be collected for the inspection of smoked herrings, contained in the third section of the said Act, and substituting the following:—

a For each box of smoked herrings—one cent.

b For each half-box of smoked herrings—one-half cent.

c For each quarter-box of smoked herrings—one-quarter cent.

Now, what does the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor) propose? Does he wish the law of last year to remain as it is? Does he wish the tax on each box of smoked herring to remain double what it is now proposed to make it?

Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman's motion proposes nothing else than to give the Bill the six months' hoist.

Mr. BLAKE. Not at all.

Mr. LANGEVIN. That is the meaning of it. The present Bill simply proposes to reduce the tax on each box of smoked herring, and this is a reduction which was promised by my late colleague the present Judge Baby, but which was overlooked at the time, and is now introduced. The hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) says the law is a dead letter. You have not appointed inspectors, and the law is a dead law. What would have been the consequence had we appointed inspectors last year?

Mr. BLAKE. I am not complaining of your inaction.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I hope I am not misrepresenting what the hon. gentleman said. He stated we had not appointed inspectors. Why? Because, if we had appointed them they would have had to collect fees, and by delaying the appointment of inspectors we have given time to Parliament to look over the law again and to reduce the fees. We have asked the House to take that course, and the House assented in so far that there has been no amendment until now. Here we are at the third reading of the Bill, and an amendment is proposed at the last moment by the hon. member for Charlotte, and if it is put I hope the House will vote it down.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I desire to correct a misapprehension of the hon. Minister. He has stated that the motion of the hon. member for Charlotte is simply to go back into Committee and to make the fees as they were before. As I understood the motion, it is to make the fees optional, and thereby relieve all those fishermen in his district who do not believe that this measure will be any benefit to them. Whatever may be the merits of the case itself, it is perfectly clear that my hon. friend's motion goes to the root of the whole matter. It is to relieve those poor men, who lead that very laborious and very dangerous existence, from the necessity of parting with a large part of their profit to pay these inspection fees. I must say that, although I do not profess to have any knowledge of the fishery question in the Maritime Provinces, this House ought to be most careful not to impose any burden whatever on men who, as we all know, are engaged in the prosecution of a calling so laborious and so dangerous as that of fishermen.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. member has altogether misconceived the true meaning of the amendment of the hon. member for Charlotte. He does not propose that the fees be reduced; he only asks that inspection should be optional in the county of Charlotte. The law of 1877 does not apply to the whole Dominion, but only to such portions where inspection districts are organized. There are inspection districts organized in all the Maritime cities, and in all those cities the inspection is compulsory whenever the fish is shipped. The fees for inspection have been very high so far, and the hon. member for Charlotte anticipates that if the fees for inspection are decreased the inspection districts will be multiplied, and that, sooner or later, the county of Charlotte will become part of an inspection district. If, to-morrow, for instance, the county of Charlotte were organized into an inspection district, inspection would immediately become compulsory, and that is what the hon. member objects to. The hon. member says that at present a large part of the smoked fish produced in his county is shipped from that county to the United States without being inspected, and he proposes that wherever there are inspection districts inspection should not be made compulsory, but left optional; so that if, to-morrow, the Government organized his county as an inspection district, then the law shall not make inspection compulsory, as it is now. He does not ask to have the law altered—he could not, as the Bill provides for the reduction of inspection fees—he only asks that if the fishermen of Charlotte should prefer it, they might export their fish without having them stamped and inspected. If the law remains as it is, the fishermen can export their fish without being subjected to inspection, but the Government propose that, by a mere Order in Council, the county of Charlotte may be organized into an inspection district, and then it will be compulsory upon all the fishermen of that county to have their fish inspected, and that is what the amendment proposes to avoid.

Amendment (Mr. Gillmor) negatived on the following division:—

Bill read the third time and passed.

PATENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. POPE (Compton), in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 45) (from the Senate) to amend the Patent Act of 1872, said: It has been found that many people do not quite understand the operation of the Act passed in 1872, which varied considerably from the previous Act. It has frequently happened that applications for patents, coming a day or two after the expiring of the time required for notice, or even on the same day, and the applications being lodged in the Patent Office, the parties suppose it is all right. The object of this Bill is to give the Commissioner of Patents, in cases where applications are made in good faith, but a day or two late, an opportunity to investigate the matter, and if he is satisfied that they acted in good faith, he may give them an extension of time, but not to interfere with any person that may have used the patent in the meantime. This Bill is brought in in obedience to a pressing demand from many parties for legislation in the direction pointed out. The hon. member for West Durham will find, by looking at the first clause of the Bill, that the change made in the Senate is confined to applications made one year ago. My own impression is that it may work a little hard. However, if the Bill passes the second reading we can discuss the matter in Committee of the Whole. In some cases it appears the party was not duly authorized to take out the patent at that time, and did not send their transfer, or something of that kind.

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. How many cases are there?

Mr. POPE. Perhaps there may be twenty. I do not know. That is the object of that clause. The second clause merely carries out the present arrangement. The third clause is for the purpose of relieving persons who have acted in good faith, and supposed the matter was all right. Section seventeen is for the purpose of setting forth clearly that a fresh patent was to be taken out before the expiration of the patent. It is also proposed to insert the words "before the expiration of the second five years." I make these alterations that no more mistakes may occur. That is the whole intent and object of the Bill, which I submit for the consideration of the House. In respect to the fifth clause it has been found in fact that the provision for all applications to pass through the Attorney-General is a mere matter of form. It is not done. They are perhaps submitted to some clerk, and the Minister knows probably no more about such matters than the clerk; consequently we thought it better to strike out that provision.

Mr. BLAKE. I will leave the Minister of Justice to answer the observations made by the hon. gentleman with respect to the manner in which the duties devolving upon the Department of Justice have been performed. The 18th section of the Patent Act provides:

"Every patent and instrument for the extension of time as aforesaid shall, before it is signed by the Commissioner or any other member of the Privy Council and before the seal hereinbefore mentioned is affixed to it, be examined by the Minister of Justice, who, if he finds it conformable to law, shall certify accordingly, and such patent or instrument may then be signed and the seal affixed thereto, and be duly registered shall avail to the grantee thereof."

I understand the hon. Minister of Agriculture to make two objections. First, that the Minister of Justice has not performed his duty in point of fact, but has left it to some clerk who knew nothing about it; and second, that it would not have been better if it had been left in the hands of the Minister of Justice himself, as he knew no more about it than the clerk. I certainly would not have made such an observation, but, in the frankness and familiarity which necessarily arises from the cordial relations which subsist between those hon. gentlemen, they can talk about these matters in a manner which I would not venture to adopt. It is of much consequence that these important documents should be made conformable to the law, and this will not be accomplished by striking out the clause. With respect to the other parts of the measure, it was certainly introduced in the Senate in a more liberal form for the patentees, whose patents have expired, than its present form; and if I rightly understood the Minister of Agriculture he rather objected to the limitation introduced by the Senate, and was inclined to suggest that the House should revert to the original terms of the Bill. It will be satisfactory at an early stage to know what the views of the Government are—what, in point of fact, they propose. The hon. Minister has told us the Bill is not satisfactory to him, and that he thought it should be in different terms. What are the terms in which they ask us to agree to it, what are the changes which the hon. Minister proposes to make from the Bill, as passed by the Senate? It was introduced in the Senate by the leader of the Government, but altered very considerably in the course of its progress through that body. Although I think this measure objectionable, I am not making these observations with a view to opposing the second reading of the Bill, but I am making them at this early stage because we should know something more about it before it takes the next stage, and because it is important to know what persons and what patents come within the scope of this measure as now proposed, and still more what persons and what patents will come within its scope if passed in such terms as the Minister thinks should be adopted. We have an indefinite measure before us now. The hon. Minister does not know how many cases will be affected; he thinks about twenty. It is not a difficult matter, however, to ascertain the facts. We can learn the cases in which patents have expired up to this time, and in which not more than one year will have elapsed, and in which the application was made within ten days of expiration. We can then see for what particular cases it is proposed to alter the general law. The hon. Minister says it is intended to deal with such cases as appear to deserve relief, because the applications have been made in good faith, and that the omissions occurred through misapprehensions, but I do not observe that that limitation is contained in the measure. There is an unlimited discretion allowed on the part of the Commissioner as to what he should do; but, subject to that which is attempted to be provided for in the Bill, there is no ground given by the Minister except that the applications in question had been made in good faith, the parties being at the time under a misapprehension as to the law. With reference to the meaning of the law I do not see how there could be any misapprehension as to the first renewal, since the clause says the application for a renewal of a patent must be made "at or before" the period of expiration. It seems to me that no interpretation can be placed on that clause to indicate that a patentee is entitled to apply after the expiration of the time. The Act says that a patent shall be valid for five, ten, or fifteen years, at the option of the applicant. The applicant knows that his patent is valid only for the five or ten years for which he applies for it. Then the Act goes on to say that "at or before the expiration of five or ten years the holder may obtain an extension." If he may obtain it at or before he cannot obtain it after. I am defending the hon. gentleman's own legislation—for I think he was Commissioner at that time—against his attack upon it, and against his imputation of ambiguity. There is no ground for the measure, so far as it applies to the first five or ten years. As to the second five or ten years, I agree that the phrase in the Act with reference to that is not as plain as the hon. gentleman should have written it; yet I think, by the ordinary process of reading, as "at or before" applies to the first extension, it should apply to the second also. It seems to me, before we can pronounce a judgment, we ought to have a list showing the persons who have applied for patents, what the patents are, and the periods at which their applications were made, and the circumstances, and I ask the hon. gentleman to bring down such a statement before he asks us to take another stage with this measure.

Mr. POPE (Compton). It occurs to me that the hon. gentleman has not made out much of a case. I say a doubt was expressed. The Deputy Minister of Justice said that he did not understand this as I understood it.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps it was only a clerk in the office.

Mr. POPE. No; it was the Deputy Minister of Justice, who was appointed by the hon. gentleman himself. I believe, if there was such a doubt about the matter, that it ought to be set right; and I thought if that gentleman, who was the deputy of the hon. gentleman, and approved by him, could not throw light upon it, people who had not the mental calibre of the hon. gentleman, might be excused for not understanding it. That is the reason I ask for that change. The hon. gentleman has not shown one single reason why it should not be changed.

Mr. BLAKE. I am not objecting to the change, but the change does not justify the other part of the Bill.

Mr. POPE. As to the 18th clause, to which the hon. gentleman objects in toto, what is its effect? It is to prevent delay and hindrance in work by making the law more clear, so the Commissioner will have no difficulty in arriving at a decision, and not be obliged to refer so often to the Department of Justice. The following is a list of applications:—

Name of Patentee.	Title.	Reasons for Refusal.
L. Nightingale, Windsor	Spring Bed Bottom	Balance of fee only, received from New York, Dec 3, 1874 Patent expired Nov. 25, 1874.
Wm Fraser, Glenwilliams, Ont.	Hay Elevator and Conveyor	Original Patent called for Dec 17, 874, but not sent in until Jan. 8, 1876.
Wm Brown, Easton's Corners, Ont	Gate Hanger	Petition and original Patent asked for Dec. 31, 1874, only received Jan. 27, 1875.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). I have heard, for the first time, the complaint made by my colleague, that on reference to the department these matters were not properly attended to. I regret I did not hear the complaint before, and without saying a word as to the competency of either the head of the department or the subordinates, I shall certainly enquire whether the subordinates of my hon. friend have correctly informed him in stating that the patents were either sent or, when sent, were neglected. It appears to me the whole thing is in a nutshell. The Bill of my hon. friend is to relieve persons who have omitted in time, under the law, to apply for a renewal of their patents. It is an appeal to the justice of the House to enable my hon. friend to remedy the grievances of which these people justly complain. It does not appear to me, therefore, to be entirely-irrespective of the other point raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition, as to whether the ambiguity in the Act was of such a character as to require amendment. That appears to me to be only a subordinate part of the general object which my hon. friend has in view. The main object is to give relief to the persons named in the list, who shall make out a case that will entitle them to it. Whether there be any ambiguity or not in the clause referred to by my hon. friend, it is sufficiently plain to bear a reasonable construction, and induce parties who desire a renewal of patents to exercise a little caution by keeping within the doubtful side of ambiguity, by making the application in time to secure a renewal. But that is no reason why, on the ground taken by my hon. friend opposite, the relief sought for should not be given. When we go into Committee, I fancy that the clause that has come down from the Senate, and which, I understand, was here altered in its phraseology somewhat, will have to be made clear itself; the question as to the necessity for dealing with such ambiguity in the original Act would also be dealt with. As to the last clause, striking out section 18, which requires a return of the Department of the Minister of Justice, I take it for granted that my hon. friend, when making the observation he did, that so far as the technical character of the invention was concerned, and its aptitude for the purpose for which it was proposed to obtain a patent, it could not be dealt with in that department, said what is manifest to everybody. All that could be done there, even by a competent clerk—and I am glad to see that many are competent even in so very unprofessional a matter—would be to see whether the requirements of the Act had been complied with. I think it would have been a graceful act on the part of my hon. friend if, instead of reflecting on the department of which I have the honor to be the head, he had said his own people were so competent to discharge their duties that he had found it was not necessary to ask their advice. It would have been kindly, so far as the gentlemen in my department are concerned, to have put it on that ground. I dare say, on the other ground, there is a good deal in what he says. A competent Commissioner of Patents ought to be able to determine whether applications had come in at the proper time, and the provisions of the Statute had been carefully and literally complied with. I dare say, if competent to decide the main questions, he would be competent to decide as to details of that character, in which case it would undoubtedly be a waste of time to remit them to the Department of Justice for consideration. The important question only might then be submitted to the department—as to whether the application was valid and ought to be granted.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). As I understand the statement of the Minister of Justice, this Bill has been submitted to the House in consequence of applications made to his department by persons who had neglected to do what the law required, in order to secure the continuance of the privilege granted under it; and that he submits it simply with the view of ascertaining the opinion of the House on the subject. I very much regret it has been submitted at all. I have listened to the statements of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Minister of Justice, but I confess I see no reason why this Parliament should be called on to interfere for the purpose of remedying an injury or loss which has occurred to people on account of their own neglect of their own interests. The Patent Law gives persons who take out patents very great privileges. They have exclusive rights to those patents for fifteen years after their obtainment. They may take them, at first, for five years, as a mere experiment; after which they can renew them up to periods of ten or fifteen years. It does seem, then, that when a privilege, to a certain extent exceptional, is given parties, they ought to have sufficient interest in it to look to the law and observe its requirements, if they want an extension of such privilege. It seems to me that this Bill, if passed, may act very injuriously in some quarters. I understand the first clause—and not being a lawyer, I speak with deference—runs to this effect: any person who should have made an application, within ten days of the time of that Act, and any time within a year afterwards, the Minister of Agriculture may, if he thinks proper, grant the renewal sought. As I understand it that, after all, will apply to all cases where patents have lapsed up to that time, I quite understand the position as to all cases where applications may be made within the ten days.

Mr. BLAKE. It includes all cases in which not more than one year has elapsed.

Mr. WHITE. Then, as I understand it, the law will be only retroactive for one year from the present. But, during that time, other interests may have sprung up in connection with this matter. Other persons may have undertaken the manufacture of the article the moment the patent expired, as the law would permit. I am aware there is a clause contemplating that such action has really taken place; because the third clause declares that nothing in the Act shall interfere with the right of such persons as to the specific articles they have manufactured during that time. As I understand that clause, it will operate in this way: a patent for a churn or washing-machine expires, and a person undertakes to manufacture it. At the end of a year, the measure gives the patentee a renewal of the patent. As to the specific articles manufactured during that year, the owner would be permitted to sell or use them; but after that he could manufacture them no longer. So that in reality he may have made all his arrangements for their manufacture, and have incurred serious expenditure, yet under the law, and in consequence of the lapse of the patent, and when this Bill has passed, he will find that all that money and labor is lost, and that his interests have not been considered, for the benefit of a person who thought so little of his own interests as not to have considered it worth while to apply for a renewal of his patent before the time expired. I am aware that this Parliament has given special relief under special Private Bills, in relation to patents expired. If there should be any case of that kind, it does seem to me—if the matter is of sufficient interest to justify the Legislature in granting special relief in the interest of the patentee—it ought to be sufficient interest to him to induce him to come before it with a petition and ask for a Private Bill, to give him the privilege he has unfortunately lost by his own neglect. It seems to me a case in which private and not public legislation should take place. I sincerely hope this Bill will not pass.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I concur in a great deal that has fallen from the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) with reference to the inadvisability of extending those patents. The Patent Law, to a certain extent, is an obnoxious one, because it creates a monopoly such as is not altogether beneficial. At the same time it is very desirable we should give encouragement to people who do invent good and useful machinery, and make other useful discoveries. Now, I submit that, if we are to have a change at all, it ought to be more extensive than is proposed in the first clause of this Bill. It proposes to deal only with such cases as have come before the Commissioner of Patents, and these are cases "in which not more than a year has elapsed since the expiration of a patent, and application to renew the same has been made to the Commissioner of Patents within ten days of such expiration." If that section passes in its present shape it will do a very great wrong; it will be a piece of special legislation for those particular individuals who have not been sufficiently careful in looking after their own interests. I think that the first sentence of the clause should be amended so as to read: "In all cases in which not more than a year has elapsed since the expiration of a patent, and application to renew the same has been made to the Commissioner of Patents within ten days after the passing of this Act." If the first clause is to pass at all, I think that would be a reasonable amendment; and I certainly do not think it would be fair to legislate in favor of those patentees who have made application for renewals under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Minister. With reference to the argument of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), I certainly would be very loth in expressing an opinion different from his own on a legal question, but I cannot agree with the argument he has made use of with reference to the phrase which reads, "at or before the expiration." I submit, in the first place, that the language in the clause is very ambiguous, because, if you can make application before the expiration—that is, at any time before five years have elapsed—that means the application can be made up to the last minute of the day on which the time expires—then what is the use of using the word "at," unless it is to be construed to mean "after." I submit it must therefore mean, and should read "after the expiration." I can therefore quite understand the Deputy Minister coming to the conclusion that the clause was not as clear as it should be. On the other hand, I think it is probable that if a legal decision were to be asked, the hon. member for West Durham would be held to be correct in his view as to the real intent and meaning of the Statute. But I think that in matters of this kind there should be no ambiguity and that the meaning of the law should be so clear that he who cannot may read. This very afternoon I received a letter from a firm of gentlemen in Hamilton, saying that by an oversight their patent had expired on the 8th of this month, and asking if the patent could not be extended. According to the law as it now stands, this cannot be done.

Mr. BLAKE. They had better put in an application immediately.

Mr. ROBERTSON. An application would be of no use until the clause is amended.

Mr. BLAKE. Certainly it would. Eight and seven make fifteen.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But that does not bring it within the provision of the first section: It says "in all cases in which not more than a year has elapsed."

Mr. BLAKE. "Not more than a year." It need not be a whole year.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The clause proceeds "not more than a year has elapsed since the expiration of a patent, and application to renew the same has been made to the Commissioner of Patents within ten days of such expiration."

Mr. BLAKE. That is within ten days after the expiration. Any time before the 18th your case will come within the clause, so you had better telegraph them.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have telegraphed them, but I do not think it will do any good, because, as I read the clause, it refers to those which have really expired and applications have been made within ten days before the expiration of the patent.

Mr. BLAKE. The hon. gentleman knows that the Bill will not be assented to to-day, and will not be assented to before his application is in.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But it does not apply to the cases in which the time has not already expired and application has not been made. That is the view I take of the matter, but I shall be glad to know that I am wrong. The clause should be amended as I have suggested by striking out the word "of," and inserting "after."

Mr. JONES. I do not think that this Patent Act should be amended so often, for it is quite ambiguous enough at present. The legal gentlemen on both sides of the House are unable to agree upon its meaning; in fact, it is so ambiguous that unless a man is a lawyer, or a patent agent, or something of that kind, it is only with the greatest difficulty that he can get a patent through the department. If the law is to be amended, it should be so simplified that a layman could understand it, and could get a patent to issue without being obliged to pay large fees to patent agents and other intermediaries. I notice that this Bill as sent down from the Senate is somewhat different from the measure as at first introduced in the original Bill. It was provided that no patent should be revived at any date subsequent to the 1st of January, 1883, but according to the amended Bill no patent shall be revived after the 31st of October, in the present year. Then, I notice that the schedule to the original Bill, showing the date of expiration of twenty-two patents, if they were revived—the dates running up to 1890—has been omitted, and as it would have been of some service, I cannot understand why it was struck out. As I understand from the arguments made use of in this debate, if an application is made within the prescribed period, the patent is revived of necessity, and not at the mere option of the Government. I think that it is not advisable to have a wholesale renewal of all these patents without knowing something about them. If people who have patents allow them to expire by an oversight, they should come to this House and ask for a renewal by a special Act. That is the only way I think it should be done, because if we pass a wholesale Act like this, it may be very injurious to many individuals who are working closely upon some of these patents, and who, if the Bill is passed, will be precluded from working under them any longer. I, therefore, think the Bill should not be passed, but if through carelessness the time has been allowed to expire, if the patents are worth anything they are worth the trouble of coming to this House and asking special legislation for the extension of the time.

Mr. McCUAIG. The objection my hon. friend refers to is overcome by clause a, which reads:

"In all cases in which not more than a year has elapsed since the expiration of a patent, and application to renew the same has been made to the Commissioner of Patents within ten days of such expiration, the Commissioner may, in his discretion, and after such hearing of conflicting interest (if any, as he may deem expedient, revive the expired patent and continue the same for the period for which, if application has been made in time, it might have been extended under the Patent Act of 1872, but no such patent shall be revived after the thirty-first of October in the present year."

Now it so happens that I am familiar with a case where an application was sent with the money to a member of this House three or four days previous to the expiration of the patent, and by the neglect of the member it was not taken over to the office until a few days after expiry, and the Minister refused to renew it. I certainly think this was a case where the owner of the patent was entitled to some further consideration. I think this Bill is very important and ought to be accepted. It is all very well for the member for Leeds (Mr. Jones) who is a manufacturer and benefits by these patents, to take the course he does, but it is a very hard case for a poor man who makes a discovery in mechanism to lose a small patent of this kind by oversight, or by ignorance, and who has to pay $200 or $400 to get it renewed. I may say that in the case I referred to the money was sent to myself, together with the application, but not being familiar with the rules of the department, I, unfortunately, allowed it to lay in my desk two days too late, and when I went to the Patent Office the Minister told me the law would not permit him to receive it.

Mr. BOULTBEE, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 52) to amend the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, said: In proposing this measure to the House I shall endeavor to deal with it in a reasonable and argumentative spirit. As far as I can discover there seems to be a great deal of feeling about the Bill, at least I should so judge from the numerous anonymous letters I have received on the subject, threatening me with various pains and penalties if I proceeded with the Bill. But the letters being anonymous I have not paid any attention to them, and I shall venture to brave the pains and penalties which may be imposed upon me. In proposing this amendment, the position I take is not in any way against the temperance cause, but in its favor. The object of this Bill is merely to make it necessary, before the Scott Act shall go into effect, that its principles shall have been affirmed by a full majority of all those who have a right to vote in the district in which it is submitted, and I conceive that the principle of the Bill is one which, when reflected upon fully, will be seen to be in no way against the cause of temperance, but strongly in its favor; because I do not know anything—at least, in the Province of Ontario, from which I come—which is doing so much harm to the cause of temperance as the attempts which are being made to force this prohibitory legislation on the people. These attempts distract the attention of the people from the legitimate means of dealing with this evil, and are intended to substitute for them a process of legislation which fails in every instance to effect the object desired. In no case that I am aware of—and I have paid a good deal of attention to this matter—has this prohibitory legislation been successful, either in Canada or in any other country; in fact, it seems to bring the cause of temperance into disrepute; because, whenever you attempt to enforce a law which does not commend itself to public opinion, but which is felt to be tyrannical and unjust, it not only excites people to break the law, but tempts them to break it, merely for the sake of asserting their independence. I have read the opinions of some of our leading thinkers and jurists who have given much consideration to this question, and the weight of all authority seems to be against all attempts to coerce people by prohibitory legislation. Among those who are in favor of this prohibitory legislation, we do not so much find the most earnest and valuable advocates of temperance, but rather busybodies who wish to gain some sort of notoriety and to bring themselves before the people, and politicians who have not been very successful in a legitimate way, and who have become as they say, "played out." In the city of Hamilton, and throughout several Ontario counties, this prohibitory law is being at the present moment agitated, chiefly by one of these played-out politicians, who is endeavoring by this means to escape from that obscurity into which he has been relegated by the common sense of the people. But from such a description, I wish specially to except the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Longley), one of the strongest and most ardent supporters of a prohibitory law in the House; but he has got his brain so soaked with it that all the cavities are filled up, to the exclusion of every sense of justice in regard to this question, and he has become very tyrannical in his way of dealing with his fellowmen. He does not seem to consider that in this case he is seeking to enforce a law which is ruinous to many men, destroying their property, their income and their means of living, without any compensation. He and gentlemen like him come and say to me in private conversation: "Why do you treat temperance men exceptionally? Why will you subject them to a law which you do not apply to other people?" I say that argument does not stand on fact, because in a Statute of the Province of Ontario, with regard to a matter not nearly so important as this, the very principle contained in this Bill has been affirmed, namely, with regard to bonuses in aid of railways or other undertakings. If it is necessary that there should be a clear majority of all the ratepayers entitled to vote, in order to carry a bonus by-law, surely it is necessary that there should be a clear majority to carry a measure like this, which restricts the liberties of the people, and is a sumptuary law of an exceedingly harsh character. Sumptuary laws have been tried in other countries in a way which we should think absurd. For instance, in Russia, under a pure despotism, a ukase was issued some years ago, ordering that men should wear their beards and hair in a particular fashion. Even in Russia it was found very difficult to enforce that trivial law, because it was regarded as interfering with the personal liberties of the people.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. BOULTBEE. When the House rose, I was trying to establish the position, not only that by this Act I did not seek to apply any exceptional law to people in favor of the Scott Act, but also the principle that a majority of those entitled to vote should pass upon such a law before it should come into operation, and in support of this I showed that the Act, as passed in the Province of Ontario with regard to bonuses, established that principle. I was going on to show that even if this principle were not admitted, the Scott Act is in itself of such an exceptional character that it should have exceptional provisions attached to it for guarding the people and the country, its revenues, and its general status, against the effects of that Act which are so prejudicial in their character. I think I shall be able to demonstrate in a way that cannot be answered, that the position I take is a correct one. All the scientists, all the great thinkers, all the men whose opinions are worth anything, agree that any such law or of a cognate character, whose object is to restrict the liberties of the people, must have public sentiment in its favor before it can, by any means, have effect; and as it is an affirmative proposition of the temperance people that the public sentiment is in favor of such a law, it devolves on them to show that in support of their view, they have a majority of all those who are going to be affected by the law. If this is not the case, no Act of a like character can, by any possibility, have any effect. I gave some illustrations of the effect in other countries of endeavors to pass sumptuary laws—laws interfering with personal liberty; and I demonstrated that none of those laws, even in despotic countries, have ever resulted in a thorough actual and practical working. The reasons in favor of the amendment, which I bring in this Bill to effect, may be briefly summarized. Any Act seeking to enforce a sumptuary law, to interfere with the liberty of the subject, should have at any rate a full majority of the people in its favor before it takes effect. Another strong reason is, that it is a law exceedingly harsh in its provisions. What are these gentlemen, who are in favor of the Scott Act, seeking to do? Are they not trying to promote some very exceptional legislation? Are they not seeking to outrage every principle of fairness? Are they not seeking to break the Divine law: "Do unto others as you would be done by?" Is there any other instance in the working out of our constitutional system where men are sought to be injured, their property rendered valueless, themselves deprived of the means of making a living; is there any other instance except in the working out of this Scott Act where such injuries are sought to be inflicted on men entitled to equal rights with ourselves, without compensation being made to them? The advocates of the Scott Act say those men are engaged in such a traffic that they have no rights as other men have, it is a meritorious thing to legislate them into ruin and make them no compensation. In the history of the laws given effect to under our system of civilization, as long as the British Constitution endured there is nothing so harsh, severe, destructive of every idea of British honor, fair play and justice as this attempt to work this Scott Act. Yet these gentlemen say they do not like exceptional legislation. The position I take is this, while I am as much in favor as any man of reasonable temperance, not only in eating and drinking, but in speaking of others, in dealing with other men, in fact, in every condition of the affairs of this life, I do not believe this Scott Act will effect what its promoters say it will. I believe it to have proved a failure in every instance in which it has been tried. There is nothing throughout the length and breadth of the country that is bringing so much disgrace on the temperance cause as this Scott Act. I affirm the principle that before an Act of this character can be given effect to, it must have the support of the majority of those who have a right to vote. This affirmation will be re-echoed in the minds of the people from one end of the Dominion to the other. You cannot, by a small majority, force a law like this down the throats of the people and have it respected. I ask these advocates of the Scott Act to cast their eyes over the country and see what has been the result wherever it has been given effect to. Has it been favorable to the temperance cause. It has been a curse to the temperance cause, and very many of those whom we find crusading the country on every hand, trying to give effect to this most iniquitous Act are not the leaders and makers of public opinion. On the contrary, many of them are men who make a living out of temperance. They are temperance lecturers, men very largely of weak brains and infirm purpose who, being unable to restrain their own appetites except through the most rigid abstinence, look upon themselves, because they have taken the pledge, as extraordinary apostles, as surrounded with a sort of a halo, and entitled to lecture other men who are able to restrain their appetites, to conduct properly the affairs of this world, and take care of their families. I repel indignantly the charge made against our country, that we are a nation so degraded as to require such a law as this to be enforced. I deny that the people of Canada are a nation of drunkards. In my few travels throughout the world—and I have been in other countries than this—I have seen no more sober, law-abiding people than the people of Canada. They do not require a law like this to keep them sober. There are hon. gentlemen who are opposed to me on this question, professed advocates of temperance, some of them are men whose opinions I much respect, though on this question they have become, from a long study of it, so impressed with the evils of intemperance—which every one deplores—that they are not able to deal with the matter in a fair spirit. But I think the preponderance of the temperance men in this House, men who have been consistent temperance men all their lives, are in favor of the proposition I now submit. I hope they will say something in this debate. I refer to the hon. member for West Montreal, to the hon. member for Cardwell, and the hon. member for Cornwall, the latter of whom I regret is not in his seat. All of them being consistent temperance men they are entitled to as much respect as the hon. member for Annapolis and the hon. member for West Middlesex. There are many consistent temperance men who have been working hard all their lives, who tell me that the Scott Act is not only not a benefit—an Act of no advantage to temperance—but is directly injurious to it; because it draws men away on all occasions from the proper exercise of the proper means to promote temperance. It is doing more than that—it is leading people to break the laws, and bringing temperance into disrepute when it is seen that the Act is of no effect, but promotive, instead of temperance, of intoxication. What are the inevitable results of the passing of this prohibitory law in one of our counties? The legitimate business of properly conducted hotels is destroyed, because their owners are subjected to such supervision that they cannot, if they even wished, be able to carry on their affairs and sell contrary to the law. What is the result? The consumption of our wholesome and nutritious Canadian ales and wines falls into disuse to an enormous degree, and ardent spirits, which may be conveyed in a much smaller bulk, and which are often manufactured out of the most deleterious materials, are used in their stead—not by respectable hotel keepers, but by the vilest of the vile, in such low haunts as best conceal their business; and so the Dunkin Act, as this one may be called still, instead of promoting temperance, directly militates against it wherever it is adopted. What has been the consequence? Speaking only from memory, I do not think the Act has ever been passed in any place in Ontario without being afterwards repealed immediately. That circumstance ought to silence all opposition to my Bill. I have a return from the Local Government of the places in which it was carried in Ontario. I see in the very large County of Bruce it was carried by but 3,700 votes, while 12,000 stand on the list. In Brant 2,000 voted for it out of 7,000 voters. In Essex 225 voted for it, and 102 against it, in one municipality. In Haldimand 1,200 voted for it out of a total vote of nearly 6,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was defeated in Haldimand.

Mr. BOULTBEE. It was. My list is dated some time back, and, therefore, is not a full one, but it shows what would be the fate of the Scott Act if tried elsewhere. Any sensible and reasonable man who fairly wants to promote temperance, but set to worry and persecute his neighbors, or to destroy our Canadian ale and wine trade, and promote the sale of the vilest liquors that can be used to ruin the health of mankind, has only to read this return of the counties in which the Act has been adopted and repealed in order to willingly give his support to this Bill. In the County of Brant, it was carried by a vote of 2,000 against 1,800; but repealed by a vote of 958, only 141 voting against it. What was the reason of that? How is it that this Act to promote temperance and do so much good, that was going to increase sobriety and make all men temperate, promote the happiness of many homes and abolish drunkenness, was, only a short time after its enactment, so unpopular that only 141 persons in that county voted to retain it? Because they found in that county, as I and most other public men in Canada have noticed, under similar circumstances, that a worse condition of affairs as to drunkenness succeeded the adoption of the Act. I do not mean there was a tremendous change for the worse, but that drunkenness increased to a much greater extent than before the passage of the Act. Well, in the County of Grey it was tried and repealed also. It is a large county of 13,000 votes, only 4,000 of whom voted for the law. In that great county much trouble and expense was incurred and much turmoil excited, much business was destroyed and property rendered worthless when steps were taken to repeal the law. Well, 1,388 voted for its repeal and only 161 for its retention. I do not know, then, how any man of common sense, common judgment and common honesty would desire to perpetuate a law attended with such results. I have not the return of the town of Peterborough when the law was enacted, but I have the return for the time at which it was repealed. There seems to have been a consensus of opinion that the law should be repealed, because the vote on the occasion was very small, only 177 being cast on both sides—172 for and only five against the repeal. And yet some hon. gentlemen say we ought to try the Act further, and submit it in all counties where it has not been presented. It seems to me that if it is to be submitted—but I think the common sense of the community has condemned it as useless—surely the position I take by this Bill is the correct one—that before such an obnoxious law is passed on the people, at least the public sentiment in its favor should be marked by a majority of the electors voting for it. I have said that its results include the ruin of the respectable hotels and the development of the illicit drinking of the worst liquors and the increase of intemperance on all sides. But very largely has been increasing in this country every year, the use of our wholesome ales, beers, and Canadian wines. Directly you pass this Act, and do away with the legitimate hotels, you do away with those wines and ales, because they are too bulky to be used in that illicit manner, and at once you force upon the people the larger consumption of liquors compounded of the vilest materials, from which a profit is illicitly made. This Act encourages evasions and defiance of the law, and an increase of perjury; and it is rather remarkable that wherever you attempt to enforce a law not in accord with the public sentiment, and which does not gain their respect, the breaking of that law does not seem to be attended with the disgrace connected with the infraction of more proper enactments. All men in the House acquainted with the business of the country, all the lawyers and magistrates will bear me out in my assertion that an enormous amount of perjury has been developed in the attempt to enforce this prohibitory law. But the unfortunate result of the breaking of the law and the encouragement of perjury in one particular, is, that a man having once broken the law in one respect becomes more careless about breaking it in others, and a man who sees perjury committed or a case sworn through, as is too frequently the case in these prosecutions, is led to think that he could promote his own ends and accomplish other objects by means of perjury and evasion of the law.

Mr. BOULTREE,

Another result is, that after a municipality has been put to the expense of having this Act submitted, after the loss of revenues which it sustains from its operation in every place where such legislation has been tried, the result has been to intensify the evil of intemperance. The amendment which I propose only says that if you are determined to carry the Act which has somehow or other got on the Statute-book, you must at least be able to show that public opinion is unmistakably in its favor. It may be said that the present test in that particular is a fair one, but experience goes to show that people do not care much for the interests of others in matters of this kind. The hotel keepers, brewers, and other people of that class who have their property and means of living taken away from them, are numerically a small class, and while those who are in favor of the Act are active in their campaigns; while they throw every obstruction in the way of those who would feel disposed to record their opinion against the Act; while the temperance lecturers and other gentlemen who put themselves on a high pedestal of morality, which will perhaps cover other matters, are found at every polling place pouring contumely and reproach upon those who do not think as they do, I say that under these circumstances it is difficult to secure a fair record of public opinion. I have seen ministers of the gospel and others, who should have known better, standing at the polls and defying people to vote against the Act, and throwing out the penalty of holding them up to public opprobrium. Men do not like to expose themselves to that sort of contumely; they do not like to be styled "Children of the Devil fighting in the army of Satan," when they venture to record their opinion of what is right, and the result is that a fair record of the opinions of those opposed to such legislation is difficult to obtain. We have not had this sort of legislation attempted in this country for a very long time. It is a thing of recent date. We have been pursuing the cause of temperance according to the old-fashioned way—by trying to manufacture public opinion—by the better class of our men exemplifying temperance, and their efforts have been wonderfully successful, for there is no more sober or temperate class of people anywhere than those of Canada. But we have had an example of the effects of prohibitory legislation in some of the neighboring States, and especially in the State of Maine, where it has been in force for twenty-seven or thirty years, and which has given a name to this prohibitory liquor law. If we may judge by the abnormal condition of affairs which it has produced in that State, we must say that its results have been most disastrous. The evidence of their own people is that during the twenty-seven years of the operation of the prohibitory law in that State, the people have sensibly deteriorated; crime has increased; drunkenness has increased, divorce has increased to a most alarming degree, a degree almost amounting to the destruction of the domestic ties—and these evils are so marked that they have elicited observations from their public men and have been commented upon by the Judges of the State. The New England intellect at present, keen though it be, is not an intellect which is working to the advantage of the world; though keen and subtle it is a gnarled twisted intellect, it is in those States that "isms" have their growth, that disbeliefs are prevalent, that the foundations of religion are sapped and broken, that the domestic ties are not respected, that murder and all the more violent crimes is on the increase. If we are to take them as the results of a prohibition law then, God forbid that we should imitate such legislation in this country. I do not speak without the book in making these remarks. I have in my hands a copy of the Hamilton Spectator of February 11th, in which is a report by Judge Goddard, of Portland. He says that within twenty or thirty years murder has increased 600 per cent. in that State; manslaughter, 400 per cent; murderous assaults, something like 300 per cent. He says that Maine seems to head the calendar in the North-East for an increase in criminal offences; and he concludes by saying that a community where crime, immorality and suicide are rapidly increasing is surely verging towards barbarism. He says that in Portland there are 130 rum shops, that intoxication is rife there, that there is more drinking than ever before, and that this prohibitory legislation has utterly failed to carry out the intention of its promoters. Is it unfair to assume that if we pursue the same course here we shall have the same result? I think we may fairly assume, that what little we have seen of the working of prohibitory legislation amongst us, shows how very rapidly we may arrive at the unfortunate state of things that prevails in Maine. I shall read a short extract or two from one of the most influential organs of public opinion in this country. The article states so strongly and so succinctly the evil of this legislation, that I felt when I read it that I should do better to read it to this House instead of making any remarks of my own, because it states the case so much better than I can do it. It says:

"An evil of this kind of legislation is that the evading of it is hardly ever felt to be a moral offence; hence it can never be really enforced, and the convictions can only be obtained by means of personation, lying and dirty devices. The litigation caused by it is exceedingly costly, and it familiarizes the people with perjury, mendacity and transgression of the law. . . . But, say the gentlemen of the Alliance, by these laws we make drinking disreputable, and drive it out of sight. Drunkenness is indeed disreputable; but it is our growing good sense, the advancing civilization, and the power of Christianity, not prohibitory legislation, which have made it so. And if you drive drinking into secret places, after all, have you gained very much? It is like sweeping a litter under the table and boasting that you have cleaned the room. . . . The Scott Act is financially extravagant, morally debasing, and totally unworkable, and will, we trust, in its present shape at least be rejected by the good sense of the people of Canada as likely rather to hinder than to help the cause of temperance."

Well, Sir, these are remarks that I think cannot be contradicted. Then, again, with regard to Portland, it says:

"The advocates of prohibition point to poverty, disease, lunacy and crime, and claim that the passage of prohibitory laws will diminish if not extinguish them. The simple and complete answer to this is—that as a matter of experience such legislation has always increased them. In the State of Maine prohibition has been the law for over twenty-five years, and the statistics show a steady growth in the number of paupers, lunatics and drunkards. Portland, before the passage of the prohibitory law, with a population of 24,000, averaged 300 drunkards a year; in 1876, with a population of 35,000, the number of drunkards was 1,640."

I may say with regard to the city in which I live, Toronto, the proportion of drunkards to the population is only one-half as great as it is in Portland. Then again:

"Another main argument of the Prohibitionists is, that if you forbid the use of alcoholic liquors you so enrich the community that direct taxes more than recoup the loss to the excise. Facts show indisputably that under prohibition the consumption of ardent spirits is vastly increased, as are pauperism and lunacy. Under the Dunkin Act the municipalities lost their revenue from licences, and got absolutely nothing in return, nay, had to pay the saintly whiskey detectives, who traded their wholly fictitious illnesses and fatigue on the unsuspecting benevolence of the deluded publican. What sane politicians would consent to abandon the excise revenues, which commend themselves heartily to public sentiment, for a supposed increase in the national wealth which is contradicted by all experience? We wish to guard ourselves here from misapprehension. We admit heartily that if our people did not use alcoholic liquors they would grow richer; our contention is that successful prohibition is impossible, and the unsuccessful attempt deprives the Government of revenue, fosters immorality, protects adulteration, and benefits no one but the wily politician, who makes it a tool to carve out his own slice from the national pudding."

Then here are a few words which I commend to those gentlemen who seek to make a nation temperate by means of this prohibitory law. Let them heed these words because they are pregnant with meaning:

"The action of moral and spiritual remedies is undoubtedly slow, because they depend for their efficiency on the co-operation of the human will. Christianity, after nearly nineteen centuries, has much of its work yet to do, but that is no impeachment of its truth and ultimate efficacy. The legitimate work of temperance is tedious perhaps, in its operation, but that is no excuse for drastic remedies which will endanger the life of a patient. In spite of the pessimists the world is advancing, and our race is growing in self-restraint, in manliness and nobility of character. We counsel the friends of temperance to patience and perseverance; and it is because we desire to see their efforts directed into a channel which will lead to success, because we heartily sympathize with their object, that we denounce such legislation as the Scott Act, on the ground that it is immoral, unworkable, mischievous where enforced, and an enemy to the best interests of society."

I expected to be asked this question, and I may say here that the Toronto Mail is the most influential organ of public opinion in the Dominion of Canada, at least in the Province of Ontario. It has a circulation of 70,000. It is conducted on business principles, and its object is to echo the honest sentiment of the people; that it has done so in politics we have ample evidence. It sounded the tocsin of the National Policy, and echoed the people's wish there. It was not far astray on the great scheme we have just carried through Parliament. But then, it may be said, these are political matters on which the paper represented the opinions of a party. But here is a matter in the interests of society, and the common well being of the country, and its managers would be fools if they ran counter to public opinion. I believe that paper echoes public sentiment as correctly on this matter as it did in the political issues to which I have referred.

Mr. ROSS. The Mail elected the Mayor of Toronto in the last municipal election.

Mr. BOULTBEE. If you cannot show anything against the influence of the Mail better than the election of the Mayor in Toronto, I think the Mail will be able to stand alone and run yet. The Mail is sneered at because it is a political organ, but I do not see why a newspaper which takes a sound stand on political matters may not take a sound stand on matters other than political. Here is an extract from one of the first living thinkers in this country or in Great Britain—I refer to Goldwin Smith. I suppose there is no publicist in either country whose writings have so much influence on the public mind. He says:

"We come back always to the same thing. Sumptuary legislation cannot be enforced in a free community. The Czar Peter might have compelled his subjects to give up brandy as he compelled them to cut off their beards. He needed no aid from public sentiment to give effect to his ukase. But in a free community your law without public sentiment is a dead letter. Prohibitionists may be ready to call upon the Government for vigorous measures, but not one in ten of them would himself help the police in interfering with the private habits of his neighbors. Mere self-indulgence, however injurious to the man himself, is not an offence against the State, and people in general cannot be induced to treat it if it were. Some persons hold tobacco to be a slow poison; others hold meat to be the same, as, if used in the excessive quantities in which many people use it, undoubtedly it is. Suppose the anti-tobaccoists or the vegetarians to be everywhere in a majority, will it be their duty to close by law the shops of the tobaccoists and butchers? If we want to change the diet or the habits of freemen, we must do it by argument and example. The end will not be so quickly attained as it would be by the ukase of the despot, but the work will be the more genuine, more lasting, and more truly moral."

In the Bystander and other works of the same writer, and I dare say hon. gentlemen have read them, Mr. Goldwin Smith takes the same view I have taken to-night, in fact I have taken my views largely from him. I take another article written by a public man of considerable note in this country, and published in Belford's Magazine of 1876, and from that article I will read the following short extract:—

"The Prohibitory Liquor Law thoroughly enforced would, I have never doubted, contribute more to the wealth of the State and the welfare of society than all the other of our Statutes put together. But if this law be enacted before public sentiment is prepared to enforce it, it must divert the attention of temperance men from the vigorous and individual employment of those moral influences which alone can give development and power to public sentiment. I affirm that its influence in New England has been disastrous up to this time."

That is taken from a work entitled "Fifty Years History of the Temperance Cause," by Mr. Stebbins. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have read quotations from the Mail, from Mr. Goldwin Smith, and from a distinguished publicist, but they are not alone. We look around in every rank of society where the great thinkers are, where we find men moulding public opinion, and they are taking this view. I may refer to another gentleman, and I introduce his name with some hesitancy, because I do not think men of his position like their names to be introduced into parliamentary debate, but he made the statement publicly. I refer to the Rev. D. J. Macdonnell, of Toronto, who expressed his view as being opposed to a prohibitory law as an aid to enforcing temperance. He is a consistent man, who, by his earnest piety and the beauty of his life, is an ornament, not only to his church, to the city where he resides, but to the country, and his view is against these men; yet he is an earnest man, working and devoting his whole life for the good of his kind, a simple, earnest, straightforward Christian, whom all must admire if they cannot agree with him. Far eastward there is a gentleman, some of whose words I read not long since, Rev. Dr. McRae, who takes similar ground. I have already read, to the House an extract from the Mail, the best and most influential exponent of public opinion in Ontario. I do not think I am far astray in saying that the most influential organ in the Province of Quebec, if you judge it by the test of the number of its subscribers, is the Montreal Gazette, the editor and proprietor of which is a member of this House, and is a consistent temperance man, doing as much and perhaps far more for the promotion of the temperance cause than the hon. members for Annapolis and West Middlesex put together; for while those hon. members may be doing their best according to their lights, yet the influence of the hon. member for Cardwell is wider and larger, and the reasons I have advanced in favor of the passage of the amendment I propose to the Scott Act have been largely taken from arguments adduced by the Montreal Gazette. I think I have, perhaps, detained the House longer than I should have done, but I feel rather warmly on this question, being somewhat of an earnest man when I take up anything and desiring to handle it in the best way I can. It does seem a remarkable thing to find a Government calling itself a paternal Government, a Government that brings down its Budget, with large sums to be derived from revenue, and partly derived from taxation on articles of drink—and properly so because, much more than articles of food, they are luxuries—I cannot understand why a Government which derives large revenues from the imposition of customs and excise duties on liquors should allow an Act to remain on the Statute-book which separates the dealers in those commodities from every other class, and renders them liable to the harsh and arbitrary will of men, fanatical in this respect, and not imbued with the principles of fair play and justice, and to be legislated out of their means of livelihood and rights, while, at the same time, the Government derives a large revenue from taxing them. It does not appear to be a fair thing that the Government should allow such an objectionable Act to remain on the Statute book; and the Government ought, and is bound to support such an amendment as I now propose, so that if such a harsh and arbitrary law—a law taking away men's property, and depriving them of the means of living—is to be put to the test, it should be passed with the sanction of a full majority of those in whose power it is to give it effect.

Mr. MILLS. Why not tax their industries, when you support others by protection?

Mr. BOULTBEE. The hon. member for Bothwell is a publicist and a metaphysician, and I am sometimes unable to comprehend him, and in the present case I cannot see the pertinency of his remark to the present discussion. Of course, it is owing to my stupidity in not being able always to comprehend his remarks. I dare say the hon. gentleman experiences some pricking of conscience for having assisted in the passing of the Scott Act, when, perhaps, he thought he was aiding the cause of temperance, while he failed to look sufficiently far to see the gross injustice to people whom, as Mr. BOULTBEE.

the member of a Government, he was bound to protect. Mr. Speaker, I have placed this matter before the House in as brief a form as possible, and all I hope is that as the debate rolls on, and my remarks will be answered, the House will not be troubled with long lectures on temperance which are not appropriate. No one can deplore the evils of intemperance more than I deplore them. The issue involved in the passage of this Bill, or its defeat, is this—is it desirable that a law like the Scott Act should have effect unless it is shown to have the approval of a full majority of those who are entitled to vote on it? That is the only question at issue. It is not a question of temperance. The question is whether granting that it is a law which it is well to try in order to see whether it will have beneficial results, is it desirable that this sumptuary law, affecting the privileges of the people, confiscating men's property, and restricting their liberty, should be carried into effect unless public sentiment is in its favor to such an extent that its advocates succeed in obtaining the support of a majority of those entitled to vote for its affirmation or rejection.

Mr. OGDEN. I feel it to be my duty to offer a few remarks on this important question now before the House. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) has made a very lengthy and laborious speech. He has evidently accomplished his purpose; he thinks he has performed his duties to his friends, but he has also accomplished this: if there are any hon. members who have been halting between two opinions, I think after listening to the speech of the hon. gentleman they will have become thoroughly convinced that his Bill must be voted down. I sympathize with him very much. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would like his Bill to be judged by the same tribunal which he wishes the temperance question to be judged by. Is he willing that his Bill shall not pass unless it receives the votes of a majority of the members of this House, whether present or absent? For my part I have the honor of representing a temperance constituency where not one drop of liquor is sold, unless it is sold in violation of the law, and that without the Scott Act being in force. I shall feel it my duty to sustain the law as it now stands, because I think it is nothing more than right that it should have a fair trial, and I beg to move in amendment:

That the Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex). I am exceedingly glad that my hon. friend has proposed that amendment. I had intended to move such an amendment myself, in the full confidence that it would meet with the approval of the majority of this House. I have listened with very great interest to my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Boulton), while he attempted to give reasons why his Bill should be sustained by the votes of the members of this House. I have, on a former occasion—last year, I think—opposed an amendment in similar terms to that contained in the Bill of the hon. member. I have on former occasions in this House, advocated what I believed to be those temperance principles which, when applied and sustained by law, would promote the well-being of this country; and in doing so, I thought I was allying myself with a body of respectable, influential and useful men. I had no hesitation in casting in whatever little influence I had with the temperance men of this country, without fear, that by so doing I would lower my position in society or materially destroy my own usefulness, and I was surprised to learn from the hon. member for East York that in allying myself with the temperance men I was allying myself with those who were “laboring to destroy their neighbors,” men who “outraged every law, human and divine,” men who were “besotted in brain,” men who were “intemperate,” men who were “working for hire,” men who “could not control their passions,” men “without common sense, common honesty, or common judgment” and “fanatics.” I have given you a few choice morsels from the hon. gentleman's speech, descriptive of the temperance men of the Dominion of Canada. I am ashamed of them. I have given you a few choice morsels descriptive of such men as the hon. Minister of Finance, leading bishops, archbishops, clergymen, doctors of divinity, judges, lawyers, and other distinguished men—such men as Vice-Chancellor Blake of Toronto, Judge Jones of Brant, Professor Wilson of Toronto, and Principal Dawson of Montreal—such names as Sir Wilfrid Lawson of England—all insignificant men without common sense or common honesty—and I find myself here to-night in that classification. Well, Sir, in spite of these associations, in spite of the depressing effect which you can well understand, falls upon me in defending the Temperance Act of 1878, I propose, nevertheless, to call your attention to some reasons why that Act should be maintained in its entirety. My hon. friend, in proposing an amendment to the Scott Act, is acting adversely to public opinion. Every principle contained in the Temperance Act of 1878 was supported by a very large majority in the old Parliament of Canada in 1864. That principle was accepted by the people of Canada, and was never reversed by them. True, its application was enlarged, better machinery was provided for rendering it effective, but the public opinion of the people of Canada is that the majority in our municipalities shall have the right for themselves to say whether or not they wish the sale of intoxicating liquors to be sanctioned among them. Nor was the Temperance Act of 1878 forced upon this Parliament hurriedly. The matter was well considered. The agitation which culminated in that Act began by the appointment of a Committee during the Session of 1873. Petitions were presented from time to time in favor of that Act. In 1874, I find, by the report of the Committee of that year, 132,465 individual signatures were appended to the petitions laid on the Table of this House. Besides these, petitions were presented from municipal bodies representing a population of 478,756, as well as from the presbytery of Manitoba, from the members of the New Brunswick Legislature, from the Synod of the Canadian Presbyterian Church, from the Young Men's Christian Association of the city of Fredericton, from the Baptist Conference of New Brunswick, from the professors and students of Knox College, Toronto, from the Brockville and Ottawa Railway Company, from the General Assembly of the Canada Presbyterian Church, from the Niagara Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and from the Ontario Legislative Assembly, over the signature of its Speaker. These were presented in 1874. They were renewed in 1875, showing that the public sentiment was ripening. I find in a report presented to the Senate, that petitions were received by the Senate bearing 349,294 signatures. Of these 302,012 were from Ontario, 140,308 from Quebec, 16,335 from New Brunswick, 13,622 from Nova Scotia, 3,174 from Prince Edward Island, 34 from British Columbia, and a petition was received from the Presbyterian Church, of the Province of Manitoba—so that every Province, in some form or other, called the attention of the Legislature to the necessity of some action being taken in regard to this question. Now, I hold that legislation secured after such a strong request, and after the careful attention of the Senate and House of Commons was given to the Act, is of such an important character that the House should hesitate before it unceremoniously destroyed the deliberate opinions of Parliament so expressed. Although the Temperance Act of 1878 is dated three years back, we can only be said to have had it for one year. It was only recognized to be within the limits of our Constitution during the winter of last year by the Supreme Court; yet my hon. friend from East York proposes now, although we have only had the Act enforced hardly for one year, although any evil that it might inflict upon the community has not yet been ascertained, to set aside the deliberate opinion of Parliament as expressed in the Session of 1878, by an amendment to the Act which, by emasculating all that is excellent in it, practically destroys it. He proposes to do this before we have had any opportunity of ascertaining whether the Act is inefficient or inoperative. My hon. friend will not be sustained in this course by public opinion. Under what pressure is he acting? Has he presented any petitions to this House in support of the course he has taken? Before the Scott Act was placed on the Statutes, I venture to say that nearly a majority of the people of this Dominion, in one form or another, petitioned for that legislation. The very fact that the Local Legislature of Ontario itself, by a unanimous vote, petitioned for prohibitory legislation, taken in conjunction with the other petitions, proved that it was asked by a majority of the people. What evidence has the House to lead them to believe that the arguments my hon. friend advances in favor of the destruction—I use the word advisedly—of the Temperance Act of 1878, are backed up by the public opinion of this country? Allow me to say further, that my hon. friend is exceedingly anxious that this Bill should pass, because he is afraid that in the present form a majority of the people would tyrannize over a minority. Constitutional government, as I understand it, is founded on the principle of government by majorities. If, however, the objections of my hon. friend are well founded, instead of proposing to have the Temperance Act of 1878 carried by a majority of names in the voters' lists, he should propose a repeal of the Act. If this Act is wrong, if it is an Act of spoliation, if it outrages public opinion, if it destroys the liberty of the people, he should propose either compensation for those whose property is destroyed, or the repeal of the Act. If the manner in which the Act is brought into force inflicts a wrong on any municipality, would his Bill make that wrong right, because under it, the wrong would be inflicted by a majority of the names on the voters' lists? This is his position. His argument is inconsequential. If he argued according to the logic of his own facts, he would have to waive the position he advocates and say to the House: "The Temperance Act of 1878 is wrong in principle; it does injustice to vested rights; it is, as are all sumptuary laws, an injustice, and will end in failure. I, therefore, propose its repeal." But instead of taking this logical position, he says that the Temperance Act passed by a majority would be wrong; but if passed by a majority of names on the voters' lists, the wrong becomes right, and all the evil consequences that flow from a sumptuary law, its spoliation and interference and vested rights, would be right, and the Temperance Act of 1878 become a blessing instead of a curse. I commend his amendment to his reconsideration, and trust, if he proposes to attack the Act, he will attack it on its merits and not by a side wind. His Bill involves a further injustice. It does not propose the Act shall be carried by a majority of all the voters entitled to vote, but it says: "If the majority of all the voters whose names are entered on the voters' list used at such a polling place are for the petition, the same shall be held to have been adopted, but not otherwise." He is introducing a new principle, and he justifies the introduction of that principle by the sixteenth section of 21 of the 4-43 Victoria, Province of Ontario. That section says: "To render valid a by-law of any municipality for granting bonuses in aid of a railway, or for promoting any manufactures, the assent shall be necessary of the majority of all the ratepayers, who are entitled to vote on the by-law." There is some fairness in that, and it is from that the hon. gentleman says he has copied his Bill. If my hon. friend had proposed that the Temperance Act of 1878 should not prevail unless sustained by a majority of those who were entitled to vote, we would have had something to govern us all; but he proposes the Temperance Act of 1878 shall not prevail unless sustained by a majority of all the names on the voters' lists. What does that mean? It means, in the first place, that the man who comes up and votes for the Temperance Act of 1878, under his Bill, if it passed, will have no more influence than a dead man in the village churchyard; in the second place, the man who is at his post of duty and votes for the Temperance Act of 1878, has no more influence than a man who may be in Tasmania; further, the man who may have his name entered on the voters' list five or ten times, as is frequently the case in Ontario, may vote once for the Act, and nine times against it, contrary to his own will. Is that the honest legislation we are going to get from my hon. friend? We are charged with being deficient in common sense. Is that a proof of common sense? We are charged with being deficient in common judgment. Is that a proof of the supreme wisdom of my hon. friend? Is it common honesty? If my hon. friend can point me a clause in the Temperance Act of 1878 that has the stamp of dishonesty so clearly on its face as that simple statement in his own little Bill has, I will abandon the Act altogether. I give him all the liberty he may want in the advocacy of his side of the question. Would it not be an outrage on common decency—I use the words of the hon. member who introduced the Bill—for Parliament to place on the Statute-book a Bill by which a living man would have no more weight than a dead man in the councils of his country—by which a man living in the Dominion, discharging his duty to his country and Queen, would have no more weight than a man wandering in a foreign land? Would it not be disgraceful to all common decency, not to say to all common sense, that a man should be compelled by a Statute of Parliament to vote nine times against himself when he was endeavoring to enforce his opinions by his action at the polls? I hope my hon. friend will reconsider another point in his Bill. But let me first say that we have various grievances of a local character. Take the case of a constituency in the Maritime Provinces, where a number of electors may be at sea—in that case, what would be the result? Every man thus providing for his livelihood would be counted as voting against the Act of 1878, no matter what his opinion on the subject. We understand, and I think the House and country have understood, that the principle upon which our legislation is founded—by which the affairs of this country are governed municipally as well as by Parliament—is the general, broad principle that the majority must govern. Why has my hon. friend opposite sought such a principle as that? It is because he was in search of some respectable authority by which he might sustain the position he intended to take? It is because he was afraid that, without the precedent of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario, he would find no person in the House to consider his proposition? While finding that, the precedent in reference to a railway bonus by-law, he might find hundreds of precedents in regard to the policy of government by the majority. Look at the excellent school system of Ontario. How is that managed? Is it by the principle of the hon. gentleman's Bill? No; but by the principle of the rule of the majority. Why did he not quote that instance? Look at our municipal or parliamentary system, and what do we find? We find these systems are founded in the broad principle that the majority must rule. I contend that, under the circumstances, it is safer, more honest, more convenient, that in this, as in other legislation, we should follow some broad principle. Or, if you consider the importance of the matter to be adjudicated upon, I contend that the principle of the majority should apply. How are we governed in this House? How did we dispose of vast interests in this House a short time ago? How do we dispose of all great affairs but on the principle of the majority? No matter how important temperance legislation may be, it will not be contended it is more important than that carried on in this House. If it be confessed that it is not, nor more important than the legislation of the great parliamentary assemblies of the Kingdoms of Europe, then let us honestly apply to this question, important as I believe it is, only the same broad principle which is applied to legislation in other cases. But if we apply to my hon. friend's own election, for instance, the principle of his own Bill, how would he stand? I find in the East Riding of York there were at the last election 4,774 voters, of which the hon. member polled but 1,526, or thirty-four per cent. Well, if his principle were applied to his own case, where would he stand? He would not be here. We should not see his manly form or hear his melodious voice. Elsewhere my hon. friend would be, no doubt standing up for the same great principle of legislation; perhaps, were he inside this House, he would be contending for the right of being elected by a minority of the total vote, the only chance, perhaps, he might have of being elected under any circumstances. Let us apply this rule to the case of other hon. gentlemen in this House, and what do we find? If we applied it to those hon. gentlemen in front of you, Mr. Speaker, everyone of us would have to leave the House but the hon. leader of the Government and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia. There are only two members in this House to-day who were elected by a majority of the voters in their respective constituencies; and only two other cases where the gentlemen were elected by forty-nine per cent. of the electors; and besides them, every other hon. gentleman in the House was elected by less than forty per cent. of the electoral vote of his constituency, except the hon. member for Prince Edward, who was elected by forty-one per cent. Now, if the principle is good as applied to the Temperance Act of 1878, let us have it of general application, and in the vote we are shortly to give in regard to the proposed destruction of the Temperance Act of 1878, let my hon. friend who introduced the Bill accept the effects of his own medicine, and agree as an amendment to the Bill he now proposes, that no amendment should take effect unless carried by a majority of the Commons. But he says, further, that he is acting in the interest of the temperance cause. Well, I ask for his credentials. I want to know what temperance organization has sanctioned his course? Why, the Dominion Alliance, the other day, in this city, at its annual meeting, passed a resolution protesting against the passage of what it calls the Boulton amendment, which he has introduced in this House. He has not the sanction of that representative body that has spread its organization from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island. The Sons of Temperance, an organization representing over 30,000 members in the Dominion, at their gathering passed a resolution, after the amendment of last year was introduced in this House, protesting against its ratification by Parliament. The Independent Order of Good Templars, representing, perhaps, a larger membership, passed a similar resolution. I do not know, then, by whom the hon. gentleman is accredited. I do not know how he stands on the floor of the House to claim to speak for the temperance men of Canada. But what do we find besides? We find that the Canada Methodists, at their last General Conference, passed a resolution protesting against the adoption of the amendment he has now proposed. In the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and at the annual meeting of the Baptist denomination of Canada, similar resolutions were passed. Wherever men have spoken out their views in regard to the temperance question, they have protested against the proposition of my hon. friend from East York, and yet he pretends here to speak for the temperance men of Canada. We have evidence that the Temperance Act of 1878 is reasonably acceptable to the people of the country. True, it has only been adopted and retained by one county in Ontario, but there is to be a vote within a few days in Hamilton, in the county of Wentworth, and in Halton. It has been adopted by the whole of Prince Edward Island, and by one of the largest counties in Manitoba, that embraces nearly half the Province, Marquette. It has been adopted in New Brunswick, Fredericton being the first municipality to decide for it; and in Carleton, Albert, Charlotte, King's, Queen's and, I think, and am now informed, in Westmoreland; also in York and in the city of Woodstock. In Nova Scotia it has been adopted in Digby, Queen's, and is going to be voted on on the 17th March in Shelburne. Petitions have been made for its adoption in Yarmouth, Hants, King's and Gloucester, and have been largely approved, I am told. These facts prove that the Temperance Act of 1878 is acceptable to temperance men. It will be quite time enough for my hon. friend to propose his amendment when it shall have been shown that the Temperance Act of 1878 fails to accomplish what we trust it will accomplish. The hon. gentleman points to the failure of the Dunkin Act as a proof that the Scott Act will be a failure. The two cases are not analagous. Not only are the methods of introducing the two measures very different, but the penalties which are provided, and the machinery by which the Temperance Act of 1878 is to be enforced, are by no means the same. The Dunkin Act was a failure in many respects. The privilege allowed to those who were prosecuted for infringing its provisions of constantly appealing from one court to another, frequently prevented the results which temperance men expected would follow from the prosecutions under the Act. Under the Temperance Act of 1878, when cases are tried before a police magistrate or a stipendiary magistrate, appeals are not allowed, and we expect that many beneficial results, which were not obtainable under the Dunkin Act, will follow from that provision. The hon. gentleman did not argue fairly when he argued against the Temperance Act of 1878, by the example of the Dunkin Act. But the hon. gentleman protests against all sumptuary legislation.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Would the hon. gentleman go on and state all the points and differences between the two Acts. I do not ask him in a captious spirit to do so, but as a matter in which the public are interested.

Mr. ROSS. In the first place any thirty petitioners could ask for the submission of the Dunkin Act—now it requires 25 per cent. of the names upon the voters' list to be attached to a petition and transmitted to the Minister of Justice through the Secretary of State before the Scott Act—as we call it—can be voted upon. This petition is an evidence that there is a substantial temperance sentiment in the constituency in which it is intended to have a vote on the Act before a vote can take place, and I agree with my hon. friend that a substantial public sentiment is necessary to the effective operation of the Act, as I believe it is necessary to the effective operation of any law. I believe it is as necessary for the maintenance of public morality in any form, as it is for the maintenance of that form of public morality which we suppose the Temperance Act of 1878 is designed to enforce. But besides the mode of submitting the Act there are other differences. The penalties under the Act are greater than those provided under the Dunkin Bill. The penalty for the first offence is $50, for the second offence $100, and for the third offence, imprisonment. In the next place, when a summary trial takes place before a police magistrate or a mayor, under the Act no appeal can be made. Fourthly, the defendant himself, or prosecutors under the Act, may be examined, by which we can ascertain more easily and with certainty if he has violated the law. Fifthly, the husband may give evidence against the wife or the wife against the husband. Sixthly, liquors, casks and other paraphernalia may be forfeited, and in many cases destroyed. Seventhly, search can be made for liquors sold contrary to law, and if found can be forfeited or destroyed. Eighthly, an action can be brought by any person. Ninthly, certain portions of the fines are to be set aside, to form a fund in aid of prosecution. Tenthly, it is not necessary to prove the precise description of the liquor, the actual passing of money, or the consumption of the liquor, a transaction in the nature of barter and sale is sufficient; and where apparatus is found with liquors it is prima facie evidence of guilt, and the onus of proof rests upon the defendant in many important cases under the Act. It will be seen from this summary of the main points of difference between the two Acts, that the Temperance Act of 1878 gives greater powers to magistrates and police officers to see that the law is carried out. My hon. friend made an allusion to the eastern States to show that sumptuary legislation, as practiced there, was destructive of the intellectual fibre of the people. My hon. friend could not have been very familiar with the public sentiment which prevails there. Does the hon. gentleman not know that the most active public sentiment, that the force of all other forces which moulds and creates the public sentiment of the United States, exists in the eastern States? Can he produce a single fact to show that there is not at present in the eastern and north-eastern States as active an intellectual fibre—if I may use the term—as in any other portion of the United States? Whence came the Daniel Websters and the Blaines of American politics? Have not the eastern States given us such orators as Wendell Phillips and Lyman Beecher—such poets as Oliver Wendell Holmes and William Cullen Bryant? Have not many of the legislators, the orators and the poets of the Republic come from those States? Do they not produce the most active and refined men of letters which the United States has ever produced? My hon. friend has cited an example which proves too much for his case. If he had cited Tennessee, or Mississippi, or Missouri, or Indiana, where there are no prohibitory laws, he might have found something to sustain him; but as it is, if I wished to rest my case on the intelligence or the intellectual force and vigor, or the domestic or moral purity or the character of any portion of the American Republic, I should have selected the eastern States, as furnishing evidence upon which to ask that the Bill of the hon. gentleman should be unanimously rejected. If we could raise a population with the intellectual keenness of the average citizen of the United States, with his constructive skill and his mental refinement and his moral purity, by temperance legislation, then temperance legislators would be the greatest benefactors of the age, and the Temperance Act of 1878 would be one of the most valuable Bills ever placed on the Statute-book of Canada. The hon. gentleman says crime is on the increase in the State of Maine. Well, Sir, crime is on the increase in the Dominion of Canada. It is on the increase in the Province of Ontario, and that in a very alarming degree. The hon. gentleman's statement again proves too much. The House will, perhaps, allow me to quote a few figures from the last report of the Inspector of Prisons and Asylums for the Province of Ontario, received since the House met. It will show how crime is on the increase in Ontario, and will be an effectual answer to the position taken by my hon. friend. In 1869 we had committed to the jails in Ontario, 5,655 persons; in 1870, 6,379; in 1873, 7,877; in 1875, 10,073; that is, an increase of 100 per cent. in six years. In 1880 the commitments were 11,300, that is to say, from 1869 to 1880, commitments to the jails in Ontario averaged from 5,656 to 11,300. Now, Sir, that cannot be said to be the result of temperance legislation, because there was no temperance legislation in Ontario at that time. If it be true that crime has increased in Maine, as my hon. friend says, why has it increased in Ontario? The Inspector of Prisons, Mr. Langmuir, than whom there is no more efficient and painstaking officer in the employ of the Ontario Government, says:

"The number of commitments to the common gaol has, as nearly as possible, doubled during the past eleven years, but the rate of increase from year to year has been exceedingly variable. . . . It is important to note, however, that while the number of commitments have increased on the whole, the increase has not been anything like so great in one class of offences as in others. Thus, while commitments for crimes against the person and property, and against public morals and decency, which may generally be designated indictable offences, increased from 2,214 in 1869, to 3,919 in 1880, being at the rate of about 7 per cent. per annum, the offences against public order and peace, of which drunkenness and vagrancy constitute nine-tenths, increased from 2,886 to 6,640, being at the rate of about 12 per cent. per annum."

Here we have a statement from the Inspector of Prisons of Ontario that drunkenness and vagrancy constitute more than nine-tenths of the indictable offences in what we call the fair Province of Ontario. Out of the 11,300 commitments to the jails in that Province, he says 3,069 males and 726 females were committed as drunk and disorderly. If we investigated other crimes for which drunkenness is largely responsible, it would only go to confirm the position which temperance men, I am sorry to say, are obliged to take, that crime is associated with intemperance. No doubt there is crime. My hon. friend tries to cast reproach upon temperance legislation by citing the State of Maine. Let me cite the little town of St. Stephens, in the county of Charlotte, New Brunswick, where the Temperance Act has been enforced since last May. During the eight months ending with December of last year, the arrests were 49 for drunkenness, but since the Act came into force the number of arrests has diminished to four. I am not just now disposed to argue the question of the result of prohibition in Maine, but I am disposed to say that the Temperance Act of 1878, if applied and enforced will fulfil to a large extent the purpose for which it was intended. My hon. friend says it is a frequent source of perjury. But every law may be said to be a cause of perjury in the same way. We have placed a law upon our Statute-book against bribery and corruption at elections; will any man say that that law is not a frequent source of perjury? If the Temperance Act causes perjury, it does nothing more than any other law. I venture to say there is not a law upon the Statute-book of the Dominion of Canada but in some sense may be said to be a source of perjury. The principle upon which the hon. gentleman asks us to repeal this law—for that is what this Bill amounts to—would repeal all legislation, and in order to avoid perjury we should blot out from the Statute-book every law that has been passed. But the hon. gentleman also says that temperance legislation is a frequent cause of lunacy. He says that lunacy is on the increase in the State of Maine. But I find by the report of the Inspector of Lunatic Asylums in the Province of Ontario, that lunacy has increased largely in that Province, and I may say in that connection that the consumption of intoxicating liquors is also on the increase. Would I be wrong in putting these two things together and drawing a conclusion, that because intemperance was on the increase and lunacy also, that one was responsible for the other? If because lunacy is on the increase in Maine we should therefore have no temperance legislation; on the same reasoning, because lunacy is on the increase in Ontario, we should have no intoxicating liquors sold, because intoxicating liquors are sold very largely and lunacy is increasing in Ontario. I find that the county which my hon. friend represents 1,714 lunatics were sent to the asylum last year.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). I do not wonder at it.

Mr. ROSS. More than three times the number of lunatics were sent from his county than from any other county in Ontario. Following the logic of my hon. friend I would conclude that he was only about one third as wise as the average elector in Ontario. I would conclude from his Mr. Ross (Middlesex).

logic that if the Riding of East York furnishes more lunatics than any other county in Ontario, it is because he represents that county. I am following his own logic. He says, because there is temperance legislation in Maine, therefore lunacy is increasing. I find lunacy on the increase in East York, and I find my hon. friend representing that county; therefore, lunacy is increasing in East York because he represents that county. That is a specimen of his logic. It just proves as much in the one case as in the other. I hope the House will adopt the amendment moved by my hon. friend behind me. I hope the House will not feel that before we have had an opportunity of testing the legislation adopted by the last Parliament, after many years of agitation, we should cast aside the decision thus arrived at. I think we ought to pause and see whether the course we adopted in 1878 is a wise one or not. We have only planted this plant, and we ought not to pluck it up by the roots before it has scarcely budded or blossomed. I have evidence to show that in the city of Fredericton the Act has worked as well as any other legislation. I will read a short quotation from a statement made by the Police Magistrate of Fredericton, who says:

"The Police Magistrate of Fredericton, Professor L. Marsh, Esq., writes under date of July 20th:—As Police Magistrate of the city of Fredericton, I have much pleasure in being able to certify to the favorable results of the Canada Temperance Act since it came into operation in this city on the 1st of May, 1879, and more especially since the Act was declared by the Supreme Court of the Dominion, to be within the constitutional powers of Parliament.

"There is no such thing now as the open sale of liquor by retail in public houses or saloons; there is, of course, an occasional case of illegal sale discovered and punished. The cases of street drunkenness are very few indeed, and the business at the police office arising out of intemperance has been reduced by at least one-half.

"I feel safe in saying that in this city the working of the Act has been such as ought to satisfy the reasonable expectations of all friends of temperance."

Now, Sir, we are just testing the virtues of this Act. We are just testing it to see whether it serves the purpose for which it was intended. If it can be shown that the Temperance Act of 1878 is a failure, if we have the proof, substantial and convincing, adduced by any hon. gentleman, I shall be as ready to vote for its repeal as any other member. Why? Because I believe that an Act that cannot be enforced should be repealed. I do not believe temperance men are unreasonable. We may be charged with violating every law, human and divine, we may be charged with being fanatical; but I think we have been exceedingly moderate in forcing our views upon the people of Canada. We may be said to be an inferior order of the community, and occupy no very respectable position in society; but I challenge the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) to show as the results of the liquor traffic, of which, I think, he is the special champion, any such beneficial effects upon the community as temperance legislation has produced. I challenge the hon. gentleman to show that society will be benefitted by the general, unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors, and that under any system whereby the liquor traffic is in full force and produces its natural and ordinary results, society is in any degree more virtuous or more enlightened than it is where total abstinence is practised, and where the people eschew the use of intoxicating liquors. I appeal to the House on two grounds, then, to reject the Bill, first, because it is not desirable to repeal the Temperance Act of 1878; second, because the proposition of the hon. member for East York is absurd on the face of it; and, if allowed to add a third reason, I appeal for the rejection of the Bill of the hon. gentleman, because I believe on this question we are acting in consonance with public opinion, and in the interest of public virtue and morality.

Mr. PLUMB. I was quite prepared for the eloquent speech in which the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has addressed the House; but I was a little unprepared for the motion moved by the hon. member for Guvborough (Mr. Ogden). This question was discussed at considerable length during the last Session of Parliament. If the proposition now before the House is, as the hon. member for West Middlesex claims, an absurd proposition, it certainly received the sanction of a majority of the members last Session when it was fairly and fully debated. If it was an absurd proposition, my hon. friend (Mr. Ross), with that acuteness of logical reasoning which he has shown in the course of his speech, will readily admit that he charges a large majority of the members with a want of knowledge of what they were about in accepting that proposition last year, and I have no doubt but they will prove themselves absurd in the same direction when the vote is taken upon this proposition. I think it is useless to enter into a temperance argument, and I do not intend to follow the remarks of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), or of the hon. gentleman who introduced this Bill. I place my support of the proposed amendment of the Scott Act upon an entirely different ground. I hold that sumptuary legislation, in order to be effective in the community, must have the moral support of that community; and if the friends of the Temperance Act are sincere they will admit at once that it is desirable that it should have at least the support of a majority of the voters of any district in which it is put in operation. That is a perfectly reasonable proposition to be made by the best friends of the Temperance Act, and every one who wishes to see it applied will feel that the only chance of its being kept on the Statute-book—for it can only be applied in isolated counties as it is not a general Act—is that communities will feel the effect of the moral power which has put the Act into operation; and I think hon. gentlemen who are opposed to the Bill beg the whole question when they say that to require a vote of the majority will virtually repeal the Act. I say if it rests on such a foundation, that the sooner it is repealed the better. I would, however, be very sorry to have it repealed until it has been tested. There is no hon. member who will rise and attempt to gain away the arguments which have been advanced setting forth the evils of intemperance. They are known and admitted among all of us who have any moral sentiment at all; the only difference of opinion is as to how to deal with these questions. I have, I believe, an honest opinion that this is not the true way of dealing with it, but I am willing to let it be tested. I am satisfied, and I believe I am in accord with many other gentlemen who have watched legislation on this subject, that, as a rule, legislation is ineffective for the purpose of suppressing this evil; but as we have legislation upon the Statute-book, I desire that the principle of the Act should be tested, and I think it cannot be fairly tested except by requiring that a majority of those who are entitled to vote for municipal officers in each county, who are registered on the voters' lists, shall be required to record their votes in favor of the Act before it is adopted. That is a proposition which seems to be an eminently fair one, and I do not propose to support it, because I intend by a side wind to kill the Scott Act; but I say that the advocates of the Act could not make a greater mistake than to attempt to force on the community that which may be repugnant to them, by the fact that they have an active organization and can bring to the polls a small minority of the votes of a district, and thus force the Act on the community. They take the initiative, it is not the public who take the initiative. In regard to the question of voting raised by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), I am willing to support any amendment to the Act whereby duplicate votes shall not be counted and to have the Act thus perfected; but it is unfair to bring people from their homes to vote down a proposition, and if they failed to do so, a minority would be able to force the Act on the community. It was a blemish in the Act from the beginning. We were powerless to change it. The Act came down from the Upper House cut and dried, and it was accepted by this House. My hon. friend says it has been brought about by slow degrees—that it is not something which has been suddenly forced on the country. I am perfectly willing to admit that a large portion of the community by petition called for this Act. We know perfectly well what petitions are and how they are got up. We know that petitions for a Temperance Act would be such as many men, though opposed to them, would not have the moral courage to refuse to sign; we know that they represent in no sense a majority of the community; but a minority; and it is useless to cite them as evidence of public opinion. They are entitled to just as much credit as they bear when taken in connection with the circumstances to which I have alluded, and they are entitled to no more. The argument of my hon. friend was largely one applicable to the general temperance question. I believe sincerely that the Maine Liquor Law has been a failure in the State of Maine. A revelation was made by the Mayor of Bangor four years ago, which was most damaging to the arguments of my hon. friend, and I have no doubt he has it among his papers. That gentleman stated that he had been the temperance candidate, and that it was as much as his political life was worth to make a true statement on the subject, but he felt his conscience compelled him to do so; and he made a statement which my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), would not dare to repeat here in reference to the state of temperance in Maine. I say it is in the interest of temperance, in the interest of the effective enforcement of this law itself, that the Bill before the House should pass. I believe it would strengthen the hands of the temperance men more than anything else they could do. I am not arguing in favor of any association; I am entirely free from connection or influence whatever; but I wish to explain why I shall vote in favor of this Bill. I shall vote for it because I conscientiously believe that if this experiment is to be tried, it should be tried in such a way as to have the moral force of the community to back it, and not to be thrust upon us by a minority, however large. In some cases this Act might be carried by one-fourth or even one-tenth of the registered voters. That small minority could force on the community that which was utterly repugnant to it, and we know what the consequence would be. It would be exactly as it was in the State of New York in 1853 or 1854, when a Temperance Act was forced on the community so utterly repugnant to the majority of the community, that when it went into operation on the night of the 3rd of July, everybody purposely violated it, and it became a dead letter and was never enforced at all. I admit that it is desirable, now that this Act is on the Statute-book, that it should be tested; but the gentlemen themselves show that they have no confidence in the weight of their principles, or in their hold on the community, or they would consent to that rough principle—which I do not altogether believe in, but it is a necessity—that the majority should govern. I presume the rule of the majority is the only way by which we can sustain a principle of legislation, whether political or moral. I do not believe it always expresses the intelligent will of the community; but as we have accepted that as the basis of our general system, I am perfectly willing to accept it here; and in any district where a proper majority should wish to carry that Act, I should certainly do my best to further the wishes of that majority. But until the temperance advocates in this House or elsewhere are content upon a question like this, affecting the private rights and the private habits of individuals—a sumptuary law, by which a man compels his neighbor to do that which he may not desire to do—until they are willing, when they force that law on the community, to subject it to the will of a majority, I do not believe they are sincere in their contention that the country wants such an enactment. My hon. friend talked about the election of members of Parliament, and attempted to put the Constitution, by which we hold our legislative powers here, upon the same platform as this Act; and he taunted the hon. member for East York—in very bad taste, I thought—with not sitting here by the votes of a majority of his constituents. Well, the hon. gentleman might look at his own riding—that hon. gentleman, an active temperance man, claiming largely to hold and supplement his political influence through his temperance principles, and through the fact that he is the head of the temperance movement, one of the ablest orators, and one of the best known in his own county, in 1874 was elected by acclamation. What is his record since? That in 1878, of the 4,242 registered voters in West Middlesex, he received 1,635 votes.

Mr. ROSS. Because my hon. friend did not support the Act, he was defeated.

Mr. PLUMB. There was a majority against the hon. gentleman of 2,607. I am using his own argument; it is a two-fold argument which cuts both ways. He was elected by acclamation in 1874; he has been active in getting the Temperance Act placed on the Statute-book since, and when he goes back to the people for election, they do not give him an acclamatory vote, but 1,635 out of 4,242. And the hon. gentleman uses this most irrelevant argument against having a majority for the Scott Act, one of the most important acts ever passed by Parliament, and I should not have referred to it unless he had done so himself. He talks about that being passed by a majority of the people. The hon. gentleman may remember that scarcely a quarter of the members returned to the Parliament of 1878 voted against the Bill. It was passed here by a majority of three to one, and in another House was passed by a majority of two to one. We claimed that a Bill so passed should command respect and disarm opposition by requiring for its adoption a majority also. I trust that after the hon. gentleman's temperance lecture, the House will be true to the position it took last year. I want to see those gentlemen test this Act by a majority of the voters of Canada. Unless the advocates of the Scott Act have a majority, they have no right to force their principles down the throats of those people who do not want them. I believe a stringent license law, strictly enforced, will prevent the deception, the fraud, the secret drunkenness, the unmanly evasions which always result from the stringent legislation which the hon. member wishes to perpetuate. For that reason I now advocate that no law like that should stand on the Statute-book, unless an amendment such as that proposed in the Bill of the hon. member for East York is accepted by Parliament, and I trust, therefore, his Bill will meet the approval of this House.

Mr. BANNERMAN. I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for West Middlesex enlarge on the morality of the people in the Eastern States. Like missionaries of the same school, he always forgets to state the reverse facts of the case. If he would study the last United States departmental reports, he would see the increase which has taken place in the use of chloral and opium in the five New England States instead of whiskey, and would have had another theme to talk about. Twenty-five years ago there was one grain of opium in use for the one ounce used now in those States, and to-day there are used in those five States two drachms of chloral to the grain that was used four years ago. As for morality, any portion of the Dominion occupies a far higher scale than those States. God forbid that our people should ever sink as low in this regard as theirs has. The hon. member referred to the many eminent men born and reared in the New England States. I have no doubt they were an honor to their country and the Anglo-Saxon race, but we have in this House in the persons of the hon. leaders of both sides and other leading statesmen, men who will compare favorably with those to whom the hon. member referred. The whole trouble in connection with this Bill that my hon. friend has brought in is this: In South and North Renfrew, we got the Dunkin Act passed; the result was that six months after the men who worked the hardest to get the Dunkin Act passed, worked tooth and nail to get the law repealed, because it was a matter of fact. I do not know how it is, whether these people are so grasping or so near; but while we hear charges in their mouths, they keep their hands in their pockets. There is no danger that they will ever pay a cent to make the kettle boil, as the saying is. So far as I am concerned, I am prepared to vote for the Bill, as I think it is only right that a majority of the voters should sign a petition before the whole are asked to vote on this question.

Mr. LONGLEY. I do not see at present that it is necessary to discuss the general question of teetotalism versus drinking, or the prohibitory or permissive principles as applied to the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I think we should gain by confining our attention to the issue before the House, namely, should the Scott Act, passed only so late as 1878, be maintained or repealed? We might at the very outset enquire, with advantage, whether the statement of the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) be true or not—that there are but two members of this House who hold their seats by a majority of all the voters in their respective constituencies, the one the hon. leader of this House and the other my witty, honest, hon. friend the member for the Isle of Cape Breton, Mr. Wm. McDonald. Now, from my own investigations and information supplied me, I am assured of the accuracy of this statement. Before I sit down I will show that even the gentlemen elected by the largest majorities, varying from 600 to 900, have not received the majority of all the votes in their respective constituencies. The supporters of this Bill are kind enough to say that they desire the Scott Act should be put into operation in a manner that would ensure its being carried out, when the difficulty would be to get it into operation at all. I ask every fair minded member if, influenced by the excitement of a general election and all the elements that enter into political contests, you cannot get a majority of the voters to come to the polls, how could you expect them to come out to vote for the Scott Act where a great deal of indifference prevails on both sides? You could not expect to get anything like the vote, under the circumstances, obtainable at a general election. I ask every fair-minded member to call to mind when the Scott Act was passed—in 1878—and the fact that scarcely was the law passed when it was pronounced by the Court in New Brunswick to be ultra vires, and that for one year every effort to put the Act into operation was stayed so that, as remarked by the member for West Middlesex, the law has only had the chance of a fair trial during the brief period of a single year; yet, forsooth, a motion is made for a change tantamount to a repeal of that law. It cannot be pretended, in the face of the facts, that this Bill was introduced for the purpose of strengthening the Act and promoting the cause of teetotalism. Under some hallucination difficult to conceive of, but which I will not pretend to say, the mover may have worked himself into the frame of mind to believe that. But I fancy he will have great difficulty in persuading this House that the men who have put him forward as their mouthpiece—and which he has been only too willing to become—have any ardent desire to see the cause of teetotalism flourish. I cannot free my mind of the idea that these men are fighting behind beer barrels and brandy pots, and in the interest of the Licensed Victuallers' Association, who, I understand, have become so benevolent of late, as to contribute $100 to the poor of Toronto, or some other Ontario city, returning about one-tenth, I suppose, of what they had previously taken from the poor, by selling them beer, brandy and wine. That is where the bulk of the property comes from, both in city and country. You cannot dissociate it from the liquor traffic. I doubt if there is a single member of this House who would take the ground that intoxicating liquors should be sold without any restraint whatever, and if it be true that some restraint upon the traffic is required, we would have simply to inquire what sort of restraint we shall seek to impose upon the traffic, whether we shall license it—and that is an odd way to put down anything—and give it the sanction of the law, or whether we shall adopt the principle of prohibiting the traffic altogether. The present law simply gives the right to a majority of the voters in any county or riding to say whether liquor shall be vended in that particular riding or county, or whether it shall not. We adopt that principle in almost all the relations of life. We allow the majority to rule, and in fact, in a great many instances, we could not help ourselves if we desired to do so ever so much. The Scott Act is nothing unless it receives the endorsement of the people. I contend that the right to restrain the liquor traffic or any immorality involves the right to prohibit. I think that is a sound principle. Now, if in the interests of society restraint is sought to be put on any source of immorality, then there remains simply the question of how far you shall go; and it also becomes a question of whether you shall seek to confine it within certain limits or utterly prohibit it. Prohibition is the more sensible method of dealing with an acknowledged evil, but it is not always competent for the people to accomplish it. Let us inquire if that principle is not adopted in the way of promoting the education of the people. We know that where the assessment principle is applied for the promotion of the purposes of education, that principle is applied against the earnest protest of at least a portion of the voters; but the State, considering that it is responsible for the education of the people, assures that it is better to make a certain proportion of the people, who would otherwise be relieved from any taxation in connection with education, pay than to relieve them, because in that way the education of the people would be first promoted, and what a portion of the people would be unable to accomplish the united force of the whole is able to accomplish in the most satisfactory way. So the State in various stations and relations, and in reference to almost every state of society, imposes more or less restraint, in fact, every member of society is by law put under a certain restraint, and our liberties, as a rule, are curtailed just in proportion as civilization advances. That is capable of demonstration, though I shall not now stop to demonstrate it. Now, I presume that in regard to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec there is very much less interest felt in the keeping of the Scott Act intact than there is in the Lower Provinces, simply because in Quebec the license system is, I apprehend, preferred, and in Ontario—that is in regard to many of the constituencies, if I am to judge by the opinion of their representatives—there is no very great interest felt in regard to the Scott Act. There may be this said that when the sentiment of the constituencies is opposed to the Scott Act, it is a nullity, it does not go into force; and all we ask is the privilege of adopting the Scott Act when the majority of the people, voting in the ordinary way, say it shall be adopted. Let us deal with this question somewhat hypothetically, and see what will be the result of the principle of the Bill of the hon. member for East York. I will assume, for the purpose of illustrating my argument, that there are 50,000 voters in the Province of Nova Scotia, and I will assume that 41,000 out of the 50,000 come to the polls and vote. Now, the half of the 50,000 is 25,000, and if you add 16,001 votes to the half of the number of votes in Nova Scotia you will find that the 16,001 control the 50,000 votes. I will assume that in the Dominion of Canada there are 400,000 voters, and I will assume that 300,000 of that number go to the polls and vote. The half of 400,000 is 200,000, so that all you require to make up the 300,000 who go to the polls and vote is just 101,000 votes. Now, I ask every fair-minded man in this House, if that is a proper principle to apply to this Act, or any other Act, where it is so utterly at variance with every principle known to British legislation. I ask the introducer of this Bill to say when that principle has ever been applied to British legislation. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) has shown what would have been the effect if this principle had been applied to the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) at his last election; he would have been elected to stay at home by a majority of 61 votes. I do not see the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) in his place, or I might have said something for his especial benefit. He received just 36 per cent. of the whole number of votes in his riding, and yet he rightfully comes here to discharge his duties as a representative. It is a singular circumstance, but the men who are here by the narrowest majorities in some cases polled the largest percentage of votes, simply because the contest was sharper and pretty much all the voters came out. I will just mention a fact which will go to illustrate the vicious principle which it is sought to introduce into our legislation and apply to the Scott Act. My worthy friend, the late Mr. Oliver, of North Oxford, was here by the overwhelming majority of 903 votes, I think, and yet any hon. gentleman who will take the pains to analyze the vote cast in his riding will find that he lacked just that number of having one-half the votes in his constituency. My hon. friend from Northumberland, who is here by a majority of 691 votes, only polled, I think, 1,760 out of the nearly 6,000 votes in his county. He sits here, not by a majority of the votes of his riding, but by a majority less than one-half the total number of votes by some 400 or 500 votes. Our energetic, popular, and determined friend from Cumberland (Sir Charles Tupper) lacked, I think, twenty or 120 votes of having fifty per cent. of the electors of his county in the last election. With two exceptions, you may go through the House and there is not a single member here by a majority vote. I do not see my popular and worthy friend from Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) here, but I observed that though he had a majority of 813 votes, he sits here by a vote of only 40 per cent. of the electorate. Now, I think I have said enough to show conclusively the vicious principle of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from East York. I might present many similar cases. I have a word or two to say with regard to the city of Bangor, where it is said drinking prevails to such an alarming extent. General Dyer, Inspector-General of Militia, said:

"That in his county (Kennebec), with a population of about 39,000, containing three cities and twenty-four towns, the law was enforced; that it was the best law they ever had, and that it materially improved both the moral and social condition of the people, as it reduced crime and poverty. It was a great point to remove the temptation, and he felt confident the vote of the State, if taken, would be against its repeal. He said that yesterday some liquor was secretly brought on to the camp ground, but it was suspected, searched for, seized and destroyed at once."

Althens Lyons (Police Court Recorder) said:

"He had kept the records of the Court during the last eighteen years. In the cities, crime had no doubt increased with the population; but in the country districts it has decreased. He remembered as far back as 1826, when no business could be done without liquor. In Waterville, where he was residing, was conversant with the fact that one merchant in three months sold 300 barrels of rum, and now he doubted if in the same place you could get a glassful."

A great deal is said about sumptuary laws, but we are only asking that intoxicating liquor shall not be sold, in order that the temptation may be taken away from all classes, but especially from that unfortunate class. Talk about the rights of individuals engaged in the liquor traffic. Nothing is said about the rights of the poor victims of the traffic. Nothing is said about the rights of the children who have to go hungry and almost naked in consequence of the traffic. Nothing is said about the tears that are shed and the woes that the wife suffers in consequence of her husband tarrying late at the tavern and coming home intoxicated. We do not hear anything about that. Yet the men who are engaged in the traffic are responsible for its effects; Nobody asks them to enter into the business; they enter it simply because they can make 400 or 500 per cent. on their capital, and that is why they continue it. They never go into it with a view of promoting the interests or developing the resources of the country. I hold in my hand a work written by the celebrated Wm. B. Carpenter, the author of a prize essay on "The Use and Abuse of Intoxicating Liquors, on Health and Disease," for which a prize of 500 guineas was offered by the late Prince Consort. It cites the testimony of Judge Wrightman, who stated in his address to the Grand Jury at Liverpool, in August, 1846, that "he found, from a perusal of the depositions, that one unfailling cause of four-fifths of these crimes was, as it was in every other calendar, the besetting sin of drunkenness." Judge Alderson, when addressing the Grand Jury in 1844, at the York Assizes, said:

"Another thing he would advert to was that a great proportion of the crimes to be brought forward for their consideration arose from the vice of drunkenness alone; indeed, if they took away from the calendar all those cases with which drunkenness has any connection, they would make the large calendar a very small one."

I have also the testimony of Judge Erskine and others to the same effect. What we simply want to do is to mitigate these woes which are universally acknowledged. We think we can best accomplish that end by keeping intact the Scott Act; and I am free to say that if, after the Scott Act has a fair trial, it is shown to be inefficient and insufficient to accomplish the object arrived at, then I shall be willing to part with the law and seek for a better one. But we do ask for some fairness in our efforts to put down intemperance, which is likely in many cases to flood the land. It is doing more mischief confessedly than all other crimes and evils put together, and in the name of humanity let us try the best remedy that has been devised for the iniquity. I admit that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is one of the most difficult things which men were ever called on to deal with; but it cannot be disputed that there are engaged in the temperance reform, and have been for a quarter of a century back, some of the best elements in society, and it is a significant fact that the vast majority of the clergymen of the various sects and denominations are heartily in favor of the temperance movement, a very large percentage of them being practical abstainers. I hope the vote we shall give on this question will be such as to convey satisfaction, not only to those who have labored to retain the law on the Statute-book, but to the vast number of the friends of temperance who have been watching with intense interest to see whether the members of this House were willing that the law should have a fair trial, or whether they would countenance an insidious attempt to strike it down and render it a nullity.

Mr. BRECKEN. I intend to oppose the amendment proposed to be made to the Temperance Act. One reason I do so is that in Prince Edward Island the registration of electors has been repealed, and there is no way of ascertaining whether or not a majority of the electors in any district have voted for or against the measure. I must further state that the Scott Act has been placed before the people of Prince Edward Island, and a majority of the electors who have voted have voted in favor of it. Whether or not the majority of the people of Prince Edward Island are in favor of it or not I cannot say; but if I were to vote for the Bill, I would be practically voting for the withdrawal of that Act from Prince Edward Island. I have the most profound respect for the motives that influence hon. gentlemen to stand up here and advocate the temperance cause. But

I think the principle involved in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for East York is a sound one, because if the law is to be carried out in its integrity it must have in its favor the general sentiment of the people of the district where it is enacted. While I admire the motion of the hon. gentlemen who advocate temperance, I cannot subscribe to their machinery, where the Scott Act has been placed before the people from a hustings and there adopted, and though hundreds may not have taken the trouble to attend the meeting, it has a prior chance of being carried out honestly. The popular sentiment should be ascertained by the people's votes. Though I am in favor of the principle of this amendment, if I consider that out of respect to the wishes of the people who sent me here, I must vote against it, because there is no legislative machinery in Prince Edward Island to meet the amendment if adopted. I think injustice is inflicted by this Act on a class of people who have embarked their means in a certain class of trade. Take for instance, the brewers and distillers, whose business has been legalized as a source of revenue. It is an extreme injustice to them that this Scott Act should be sprung on them, and their business destroyed. If Prince Edward Island were in the same position as other electoral districts here, I would be prepared to vote for the amendment of my hon. friend, but under the circumstances, I must record my vote against it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am the more unwilling to give a silent vote on this question this year than I was last year, from the fact that I know, from the experience of last year, that the position I take on this question is certain to be misrepresented by a portion of the press. Last year when the majority of this House chose to believe that the peculiarity of this measure rendered it necessary that a somewhat exceptional principle should apply to it, we were denounced at once as opponents of the temperance movement. I do not desire here for a moment to parade my temperance principles. That is a matter which concerns myself only. I can only say that in a horror of the drinking habits of society and the evils of intemperance which spring from them, I yield to no hon. gentleman in the House. I believe if every man in the country who professes to be in favor of a prohibitory law would do precisely what I have done, that is become a personal abstainer, we would have a very great reduction in the evils of intemperance in the community. What I feel about the measure is this: We have had experience in Canada of the Dunkin Act. It is quite true that the hon. member for West Middlesex, who is thoroughly familiar with the question, has pointed out a number of features in which this Act differs from the Dunkin Act, and which, it is hoped, will render it much more effective. We have yet to learn, by practical experience, whether that is the case or not. The Act has been passed in some counties. It remains to be seen whether, as the result of its passage, any beneficial effect is derived by those counties. Were I convinced that the passage of the Scott Act anywhere would prevent the evils of intemperance in the country, I would do everything in my power to secure its passage. In fact, so strongly do I feel on this subject that, as I informed the House last year, in any district in which the Dunkin Act was submitted and which the newspaper that I control was supposed to have any influence, I have invariably used all the influence in my power to secure its passage; but the result has been in every case, without a single exception, I believe, that practical experience has led to the repeal of the Dunkin Act even in those counties where the temperance feeling was so strong that the repeal in the first instance was defeated, such as the county of Prince Edward for instance, where, although the repeal in the first instance was defeated by a large majority, yet another year's experience led the people by a large majority to repeal the Act and return to the license system. It seems to me this measure is one which to succeed at all must have a very strong sentiment in its favor, and that sentiment cannot be presumed upon the mere accident that a majority of the voters who voted on the by-law were in favor of it. If it be true that an overwhelming majority of the people, and that all the clergy are in favor of the Dunkin Act, there can be no difficulty in saying that the majority of those entitled to vote at an election shall affirm their desire for the passage of this Bill before it becomes law. I cannot imagine that in voting for this Bill we are seeking to repeal the Scott Act, unless you admit that public opinion on the subject is pretty evenly divided. We have had statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, as to the number of votes polled for members of this House. I judge that, taking the average all round, it will be found the successful candidates polled at the last general election about an average of 40 per cent. of the votes in their respective constituencies. Political opinion is very evenly divided in this country. The member for West Durham, I think, speaking on one occasion outside the House, made a very elaborate calculation to show how few votes would change the entire aspect of political opinion in the House. If political opinion is so evenly divided, and that 40 per cent. of the electors have voted for each member, I think we may fairly assume there would be no difficulty in getting a vote to the extent of 50 per cent., provided there was such a strong, overwhelming opinion in favor of this measure as would justify its being enacted at all. That is my argument. Hon. gentlemen who are very strong and earnest temperance advocates—who devote a great deal of their time to the advocacy of temperance principles, and who, from their situation, are constantly in the presence, if I may use the expression, of the evils of intemperance, I can readily understand are willing to resort to any means that may be adopted that seem to offer a prospect of removing those evils. But what I think they fail in is this: they will not remember that the mere placing of a law of this kind on the Statute-book, and its subsequent adoption by a county, does not necessarily produce the results they so much desire. Their whole argument is based on the assumption that the moment the Scott Act is passed, drinking disappears. We know, as a matter of fact, that in Maine, where prohibition has lasted for a great many years, there is a great deal of drinking, that many persons are convicted of drunkenness, and crime has been on the increase, I do not say because of prohibition, but in spite of it. The member for West Middlesex told us, to-night, that he wished the people of this country were as moral, high-toned and intellectual as the people of the New England States. Now, I find an article in a leading organ of public opinion, which I dare say hon. gentlemen opposite will not treat in the sneering way that they have treated any extract from another organ of public opinion cited by the member for East York. I see in to-day's Globe an article which deals with this very subject. I will read from it two short extracts to show how unfair it was to assume that the tone of morality in the New England States is higher than the tone in this country. The first is as follows:—

"Benjamin Trumbull, in 1875, mourned that 439 divorces had taken place in Connecticut within a century, and 389 of these within a half century. President Dwight was alarmed at one divorce to every one hundred marriages. But during the fifteen years preceding 1879 the same State averaged 446 annually, and the ratio of divorces to marriages was 1 to 10.4. Vermont granted 94 divorces in 1860, and 197 in 1877; ratio to marriages, 1 in 14. Rhode Island grants about 180 per year; ratio to marriages, 1 in 13. Statistics in New Hampshire and Maine are defective, but the number of divorces in 1870 was 159; in 1878, 241. Fifteen out of sixteen counties in Maine granted 437 divorces in 1878. In four counties for which returns were made in 1880, there was an increase during that year of from 125 to 171, more than one-third."

Then, after a number of extracts and statements in relation to the growth of immorality in the New England States, the article goes on to say:

"The lecturer does not claim that divorce and licentiousness stand to each other strictly in the relation of cause and effect. This is, no doubt, partly true. But the primary cause of both are common and lie deeper. There can be no doubt that the three classes of evils named—divorce, licentiousness, and the destruction of unborn life—spring from common sources. They all have their roots in wrong and vicious principles wrought into the New England civilization. The love of wealth, ease, display; the cowardly shrinking from the strain of limited means, sturdy toil and simplicity of living are amongst the worst foes of the frugal and virtuous family life. And closely connected with these is the loosening of the restraints of religion upon the minds and consciences of many."

I give those extracts from an editorial in to-day's Globe as an offset to the statements of the hon. member for Middlesex as regards the moral condition of the people of New England. I do not, for a moment, say it is due to prohibition, but I do say it exists in spite of prohibition, and that prohibition has not produced that high moral character in the people that the hon. gentleman asserts. But we are told that the principle now proposed, in the Bill, is entirely unheard of. Why, already, we have had cited the action of the Legislature of Ontario, which, in the matter of bonuses to railways, or any other public enterprise, requires an absolute majority of the votes of all entitled to vote. I find, at the last Session of the Quebec Local Legislature, an Act was obtained, I may say as the result of a strong temperance agitation in Montreal—all about which I know, because I took an active part in it in connection with the issuing of licenses in a part of the city which it was thought did not require them—I find that the principle laid down in the cities of Montreal and Quebec was that no license should be granted to any person, if an absolute majority of the voters signified their opposition. The temperance men of Montreal were most gratified with this provision, feeling confident that they could prevent the granting of licenses in places where they did not wish the sale of liquor. We have that principle affirmed in many other ways. It governs our dealings with property and runs through the whole of our legislation in regard to it; in such cases a simple majority of votes is not sufficient; in some cases two-thirds, in others three-fourths of the votes are the proportions insisted upon. In cases of insolvency, for instance, dealing with property, a mere majority does not give a man a discharge; it requires a certain large proportion. Take our railway legislation and the authorization to issue bonds to take precedence of the existing securities, and postpone perhaps a chance of a return for one portion if not its destruction altogether, as a paying investment; in this case there is not simply a majority of the stockholders needed, but two-thirds or three-fourths must vote for such a change. And so, whenever property is affected in any way, this principle runs through the whole of our legislation. That is the principle proposed in this particular case. We have here an attempt to pass a law the effect of which is to destroy the business, whether that business be good or bad, but one up to this time permitted by the law. This law destroys the value of property created in connection with that business, and it is surely not too much to say that there should be such a consensus of public opinion in favor of this law as would be shown by a majority of those actually entitled to vote. I quite admit the Bill is defective in phraseology, and that difficulties might arise in connection with it. But in Committee it could be amended to prevent the occurrence of the difficulties pointed out by the hon. member for West Middlesex. All that is desired by the friends of the Bill is that an actual majority of those entitled to vote should vote on a law like the Scott Act before its enforcement in any locality. And we desire to have that done for this reason, that the experience of the past has shown that the passage of these by-laws has not resulted as their friends anticipated; that they resulted so differently from what they anticipated that they have all been repealed, and we desire that in regard to any new law of this kind that there shall be at least a fair and reasonable prospect of its success. It is the more necessary that that should be the case in regard to the Scott Act, because once passed the by-law cannot be repealed for three years. Now, this Bill has been adopted in a number of counties, we are told, and there would be an opportunity of testing it in those counties. If it is found to operate successfully, if its effect is proved to be to lessen materially and largely the evils of intemperance, if other places of accommodation spring up in the places of those that existed before, and if the result during the three years is found to be unquestionably beneficial, so much so that at the end of that time those who had voted for it, and others who had not, will be willing to continue it, then it may be adopted in other places, and that experience will be such that there will be no difficulty in getting an entire majority to vote for it. But I do not think it is desirable, in view of the fact, that three years must elapse before the by-law can be repealed, to encourage the general adoption of these by-laws, unless the public sentiment in favor of them is sufficiently great to induce a final majority to vote for them. It is for that reason that I shall vote against the motion for the six months' hoist and for the second reading of the Bill, with the hope that when it goes to Committee the phraseology will be so changed as to avoid the difficulties pointed out by the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), I shall do so, notwithstanding that I know I shall be charged outside of this House with having voted for a measure, the effect of which is to produce intemperance, or at any rate to retard the advancement of temperance principles.

Mr. MILLS. I purpose voting for the six months' hoist. When you look at the provisions of the Bill it is very objectionable, even upon the ground of the abstract principle which the hon. gentleman who moved the Bill, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, discussed. What object can there be in calling out the electors to record their votes in opposition to a temperance measure, when it is not the number of the votes in opposition to the Bill which are to be counted, but the electors who have not polled their votes in favor of the Bill. It seems to me utterly preposterous to invite the electors to vote against a prohibitory liquor law, or the granting of licenses for the sale of liquors, when you simply count the votes on the voters' list who have not recorded their names in favor of the proposition. I say, therefore, that the Bill is very defective in that particular, and its provisions utterly without meaning. Further than that, when you look at the provisions of the Scott Act you will see that it does not come into force in any particular constituency unless the majority who record their votes do so in support of the proposition. Now, hon. gentlemen have assumed that those who fail to vote in favor of temperance legislation are opposed to legislation of that sort. Now, I do not believe that that assumption is well founded. In my opinion the great majority of those who fail to record their votes are perfectly indifferent. They are willing the experiment shall be tried if a majority of those who vote favor it, and they are willing to permit licenses to be granted if a majority take that particular view. They neither throw their influence in favor of prohibitory legislation, nor do they throw their influence against it. Besides, the hon. gentlemen who are supporting this measure assume, apart from this, that the community have a right to engage in the manufacture of, and traffic in, intoxicating drinks. That is not the fact. Apart from the Temperance Act altogether the great majority of the people never engage in the traffic. They are not permitted to do so. If you look at the ordinary license law of any of the Provinces, you will see that only one tavern is allowed for every 250 inhabitants. Now, what does that mean? Does it not mean that you propose to grant to some one person a privilege by that legislation which you deny to the great majority of the population? The hon. gentleman has said that property under this measure would be rendered valueless, and that we are dealing with this matter in a wholly different way from that in which we deal with property in other cases. I do not admit that; nor do I admit that property is at all involved in the manner in which the hon. gentleman has represented. When a license is granted, say for a distillery, it is granted for a single year. The right to engage in the business depends on the license which the person has received, and if you withhold that license the right ceases. It is not a right acquired by the erection of a distillery or by the investment of capital in that particular business, because if the person so engaging in the business did so acquire the right, you would recognize his right to go on from year to year. But you do not do so. In many instances reports are made in which it is stated that the position of the distillery is unfavorable for the exercise of proper supervision over the business, and the renewal of the license may be refused. I know of a case in which that was done. A person invested capital in the erection of a distillery four or five miles from the city of Winnipeg. A license was granted for a year; but at the end of that time he was not allowed to go on, because it was said a proper supervision could not be exercised over the distillery situated where it was. In the working of the ordinary license law, you assume that no one has the right to engage in the sale of intoxicants, and, in order to give that right, you grant a license on the payment of a certain sum. Does not that assume that all those to whom a license is not granted shall not engage in the business, or enjoy the privilege which you grant to others? You have simply a police regulation and nothing more, and the party obtaining the license under that regulation is a person to whom a special privilege is granted, on the payment of a certain sum, and when the period expires for which the license is granted, his right is at an end. That is the case under the license law of Ontario at this moment. In a community, four or five licenses may be granted, under the law, to tavern keepers, and, within the year, some one else may put up another building with better accommodation than some one of the others who has a licensed hotel. Under the law a license is granted to him and denied to some one who held it the previous year. Does he come before the Local Legislature for compensation? Not at all. He took his risks when he engaged in the business, and he is just as much entitled to compensation as any one who would be disqualified from getting a license by the adoption of the Scott Act. Suppose, instead of one person being ruled out in this way, the whole are ruled out under the Act, have they any more right to compensation than the first one? Is it not perfectly obvious that the law is based upon the assumption, altogether apart from the Scott Act, that this is not a business in which the community ought to engage, that it is detrimental to the public interests, and that the Legislature should exercise a controlling influence over it? It is upon that assumption that licenses are issued at all, and the very same line of public policy which will justify you in denying a license to the great majority of the community will justify you in denying the right to the remainder if public opinion will sustain you. Then it comes down to the question how far the public will sustain you in carrying out a policy of prohibition; and it is upon that principle that we proceeded in the Scott Act. Under the provisions of the Statute a majority of those who record their votes must support that Act before it can take effect. It would be more logical to refuse a license unless a majority of those who are voters authorize it by a poll, than to refuse to withhold it without such a vote. The hon. gentleman who moved this Bill said that by this Act we were robbing some persons, that we were not dealing with them in the same way we deal with other persons, that we take away their property by Act of Parliament and apply it to public purposes. But a person does not require a license to build a cotton-mill or to engage in any ordinary manufacturing business. Any one can engage in an industrial pursuit, but with regard to the manufacture and the sale of intoxicants you undertake to regulate them by a legislative enactment and you license certain parties, upon the payment of a certain sum, to do certain things which you do not permit the majority to do, and their business can only continue so long as the Legislature sees proper to grant licenses in the matter. Now, the hon. gentleman seems to think that there is a great deal of public spirit in a few glasses of whiskey. He told us how much more generously people who drink act in regard to public matters than those who are disposed to support prohibitory legislation. I do not agree with him. In my opinion, it is simply a question of how far public opinion will sustain us. We know that in every town, in every village, in every large municipality, there are a certain number of persons who are supported by poor rates, and we know that in nine cases out of ten these people have been reduced to destitution on account of drink. In a great majority of cases in the towns and cities those who are dependent upon the charities of the population have been brought to that condition by dissipation. If that be the case we have a right to protect ourselves against such a state of things. You do not recognize the right of a man to establish a powder-mill at your door. You do not allow him to create a nuisance, and you seek to protect yourself against the wrong that would be inflicted upon you in this way. When the manufacture and sale of a particular article imposes burdens upon the community, they have a right to protect themselves against those burdens by saying that parties shall not engage in a business which produces those results. A few years ago we refused to certain parties leave to engage in the manufacture of gasoline, or something of that sort, in the vicinity of towns and cities, on the ground that it would be dangerous to the property of others. In precisely the same way we have the right to protect ourselves against the mischiefs that result from drunkenness. The only question the Legislature has to consider is whether the measure on the Statute-book will prove efficient. In my opinion, the measure has not yet had a fair trial, and until it has had a fair trial it would be premature to pronounce against it.

Mr. STRANGE. The hon. members for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) and Annapolis (Mr. Longley) have given some statistics which I consider to be incorrect. They have asserted that only two hon. gentlemen in this House are entitled to sit here by a majority of the votes in their respective ridings. I have gone over the list as given in the "Parliamentary Companion," and I find that seven hon. gentlemen obtained more than a majority of the votes, viz.: the hon. members for Cape Breton (Messrs. McDonald and McLeod), New Westminster (Mr. McInnes), Quobee County (Mr. Caron), Victoria, B.C. (Mr. DeCosmos), Yarmouth (Mr. Killam), and Muskoka (Mr. Cockburn). In the constituency of Muskoka, represented here by an advanced Liberal, I find the total number of voters to be 1,986, of which the hon. member received 1,259. There must be some peculiarity in the way voting is conducted in that riding, for I find that the unsuccessful candidate received 1,196 votes, also more than one-half the entire number of voters.

Mr. BLAKE. I simply wish to say that while I am of opinion that there is a great deal to be said in favor of the view that to secure an effectual and beneficial enforcement of this law a very strong and also a diffused majority is required, I am equally of opinion that the measure now proposed, although several hon. gentlemen have no doubt with the utmost honesty declared that such is not their view in their support of it, is not merely calculated to give us the benefit of the law in cases in which there is a strong majority in its favor, but is calculated to prevent the law having a chance to become operative at all. I think that is sufficiently demonstrated by the statistics to which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Strange) has alluded. It is quite clear that the case to which he has drawn particular attention is one in which the "Parliamentary Companion" must be in error, because, as he has properly observed, it is quite impossible that each of the candidates can have polled more than one-half of the total number of registered voters. I do not know whether there are any other errors in the "Parliamentary Companion," nor have I looked at the poll returns to find if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct. But I will assume it to be so, that six or seven out of the 206 members have succeeded in polling one-half of the total number of voters in their constituencies, yet that would not at all prove that we could give practical effect and operation to this law. Now, Sir, I have looked a little at the statistics upon this subject, and I took the trouble to run out the figures of the returns of the hon. gentlemen who during last Session voted for the amendment of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton), which is in the form of a Bill now; and I found that the number of registered voters in the constituencies of those 90 members with respect to whom the statistics could be obtained—for some had been elected by acclamation, and in two cases there was no complete report in the return—was 344,291, of which one-half would be 172,147; but those 90 gentlemen polled 125,344, making a slight deficiency of 46,810, and leaving their poll equal to about 36½ per cent. of the registered voters of their constituencies. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) said that he assumed it was 40 per cent.—I have shown that it was under that—and that he said was a satisfactory exhibit, because political opinion is very much divided. Well, on the whole, political opinion is very much divided; but there are constituencies, as we know, in which political opinion is very much on one side, and when you find such an average result as I have referred to in 90 constituencies—and I presume that will be the result all round, because that number of constituencies was not taken from one side but from both sides, not from one Province but from all the Provinces—when you find about that rate, coupled with the circumstance that of those 90 members only one had polled a majority of the registered electors, you find that a majority of the registered voters is a thing, under our present system, practically unattainable; and therefore, you are practically, if this Bill passes, placing a barrier not to be passed over to the operation of the law. Now, as regards the 90 constituencies to which I have referred, or as regards all the constituencies at present held by the Conservative party in the Province from which I come—and I ran out the figures with very similar results to those and not one of them had a majority of the whole vote—that though there are many constituencies in which public opinion is overwhelmingly in favor of the Conservative party, yet you do not get out a majority of the number of registered votes in all the excitement of a popular election, even in constituencies where an active campaign is carried on. If there is not, among the 64 or 65 members returned in the Conservative interest in Ontario, a single instance in which a majority of the registered votes has been obtained, will it be fair or reasonable to argue that in those cases these gentlemen returned had not the support, really, of a majority of the voters in their constituencies? We know they had the support almost invariably, however small the majority by which they were returned. There are in many cases a residuum of non-voters, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has pointed out, but as a rule the residuum is not of such a character as would have turned the election. There are some cases, but they are exceedingly rare, in which the residuum unpolled was of such a complexion as would have turned the election. The conclusion I draw is, that experience in this country has established that you cannot, no matter how strong the sentiment, get out, under your present system, a majority of the registered voters; and therefore the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) is proposing, not a means by which this law can be enforced where there is a strong demand for it, but a means by which it can never be placed in operation.

SIR LEONARD TILLEY. I will not occupy the attention of the House during more than a few minutes. In the first place I wish to express my regret that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Boulton) should have thought it proper to use language with effect to the character of the hon. members who are supporting the principle of prohibition or limitation with respect to the liquor traffic in the Dominion. I think it is but right, having been associated for the last twenty or twenty-five years with men who entertained those views, to say that so far as my knowledge goes they compare favorably with the class of men who have differed with us on this important question. They are among the most liberal-minded, and the best educated, and include the clergy of various denominations of the philanthropical and benevolent men. The hon. member for East York would have rendered his measure greater service had he used somewhat different language, I think, in describing the character of the gentlemen in Canada who opposed his Bill. Reference has been made to the State of Maine. It was not perhaps necessary to bring it up; but it has been brought up and statements made with reference to the action on the prohibitory law there and the character of the inhabitants. I cannot understand why, if the effects of a prohibitory law—it may be imperfectly carried out—have been such as described, such a law remains on the Statute-book for 27 years. With respect to the subject under consideration, I am opposed to the Bill, because it is a virtual repeal of the Scott Act. It may be said that when we make that declaration, it is an admission on our part that a majority of the people are not in favor of the Scott Act. We know, however, from past experience, that it is impossible in constituencies, even where there have been strong political contests, to get out a sufficient number of people to record their votes. There is another point which has not been fully brought out during the debate. It has been said that a majority, by their energy and earnestness, may carry the Act against an overwhelming majority. When the framers of the Scott Act prepared the measure they exercised a very wise precaution. Myself and an hon. member know it, because I was in communication with him on the subject of prohibition when out of Parliament. We felt so strongly that it was necessary for the enforcement of this law, in any locality that a majority of the people should be in favor of it, that I was willing that three-fifths of the voters should be required to record their votes for it; and the framers of the Act, in the same view, decided that before the Government could issue a proclamation for the polling, twenty-five per cent. of the whole electors eligible to vote should sign, with their own signatures and attested to by witnesses, a declaration that they are in favor of the vote being taken, and therefore declare themselves in favor of the Act itself. That is a great protection against a verdict being given by a mere minority of the people. Let us recollect that the passage of that Act was the result of agitation for years throughout the country. Thousands and tens of thousands of petitions were laid on the Table of this Parliament in favor of such legislation. The friends of the cause and the moderate men united together and prepared the Scott Act, which became law. It has practically been in operation only a twelvemonth, and what we, who are believers in the principle of the Act, ask, is that it may have a fair trial. I do not hesitate to say that after it has had a fair trial—not after three years during which the Act is in force, but after a twelvemonth—if it is found to have a bad effect, we shall not ask that it be allowed to remain for three years, but we shall go for its repeal. But, after thousands and tens of thousands of petitions have been made in favor of it, after both branches of the Legislature have voted in favor of it, and after it has only had a twelvemonth's trial, I feel that I would not be doing my duty, as a representative in the House of Commons, if I voted for the repeal of the Scott Act, because you would practically repeal it if you required a majority of the ratepayers to come out and record their votes in its favor. You must recollect, in the first place, that the men who favor this measure have no pecuniary interest in the matter. Somebody must travel through a district and obtain the signatures of twenty-five per cent. of the voters. They may be fanatics, and they may be wrong, but they have no special interest in the matter. They have no establishments for the manufacture and sale of water out of which they may make a fortune. They act for the best of motives, and it requires a great sacrifice of time and money to accomplish what they desire. Notwithstanding all the interest they may feel in this matter, I believe there is not one place in twenty where—though a majority of the whole people might be in favor of the Act, and would sign the petition if you took it to them—they could all be induced to travel eight or ten miles to record their votes. Therefore, because I feel that the passage of this Bill would be a practical repeal of the law, and that after all the labor that was given to this matter, and the strong opinion that was expressed by every Province of the Dominion, I feel bound, so far as I am concerned, to record my vote against any proposition that would be a practical repeal until that law has proved itself inoperative for the accomplishment of the object in view, and injurious rather than beneficial to the cause we desire to promote by legislation of this kind.

Mr. ANGLIN. When hon. gentlemen say that if this Bill passes the Scott Act will be virtually repealed, they virtually admit that there is not a large majority of the people of this Dominion in favor of the continuance of that Act. The zeal of those who are active in the temperance cause is such, that if there were anything like a majority, there would be no reason to apprehend any danger to their beloved Act from the passing of this amendment. The number of registered electors throughout this Dominion is, at the outside, but one in every seven or eight of the population, and if the Act is to remain on the Statute-book, it is not, surely, too much to ask that it be so amended that one-half of the sixth or the seventh of the population should be required to vote in favor of the imposition of this Act upon the rest of the population. We should thus be confining the voting to those who are the most intelligent of the people, and who have the largest interest in the welfare of the country. We have seen this law put in force in some districts by a very small portion of the population, and those who have seen its operation are disposed to admit that it is a mistake. For my own part, I am entirely opposed to this law on principle. I do not believe that one portion of any district or country have the right to prescribe to another portion what they shall eat, drink or wear. Nor do I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell, that those who build distilleries or hotels are entitled to do so by virtue of the law. The law is not intended to permit the erection of hotels or distilleries, but it is intended to restrict the natural privilege of people to sell ale, wine, brandy or whiskey, as well as broadcloth or any other article. One of the reasons why these restrictions are imposed is precisely the same as that for imposing similar restrictions on the sale of tobacco, namely, for the purpose of raising a revenue and preventing frauds on the revenue. And the reason was that it was thought desirable to restrict the sale of liquors to prevent abuses which are likely to arise. While we all admit that the excessive use of intoxicating liquors is a very deplorable evil, while we all wish to see this evil abolished, we ought not to go to the utter extreme and prohibit absolutely the use of liquors which may be used moderately and reasonably, without offence either against the law of God or the law of any country except the State of Maine, and perhaps some districts in this Dominion. To justify such a law as this, it would be necessary not merely to point out the fact that great evils arise from the excessive use of alcoholic liquors, but to prove that the use of alcoholic liquors is an evil in itself. That is sometimes asserted by such extreme teetotalers as the hon. member for Annapolis, but only extreme prohibitionists would agree with that hon. gentleman. We tried the prohibitory law in New Brunswick many years ago, and found then it did not tend to temperance, but to intemperance. During the few months that law was in operation, there was more drunkenness in that Province than before, and the evil effects are felt down to this day. I believe there is more drunkenness in New Brunswick to-day than there would have been had such a law never gone into effect. It may be that the law has been beneficial in some parts, but I do not believe it has anywhere succeeded in preventing those who, unfortunately, have an excessive passion for indulgence of that kind from gratifying that passion. In Fredericton, there seems to be a large number of the population desirous of adopting this measure. But the police magistrate of that city, himself a very zealous prohibitionist, said, a few short months after the law was in operation, that it worked so beneficially as to cause a decrease of one-half of the number of cases before his court. Well, that proves that the one-half gratified their passion for liquor and that there is no difficulty in getting bad liquor, but in getting good liquor. The liquor is sold and will be sold wherever this law goes into operation. I stayed one day in the city of Bangor, where I saw more people under the influence of liquor about the hotels than ever I saw in St. John. I remember having accidentally stumbled into one of the rooms, which I found was a bar-room, with thirty or forty people drinking in it, and, I have no doubt, drinking more freely than if there was no restraint. I object altogether to this measure upon principle, but if it is to be enforced at all, it can only be enforced by a preponderance of public opinion in its favor, and I, therefore, shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. The question is, shall we allow this law to have a fair trial, because, I have no doubt many men voted for it who feared it might not produce all the benefits its advocates expected. Suppose, for example, the temperance advocates, after they had given a little trial to this law, had come before the Parliament and asked the people who did not record their votes in each county should be considered as having voted for them. They might have said, we find it difficult to pass the law because many do not vote, and, as silence gives consent, why not count them as part of our majority? What would the hon. member for East York say to that. Yet he comes here with a proposition equally objectionable from the other side. I will vote this year, as last, with every hope that the Scott Act may be a great success; but even if I believed it to be a failure, I should deem it my duty to give those who attempt to work it out under the authority of Parliament, at least, a fair trial.

Amendment (Mr. Ogden) six months' hoist, carried on the following division:—

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MACDOUGALL introduced a Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Peace River Railroad Company.

Bill read the first time.

House adjourned at 12:30 o'clock, a.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 16th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 62) to amend the Act incorporating the Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada —(Mr. Gault.)

TAX ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to reduce the tax imposed on Canadian tobacco cultivated for the manufactories?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is not the intention of the Government to reduce the tax imposed on Canadian tobacco cultivated for the manufactories.

EXCISE DUTY ON CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. MONGENAIS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to abolish the Excise duties imposed on tobacco grown and manufactured by the growers for purposes of trade; if not, whether the Government will so amend the existing law as to relieve tobacco growers from the trouble of applying to the Government in order to obtain the license required in that behalf, and making accounts or returns as required by the law now in force?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. It is not the intention of the Government to abolish the Excise duties imposed on tobacco grown and manufactured by the growers for purposes of trade. In regard to the latter part of the question, the inconvenience complained of will probably be remedied by instructions given to the inspectors.

SEINE NETS ON OTTAWA RIVER.

Mr. MONGENAIIS enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to abolish the use of seine nets on the Ottawa River, in the section comprised between Carillon and St. Ann?

Mr. POPE (Queen's). I can scarcely say what is the intention of the Government as to the use of seines on the Ottawa River at the place mentioned. I dare say, at certain times, and under certain restrictions, the use of seine nets may be allowed, but information will be asked from the fishery officers in that section of the country, as to whether it is advisable to go that far or not.

IRISH IMMIGRATION TO CANADA.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Whether the Government has received any despatch from the Imperial Government on the subject of Irish or other immigration to the North-West or other parts of Canada; and whether any such despatch will be laid on the Table?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. There has been no despatch received from the Imperial Government on the subject.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Before the notices are called I desire to direct the attention of the House to a subject which has become one of very considerable moment to us all. I do not remember, in the course of eighteen years experience, ever to have known of so many hon. members having become seriously ill in the discharge of their Parliamentary duties, as those who are now unfortunately debarred from attending the House. I do not think, although it is true that we have had very severe work, that that work has been more severe than the House has undergone on some occasions before Confederation, but perhaps not since; and judging from my own experience I believe that in addition to the late hours, the excitement and the hard work, the real cause of the mischief has been, to a very great extent, the impurity of the atmosphere which we are compelled to breathe. After entering the House I have passed through the corridors and down into the basement, and have been sensible of a very impure atmosphere. Every one who has paid the slightest attention to this question knows that if this condition of the atmosphere is to continue in future, in view of the severe work upon which we are about to enter—for members will have very considerable Committee work in the morning, and we cannot get through the Estimates without a considerable number of late sittings—must admit there is urgent necessity of taking steps, if any can be taken, to guard against the consequence of spending many hours in a very bad atmosphere. I make this suggestion for the consideration of the House, and I think it is desirable that Mr. Speaker should give orders to some thoroughly competent medical practitioner, or any other gentleman in whom he has confidence, to make, without delay, a very close examination of the whole of the basement, drains and air ducts that are supposed to properly ventilate the Chamber. I recollect when a similar examination was made, a few years ago, under the conduct of Senator Brouse, that a state of things was revealed which was quite sufficient to account for the very considerable amount of illness arising from breathing the atmosphere they were breathing, and I respectfully suggest that, without further delay, steps should be taken to make a very thorough examination. I am afraid the practice of having the whole of the basement of this building occupied for various purposes, is the cause of much of the trouble of securing a pure atmosphere in the Chamber and corridors. These buildings are of very great length and in some places of very great depth, and I am afraid it will be a matter of great difficulty to prevent the atmosphere of the lower parts from becoming vitiated, and the atmosphere of the upper portion necessarily suffers. I respectfully beg to call attention to the question which hon. members, called upon to undergo Committee work and consider the Estimates, will find to be a very serious question indeed.

Mr. PLUMB. As I joined my hon. friend from North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) in making some recommendations about the sanitary affairs of the House, I may venture to say a few words in full accord with what has been said by the hon. member for Centre Huron. There is nothing more difficult to obtain than a system of ventilation which will be perfect in a House like this. The hon. Minister of Public Works has made a great step in advance within the last year or two, in accordance with the suggestions of the hon. member for North Norfolk and myself. I do not think the sanitary condition of the House can be remedied by any such proposal as that made by my hon. friend from Centre Huron, although his proposal is in the right direction. The system by which this House is fed with heated air violates the first principles of ventilation by excluding the fresh air of Heaven, than which there seems to be nothing more cheap or more difficult to get. Every man has a pet project of ventilation which, if employed by the Government, he desires to air. Many things which might be done are left undone. There is a great lack of means by which the carbonic gas that falls to the floor can be removed from the House. If it goes into the basement, as it will if it has an opportunity to go there, it is driven up again by the heated air, and we breathe over and over again vitiated air. When Dr. Brouse took upon himself to examine the means by which this House is fed with fresh air, he found that through the exercise of diabolical ingenuity, the air was brought in by ducts 400 to 600 feet long, in which the air lay for weeks before being admitted into the House, and consequently became stagnant. I have noticed that when steamers are passing along the river, we get their smoke driven up through those ducts from the side of the cliff, and Dr. Brouse said he waded through stagnant water in those ducts a foot and a half deep. The most desirable thing would be to get scientific authority on the subject and have all the sewers examined. It is notorious there is no place where the sewerage is so bad as in Ottawa; every time there is a severe frost they are completely stopped up. I heartily second what has been said by the hon. member for Centre Huron. In the meantime, after the Session is closed at night, there ought to be free circulation of air through the buildings. Hon. members complain that the air in the morning is vitiated with the foul air of the night before. The only way to remove the difficulty is to go to the root of the matter. I have no doubt the hon. member for North Norfolk will be willing to further anything which the House may think desirable in the interest of promoting the health of the members.

Mr. CURRIER. The hon. member for Niagara has stated that the city of Ottawa is the worst drained city in the Dominion. It is well known, on the contrary, that the city of Ottawa is better drained than any city in the Dominion.

Aside from that, however, the sewerage of these buildings is not connected with the sewerage of the city. The drains from these buildings go out to the river, and I do not believe it can be said with truth that the absence of those who are unable to attend the House at present has been caused by the bad ventilation or bad sewerage of these buildings. It is, perhaps, the gas that is generated in this House by the member for Niagara, and others, that hurts us. I believe the atmosphere of this room is as pure as that of any room occupied by so large a number of persons. For my part, on entering it from the outside, I do not experience any disagreeable sensation. In the corridors the air is less pleasant. I believe this Chamber is as well ventilated as any could be. I know the Minister of Public Works has paid a great deal of attention to this matter, and brought about a great improvement in the ventilation since the question was first raised by Dr. Brouse. I think it is a mistake to suppose that the cause of the illness of certain members is the bad ventilation of these buildings.

Mr. PLUMB. I only wish to say that I have heard many of the remarks of the member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) from him once before, and if I had any memory of having excited his ire on a previous occasion, I probably should have excepted him now from the number of gentlemen who have sensitiveness or smell to discover whether this room or any other part of this House is well ventilated or not. As he has elicited cheers from those gentlemen likely to cheer anything reflecting on me, I congratulate him on his feat. But I still insist that the hon. gentleman may be of those who, though acute in many ways—who may have the sense of hearing and taste, and very capable sight—cannot vouch for their nose. I am not in accord with him in saying that this is one of the best ventilated rooms in Ottawa, and that Ottawa is one of the best drained places in the country. It may be in the neighborhood of his residence, and that those who cross the Rideau have not discovered any foul odors in that neighborhood. It may be that in the lower part of the town there is no foul smell arising from the sewers; but those who are unconscious of those odors are peculiarly constituted. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his superiority to me and other people in this respect.

Mr. CURRIER. I must confess my hearing is rather acute and sensitive, and that it has often been shocked by the long speeches of the member for Niagara.

Mr. CHARLTON. The importance of having this Chamber properly ventilated can be hardly overestimated. It is a question to which I have given considerable attention. I confess I have suffered somewhat in health for some years past, in consequence of the imperfect ventilation of these buildings. But I do not consider that the ventilation of this Chamber at present is as defective as in former years. Under the supervision of the present Minister of Public Works, important changes for the better have been made in the ventilation of this Chamber. I do not know that it is fair to attribute all the illness of which members complain to the ventilation of this House. It must be borne in mind that when we come to Ottawa our habits of life are, in a great measure, revolutionized. We turn night into day, and those of us accustomed to outdoor lives, are without that amount of exercise we are in the habit of taking, and that itself greatly influences our health. Besides, many members attend entertainments two or three times a week, and often eat heavy dinners, and all these things affect the health. The only wonder is that not more members are sick in consequence of this great change in their habits during the Session. The provision for the ventilation of this Chamber is such as to secure better air than we have. If an attempt is made to bring in fresh air, a protest is instantly made by many hon. members that there are draughts. You cannot have a movement of air without draughts, which keep the air in proper condition for breathing. If hon. members would bear in mind that draughts of fresh air are less injurious to health than sitting in a stagnant, fetid atmosphere, we can have the air much improved by using our present means and appliances for ventilation. The room where the Public Accounts Committee meets is not one where a person can remain with comfort ten minutes, there being no provision for ventilation. The air of that room, where fifty men often sit for two hours, is enough to make any one sick. The entrance to the air ducts might be examined often and regularly, as they may be letting in impure air. If there is any suggestion with regard to improvement in this direction, let us have it. If this matter could be investigated by a Special Committee, the appointment of one is highly desirable. We could have an abundance of fresh air let into this Chamber, which is practicable, if hon. gentlemen would cease their protests against draughts.

Mr. ORTON. I am glad to see this matter brought up. There can be very little doubt of the truth of what the hon. member for Niagara said, that the House is not ventilated properly. The fact that the air comes in tous every evening from the bed of the Ottawa is sufficient in itself to account for the illness of certain hon. members. We all know that the foul air from Ottawa and Hull must naturally get to the bed of that river, being heavier than pure air, and that in the evening more especially it descends. By the arrangements for the ventilation of this Chamber this impure air from both Ottawa and Hull is drawn into the House nightly. I think the evil could be very easily remedied by building a tower so that we may obtain the fresh air from a higher elevation. The system of ventilation which is practised in the General Hospital in the city of Toronto is the best that I have noticed, and I think it would be well if the engineer who has charge of these buildings would pay a visit to that institution and make himself acquainted with the means there adopted for the purpose of ventilation. I am sure he would be able to obtain information which would be valuable to him, and I know that the surgeon of that institution would be glad to show him around the building and explain the workings of the system, which, by the way, was adopted by the advice of the first medical men of Toronto. The air enters by ducts in the upper part of the room, and aspirators are placed two or three feet above the floor by which the foul air in its natural tendency to descend escapes, and allows the pure air to take its place. Here the cold and the hot air enter by the same channels, so that sometimes we have a current of hot air and then, by way of variety, we have a current of cold air, causing an eddy here and another there, just as are produced to a body of water by the meeting of currents. I think that with very little attention, and not a great deal of expense, these difficulties might be obviated and the ventilation very much improved. But I think what we really require is a radical change—I mean with regard to the position of this Chamber. This part of the building is most unsuitably located; it should, instead of being placed in the very centre of this block, be more exposed both to the air and the rays of the sun, for, as hon. gentlemen know, the admission of sunlight is an important consideration in a question of this kind. I offer a suggestion which, perhaps, may not be received with very much favor by the Government, or by leading members on the other side, but I believe it is one worthy of consideration nevertheless; and that is, that the library, which would be admirably adapted for the purpose, should be used as the Legislative Chamber, and that the present Chamber, with the adjoining corridors, should be transformed into a library. If that is too much to ask them, would it not be well to consider whether a new Chamber ought not to be built at the rear of this building, accessible by air and light, for the purposes of a Legislative Chamber.

Mr. BLAKE. The subject is one which, in view of the state of health of several of our most respected members, deserves our serious consideration. I think that there is a concurrence of opinion that something ought to be done to improve the condition of this room; and, with reference to the admission of air, I think the hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Orton) has about hit the mark. I think that, first of all, a supply of fresh air should be drawn from a more elevated point than at present, and then it should be brought into the room from above and the vitiated air drawn out below. I think, too, that a great deal more attention should be paid to the ventilation of the corridors and other parts of the building. There should not only be provision for a free admission of fresh air, but there should be a systematic means of drawing away the foul air, and of preventing poisonous draughts from coming up from the basement. I agree with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the condition of that large Committee Room upstairs, where we have to spend so large a portion of our time for the three months we are here, is simply scandalous, and for my own part I never spend half an hour there without feeling the effects very sensibly for the remainder of the day, and I dare say many other hon. members can testify to the same experience. There is no reason why we should not have an ample supply of fresh air introduced into that room, or why the foul air should not be drawn out effectually. And as I have had occasion to remark before, the stained windows of this Chamber are very pretty, but I could willingly dispense with a portion of their beauty if they had a large pane here and there which could be opened wide to allow of the admission of fresh air, if no more artificial system of ventilation is available. I once heard a remark made by a very eminent architect on this subject. He was asked, with reference to the British House of Commons, after many thousands had been spent in the effort to improve ventilation, what plan he would suggest, and all he could say was: "Break open the windows." We may have to resort to that elementary means of ventilation if we can obtain no other. I should be glad to welcome any plan which would remedy the evil so generally complained of, but meantime there are two things I would abolish. I think we ought to abolish our late sittings in this Chamber, and I think we ought to get rid of the bar down stairs.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The ventilation of this Chamber, as well as of all the buildings here, was provided for when they were erected, and therefore our efforts have only been directed to the improvement of the ventilation which was adopted at that period. Last year we took the opportunity afforded by the late fire, which took place in the upper portion of this Chamber, to improve the ventilation, and I think we succeeded, as several hon. gentlemen acknowledged that we very largely improved the ventilation of the room. But as some hon. gentlemen have observed, whenever there is an attempt to introduce fresh air into this Chamber, both my own colleagues and those who sit directly opposite us come to me and say: "The draughts are terrible; do you want to drive us over to your side of the House by this draught behind us?" That has been said this Session. The atmosphere was very heavy and the air very foul, especially during our long sitting lasting for some seventeen hours or so. Orders were given to try and admit some fresh air, but as soon as those orders were carried out many members came to me and said they would have to leave the House on account of the draught. There is no doubt that there is not in the Dominion a building more difficult to ventilate than this. If we try to ventilate it hon. gentlemen complain, and if we do not ventilate it they complain still more. The whole matter is in the hands of the House, and if it will allow us to bring in fresh air, fresh air can be brought in. But I can promise hon. gentlemen that if we do that, before half an hour is over we will have complaints from hon. gentlemen on both sides, and the hon. gentleman opposite who has now his hat on his head (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) would not be the last to come to me to complain of draughts. On the other hand, I admit that the ventilation is far from perfect. The Railway Committee Room is especially faulty in that respect. It was never built for such a large Committee as now meets there. We must remember, that it was built before Confederation, with no expectation that 120 or 130 members would meet there at a time. However, that room can be ventilated through the windows. We have had experience of ventilation through the windows in the Privy Council Room where fourteen members meet together, and as secrecy is sought to be attained we have to ventilate it by the windows. I admit there is a great deal of force in the remarks that the atmosphere of this Chamber is affected by the bad air that comes from the river. There may be a good deal of that, and I shall immediately call the attention of my officers to that point. Orders have been given to examine frequently the air-ducts, to see that they are kept in good order, yet there may be something defective in connection with them. But hon. gentlemen must remember that we do not live entirely in this Chamber, that we spend a large part of our time outside or in our own lodgings. The hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Currier) says, that the drainage of this city has been made as perfect as that of any other city, but I must say that quite lately that has not been found to be the case. The air-ducts were found to be closed, and as the foul air had no other means of escape it escaped through the dwelling. My own house is as good as can be found in the city, yet there have been times when I had to complain of the foul air to the City Surveyor, who caused the ducts to be opened. That may be another cause of sickness. However, I do not think, though I am not a medical man, that foul air would produce inflammation of the lungs or diseases of that nature, though it may be a predisposing cause. At all events hon. gentlemen must not attribute all this sickness to the bad ventilation of the House. If the House thinks it well that there should be a Committee of medical men appointed to enquire into the matter, the Government will be most happy to give effect to the recommendations of such a Committee. I shall see my colleagues about the matter, and we may ask Parliament for a reasonable sum of money to meet the expenses of remedying the evils that have been complained of. I hope those hon. gentlemen who are now ill will soon recover, and that no one may have future cause of complaints against the sanitary arrangements of this Chamber.

Mr. LONGLEY. I think enough has been said upon the general subject which has been engaging the attention of the House, and I propose to offer a word or two upon one branch of the subject that relates to the bar in the regions below. I have never yet been able to tell exactly for what purpose that bar has been run, or rather for what purpose it was established. I cannot see upon what principle it is being run, whether it is for the special benefit of the members or of the outside public, for I have observed that it has been patronized pretty liberally this Session by both.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

Mr. LONGLEY. I sometimes have occasion to go down stairs, but always for perfectly legitimate purposes. But when I go below, or wherever I go, I have my eye out to this traffic against which I have always pitted myself, and always expect to. If it has been considered indispensable for getting the ardent liquors below for the special benefit of those who belong to this House, and who may desire it, I cannot conceive that there is any necessity whatever, or that it is at all proper, that the outside public should on certain occasions, and when we sit late at night, be thronging these corridors and be running up and down those stairs, because some of them—and I have seen them myself—have partaken so freely that they could not stand up without leaning against the side of the wall. I am quite aware that I render myself amenable to the criticisms of some hon. gentlemen when I thus express myself; but I am quite confident that I am in the right, and if I stood alone on the floor of this House, or anywhere else, I would always feel it my duty to raise my voice against these improprieties. I venture to express the hope that the Commission on Internal Economy will attach some importance to the observations which have been made, and lend their aid to bring about a condition of things that would at least bear the semblance of respectability.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. I would just say, in reply to the hon. Minister of Public Works, that I trust that he will not neglect to have a thorough examination made of the drains and the basement. I have a very strong suspicion that a thorough search similar to that made at the instance of Senator Brouse, would reveal a state of things not much better than was discovered then.

Mr. McINNES. With respect to the ventilation of this building, I take the liberty of offering two suggestions to the Minister of Public Works—first, that the temperature should be reduced at least five degrees, and, second, that after the House adjourns every window and door that can be, should be thrown open, so that a current of pure, fresh air should permeate into every section of this building and expel the foul air generated while the House is in Session.

Mr. CHARLTON. I venture to suggest that, so far as temperature is concerned, that can be secured at any time with the means we have already at our disposal.

Mr. ROCHESTER. One great difficulty is that, owing to the position of the boilers, we get the air through them instead of through the ducts, and I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works that these boilers should be closed in, and the foul air from that enclosure removed by means of a shaft. During late night sittings I have frequently experienced a smell similar to that of exhaust steam and of burnt grease from an engine. If the air were forced down from above, which I believe is now done in the English chamber, and which I think could be done here if scientific men were got to do it, it would be a great improvement. I would certainly recommend the appointment of a Committee to investigate this matter, and that the Minister of Public Works should place a sum in the Estimates to put this building in proper order.

Mr. BANNERMAN. It is one of the simplest things to ventilate this building, and if the Minister of Public Works would only obtain the services of a colliery engineer, who is in the habit of ventilating coal mines, to start a furnace here, I believe, for a few thousand dollars, we could have first class ventilation on the principle adopted by all large coal mines.

Mr. CURRIER. The hon. member for Carleton has suggested that something might be done to remove the foul air from the boilers. The boilers, we know, are out of doors, and what can be better than the draught of the smoke stack, which is 200 feet high and very large inside? Objection has been taken to the way in which the air is brought into the building. It comes from the brow of the hill, about 150 feet above the river, and is brought in to the building through cut stone ducts, which are perfectly clear and smooth; and there is no possibility of the air becoming contaminated in passing through them. Altogether, I think the ventilation of this room is as near perfection as anything can be, although I think something might be done to increase the purity of the air in the corridors surrounding the chamber.

Mr. BOURBEAU. Mr. Speaker, I know that the system of ventilation was defective last year, but I am of opinion that since the repairs were made a great change has taken place, and I do not believe that we could easily get better ventilation than we have. I think that the air in this chamber is quite healthy, and that it would be useless to expend large sums of money on repairs that would give us no better result. If I had a suggestion to make, Sir, to those who complain, it would be to talk less, so as to get through the Session quicker and remain here as short a time as possible. If the hon. members who complain so much did not drag out the debates, we might, perhaps, bring the Session to a close in two months' time, and those who complain, those whose health is not good, could return to the bosoms of their families, and there recuperate. That was the remedy I thought of suggesting, Sir, but I know very well that I shall not succeed, for it is rather difficult to prevent a good many hon. members from prolonging the discussion. But I say again to the hon. Minister of Public Works that it would be perfectly useless to expend large sums of money on repairs in this chamber, which is, in my opinion, in a satisfactory state. Any one who is not unwell before coming here, can certainly go through the Session in good health.

CONTRACT BETWEEN DENIS COHOLAN AND THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WELDON moved for a return of contract between the Government and Denis Coholan, dated January 18th, 1877, with that part of the specification relating to the size and number of scows employed with the dredge operating at the Deep Water Terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, St. John, N.B.; also, the correspondence between the Department of Public Works and the said Denis Coholan, in reference to the termination of the contract, and also all reports and other papers connected with the said contract.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is very much to be regretted that the Minister of Railways is not able to be in his seat owing to indisposition, as we should like to have from him the explanation he promised to give of the reason why this contract was cancelled. We, in St. John, believe that the only reason was a political one. This Denis Coholan had been not more active than many others, but had taken an active part in the election after the change of Government, and he was punished for having taken that active part. When an advertisement appeared in the St. John Sun, asking for tenders for a new contract, application was made to the department to know why Coholan had been thus dealt with, and the only answer received was that it was found necessary to enter into a new contract, and that there was to be some change made in the number and size of the scows. It is alleged that no change has been made in either of those particulars, and that, therefore, was a mere pretext for the cancellation of the contract. In the contract the Government reserved the right to cancel it, but such right is reserved for the protection of the public interest, and not that one Government or other might be able to punish a contractor who is obnoxious to them politically, even though he had performed his duties well and faithfully. In this case Mr. Coholan asserts that he never gave the Government ground for complaint, that he discharged his duties to the satisfaction of the officers, and that in the reply given him no assertion was made that any conditions of the contract had been violated. Moreover, instead of laying up his vessel for the winter and so save a large expense, he kept her afloat during the whole winter at very considerable expense, for the purpose of carrying out the contract. The work was, however, taken from him and given to other parties, and for no reason but that he had voted and acted on one political side instead of on the other during the election which preceded the cancellation of the contract by a few months. That is the allegation, and we desire very much to hear the explanation which the hon. Minister of Railways seems to think a sufficient and satisfactory answer to any allegations made by Mr. Coholan and his friends. I hope and trust the Minister will soon be in his place, and when he does so, I think it will be proper in some way to call upon him for the explanation.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I can only express my regret that the hon. the Minister of Railways is unable to be in his place; but when he is present he will not be required to be called upon, but will be very happy indeed to furnish all the information in the department in reference to this case. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Anglin) has referred to political influences. It may be supposed from the fact that Mr. Coholan resides, I presume, in my constituency, that if any political influence was exercised, it was, perhaps, at my suggestion. I can only say that, until I saw the notice on the paper, I did not know that Mr. Coholan had had a contract, and that I do not know how he voted. I know nothing whatever of the transaction, and I do not remember hearing his name mentioned before or after my election, and, therefore, the cancellation cannot have been done at my suggestion. Moreover, I would not know Mr. Coholan if I met him on the street. I am quite sure the hon. the Minister of Railways will be exceedingly glad to make a statement on the case when he is in his place, and answer the statement made by the member for Gloucester.

DREDGING AT THE INTERCOLONIAL DEEP WATER TERMINUS AT ST. JOHN, N. B.

Mr. WELDON moved for a return of the contracts made since February, 1877, for dredging at the Deep Water Terminus of the Intercolonial Railway, St. John, New Brunswick, with the portion of the specification relating to the size and number of scows employed, and also, the amount paid out since that date for dredging at such terminus. He said: A contract for dredging at the Intercolonial Deep Water Terminus was entered into in 1877. There was a clause in the contract giving the Government the power to terminate it. That, however, was inserted only with the object of protecting the Government if the contractor failed to do his duty; but no charge of that kind was made, but so far as my information goes, when the contractor was ready with his tug to perform the required service new tenders were called for. On application to the Government he was informed that the only reason for cancelling the contract was that they had made a change in the size and number of tugs. When the objection made is on a matter over which he has no control, some compensation should be made to the man so suddenly deprived of his contract.

VOLUNTEERS IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

Mr. WELDON moved for a return of the number of men that have withdrawn, left, been discharged, or struck off the rolls in the different battalions of volunteers in the Province of New Brunswick during the years 1878, 1879 and 1880, specifying the number from each battalion, and the causes of such withdrawal, discharge, or removal from the muster rolls.

Mr. CARON said it was impossible to furnish all the information asked for. He could furnish the hon. member with copies of the muster rolls.

Mr. WELDON said that would be sufficient.

CLAIMS FOR DRAWBACKS.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant) said: Sometime ago I moved for copies of all regulations made by Orders in Council with reference to the payment of claims presented for drawbacks on goods manufactured for export. In response to this order, we are furnished with only a partial statement of what I asked for, which necessitates the making another motion which I will place in your hands, and embrace the opportunity which it affords me of calling the attention of the House, and particularly of the Ministry, to a subject that I consider of some importance to the country. I, for one, have always placed a high value on the proper encouragement of the manufactures of this country, and never hesitated to say that, when they can be promoted without unduly pressing upon any interest or section, that that was a wise and prudent policy to adopt. And it is a matter of no little satisfaction to one who, like myself, is engaged in that branch of industry, and, doubtless, to every other hon. gentleman who is a lover of the progress and advancement of the country in all its departments, to know that, young a country as we are, in the progress we have made in our manufactures there has been fair cause for congratulation. I find that there are thirty-two countries to which the manufactures of Canada are exported. Not only are we producing largely for our own wants, but we are shipping our manufactured goods to almost every country upon the globe. They have found their way into Great Britain, United States, Newfoundland, British West Indies, Spanish West Indies, French West Indies, Danish West Indies, British Guiana, Mexico, South America, Havana, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, Turkey, Egypt, Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Sandwich Islands, Denmark, Spain, Hayti, Norway, Canary Islands, Greece, Japan, St. Pierre and Belgium, during the last few years; and it must be a matter of some satisfaction to us, because it proves that we can meet foreign manufacturers in all the countries of the world and sell our productions against theirs. This affords proof, also, that we are in a good position to supply the wants of our own country. The Trade and Navigation Returns, if we had the census, shortly to be taken, would give us the proportion of goods manufactured in Canada to its requirements, when I dare say we should be startled to find how large the proportion of many classes of goods is that are already made in this country. I have always been a consistent advocate, not only by speech but vote, of the promotion of our industries in a legitimate way—and I might say to the Finance Minister, who exclaims "hear, hear," perhaps somewhat ironically—that during all the time I have had the honor of a seat in this House I have uniformly supported a tariff that gave protection to our manufacturers, and that, during the five years of the late Administration, I supported its tariff which beyond doubt afforded a fairer amount of protection to the great bulk of our manufactures than that introduced by the hon. gentleman himself. I have no hesitancy in making that statement, and I have figures that will enable me to prove the assertion. I speak from a practical knowledge of it and from the statistics furnished by the public records themselves. From the arguments of supporters of the Government we should naturally have expected that our manufactures would have been nearly extinct prior to the advent of the present Administration and the adoption of the existing tariff; or we might have looked for, under this policy, what it was supposed and designed specially to produce, wondrous results to the country in increased prosperity in every branch of industry in this Canada of ours. But what are the facts? I shall confine myself to matters which are pertinent to the motion, and endeavor to point out to the Finance Minister and the Minister of Customs that the exports of the manufactures of this country are decreasing to an alarming extent. And I shall furnish the figures to prove my statement from the official documents which those hon. gentlemen themselves have put in our hands. I shall show that this policy under which we are living at the present time, a policy which it was claimed would permanently benefit our manufactures, has almost wiped out the exportation of manufactures from this country. I shall make a comparison between the exports for the year 1878, the last year of a 17½ per cent. tariff, under the Mackenzie Administration, and the year 1880, when the National Policy tariff, ranging from 25 to 60 per cent., was in full operation—a tariff which, contrary to all sound principles of protection, imposes duties on raw materials, and thus militates against the success of many of our leading branches of manufacture. Take first agricultural implements, one of the largest of our industries, at any rate in one of the Provinces of the Dominion. In 1878 we were not only able to supply the wants of the country, for there was scarcely any importation at all, but we exported $86,001 worth; in 1880 we exported only $59,128 worth, a decrease of $26,873, or, in other words, in two short years we have wiped out about one-third of our agricultural implement industry. If the same rate of decrease is kept up for four more years the export trade in these articles will be entirely wiped out. Biscuits is the next item: we exported of these in 1878, $29,986 worth, and in 1880, $20,063, a decrease of $9,923, or over one-third. Of candles, we exported, in 1878, $14,790; in 1880, $4,574, a decrease of $10,216, or nearly three-fourths. Of carriages, we exported, in 1878, $58,409; in 1880, $40,480, a decrease of $17,929, or nearly one-third. Four years more at that rate our export trade in that article will have disappeared. Of clothing we exported, in 1878, $24,754; in 1880, $8,742, a decrease of $16,012, or nearly two-thirds. Of confectionery, we exported, in 1878, $723 worth—a small amount, but small as it was, it was increasing, but under the National Policy it shrank to $85 worth, or nearly nine-tenths of a decrease. Of cordage, ropes and twine we exported, in 1878, $21,076 worth; in 1880, $14,084 worth, a decrease of $6,992, or nearly one-third. Of drugs and medicines, we exported, in 1878, $5,991 worth, and in 1880, only $98 worth, a decrease of nine-tenths. If that rate is maintained for two short months the export trade of that industry will disappear altogether. Of extract of hemlock bark (prepared), we exported $187,840 in 1878, and $171,808 in 1880, a decrease of $16,032, or one-twelfth. Of furs, we exported, in 1878, $6,197, and in 1880, $4,469, a decrease of $1,728, or nearly one-fourth. Of ground gypsum, we exported in 1878, $22,527, and in 1880, only $3,925, a decrease of $18,602, or nearly two-thirds. Of hats and caps, there were exported in 1878, $572, and in 1880 only $400 worth, a decrease of $172, or nearly one-third. Of Indian bark-work, in 1878 we exported $843, and in 1880 we exported none, so that already that industry has been wiped out. Of hardware iron there was exported in 1878, $102,983 worth, and in 1880, $92,588, a decrease of $10,395, or about one-tenth. Of jewellery and plated ware, we exported in 1878, $70 worth; in 1880 only $9, a decrease of $61, or nine-tenths. Of sole and upper leather, we exported in 1878, $563,221 worth; in 1880, $408,708, a decrease of $154,513, or about one-fourth. In six years at the same rate the export of those articles will have stopped altogether. Of harness and saddlery, we exported in 1878, $3,405; in 1880, $3,314, a decrease of $91, or about one-fortieth. Of other leather, we exported in 1878, $18,806; in 1880, $8,357, a decrease of $10,449, or, in other words, one-half that export has been wiped out in two years. One-half of our exports of that item has been wiped out in two years, and in two years more, at that ratio of decrease, that item of exports would disappear altogether. Then we come to boots and shoes, the item that created so much concern a few years ago, that item of which there was only $200,000 worth imported, while there was $17,000,000 worth made in the country during the late Administration—what has been the effect of the tariff introduced by those hon. gentlemen upon that industry? Why, in 1878, after supplying $17,000,000 or $20,000,000 worth to our own people, we were able to export to other countries $236,345 worth.

But what have we been able to export during the past year? Only $165,147 worth, a decrease of $71,198, a decrease of nearly one-third in that item in two years. In four years more, at the same ratio of decrease, that item is wiped out altogether from the list of exports. In lime, in 1878, the exports were $8,301; in 1880, $8,047, a decrease of about one-fortieth. In ale, beer, and cider, in 1878 the exports were $32,283; in 1880, $18,952, a decrease of $13,331, or over two-fifths. In spirits, exclusive of whiskey, the exports in 1878 were $135,908; in 1880, $12,034, a decrease of $123,874, or nine-tenths. I now come to machinery, another large branch of industry in this country, that has shops scattered throughout the Dominion in every important town, that embraces as many skilled laborers, perhaps, as are employed in any other branch of industry. What has been the effect of the tariff upon that particular industry? In 1878 the exports of machinery amounted to $77,482; in 1880 they shrank to $47,193; a decrease of $30,289, or two-fifths. Then we come to musical instruments, other than pianos and organs—for there has been an increase in the exports of pianos and organs—and we find that while in 1878, the exports amounted to $1,466, in 1880 they amounted to only $470, a decrease of $996, or nearly three-fourths. Oil cakes, exports in 1878, $76,697; in 1880, $21,819, a decrease of $54,878, or over two-thirds. A simple calculation will show us that, at the same rate of decrease, another year will have wiped out that item of export altogether. Sails, in 1878 the exports were $846; in 1880, $689, a decrease of $157, or nearly one-sixth. Sewing machines—this is another important industry that gives employ to a great amount of skilled labor, an industry that was in a thriving condition before the present occupancy of the Treasury benches had the slightest hope of obtaining the position they occupy—what has been the effect of the tariff upon that industry? In 1878 we were enabled to export $273,258; while in 1880 the exports were only $201,545, a decrease of $71,713, or one-fourth in two years. Then we come to an item that interests my friends from the Maritime Provinces, and that ought to interest my hon. friend the Finance Minister—the item of ships sold to other countries, a prominent industry among the mechanics and artizan classes of those provinces. What has been the effect of this tariff introduced under the plea of benefitting these artizans? The figures furnished by the Finance Minister himself tell the tale of the effect that has been produced. In 1878 this item amounted to $1,218,145; last year it was $464,327, a decrease of $753,818 in one year, or two-thirds of a decrease of the exports of ships sold to other countries in two years. Another year of the like rate of decrease and ships sold to other countries will be a thing unknown in the Maritime Provinces, and the artizans will have to turn their attention to some other branch of industry. Coming from ships to soap, we were enabled to export of the latter article in 1878, $8,629; in 1880, $4,498, a decrease of $4,131, or one-half. Wrought stone in 1878, $13,154; in 1880, $6,811, a decrease of $6,343, or nearly one-half. In tobacco stems and cutting, in 1878, $15,941; in 1880, $7,701, a decrease of $8,240, or over one-half. Other tobacco, in 1878, $63,852; in 1880, $28,141, a decrease of $35,711, or over one-half. Vinegar, in 1878, $335; in 1880, $181, a decrease of $154, or nearly one-half. Doors, sashes, and blinds, in 1878, $36,777; in 1880, $22,742, a decrease of $14,035, or over one-third. Woollens—that industry that we intended to promote and protect so much, that industry that would have, furnished, if all the promises of hon. gentlemen opposite had been kept, all the clothing worn by the people of this country at the present time, and would have enabled us to send exports to foreign countries—what has been the effect of the tariff upon that industry? The figures are not very much in either year, but they will do for purposes of comparison. In 1878 we were enabled to export of woollens, $33,897; in 1880 we exported $32,687, a decrease of $1,210, or over one-thirtieth. That speaks a good deal for an industry that was sought to be protected to such an extent that the Finance Minister doubled the amount of duty upon it, while at the same time he let raw materials come in free, which he did not do in many other cases. The totals of the exports of these thirty-five articles are, in 1878, $3,374,609, and in 1880, $1,883,584, a decrease in two years of $1,485,025, or over two-fifths. If we go on at the same rate, in about four or five years more we shall have wiped out entirely the exports of these thirty-five important industries. Some of them are small—let hon. gentlemen not console themselves with that thought. Let me ask them if, in the industries I have mentioned, in which our exports have decreased to such an extent, the great bulk of the important industries of this country are not included. I ask them if they do not include the industries which furnish employment to more than one-half of the artisans in this country? I go further; I ask them if the boot and shoe industry, the agricultural implement industry, the woollen industry, the ship building industry, and the other industries I have mentioned, do not give employment to three-fourths of the skilled labor of this country? I venture the statement that they do, and I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to contradict it. My object is not to make an attack on the tariff at the present time.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. PATERSON. I am sorry that I cannot give plain figures without their amounting to an attack on the tariff, as is evidenced by the hon. Finance Minister's "hear hear." But that is not my fault. My object is to point out a remedy that I think ought to be applied in order to improve, if possible, our export trade, if the present tariff is to be continued in force. But before doing that, hon. gentlemen will agree with me that it is only right and proper—having mentioned these industries which have been crippled, having mentioned the exports which have decreased—that I should now mention the exports which have increased. Instead of there being thirty-five articles in which there is an increase, I find that there are only twenty-four. I will run over them as rapidly as possible:

Totals	753,096	1,363,033	599,937

From this total increase in these twenty-four articles of export of $599,937, I think the hon. gentleman will not deny that I am fairly entitled to deduct the iron scrap increase, amounting to $167,298. That iron scrap is produced in the ordinary course of labor of men employed in machine shops. It is simply the gathering together of all the pieces of iron that cannot be utilized for any purpose. Why it is classed under this head of manufactures I cannot say, but at any rate the labor used in that is the labor employed in the machine shops in which there is a decrease of exports. There is no skilled labor, at any rate, required in the production of rags. We might fairly be entitled to take that from the list. While there are other items that I might deduct, it will be found that deducting these two items from the increased exports, or deducting $201,981, would leave a net increase of $397,956. We have, in other words, 22 articles of manufacture, the exports of which in two years have been increased by $397,956; while, in 35 articles, embracing three-fourths of our industries that employ skilled labor, we have a decrease of $1,485,025. Taking the total export of manufactured goods, what do we find? The total exports in 1878 were $1,127,155, and in 1880, $3,242,617, or a total decrease of $885,138. Very little figuring will show the hon. Finance Minister that, taking that test, we have an actual decrease in our exports of manufactured goods in two years of one-fifth. In eight years more, at the same rate, our exports of manufactured goods would be entirely wiped out. As I said before, my object is not to attack the tariff; but it will be remembered that it was pointed out to hon. gentleman opposite that the tariff they introduced was not a scientific one, that it was copied in a large measure from the United States tariff, and from that fact must, of necessity, work injury to our country, because the situation and resources of the two countries are altogether dissimilar in many respects. The United States comprise within their territory almost every clime; they can grow cotton and sugar in the south, tobacco for plug in the northern and southern States, and tobacco for cigars in the New England States; they have vast mineral deposits and coal beds necessary to the proper development of their manufacturing power. Having no regard to the dissimilar circumstances of the two countries, it is not to be wondered at that the results I have described should follow. To tax iron and coal, raw material not produced, and which cannot be produced here for many years, must necessarily, instead of benefitting manufacturers, do them great injury. But the hon. Finance Minister said he had a remedy, and his remedy was to give manufacturers a drawback on the material that entered into their manufactures equal to the amount of duty on it. That system of drawbacks has not been carried out, and the result is seen in the disastrous figures I have quoted.

Mr. BOWELL. In what particular has it not been carried out?

Mr. PATERSON. I am coming to that. I am glad the hon. Minister is paying attention to me, and if I do him an injustice I shall be glad to remedy it. I assure him, also, that when I make this statement I make no special attack on his department. I am not given to flatter any man, but I will say that I believe there is administrative ability enough in his department to carry out the remedy that I think I can point out, if he will only be able to prevail on his colleagues to apply it. Until we can get some capable man from this side of the House to administer the affairs of that department, there is no man I would rather see administer it than the hon. gentleman now at its head. Let no hon. gentleman think we are discussing an unimportant subject when discussing our export trade in manufactured goods. I am an advocate of Canadians supplying their own wants; but after all the source of a country's wealth is its capability of producing more than it requires, so that a surplus will be had for export in exchange for the gold of other nations. No tariff can interfere with the export of animals and other products, agricultural products and the products of the forest, except to injure that trade. The export trade of manufactured goods of this country in 1878, as I have said, had reached this enormous amount of $4,127,755. Why, the total product of our mines in 1878 amounted only to $2,869,303. The exports of manufactured goods was nearly double the exports of the products of the mines, and were thus a source of wealth to our country. In 1880 the products of the mines were $2,981,613. They have increased, while our exports of manufactured goods have decreased nearly $1,000,000. This product of the fisheries, about which we boast so much as a great industry and great source of wealth, brought into the country in 1878, $6,929,366. So that our manufactured exports in 1878, though not a source of so much wealth to the country as the products of our valuable fisheries, produced in fact two-thirds as much. Therefore, when we talk about encouraging and developing the export trade of our manufactured goods, we are not speaking of an insignificant interest, but about that which is a source of wealth, and, relatively, a greater source of it than some of those other great industries of the country, approaching to within one-quarter almost the most important industry we have. Then, if I am enabled to point out how those manufacturing industries are placed at a disadvantage with reference to the export trade, the House will agree with me that if any steps can be devised by which it would be relieved, that great good would thereby be accomplished. Now, I devote myself to answering a question that has been asked by the Minister of Customs. I have this return brought down by him in response to my inquiry, and which professes to be an account of all the drawback paid on all the manufactured goods exported. What does it show? A total of 203 claims presented for drawback on the tin used in the making of lobster cans, and which claims were allowed amounting in the aggregate, in the twenty-one months covered by the return, leaving out the cents, to $12,998. Then, there was allowed by way of drawback on four different claims, to the Edwardsburg Starch Company, $634 on corn used in the manufacture of starch exported to foreign countries; and there is an item of $275 for drawback to gentlemen in Stratford on oats used in the making of oatmeal, and $550 to others in Stratford on the export of oil cake made from imported linseed. There is also an item of $49 paid as drawback to the Dominion Barbed Wire Company, for wire used for fences; and one of $34 for tin used in canning meat; and on five claims of different manufactures of pilot bread from flour, $8.36 was allowed in drawbacks. The total amount of drawbacks paid by the Government in the twenty-one months, ending December 16th, 1880, was $15,379. As lobsters do not appear among the manufactured goods exported, they are to be found under the head of "products of the fisheries." We must take the drawback allowed on the cans from that return. Now, deducting from this total of $15,379, the drawback allowed on those lobster cans, namely, $12,998, we find the total amount paid by way of drawbacks was but $2,380; and part of this amount is allowed on oats used in making oatmeal, which does not appear among our manufactured goods, but among our agricultural exports. This sum of $2,380 is all that is allowed to compensate all our manufacturers who have exported goods to foreign countries to the amount of between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000. We now can readily see why the export of manufactured goods dropped out. We knew our manufacturers were heavily loaded. Iron formerly admitted free is heavily taxed, and the same is true of coal and boiler-plate, which is not made in this country and may never be. Tubing is not made in Canada, and I fear never will be, because the total demand in Canada would not keep in existence a single factory, and it, too, is heavily taxed as well as all the materials of the manufactured articles; and yet as this total export of between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 of manufactured goods, on which the present tariff has levied such enormous burdens, there has been paid in drawbacks only $2,380. Our manufacturers entered into business in good faith, and the export trade was in good condition before the present Government harrassed it by their tariff. Our goods had penetrated thirty different countries, and were making rapid progress; but our manufactures now show signs of languishing, and the reason is that they have been hampered and harrassed by duties on the materials, which we were told would be returned by way of drawbacks. There is in my own city one of the finest manufacturing establishments in the Dominion, and one of the most enterprising firms, which was engaged in the export trade years ago. They have their mills running in Germany, Russia and every Province in the Dominion, as well as in Chili, in South America. They have now ready a shipment for Chili, to follow previous shipments, another for Australia, and one for Prussia, and that establishment has been burdened by the duties on boiler-plates, and tubes entering into boilers, and on the iron and saw-teeth, and coal, used in its operations. This establishment, has already made ten different shipments for foreign countries, aggregating $27,000, which will bring back wealth to our country. The firm tell me their export trade is badly crippled. They have to work on a close margin in competition with the men who enter the markets of Europe, Chili and other countries, and have to hold their own with all rivals in the markets of the world. They have hard work to compete against the goods of Great Britain and the United States, which have free coal and iron, and which manufacture such articles as iron, saw-teeth, and so forth, that have to be imported by Canadians. With all these difficulties to contend with, the margin for Canadian goods seems sufficiently small. The amount of the drawback they claimed would not be allowed, though they paid strict attention to the details of the amount of taxation upon the articles which entered into the construction of their machines though they kept closely within the mark, because the regulations made by the department with reference to the payment of draw-backs are of such a nature that it is impossible for an honest man to make the affidavit which is required. That is the reason, Sir, why I put this motion in your hands. In my previous motion I covered the ground which I intended to cover, but, unfortunately, I asked for "regulations of the department," so with the red-tape which characterizes every department, a memorandum was added to the return stating that there were no regulations made in the department, but that the matter was regulated by Orders in Council, and therefore I am obliged to make the present motion. If I had the information which I ask in my hands at the present time I would be able to point out more intelligently than I can without it the difficulties which exist with regard to this system of drawbacks, and to show what is necessary to enable us to carry on this export trade. But I have quoted fairly the figures which are given in the blue book, I have pointed out the effect of the remedy which was proposed for the evils to which hon. gentlemen know our export trade would be exposed, and I can assure hon. gentlemen that the regulations they have imposed, or the Orders in Council they have passed, are such that the honest manufacturer cannot avail themselves of these drawback. I have shown from the figures I quoted, that instead of our exports amounting to $4,000,000 as they did a few years ago, the figures show that at the present rate of decrease our export trade in manufactured goods will soon be wiped out altogether, and that all we can look to as a means of developing our manufactures and enlarging their market, will be the natural increase of our own population. I trust that the subject which seems to me to be one of great magnitude will receive the attention of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Customs.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have only to say that the hon. gentleman has made in advance a statement which I might have reasonably expected after making my Budget speech, and I can only say that having put me in possession of his views, I shall take the opportunity of answering them at the proper time, and I trust that I shall be able to answer them to the satisfaction of the House.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not my intention to enter upon a discussion of the subject with which the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) has dealt during the last hour and a half. I think that probably the best answer to all his arguments with reference to the exports of the country, will be found in a short paragraph on page six of the Trade and Navigation Returns, in which the Commissioner points out the important fact, that for the first time in the history of this country since Confederation, the exports have exceeded the imports by $1,421,711, and that they exceed also the value of the goods entered for consumption by $16,129,109.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I spoke of the exports of manufactured goods, that is what we should consider.

Mr. BOWELL. Yes; the hon. gentleman has selected twenty or thirty different articles, and has made out a very good case for the Government in showing that our home market, which was formerly supplied by foreign countries, is now occupied by our own manufacturers. I will not, however, discuss the general question at the present moment. I merely rise for the purpose of pointing out the fact that, in a speech of one and a half hours duration, the hon. gentleman made only one point, and that was with reference to the drawback refused by the department to the Waterous Manufacturing Company, which does business in the city in which the hon. member resides. Had he questioned me upon that matter, I would have told him why the drawback was refused. The hon. gentleman said that the promise made by the Finance Minister was that drawbacks should be paid to manufacturers upon the duty they paid on raw materials used in their manufactures. When I tell the House that the articles upon which this company demanded drawbacks were not only raw materials, but, to a large extent, manufactured articles—articles complete in themselves, purchased in the United States and brought into this country to be used in the portable saw mills and other machinery which they make—hon. members will at once understand that no promise was made by the hon. the Finance Minister or any other member of the Cabinet which was intended to cover such imports as these. The policy adopted by the Government is to allow a drawback of the duty paid upon the raw material used in the manufactories of Canada. Upon evidence being produced that the article upon which a drawback of duty paid is asked, was imported and that it was used in the manufacture of an article which had been exported, the duty has invariably been refunded to the manufacturer. In regard to the case in question, I may say that not a single document has yet been produced upon which a drawback could be paid, from the simple fact that the importation made by the Waterous Company included saws, screws, and a number of other articles which are complete in themselves, and upon the manufacture of which no additional labor was required after they were brought into the country. That is a simple, and I trust a satisfactory reply to the complaint which the hon. gentleman has made. The regulations made by the Government in reference to the affidavits which have to be made simply cover the facts that importation was made, that the duty was paid, that the imported material went into the manufacture of some article which it was proposed to export, and that exportation has been made. Upon such an affidavit being made, whether the article produced be a Waterous saw mill, or a tin can for preserving lobsters, the money is at once paid over. In reference to the question of ships which the hon. gentleman has mentioned, I can assure him that there has been no complaint whatever. I have the testimony of an hon. gentleman on his own side of the House that the system which has gone into operation has given the utmost satisfaction to the shipbuilders of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick; that there has not been the slightest complaint made in reference to the payment of the drawback; for within a day after the proper papers are sent to the department, the drawback is ordered to be made.

Mr. MILLS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for returns were severally agreed to:—

Correspondence with the Hudson's Bay Company, or any person acting in its behalf, with reference to the south-east quarter and the north half of Section 7, Township 17, Range 20, west of the 1st principal meridian, and for all papers, Orders in Council, &c., respecting the granting of the said land to the company; in lieu of other land alleged to be occupied by settlers.—(Mr. Drew.)

Return of the accounts of stock taken in the stores or shops of the Intercolonial Railway at Moncton during the years 1879 and 1880, and also a return of any differences between amount of stock taken and that in the stock ledger during these years.—(Mr. Weldor.)

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following Bills were considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 8) to reduce the Capital Stock of the Exchange Bank of Canada, and otherwise to amend the Act respecting said Bank.—(Mr. Desjardins.)

Bill (No. 36) further to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Guarantee Company.—(Mr. Gault.)

Bill (No. 59) to incorporate "The Moncton Harbor Improvement Company."—(Sir Albert J. Smith.)

Bill (No. 60) to incorporate the Don River Improvement Company.—(Mr. Platt.)

House adjourned at 6:15 o'clock, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 17th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

MAILS BETWEEN CANADA AND WEST INDIES.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Whether the Government have made, or are they making, mail arrangements between Canada and the Spanish West India Islands, with a Clyde steamship company, sailing under the Spanish flag.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No arrangement has been made and no negotiations are going on at the present time between the Government and a Clyde steamship company, sailing under the Spanish flag.

LOCK No. 2, ON WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. RYKERT enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appropriate any money towards the enlargement of Lock No. 2, on the Welland Canal, in accordance with the petition of the Corporation of the city of St. Catharines?

Mr. LANGEVIN. In the absence of my colleague, the hon. the Minister of Railways, I may say it is the intention of the Government to act in accordance with the representations made to them.

COURT OF RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McCarthy for the second reading of Bill (No. 12) for constituting a Court of Railway Commissioners for Canada, and to amend the Consolidated Railway Act, 1879, and the motion of Mr. McCuaig in amendment thereto

Mr. McLENNAN. I believe that the Bill of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) is one of very great importance, not so much from its immediate urgency as from the fact that it is travelling in the right direction, and that it is dealing with the subject of railway management in a form in which it certainly must be dealt with before a very long time. Nobody who has had any experience, or has made any observation of the methods of railway management, can fail to understand that constant difficulties will arise in the management of traffic, that must be dealt with by some competent tribunal other than the managers of railways, controlling the relations of the public in their own hands. This is a very simple matter to state, and so long as railway managers, from the highest general manager down to the least subordinate, are only human, this fact must remain as it is. Well, the experience that has been had in England, as has been so well described by the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill, has, I think, clearly established the fact that, in order to deal with this question it is necessary to have some special tribunal—that it is impossible for the individual carrying and owning a parcel of freight, or having any other business of a limited nature with a railway company, to follow up a case through all the ordinary courts of law, with any prospect of an immediate or fair solution of his difficulties. The cure for this difficulty, in England, as we have understood, has been the establishment of a Railway Commission, in which those questions are dealt with by practical business men, aided by counsel learned in law, and forming together a mixed tribunal which has been able to deal with those questions in a manner, apparently, to meet the public requirements. Of course, we are very differently situated in this country, in our railway operations and in the extent of those corporations, from the people of England. In England there is a great concentration of railway interests within a very small compass, and sufficient employment is given to this important Commission within a range of ground that is easy for them to cover, and every requirement in that respect, of a competent tribunal that does not cost too much for its work, is met. In this country, on the other hand, the railway interests up to the present are comparatively few, and at present very widespread. A Railway Commission in this country would have to deal with questions arising—at least I should hope they very soon would have to deal—upon scattered railways all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It is just a question in my mind whether we are quite prepared for a Railway Commission of the character and importance of that which exists in England, and which has been recommended by my hon. friend from Simcoe. Then, again, some powers are placed in the hands of the Railway Committee of the Government that would have to deal with some of the questions that would naturally fall under the judgment of the Railway Commission. I think, in view of the situation, that we have rightly arrived at this point; that the question is one that will have to be dealt with, after a little more deliberation and information than we have at the present moment. A question arises as to whether we are quite prepared, at this moment, for a Railway Commission of the proportions of the one proposed, and I think this is a matter that will have to be dealt with by a Select Committee, with the assistance, of course, of the Government. There is another important point to which attention has been called already, and which, I think, will have to be considered in this connection, and that is, the relation of railway corporations in this country to the railways in the United States, and the division of traffic, involving very grave questions that come up in the determination of bills of charges, upon which so many questions of difficulty arise. This is the main question that I think would have to be dealt with by a Special Committee. My hon. friend who introduced this Bill may, with the consent of the Government, be referred to a Special Committee that may have power to hear evidence and obtain information, so that the whole subject may be judiciously dealt with, and that every interest concerned may be properly heard. For this reason I desire very much that the Bill should be read a second time. I am quite opposed to the motion for a six months' hoist.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I am of opinion that it is desirable, where a matter of so much importance to the whole country is brought under the notice of the House, by an hon. gentleman who has, evidently, given a great deal of attention to the subject, and who has prepared a measure which must have required a good deal of care and attention on his part and the examination of many authorities, and the example, so far as it is applicable to Canada, of the Mother Country, that that measure ought not to be dealt with so summarily as it would seem, from the disposition of the House, it is likely to be dealt with. I must confess that I have not been able to bring my mind satisfactorily to the conclusion that the time has arrived in this country when a special tribunal with such very large powers as are proposed should be created. I think it is not expedient to legislate in the direction of this Bill unless a clear case of necessity exists, unless it is evident that the existing tribunals and machinery applicable to cases of this kind are clearly proved to be inadequate to the attainment of the object in view—namely, the settlement of disputes between railways, or between railways and the community at large, or between railways and municipalities or individuals. I do not think the evidence is sufficiently conclusive that the existing machinery provided for purposes of this kind is not capable of dealing with those disputes which have hitherto arisen and which are likely to arise. There is a disinclination, not only in this House but in the country, to the multiplication of tribunals and the increase of the machinery which is to be carried on at the expense of the general community. I am not prepared, from my own experience, to say that the existing tribunals and machinery have proved inadequate to that duty. I believe that, between the courts of law, the Committee of Council and this House, we have all the necessary powers and means of information to reach and overcome any evil that may spring out of the operations of the railway companies in this country. It does seem to me that, instead of constituting a new tribunal, it would be quite possible for the Government—it would be quite possible to charge some of the existing Courts of the country with these duties, which appear to be rather out of the reach of a Committee of the Executive Council. I think our Supreme Court might be charged with the duty of inquiring into a certain class of cases, and of pronouncing upon them, perhaps, not in the way of a judicial decision or a judgment of a Court of law, but in the way of a report which could be acted upon or not, as might be determined upon by the Government of the country, or by that Committee which is appointed under the General Railway Act, and by which that decision might be carried out. There might also be afforded an opportunity to the railway company, against whom the report was made, a re-hearing or a re-argument of the case, before the Committee of the Council, with all the advantage of evidence obtained under the supervision and direction of a Judge of one of the Superior Courts. I was myself concerned as counsel in a railway case, which subsequently came before this House, and I had then an opportunity of witnessing the working of a system, which is now the law of the country. Arguments were heard before four members of the Privy Council. They sat for two days, and after an adjournment of two weeks two sittings more were held. These gentlemen listened with great attention to the evidence and arguments of counsel, they examined maps, and in every way appeared desirous of doing their duty in the premises. They are men of large experience, as most men are who succeed by one means or other in obtaining seats in the Executive Council of the country; one or two of them were lawyers. But it did seem to me that if they had been able to give undivided attention to the case; if they could have examined the case with the care and the deliberation which a separate tribunal could have devoted to it, in every other respect they were quite as competent to arrive at a decision which would be satisfactory to litigants as the Commission which my hon. friend contemplates by this Bill. There would be a difficulty in this country in finding men who, from their position and antecedents, and with means and leisure at their disposal, would be such as I would regard as suitable men to constitute a tribunal, with such great powers as would be entrusted to a Railway Commission under the measure of my hon. friend. In England, as we will all agree, there is no such difficulty. You have there a great many men of great experience in affairs, men of fortune and leisure, men anxious to distinguish themselves before the country by the diligence with which they inquire into and deliver their decisions on public matters, men who would not be liable to be charged either by the public or the railway companies with being influenced by sinister motives in giving their judgments in favor of one party or the other. Such a class of men can easily be had in a country like England; but looking about me I confess that if I were charged with the duty of selecting the proper men for a Railway Commission here, I should have very great difficulty in finding such men as the hon. gentleman evidently contemplates in the measure he has brought to the attention of the House. I say that it would be a matter of very great difficulty to any Government to choose in this country men whose judgments in the important matters which would be referred to them, would be entirely free from the suspicion on the part of one party or the other, that they were influenced by other considerations than the public interest, or the abstract principles of justice applicable in such cases. It might be that we could find men who would discharge their duties just as thoroughly and impartially as in any other country, but you could not persuade the public or the railway companies, respectively, that in a judgment given against them some improper influence had not been brought to bear upon any men, one can think of, as likely to aspire to such an office as is proposed in the Bill. That is the difficulty which would meet my hon. friend at the outset; but if the question becomes a judicial question in any proper sense; if the tribunal is to determine the application of the law, whether the evidence is applicable to the case or not; whether the law has been infringed, or whether it should be put in force in a particular case, then I do not think we could have any better tribunal than the Superior Court. As we all know, this Court has a double character; it is not only a Supreme Court but an Exchequer Court. In the Exchequer Court a single Judge sits and takes evidence, hears arguments, and gives a decision which, however, is more in the nature of a report, because it is subject to appeal, and in the most important cases no doubt appeals take place, and the decisions are reviewed and determined in the full Court. If we look at the territorial extent and circumstances of this country; at the character of our railway corporations, some of them incorporated by the Provincial and some by the Dominion Government—though, for my own part, I am of opinion and have often expressed that opinion, that it was not the intention of the framers of the Confederation Act to give the Provinces power to incorporate railway companies at all, this Parliament has recognized their right to do so in various Acts—we have a state of things existing which, whether legal or constitutional, is not now of so much importance, for if any question of law were raised and the Court should determine that my view is right, it would be necessary for the Parliament to enact a general law, giving all the rights and powers which it is assumed have been given by these Provincial Acts. But as it is now, with these distinct creations deriving their authority from different parliamentary bodies, subject to the local law in one case and to the general law in the other, it seems to me a little irregular to compel the former to seek justice from the latter. It will certainly be objected to on the first occasion in which the local law comes into conflict with this Dominion tribunal in dealing with cases of that kind. For these and other reasons, it seems to me that the time has not arrived, the necessities are not sufficiently clear, the facts do not justify the creation of a distinct and new tribunal to deal with the class of questions which my hon. friend has described in his Bill. I believe that some change will have to be made. I believe that either some addition must be made to this Committee of the Privy Council, or some change with regard to the members who shall compose it. I will mention one instance which will throw some light on the question, and which occurred in the case I referred to. It happened that the pressure of public business did not enable the gentlemen who heard the first argument to hear the second. Other members of the Council were substituted for one or two of these—in fact, only two gentlemen heard the arguments throughout the whole case. That, of course, was a very serious objection to the tribunal itself. The lawyers and the engineers could not go over the same case whenever a new member joined the Court: it turned out that they were not called upon to render any positive and binding judgment; it was only in the nature of a recommendation. Yet if that had been necessary; if the nature of the case had required that there should be a decision which would operate in the nature of a judgment and bind the parties finally, it is clear that a very strong objection would have been taken to the constitution of the Court which had rendered a decision without having heard all the arguments and read all the evidence. I thought then that there was a capital objection to the constitution of the tribunal in the point to which I have referred. In reference to the question of amendment, I think it is very proper that question should be considered, and it might be well to consider it upon this Bill. If this were referred to a Select Committee of leading members of this House to take into consideration the whole question and ascertain what evils have presented themselves, and what remedies, in addition to those which now exist, can be devised consistently with existing interests, we might arrive at some useful result. But we must remember that public opinion is at present opposed to the creation of new and expensive tribunals unnecessarily, and we must remember that these corporations have acquired certain powers, and have invested large sums of money under the law as it now exists, under the laws which we have passed in this Parliament, and it does seem to me that they may justly complain of the creation of a new tribunal as is provided for in this Bill, which is not only to interpret those laws, but which shall have power to modify or change them, for this is practically what it amounts to. In the case of the English Commission, one instance occurs to my mind of the great power which was exercised and of the consequences of its exercise. Under the powers which were given to that Commission by the English law, the Commission were called upon to deal with a case that occurred in the town of Hastings, where it was alleged there was insufficient railway accommodation for the traffic of that locality. It was alleged by the people that the station-house and buildings were inadequate to accommodate the large number of people assembling in them during rainy days, and were obliged to seek shelter in neighboring buildings. Petitions were got up to the Railway Commission, calling upon them under the authority of the Act, which gave them power to determine questions of reasonable or inadequate facilities, to compel the company to furnish reasonable facilities. The Commission directed the railway company to furnish additional facilities and to increase the size of their buildings, involving an expenditure of some £15,000 or £20,000. The railway company objected. They said: "These facilities we have are sufficient for the traffic, and we have not the means to meet the expense that will be imposed upon us without borrowing money and doing injustice to our shareholders." Various legal difficulties presented themselves. The question came before the courts of law; and the late Lord Chief Justice Cockburn decided that this award of the Commission was ultra vires, that they had gone beyond their powers—not technically, but on general reasoning. He said he could not imagine that Parliament intended to invest this Commission with power to direct a railway company to make changes of so extensive a character in its own property, upon a mere complaint that existing arrangements were not sufficient. My hon. friend has no doubt read of that case, and in his Bill he might have guarded against any possible assumption of power of the character I have described. We can easily imagine that other cases, perhaps not quite so palpably ultra vires as this, would arise in this new Court, acting in the public interest, acting honestly and fairly, directing nothing that would not be promotive of the public interests, but whose decisions would result unfavorably and cause great expense to the railway companies, and they might well say that Parliament was not dealing fairly with their shareholders who had invested their money in these corporations in Canada, by creating a new tribunal with extraordinary powers—not to interpret the law, but to order those railway companies to do things which would involve great expenditure at the whim of parties thinking themselves aggrieved, although the decision might be arrived at after hearing evidence as to what, in the public interest, should be done. That may be taking a step in a direction which circumstances in this country do not warrant at this moment. We are seeking abroad for capital to construct our railways; we have constantly before us in the House questions as to how far we should go in the public interest on the one side, and how far we should restrain these corporations on the other. I think, so far as my observation extends, we have always had the feeling that it was undesirable, in view of the circumstances to which I have alluded, to throw any unnecessary obstacles in the way of the employment of foreign capital in the construction of our great public works in this country—that we should, as far as possible, afford facilities and securities to those who will invest their money in a distant country. In this Parliament, matters affecting the railways can be freely discussed; in the Committees, parties interested can appear and present their case, and they have always this advantage: that if they can show that any legislation is injurious to them, and is likely to deter capitalists from investing their money, they are able to avert it. But before a Commission of three persons, appointed to office during good behavior, I suppose, and free from those influences and considerations that operate on members of Parliament, and who feel as most such persons do, that they must magnify their position—and I apprehend that they would do it in some cases, perhaps, a little too strongly for the interests of the railway corporations—we can see what difficulties might arise. I can see many ways in which I think an injurious effect might be felt by the capitalists of our own and other countries, if a tribunal having such large powers as this should be erected. If it were to operate only on future investments of capital, it could be answered that capitalists would in the future invest their capital with a full knowledge of the character of the law. But my hon. friend intends to make his Act retroactive, and to apply it to all railways alike. I am not quite sure whether this Parliament can constitute a new tribunal—not a Court of law, and if it were, that Court could only deal with Dominion matters—with authority to pronounce upon and give directions to Provincial railways in the matters to which I have alluded. The question, at all events, appears to me to be surrounded with sufficient doubt, and to be one of sufficient magnitude, to make the House cautious in dealing with a Bill of this kind, and I would, therefore, recommend to my hon. friend to content himself with taking a Committee, before which the whole question can be discussed, and then, if not this Bill, perhaps some more limited amendment to the existing law could be submitted as a result of the investigation.

Mr. IVES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

POCKMOUCHE POST OFFICE.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Anglin for an Order of the House for correspondence respecting the closing of two post offices in the parish of Pockmouche, County of Gloucester, N. B.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the hon. member for Gloucester moved this motion, he made certain statements accusing the Post Office Department of having tried to injure him in his county. As I happened to be at the head of the department at the time, I cannot allow the statement to pass uncontradicted. It has been the policy of the Post Office Department, for several years, to reduce the number of post offices where the business was not sufficient to justify their existence, and that policy has been strenuously applied during the last two or three and even four years. On enquiry, it turns out that there were in this parish of Pockmouche three post offices forming, when connected with lines, an equilateral triangle within about three miles of each other. Last year, in the month of August, it was represented to the department that the Pockmouche post office might be moved a little and placed near the chapel, in the centre of the parish, and near the telegraph office, and that the other post offices might be abolished altogether. In the year before, the revenue from these post offices, was from Upper Pockmouche $47.09; from Lower Pockmouche, fifty cents; and from Pockmouche itself, $16.90; making for the three offices $63.49. The salaries were $131.50, and there was an allowance for forwarding duties of $50, making a deficit of $17.51. I have here a sketch of the three offices, and they form, when connected by a line, an equilateral triangle. At the suggestion made to the department, the Inspector for the Province of New Brunswick was called on to examine and make a report, and he did report, not only that it was reasonable that an adjustment should be made, but that Lower Pockmouche post office should be abolished altogether.

The result of it was the post office was placed in the centre, within the base of the triangle, and close to the chapel and telegraph office. The Inspector in his report said he thought so many post offices in Pockmouche entirely unnecessary. There are, he said, Pockmouche, Upper Pockmouche and Lower Pockmouche, where only one Pockmouche is necessary. He recommended that the suggestion made should be carried out, and one office placed in the centre near to the chapel and telegraph office, instead of the other three. The matter was a departmental one. I do not think any person complained of any injustice. I knew nothing of it, nor did the officers to my knowledge. The changes were made entirely in the public interest, and were departmental, not otherwise.

Mr. ANGLIN. The statement of the hon. ex-Postmaster-General would be something disingenuous if I could imagine he knew all the facts. The distributing office was moved from the place where I believe it ought to be still, to another district, and I presume an additional amount is paid to the postmaster in that district for the additional duties imposed on him, so in that respect there is no economy. The hon. Minister says representations were made to the department. He does not say by whom; he does not say they were made by officers of the department. With reference to the Inspector, the representations were made so as to make the change which he knew was desired by those managing the affair. That same Inspector formerly reported in favor of the establishment of that second post-office, and of its being made a distributing centre. His report in this particular transaction has, therefore, no special value. The lower Pockmouche office was in existence for a great many years. It fell into disuse. The gentleman who was postmaster removed to another place, and I think it was not carefully attended to afterwards. While the hon. gentleman seems to think a distance of three miles a very small distance, the people there thought it so considerable a distance that they built a second church, and the post office which the hon. gentleman abolished was close to the church. If the revenue of the office was small, it was because it was not properly attended to. What I claim is, that an office situated close to the main river should have been maintained, because it was most convenient for the service of the very large population living up the river. I contended that the office might well have been moved further towards the other post Tracadie, because there it would have been more convenient for the very large settlement in that part of the country. But from the post office nearest to Tracadie, until you reach Cardigan now a distance of twenty miles, there is but this one post office, whereas, formerly, there were two, and I do not think two at all too many in a section so fairly populated. These representations made to the postmaster were not made in a friendly spirit to me, or out of regard to the public interest. I am sorry the hon. gentleman was led, as he says, unintentionally into so bad a transaction. What the people complain of is the diminution of the post office accommodation they had enjoyed for years, and to which they believe they are entitled.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I was led into it in the usual way, on the report of the Inspector. It is evident that the hon. gentleman wants to have a grievance. I will allow him to have it.

Mr. ANGLIN. The hon. gentleman says the change was made on the representation of the Inspector.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I said the matter was referred to him for report, and he reported as I have said.

Motion agreed to.

WRONGS TO CHILDREN.

Mr. RICHEY, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 47) to prevent and punish wrongs to Children, said: The real aim of this measure is, I think, one which must command universal assent. It is the protection of a class of the community whose wrongs can be no longer ignored by legislative authority. The first clause of this Bill may be regarded in a four-fold aspect. It deals with acrobatic feats and others affecting injuriously the health or dangerous to the life or limbs of children. It also deals with their being employed for indecent or immoral purposes, and there is another branch which refers to what may be termed fraudulent purposes. Another evil that comes, perhaps, not under any one of these classes, affects their physical and moral wellbeing. The first clause, then, refers to the employment of children as gymnasts, contortionists, riders or acrobats in any place whatever. This perhaps is an evil, the exigency of providing against which may not have been as yet so seriously felt in this country as in some other countries; but when I find in other countries that the Legislatures are waking up to the necessity of stopping it, and especially that the country situated on our own borders has legislated in this direction, I feel it becomes us to be ourselves awakened to the evil and to follow the example which our neighbors have set us. I need not, I am sure, use any arguments to impress on the minds of this House the necessity in every possible way of restraining the inducements which are offered to children to dedicate themselves to those purposes which are of themselves immoral; nor need I endeavor to set forth the necessity of putting down by every means in our power the evils of vagrancy as they stare us in the face day by day. The only portion of this clause to which I may anticipate that any objections will be offered is that which deals with the employment of children in connection with singing or musical entertainments. I find that in the United States, in the State of New York particularly, a clause almost the same as I have introduced here was passed some years ago. If any hon. gentleman who is interested in the subject will turn to the revised Statutes of New York, he will find that the restraints which are here intended to be imposed, were introduced as against the employment of children under the age of sixteen years, where singing or playing on instruments occurred in the streets. That was found to be insufficient to compass the object in view, and in 1876, the Legislature of New York passed the Act from which this clause is taken verbatim. Referring to the laws of New York for the year 1876, Chap. 122, hon. gentlemen will find in the main, the provisions of this Bill which is now submitted for the consideration of this House. The first clause is almost word for word the same. The laws of Illinois and of Ohio, as found in the revised Statutes for 1880 of those States, have incorporated provisions to the same effect. In England, in 1879, an Act for a similar purpose was passed, 42 and 43 Vic., Chap. 34, "An Act to regulate the employment of children in places of amusement." It provides penalties against those who may cause any children under the age of fourteen years to take part in any public entertainment or performance, when, in the opinion of a Court of summary jurisdiction, the life or limbs of such children may be endangered; and any parent or guardian, or any person having care of such children, will severally be guilty of an offence against the Act, and on summary conviction be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10. The second clause of the Bill renders it unlawful to receive children for the purposes of such instruction and for such purposes as are mentioned in the first section of the Bill. That also is taken from the laws to which I have just referred,—the laws of New York, Ohio and Illinois. An incorporated company exists in some States for the protection of children. I had expected to have received a full digest of the laws on this subject, but it has not come to hand, and I did not think it desirable to delay the furtherance of this measure by waiting for it, although I was anxious to submit a digest to the House. The third clause provides that no minors under the age of 16 years shall be admitted to any place where liquors are sold, or to dance houses, or billiard rooms, unless accompanied by their parents or guardians. I am quite sure I will carry with me, as regards this section of the Bill, the prevailing opinion of the House, respecting the evils which are consequent on giving permission to children of tender years to enter those places where liquors are sold. I regret to say, not only giving them permission to enter such places, but we know that too frequently they are sent there by persons whose duty it is to restrain them from all evils. I believe the passage of this section of the Bill will conduce very largely to the accomplishment of the object which many of my hon. friends have in view outside of the other purposes of the Bill I have mentioned. In the fourth section we have provided a penalty on parents and others having the custody of children who wilfully permit the life or health of children to be endangered; and by the fifth section all persons who are guilty of aiding and abetting offenses against the Act are made amenable to the same punishment as the principal offenders. The punishment provided by this measure is not equal to that found in the laws to which I have referred. I have inserted in the Bill a provision that the penalty shall not exceed $100, nor be less than $20, with the alternative of imprisonment for a term not exceeding 90 days nor less than 30 days. In New York the penalty provided is from $50 to $250, or imprisonment from 30 days to a year; and by the law of 1876 the offence is declared to be a misdemeanor. By the laws of Illinois, the first offence is punishable by a penalty not exceeding $100, or three months' imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the magistrate; and for the second offence, a penalty not exceeding $500, or imprisonment in the penitentiary, not exceeding two years. By the laws of Ohio, the penalty is one not exceeding $200, or not more than six months' imprisonment. The 8th clause, which provides for the manner in which prosecutions shall be carried on, is in conformity with our general laws and the English enactment. The provision in the 9th clause:

"Whenever any person is charged with an offence against this Act in respect of a child who, in the opinion of the Court trying the case, is apparently of the age alleged by the informant, it shall lie on the person charged to prove that the child is not of that age."

Is manifestly necessary in cases of this kind. If the burden rested upon the informant of proving the child's age, the case might often as well be given up. This provision is taken from the English Act. Provision is made as to the fines, penalties and forfeitures, where the prosecution has been instituted by a Society incorporated for the prevention of cruelty to children, or to animals, that they shall inure to the Society in aid of those purposes for which it was incorporated. If such prosecutions are to be carried forward, we may rest assured they will need the assistance of such societies as are in existence for the prevention of cruelty, and which have been productive of so much good. As yet I believe we have not, in the compass of this Dominion, any society incorporated specially for the protection of children; and, therefore, it is a duty incumbent upon all of us who take an interest in the other societies with humane objects, to co-operate in this matter. I think it would be as well to incorporate these societies under a more general name. Clause 11, possibly, some gentlemen may be disposed to question upon the ground whether it really falls within the legislative powers of the Dominion Parliament or the purview of the provisions referring to the Local Legislatures, as it may be supposed to deal with civil rights. We must look at this clause, however, as founded on the criminal acts, and as empowering a magistrate, for the benefit of a child, to commit to a place of safety and training. I have thus simply referred to the general clauses of the Bill, and to the motives by which I have been actuated in bringing it before the House, and to the analogous laws in other countries; and I feel assured that I will not appeal in vain to this House to endorse, by its action, the measure recommended. We have not, perhaps, in regard to some of those particular acts which are brought within the scope of this measure, experienced so large an amount of the evils as elsewhere. But I may advert to the fact that, last winter, when I had a similar Bill before this House, even after it was noticed in the public prints, we saw an advertisement that was intended to be exceedingly captivating of performances by children of a tender age. Now, such children are not so trained without subjecting them to influences exceedingly detrimental not only to their physical but moral well being. The contortions and gymnastic exercises by which such children are trained, and the tortures to which they are subjected are known to be injurious; and this proves it would be well for us to legislate in the direction proposed. My desire is to have the Bill referred to Committee, where any amendments desirable to render the measure more perfect can be made, and the co-operation of my friends in effecting which will give me great satisfaction.

Mr. HOUDE. Though I approve of the general character of this Bill, I think it ought to be modified in some respects before it is adopted by the House. In my opinion it deals with a question which properly comes within the purview of the Provincial Legislatures, rather than of the Federal Parliament. It proposes to deal with the case of children who are in charge of their parents, and, if I am not mistaken, that is purely a question of civil rights, and therefore one which should be dealt with by the Local Legislatures. Though, as my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Richey) says, some of the matters which the Bill deals with may be matters of a criminal nature, yet as they are only misdemeanors and not felonies, I do not think they are within the province of this Parliament. At all events, I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the point I have taken. I may say that I would with great pleasure support such a measure, if it were introduced elsewhere, but it seems to me to tend in a direction which is pregnant with danger, and that is the interference by the Federal Parliament in matters which belong to the Provincial Legislatures.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think the Bill is open to the objection which has been taken by the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House; and I think we should all feel indebted to the member for Halifax for having brought forward a measure of this kind. I remember that not many years ago a person was brought before the English Courts, charged with having committed murder. It appeared that he had gone to the booth of a gymnast, and had there found his child which had been taken from him at the age of five or six—it was then twelve—and exhibited as an acrobat. He found that his child was not only destroyed in body but ruined in mind, and then and there he killed the man who had abducted him. He was tried for murder, as I have said, but the jury acquitted him. Such things are going on constantly; and I think, therefore, that the Bill of the hon. gentleman is one in the interests of humanity; and for my own part, I feel deeply indebted to him for having brought it before this House. I think it is quite within the scope of this Parliament to pass a law to protect such unfortunates as this measure seeks to reach, and I trust it will be adopted by this House.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou). In answer to my hon. friend from Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), I have only to say that I cannot see in what particular the Bill trenches in any way upon the jurisdiction of the Provinces. The evils at which the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Richey) aims have been very succinctly stated in the Bill. It provides that:

"No person having the care, custody or control of any child under the age of sixteen years shall exhibit, use or employ, or in any manner or under any pretence apprentice, part with, let out or otherwise dispose of, any such child to any person in and for the vocation, occupation, service or purpose of singing, playing on musical instruments, rope or wire walking, dancing, begging or peddling, or as a gymnast, contortionist, rider or acrobat, in any place whatsoever, or for or in any obscene, indecent or immoral purpose, exhibition or practice whatsoever, nor for or in any business, exhibition or vocation injurious to the health or dangerous to the life or limb of such child: nor shall cause, procure, encourage or permit any such child to engage therein."

I must agree with the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb) that the Bill, instead of being one to be deprecated, is one in the interests of humanity, and of that sympathy which we all feel for those who are unable to help themselves. I dare say we have all been at exhibitions where we would have enjoyed ourselves, but for the presence of children ranging in age from five or six to fourteen or fifteen, who were obliged to take part in performances which we all felt must have caused them torture for years afterwards, merely for the amusement of the onlookers and the benefit of the cruel and heartless people who compel them to engage in such exhibitions. It may be desirable in Committee of the Whole to alter the phraseology of some clauses of the Bill, and perhaps to change some of its provisions, and I have no doubt that the hon. member for Halifax will be desirous to meet the wishes of the House in that respect. But on the general principle that it is the right of this House to prevent inhumanity to children who cannot help themselves, I have no doubt that the House has power to pass this Bill.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I am not opposed to the principle of this Bill, but, as mentioned before in the remarks of the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Houde), I think there are provisions in the Bill which go too far altogether. There is the 11th clause, for instance, which reads:

"When, upon examination before any Court or Magistrate, it appears that any child within the age previously mentioned in this Act, was engaged or used for or in any business, or exhibition, or vocation, or purpose specified and as mentioned in this Act; and when upon the conviction of any person of a criminal assault upon a child in his or her custody, the Court or Magistrate before whom such conviction is had, deems it desirable for the welfare of such child that the person so convicted should be deprived of its custody thereafter, such Court or Magistrate may commit such child to an orphan asylum, charitable or other institution, or make such other disposition thereof as now is or hereafter may be provided by law in cases of vagrant, truant, disorderly, pauper or destitute children."

I think the question of the custody of children is not a matter which belongs to this Parliament, with all our powers, but one which belongs to the Provincial Legislatures, and I think it would be a great pity to pass a clause of this kind at the risk of having it declared ultra vires. In fact, we should take the greatest care to prevent any encroachments upon the Local Legislatures by this Parliament and vice versa; and there is less danger of the Local Legislatures exceeding their powers in that respect than there is of our encroaching upon them, because of the great power which is over them, and the idea that that power would prevail in the long run. But it is certainly to the interest of this Parliament, as well as of the Provincial Legislative leaders, to see that no such encroachments take place on either side; and I should be glad if the Local Legislatures, jealous of these great powers which they enjoy under our Constitution, should take a great deal more care than they do to watch what is taking place in this Parliament, and exercise a proper degree of surveillance over legislation here which may affect their rights. It would prevent a great many of the appeals which are made from one Court to another, and which result in one Bill after another being declared ultra vires. I, of course, am in favor of the second reading of the Bill, hoping, however, that when it comes back to us from Committee it will be so modified as to prevent any interference with Provincial rights.

Mr. DESJARDINS. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, not only is the 11th clause unconstitutional, not only is it not within the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, but the same may be said of the Bill itself. I believe that were we to ask the hon. Minister of Justice, who has just declared in favour of that Bill, if Provincial Legislatures have or have not the right of legislating on all the points enumerated in that Bill, he could not tell us that they do not possess such a right, or that Provincial Legislation in this matter would not be looked upon as perfectly constitutional. Under the circumstances, I, for my part, oppose the second reading of this Bill as an encroachment on the rights of Provincial Legislatures. One is too much inclined to endure such a tendency in this Parliament, and it has been endured in the case of many other Bills to which there were assuredly objections. It is evident that, by this Bill, legislation steps in to take away from the parents and from Provincial Legislatures that have control over the education of children, those rights embodied in the clauses of the Bill now before the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, were I even alone, I would protest against the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. ANGLIN. I have objections of a serious character to this Bill. I think it is dealing with a matter that comes properly under the purview of the Local Legislatures. Moreover, I do not think that in all cases parents are to be blamed who, finding their children possessed of good musical talent, and being themselves in indigent circumstances, allow their children to appear before the public at proper places, concert rooms or elsewhere, for the purpose of assisting in the support of a family. There is such a thing as carrying these measures too far. They may be productive of good, but they are also productive of evil. We should hesitate before supporting this measure. With regard to depriving parents or guardians of the care of their children, merely on the decision of any magistrate before whom they may be accused of having exercised undue severity, this Bill proposes to go very much too far. The rights of parents should be carefully respected. The tendency now-a-days is not for parents to abuse their power over their children, but rather to err in the opposite direction and to treat them with too much indulgence. There always will be cases where parents and guardians, given to the abuse of intoxicating liquors, become unfit to retain the custody of their children, but even when they are deprived of the care of their children, that should be done, not by one or two magistrates, but by the intervention of one or more judges of the highest courts of the country. It is an interference that should rather be dis-countenanced than encouraged by legislation on our part. I trust that now the hon. gentleman has pre-ented his views to the House, he will allow the Bill to remain over for a few days for further consideration. There is no urgency for this measure, and if we pass a Bill of this kind, we should take care that, while going as far as necessary for the protection of children, we should not go so far as unduly to interfere with the rights of parents and guardians.

Bill read the second time.

COURT OF MARITIME JURISDICTION.

Mr. McCARTHY, in moving for the second reading of Bill (No. 47) respecting the Court of Maritime Jurisdiction in the Province of Ontario, said: In moving for the second reading of this Bill it may be well for me to remove some misapprehension that seems to prevail among the members who have spoken to me on the subject, with reference to the object of this proposed legislation. The Bill is not for the purpose of taking away from the seaman all the exclusive rights that he now has, for the purpose of recovering his wages, but the object is to take away one right which it is supposed he has, because it is a question somewhat doubtful: whether he has a right to take proceedings in the Maritime Court of Ontario, for the purpose of arresting a vessel, and detaining it, before he has established any claim whatsoever. In the Merchants' Shipping Act of 1854, which is law on this subject, the mode of recovering wages by a seaman is defined as follows:—

"Any seaman or apprentice, or any person duly authorized on his behalf, may sue in a summary manner before any two justices of the peace acting in or near to the place at which the service has terminated, or at which the seaman or apprentice has been discharged, or at which any person upon whom the claim is made is or resides, or in Scotland, either before any such justices, or before the sheriff of the county within which any such place is situated, for any amount of wages due to such seaman or apprentice, not exceeding £50 over and above the costs of any proceeding for the recovery thereof, so soon as the same becomes payable; and every order made by such justices or sheriff in the matter shall be final."

Now, that is the foundation of the special provision for seamen to recover their wages. When we passed the Merchants' Shipping Act of 1873, it substantially re-enacted the provision I have just read, and if hon. members will turn to the Act of 1873, which is to be found in the first part of the Statute of 1874—because it was reserved for the royal assent, and therefore does not appear in the proper year—they will find that seamen have a right to go before a justice of the peace to recover their wages when they are under $200, and the decision of the Justice of the Peace is final. The Justice of the Peace has power then to order distress of the goods and chattels, and if the captain or the owner have no goods, then the seamen may sue the vessel, and if necessary the magistrates can remit the matter to the Maritime Court. No doubt it would be right and proper that the same provision should apply in the Lower Provinces, because this Act of 1873 does not apply to Ontario, and I would not have the slightest objection that this provision should be incorporated in this Bill. The result would be that a seaman who has a claim under $200 would in the first instance have a right to go before two magistrates, or a County Court Judge, &c.; that upon his recovering, in a summary way, his wages and getting an order, the order could be enforced by seizure either upon the owner or the master of the vessel. If they had no property out of which the money could be got, then there is a right to seize the vessel, and if the vessel is beyond the jurisdiction of the magistrate, then there is a right to imprison the owner or the master. These are the special provisions which the Act of 1873 gives to seamen in this country, and I have no objection at all that they should be incorporated and made law in Ontario. What I do object to is this: That under the Maritime Court Act a seaman should have the right, before any claim is established, merely upon making a statement that he has a claim, to have the vessel arrested, except under peculiar circumstances which are pointed out in this section. I think the seaman should be properly protected as well as the vessel owner, if the provisions of the Act of 1873 were extended to Ontario, and that would give them the benefit of the Merchant Shipping Act of England, which enacts that if the seaman is turned off the vessel twenty miles from his home then he can seize the vessel. If the vessel has been seized, or if the vessel has been sold and the proceeds not yet disposed of, he can go to the Maritime Court; but I believe it is an injustice to vessel owners to permit a seaman, for a small sum, to order the arrest of a vessel when perhaps on the eve of departure. A seaman has at present the summary remedy of going before a magistrate, and if the matter is beyond the jurisdiction of the magistrate, the owner can be attached. That is the law in the Maritime Provinces and in Quebec, and I am quite willing that it should be incorporated in the Maritime Court Act of Ontario; but it is not right that we should have one law for the Maritime Provinces and another for Ontario.

Mr. PATTERSON (Basex). I do not know how the Maritime Court Act of 1877 works in other parts of the Province; but it has given considerable satisfaction, and has been the means of remedying considerable injustice in the part of the country where I live. In 1879 the following amendment was passed:—

"1. No right or remedy in rem given by "The Maritime Jurisdiction Act, 1877," shall be enforced as against any bona fide mortgagee under a mortgage duly executed and registered prior to the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight.

"2. No right or remedy in rem given by the said Act in respect of claims for towage, or claims for damage done by collision by any ship, shall be enforced as against any bona fide mortgagee, whose mortgage is duly executed and registered at a port of either of the Provinces of Ontario or Quebec."

The object of this amendment was, I suppose, to guard vested rights, not only those existing prior to the passage of the original measure, but for a year and a half afterwards. I do not know how the law is in the Lower Provinces as regards mortgages, but I know that in Great Britain and the United States a mortgage is not regarded as a lien on a vessel, except subsequent to such claims as sailors' wages, salvage and towage; but this amendment permits a mortgage to come in before all these claims. The consequence has been that seamen have, in some cases, been deprived of every dollar of their wages for a whole season, and persons after towing a vessel have found that a mortgage came before their claim. So that it will be necessary, if this amendment remains on the Statute-book, that tug owners, before taking a vessel in tow, shall have to enquire where it is registered and whether there is any encumbrance on it. Last Session I brought in a Bill to repeal that amendment, but it was dropped with other measures at the end of the Session. As to the measure introduced by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), if it extended to the Province of Ontario, the clauses he has read from the Seaman's Act of 1873, giving summary power to a seaman to collect his wages, there would be some ground for it; but he wishes to deprive the seamen of the privileges they at present enjoy under the Maritime Court Act of 1877. A good deal of objection is made to the establishment of courts in this Dominion, but the Maritime Court cannot be objected to on the ground of expense, as all it costs this Dominion is the enormous sum of $600 a year. Among the rules of the Maritime Court is one that if the claimant for wages fails to obtain a sum in excess of $50, the costs in connection with the suit cannot exceed $10, so there is not much inducement to litigation as far as profits in the Court are concerned. I think it would be doing the greatest injustice to apply to the Maritime Court of Ontario any such restriction as is proposed by the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe. The Bill seems to be based on the principle that "to him who hath shall be given, and from him who hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath." I beg leave to move in amendment

That this Bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. McCUAIG. Unfortunately for laymen here, they are not able to use legal phraseology, but they can speak of the practical working of laws introduced by lawyers in this House. One statement of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, which was fallacious, was that, though it was enforced three years before, no action was taken on the law. The law was, however, not proclaimed until 1878. Most hon. members are familiar with the means adopted generally for the construction of vessels. Vessel owners as a class generally obtain credit for one half the cost of a vessel: say it costs $50,000, they supply $25,000 of their own capital and borrow $25,000 more. No one will deny that the last $25,000 borrowed, and for which a mortgage is given, represents the wages of men engaged in building the vessel. I think a mortgage given under such circumstances should be held as a security against any claim. The amended Bill that I introduced in this House was to the effect that all claims against the vessel of any kind prior to 1878, prior to the proclamation of the original Act of 1877, should not have retroactive effect as against mortgages held for the building of vessels. That amendment passed this House almost by acclamation. This other clause was to do away with all claims for salvage as against mortgages given prior to the proclamation of the Bill, but the second clause gave preferential claims for wages accrued and for salvage over all mortgages after the proclamation of the Bill. If my hon. friend will limit himself to the simple facts and the truth, I am not afraid to have them placed before the House. But when he makes statements thoroughly fallacious it is time for me to defend myself. With reference to the case to which I referred, the cook was engaged at $10 per month for the season. She conducted herself badly and the captain dismissed her and employed another cook in her place. Three or four months after when the vessel was put in winter quarters, some pettifogging lawyers got hold of her and told her that under this Maritime Court Act she could collect $20 from the vessel. How did they go to work? At the close of the season the vessel was sent to Garden Island to have a new shaft put into her. Instead of the process being served on me, the registered owner of the vessel, or on her agent or captain, they sent a man from Toronto, who went on board the vessel which was about a mile out on the river in the ice, and nailed the process on the mast. The first intimation that I had, or the agent or the captain had of any process having been served was the advertisement for sale of the vessel which appeared in the Globe, the Kingston News, and the Picton Gazette. Had I not seen that advertisement, the sale would have been made legally, and proper title would have been given, and a vessel worth $43,000 would have been sold for a debt of $20. This was a proceeding which I am sure Parliament would never sanction. I think I have explained that the present law, as it exists, gives priority to mortgages prior to 1878, given in good faith on all vessels, and that the wages of the crew took priority over everything else. The hon. gentleman by his Bill proposes that:

“No suit or proceeding for the recovery of wages under the sum of $200 shall be instituted by or on behalf of any seaman or apprentice in the Maritime Court of Ontario, unless the owner of the ship is adjudged bankrupt or declared insolvent, or unless the ship is under arrest or is sold by the authority of the said Court, or unless any justices acting under the authority of the Act of the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, intitled ‘The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,’ refer the case to be adjudged by the said Court, or unless neither the owner nor master is or resides within twenty miles of the place where the seaman or apprentice is discharged or put ashore.”

I never knew the object of the Supreme Court before, but I certainly think by the time the poor seaman got through the whole of this proceeding he would reach the Supreme Court. The consequence would be his wages would be all absorbed in law costs. A seaman's wages of ten dollars is as sacred to him as if they amounted to two hundred dollars. It would be fairly doing him out of his wages. The law, as it stands, is a proper law. The Deputy Minister of Justice went over the matter carefully with me; the seamen were satisfied; there is not a petition before the House complaining of its working; there is no complaint about it, except, perhaps, from a few lawyers, who wish to get more cases. If my hon. friend from Essex had not already moved the six months hoist, I would have done so.

Mr. CAMERON (Huron). For many Sessions of Parliament a Bill was introduced constituting a Maritime Court, and that Bill I have always opposed at every stage. I never could see any special reason why the class of cases provided by this kind of legislation should be treated differently from ordinary debts. Parliament, however, thought otherwise, and though for a number of years we succeeded in defeating the Bill, Parliament at length saw fit to enact this law. I recollect well that the principal reason urged by the hon. member who had charge of this legislation, and others who took the same ground in favor of this special and particular kind of legislation, was the protection of the seaman. It was said and, probably, correctly enough, that in many cases the unfortunate mariner was defrauded out of his whole season's earnings. I have known many cases of that kind myself. I opposed the Bill, not because I did not desire to see the seaman protected, but because I never could understand why one class of creditors should be dealt with differently from others. Parliament, however, having affirmed the proposition, and it having remained on the Statute-books a number of years without, so far as I know, evoking any serious complaints against the working of the law, except, perhaps, in the exceptional case to which the member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) refers, I can see no reason for making the change the member for North Simcoe now proposes. What would be the effect of this change? He might just as well repeal the whole Act in so far as the seamen are concerned; and that would be a much more straightforward and manly course. I am sure that, if he had introduced a Bill to repeal the whole Maritime Law of Ontario, I would not have voted for it; and the proposition he has submitted to the House, I cannot support. And why? Because, I repeat, he might just as well propose the repeal of the Maritime Law altogether. He knows quite well that in 99 cases out of 100—perhaps in 999 out of 1,000—the seaman's wages for a whole season would not come to $200, which is the amount he proposes to enable the seaman to obtain, and for which there is summary redress provided by Statute. If that is the case, so far as the seaman is concerned, the measure would practically and substantially do away with the present law altogether, and leave the seaman in the position he occupied before the Act of 1877 was passed. No doubt in many cases that law worked a hardship; a seaman would be discharged at a particular port, without payment of his wages, and he would have no redress except an action against the owner of the vessel, which might be a foreign vessel, and the owner an insolvent, in which case the judgment against him would be but poor satisfaction to the seaman who had spent the whole season working for that owner's profit. The hon. gentleman's proposition would simply repeal the law so far as the seaman is concerned, and place him where he was before 1877. He has four exceptions, however, to that rule; but it does not appear to me they amount to anything. The first is, that where the amount of wages is under $200, in four different cases the seaman can still pursue the summary mode of redress provided by the Statute of 1877. First, it is provided that a suit may be brought by a seaman for wages in case the owner of the vessel is adjudged a bankrupt. As the Insolvent Act is repealed, that exception cannot help the seaman. The second case in which a seaman may take proceedings is thus set forth: “Unless the ship is under arrest, or is sold by the authority of the said Court.” Perhaps a ship might be sold by the authority of the Court for other than seamen's claims against her; and, perhaps, in a few isolated cases, a seaman would be able to get his wages, when under $200, on that claim, but I know of none. The third condition under which a seaman may take an attachment is thus specified: “Or unless any justices acting under the authority of the Act of the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, intitled ‘The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854,’ refer the case to be adjudged by the said Court.” Now did the hon. gentleman ever hear of a case of this kind? I never heard of one, and do not believe any such case has ever arisen here. So, also, in that class of cases, the unfortunate seaman would be in no better position than if the law was repealed. The fourth exception in favor of a seaman's lien runs thus: “Or unless neither the owner nor master is or resides within 30 miles of the place where the seaman or apprentice is discharged or put ashore.” Now, that can only apply to a very few cases. Suppose the vessel is foreign and the owner an insolvent—suppose the vessel is out of the way altogether and cannot be reached, what benefit can that provision render the seaman? I repeat, the Bill, if passed, would be practically and substantially a repeal of the whole law so far as the seaman is concerned, and I do not see any reason why it should pass. The mover, however, says he proposes adding to this Bill the provisions of the law that he states is in force in other Provinces. How is that going to help the seaman. It is proposed that in cases where the claim is under $200, in the first place, a seaman shall have summary process against the owner of the vessel; and when he obtains a judgment before two justices of the peace, or one, or a judge of a County Court in his favor, he shall obtain a distress warrant, and, in default, imprison the debtor; and then, having failed, after all the annoyance, trouble, delay and expense of all those processes, he shall have a remedy against the vessel. What is he going to do if the vessel has left the country, or the owner has left it, or is a foreigner? A seaman is discharged in any port of Ontario, and if the law is repealed he has no remedy. Why the introduction of the law prevailing elsewhere would not help the seaman in the slightest degree. The only way to help him is to leave the law as it is. The hon. gentleman talks about the enormous expense of a suit to the seaman. It is a mere nothing. The hon. member for Prince Edward talks as if lawyers got all the benefits. All the lawyer gets when the claim is under $100 is $10, unless he experiments on the constitutionality of the Court and raises fancy questions and thus create a great deal of expense. Surely nobody would say that $10 is too much for a lawyer's services in enforcing such a claim against a vessel. The best way to help the seaman is to let the present law alone, as he is tolerably well protected by it now. He can get redress when wronged. Under this Bill, the mariner would be in a worse position than ever before, at all events in one infinitely worse than under the present law. I shall have great pleasure, with a tolerable acquaintance with the working of the law, at all events in my own county, in voting for the amendment of the member for Essex.

Mr. McCUAIG. I draw a distinction between the pettifogger and the lawyer in this matter; and there are a great many pettifoggers around Toronto.

Mr. McCALLUM. I have had some experience in regard to the navigation of our inland waters, and I can say that the possession of a Maritime Court is a great boon to our mariners on those waters. In the first place, some hon. members speak only of the sailor in this matter; but more persons than our sailors have an interest in this question, the men doing business along our canals, for example, who supply foreign vessels with wood and perform towage service. I know that, formerly, vessels in winter, after the season's navigation, would be found to have changed hands, in order to wrong Canadians of their just dues. I am sorry the hon. member for Prince Edward made his amendment. I think the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court should be extended and not curtailed.

Mr. McCUAIG. They never had any preferential claims under the original law for supplies of any kind.

Mr. McCALLUM. The hon. gentleman speaks of a sailor holding a ship and taking a mortgage. I want to know what sailor is going to do that? Why should there be any restriction in his way in his efforts to collect his hard earned money? Why deprive the sailor of the right to collect his wages? So far as the cost of this Court is concerned, I am sure it is as cheap a tribunal as we have in this country. But there is one respect in which I think the present law should be amended, as it works a great deal of hardship as it now stands. Under the law actions must be brought within three months of the time when the debt is contracted—a provision which is hard even upon the debtor himself in some cases. Under the maritime laws of the United States, if a debt is contracted this season, you are allowed to bring action any time within this season or next, and if you do not bring action within that period the debt is allowed to lapse altogether. I should like to see some such principle adopted in this country. Under the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Prince Edward County (Mr. McCuaig), if a master sees a vessel in distress and wants to tow her into safety he would require to go through the formality of going to a registry office to see if there was a mortgage or other claim upon the vessel. He could not render her any assistance to supply her with goods until he made such an investigation. My hon. friend (Mr. McCuaig) has got into trouble with his cook. I would advise him to instruct his masters to deal fairly and squarely with all his employees, male and female, and then he will not be likely to get into such trouble. But I think the law should be amended, as I said before, by extending the time within which actions may be brought. As the law now stands it simply offers a premium to ship owners to get their vessels mortgaged so that they may defraud their employees, and I have had some opportunity of knowing whereof I speak. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) asks why exceptions should be made in the law for the purpose of favoring seamen, but I wish to tell him that sailors are placed in an entirely different position from those who work at other occupations. He must remember that seamen are not stationary like other men; they are constantly moving from one place to another; they have no home, and therefore they should have means placed at their disposal of collecting their wages by a summary process if they should happen to be discharged from their occupation.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am glad to hear the opinion expressed here to-day, and especially by vessel owners, such as the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. McCuaig) and the hon. member for Monck (Mr. McCallum) that the operation of this Act has, on the whole, been a benefit, and I believe that will be found to be the almost universal opinion of those who sail our inland waters, or live in proximity to them. I think we should virtually be repealing the Act if we allowed the Bill of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) to pass; it would certainly be a repeal of the Act so far as these persons are concerned, who were designed to be benefited by it, and in whose interests chiefly the Maritime Court was created. The seamen who gain their living on our inland waters are a large body of people. They have to endure great hardships and run great risks, and it is but right and reasonable that they should have a sufficient means of collecting wages which may be due to them. Hon. members who lived in ports upon our inland waters before the establishment of this Court must have been aware of many wrongs done to these people, who, after giving their services during a whole season, have had to go without their wages because the vessel was mortgaged to the mast-head; and the mortgagees, after availing themselves of the services of these men in carrying freight which paid the interest on their mortgages, turned them adrift without recompense. This was a species of wrong which was frequently brought to my notice and it was repeated year after year until the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) took the matter up and passed an Act for which he has received, and will continue to receive, the gratitude of a large number of persons who have been benefitted by its operation. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) has only given one instance to support his measure. He says there was a case in which there was a dispute as to whether a man was engaged by the day or by the month; but even in that case the owner of the vessel admitted there was some claim because he offered the man one dollar, and the latter said he was engaged for a month and that he wanted the wages for that period. I do not think the hon. gentleman could adduce another instance in which any hardship has been done to a vessel owner by the working of the Act. The hon. member for Prince Edward alludes to another case of supposed hardship in regard to his cook, and he says a notice was put up and the vessel stopped.

Mr. McCUAIG. That is remedied now.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The trouble in that case was not due to the Act, but to the regulations. When the matter was called to the attention of the Judge the matter was put right. The Judge has tried to frame regulations to prevent such hardships as have been mentioned by the hon. gentleman—to prevent persons putting forward claims unnecessarily against vessels and tying them up. He has framed a schedule of costs, so that a claim under $20 costs $2; up to $50, $5, and up to $100, $10, so that there is no inducement to a seaman to tie up a vessel for a paltry sum, as he would have to pay, perhaps, a larger sum in costs. I do not think that this law has worked hardly or injuriously; I think it would be wrong to repeal it, and I shall with pleasure vote for the six months' hoist.

Mr. McCARTHY. Though there is not much chance after all that has been said of the Bill being read the second time, I propose to say a few words, because I believe my Bill is a fair Bill both to seamen and to vessel owners. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. Cameron) discussed the Bill with a good deal of detail, but he did not do it fairly. If he will take the trouble of reading the section, it is not an original section, but copied from the Merchants' Shipping Act of 1853, he will find that there are five cases in which a seaman can have a remedy against a vessel owner. First, if a seaman has been discharged—not if he chooses to abandon a vessel as they sometimes do, for these seamen are not always immaculate, though my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Kirkpatrick) who partly represents Kingston, and desires to represent it still more closely, would have us believe so—there are cases in which seamen improperly go ashore, bring suit, and have the vessel arrested. If the man has broken his contract, and has gone ashore, then he ought not to have that remedy against the vessel. Another class of cases is where the vessel has already been taken in custody under the Maritime Act, or has been sold. There, again, the seaman can come in and get his wages, the Court having already seized the vessel. Then if the owner is insolvent—

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Suppose there are a dozen owners.

Mr. McCARTHY. I suppose they would be sufficient guarantee for the seaman's wages. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman knows a great deal about the working of the law in his own Province, but I want to apply to Ontario the law as it is there, that is all. If that law works satisfactorily in Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, where there are many more seamen than in our inland waters, I fail to apprehend why there should be a different remedy given to seamen in our inland waters than they possess upon the seaboard. These are the different cases in which this clause does not prevent seamen from applying to the Court. But why should a seaman have a different remedy from any other class of Her Majesty's subjects without having to go before a Court, and get his judgment and then seize the vessel? Sometimes seamen are led on by the class of people the hon. member has described as pettifoggers, and sometimes they cause the vessel to be seized when they have no legal claim at all and put the owner to great inconvenience and loss. That is a matter that ought to be prevented. If a seaman gets a judgment to recover his claim, then he has a right to seize the vessel or the owner's goods, and in certain circumstances to seize the owner's person. Is that not sufficient? However, I do not propose to press the Bill against the unanimous sentiment of every hon. gentleman who has spoken on the subject. I merely make these remarks to justify the view I had in introducing it. Notwithstanding all that has been said, I still think that seamen would have summary protection under the provisions of the law of 1873, which could easily be incorporated in Committee with the Bill I have introduced, with the special provision found in the Merchants' Shipping Act of 1873. Perhaps the Bill would be barren of result. Possibly the best plan would be to allow the Bill to go to a second reading.

Mr. McCUAIG. I am willing.

Mr. McCARTHY. While I hold to the sentiments of the House that seamen should have all the rights and remedies which they are supposed to have under the decision of the Court in Ontario, perhaps the hon. member will second my resolve that the second section of the Act of 1879 should be repealed, and that result, at all events, would be obtained from proposing the Bill.

Mr. McCUAIG. I am quite willing it should go to the Committee of the House.

Amendment (Mr. Patterson, Essex) six months' hoist, agreed to.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. LANGEVIN read the following report on the ventilation of the House:—

"Hon. H. L. LANGEVIN,
"Minister of Public Works.

"Sir,—In reply to your enquiry in regard to the ventilation of the House of Commons Chamber, I have the honor to report:

"1st. That the fresh air distributed into the Chamber is taken from the face of the cliff through clean ducts, and when occasions necessitate it (during very cold weather) from a vertical supply pipe over roof of fan room; this latter service is only used when all the corridors of the building are closed and the air perfectly pure.

"2nd. The ducts have been visited four times since the commencement of the session; during summer recess they are thoroughly brushed out, and during the past 18 months the only foreign matter found in them was one dead mouse.

"3rd. Owing to the numerous springs in the rock foundation of the buildings, a few of the original bricks are falling to pieces, but there is nothing in the line of duct to contaminate the passing air which is pure and good until after distributed in the Chamber; in fact, any person can satisfy themselves by smelling the fresh air inlet and discharge of suction fan.

"4th. The average variation of temperature in each twenty-four hours, in the Commons Chamber during the last Session was only five degrees, and during this Session so far only four degrees, while the thermometer outside has frequently varied upwards of thirty-five and forty degrees. The six thermometers of the Chambers are kept as near sixty five degrees as possible.

"5th. The cubic air space of the Chamber is about 240,000 feet—and the ventilating fan, at the speed we have to regulate to now, can completely change the atmosphere of the room every seventeen minutes, and although the modus operandi of effecting this change produces a minimum draft, it is simply an impossibility, from the construction of the building, to change the air without some member slightly feeling the motion of it.

"6th. Additional improvement can still be made in the ventilation by further expenditure.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN R. ARNOLDI,

"Mechanical Engineer."

As I stated yesterday my intention is to bring the matter before my colleagues with the view of asking Parliament to place a certain sum of money at my disposal in order better to ventilate the corridors and the Committee rooms.

CANADA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. ROSS (Middlesex), in the absence of Mr. CHARLTON, moved for copies of all papers, Order in Council and correspondence in connection with the Customs' duties paid or payable by the Canada Southern Railway Company, in respect of all machinery used by them on their steam ferry boat, or boats at Amherstburg, and rolling stock; and also for a copy of any bond or bonds given by any such company for such duties, and a statement of all such machinery as was imported subject to duty; a statement of the amount or amounts of such duties, and any payment or payments made on account, and of any settlement of the same, with dates and all other particulars for 1878, 1879 and 1880.

Mr. BOWELL asked for what reason the hon. gentleman moved for this return—whether it was to ascertain the amount of duties paid on the articles imported and bonded, or whether it was in order to assist a man who asserted that he had a claim against the Government for having given information on smuggling.

Mr. ROSS said he made the motion in the absence of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and he supposed it was appropriate and reasonable.

Mr. BOWELL said that if the motion was made for the purpose of obtaining information for a man who wanted to bring an action against the Government, he thought it ought to be resisted, but if it was merely to obtain the information pure and simple, he saw no objection to granting it.

Mr. ROSS said he did not see anything in the motion that was unreasonable, or that the hon. gentleman should refuse to give. Why it should concern the hon. gentleman whether his information was asked in regard to another in litigation or not, he could not understand.

Mr. BOWELL said there was no suit pending with the Canada Southern Railway Company. There had been no difficulty further than the settlement of the duties with that company. What he objected to was to bring these papers down if they were to assist a man in making a claim against the Government.

Mr. ROSS. Why not?

Mr. BOWELL. If he refers to the Hansard he will find a reply in the course his leader took with reference to the Waterbury case.

Mr. BLAKE said that in that case some papers were asked to be brought down which could not be of any public interest whatever, and the hon. gentleman who moved for them admitted that they were required to assist a prosecution against the Government. He (Mr. Blake), had objected then, as he would now, to the inquisitorial powers of this House being put into operation, to obtain papers in a matter of no public interest, for the purpose of extracting from them information for the assistance of a private suitor, which ought to be procured in another way. It was then said that whatever papers might properly be published, there would be no difficulty in bringing down. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bowell) admitted that these papers might properly be called for. The hon. Minister said, if the papers were wanted for one purpose, he objected to produce them, but, if wanted simply for the information of the hon. member for North Norfolk or his constituents, he had no objection to produce them. He (Mr. Blake) did not understand the hon. gentleman was entitled to assume they were wanted for an improper purpose, if there was a proper purpose for which they could be wanted. If the hon. gentleman will state, as a Minister, that the production of these papers would be injurious to the Government in any litigation which was now going on, he would give us a sufficient reason for not producing them, in the absence of any further statement from the hon. member for North Norfolk; but, unless he made that statement, there could be no reason why we ought not to receive the return asked for.

Mr. BOWELL said he was not prepared to make any such statement for the simple reason that there was no litigation going on with reference to those duties. A certain claim had been made, that claim had been resisted and the papers were asked for to assist the claim. If his (Mr. Bowell's) recollection be right, when the then hon. member for St. John made a similar motion, he was asked by the hon. leader of the Opposition, whether it was not for a certain purpose he required the papers, and on his admission that they were required for that purpose the motion was resisted. It was quite true his hon. friend was not aware of the objects this person has in view. He agreed with the hon. leader of the Opposition that a motion ought not to be made of an inquisitorial nature for an ulterior object. If it were for political purposes, there could be no possible objections to it. He had no objection to bring down the bonds, the amount paid under the bonds, and any correspondence relating to that, but he objected to bring down any correspondence to which he had incidentally referred in that connection.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. Minister objected to bring down a certain portion of the papers because, in his opinion, it would assist a private individual in the prosecution of some claim against the Government.

Mr. BOWELL. No; the man himself may think that.

Mr. BLAKE said the hon. Minister did not correctly state his (Mr. Blake's) position on a former occasion, and did not correctly comprehend the ground upon which a Government ought to grant or refuse a motion such as that now made. His ground should be not what the motive of the mover was, but what the effect of producing the papers would be. If the effect would be to assist the prosecution of an unfounded claim, that was sufficient reason for not producing them; if not, there was no reason for producing them.

Mr. SCRIVER would like to know if the hon. Minister had made up his mind not to produce the papers referred to, under any circumstances, or whether, if the hon. member who made the motion were here, and made satisfactory explanations of the case, the hon. Minister would bring down all the papers. If the latter were the hon. Minister's conclusion, he would move the adjournment of the debate, in order to give an opportunity to the hon. member for North Norfolk to make the further explanation which the hon. Minister seemed to require.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

TRANSLATION OF THE FRENCH DEBATES.

Mr. VANASSE moved for a statement showing the names of all persons employed as additional French Translators, translating by the page, during the last Session of the Dominion Parliament; 2. The number of pages translated by each of the said persons; 3. The price fixed in advance for each page so translated, and the price paid to each of the said additional Translators for each of the pages so translated; 4. The names of each of the officers of the House of Commons, who certified separately the number of pages so translated, and copies of each certificate given by them, and of each receipt given by each of the said additional Translators. He said: Since last Session, and especially since the beginning of the present one, certain rumors have been in circulation of a nature to incriminate in a rather serious manner the Chief French Translator. He is accused of sundry irregularities; he is accused of having given incorrect receipts or certificates, not to give the matter a harder name; and I make this motion in order that that worthy gentleman may have the opportunity of justifying himself, or that the truth be known about these matters.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting to the adoption of the motion. The hon. member will, perhaps, excuse me if I do not speak in French, because I do not propose to offer any reply to a speech, but to avail myself of this opportunity to bring another matter before the House in connection with translation. Perhaps I am not quite in order, but I venture to take this way of speaking in regard to this subject rather than by moving the adjournment of the House or other mode. The House may, perhaps, remember that on the 17th December I was called upon, as a member of the Government, to make a speech on the question of the Canadian Pacific Railway. My speech which was longer than the remarks I usually address to the House, was delivered in English; therefore, every word that appears in French in the Hansard is a translation of my speech. The other day a newspaper, in its independence and freedom, thought proper to criticize a speech delivered by the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier), in regard to the character of the French he had used. I must say, so far as that hon. gentleman is concerned, that I never heard the hon. member make a speech which was not, so far as language is concerned, a credit to any French member in this House or other body; and, therefore, the criticism respecting his French I must say could not apply to his or to that speech, because his sentences are carefully worded, his French, in a word, is always correct and a credit to himself. But the newspaper that supports that hon. gentleman, La Patrie, took the speech delivered by myself on 17th December, and published a column, including such extracts as no hon. member speaking French would farther. The language is such language as is never used in this House; it is the language of men quite uneducated, and I must call the attention of those connected with the Hansard, and of the Committee charged with supervising the debates, to the manner in which that translation has been made. It is a disgrace to this House and to Parliament. Years hence, when we have all passed away, and reference is made to that speech by others, I hope the historian of that period will have the goodness to look at the remarks I offer this evening, and the protest I now offer against the language put into my mouth in that translation. The French language is my language, and although, perhaps, I may not in public speeches use the chaste language of littérateurs, and those who take the trouble to correct their sentences and make rounded periods, nevertheless I always try to speak the French language in such a way that my compatriots may not be ashamed of my utterances. I make this protest, and I hope it will be recorded, and the Committee, or those who have the supervision of the Hansard, should take care that the translation is made in such a manner that members of this House may not be ashamed of it.

Mr. BÉCHARD. I desire to offer a few remarks as a member of the Debates Committee. The Minister of Public Works has expressed the hope that members of the Committee would see that the translation was better executed than it had been. I suppose the hon. Minister does not mean to say, nor will any hon. member pretend, that the members of that Committee speaking French will take upon themselves the task of reading all the translations of speeches in order to see whether the work was well done or not. That, of course, cannot be done; but hon. gentlemen who have an opportunity of reading their speeches after they have been translated should feel it to be their duty, in case of bad translation, to complain to members of the Committee. It is only in that way the members of the Debates Committee can quickly ascertain whether the translation is well done or not, because the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) and myself are the only French members of the Committee, and we cannot assume the task of reading the translation to ascertain whether it is well done. It is an impossibility. So I say there is no other way by which the Committee can ascertain whether the work is well done or not than in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. LANGÉVIN. —

Mr. LANGÉVIN. I must say to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Béchard) that I must decline the task of reading my speeches after they are reprinted and translated. It is a task I cannot undertake; and I have no doubt that a large majority of hon. gentlemen who speak often and have large departments or avocations to attend to, would find themselves unable to do so either. We pay for good reporting and good translation, and when the attention of the Committee is called to the fact that the translation is only a burlesque I have no doubt they will see that the public money is not squandered on work done in that way. If the translators are not proper men they should be changed—we should have good translators. The hon. gentleman says that his present action is the only way to correct the evil, and that the Committee are not called upon to read the translated speeches. Doubtless they are not. But I suppose he will not require a motion to have the evil corrected. As a member of that Committee, I have no doubt he will take as much pride in having our speeches put down in proper language as becomes his position, and that he will see that the French sent out is not the sort of French that has been called Abenquis or Iroquois.

Mr. BÉCHARD. This is the first complaint that has been made, that has come to the ears of the Committee, and I am very glad the hon. gentleman has given us this information. We certainly shall take notice of it. I might suggest, as a remedy, that whenever the translation is bad, complaint should be made, for there must be some way of the Committee's ascertaining whether the translation is well or ill made. Of course, the hon. gentleman who last spoke agrees with me that the French members of the Committee cannot assume the task of reading the French speeches, to see whether the translation is well made or not. I fully agree with the hon. gentleman, that we ought to have a good translation. Every year that we have engaged translators, we have hoped for a better translation than in the past. If there is disappointment in this respect, it is not the fault of the Committee. We have found it a difficult task, up to the present, to obtain good translations, and do not know at this moment the best mode of securing them. But this is a matter that will be brought before the Committee very soon.

Mr. ROSS. I must say I regret exceedingly, that the Minister of Public Works has had any cause to complain of the translations. This is the first complaint, as my hon. friend for Iberville has said, that has reached the ears of the Committee in regard to this matter. A few complaints were made, some time ago, with respect to the French reporting, and as soon as the Committee heard of them they engaged a gentleman who has had a great deal of experience in reporting in the Courts of Quebec, since which time I understand no further complaints have been made. I would like to say, however, to the hon. gentleman, that the task of engaging suitable translators is a very delicate one, in fact, a very difficult one; and it is only by learning the views of hon. members who speak and understand French, that the Committee can be informed in regard to this matter. Of course, the matter will be attended to immediately. Another remark—I was going to make is, that those members who look for the translation of their speeches into French are sometimes so anxious to get them early, that I fear the translators are pressed, and are sometimes obliged by the pressure to sacrifice excellence to speed. There may be something in that view. Besides, it must be remembered that the task of reporting in English and French is a herculean task. It is something that has never been achieved in any Legislature in the world before, either as to quantity, excellence or rapidity of execution. The experiment we are now practising is a new one. I think it has met with a marvellous success; and although we are going steadily to seek to meet the views of hon.

gentlemen in regard to every detail, we trust that the members of this House who are favorable to the present mode of reporting the debates will be as patient with the Committee as they can, and strive to assist us in perfecting every detail of this work, so as to enable us to present at the close of Parliament, a finished report, both in English and French, of which neither French nor English members need be ashamed. I do not regret that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has called attention to this matter; and at an early day we will seek to make such arrangements as will remove all cause of complaint.

Mr. LANDRY. Mr. Speaker, since the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Yamaska has taken the turn it has, I will add a few remarks to what has already been said. I am surprised that the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Ross) should think that the system recently adopted has been a success. If a system by which we get the French version of the speeches delivered in the House, a month, five weeks, or even six weeks after their delivery, is not a success to be envied—and the hon. member is wrong in taking upon himself to assert, or at least to hint, that the few mistakes that creep into the French version are to be explained by the fact that accuracy of expression and idioms of language are sacrificed to rapid translation—such an explanation can noways be accepted, and French members are perfectly justified in complaining of the considerable delays which take place in the translation of the debates. To-day is the 17th February, and so far we have only seen in French that portion of the debates which took place up to the 11th or 12th January last. Things are thus more than a month behindhand. Whilst we are discussing the subject, I think that I will meet the views of many of the members if I suggest a new method of bringing out the Hansard. I think we should be better off were we to adopt the system in use in England. According to that system, a member would only be entitled in the Hansard to a summary of his speech, and in that summary should be inserted merely anything new that he may have said on the subject he spoke about. Three-quarters of the Hansard would thus be done away with; the debates would be less lengthy, the Session would be shorter, and the country and the members would be all the better for it.

Mr. BÉCHARD. The hon. gentleman speaks of the delays which have taken place in putting into the hands of hon. members the French copies of their speeches. That has been the subject of complaint on the part of hon. members of the Committee, who had the Chief Translator come before them; and they ascertained that the fault was not with the translation, but with the printers. He showed us that the translating was done as rapidly as possible, and that the delays were entirely owing to the printer.

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to call the attention of the House to one or two matters in connection with the Hansard report of our Debates and Proceedings. I presume that some hon. gentlemen may not be aware that the report of the Debates of this House, which is now being issued, is the most voluminous of that of any legislative body at the present time. I believe that the Hansard of the English House of Commons employs a staff of eighteen reporters, though it is not as voluminous as ours, which is got out by a staff of six reporters. The amount of the work which the reporters of this House perform is very much greater according to the number employed, than is performed by the staff of the United States Congress, or in fact, of any other legislative body that I am aware of. I think, taking into account the amount of work which is done, and the pressure which has been placed upon the reporters during the heavy debates which have taken place this Session, we must conclude that the work has been extremely well done. I have no doubt that hon. members find it necessary to revise their speeches, and they may expect to find some trifling errors at least. The report is held open four days for the purpose of allowing members to revise their speeches for book form of Hansard, for the report which is laid on the desks of hon. members at three o'clock is a temporary and necessarily an imperfect report, as it is got out at lightning speed, hardly any time being left for the staff to consider whether they are doing the work properly or not. The reporting is done hastily; so is the proof reading; so is everything in connection with the work, and it was supposed that hon. members would take pains to revise their speeches. I think, considering the haste with which the work is done, we can reasonably claim that the Committee and the staff have come as near perfection as could have been expected from the number of men who are employed and the labors they have to perform.

Mr. BLAKE. I rise simply for the purpose of making a practical suggestion, which may be of use to the Committee. I think the work on the whole—I do not say anything about the French reporting or translation, because I have not paid much attention to it, and do not claim to be a competent judge—has been satisfactory as reporting; but I think that, owing probably to the circumstance mentioned by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton),—our rules requiring the proof copy to be laid on the Table at 3 o'clock next day—the proof reading has been extremely defective, and it seems to me it might be worthy the attention of the Committee to consider whether they really could not get out better work if they allowed a delay of some twelve hours before the printed paper should be put on the Table, with the special view of giving more time and thus, perhaps, securing better proof reading. The work of those hon. members who revise their speeches would thus be lightened, and they would not be called on to correct the most obvious errors in proof—errors which any intelligent proof-reader, if he had time, would be able to correct before the paper was laid on the Table.

Mr. JONES. I should be very sorry if any change is made with respect to the time at which the proof copies of the Hansard are laid on our desks; as I believe it is the correct system to report the language which hon. gentlemen, in the spur of the moment, use in the House, and that they should not be allowed further time to correct the proofs.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say that.

Mr. JONES. No; but we infer that an extra twelve hours is wanted to enable hon. gentlemen to correct their speeches.

Mr. BLAKE. No, no; that is not what I said.

Mr. JONES. No; but we assume it. I say with regard to the whole work, that the speeches made in this Chamber are wonderfully well reported, that everything about the report is well done. I am somewhat surprised that the translators should have made any mistake with regard to the Minister of Public Works. I have no doubt that they made the mistake inadvertently, but I was certainly surprised that any mistakes should have occurred with regard to the speech of an hon. member who speaks English so well and so deliberately as the hon. Minister of Public Works. But my purpose in rising was to protest against any additional delay in laying the proofs on the Table.

Mr. BLAKE. I wish to correct a misapprehension into which the hon. gentleman has fallen. I did not, in the slightest degree, intend to suggest—and I do not think I did suggest—that there should be any intervention on the part of hon. members in the correction of the proofs. I hold altogether with the hon. gentleman that what comes upon the Table in the daily report should be the work of the reporters without the intervention of members at all, but I say that the work of proof reading has not been properly performed, and that it could probably be better done if more time were allowed for the purpose.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I am quite sure that no one would seriously suppose that the hon. member for West Durham should desire that members should have an opportunity of reading the proofs of their speeches in any way. But speaking as one having some practical knowledge of matters of this kind, I am afraid that the change that he suggests would not result as he anticipates. The misfortune of the matter is simply that the reporting staff is not as large as it ought to be for the work they have to do. The Chief Reporter, Mr. Bradley, supposed at first that he was to do the proof reading to a very large extent, at least the revising of the proofs, but as the performance of that duty led to its being almost impossible that he could do any actual reporting, it reduced the staff of reporters by one. In the work, such as the reporters had to do during the long debates we have had this Session, it was quite impossible with this reduction that they could get through their work, and as a consequence the proof reading has not been as good as one might desire. I can see no reason why the printer, who is really the contractor for both the printing and proof reading, could not get out the proofs properly as proofs—looking at them simply in that light—and have them corrected in such a way, as far as necessary, for the purposes of the daily edition. There are two plans by which the difficulty might be removed, either by appointing a new proof-reader altogether on the staff, or allowing the Chief Reporter to remain away from the Table and do the work of proof revising in his office. Unless we adopted one course or the other we would not benefit in the slightest degree by following the plan suggested by the hon. member for West Durham. As to the question of French translation, I may say that there were some difficulties at the start, as hon. members of the Committee will bear me out in saying. There were one or two of the translators—one at any rate—who was believed by the Chief, to be utterly incompetent. We had some difficulty, as members of the Committee will remember, in connection with the corrections for the printer, representations having been made by the Chief Reporter that the work was apparently done by some incompetent member of the translating staff. As I understand these persons are no longer connected with the translating staff, and I think I may say, on the testimony of the French members of the Committee, that the staff is now about as efficient as we can fairly hope to get it. The suggestion made by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Landry), as to the delays has been answered by the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard). The delay in the French copy is not due to the translator at all, but to the printers. The matter was the subject of investigation, and the printers have been informed that they must get the French copy out more speedily than they have done. But hon. gentlemen must remember that even with a monthly delay, which is complained of, we are still much better off than we used to be. At this time of the Session we used to have the English copy, not only a month but five or six weeks behind, so that the reports of speeches delivered by hon. members were of no use to them, and the English copy contained the reports of speeches which were so different in some few instances from speeches delivered in the House that one could hardly recognize them at all, owing to the system of allowing hon. members to correct the manuscript of their speeches before going into type. The French copy had to be translated after the English copy was printed, and I think I am speaking within the mark when I say that the French copy really did not come out for two or three months after the speeches were delivered. As the hon. member for North Norfolk has pointed out, four days are allowed to members in which they may correct the printed copy. Under this system the French translators cannot consequently commence their work until they have the corrected English copy before them. I think if hon. members will go into the translators' office now, they will find—that is the information we had at a meeting of the Committee a week ago—that the French translation is well up, although unfortunately owing to the delays in printing the copy has not been submitted to the House. I am sure the Committee are very much obliged to the hon. the Minister of Public Works for bringing this matter before the House and making these complaints in the public way he has done. I am sure every member of the Committee will be glad to insist upon the greatest possible care being taken that the Hansard, as it comes out, whether in English or French, shall be creditable to the House, and the speeches creditable to the hon. members who delivered them, in so far as their construction is concerned.

Mr. MILLS. I believe the reporters often do their work under great disadvantage. There are frequent interruptions, members become tired of listening to the discussions, they are frequently coming into or leaving the House, and it is sometimes difficult for the reporters correctly to hear what is being said. I think that many of the mistakes which we find in the report are due to the printers and not to the reporters. In reading the reports we see mistakes evidently made by the printers who have not accurately read the manuscript of the reporters. Of course that is evidence that the proof-reading is not always done with care. I believe the fact is that the proof-reading is not done by the reporters, but is done by some one in the printing office. No doubt, the Committee may be of service to the House in calling the attention of the printer to the fact that the proof reading is not properly done. There are often glaring mistakes that ought never to exist in the reported document at all. Even though the report itself might not be perfect in every respect, if the printers did their work properly I am sure that even this first impression would be much more satisfactory than it is. If I correctly understand the hon. member for Cardwell, the translation is not made until after the copy in the language in which the speech is delivered is revised, and it often happens that members are so busily engaged that they delay to correct their speeches, and, consequently, there is some delay before the translator can get the revised copy. If members were always prompt in assisting in the correction of mistakes in the first impression, the translation would be much more promptly done than it is now.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to bear my testimony to the fact of the great improvement that has been made by the system adopted this year. I have no doubt that every member who addresses the House has found a great deal of satisfaction in the prompt manner in which his speeches have appeared in the Hansard within a few hours, and he has found also that the reporting is, in the main, exceedingly satisfactory. I may say, however, that I think too great a charge has been imposed upon the manager of the reportorial staff. That gentleman has been compelled, not only to take his part in reporting, but to edit—I think that is the word—the reports as they come out. It is quite certain that the editor of the Hansard must be familiar with the topics which are discussed in the House, in order intelligently to translate the reporters' notes and get them properly extended, and to see that there is no mistake made which can be avoided. I understand that during the great stress that was thrown upon the staff through the long debates we have had, and the more than usual amount of business they had thrown upon them at the outset, they have been greatly overworked. My own impression is that if this thing is worth doing at all it is worth doing well, and that the best talent should be employed for the purpose, that it should be properly remunerated, and that we should not attempt to get too much work of these gentlemen who are doing us an excellent service. I have reason to suppose that the staff is very much overworked. I have reason to believe that it would be very much better if the House should enlarge it somewhat. I do not think there is any one in the House who would like to go back to the old system of not having the official reporters on the floor of the House. I, for one, wish to bear my testimony to the thoroughness and promptness with which, as a whole, the reports have been made. There are, of course, and must be, mistakes from the hasty manner in which these reports are brought before us, within twenty-four hours, and frequently less than that, after the speeches are delivered; there must be blunders which a little time and more care would obviate. I have found more satisfaction in the reports I have received than I have ever had before since I have been a member of this House. The speeches are in general so well reported that one goes on for a long time scarcely finding it necessary to make any change or alterations, then, perhaps, we come to something slightly rough. If there is difficulty in the French translation I have no doubt it will be speedily obviated by the Committee, who, I am sure, are desirous of doing everything in their power to make this a successful experiment. I hope the services of the reporters will be appreciated. Since I rose to speak, I have had handed to me a memorandum which is exactly in the direction in which I have ventured to make these few remarks. This memorandum, I think I may take the liberty of saying, has been handed to me by the chief of the staff, since I have been on my feet:

"All that is required to perfect the report is to slightly strengthen the staff. That is all we ask. Let the Committee do this, and corrections will be reduced to almost nothing. Members will then have no trouble, and the extra cost will almost be saved in printer's corrections."

That is my judgment, and I hope it will meet with the approval of the House, and that liberty will be granted to the Committee to so strengthen the staff as to bring about what is suggested here by the very excellent superintendent of the staff, Mr. Bradley, than whom there is no better or more efficient man that I know of engaged in the practice of stenography.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. If I were disposed to agree with every word spoken by gentlemen on all sides of the House, I would still be inclined, from all that has been said, to ask the Committee or the House to consider whether it is better to increase the staff or diminish the material. As long as the present system prevails, the material which makes up the herculean work of the Hansard reporters will probably increase. We are so peculiarly situated that, as has been well said, the labors of the Hansard staff are greater and more efficient than elsewhere. The reporting being in the two languages, the labor is very great. The report which is almost the ipsissima verba of hon. gentlemen who speak, appears to me to be more than is absolutely necessary to adorn history, and I think we might, perhaps, adopt a system which would enable us to get a kind of digest of what hon. gentlemen say, or give some discretion by which the enormous labor the present system entails would be avoided and the enormous volumes of Hansard reduced.

Mr. ROYAL. Mr. Speaker, I think that the translation of the debates into French are very well done, and that the case of the hon. Minister of Public Works is an exceptional one. There are many difficulties in our language, as is well known to all those who are acquainted with the French language; it is difficult to speak it well, and especially difficult to translate it. There is an Italian proverb that says: "Traduttore, traditore." And in point of fact, in the case of a novice, a translator is often a betrayer. There are two translators' offices here in connection with the House of Commons. The translator of the debates employs new hands, slightly conversant only with translating; and it is consequently not surprising that in some instances the translation should be faulty in more ways than one. But I believe this to be the exception; there are in that translator's office very able men, who know their own language perfectly well, and who can translate it as well as anyone; men who know French, who know how to write it, and who understand English as well as French. No doubt, Mr. Speaker, it is far harder to speak French grammatically than it is to speak English, and that is why we are so sensitive when we read the reports of what we have said. If we are reported verbatim, it is certain that, in many cases, we do not recognize our utterances or that we feign not to recognize them. Notwithstanding that a poet has said:

"Ce qui se conçoit bien s'énonce clairement."

We think we are expressing ourselves in a clear manner, yet often in the verbatim report taken of our utterances, we pretend not to know ourselves again. At all events, I think that we must in justice to the translators' office, admit that the translation is done as perfectly and as correctly as we can expect, considering the time and the circumstances. And now, Mr. Speaker, I will say a word about the other translators' office in connexion with this House; in that office there are to be found some very able men; nevertheless I think there is in that office room for improvement. I am told, and that on good authority, that some Statutes have been translated in so defective a fashion, that last year, one of the Judges of the Superior Court sitting in Montreal, refused to consider the French translation as the official text; as a matter of fact, when the French version was compared with the English one in one of the departments, it was found to be in distinct contradiction with the latter. No doubt, in this case as in the other, it would be unjust to condemn the whole office because a few Statutes or a few debates have been badly translated. Nevertheless, the discussion which has just taken place, ought to be an incentive to those employed in both offices to do better, whilst the Committee, whose duty it is to superintend the publication of the official debates, should see to it that there are in the offices a sufficient number of men to prevent the repetition of mistakes such as complained of to-night by the hon. Minister of Public Works, and which we regret as much as he does.

Mr. SCRIVER. With regard to what fell from the hon. member for Niagara (Mr. Plumb), I desire to say that it was understood, when the staff was engaged, that the chief of the staff was to assist when necessary, and only when necessary, as a reporter in the House, and that the duties of reporter was not to be allowed to interfere with the discharge of his duties as chief of the staff; and the Committee have been given to understand that such reporting as he has done has not been such as to interfere with his more important duties as chief of the staff. I was a little surprised to learn, from the hon. member for Niagara, that the chief of the staff had taken the method which he did to advise what he thought was required as an improvement in the French translation. I think it would have been more proper if that gentleman had communicated his views first to the Committee with whom he generally communicates, and allow the Committee, if they thought fit, to recommend some change to the House. We have already been given to understand that the delay in the French translation was not owing to the translators themselves, but owing to the printer. With regard to the insufficiency of the staff to do the work imposed on them, I think the Committee were satisfied that had the work which the reporters had to do in the early part of the Session continued, the staff would not certainly have been large enough to do the work. While the Pacific Railway debate continued, they had more work to do than could fairly be asked of them; but the Committee were of opinion that during the remainder of the Session, the staff as at present composed, was sufficient for the task required of them.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF SANDFORD FLEMING.

Mr. MILLS moved for copies of all memoranda to Council and Orders in Council relating to the dismissal of Sandford Fleming, as Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway; also, all correspondence between Ministers, and between Mr. Fleming and any member of the Government upon the same subject.

Mr. LANGEVIN suggested that the word "withdrawal" should be substituted for "dismissal."

Mr. MILLS. Say "removal."

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman does not know whether it is dismissal or removal, and therefore I would suggest it should be withdrawal.

Mr. BLAKE said that the letter of the hon. Minister of Railways to Mr. Fleming informed him he had been appointed to some other office, and that another person was appointed in his place. If the hon. Minister properly called that a "withdrawal," he (Mr. Blake) did not understand the English language.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he understood that in the English language "dismissal" was not a complimentary word. It meant removal for cause. The hon. gentleman was not justified in putting that stigma on the late Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, therefore, he would suggest the word "withdrawal" should be used. Whether he had withdrawn by his free will or been offered another office, the papers would show.

Mr. ANGLIN. The favorite expression of the hon. Minister of Railways is that his services were dispensed with. Why not adopt that phraseology?

Mr. MILLS said the hon. Minister must know the facts better than any hon. gentleman on this side, but the correspondence did not show that Mr. Fleming had "withdrawn" from his position. It disclosed that he had been removed, that it was intimated to him he could not be permitted to remain. True, he was offered another position, but how he came to be offered that was not a matter about which he (Mr. Mills) made enquiry. His enquiry had reference to the fact of his having been superseded in the position of Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway whether that was through the action of the hon. Minister or of Mr. Fleming would be disclosed by the papers; but certainly the correspondence given to the public showed that he was removed from his position and another put in his place.

Mr. LANGEVIN. We will give the information about that.

Motion, as amended by Mr. LANGEVIN, agreed to.

RICE AND POWDER DUTIES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUNSTER moved for a return of all duties collected on rice imported into the Province of British Columbia during the last fiscal year; also, a return of duties on powder imported into the same Province during the same period. He said: This motion may be considered, by some hon. members, as somewhat odd; nevertheless, it is of more importance to the whole continent of America than many hon. members can conceive. In asking for the returns of rice, it affects the whole Dominion and the whole continent—in imposing a tax on a certain class of individuals who defy competition and all tax collectors. That is a well known fact. It is admitted by all tax collectors that they cannot reach this class now infesting the country—if I may be allowed to use the word—and who, to-day, are imported by shiploads into British Columbia. This is a question which we now feel very seriously on the Pacific coast, and which will also, in future years, be felt in the eastern part of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BUNSTER. The hon. member for Bothwell, although well acquainted with most subjects, knows nothing about the question on which I am speaking, and it would be well if he abstained from displaying his ignorance—if I may be allowed to use the term. He may possess a serious motive for doing so. Who knows but he may be retained by some Chinese merchant—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BUNSTER. I maintain that I am perfectly in order. I have heard it stated that hon. members belonging to the legal profession received fees before; and when interrupted I claim I have a perfect right to accuse an hon. gentleman who interrupts me of having a fee from the Chinese merchants, because the Chinese claim they will yet own half the country, and will leave no stone unturned to accomplish their end. They brag and boast of it. What are they doing to-day? They are sending more people to our country than the whole of Europe. They say they will build the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they have cyphered out its cost. It is currently reported that the celebrated Onderdonk contract belongs to Chinese merchants. British Columbia entered the Confederation for the sake of having the Canadian Pacific Railway built; but we did not think it would be built by Chinese labor. We thought it would be built by Canadians and Europeans who would people the soil and develop the country, who would not take away every dollar they could rake up out of building the national highway across the continent. Hence we have a great grievance to present to Parliament, to lay at the foot of the Throne. I intend to press this motion on the attention of the Government, and I regret that while the Government promised to include it in their National Policy, they failed to do so, and I think it was a mistake. They increased the tax on powder, but they did not do so with respect to rice. If we allow Chinese to infest our country, as is at present being done, they will drive out the white population which has gone there and civilized the Indians, who make better citizens than the Chinese.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BUNSTER. I will prove my assertion by reading a short extract from a newspaper, the British Colonist, of Victoria. It is as follows:—

"The 'highbinder' bears to the Chinese portion of our population the same relation that the 'hoodlum' does to the white portion, in fact he is a 'hoodlum,' and sets at defiance all laws and customs, and is always ready to assail and resist. Huey Ah Hop, one of this class, was brought before the Police Judge on Friday for assault on one of his countrymen, and, after trial, was found guilty. Yesterday he was sentenced to pay a fine of $100 or to be imprisoned for fifty days in the county jail. On Thursday night Hop was in the Chinese theatre on Washington street, and as there was standing room only he took up a position in one end of the passage way. During intermission one of the audience in passing but jostled against Hop, who drew from under his coat a hatchet and attempted to lay his head open with it, and would undoubtedly have done so had not a special watchman come up and placed 'highbinder' under arrest. The weapon used was produced in court, and on examination it was discovered that it had been ground until its edge was as sharp as that of a razor, creases had been cut into the handle in order to give a firm hand hold and the cutting portion of the weapon was covered with a sole leather guard to protect the wearer and which could be removed instantly at will. The weapon—a most dangerous one—is the implement used by every member of the Hatchet Society, composed of 'highbinders' banded together for the purpose of blackmail, plunder and murder."

These are the instruments the Chinese carry to cut people to pieces. If we are to encourage such a class of immigrants we will drive European immigrants from our shores—immgrants from France, Germany, England, Ireland and Scotland—and I ask the House which is the better class. When we consider there are in China 480,000,000, of a population, and that it could spare 40,000,000 or 50,000,000 people and not miss them, which masses could flood us out, am I not right in asking protection against this Chinese labor that is excluding the white labor of Europe? May I read some evidence taken before Congress with regard to these Chinese in the United States? No; I will spare the feelings of the ladies in the galleries. Members may inform themselves, in our Library, of the outrages against decency committed in the United States by the Chinese. The information would make one's blood run cold in connection with the thought that such emigrants may enter our country with impunity. If the Premier was in his seat, I would ask him why he did not put a clause in the Syndicate agreement prohibiting the importation of Chinese labor for the Canadian Pacific Railway. Now that the Minister of Customs is in his seat, I expect he will support my views, or at least impose a sufficient duty on rice.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. BUNSTER. What is your point of order? Do you know what you are talking about? I am perfectly in order and know what my people require and demand. Let me say that the farmers in British Columbia feel severely this Chinese immigration. No white women will come into our country for domestic service. Chinese immigration deteriorates labor; hence our farmers are obliged to go without wives, which is certainly, all will admit, a great deprivation if not a curse to the human family.

Mr. MILLS. What, wives?

Mr. BUNSTER. What do you know about wives? But, to be serious, a frontier country requires nursing. We gave ourselves away to Canada, thinking we should be better protected; but had we known this evil was coming upon us, I question very much if the people of British Columbia would ever have joined the Confederation; they would not had they thought their prayers would not have received more attention than they do to-day. We have a right to lay our grievances before the Government, and when they profess a National Policy, ask that the sons of the soil should be protected against Chinese competition.

An hon. MEMBER. The Chinese.

Mr. BUNSTER. Who is speaking—you or I? When Chinese immigration creates bad blood with every man in British Columbia, I have a right to protest. I may say to the hon. gentleman who has more than once interrupted me, that when I finish, he can answer me; but I claim the protection of the Speaker to lay this grievance before the Government. We do not want to be imposed upon by a race that has been denounced by our American neighbors from stem to stern; and it was only the President who was bought, perhaps, by millions, who vetoed the Act of Congress, continued to the Chinese the privilege of landing on the United States shores. I notice that when Pacific Coast questions come up in this House, they do not get a fair hearing. I brought up this question years ago, and shall continue to do so while I am in the House, until I succeed in obtaining redress. We have a great grievance to contend with. There is not a British Columbian but would say "keep the Canadian Pacific Railway; let us keep out of Confederation if we can thereby keep the Chinese out of the country and preserve our internal rights and arrangements as we had them before the Union." We would be happier under the old system. I am much pleased, indeed, to have the approval of the member for Lincoln. The subject deserves the consideration of this House and country, and the more the country is enlightened on it, the more they will feel that we have a grievance that ought to be remedied. Notwithstanding some hon. gentlemen will say it would be well to have the Mongolian race come to British Columbia and develop the sea of mountains, nevertheless that sea of mountains will take care of itself independent of that Mongolian race. It is unfair to the terms of Confederation, and contrary to the spirit of the contract with British Columbia, to allow Chinese labor to build that road in that Province. This portion of the Dominion here is too cold, and if I may use the language of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), too inhospitable for them to come to. They have not the manhood and the hardihood to come into a country where it freezes, but our Province—warm, genial and salubrious as it is—is different, as they know very well. It is not long since a few of them came here, as agents, to report to the great kingdom of China and Hong Kong what this climate was like. The report was that it was not fit for them to live here. I trust that the Government will impose a duty on rice, according to the wishes of the people of British Columbia, and that they will also take the duty off powder, in order that our white miners, the native born sons of our soil, may develop the coal mines, the gold mines or the other mineral resources of our Province, which will yet be an incalculable boon to this country just as Ireland and Scotland are to England, one country furnishing the minerals and the other the breadstuffs and beef. We do not want our country populated by the Chinese; we do not acknowledge them as part of our people, and we do not wish to deteriorate our race by any mixture with them. I ask this rearrangement of the duties on the grounds of the National Policy, and from a Government who believe in protecting our home industries. I supported them through thick and thin in regard to protection, and I believe in protection still. I think that the imposition of a duty on rice, which would keep out an undesirable element in our population, and the reduction of the duty on gunpowder, which would develop our mining interests, would be a fair exchange and one which would be in the interests of the country. It is our duty to legislate in the interests of our own people and not of the Mongolians, a class of people who do not encourage churches or schools or any other means of promoting morality in our country. If our children go to school with half-breeds and Mongolians, it makes bad blood, and I say that our people should not be compelled to mix with these Chinese, in either our schools or our churches. I want to see our country peopled by Canadians and Britons, and not by Mongolians, who are flooding our shores like the locusts in Texas some time ago, to the exclusion of white men. They are the greatest curse we have had to contend with, worse, by far, than the weevil or the Colorado potato-bug, because no farmers will settle on our lands, for they cannot get wives to make their homes comfortable. This is a grievance that money cannot counteract, for millions of money are worth nothing if home is not happy, and I would like to know if home is ever happy without a good maid in it. I claim that this question deserves well at the hands of the Government—deserves more consideration than they have yet given it. It is a more serious question to-day than the Pacific Railway Syndicate scheme, which they carried through so successfully. I hope they will comply with my request and impose a duty of twenty-five cents per pound on rice and remove the duty off powder. I make that suggestion, and I have the cordial support of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. De Cosmos) in doing so. I leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a list of the names of persons appointed to take the next census, giving the office held by each and the district for which he is appointed.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I do not know whether this covers more than the appointments already made. If the hon. gentleman means those, we might come down with one return first and then a supplementary one at a future day.

Mr. BLAKE. Are the great bulk of the appointments made?

Mr. LANGEVIN. It will not be long before they are all made.

Motion agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO CENSUS ENUMERATORS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for copies of all written instructions and forms and papers prepared for the use of any of the officers engaged in taking the census of 1871, not already brought down, including the papers mentioned in the Census Report; and for a memorandum of the substance of the oral instructions given to the Commissioners on that occasion; and for the like information as to written instructions, forms and papers, and as to oral instructions in connection with the census for 1851. He said: It will be observed, from the report in connection with the last census, that there were appointed 206 District Commissioners, and 2,789 enumerators, who all receive a series of instructions before entering upon the execution of their duties. Each officer was furnished with a manual of directions and a specimen schedule indicating the manner in which every entry was to be made. It is to that that I refer particularly when I ask in this motion for the papers mentioned in the Census Report, the report indicating that there was a manual of their directions and a specimen schedule, as well as a schedule delivered to heads of families in taking the census. It seems to me important that we should have a copy of the forms that were used on the former occasion, together with the forms to be used in the next census, that we may compare them and see which are the best.

Mr. LANGEVIN. All these papers will be brought down as soon as possible.

Motion agreed to.

MODE OF TAKING THE CENSUS.

Mr. BLAKE moved for a statement of any information in the possession of the Government as to the number of persons counted during the last census, though absent from the place in which they were counted; distinguishing by Provinces, and also distinguishing between those said to be absent (1) in other parts of the same Province, (2) in other parts of Canada, (3) in the United States, and (4) in other foreign parts; also, for a statement of the means (if any) taken to ascertain how many absentees were counted; and to guard against those who had left permanently, and against those who were present only temporarily being counted; also, for a statement of the means (if any) to be taken during the next census to secure the suggested information, and to guard against the suggested defect in the taking of the next census. He said: I think the subject to which this motion relates is one of considerable importance. It will be within the recollection of those who had seats in this House when the former Census Act was under consideration, that there was a debate upon the second reading, I think, of that measure as to the mode in which our census should be taken, whether it should be according to the phonographic system or the system which was ultimately adopted. Upon that occasion the Bill not prescribing the precise mode in which the census should be taken, information was asked by hon. members as to the mode intended to be adopted, and several hon. members suggested that the peculiar difference in some of the Provinces with reference to the habits and employment of the population required a more extended provision than that which was adopted in England. But the Premier, the then leader of the House, declared that the only true mode of taking a census was the mode adopted in England, the plan of ascertaining the number of persons actually sleeping in a particular house which was visited on such a night of the year. Well, I have not the slightest doubt in the world that that statement was made in perfect good faith, and represented the then intention of the Government; but it so happened that the Government entirely reversed its policy subsequently, and the census of 1871 was taken, not upon the principle which had been stated to the House as that which was to guide the action of the Government, but upon another principle altogether. I am assuming that in some form or other, the policy on which the census of 1871 was taken, is that upon which this census is to be taken, and I simply desire now to ascertain what precautions have been taken to avoid the evils and difficulties which must occur in any mode of enumeration which does not follow the simple form to which I have referred. That there follow difficulties from the protracted system of enumeration is very clear. The report of the last census of the United States has not yet been issued, but in the general report of the Superintendent for the ninth census, that of 1870, while pointing out the accuracy which was attained as far as possible in doing the work, he heads one of the divisions of his report thus: "The Essential Viciousness of a Protracted Enumeration," and he points out that it is almost impossible to secure accuracy under that system. He points out that the period contemplated for the completion of the census was in round numbers 100 days. Then he says:

"Now, why the enumeration of a people is extended over such a period of time, a de facto enumeration is of course impossible. The country must be content with an enumeration which affords, in its very nature but an approximation, more or less inexact to the real number of inhabitants. A definition of residence must be introduced into the law and the schedules, and it is inevitable that, by the inherent vagueness of such definitions, considerable numbers will escape enumeration. This is not a question of the strong or loose administration of the law. It is involved in the very provision of the law by which a period of one hundred days is taken."

He proceeds to point out difficulties which occur in cities, owing to removals from one ward to another, and owing to absences. He points out also that a certain amount of duplication necessarily occurs, and gives some instances of it. Then he says:

"As the instructions given in the preparation for the present census were especially emphatic and clear on this subject, it must be inferred that the error is inherent in the nature of a protracted enumeration, and that the remedy can only be found in a de facto census."

He gives a number of errors which were found in particular classes. One of those instances is that of students resident at colleges. I understand that large numbers of persons were counted, although temporarily, as was supposed, absent from the places where they were counted, and therefore I desire the information asked for in the first part of my motion. Our law seems to be much looser than that of the United States. The schedule under which the census has just been taken, contained in an Act of Congress of 1878, and altered by an Act of 1880, provides for the "name of every person whose abode was, on the 1st of June, in this family." A special provision is also made for the enumeration of persons who have left certain parts of the States and who live in California, Oregon, Utah and New Mexico. I cite these instances to show that the Legislature of Nova Scotia provided for certain difficulties connected with the census, which we have left entirely in the hands of the Administration, and upon which it is expedient that Parliament should have information. I do not observe in the report on the results of the last census, any statement with reference to recounts, re-enumerations or a checking of the cases in which there appeared to be some discrepancy. I do not mean to say that there was no occasion for such re-checking; I think it is not now likely that there was. I merely contrast the report in its meagreness, in this respect, with the report to which I have just referred, and I think, on that subject also, the House should have some information. It seems to me to be extremely important that we should know, in view of the extension which has taken place in our population, what steps are being taken to guard against the enumeration of those who have become absentees permanently, who have left one Province for another, or for Manitoba, the North-West or the United States. I understand that the instructions given for the taking of the last census provided in substance that the census officer should ascertain who belonged to a family, who were usually residents in a locality, and enumerate them even though they were absentees. The precise form of words I think we ought to know. I have heard it stated, though not on authority, that there is a serious alteration in the present instructions, and that the theory of the present census is, that those who were resident in a locality or in a family within twelve months preceding the day of the census, are to be taken. If there be any substantial deviation from the practice of taking the old census, I think we should know it, because I think such a method would be open to very serious criticism. If there was a column in the schedules for the names of any persons, who, at the time of the enumeration, are temporarily absent from a family or a locality, it would be a considerable check upon the improper counting of absentees. We could see at once, how far the numbers were swelled by the absentees being counted, and, by a certain law of average, we could observe where there was any undue swelling of the numbers on that account. If no provision of that kind exists, I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, we have omitted an important precaution against error in taking the census.

Mr. LANGEVIN said he was afraid the hon. gentleman could not expect to have all the information he asked for very soon, owing to defects in the taking of the full census, but the Government would bring down all the information possible in as short a delay as possible.

Motion agreed to.

EMIGRATION FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for copies of all despatches and correspondence on the subject of emigration from Ireland or other parts of the United Kingdom to the North-West and other parts of Canada, said: In December last, I think it was the 14th December, the hon. Minister of Railways flourished across the House a paragraph from the Times, and told me:

"I am quite sure that, as a patriotic Canadian, he will be glad to learn the London Times announced that the Imperial Government has promised to bring down a scheme of emigration, assisted by the Canadian Government. So the hon. gentleman may feel he is not quite in a position to repeat what I am rather afraid was to him a gratifying intimation, that the present Canadian Government had entirely failed in their negotiations."

Since that day we have not heard anything of the announcement of the Imperial Government. We have had, at a late period, laid on the Table a Message from His Excellency, in which he stated the proposition of the Canadian Government to the Imperial Government on that subject dated, I think, in November last; but we are now at the 17th February, and there has been ample time for the communication of a reply to that communication of the Canadian Government, yet we have no information of the intentions of the Imperial Government. I am anxious to know whether there is any official recognition by the Imperial Government of the fact that such a despatch was sent—any communication to show that the Imperial Government has considered the proposal of the Canadian Government—and if so, what are the intentions of the Imperial Government on the subject? In a word, I wish to know whether there is any thing at all to prove that the gratifying statement made in the Times, and quoted by the hon. Minister of Railways on the 14th December, has any foundation?

Mr. LANGEVIN. The despatches and correspondence to which the hon. gentleman alludes will, of course, be brought down, unless the public interest would not allow them to be brought down. We have nothing to hide about that matter.

Mr. BLAKE. I am afraid that while the hon. gentleman has nothing to hide he has nothing to conceal.

Mr. LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman has no right to say that.

Mr. BLAKE. I will give the hon. gentleman the reason.

Mr. LANGEVIN. What I say is that all the correspondence and despatches which we can bring down consistently with our duty to the country, and the interests of the country, we will bring down. The hon. gentleman has no right to say after that we have nothing to bring down. When the papers are produced he can form his own conclusion.

Mr. BLAKE. I said I was afraid that while the hon. gentleman had nothing to publish, he had nothing to disclose. He said that I had no right to express that fear. It was, however, based on a statement made to me a few days ago by the Minister of Finance, that there was no despatch from the Imperial Government on the subject.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Then why did the hon. gentleman ask for them?

Mr. BLAKE. Because I had put my notice on the paper.

ADMISSION INTO FRANCE OF CANADIAN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. VALIN moved for copies of all correspondence exchanged between the Canadian and the French Governments, with reference to the admission into France of Canadian built vessels on the same terms as European built vessels. He said: The shipbuilding trade in the Provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is in a most languishing state. We have repeatedly asked the Government to inform us of the result of its application to the French Government to admit vessels free of duty. I well remember that, during the Session of 1879, mention was made of a tariff, according to which Canadian built vessels should be admitted on the same terms as those of other nations. The hon. Minister of Finance has said that he was not aware that any correspondence had taken place, at least recently, that could give us any information on the subject. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read the text of the French law just passed:

"The Journal des Débats of the 30th January gives, in the following terms the law on the mercantile marine, as passed by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies:

"The Senate and the Chamber of Deputies have passed as law, "The President of the Republic promulgates a law, the tenor of which is as follows:—

"Article 1.—Free pilotage is granted to all sailing vessels of less than 8) tons burden, and to steamers whose burden does not exceed 100 tons, which usually trade from port to port, and which resort to the mouths of rivers.

"But, at the request of the Boards of Trade, and after an inquiry made in the ordinary form, departmental regulations shall be issued to determine such improvements as it may be deemed necessary to make, in the interests of navigation, in the existing regulations.

"Article 2.—In the case of vessels sailing in distant seas, the inspection prescribed by Article 225 of the Commercial Code, in the case of a new cargo loaded in France, shall only be compulsory, inasmuch as six months shall have elapsed since the last inspection, unless, however, such vessels shall have received injuries.

"Article 3.—"

It is in this Article 3 that we shall at last find some information in reply to the question which we have put:

"The deeds and documents establishing the changes, either partial or total, of the ownership of vessels, shall, on being registered, be liable only to a fixed rate of 3 francs. Art. 5, No. 2 of the law of the 28th September, 1872, is annulled in so far as it is in contradiction with the present enactment.

"Article 4.—As a compensation for the duties imposed on builders of sea-going vessels by the Customs Tariff, the following allowances shall be made them:—

"For steel and iron-built ships, 60 francs per gross ton."

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in order to encourage ship-building in France, and to increase the number of ships, premiums are to be given, which, as I have just said, will be of the value of 60 francs per ton for iron or steel-built ships.

"For wooden vessels of 200 tons burthen or more, 20 francs.

"For wooden vessels under 200 tons burthen, 10 francs.

"For composite vessels, 40 francs.

"For locomotive machinery on board steamers, and for auxiliary apparatus, such as steam pumps, feeders, winches, ventilators, driven by machinery, as well as the boilers feeding them, with their tubing, 12 francs per 100 kilogrammes.

"Shall be considered as composite vessels, wooden-encased vessels, whose frames and beams are entirely of iron or of steel.

"Article 5.—Any transformation of a ship resulting in the increase of its tonnage, entitles to a premium calculated in conformity with the foregoing tariff, according to the number of tons by which its tonnage is increased.

"Such premium shall be granted to locomotive machinery and auxiliary apparatus fitted in after the vessel shall have been constructed.

"When boilers are renewed, the owner of the vessel shall be awarded a compensation of 8 francs per 100 kilos on the weight of the new boilers, which are to be of French make, and which shall be weighed without their tubing.

"Article 6.—The allowances determined by Articles 4 and 5 shall be paid after the delivery of the deed of French registry, by the Collector of Customs who shall be nearest to the port where the ship was built.

"Article 7.—The free entry established by Article 1 of the law of the 19th May, 1866, and by Article 2 of the law of the 17th March, 1879, is hereby abolished.

"Article 8.—With regard to ships on the stocks at the time of the present law coming into force, the builders shall receive the allowances mentioned in Article 4, after deduction of the duties payable, according to the conventional tariff, on foreign materials the free entry whereof shall have obtained at the time of their importation for the construction of the said ships.

"Article 9.—As compensation for the burdens, which the mercantile marine has to bear in connection with the recruiting for and the service in the navy, there is hereby granted to French sailers and steamers, for a period of ten years, from the date of the promulgation of the present law, a premium on their navigation.

"This premium is only granted to vessels sailing in distant seas.

"French built vessels, newly constructed, shall receive a premium of 11.50c. per net ton, and 1,000 miles of travel, said premium subject to the following deductions every year:

"75 centimes in the case of wooden vessels;

"75 centimes in the case of composite vessels;

"5 centimes in the case of iron vessels.

"In the case of foreign-built vessels, the above premium is reduced to one-half.

"Vessels registered in France previous to the promulgation of the present law, shall be treated as French built vessels with regard to the above premium."

The meaning of this, Mr. Speaker, is, that were we to go and sell in France a ship built in Canada, Nova Scotia, or in New Brunswick, it would be to our disadvantage, for in that case, the French shipowner who would buy that ship would be entitled to put one-half of the premium per ton on the thousand miles of travel. This is an enormous disadvantage to us on the French markets.

"The premium shall be increased 15 per cent. in the case of steamers built according to plans which shall have been approved of by the Naval Department.

"The number of miles travelled shall be reckoned from port to port, and according to the direct maritime line.

"In time of war, merchant vessels may be requisitioned by the Government.

"Vessels engaged in coast and deep sea fishing, lines receiving a subsidy, and pleasure boats shall not be entitled to the premium.

"Article 10.—Every master of a ship receiving one of the premiums fixed by article 7 of the present law, shall be bound to carry, free of charge, all correspondence matter entrusted to his care by the Post Office authorities, or that shall be given to him to transmit to them in conformity with the Consular Act of 19 germinal year X.

"Should any mail officer be sent with such correspondence matter, he also shall be carried free of charge.

Mr. VALIN.

"Article 11.—A Departmental regulation establishing the distances from port to port, shall be issued to determine the working of this law.

"The present law having been discussed and passed by the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, shall be enforced as a State law.

"JULES GREVY."

"Paris, 29th January, 1881."

Here we have the true answer, which we have been so long awaiting. I do not think it very advantageous for Canada. As a shipbuilder residing in Quebec, I do not see that according to that law we can build ships at Quebec on a very large scale. I do not think, moreover, that it would be an advantage for our Government to make a concession such as was spoken of in 1879, in order that our ships should be admitted on the same footing as those of other Provinces. If, according to the terms of that law we are, as it seems to me, entitled to enter free of duty, I think we are entitled to do so without making any sacrifices in our own tariff, unless there be private arrangements to be derived therefrom, of which we are ignorant, but of which we shall be informed later on, if such arrangements actually exist. If that law there is not, as far as I can see, more protection for us than for other countries selling their ships to France.

Motion agreed to.

VESSELS BUILT IN THE UNITED STATES AND REGISTERED IN CANADA.

Mr. VALIN moved for a statement of the number and tonnage of sailers and steamers, built in the United States and registered in Canada, from 1st January, 1878, to 1st January, 1880; also of the amount levied for the registry of said vessels. He said: Mr. Speaker, two years ago I made a nearly similar motion before this House, by which I asked that ships built in the United States and sold on our market should at least be taxed. I know that abuses exist. I know of ships owned in Canada and that have been bought in the United States, but I do not know if they have been registered. Should the Government accede to my motion, the truth of the matter will come out.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Copies of all reports and accounts made by Antoine Dosithe Danis, as collector and paymaster upon the Beauharnois Canal, and submitted by him to the Department of Inland Revenue, Public Works, and of Railways and Canals, from the date of his appointment to the present time.—(Mr. Holton.)

Copies of all reports of Engineers or others, respecting the repairs made on the Dam or Breakwater at Shippegan, N.B., in the year 1880, of any reports made by the officers or others through whom the persons employed in the work were paid, and copies of the pay-lists; and also, copies of all correspondence relating to such repairs and such payments.—(Mr. Anglin.)

Correspondence and reports of Engineers in relation to the construction of a Breakwater and Breastwork at Souris West in King's County, Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Muttart.)

Statement showing the value for duty at which the iron for the construction of the Chaudiere Railway Bridge was entered, the addition made to said value by the appraiser or collector at the Port of Ottawa, the names of the merchant appraisers appointed under Section 45, Cap. 10, 40th Vic., to whom the final appraisement was referred; together with a copy of the decision, award or finding of said merchant appraisers and of the Collector of Customs at Ottawa, in reference to such appraisement, or to the alleged undervaluation for duty of all iron entered for the construction of said Chandiere Railway Bridge, and a copy of the evidence taken before the aforesaid merchant appraisers.— (Mr. Hay.)

Return of all import duties collected at ports of entry on James and Hudson Bay during the season of 1880.— (Mr. Schultz.)

SUPPLY.

Mr. LANGEVIN. If we follow a rule that has been followed for years with regard to the Supplies and Ways and Means, in order to allow the Minister of Finance to go into Committee of Ways and Means to-morrow, we should take the 15th item in Supply and pass it. I know that in the English House of Commons the practice has been changed, and now the two Committees go together; and it is well to go into Committee of Supply first and pass one item before going into Committee of Ways and Means. In order to avoid any difficulty in regard to not following the practice observed in England, I think it would be better to call item 15 in Committee of Supply and pass it, the first item of the Estimates.

Mr. ANGLIN. It is really a matter of no importance to follow that course. It has been the usual course in Canada for a great many years past. The British course has always been different. We never adhered strictly to the English course. We have taken a vote, generally, in Supply, for a very small sum, I think item 11, and have afterwards sometimes changed the tariff and added two or three millions to our taxation as the case might be. Perhaps it would be more convenient to adopt the modern English practice at once; but I do not think it makes a great deal of difference.

Mr. LANGEVIN. I think it better to vote this item, and not run any risk in the matter.

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

2. The Governor General's Secretary's Office $11,100

Mr. LANGEVIN said hon. gentlemen will see by page 10 of the Estimates that there is an increase on this item of $100. It consists of two small sums of $50 each to two clerks who have received the addition fixed by law.

Mr. ANGLIN. That is the thin end of the wedge.

Mr. LANGEVIN. That wedge has been established by law, and we must accept it.

Resolution ordered to be reported.

House resumed.

THE LATE MR. CONNELL.

Mr. LANGEVIN. Before moving the adjournment of the House I wish to express the sorrow we all feel at the untimely death of our colleague and fellow-member, Mr. Connell, the member for Carlton, New Brunswick. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance wished to be present to make a few remarks upon this sad event, but is unfortunately obliged to be absent this evening; and therefore he requested me not to forget to make a few fitting remarks on this melancholy occasion. I have no doubt that I am only expressing the views and feelings of every hon. gentleman in saying that we all regret extremely the death of Mr. Connell. He was quiet and unassuming in manner, but those who knew him best are aware how kind he was and how attentive to his duties, and how great was the interest he always took in the welfare of his county and the country. It is a very painful duty to me to have to make these few remarks, especially after the loss already this Session of two of our colleagues. With these few remarks I shall move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Before the motion is put, as a New Brunswicker I cannot allow the occasion to pass without a few words in reference to my hon. friend whom we have lost. His death is a matter of very great regret. I have known him very intimately, have been most friendly with him, I have seen a great deal of him; and last night when I went to see him before retiring I was shocked to find that he was dead. I cannot adequately express my feelings on this sad occasion. It must, however, be a matter of great pleasure to his friends in New Brunswick and elsewhere to know that his loss is so much felt here by people at so great a distance from his home, and that he received great kindness, not only from members of this House, but from the citizens of Ottawa generally. I am sure that if his relatives could have been here to-day and seen the way in which the citizens turned out to attend his funeral, they would have felt convinced he was held in great respect, and that his loss was quite as much felt as the Minister of Public Works has stated to the House. And as a member from New Brunswick I feel pleased that so much respect has been paid to the memory of the deceased gentleman whose friends were so far away when he was removed by death. His father died when I was a member of this House, and I saw his body carried out of the hotel as the body of his son was taken away to-day. I feel that the loss we have sustained is one which is not sustained by this House alone, but by the whole Province of New Brunswick, because I believe hon. gentlemen opposite will agree with me in saying that he had not an enemy on either side of the House.

Mr. ANGLIN. The House will permit me very briefly to add my tribute of respect to the memory of a gentleman whose death was so unexpected and whose loss we all deplore so much. We who come from New Brunswick feel his loss much more sensibly than other hon. members. To most of us he was personally known; to most of us his family were well known, and we all esteemed and respected him in his private life however we might differ from him with regard to public affairs. He was, as the Minister of Public Works has said, singularly retiring and unobtrusive in his manner, but he was also remarkably attentive to his public duties. We, on this side, know more of him in his private life; we all knew him before he became a member of this House; we know that he was respected in the part of the country from which he came, and that he was exceedingly popular there—not that he sought popularity by the ordinary means which politicians use, but because he led so excellent a private life. He was so estimable in all the private relations, and was so much esteemed and regarded by the people throughout his county, that when he became a candidate, sometime after the death of his father, his election was regarded as a certainty from the first. We all thought that the dangerous crisis in his illness had passed. We heard late yesterday afternoon that he was quite out of danger and that his recovery was certain, and the news of his death came so suddenly, as not only to cause profound grief, but also a very sensible shock. I heartily join in a tribute of respect to his memory, and in the expressions of sympathy with his family who, I know, will regret him long and deeply.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:05 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS;

FRIDAY, 18th February, 1881.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

SUPPLY.

The Resolution adopted in Committee yesterday, was reported, read a second time, and agreed to.

THE BUDGET.

Sir, LEONARD TILLEY. Mr. Speaker, in moving the House into Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to make my financial statement to the House. In doing so, I cannot do better than follow, to some extent, the course I pursued when this duty devolved upon me last Session, and, indeed, I may say the previous Session. I then, Sir, contrasted the position I occupied with the position in which I was placed, as Finance Minister, after submitting my statement in 1873. I called the attention of the House, at that time, to the fact that in 1873 I could point to a full Treasury; to a prosperous condition of the country; and to a hopeful state of things for the future. In 1879 matters had materially changed. I had to point out to the House the fact that for three or four years there had been a deficit; that the trade of the country was very much depressed; that our manufacturing and other industries were very nearly crushed out; and that it became an important and serious duty for the Government then to inquire what steps should be taken, or could be taken, for the purpose of remedying the existing evil. At that time the Government submitted propositions to the House, which they considered were calculated to remedy these difficulties, and last Session I was in the happy position of being able to say that, to a very great extent, the result of the measures that had been submitted and carried through Parliament had been to restore confidence, to restore the revenue, and to give an impetus to our manufacturing and other industries. Though we were not, from circumstances over which we had no control, at that time, in a position to state that the receipts of the year would equal the expenditure; yet, Sir, we expressed the hope, and the firm conviction that when Parliament next met we would be in a position to assure the House and the country that, as far as the financial operations of the Tariff were concerned, the revenue would be found to be ample for all the purposes of the country. I am, Sir, in the happy position to-day, of being able to affirm, to confidently affirm, that the most sanguine expectations of the Government and of our friends behind us—the most sanguine expectations of our supporters in the country have been, within two years, fully realized. I had, Sir, at the last Session, to state that, owing to circumstances over which we had, to a great extent, no control, we were compelled to come down to the House and ask, over and above the Estimates of the year previous, $200,000 for the relief of Indians in the North-West, $100,000 for the relief of our suffering fellow-countrymen in Ireland. We also asked for sums to meet engagements not anticipated the year previous. We were, therefore, compelled to admit that, upon the basis of calculation made in 1879-80, there would be a deficiency of $500,000 between receipts and expenditures last year. Sir, I am happy to say that, upon the calculations that were made, so far from the deficiency being $500,000, it was reduced to $243,228. But I think I hear some hon. gentleman opposite say, the Public Accounts show that the difference between receipts and expenditure was something like $1,500,000. Well, Sir, that is quite true; but let me call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1879 and in 1880

Mr. ANGLIN.

I submitted for their consideration a Tariff, the revenue producing power of which I stated we estimated at $2,600,000 per annum more than the then existing tariff; or, in other words, that the revenue during the next year would, under the new Tariff, be $2,600,000 more than under the old Tariff, and deducting sums paid as drawbacks, there would be a net increased revenue upon goods consumed during the fiscal year of 1879-80 of $2,500,000. Well, Sir, I said at that time that in that estimate there would be $700,000 Customs that would be collected in the year previous, but, to use the language of my predecessor, which would be borrowed from the following year. I also stated that from the Excise dues collected the previous year there would be $600,000 borrowed from the next year, and that from the enormous withdrawal from bond the imports and excisable goods within the first three months of January, February and March would exceed, in Customs by a million and three or four hundred thousand dollars, and Excise $1,100,000, the figures for the corresponding three months of the year previous. My calculations were based upon the producing power of the Tariff, because it will be quite apparent to the House that, no matter when changes of Tariff are made, whether it be in 1874 or in 1879, there always will be increases of imports and withdrawals from bond of a large amount of goods that must take necessarily from the following year revenue that properly belongs to that year. If my calculations had been based on the revenue simply to be received the following year, it would be quite apparent to the House that we would have had to increase the revenue, in order to make up the actual receipts of that year, $1,300,000 more than was necessary for subsequent years, because that, Sir, would have been anticipated in the year previous. My hon. friend opposite, when Minister of Finance, as is perfectly well known to hon. members of this House, discussed this subject in the controversy that was had in 1874 and in 1875, renewed in 1879 and continued in 1880, with reference to the estimates of expenditure and income, made by myself in 1873, and its effect on the revenues and expenditures of that year. It is well known, Sir, that the actual receipts of that year were in excess of expenditure between $800,000 and $900,000. I am sure no member on this side of the House ever claimed that the increased sum collected in that year, as the result of the changes in the Tariff, should be placed to our credit in the year 1873-74. The hon. member opposite, my predecessor, estimated that he received in that year, as borrowed—to use his term—from the following year, something like $1,500,000. At all events, there was very little discussion as to the amount. There was some discussion as to the items of expenditure that properly belonged to that year. Certainly it was never claimed by the present Minister of Railways, or by the hon. member for Niagara, who also took up this subject, and it was never claimed by myself, that we had a right to that $1,500,000 borrowed from the year following, received the year following. We now claim that the $1,300,000 received on goods consumed in 1879-80 should be fairly taken into account as establishing the producing power of the new Tariff. Well, Sir, on that basis, the estimated receipts for that year were $24,450,000. Total cash receipts, $23,307,406; borrowed from this year, in 1878-79, $1,300,000. The producing power of the revenue received upon the goods consumed during the year, added to other revenues would be $24,607,406, as against the estimated revenue of $24,450,000. The estimated expenditure of 1879-80 was $24,978,000, and the actual expenditure was $24,850,634, showing an increase of receipts over the estimated expenditure, and a decrease in the expenditure, reducing the deficiency, as estimated last year, from half a million to $243,228. If it had not been for the grant to the Indians of $200,000, and for the grant of $100,000 for the relief of our fellow-countrymen in Ireland, there would have been a balance to our credit instead of a deficit, and this fact shows that the Estimates were as accurate as they could possibly be. Now then, Sir, with reference to the present year, it will be remembered, the estimate of receipts made in March last for the current year, was $25,517,000. The Customs revenue was estimated at $15,300,000. Hon. members will recollect the statement which I made at the time as to the basis on which I made that calculation. I estimated that there would be received, during last year, in cash for Customs $14,000,000, which, with $700,000 added, made $14,700,000; and for Excise, $5,213,000. I estimated the Customs revenue would be increased by 5 per cent., or at least, there would be an increase of 5 per cent. in the imports, which would give an additional $800,000 of revenue from this source, making, in all, $15,300,000. Taking all the revenue together, our income was estimated at $25,517,000. I am now, Sir, in a position to state, after an experience of seven months and a half, that our income will be at least $27,586,000 against the estimate of $25,517,000. It is quite clear now, Sir, from the information which we have, that the Customs receipts for the present year will amount to $17,000,000 compared with the estimate of $15,300,000; that the revenue from Excise will be $5,600,000, against the estimate of $5,213,000; that the revenue from the Post Office will be about what we estimated it at last year, $1,210,000; that the revenue from Public Works will be $2,286,000, as we estimated last year; Bill Stamps will yield $190,000; that the interest from investments will be $600,000; and that the revenue from all other sources will be $700,000. The estimated expenditure made in March last, including the Supplementary Estimates, amounted to $25,315,786. The Supplementary Estimates which were submitted to the House a few days since, amounted to $457,608. This includes, a second vote of $200,000 to meet the demand made this year for Indians, being the same amount required for this purpose for the year previous. But, Sir, deducting the sums which will not be expended, and which will probably be dropped at the close of the fiscal year, or carried over for expenditure next year, I think I may safely say that the expenditure for this year will not exceed $25,573,394. If our Estimates are correct in this respect, the surplus for the current year will be $2,011,000, or $2,000,000 in round numbers. I know there are hon. members in the House who, not looking, perhaps, into this matter, may have supposed, from the published statements made from month to month, and from the increase in the revenue as compared with the corresponding months of the previous year, that the surplus would have been larger; but when I call their attention to the fact that during the first six months of the fiscal year previous $1,300,000 was lost to that year, it having been placed to the credit of the year previous—and that, therefore, in making a comparison, you have to add to the six months previous $1,300,000—they will see at once that the apparent difference between the receipts of the first six months of the two years would be materially reduced; but I think it will be considered satisfactory to the House and to the country, that, under existing circumstances, we have every prospect of having at least $2,000,000 as the surplus for the current year, so that beyond doubt, Sir, the revenue producing power of the present Tariff—and, as I will show by-and-by, the power of the Tariff to stimulate the industries of the country—is clearly established. I now come to the Estimates for the next fiscal year. It is estimated that the receipts will be as follows:—Customs, $17,000,000; Excise, $5,600,000; Post Office, $1,300,000; Bill Stamps, $190,000; Public Works, including Railways, $2,360,000, and interest on investments, $550,000; making, with the revenue accruing from all other sources, $27,860,000. The estimates of expenditure submitted to the House amount to $26,189,896. I do not know, at the present moment, what the Supplementary Estimates may be, they vary in different years. I trust they will not be large, because we were exceedingly anxious to obtain all that it was possible to submit as the main estimate for the year, but I will add $200,000, for I find that two or three items have been omitted, either by the clerk or by the printer, but probably occurred during the checking off by the clerk. But, stating this estimate at $200,000, the estimated expenditure for next year will amount to $26,389,896, leaving an estimated surplus of $1,410,104. Now, Sir, I beg to call the attention of the House to a few items in the present Estimates, causing largely the increased expenditure for the next year. The House will not be surprised, considering that the Estimates contain an expenditure, under the head of capital, of something like $14,000,000 for the Pacific Railway, for canals, and for other public works, that there will be an increase in the interest on the debt during the next year, and that therefore the sum of $319,605.37 have been added to the interest on the debt and sinking fund for next year. The subsidies to Provinces show an increased estimate of $33,919.78. It becomes necessary, owing to the census which is to be taken this year, and under the Union Act, to pay 80 cents a head on the increased population of all the Provinces which have not a population of 400,000, and from the negotiations which are at present going on with Manitoba, it is probable that there will be an increase given to that Province—especially if the boundaries are extended. It is estimated in round numbers that at least $34,000 will have to be added to the item of subsidies to Provinces owing to these two causes. The charges for management are increased by $10,438.68. That arises from the fact that $13,000 additional will have to be paid to the agents during the next year, as 1 per cent. on the redemption of a much larger portion of the debt than it was necessary to redeem during the current year. The estimate for Public Works and buildings are increased by $127,772.97. Hon. members recollect very well that during the last two years, while a surplus was not assured, and while, on the contrary, we had to admit that there would probably be a deficit of half a million, the Minister of Public Works and his colleagues had to resist many applications—applications in respect of works recognized as having great merit—because we did not wish to increase the expenditure beyond the income. Many of these claims which thus rejected, when we felt we had not the means to provide for them, we felt we were bound to recognize now that we show a prospective surplus of two millions in the Treasury. In consideration of that, and looking to the improvement of our harbors, our navigation and our public buildings—

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. My hon. friend opposite says "hear, hear." I know he is hoping that his own locality will be considered. I am glad to know that he approves of the extension of these great public works. Under these circumstances I say, the House will not be surprised, the country will not be surprised, but, on the contrary, will be gratified, to know that the Government feels itself in a position to increase the expenditure on the public works, on these great national objects, to the extent of $128,000. Then there is an increased expenditure of $61,300 for the militia. During the past two years we have not been able, and we did not feel ourselves called upon, to add to our debt by devoting a larger sum than was absolutely necessary for that important service. It is well known that during last year and the year previous, the volunteers only received, I think, four days drill per annum—

Mr. CARON. Six.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Six was it. I knew it was about half what they were in the habit of getting. It has been considered desirable and in the interests of the country, that the sum for drill should be increased, and that the drill, this year specially, shall be greater than it has been for the last year or two. The sum to be expended on Ocean and

River Service is increased by $56,140. This arises from the fact that communications have taken place between parties in France, and parties in Canada, relative to the importance of establishing a line of steamers to ply between the city of Quebec, and France. It would be an advantage if such a line could be established; and as it has been asserted that the French Government will contribute $100,000 towards the undertaking, it was considered desirable to ask Parliament to place at the disposal of the Government $50,000 for the purpose of securing the establishment of that line between Quebec and France. I know it may be said that, under the present tariff in force in France, the amount of business transacted between the two countries has not been large. But the very fact of the French Government granting $100,000 to this line, will be a declaration on its part that it is prepared to extend its trade relations to Canada; and Canada, therefore, is not in a position to resist, for a moment, an application for a grant. We have, therefore, asked $50,000 for the purpose. Then, Sir, there has been a growing difficulty in the Maritime Provinces with reference to the communication between those Provinces and Great Britain. The people of the Maritime Provinces for the past year or two have been turning their attention to the export of cattle, of agricultural products and of fruit to Great Britain; and from the fact that there was no line of steamers from the Maritime Provinces, except from Halifax—and the steamers from that port were not exactly the kind to do the business we required them to do—we were compelled to go to the city of Quebec, largely, and take the steamers there, which greatly added to the expense of the transport, and to the reduction of the profits of shippers in the Maritime Provinces who were shipping the Government have, therefore, decided to ask Parliament to place at its disposal, for a fortnightly steamer running alternately from Halifax and St. John, and thus serving Prince Edward Island also, the sum of $25,000. I feel, Sir, that these services costing $75,000 will be sustained by the House and by the country. On railways and canals the increase is $76,268. This is for repairs, which in many cases will be somewhat extensive during the approaching year, and enlargements. There may be a question whether a portion of this sum should not be added to capital; but it was considered best, under all the circumstances, to ask Parliament for that sum, and to be charged against income. The estimated Post Office expenditure is increased by $91,500. As will be seen by last year's Estimates, we asked for an increase then, but I am happy to be able to say that while in 1879-80 there was a considerable increase in the expenditure on the postal service, there was also an increase in the revenue, although not quite equal to the expenditure. During the present year there is an increased income expected from that source; and you will observe that the estimate of income mentioned by me a few minutes ago was $1,300,000, which is a sum considerably in excess of any amount we have yet received from that source. Now, Sir, these items I have named make altogether $776,944, as against a total increase, including the Supplementary Estimates, of $884,000. When we come to vote these items, Sir, and ask the House to vote them, we will be in a position to state more fully than I have stated just now, our reasons for asking Parliament for them. Now, Sir, I have gone into the income and expenditure of 1879-80, the expected income and expenditure for 1880-81, and the estimated expenditure and income for 1881-82. Hon. gentlemen may ask if, with the estimated surplus for the present year of $2,000,000, and the estimated surplus next year of $1,500,000, we propose, in the resolutions we are about to lay on the Table, any great reduction in the Tariff. My answer, Mr. Speaker, is that the propositions that we are now about to submit for the consideration of the House, with reference to the amendment of the Tariff, are mainly for the purpose of placing a number of articles, that are now subject to a 20 per cent. duty, and are raw material for certain manufacturers in the free list. The resolutions also provide for the increase of the duty on some manufactured articles, where the Government feel that it is desirable that additional protection or support should be given to those particular industries. There is, also, a reduction of duty on two or three articles that are to the manufacturer raw material, in order to place them in a better position than they were before. There are resolutions for the purpose of smoothing—if I may use the term—the working of the Act or of the Tariff, to remove the difficulties which have been found to exist in working out this Tariff and secure uniform action, by all the officials throughout the Dominion. We found that varied rates have been fixed by different officials on the same article, and it became the duty of the Government to see if, by changing the wording or classification of the goods they could not remove what I admit to have been an irritation and annoyance to importers. I know that last Session we removed a great many of these, and I trust the resolutions now about to be submitted will remove many more, if not the whole of them. But these resolutions will not materially affect the Tariff, except, perhaps, in reducing the amount to be received, but immaterially. The Government considered the question whether it was desirable, in the present state of things, to ask Parliament to take the duty entirely off certain goods or reduce the duty on others, and so materially reduce our receipts. After giving that matter full consideration, it was decided—in view of the fact that at the present time the effect of this Tariff, or National Policy as it is termed, has not been fully developed, and we do not know as these manufactures increase and grow in the country, whether they will give back through their employes an equivalent for what we lose on their products; we do not know what will be the effect of the rapid extension, of the manufacturing industries of the country—we thought it desirable, on this ground, to make no proposition for a large reduction of the Tariff during the present Session. More than that, when the Tariff was brought down in 1879, in was stated distinctly that the Government was willing to renew the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, and as an expression of the feeling of this House, they gave the Government power to reduce pro rata the duty that we now collect upon the raw material, such as coal, lumber and grain, and everything of that kind in precisely the same proportion that the Government of the United States, or Congress, might think proper to reduce their duties, and even, if necessary, to remove them altogether. Well, Sir, we know that during in the last Session of Congress—and renewed this Session—petitions were sent to Congress to appoint a Commission to confer with the Canadian Government in reference to this matter. We do not know whether anything will grow out of that or not. It may not result in any proposals being made to the Imperial Government on the part of the United States authorities, but the carrying out of such a policy would largely reduce the revenue we now receive from coal and other articles now contributing largely to our revenue, and as long as there is a possibility of that taking place, it would be impolitic for us to ask the House to reduce the Tariff. We thought it would not be injurious to be able to show in two or three years that we had a surplus of two and a half or three million dollars. It would not affect our credit abroad, certainly. These are the reasons which decided us at present not to come to Parliament and ask for a reduction in the Tariff. If there is no chance of these articles being made free, if there is no chance of our natural products having a free market in the United States, if we find that in addition to the $300,000 required for interest on our expenditure in the construction of the Pacific Railway we have a handsome surplus, I need not tell hon. gentlemen that we shall be only too glad to relieve the people of taxation, whether to the extent of half a million or a million of dollars. But at present we feel that it would be unwise and undesirable to do that. I think, from the facts I have submitted with reference to the state of the revenue up to the present time—facts shown by the papers laid upon the Table an hour since—that there can be no question as to the revenue producing power of the present Tariff and its ability to pay all the requirements of the country. That being established, then comes a very important question, whether, as it is proved to be a revenue producing Tariff, it is also a protective Tariff. Our friends opposite, as is well known in this House, discussed for some six weeks the Tariff submitted in 1879. They took strong objections to many of its provisions. They met us with a statement that the Tariff must prove a failure in one or the other respect, either as a revenue producing Tariff or as a protective Tariff. I desire to ask the House for a few moments to consider—from the evidence we have all had from our every day observation, as we have necessarily from day to day and week to week been brought into contact with the manufacturing industries of the country—whether this tariff has not given a great impetus and stimulus to the manufacturing industries of the country. This Tariff has now been in force since March, 1879, and I have given its operation careful personal consideration. I have done more. I have endeavored to obtain reliable information from every part of the Dominion as to its working, and as to the effect it is producing upon certain industries, as to the new industries which have been created, and the old ones that have been revived, and as to the general impetus it has given to the manufacturing industries of the Dominion. I do not hesitate to say that those inquiries have resulted in the most favorable returns, and in the strongest possible evidence of success. I know there are hon. gentlemen in this House who will say that I and my friends are too sanguine upon this subject. I have therefore prepared a few facts to present for their consideration. I would ask them how it is possible that the trade returns and other evidence presented to us could show such largely increased importation of raw material, if our manufactures had not largely increased. Let me, Sir, in the first place, call the attention of the House to what is in my judgment one of the strongest evidences possible of increase in our manufacturing industries in this Dominion. We know there are certain industries that do not require fuel to carry them on as steam power is not used. But in a large portion of them steam power is required. I wish, therefore, to compare the consumption of coal in 1878-79 with that of 1879-80. In 1878-79 we imported of coal 889,740 tons, and of Nova Scotia coal we consumed 554,603. I ascertain this by taking the whole number of tons of Nova Scotia coal sold, and deduct from it the number of tons exported, the balance being the amount consumed in the Dominion. This makes a total of 11,444,343 tons altogether consumed in Canada in 1878-79. This increased importation of coal was one of the elements that I did not calculate upon. I was not sanguine enough when I made my statement in 1878-79. I supposed that the consumption of Nova Scotia coal would so increase that there would be less importation, and consequently less revenue upon this article. But I find that in 1879-80 we imported 973,778 tons. We consumed of Nova Scotia coal 811,719, making the increased consumption of coal in that year over the preceding year of 341,154, the increase in Nova Scotia coal being 257,116. That bears very strongly to my mind, upon the very subject we are discussing as to the effect of this Tariff upon the manufacturing interests of this Dominion. I desire to give a little further information, because I consider it pretty strong evidence. I may say, with reference to the cotton manufactures, that they have very largely increased. We have several new factories started and many of the old ones have been enlarged. The returns submitted to me show that we are employing to-day, in the cotton factories, 1,850 hands more than we were when the Tariff was changed. The best evidence we have outside the evidence now before me, is that the products of the cotton mills have been increased about one and three-quarter millions a year. And it is said that the enterprise has not been ruinous to those engaged in it, and I am glad of it. I know there was some fear expressed, that so rapidly was this industry being developed, that by-and-bye, cottons would be so cheap that the men who had capital invested in the factories would be ruined. My inquiry presents the facts I have stated, that the products of the factories have increased a million and three-quarters a year, and we are now employing 1,850 hands more than last year, and that is evidence of prosperity that cannot well be gainsaid. Gentlemen may say: "But your returns are not right. You have been in communication with parties interested in this enterprise, and they have given you large figures, or if you visited the factories yourself, (as I heard it said in the case of one place visited) the men were taken from the lower floor to the upper floor to make an exhibition." However, I am pretty confident that there was no ground for that statement. It might be said, however, that my calculations were wrong. But take the Trade Returns, and what do we find? We find that in the last eighteen months the imports of raw cotton—as we produce none in the country, the amount imported gives a fair gauge of the extent of manufacture—increased $871,473. Now, Sir, the increased value of this material when manufactured is admitted to be from $1,450,000 to $1,525,000, that is, this raw material with the labor of manufacture added, is in value $2,396,564, representing the increased value of the products of this industry in eighteen months. That bears out the statement furnished me from other sources. Well, Sir, a word with reference to this cotton. It may be said that the country pays very heavily for this industry; it may be said that it increases the taxation direct and indirect of the people of Canada. I stated here in my place in March last, that I held in my hand a list of prices at that time of certain descriptions of cottons made in the Dominion of Canada, and those prices showed that they were sold in Canada as cheap as they were sold in manufactories in Massachusetts at that time. I believe there is a difference now, but it does not equal upon this class of goods the revenue formerly collected upon it. I have received a list of prices of a new branch of that industry—that of knitting cotton—established in my own city. The manufacturer is supplying, and will supply, every part of the Dominion, and his prices compare pound for pound, cent for cent with those of the New Hampshire manufactories. Well, Sir, the next article we come to is the article of wool. Now, Sir, the result of my inquiry with reference to the woollen industry is that the products of wool during the last year in Canada have increased $2,000,000; and I am authorized to state here that the great bulk of the woollen goods manufactured in the Dominion of Canada in the last year are selling to-day cheaper than ever before, taking into account the price of the wool. Now, Sir, if my statement be correct, the Trade Returns will show something like the same result. The statement is not as perfect or as reliable as in the case of cotton. Of course, cotton is not produced in the country, but wool is; and we consequently see that the result of the operation of this Tariff, is not only to increase the importation of the latter article, but to increase the demand for what we produce in our own country. The increase in the wool, imported during eighteen months, amounted to $1,153,587, and the increase in the value of woollen goods produced in the country was $2,500,000, leaving an amount equal to $1,346,413 to represent the increase in labor, capital, etc., expended and invested in the industry. This result corresponds, as nearly as possible, with the estimates, from eighty mills in the Province of Ontario, twenty in the Province of Quebec, and some in the Maritime Provinces, showing an increase in the products, in all, of about $2,000,000. We now come to another raw material, which forms an illustration of the increase, which has taken place under the Tariff, in the value of the articles manufactured in the country. I refer to the article of hides. The increased value of the imports, for eighteen months, was $807,297, and in the value of the manufacture of $1,614,000, leaving for labor, bark—which is practically labor—and capital, a sum of $806,703. The result of my enquiries, in so far as I have been able to obtain information from the leading industries, was all in this direction, and showed in effect what I have stated. The increased value of pig iron entered for consumption, during the eighteen months, was $303,189. Now, Sir, this is only an approximate estimate; it is, moreover, a low estimate; and when we take into consideration, the quantity which enters into the manufacture of stoves, sewing machines, etc., the value of which when manufactured is $1,000,000, we find the difference between the value of the raw material and the manufactured article to be nearly $700,000, all of which goes to pay for labor and capital invested. Now, Sir, we come to a question which has, perhaps, received more attention than any other arising out of the present Tariff—an industry which is spoken of by our friends opposite as one of the 'pet industries of the Dominion of Canada. The Tariff largely increases the manufacture of the article produced by this industry, and—so it is alleged—reduces materially the revenue to be derived from it. I refer to the article of refined sugar. Sir, I wish to make some statements to the House on the subject of this so-called favored industry, in the course of which, I think, I shall be able to show that it, above all others, is deserving of our support, not only in affecting the industry itself, but as affecting the general interests of the Dominion of Canada. I have seen it stated since the Trade Returns were laid on the Table of the House, that it is quite clear from the statements contained therein, that this is a losing industry for the country, because it is shown that in 1878-79 the value of the sugar imports was $5,650,677, and the duty derived from it $2,554,582, while the value of the imports of 1879-80 was $3,904,287, and the duty collected $2,026,000. The question is asked: how can you explain the decrease of the value of the imports and the decrease of the revenue, unless the money goes into the pockets of the refiners. I will endeavor to explain it, and I will leave it to the hon. gentlemen opposite to show if I am wrong. If there is any fallacy in my statement, I would like to have it exposed. We find that the value of the imports of 1878-79 and the duties collected, were increased from the very cause I referred to—that is to say, from the large importation, and the withdrawal of an enormous quantity of sugar from bond, which took place during the period immediately before the new Tariff came into operation. We find, on looking over the imports of January, February and March, 1878, that we imported a little less than $1,000,000 worth of sugar, while in 1878-79 during the same period, we imported $2,000,000 and the result was that we paid $225,000—that is, the half of $450,000 additional collected upon importations of 1878-79—which belonged to the next year, and we paid half a million dollars for sugar that was consumed in the next year. If, therefore, you will take half of the extra million dollars received during these three months, and add it to the value of the imports of the following year, we have $4,404,287, as against $5,150,677 of the previous year. Then, so far as the revenue of the year is concerned, if you carry to the credit of the last year the $225,000 received the year previous you have a revenue of $225,692

or $77,890 less than the year previous. Now, Sir, the difference of the value of the imports, as shown in this statement, would be $746,390. It may be said that this amount is in the pockets of the refiner; I will endeavor to show where it has gone. I want to explain where this amount has gone. Now, you will recollect that the duties collected in 1878 and 1879, were upon refined sugar manufactured to a large extent in the United States and imported from there, and, therefore, we paid duty upon the labor of the refiner of the sugar upon which freight was paid, and upon other charges and expenditures in the same connection, which increased the value, under that operation, to $746,390. Where did it go to? Freight on 38,000 tons of sugar, at $6.50 per ton, and which we received no portion of, but was, of course, paid the refiners in the United States, where it was taken for the purpose of being refined, and where they paid it. That $247,000 was paid last year to the vessels that brought that sugar mainly to the ports of Montreal and Halifax. There were 24,000 tons of coal used in refining sugar in Canada last year; which, at $4 per ton delivered at the refineries, amounted to $96,000. We manufactured in Canada last year 300,000 barrels, which, formerly, were manufactured in the United States, at 32 cents per barrel, amounting to $96,000. Wages of 400 hands employed in refining that sugar, $160,000; wharfage that went into the revenue of the Commissioners at the Port of Montreal, and cartage mainly paid to the people of Montreal, $27,000; animal charcoal and other expenditures for refining material, depreciation of stock, etc., $40,000; interest on investment on the two establishments then in existence, $49,000; insurance on the buildings, $12,000; one and half per cent. as insurance on the sugar that was imported, $7,500. You will find that these added, make a total of $794,500, as against the $746,390 stated before. It will be difficult, until the Trade and Navigation Returns for this year are before Parliament, to compare the figures of last year with those of preceding years, but for the six months of the current year for which we have returns. We find that the quantity imported during the first half of the year was 2,915,798 lbs. against 2,061,344 lbs. for the last half of the preceding year, and that the duties collected for the first half of this year amounted to $1,398,093, against $1,101,680, showing an increase of $296,413 during the first half of this year; and if we have but two thirds of this sum during the balance of the year, we shall have more revenue out of sugar this year than in any previous year since the Confederation of the Provinces. Under the operation of this Tariff we have $749,500 distributed amongst the owners of our vessels and laborers—

Sir ALBERT J. SMITH. Oh no; foreign vessels.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am reminded that there were some foreign vessels. A considerable portion went to our own vessels, and there will be more this year, for a refinery is being established in Halifax, and, I am happy to say, there is one already in operation at Moncton. Here I may say, with reference to the Maritime Provinces, that having no refinery there in the past, the only direct trade with the West Indies has been the sugar brought to Halifax and sent by train to Montreal, but now, with the refinery in Halifax and another in New Brunswick, there will be a change. We paid to vessels coming to Canada, $247,000; to our coal industries, and for this industry alone for 24,000 tons, $96,000; 300,000 barrels manufactured, $96,000, wages of 400 hands, $160,000. What does 400 hands mean? It means 400 tenements occupied in the city of Montreal that would have been vacant; and not only that, you have these men, who are customers for every branch of trade and industry in that city. And now I am happy to say it extends beyond Montreal to the Lower Provinces. In addition to these we have other expenditures, amounting in all to $794,500. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say: "Supposing all that to be true, the people of the Dominion pay more for their sugar than they did under the old Tariff!" That, Sir, is greatly exaggerated. I hold in my hand what I believe to be a reliable statement with reference to granulated sugar during the past year. I have here the prices during every month of 1880 in the United States and in Montreal. The prices in the United States averaged $6.52. Add the old duty, (because I am making the statement under the estimate of the old duty), 25 per cent. $1.63, 1 cent per pound, $1, and all other expenses of every kind, 35c.—that brings the price of granulated sugar to $9.50, as against an average price during the past twelve months of $9.75, or an increased cost of 25 cents per 100 lbs., as between the present price and what it would have cost to import it under the Tariff of 1878. Now, I am also informed, on what I consider reliable authority, that the yellow refined sugar is now in the market to-day by the refiners and sold at from 14 to 19 cents per 100 lbs. less than it could be imported from the United States for, under the Tariff of 1878. I may go further, and say that grocery sugar No. 14 now pays three-fourths of a cent per pound and 30 per cent. duty only, when, under the Tariff of 1878, it paid one cent a pound, and 25 per cent duty.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. No.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I speak of that class of sugar of which I had a sample a year ago—a very fair grocery sugar. That sugar is imported to-day at a quarter of a cent per pound less duty than it was in 1878, with five ad valorem addition, and the packages containing per cent. it being free of duty when brought directly from the West Indies. Therefore, that class of sugar is nearly a quarter of a cent per pound less to the consumer to-day than it was in 1878. It is quite true that the ad valorem duty on raw sugars used by the refiners was increased from 25 to 30 per cent. in the Tariff of 1879, but there should be no complaint if the refiners have to pay that: it does not amount to that because the practical effect, as there is no duty on the packages as in 1878, is, that it does not cost a great deal more than under the Tariff of that year. Therefore, looking at it from this standpoint, if the refined sugar, under this statement, costs an average of 25 cents a hundred more, and if yellow sugar of average quality is sold to-day at from 14 to 19 cents per hundred less than under the old Tariff, and No. 14 can be had for a quarter of a cent less per pound, then the people who consume sugar in Canada cannot be paying a very large sum over and above what they paid before. But we have, in addition to that, an industry created which represented $750,000 in toto last year, which will increase and grow, amounting during the present year, probably, to $1,000,000; and what is more, the vessels that brought that sugar into the port of Montreal (because it was confined to Montreal during the last year) and brought the coal there necessary to refine it, amounted to 62,000 tons. What effect had that upon the general industries of the country? It had this effect: that while it gave a large increase of revenue to the port of Montreal, it gave a largely increased business to that district of the country. But it did more. The fact that those 62,000 tons of shipping were at that port, led to the shipment from it of a larger quantity of grain and foreign products from the United States, because there was the tonnage and freight at a reduced rate. The competition of those 62,000 tons did diminish very materially freights at Montreal last summer; and every ten cents saved in freights on a barrel of flour of the product of Canada left just that much more in the producers' pockets; and every half cent reduction in the freight of a bushel of wheat went into the farmers' pockets, as did also every ten cents saved in the carriage of a box of cheese; and so with all similar reductions in freights of bacon, pork and other products. If, by the operation of this Tariff, we attracted, last year to that port 62,000 tons of shipping, that otherwise would not have been seen within it, I believe that, indirectly, the whole Dominion, and especially Ontario, experienced from it a great and decided advantage. But during the present year this advantage will be extended to the Lower Provinces, and, with our sugar refineries in operation in Halifax and Moncton, what will be the result? There will be a large increase of trade between those Provinces and the Dominion generally and the West Indies. When our vessels going to the West Indies have a return cargo of sugar and other articles, they will be able to carry away from our ports fish and other products at lower rates, which will give us the benefit of greater employment for our own vessels besides. If, then, we should pay 25 cents per cwt. more on our sugar, the agriculturists of the west, and lumber and fish merchants of the Lower Provinces, will have an advantage equivalent, or even greater, in that increased trade with the West Indies, reduction of freights and larger exports from the Lower Provinces and Province of Quebec. The next point to which I shall call attention is the increase of our manufactures throughout the country. We see new furniture factories, and new establishments for the manufacture of locomotives and rolling stock, one of which I had the pleasure of visiting. This shows the increase of enterprise in the country. With reference to one new industry, the manufacture of beet root sugar, my colleague beside me (Mr. Mousseau) has just handed me a cablegram from Paris, which he has received to-day. I see my hon. friend opposite (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) smiling, as much as to say these telegrams are very convenient. No doubt they are very convenient sometimes. But pretence is not necessary in this matter; for it is an established fact that the beet root sugar industry is a veritable enterprise. I may say, in passing, that the Government propose submitting a resolution to the House, asking it to extend the resolution passed in 1873, exempting any beet root sugar factories from payment of duty for eight years; now only two years have to run, and our intention is to extend the period eight years from July next. The machinery for the factory referred to in the telegram has been purchased in Paris. I come now to the furniture factories, in regard to which I find a considerable increase, though not so large as some of our other industries. With regard to locomotives and rolling stock, the amount required by our railway companies, and largely by the Government, has been ordered, and is being manufactured in the Dominion. Look, for instance, at the Grand Trunk Railway Company alone. You need only enter their workshops at Montreal to see what a wonderful impetus has been given to that particular industry; and at every city you will find similar evidence of the beneficial operation of the National Policy. You will see, moreover, one factory for cars at Cobourg, another at London, and more in other localities. But under the old Tariff they were imported from the United States. In the production of agricultural implements, waggons, and so forth, the last year or two witnessed a large increase. The makers complain that they make no more profits than before, but we find the quantity largely increased. The returns for Manitoba show a great increase in the purchase of Canadian manufactures and products since 1872, an increase that is marvellous. In that year their value reached $390,000, and last year $3,600,000 worth of the manufactures and products of Canada were imported into Manitoba and the North West, a considerable portion being agricultural implements. A new market has been opened for our wares in that country, from which those of the Americans have been shut out. In the language of a gentleman I met at Kingston in April last, and who formerly lived in Canada, but now resides in St. Paul, Minnesota,—our Tariff has killed his business with the North West. The boot and shoe industry has increased

25 per cent both as to the amount produced and the number of the employes. We find them, moreover, working full time, while, before, they worked but two-third time. The manufacture of earthenware is constantly increasing, and that of hardware, including stoves, shovels and hoes has received a new impetus. Among the new factories established, are two for silks at Montreal; they weave magnificent silks, and are preparing to make ribbons of every description. Paper manufactories are also increasing in number, and producing more than ever, wall and colored papers inclusive. We have a new paint manufactory on a large scale, established in Montreal. The organ and piano industry is largely increasing everywhere, and the increased demand at home which is something marvellous, is one indication, at all events, that times are more prosperous; for such articles are purchased only when people can afford it. Then we have lock and brass works of various kinds, and we, for the first time, are manufacturing plated ware—one factory at Hamilton, another at Montreal. There is, in addition, corset factories employing 500 hands, and one ready-made clothing establishment, alone employing 900. Soap and other manufactories are increasing all the time, all multiplying the number of workmen, and increasing their wages. From a careful estimate it is now established that, in the last year, the increase of raw material, in value, by the application of machinery, capital and labor, throughout the Dominion, was $6,000,000, and the number of persons employed has been augmented 14,000, representing, with their families, a total of 42,000. About $1,000,000 passes to the hands of the people engaged in those industries, which money is generally distributed. If, of those 14,000, 7,000 are occupiers of houses and tenements, are they not building up a new city, practically, in a year—a city of 40,000 inhabitants, and adding 20,000 more, because we do not import the half of what they consume, which gives increased employment to our own people. We are thus practically building up, in a year, a city of 60,000 inhabitants, with the capital expended last year in this way, of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000; we are establishing new manufactories of various kinds, apart from other expenditure, to the advantage of our people, and all these are the results of the National Policy within eighteen months. I would ask the House whether, under these circumstances, the most sanguine supporter of this policy expected it would have accomplished so much in that time? The leader of the Opposition stated that I intimated my intention of visiting the agricultural districts. He must have seen that I visited some of them during last summer, but not so many of them as of the manufactories. Unfortunately for my plans in this respect, three members of the Government were absent in England a portion of last summer. Some of us had to keep watch and ward, and were unable to be absent from Ottawa as much as we desired. But what did we find? Some few facts are patent upon the face of your enquiry every where we go. I know it is a vexed question, and hon. members on both sides of the House argue it from different standpoints; but it is clear that the effect of the Tariff has been to increase the price of flour, wheat and other cereals, and, from the most careful enquiry that can be made, I have arrived at this estimate: that flour is increased to the consumer in Canada, ten cents per barrel. That is the calculation I make; there must be some speculation about it, but that is the closest estimate I can obtain. The increase in the price of wheat in June and July, in Canada, was unquestionably caused by the Tariff. There are periods of the year after the harvest when we have an abundance, when in spring a large portion has been manufactured, and owing to the increased demands of mills the prices rise. When there is a surplus, and when a market must be sought elsewhere for the wheat, prices may not be materially affected, but at the same time there are periods in the year when the growers obtain a benefit, as they did last spring with respect to wheat and rye. I find from investigation that there has been in part of the

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

Dominion, and along the banks of the St. Lawrence, a new inquiry enquiring for that article, and that the distillers of Ontario and Quebec instead of using corn are asking for and buying rye, giving growers an increased price as the result of the duty on corn and rye. The duty on corn has increased the production of corn in Ontario, especially in the western portion of the Province, whatever may be said with respect to other portions of the Dominion. With regard to oats, it is estimated that the result of the Tariff has been to increase the price of oats in the Maritime Provinces, and in this part of Canada three cents per bushel to the consumer—and, if it is any comfort to hon. gentlemen opposite, I admit the lumberer pays his share of it. What did I further find? That no part of the Tariff is more acceptable to the agricultural population than the increased duty imposed on fruit and fruit trees. Under this system, persons who desired to obtain fruit in the early season, when Canadian fruit was not fit to use, could afford to pay the increased duty. In the season, when we have a surplus, and we had a large surplus last year, it is admitted that if it had not been for the duty imposed, our last year's fruit crop could scarcely have been sold, and that, though it had to be sold at low figures, yet the financial result would have been infinitely worse had there been no protection. With respect to bacon and ham there is now a protection to the farmer of 25 per cent. I may here say that some of my hon. friends behind me have been urging on the Government to increase the duty on salt pork. That article enters largely into consumption by the lumbering interest, and that is an interest which we cannot legislate specially in favor of, but against which we desire to tax as lightly as possible. We have not, however, seen our way clear to ask to increase the duty on salt pork at present; but I may say that in looking over the duties, we find that about nineteen or twenty per cent. is the duty on pork and other meats. Then, see the effect of the increased consumers in the home market of vegetables, poultry, eggs, fresh butter and cheese, and everything that comes into the home market in the neighborhood of the manufacturing centres; they receive for all those which may be considered perishable articles and cannot be exported to Great Britain, increased prices as the result of the increased wages received by the increased number of people employed in manufactures and their prosperity. In 1879 and last year, especially in 1879, very grave objections were brought against our Tariff by hon. gentlemen opposite, in a very plausible manner. If some of those objections had been borne out by experience, the fact would have had some effect on the Government; but I am happy to say that, after examining these objections carefully, evidence has proved that the fears entertained by hon. gentlemen opposite were without foundation, and that we stand here to-day with our policy vindicated in the face of the country. One of the objections put forward, was that the Tariff would reduce the foreign exports via Montreal and Quebec and the St. Lawrence, by the imposition of custom duties on raw material, or upon wheat or flour and products of foreign countries passing over our railways and through our canals to Europe, by the necessity for bonding such goods. If that could have been established there would have been some ground for considering how the fact should influence our conduct in the matter. But what are the facts? I glean from the official records that during the summer of 1878, the open season from May to November, there were exported foreign products, via Montreal, of the value of $6,743,771; in 1879, $9,439,727; last summer $11,148,509. The hon. Minister of Customs made arrangements by which the products of the Western States would pass through without let or hindrance, under regulations adopted by the department, and no inconvenience whatever was felt. Now, let me say here that in addition to this, I think the increased export was due to a large extent to the increased tonnage that was there. I recollect when in St. Catharines in the autumn of 1879, the owners of vessels on the canal told me that the limited business on the canal was caused by the limited tonnage at Montreal; that if they shipped their grain or flour at that port, they might have to pay very high freights, and they selected United States ports in preference; and I say that any policy which will increase the tonnage at Montreal, will relieve this difficulty and give a larger trade to our railways and canals. Another objection was that the imports of English manufactures would decrease while the imports of those from the United States would increase. In reply to that, I will simply read a tabulated statement which I have in my hand, showing exactly what has been the course of trade between Canada and England, the United States and other countries respectively since 1874-75. In 1874-75 the importations for consumption from Great Britain was $60,000,000; from the United States, $50,000,000; from other countries, $8,000,000, or 50 per cent. from Great Britain, 42 per cent. from the United States, and 7 per cent. from other countries. In 1875-76, the figures were: Great Britain $40,000,000, or 43 per cent.; United States, $46,000,000, or 48 per cent.; and $8,000,000, or 8 per cent. from other countries. In 1876-77, Great Britain, $39,000,000; United States, $51,000,000; other countries, $5,000,000, or 41 per cent. from Great Britain; 53 per cent. from the United States, and 5 per cent. from other countries. In 1877-78, from Great Britain, $37,000,000; United States, $48,000,000; other countries, $5,000,000, or a percentage of 41 for Great Britain, 53 for the United States and 5 for other countries. In 1878-79, the amount from Great Britain was $30,000,000; from the United States, $43,000,000; for the great bulk of the imports that were brought into the country, in February, 1879, came from the United States—such as gray cottons, refined sugars and a number of other articles. In that year, we imported from other countries, $5,000,000; and the percentage for that year was 38 per cent. for Great Britain, 54 per cent. from the United States, and 6 per cent. from other countries. In 1879-80, we imported from Great Britain, $34,000,000; from the United States, $29,000,000, and from other countries, $7,000,000, or a percentage of 48 from Great Britain, 40 from the United States, and 11 from other countries; or, in other words, for the first time since 1874, the importations from England were in excess of those from the United States. The next argument of these hon. gentlemen was that the Tariff would create an unfriendly feeling between England and Canada and damage our credit. Let us see what the answer is upon that point. I have in my hand a little pamphlet published in England, showing the exports from Great Britain to other countries, and I find that during the present calendar year the exports from Great Britain to Canada have increased by £1,200,000 or $5,000,000. This English writer shows that our trade has increased with that country instead of showing a falling off, as hon. gentlemen predicted would happen under the trade policy of the Government. As a consequence no unfriendly feeling exists. Then, Sir, as to the effect upon our credit. I was able to show last year that our 4 per cent. securities stood at 95½ and 96, as compared with 90 or 91 and 92 in 1873, and, to-day, I find that, with the accrued interest at 1½, they are 104½ and 105, or an increase of 7 or 8 per cent. The hon. gentleman opposite—my predecessor as Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright)—may say: "That may be true, but you have not increased your securities in the same ratio as the United States." Now, on the 30th December, 1876, 4½ United States bonds, funded, stood at 103½; and on January 1st, 1881, their 4½'s stood at 115½ and 115¾. Our securities in 1878 were worth from 89 to 91, while at the present moment they are quoted at 104½; a fact which shows that the increase is at least equal to that of the United States securities. But I desire to allude to a fact of still more importance. In 1878, New South Wales securities stood higher in the money markets of England than any other colonial securities in the world; they were actually 5 per cent. in advance of ours at that time. To-day ours are a little in advance of theirs, a fact which will show the relative credit of the two countries, though I admit that the increase is largely due to the abundance of money. But at any rate there is the fact: that our securities have increased relatively to those of New South Wales by five per cent. during the last two years. I come now to another point, namely, the predicted increase of taxation upon the consumer. It was stated in 1879 by hon. gentlemen opposite and repeated last year, as well as during the recess, that the effect of this tariff was to add to the taxation of the people of Canada a sum of $7,000,000, while only $2,000,000 would be paid into the public Treasury. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how that could possibly be? I put the question not only to him, but to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. If, say our imports have been diminished by $6,000,000, add this to the $71,000,000 which represents the amount entered for consumption last year, and we have $77,000,000 as the amount representing our importations, if we had not manufactured an increased quantity of goods at home. The average Tariff for the last year has been 20 per cent. or one fifth, which, upon the $71,000,000 will amount to a sum of about $14,000,000. The additional duty upon the $6,000,000 (which we will estimate represents, the reduction of imports) would be, if the goods had been imported instead of being made in this country, $1,200,000 instead of the $5,000,000 which the hon. gentleman named. But when I point to the agricultural implements, a large portion of the cotton and woollen goods, a large portion of the iron manufactures, and many other articles with regard to which hon. gentlemen say the Tariff is not popular with the manufacturers because it has not increased the price, then I say that but a very small portion of the $1,200,000 is paid by the people of this country as a result of the change in the Tariff. As to this contention by my predecessor (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) that a tax of $5,000,000 is imposed upon the people, and that $2,000,000 goes into their pockets, I confess I cannot understand it, and I hope that the hon. gentleman will so explain it, that it may be understood by the House and by the country.

Mr. PLUMB. They tried to explain it in West Toronto last summer.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Another objection to the Tariff was, that it was going to break up the Union by distributing the taxation of the country unequally on the various Provinces. In the language of my hon. friend from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), the smaller Provinces would pay a much larger sum proportionately than the people of Ontario and Quebec. The hon. gentleman referred particularly to the Provinces by the sea, his sympathy for us was unbounded, and I thank him for that sympathy. But let us see what foundation there was for it. It would, the hon. gentleman said, break up Confederation by imposing unequal taxation; it would disserve this admirable superstructure which we are all proud of; it would destroy that union which the country, as a whole, rejoiced to know had been accomplished and which was in the interests of the whole country. But let us see how unequally this taxation, during the last year, under this Tariff, has borne on the different Provinces. I have prepared from the Trade Returns some tabulated statements to which I desire to draw the attention of the House, and which show that if the Tariff has borne more heavily upon one section of the Dominion more than another—and there has been, taking all things into consideration, not much difference—it appears to have borne more heavy upon Ontario and Quebec than upon the smaller Provinces. The increase in the rate of duty on goods entered for consumption in the several Provinces, under the new Tariff, is as follows:

Ontario and Quebec, 3.76 per cent.; Nova Scotia, 2.55 per cent.; New Brunswick, 2.18 per cent.; Manitoba, 2.12 per cent.; British Columbia, 5.08 per cent. British Columbia seems to have paid an increased percentage, and I will explain briefly one of the causes that led to that; perhaps it may be remedied this Session to some extent. Prince Edward Island, 2.21 per cent. In these figures the fact is not taken into account that in the Province of Quebec last year a large portion of the revenue was received on sugar refined. In New Brunswick $45,000 less sugar was entered than in the year previous; instead of being imported from the United States, it was imported from Montreal, duty paid and taking that into account the balance against Quebec and Ontario would be reduced. The average of the total increase was 3.60 per cent. I now come to the statement made in the Trade Returns by the hon. Minister of Customs showing the rate of taxation per head of the population in the different Provinces, based on the population of 1871. Taking the population of 1871 as the basis, it gives a higher rate per head than our present population would give; but applying the same rule to all the Provinces, the ratio will be the same in proportion. In Ontario and Quebec, for 1878-79, the rate was $3.51½ per head, and for 1879-80, $4.08½ per head, an increase of 57 cents, arising largely from the duty paid on sugar. In Nova Scotia, for 1878-79, the rate was $3.05, and 1879-80, $3.14, and increase of 9 cents; in New Brunswick, for 1878-79, the rate was $3.67 and in 1879-80, $3.05, showing a decrease of 62 cents; in Manitoba, the increase was 78 cents; in British Columbia, though the percentage on the imports was greater, the decreased rate per head was 68 cents. The rate for Prince Edward Island decreased 8 cents; and the average increase for the whole was 33 cents per head. Instead, therefore, of the smaller Provinces paying more in the shape of percentage per head of the population than the larger Provinces, it will be seen that, even making allowance for distributing the sugar duty collected in Montreal over all the Provinces, the amount paid by the smaller Provinces was less than was paid by the larger, if I except British Columbia, which, according to one mode of calculation, pays more, and according to the other has the advantage. If that be the case, the Tariff is not calculated to break up the Union on that head. My experience has been, that Ontario and Quebec have always been willing to deal liberally with the smaller Provinces, and I believe, no matter what party may be in power, they will always continue that policy, so that they need not be alarmed with reference to the operation of this Tariff. In the next place, it was said the Tariff was going to destroy the shipping industry. Well, I know we cannot legislate very materially to protect that interest; but I will tell you what we did do. We imposed the taxation in such a way that the shipping industry would not feel it, but would be in a better position than before. I have here a return of the drawbacks paid from December, 1879, to December, 1880, to the different ship-builders; showing an amount paid of $60,601.33. In the whole of this return, you will find that, while 75 cents per ton is given on the best class of shipping, there is but one application asking for a return of the duty paid; that amounts to one dollar per ton; whereas, before, there was a considerable amount of duty that had to be paid and there was no drawback. I am willing to submit that statement to prove beyond doubt that the shipping interest of the Dominion is to day in a better position than under the former Tariff. The question of the lumber interest I have carefully gone into. I have made a calculation to show what it cost to produce 2,000,000 feet of logs, including in the calculation the material, the feed, the oats, the pork, and everything of that kind. Deducting the reductions in duties where the duties have been reduced, and adding them where they have been increased, the net increase does not

amount to one per cent. on the cost of production of 2,000,000 feet of logs at the tail of the mill, while on the imports the average increase is four per cent. The tariff had to be increased to meet our deficits; every interest was bound to pay its share, but feeling that we could not protect the lumber interest, we felt bound to touch it as lightly as possible. The tariff drives the people out of the country, they say. Well, Sir, I think the exaggerated statements about the exodus are pretty well exploded. I think, after the articles I have read in the Opposition press on this subject, that we shall hear no more of that. The hon. leader of the Opposition the other night, when pressed, read an extract from a speech I delivered in Toronto. I said in that speech, and I repeat here, that there had been an exodus. Still hon. gentlemen opposite say that we have been discussing this matter to show that there has been no exodus. We have never said there has been no exodus. What we say is that there has been an enormous and unjustified exaggeration of it. I am not surprised that the American authorities should strive to lead away the immigration from Canada to the United States, and I doubt not that some of these persons have been paid by the railway companies of the United States, to make these statements in order to lead emigration from Canada to the United States. What are we to think when we find a leading member of the Opposition, and the hon. leader of the Opposition himself, taking up these statements, and when we find the ex-Finance Minister, after the hon. Minister of Agriculture had refuted these statements, replying that these were obtained from official authorities in the United States, and that he himself had made enquiries since they were questioned, and found that they were reliable? I did feel that it was to be regretted that leading gentlemen in the Opposition, and the leading press of the Opposition, should, during the last twelve months, have thought it necessary, in order to damage this policy and the Administration, to make statements and to publish statements to the country that cannot now be verified or sustained. If the object was none other than to gain a petty victory at some election, I feel that it is deeply to be regretted. And when at Stratford, last autumn, I took up the statement made by the ex-Finance Minister with reference to this exodus and stated that I had it from good authority—from the hon. Minister of Agriculture—that by one of the railways the exodus from Canada to the United States, instead of being 90,000 annually, the whole number of through passengers going west from all quarters was but 53,000, the organ of hon. gentlemen at Sarnia stated that I had misled the people in a manner unworthy of a man occupying my position, and called upon me to prove what I had said, or to stand as a gentleman who had made a statement that was, before the country, untrue. Now it appears that the whole thing was a delusion and a sham. But there has been an emigration, and why was it? It was from this cause. The United States became prosperous a year or two before we had introduced this policy and before we had begun to feel its effects here. Wages had increased; strikes followed; and employers came into the Dominion and held out inducements to our people to leave Canada by the offer of high wages, and it was natural that they should not resist them. The depression of the previous five years had produced such an affect that although this policy was inaugurated, it did not, as its opponents said it should have done, restore by magic as it were in one month all the industries of the country to a condition equal to that which it took the people of the United States twenty years to secure, and which had the effect of leading our people away when we had not the means of inducing them to stay at home that we have now. But happily, we have evidence that they are returning to the country. I know many manufacturers who say they cannot obtain men enough, and while there has been an exodus, the people who left us are returning, and with them are coming many others in search of employment in this country. Just here I may refer to a new objection raised by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) the other day, when he referred to the diminished exports. Why, Sir, to my mind, diminished exports last year as compared with 1878 are an evidence of the improved condition of our manufacturers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Yes, Sir, they were driven out of their own market in 1878 by their competitors from the United States, and they either had to find a market abroad, or to close up their establishments; and I have no doubt that in many cases they preferred making a sacrifice to doing that. The hon. gentleman said that there was $1,200,000 difference between the exports of manufactures in 1878 and those in 1880.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). A decrease of $885,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. $885,000 was the decrease, of which $700,000 odd was the sale of ships. What was the fact? In 1872, 1873 and 1874 our shipping industry was most prosperous. Many men who had means, and many men who had not much means but had credit, invested in ships. But down to 1878 the trade was decreasing year after year, and in many cases those ships were yielding no profit; and men on the other side of the water who had mortgages on ships, finding that there was no probability of their being paid, came over to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Quebec and Prince Edward Island, in 1878, and compelled many shipowners to close up their accounts, and transfer many of their ships, in order to liquidate their debts to people on the other side of the Atlantic. Then, a large number of vessels, in 1878, were sold to Norway. Under a provision of the Plimsoll Bill, our ships were subjected to regulations which were not imposed on foreign vessels, and I know of some parties who transferred their ships to Norway in order that they might not be subject to the requirements of the Plimsoll Bill; and I have no doubt that a great many of the ships said to have been sold to Norway were transferred for that purpose. I admit that in 1880 the tonnage of ships constructed in Canada was less than that in 1878. We know the reason why: there is less demand for wooden ships than formerly, because iron ships are taking their place; and if there is anything demanded of the Government and Parliament of this country, it was that they should devise some means by which the shipbuilders and mechanics engaged in the construction of ships should be kept in the country by providing other employment for them. I say this at the present moment because my hon. friend endeavored, before we had started on our march, to make a flank movement upon us, which I am happy to say, did not succeed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is because you were so late in delivering your Budget speech—sixty-nine days from the opening of the Session.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is a sufficient apology. The consequences, had the hon. gentleman's statement been delayed, might have been serious.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will state that in the 35 articles of which there has been a decrease in the exports, ships are included to the amount of some $700,000, but in the other articles there is a decrease in our exports of $733,000.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I looked into that matter last night. Taking the exports of the manufactures of Canada for 1878, and those for 1880—in both cases he included ships—it made over $800,000, taking the whole of the exports, and if we take the ships out, it made a difference of only about $200,000.

Now, I come to a question in which we are all interested, and that is the general prosperity of the country. I do hear occasionally some of our friends of the Opposition saying: "Oh, well, times are better; they are improved; but then the National Policy has had nothing to do with it." I thank them for that, because it is really something for the country to have the hon. gentlemen opposite say that times have improved in Canada. It has been a long time since they have done that. Now, I have some facts to state which, I think, are calculated to establish pretty clearly that times have improved. Look at our commerce. In 1878-79 vessels inward and outward amounted to 6,088,550 tons; in 1879-80 to 6,786,791, tons, and increase of 700,000 tons; while in the latter period there were 112,525 seamen against 104,390 in the former period. We hear some hon. gentlemen say: "What has that got to do with manufactures?" As I stated before, 100,000 tons of that increase was due to the importation of coal and sugar. The total exports for 1878-79, were $71,491,000; those for 1879-80, were $87,911,000, or an increase of $16,420,000. The annual average excess of imports over exports from 1867 to 1879, was $20,000,000. Last year the excess of exports over imports was $1,451,711, the first instance of the kind in the history of Canada. That is due to two causes: First, because we increased the value of raw materials by manufacture, by $6,000,000, which diminished the value of the imports by the same sum. Then we increased the exports, due partly, I admit, to a bountiful harvest, for which we have great reason to be thankful. Then with reference to the coal interest, as I stated before, the coal producers of Nova Scotia sold in 1878-79, 688,624 tons; in 1879-80, 944,615 tons, or an increase of 255,991 tons. In British Columbia, last year, they exported 204,527 tons, being 30,738 tons more than the year before. The increased production in Nova Scotia and British Columbia, for the last year, was 286,729 tons. Then there is an increase of trade with the West Indies from $1,033,849 in 1877-78, to $1,252,429 in 1878-79, and $3,151,754 in 1879-80. The imports from China and Japan were $383,676 in 1877-78; $448,962 in 1878-79, and $893,911 in 1879-80. Now we come to some other facts, which are tests of the condition of the country. For instance, the value of the stocks of thirteen Banks of the Dominion on the 1st of February, 1879. The paid up capital then was $38,465,864. The value at the rates at which they were then sold, was $38,921,015. The value on the 1st of February, 1881, was $53,237,168, or an increase of $14,316,153 on the $38,000,000 of bank stock in the year. The deposits in the Banks of the Dominion, not including Government deposits, were, in December, 1878, $66,406,516; in December, 1880, $79,234,416, or an increase of $12,832,900. The deposits with the Government in Post Offices and Dominion Savings Banks for the fiscal year of 1878, amounted to $8,998,113; in 1879, $9,846,982; in 1880, $11,688,356. On the 31st of January, 1881, they were $14,730,594, an increase of $5,732,481 in two years; this sum added to the $12,839,900 of additional deposits in the banks, makes altogether $18,500,000 of increased deposits, showing the increased earnings of the people. Then we will take the receipts of Canadian railways. In 1879, 3,722 miles of road yielded $15,789,101; in 1880, 3,744 miles yielded $21,241,756, or an increase of $5,452,655.

Mr. MILLS. Is that the local traffic or the total traffic?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. That is the whole traffic. A portion of this increase is, no doubt, due to the distribution of the sugar that was refined in Montreal. Formerly, it came in by the bridge at the Falls, they did not carry it so far, but when it had to go from Montreal to all parts of the Dominion, they got something extra out of that too. I think that with these facts before us, we will be prepared to admit that the country is in a more prosperous condition. We do not claim all that for the National Policy. Oh, no! I think that the National Policy has had a great deal to do with it, in the first place by giving confidence to the people who had their capital invested. Even on the 14th of March, 1879, there was increased confidence on the part of every man who had capital invested. If you travel over the Dominion to-day and come in communication with men of all classes and all branches of business, they will tell you that business has vastly improved. We have few losses now whereas we had enormous bankruptcies before. In conversation the other day with a large importer and trader of Montreal he said: "Last year we did an enormous business and we lost but $40 in bad debts. Everywhere we have prompt payments; money is more abundant; business everywhere is better, and the National Policy has had a good share in this improvement. Now, there has been a good deal said about the increase of taxation upon the people of Canada since 1872. It was the burden of speeches made last summer where elections were held, and last autumn. I think it was my hon. friend from South Brant (Mr. Pater-son) who stated that this Government was very extravagant and was ruining the country. And I think that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, as well as the late Financial Minister stated that on the return of the present Ministry to power the expenditure began to increase. The latter gentleman said: "You may look for a large increase, and I should not wonder if, in 1883, we should have an expenditure of $28,000,000." Last Session the hon. leader of the Opposition went out of his usual sphere and made a careful examination of our financial affairs; he apologized for doing so, but it was not necessary, as he handled the subject in a very able manner; still, perhaps, his attention has not been called to a few facts I am now about to give him on this subject. The taxation necessary to meet the expenditure for 1873-74 to 1879-80, may be stated as follows: I deduct the $2,000,000 surplus because we are not spending it. If we had a deficiency of $1,000,000 we would have to add that $1,000,000 to the amount collected from Customs and Excise, because we would have required to increase the expenditure. Then I take the increase of population under the census of 1871 as my basis. It was about 12½ per cent. between 1861 and 1871, and I estimated 12½ per cent. between 1871 and 1881. I divide that by ten, and adding one-tenth to each year from 1871 down, showing the increase. Taking money necessarily collected from Customs and Excise for the purpose of paying the necessary expenditure of the country, as just stated, we find it to be as follows, per head for the population:—1873-4, $5.01; 1874-5, $5.07; 1875-6, $5.22; 1876-7, $4.82; 1877-8, $4.71; 1878-9, $5.02; 1879-80, 4.87. And under the estimated expenditure of the present year (1881), 4.98 as against 5.22 in 1875-76, and 5.07 in 1874-75. It must be borne in mind that between 1873-74 and the time when the present Government came into power, our debt was increased $40,000,000, and during the last two years $18,000,000 were added, for which we have provided this year. Notwithstanding that it was 4.87 per head of the population last year, it is estimated this year it will exceed 4.98. This is a matter I have gone into so carefully that I am satisfied I am correct; but, of course, it is quite open for my predecessor, the late Finance Minister, to show, if he can, that I am wrong with reference to that matter.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. What do you hold the population in 1881 will be?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. If there is any error it is in favor of my hon. friend, because I divide by ten, and you will see that is at the same percentage. The increase would be larger in the last year, and we give him the benefit from the commencement. Now, as we are entering upon a great work, and one which the country will sustain this House in carrying out, it is necessary that we should look to see how the debt of the Dominion of Canada stands to-day, Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

and how it will stand when that work is completed, as compared with the debts of other countries and the rates of taxation. I have obtained information with reference to the debts of the different Australian colonies, for the purpose of comparison. The following is a statement of the debts per head of the population of the following colonies, June 30th, 1879, and taxes per head for the same year:

	Debt.			Taxation.
New South Wales ...	20	6	10½	1	15	7½
Victoria	22	5	10	1	19	4½
South Australia	25	9	6	2	1	3
Queensland	46	16	0	2	18	11½
Western Australia	12	11	10	3	1	7½
Tasmania	15	17	8	2	2	6
New Zealand	51	13	3½	3	4	4
Canada, gross debt....	9	7	2	1	0	7½
Debtor, net debt.....	6	14	1½

If the engagements in connection with the Pacific Railway could mature during the current fiscal year, the revenue of the year would be found sufficient to pay the interest on the debt, including all other charges upon the Consolidated Revenues, and the net debt of the Dominion would not exceed £9 9s. 4d. per head of the present population, and the taxation for the year would not exceed £1 2s. 2d., or less than one half the average taxation of the Australian Colonies. Now, that would not justify extravagance on our part, I admit, but I make this statement to show our people that our taxation will be only one-half when that work is completed, of what it is in those Australian colonies, and that, under those circumstances, with our country in its present prosperous condition, and with a certainty of a continuation of that prosperity, they need have no fear of the future. Some gentlemen may say bank stocks have increased in value because of the good harvests. That is of a temporary character, but they have increased in value because the assets that the banks held were made more valuable by this policy which is giving an impetus to the trade of the whole country; and if we may judge from the improvement visible in the last two months since it was known that there was a probability of the Syndicate taking this road off our hands and constructing it rapidly, that the liabilities of the country were fixed, and that this road would be completed within ten years, I believe that fact, in connection with the National Policy, has much to do in increasing the value of stocks and of real personal property everywhere, and giving a hopeful feeling to the people throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. It is said we on this side of the House are very sanguine, and that I am a sanguine prophet. I will not undertake to prophecy, but I ask the members of this House and the people generally to look at the state of trade and our prospects and say, have they ever been more hopeful than at present. I firmly believe, although we have not a high protective Tariff, that by a re-adjustment of our Tariff from time to time for the encouragement and development of the resources of the country, and with our vast fertile belt of lands in the North-West for settlement, there is no reason why we should not be hopeful, and why the most sanguine expectations of the people of the Dominion should not be fully realized. I feel, standing here and speaking as the representative of the Government, that we have ample proof and evidence to vindicate us in the policy that we have followed, and that the gentlemen who support us in this House—and it is more their measure than ours—will be vindicated by those who sent them here. Having heard the leader of the Opposition say a few nights since, that he desired a return to the Tariff of 1878, I would prophecy this—and it is the only prediction I will make: if the hon. gentleman continues to entertain these views and propounds them at the election of 1883, this wave of prosperity that is coming over this country will submerge him and his party if they attempt to check its onward progress by the destruction of this policy, and it will be fatal to them all. They may patriotically feel that it is their duty to do it, but the consequences will nevertheless be as certain. In Committee I propose to submit some resolutions, of which the following is a summary:—

Schedule A.—Dutiable Goods.

- Agricultural implements—mower and reaper, knives to be added as parts of—department rules same now.
- Books—printed matter not enumerated, to be added at same rate, 30 per cent.
- Britannia metal—in pigs and bars 10 per cent. Manufactures of not plated, 25 per cent,—now all 20 per cent.
- Cocoa nuts—present duty $1 per hundred—when from place of growth to be 50 cents.
- Cordage—to include Manilla mouline, 20 per cent., being plentifully made in Canada.
- Cotton and manufactures of—amendment intended to make white or dyed jeans, coutilles, cambries, silicias &c., uniform rate 20 per cent—some now 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent.
- Cotton over 36 inches wide for oiled window blind manufactures to be 15 per cent—now 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent.
- Clothing of any material not elsewhere specified, to be uniform duty 30 per cent—now according to material.
- Glass and manufactures of—word “moulded” inserted, and words “or fruit” taken out to make item plain, and side-lights and head-lights added at 30 per cent.—The latter now rated according to material, and sometimes not properly rated.
- Gun, rifle and pistol cartridges to be uniform at 30 per cent.,—now rated according to material.
- Grain, flour and meal—now specific duty, to be 20 per cent. upon appraised value when damaged by water.
- Iron and manufactures of—axles, rivets and nuts, to pay same duty, whether of iron or steel.
- Rolled beams, channels and angle, and T iron, now 15 per cent. to be reduced to 12½ per cent.
- Wrought iron tubing, now all 15 per cent., to be changed, and make all of 2 inches diameter and under 25 per cent.
- Chain cables—over ½ inch, now 5 per cent., change size to read over ⅜ of an inch.
- Laces, braids, fringes, cords, tassels, now various rates, according to material, to be all 20 per cent.
- Lead—old and scrap, to be 40 cents per 100 lbs.; pigs, bars, blocks and sheets, to be 60 cents per 100 lbs.; both now 10 per cent.
- Leather—kinds now dutiable at 15 per cent., not well defined. Item changed and kinds more clearly specified, but duty not changed.
- Liquorice root—the root was inserted here in error, it is in the free list, and is to be expunged from the dutiable item.
- Marble finished—now 25 per cent., to be 30 per cent.
- Musical instruments—except pianos and organs, now rated according to material, to be all uniform duty, 25 per cent.
- Oil—lubricating, now often difficult to determine, duty being of mixed materials to be 25 per cent.
- Paints—white lead in pulp, not in oil, to be 5 per cent.
- Ribbons—all kinds and materials, to be 30 per cent.—now different rates according to materials.
- Oil cloth for floors, etc. . . Wording of item changed to avoid discrepancies in rating, but duty not changed, 30 per cent.
- Plated ware—cutlery plated wholly, or in part, specified in item to make it plain; duty not changed.
- Plaster of Paris—ground, not calcined, now 20 per cent., to be specific—10 cents per 100 pounds, to avoid difficulties in valuation.
- Printing presses—now 15 per cent., to be 10 per cent.

Silk in the gum—item changed to read “or spun, not more advanced than singles.” This to favor ribbon manufacturers.

- Spirits and strong waters—to include medicinal elixirs and fluid extracts, and wine preparations, at $1.90 per gallon, now difficult to rate, makes matters plain.
- Steel—free until 1st January, 1882, extended to 1883.
- Canned meats, fruits and tomatoes—Specific rates of duty to include the cans, and weight of cans to be included in weight for duty. This has been established by Order in Council and acted upon in the past.
- Satins of all kinds—to be 25 per cent., now various according to material of chief value.
- Screens—of any material not elsewhere specified, to be 30 per cent. Wood screens are now 35 per cent., and others various rates according to material.
- Shawls of all material, except silk, to be 25 per cent., now various rates.
- Slates—roofing slates now 25 per cent., to be specific at 80 cents and $1 per square.
- Sulphuric and nitric acid—combined, to be 20 per cent. This is so now under Order in Council.
- Telephones, telegraphic instruments, electric and galvanic batteries and apparatus for electric lights to be 25 per cent., now rated according to material.
- Umbrellas, parasols and sun shades of all kinds and materials to be 25 per cent. now rated according to materials.
- Velvets—silk to be 25 per cent. now 30 per cent., velveteens and cotton velvets to be 20 per cent.
- German and nickel silver, manufactures of, not plated, to be 25 per cent. now uncertain.
- Wincies—not more than ¼ wool, plain and twilled, all widths, 20 per cent.
Checked, striped or fancy not over 25 inches wide 20 per cent.
Checked striped or fancy, over 25 and not over 30 inches, 2 cents per square yard and 15 per cent.
But all checked, striped, or fancy, over 30 inches containing wool as part of material or to be rated as “woollen goods.”
- Woollens—horse clothing shaped, added to prevent misapprehension, no alteration in duty.

Schedule B.—Free List.

To be added—

- Beans—vanilla and nux vomica, belladonna leaves.
- Books—educational, for the use of schools for deaf and dumb, exclusively.
- Bones, crude, &c.—the word “and” to be stricken out, to avoid mistakes.
- Colors, dry and in pulp—item to be changed so as to add a number used by wall-paper-makers and others.
- Cinchona bark and ergot.
- Forest trees, for planting—free for Manitoba and North-West Territory.
- Horn strips—for making corsets.
- Extract of oak bark.
- Potash—bichromate of
- Roots medicinal—Aconite, calomba, ipecacuanha, sarsaparilla, squills, taraxacum and valerian, and various other roots are already free.

Prohibitions to be added—to accord with Copyright Act.

Foreign reprints of British Copyright Works, Copyrighted in Canada, and of Canadian Copyrighted Works. I shall submit these changes to the favorable consideration of the Committee, and I thank the House for the patience with which it has listened to me.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal), in the absence of Mr. GAULT, moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 62) respecting the Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada.

Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE BUDGET.

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the great and complicated questions to which the Minister of Finance referred and very properly referred, in his speech on the present occasion, are too numerous to enable me, or any one else for that matter, to do more to-night than take a general and cursory survey of the points in dispute between the two sides of the House, and in particular between the hon. gentleman and myself. Some of them would require for their proper elucidation very nearly an entire debate of itself. And although I do not despair of being able to notice almost all, if not all, the chief points to which the hon. gentleman referred, I certainly cannot pretend just now to go into all the questions which have come up in connection with this discussion. I observe that in the brief but touching remarks in which the hon. gentleman introduced his financial statement, he naturally enough alluded to the remarkable condition of peace, prosperity, and happiness which attended the affairs of this country at the time he first, as Finance Minister, made a statement to this House. Sir, although I am very far from denying that the financial state of the country in March, 1873, was a very strong one, I fail to understand what particular credit the hon. gentleman—who held the office of Finance Minister for eight months in 1873, if my memory serves me, after the retirement of Sir Francis Hincks—who used that opportunity to add between three and four million dollars a year to the expenditure of Canada without making any provision whatever for the payment of the same—I say I fail to understand what particular credit the hon. gentleman can claim, or how his actions during that time can have had much to do with the promotion of the prosperity to which he alluded. If hon. gentlemen should desire to know what was the true condition of the country when I entered upon office, and when I made my first financial statement in April of 1874, they may advantageously consult the Budget which I then felt it my duty to lay before the House. But the hon. gentleman threw out a challenge to this side of the House, to draw comparisons between the administration of public affairs by the Government of which hon. gentlemen on these Benches were supporters, and the Government of which he is himself a member, between the Tariff under which we conducted the business of the country and that which he has himself introduced. I say for myself, I say for the late Administration, and I think I may also say for my hon. friends behind me, and for the great party which they represent, that they shrink from no fair comparison on this point. We are willing, aye, more than willing, even eager, that a comparison should be made between the true effects of a protective Tariff and a revenue Tariff, provided that comparison is made on fair and equitable principles. Let us compare the effects of a revenue Tariff and a protective Tariff in times of depression and in times of prosperity, if you please; but do not let us resort to the gross and palpable unfairness of comparing the effect of a revenue Tariff in a time of world-wide depression, one such as was never before experienced on this continent, with the effect of a protective Tariff in a time of prosperity. In case of a fair comparison, we should have no reason to decline to accept any parallel which the hon. gentleman or his friends might desire to draw. I observed, Mr. Speaker, in the opening portion of the hon. gentleman's remarks, that he had a slight initial difficulty to contend with. On the one hand,

Sir LEONARD TILLEY.

he had an actual realized deficit of $1,500,000 to explain, and on the other an anticipated surplus, which he expects to receive, and probably will receive, as the result of the taxation of the present year. The problem, therefore, which has presented itself to the hon. gentleman is this: how shall I, having entered into office in 1878, escape the responsibility of the deficit of 1880, and at the same time, secure to myself the credit of the surplus of 1881? The hon. gentleman's plan is ingenious and simple. All you have to do is to take as much as may be necessary from the receipts of the one year, and add as much as is needful to the receipts of the other year, and the thing is done. If I might venture to suggest such a thing, it looks as if the mind of the Minister had strayed back to the pastimes of his early days, and as if he had revived for his own benefit on this particular occasion the pleasant formula of "heads I win, tails you lose" with which youthful gamblers sometimes seek to make fortune doubly sure. The fact is as the London Economist naively put it when commenting on this very transaction: "The Canadian Minister of Finance has a deficit of £400,000, but he prefers to call it £80,000." And I daresay the precedent will be convenient. But what is the hon. gentleman's argument? He imposed a Tariff in February, or rather though the terms were well-known in February, the Tariff was actually imposed in March; thereby, says the hon. gentleman, you cause great anticipations in July, August, September and October of the succeeding year. That may be the case, or it may not be the case. Let us look at the proof the hon. gentleman brings forward to sustain his position. I think that the House will agree, if there was a great anticipation of dutiable goods in the latter half of 1878-9, we might reasonably have presumed that the dutiable importations of the whole year 1879 would have been largely in excess of the dutiable importations for the years 1878 and 1880, and also that the importation in the last half of the year 1879 would have been larger than during the first half. What are the facts? Why, Sir, the facts are these: That in the fiscal year 1879, in which hon. gentlemen will bear in mind this great anticipation occurred, we imported in all for consumption $80,341,000, and in 1878, the year before this great anticipation occurred, we imported $91,199,000—$11,000,000 more in 1878 than in 1879. In 1880, the gross importation, although not the amount entered for consumption, reached a sum of $86,489,000. It is true that by the mode in which the accounts are now stated, there would appear to be a large reduction in the imports of 1880, but when you come to deduct from each of the imports entered for consumption, the amounts which were known to be imported from other countries, and passed in transitu through Canada, you will find that the real imports for 1880 are exactly identical with those for 1879. If you choose to apply another test—if you choose to compare the dutiable imports for the first half of 1879 with the dutiable imports for the last half of 1879, in which the great anticipation occurred, you have this very remarkable result: that in the first half of that year we imported $28,500,000, and in the last half we imported $26,967,000, being a million and a half less dutiable goods imported in the last half than the first, although in that $26,900,000 are included one million dollars worth of goods which were free before. According to the line of argument adopted by the hon. gentleman, because the imports for 1879 are far less than those for 1878, and because those for the last half of 1879 are less than those for the first half, and because the imports for 1880 are quite as great as those for 1879, therefore there was a great anticipation, as the hon. gentleman says, in the last half of 1879. The hon. Minister's speech, it appears to me, divides itself naturally into three parts: First, he asserted that the country was very much more prosperous than it was a few years ago. Sir, that statement is true. It is beyond all doubt that the condition of Canada is more prosperous than it was two, three or four years back. Then he went on to show, and to show in some detail, that the said prosperity, under Providence, is due to the fact that he has caused certain articles—cotton, woollens, iron, coal, sugar, and a great many other manufactured articles to be made artificially dearer, a consequence which I take the liberty to doubt. And in the third place, he alleged that this is all due to the beneficent inspiration known as the National Policy. I desire, as well as the hon. gentleman, to expend some little time in considering what are the causes of those better times—how comes it that, to-day, in 1881, things are better with us, as they undoubtedly are, than they were in 1876, or 1877, or 1878, or 1879? To the hon. Minister's mind there is no difficulty at all. He points to the sequence of events. Sequence and consequence to him are all the same. He points triumphantly to this great fact—there are the taxes imposed in 1879; here are the better times in 1881. Permit me to say that there appears to me to be some confusion of ideas here. No doubt among various races, savage and civilized, there will be found a similar confusion. When there is distress, they have various devices to get out of it. Some nations offer human sacrifices, some make long prayers, some consult oracles, and some, in order to make the people richer, impose more taxes. If they can benefit ten at the expense of ten thousand they think—and the hon. Minister, in fact, alleges—that that is a sure mode of escaping from distress. They all have their fetish, whether it be sacrifices, or prayers, or oracles or taxes, it matters not. And the hon. Minister, true to his particular fetish, proposes to go on imposing more taxes, in order to make our people richer. So far as I can follow his argument, he would have us to understand that, inasmuch as he taxed cottons we had a better wheat crop; that inasmuch as he taxed woollens—and he did tax them pretty severely—therefore the people of Canada are able to sell more beef, and butter, and cheese; that inasmuch as all articles of iron are more heavily taxed, and have risen in price—and my hon. friends know that the article of iron enters largely into the production of lumber—therefore there is a great deal more demand for lumber; and as far as coal is concerned, so far as I could follow the subtleties of his argument, that the tax on coal goes to increase travel and to cheapen freight. Sir, there have been infidels who have doubted all this. There have been men so far abandoned to their natural depravity as to point out that in the first place this distress, which the hon. gentleman alleges we brought about, and he removed, was a universal and widespread distress, and, moreover, affected nations which did impose taxes for the purpose of making the people richer quite as long and as largely as nations which did not; that the causes which led to this distress were very plain; that these causes were wholly extrinsic to and wholly unconnected with any question of extra taxes; that in other countries exactly an opposite course to that which the hon. gentleman has followed, and recommends to us, has been followed by similar results to those upon which he now congratulates us. It has been pointed out that prima facie the best way to make people rich is not to compel them to buy inferior articles for a third or a half more than they could purchase them in a free market. I am aware, that all such pleas as these the hon. gentleman will shake from him. He condescended to-night, for the first time, to give some particulars of the factories, and to give us a little calculation of the numbers of people he says he has called into existence or given employment to by this beneficent Tariff. Still, there was a good deal of rather vague rhetoric and comparatively little of the hard fact we should obtain—we must obtain—in order to thoroughly understand these questions. I would like, Sir, for my private information, to put three questions to the hon. gentleman. If this nostrum of more taxation be all he claims it to be, I would like him to inform me and the House, either now or at his more convenient leisure, how it was in old Canada in 1858, somewhere about 22 years ago, when we made a change in our Tariff, and made it largely protective, and imposed very heavy taxes, the imposition of large taxes was followed by many years of extreme distress and numerous deficits? In the second place, why, in 1868, when a change came over the spirit of these hon. gentlemen's dreams and the First Minister, in my hearing, told us he had found a more excellent way and was going to retrace his steps, when we lowered our Tariff and made it a merely revenue Tariff, then the reduction of the taxes was followed by many years of rather remarkable prosperity? Then, if it be the case, as the hon. gentleman has more than once hinted it was, that the existence of deficits—whether large or small, whether caused by our own acts or those of our predecessors—is a proof of the great incapacity of the Ministry under which they existed. I would like him, when the First Minister is in his place, to explain, and to send to the High Commissioner a copy of his explanation of the reason why there were more and larger deficits—ten times more than ours, I believe—between the years from 1858 to 1866. Now, Sir, let us see what are the reasons which the hon. gentleman advanced for claiming credit for himself and for his policy for the surplus which he expects to receive. That surplus, as the hon. gentleman truly stated, is due, or will be due when we get it, to the increased importations of the year. Now, the policy of those hon. gentlemen, declared from this side of the House and from that side of the House so often, is to diminish imports, to put a stop to this extravagant importation under which we suffer, and if it be true—and I do not see how he can deny or contradict it—that the surplus is due to increased imports, I say that it does not lie in his mouth to claim as the proof of the great success of his policy that, in spite of all he has done—and he has done a great deal in that direction—he has not yet succeeded, though he may hereafter, in so far reducing our imports as to entirely destroy our revenue. The general tone and style of the hon. gentleman's argument reminded me of the address the steward of some great proprietor might make to his master. He might say: "I and my fellow servants between us have largely added to your annual expenditure. We have pensioned off many good and faithful servants of yours and have put friends of ours in their places. We have taken pains that every job done on your estate should be executed on terms far beyond the market price—many millions above it in some cases. We have forced your tenants to deal with shopkeepers who gave them indifferent goods at high prices. We have used the power of attorney with which you so rashly intrusted to us to give away a great deal of your property, and to incur obligations which you will have to redeem at great sacrifice. But yet, in spite of all, although we have labored assiduously, though we have done our best and our worst, still we have to inform you that your neighbours have purchased so much more largely than heretofore, your fields and your herds and your forests have yielded so much better than before; in spite of all we could do we have absolutely got a balance to our credit, although it is extremely probable that we will very soon get rid of it." I spoke but now of the causes of increased revenue. Those causes were due, as the hon. gentleman admitted, to increased importation. Now, Sir, I say that that increased importation arises from causes entirely extraneous to the hon. gentleman's policy. We are able to buy more, because we have more to sell; we have more to sell, because we have had good harvests, and because there is a better demand. There is a better demand, because there has been a scarcity in Europe, and a great improvement in the United States, largely due no doubt to the hard times which existed in Europe. Now, under what possible conditions could the National Policy claim the credit of these increased imports. That, Sir, is a point to which I desire to direct the earnest attention of this House. So far as I can see, the hon. Minister is justified in claiming for the National Policy the credit of our increased exports, on one or other of these two conditions: if he be able to show that his policy has so stimulated manufacturing industry, that our exports of manufactured goods have increased largely, or, if he be able to prove, as indeed he tried to do to some extent (though I cannot congratulate him upon his success in that direction), that his policy has largely increased the production of the other articles we export, I admit he would have made out some ground for asserting that the National Policy had contributed to these increased exports to which we owe our increased revenue. But what are the facts? My hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) rather anticipated my line of argument yesterday, when he called attention to the fact that whereas our exports of manufactures of our own production were in 1878, $4,127,000, our exports of the same class of goods had fallen in 1880 to $3,242,000. Well, Sir, the hon. Minister advanced to-night an argument which I have heard, and which I think members of this House have heard for the first time, that this which we in our ignorance all thought was a proof, that whatever other benefits the National Policy might have brought about it had not increased our power of producing manufactured articles, was quite a mistake on our part. The hon. Minister tells us, and I call the attention of the House and of the country to the statement, that the diminution of exports of manufactured articles is the best proof of increasing home prosperity. That is a statement with which I confess I feel myself hardly qualified to grapple. It had appeared to me, Mr. Speaker, that one of the strongest objections to the protective system is that under it you usually fail, as those figures show we have failed, as the whole history of the United States shows they have failed, to enable your manufacturers to produce manufactured articles cheaply enough to allow them to compete in the markets of the world with merchants of other nations less heavily taxed, and that as a consequence you do great injury to your carrying trade by reducing the trade to and fro with other nations. Any one who has studied the subject knows the difficulties Americans experience in competing in foreign markets with England through lack of vessels of their own, and their inability to retain even a fair share of the commerce to their own ports, and for these two reasons I say the protective system stands condemned. However, Sir, the difference in the export of manufactured goods in any case is so small that it is not worth dwelling upon except as an illustration of another part of my argument. Has the hon. gentleman, as he seems desirous of showing, really done anything to increase the production of these great staples, owing to whose increase we are now in a more prosperous condition? Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman told us that he had added ten cents in certain cases to the cost of flour. He thought it was probable that sometimes at certain seasons there might be a small increase in the price of wheat. He was judiciously doubtful on that point, because I think if he visits my agricultural constituents, and those of other members, he will find that if there was an increase it did not go into the pockets of the farmer, but into that of the speculator, and as a matter of fact, for many months in the past two years the price of Canadian wheat ruled lower than that of American wheat, a state of affairs which I fear was due in part to the operation of the policy which he claims is the cause of our prosperity. I myself place small dependence upon the figures quoted upon that point, because I know right well the price of Canadian and American wheat is fixed by the price which rules at Liverpool and at other great points of demand in Europe. But what has he done for the benefit of the agriculturist, for the benefit of the lumberer, for the benefit of other producers of articles of a similar kind? If I am correctly informed, and I think there are gentlemen here who can corroborate my statement, what he has done for these great industries is simply this: He has added to the cost of every tool which these producers use, from a spade to a mowing machine, from an axe to a cross-cut saw. He has added to the cost of every article which they require to purchase. From their caps to their boots; from their books to their blankets, there is not one article which is extensively used by these producers to the cost of which he has not added. He has, as I shall presently show, diminished their home market by many thousands; even giving him credit for all he pretends he has added to the home population. He has added, also, to the cost of freight, and yet he claims that he and his policy have been largely the cause of the increased production of wheat, of animal products, and of articles of the forest. Now, Sir, it is well worth our while—it is an interesting study, as far as figures can be interesting—to examine for ourselves what, and how great has been the increase in the exports of this country within the last few years. In 1879, that is to say in the fiscal year terminating on the 30th June, our total exports, (including coin and bullion) of our own products, was $63,135,000. In 1880 these exports amounted to $74,671,000, of which, however, $1,000,000 was caused by an additional amount of bullion. In the first half of the present year 1881, our exports reached the very remarkable figure of $54,122,000. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman is right in congratulating the country on this state of things. But he is wrong, in my judgment, in claiming that he or his policy contributed in the slightest degree to bring about that increase. Has he considered, Sir, of what articles those increases consist? We exported in 1879,

Articles of the forest.....	$13,261,000
Animals and their products.....	14,100,000
Agricultural articles.....	19,828,000
Total.....	$46,900,000

In 1880 we exported, of

Articles of the forest.....	$16,859,000
Animals and their products.....	17,807,000
Agricultural products.....	22,294,000
Total.....	$56,761,000

In other words, the total increase of our exports during the year of those three articles alone, amounted to $9,766,000, being as nearly as possible, when you allow for the additional bullion exported, the exact difference between the exports of 1879 and 1880. And, Sir, which is another fact to which I would call the earnest attention of this House (because it is here we find the whole key to the cause of the remarkable prosperity which the hon. gentleman rightly says now exists, and from the continuance of which he hopes to obtain his surplus) in the half year ending December 31st, 1879, I find that our total exports were, of

Articles of the forest.....	$10,168,000
Animals and their products.....	10,714,000
Agricultural articles.....	14,798,000

In all, $35,500,000 in round numbers. In this current half year I find that we exported of

Articles of the forest.....	$17,985,000
Animals and their products.....	13,806,000
Agricultural products.....	13,856,000

Total..... $45,644,000

So that in the six months which elapsed on the 1st of January we had, on these three articles alone, added to our exports $10,000,000 worth. And if you compare it with the half year for 1879, in which we exported of all those articles, $30,621,000, you find that there is a difference in those six months in favor of 1881 of $15,027,000. Now, Sir, I say that these are very remarkable facts, which show clearly and distinctly to what causes our present prosperity, so far as it exists, is really due, not to the hon. gentleman—not to the National Policy, not to the increase of our manufacturers' products, but wholly and entirely to the increase of our export of lumber and of animals and their products—wholly to these causes is it due; nor need I tell any one who has paid the faintest attention to the actual operations of commerce how enormously an addition to the income of the people of $10,000,000 in the space of six months will tend to encourage and stimulate every kind of industry at home, and increase our powers of purchase and our consumption of dutiable articles. But I do say, Sir, that it is hardly open to the hon. gentlemen, to claim that he or his policy is entitled to any share of the credit until he is prepared to prove how far and to what extent that policy contributed to the enormous increase I have just pointed out. If hon. gentlemen want to trace more clearly still how close is the inter-dependence between the imports into and the exports from this country, they will find in the Gazette returns a very curious illustration, indeed, of the remarkable expedition with which now-a-days an increased export produces an increased import. In the first half of 1879-80, we appear, by the Gazette returns, to have exported of goods of our own production, $43,677,000 worth. In 1880-1, for the same period, we exported $54,122,000. We exported, therefore, during the half year just closed, $10,495,000 worth more than we did in the corresponding half year of the year before. What were our imports during the same period? In 1879, in the same period, we imported $34,118,000, and in 1880, for the same period, we imported $44,618,000. Therefore, our imports increased $10,499,000 against an increase of our exports of $10,495,000. I think that fact alone would show not merely to the House, but to the hon. gentleman himself, how thoroughly and completely the whole of this increase of revenue for which he claims credit depended on the increased exportation from this country, as to which I entirely and utterly deny the hon. gentleman has a right to say that he or his policy contributed in any degree. All it has done is that it has considerably increased the cost of producing lumber, grain and animal products of every kind and description. In that increase of our exports in these three great industries, he and his policy have neither lot, part nor share, although, as was said of old, they may profit by it—they may succeed in reaping where most assuredly they did not sow. Now, Sir, I take issue with the hon. gentleman on two assertions of his. He asserted in very positive terms that at any rate, as a revenue-producing machine, his Tariff had vindicated its claim to complete success, and he asserted also that it did produce a great deal more than the old Tariff which was imposed by the late Administration. Now, I say, that if the House choose to examine carefully the real position of the matter they will see that so far from being a success in the matter of producing a revenue, that hon. gentlemen's system has proved to be an utter failure, so long as the exports continue low—and over the amount of those exports, I repeat, he could exercise no control. What was the actual return of Customs revenue received by the hon. gentleman in the year just past? It amounted, Sir, to $14,130,000. Of that Sir, no less than $785,000 were due to the odious, unjust and unreasonable imports upon coal and upon bread—while on the same class of articles substantially on which the Tariff of 1874 was imposed, the hon. gentleman succeeded by his enormously increased and oppressive mode of taxation in raising about $13,300,000. Now what would have been the results under the old Tariff? As I have shown to the House an increase of exports is always or almost invariably accompanied, by an immediate increase of imports. Our exports in 1880 had increased, no thanks to the hon. gentleman, very largely over the exports in 1878

—which I take for the purpose of comparison in order to avoid any charge of mixing up the effects of my Tariff with the Tariff which that hon. gentleman imposed—and I say it is susceptible of the clearest proof that supposing only that there was a very moderate increase of the imports; supposing there was an increase of the imports much less than the increased exportation would warrant—that the old Tariff would have given us, in 1880, all the revenue we received, and that in 1881 we would get as much revenue as even the hon. gentleman himself expects to obtain from the enormous additions which he made to it. Sir, on that point, I desire to call the attention of the House to a rather remarkable fact which they can verify for themselves if they refer to the Gazette returns. In the first half of, 1874-5—that is to say, the period from June, 1874, to January 1875; the only period in which one can fairly compare the operation of the late Tariff—the actual Customs receipts for that half year amounted, by the Gazette returns, to $8,835,000; the actual receipts for the corresponding period which terminated on the first of January last, under the hon. gentleman's greatly increased Tariff, amounted—quoting from the Gazette returns, to $8,762,000, in which was included $400,000 at least for coal and bread. So that, Sir, in the first half of 1874-5, the only period available for anything like a fair and just comparison, the revenue Tariff imposed in 1874, absolutely yielded a larger revenue than the present oppressive and unjust Tariff imposed by the hon. gentleman. Now, I say that we are justified in laying a great deal of stress upon that point. The period I have chosen, although the only period at all available for the purpose of a reasonable comparison, is a period unfavorable to us in very many ways. First of all, the exports in 1874-5 were enormously less than the exports in the present year. In the next place, it is perfectly clear that there was a considerable anticipation in 1874-5 because the Tariff under which we then worked had been imposed at the latter end of April, and, on the hon. gentleman's own argument, there would have been undoubtedly a vastly larger anticipation under a Tariff imposed in April, than there was under a Tariff well known in February and imposed in March. Now, I think, Sir, even the hon. Finance Minister himself will hardly venture to deny that, provided our exports increase largely, our imports are sure to increase to a very considerable extent; and he can certainly hardly deny it in the face of the facts declared in our trade returns, and the facts to which I have called his attention; nor can he deny that the old Tariff would have yielded a largely increased revenue provided the imports increased. I have shown that the exports in 1880-81, so far, were within the half year at least $15,000,000 greater than the exports in the corresponding period in 1878. I do not suppose they will go on increasing in quite that ratio, but if, as is most probable, they are $10,000,000 or thereabout more in the remaining half of the year than the exports for the corresponding period in 1878, we would have in all human probability an increased export over the export of 1878 of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, and I need not say that but for the hon. gentleman's deliberate and arbitrary interference there would have been undoubtedly an increased importation of at least an equal amount—probably a much larger amount—because as the House knows, under ordinary conditions of things, we usually receive back a larger importation than the nominal amount of our exports. Now, Sir, if we assume, as a fair standard to start from, the condition of exports and the condition of imports in 1878, and if to this you add $25,000,000 of imports which would be the smallest amount that would fairly represent an increased export of $25,000,000, it is perfectly clear that we would receive at the very lowest calculation, or would have received had our old Tariff been in operation and not interfered with, an increase of at least $4,000,000 of revenue, probably considerably more, wholly independent of the duty on coal and bread which I called attention to;

in other words, if we had the additional exports—which I entirely deny the hon. gentleman's right to claim credit for—under the Tariff which we then had, our total income would have amounted certainly to not less than $17,000,000, which, I think, is about the sum that the hon. gentleman expects to receive this year, less his tax on coal; and the country at large would have had a taxation something like 60 per cent. less than the taxation under which it at present labors. Now, Sir, although I do not care to quote the hon. gentleman's words, I say that this is a most ample justification of the position assumed by the late Government. I say that the results have come out literally and exactly as we predicted years ago that they would come out. I say that a protective tariff, so long as the exports continue low—and so far as this protective tariff is concerned they would always have continued low—will wholly fail to produce adequate revenue until those conditions are changed. I say that prosperity returned the instant that those conditions were changed from causes over which neither the hon. gentleman nor myself could really exercise any control; and I say, Sir, that the moment those conditions were changed, that the late Tariff would have been amply sufficient and more than amply sufficient for all our wants. The hon. gentleman, Sir, has indulged in a very remarkable boast as to the effects of his system of taxation, and he appeared disposed to dispute, just now, my assertion that he had added 60 per cent. to the taxation. I did not say, you will observe, that he had raised the total taxes by the sum of 60 per cent. over and above what they were before, but I say this: whereas our average taxes were probably, on the ordinary importation, about 12 or 13 per cent., our average taxes at present are some 19 or 20 per cent., and I say that is a difference of 60 per cent., as compared to the former existing rate of taxation. Now, Sir, what has he done? He has added to our taxes in almost every conceivable particular. We have taxes on food; we have taxes on fuel; we have arrangements for inspection of oil so made as to involve a very heavy tax on light—on the article chiefly used for producing light in this country; and as a result we have—although, perhaps, the hon. gentleman may not sufficiently appreciate the fact—greatly increased the whole cost of living to the great producing classes of this country. Perhaps the hon. gentleman, as some of his friends behind him have done, will argue that we have paid heavily, but are receiving proportionate benefit. Now, that is a vital question for us to consider. I admit it may be possible, although I have failed to see hitherto how, that from the enormous addition to our taxation we have received, or may hope to receive, some proportionate benefit. Let us recall the promises which those hon. gentlemen made at the time they were struggling for place and power. Let me recall their promises to the urban population, their promises to the farming population, and particularly to the unhappy inhabitants of the Maritime Provinces, from which the hon. Minister of Finance comes. We were told that they were to have a better home market, and the hon. gentlemen to-night attempted to show how that promise, at any rate, has been fulfilled. We were told, particularly, in the farming districts, land was to rise and was to become more and more valuable all over the country; and I would like to get the opinion of the representatives from Western Ontario, as to the extent to which that promise has been fulfilled in their constituencies. I am afraid, if they spoke the truth, they would have to admit that, though they might differ about the cause, that there can be, unhappily, no doubt whatever as to this, that the value of the farming lands, throughout the western part of Canada more particularly, had fallen heavily and seriously within the last few years; while as to the home market, even the hon. Minister of Finance, greatly against his will, was compelled to admit, there had been a very serious exodus of our people, although he was disposed to believe that the number of those said to have left the country had been greatly exaggerated. I can well understand the reason which makes the hon. gentleman and his colleagues so sore, so savage and so touchy when any allusion is made to the exodus. Although the hon. Minister of Finance was not present himself in the House during the five years of the Administration of my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Mackenzie), he is, no doubt, perfectly well aware that on no single occasion did his friends beside him, and his friends behind him, omit to quote from those very statistics which they now decry to prove the fact that under Mr. Mackenzie's Administration there had been a great exodus of the people of Canada to the United States. Now no language is too hard, no insinuations, I was going to say, are too severe for them to make against the bona fides of the United States Customs statistics; and yet, until within a year or two ago on every hustings in Canada, did those hon. gentlemen quote those very statistics as containing unanswerable proof of the mismanagement of the Mackenzie Government and of the extent to which they were driving the people out of the country. As to the question whether or not the American statistics do accurately represent the total exodus of our people, I for the present reserve my opinion. I am not satisfied—and I take this opportunity of stating it publicly—with the report which has been submitted on behalf of the Department of Immigration, and I will proceed to give the hon. Minister some reasons which appear to be reasonably convincing as to the existence of a very serious exodus, whether or not those statistics which Mr. Lowe controverts were exaggerated or not. There are other facts well known to hon. members, which afford but too good evidence, but too clear proof—that whatever else the hon. gentleman may or may not have done—that he has failed, and failed most notably, in preventing this emigration, which we deplore as sincerely, perhaps, more sincerely in reality, than the hon. Minister himself. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Macdonell) showed the House, the other day, how, in the small space of some ten miles square, between 300 and 400 people had been known to have left this country. I called attention, myself, to the fact that out of five or six townships scattered over the County of Huron, having a population of barely 22,000 souls, there was a known and ascertained emigration of at least 1,500 souls. I find by reference to certain municipal statistics, which we have been able to obtain, and which it would be well if the hon. Minister of Agriculture had attempted to obtain, that a like state of things prevailed at widespread points through Ontario. I find, for instance, in Kingston, from which I come myself, that whereas a couple of years ago, the population was given at 17,358, to-day, under the beneficent effects of the hon. gentleman's policy, the population is put down at 13,621, a loss, in that comparatively small population, of 700 souls. I find from the returns of Belleville that, last year, their population was 9,901; this year it is given at 9,726. I am informed by a resident of St. Catharines, that the population of that city, eighteen months ago, was 11,079; the population to-day is 9,384.

Mr. RYKERT. Who is the authority?

Sir RICHARD J. CARTWRIGHT. The authority from whom I obtained this information is an authority, I venture to say—his seat in Parliament apart—equally as good as that of the hon. gentleman who interrupts me. There is another way in which we can obtain some idea of what has actually been going on in Canada. I assert, here, that whether the United States statistics be true or not, whether there has been, or not, a larger or smaller emigration to any particular point, the educational returns of the Province of Ontario alone show too clearly and conclusively how great, how vast a depopulation, if the hon. gentleman chooses to use that term, has been going on in the rural parts of Ontario. Those returns show that throughout the rural districts of Ontario the school population of all ages attending school stood as follows:

In 1877.....	399,154
In 1879.....	391,063

Here, in one year, among the population attending school, we have an actual loss of 5,157. At the usual proportion subsisting between those attending school and the total population, a loss of 5,000 represents a total loss of 20,000 to that Province, or more correctly, to the rural parts of that Province. And when you recollect—and the Minister himself alluded to that point—that in Ontario the average increase according to the last census was about one and a-half per cent. per annum, Ontario having increased decidedly more rapidly than most of the other Provinces, hon. gentlemen will see that besides that dead loss of 20,000, there must have been a loss of the natural increase in that year of not less than 25,000, making in all, if the returns of the Minister of Education are to be believed, a loss to that one Province in a year of not short of 45,000 souls. Now, Sir, I say it is impossible for us to shut our eyes to these facts which go to show, not necessarily that the United States statistics are correct, but that there has been a very great emigration from the Province of Ontario, whithersoever and wheresoever it may have been directed. And I say this: that in my judgment it would be far better for the present Ministry, and in particular the Minister of Agriculture, in place of relying exclusively on doubtful statistics obtained from this or from that railway company, to avail himself—as in a case so important he might very well do—of the resources of his office, to ascertain from the greater number of Ontario municipalities what was the actual state of things as shown by their municipal returns, and to enter fairly and honorably into communication with the United States Government, who, I take leave to say here in my place, are incapable of knowingly permitting their statistics being adulterated and falsified, as the Minister of Agriculture and his friends say they are. I have no doubt that if the Minister of Agriculture was to make proper representations to the American Government, we can easily get to the bottom of this matter, and I say that this matter is one that we ought to get to the bottom of. I submit that whether the exodus be so great as their statistics say, or as we on this side suppose, there is no doubt whatever, even in the minds of the Ministry themselves, that there has been a great and very lamentable emigration from this country; and it is a matter of the first importance that steps should be taken—if possible in conjunction with the neighboring Government—to ascertain the real actual facts in the case. I conceive that neither the Ministry nor the Committee of this House to whose province it properly belongs can be better employed than in making a very searching investigation into this matter. One fact, at any rate, is clear, and that is, that these men who now declare that these statistics are falsified and incorrect, themselves—perhaps innocently and unknowingly—made false accusations against the late Ministry, when they accused them, on the faith of these statistics which they now denounce, of having been responsible for a large emigration from this country. The hon. gentleman, though he did not do so to-night, has in another place advanced another plea. He said, I will not deny that there has been a considerable emigration, but, after all, what does that prove. Nothing against the National Policy, says the Minister, because, forsooth, if these people do flee to the United States, as you allege, they flee after all from a lower to a higher protective Tariff. Well, Sir, what I have to say in reply is this: that I think the fact is one which is hardly correctly stated, because the incidence of taxation upon those classes of our people which chiefly leave us, is, I very much fear, quite as high under the hon. gentleman's Tariff as it is under the Tariff of the United States. I say, in the second place, that as regards a very great number of articles it is a matter of perfect indifference after you reach a certain point—after you reach the prohibitory point—what your nominal Tariff may be. If 30 per cent. will exclude a certain class of manufactured articles, surely the hon. Minister and the House must see that it is a matter of no consequence whether you make the Tariff 50, 60, 70, or 100 per cent.; if 30 per cent. will exclude it is the prohibitory point and all extra taxation is idle and unnecessary. But in truth this whole argument only shows that the Minister and his supporters have wholly failed to apprehend correctly the enormous difference which exists between our position and that of the people of the United States. Sir, the United States is a country possessing immense resources which we have not; at any rate which we have not developed as yet. It is a country which possesses what we do not—an immense system of internal free trade, and the consequence of that fact is this: that even if our Tariff was identical in every page and line and letter with the Tariff of the United States, that Tariff would produce very different results, indeed, if applied on this side of the border, from those which it might possibly produce on the other. You can, for one thing, manufacture a vast deal cheaper for a population of 50,000,000 than for a population of 4,000,000, and, moreover, so large a market as they possess does ensure, to a very considerable extent, as I have never denied, a tolerably keen competition on most staple articles, which does not exist in Canada and never will exist, for the simple reason that our small market renders it impossible for us to secure equal cheap competition or to manufacture on equally cheap terms. And yet, with all these great advantages to which I have alluded—with all their wonderful natural resources, with all their magnificent system of internal free trade, let my Protectionist friends and the Minister of Finance compare the present position of England with that of the United States. The latter country has to-day equal access to every foreign market which is open to the English manufacturer. The United States exports of manufactured goods to-day are utterly insignificant; after all their attempts for twenty long years they are utterly unable to compete with the English manufacturer. I wish to call attention to a few remarkable statements made in the last report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of the United States, and I refer more particularly to the effect which the American protective system has had upon their capacity to engage in the carrying trade either of their own or of other countries. According to that report the tonnage engaged in foreign trade and owned by the United States 20 years ago—that is 1860—amounted to 2,379,000 tons. This year it is 1,314,000 tons, or a little more than one-half what it was 20 years ago. Twenty years ago the American built on an average, as this gentleman states, 233 ships every year; this year they built 23. Twenty-five years ago the tonnage of all kinds entering American ports amounted to 4,460,000 tons. Of this the United States themselves contributed 3,194,000 tons. In 1880 the tonnage had grown to 15,250,000 tons, and of this the United States claim only 3,128,000 tons. The proportion of their own trade which the United States could carry on—and I need not tell the hon. member for St. John what a valuable and lucrative trade, the carrying trade of the United States is and ought to be—had fallen from 72 per cent. in 1856 to 21 per cent. in 1880; while British tonnage engaged in the United States trade had increased from 1856 to 1880 by 6,967,000 tons. Now, that is a fact to which, at any rate, the representative of one of the chief cities of the Maritime Provinces would do well to pay a little attention when he is stating the results of the policy he is so proud of having inaugurated. As for the results of United States enterprise in contesting with British enterprise for the supremacy of trade in distant markets common to both, we find that of manufactured cotton-goods, the United States export in 1878 of $11,500,000 had in 1880 fallen to $9,900,000, and their export of woollen goods in 1878 which amounted to $448,000 had fallen in 1880 to $216,000. In the three great articles of export, cottons, woollens, and iron goods of all kinds, the United States, with 50,000,000 people, exported less than £5,000,000 stg. worth, while England, according to the trade returns for 1880, with her 32,000,000 or 33,000,000 people exported to the value of £115,000,000 stg. in eleven months: or at the rate of £125,000,000 sterling for the 12 months; in those three articles. The imports of the United States of cottons had run up from $19,000,000 in 1879, to $30,000,000; in woollen goods, between 1879 and 1880, the imports had increased from $29,000,000 to $57,000,000; and in iron goods, that particular industry, cherished by the protection of 100 years in the United States, the importation between 1879 and 1880 had increased from $9,947,000 to $53,714,000 worth. Those facts, which I quote from the United States own trade returns, show clearly, that up to the present time, with all their natural advantages, the United States have totally failed to equal, far less to supersede, English goods in markets common to them both. But there is one respect in which the United States can outrival England. You look in vain in the English market for any considerable consumption of cottons or woollens or iron goods of United States manufacture, but you learn that there are to be found on every English breakfast table, American beef, butter, bread and cheese. The lesson is obvious. The United States with all their faults have got, and they zealously maintain, the principle of free trade in land, and consequently in all things that land can produce the Americans are unrivalled. In those articles in which they have no protection, in which they can have no protection, they sweep English products out of the markets, although the British Isles have, as all know, uncommon natural advantages for the production of three, at least, of the articles I have enumerated; while in spite of tyrannical laws, in spite of an odious system of monopolies, English manufacturers force their way into American markets, and drive American productions out of every fair field common to both. The lesson is clearly this, that the United States are supreme where they have no protection; and that England is beaten alone where England still adheres to the old and unfortunate monopoly in land. Owing to this monopoly, England is beaten in those very articles which her soil and climate best adapt her to produce. Now, I say the hon. Minister and his friends might read their lesson here. In their policy they appear to me to have sedulously imitated the worst evils of both the great countries with which we are connected. We have plagiarized the foolish trade policy of the United States, and are now attempting to plagiarize the still more unfortunate land policy of England, and hon. gentlemen opposite call the mixture a National Policy. The hon. gentleman said but little of our expenditure on immigration. Now, I think that a most golden opportunity is presented to us, and I would have been glad to have heard from the hon. gentleman of the intentions of the Government in attempting to avail themselves of it. It appears to me we have deliberately adopted a policy which will tend to drive away immigrants from our shores. How are we welcoming immigrants here? We had until very recently two very great advantages, over the American people in this matter. We could say with truth that our taxes were much lower than theirs.

that living was decidedly cheaper here than in the United States, and we had, until very lately, the power of dealing with our lands in the North-West in such a way that we could avoid those railway monopolies which, in spite of American laws, very seriously impair the progress of the North-Western States. Now, how does the case stand? We have imposed a most oppressive Tariff; Canada is rapidly becoming an extremely dear country to live in. I have not the materials for making a perfect comparison of the expense of living of an ordinary workman or artizan in Canada and the cost of living in England. But I know that the English artizan can obtain clothing for himself and family at vastly cheaper rates than he can in Canada; I know that in England, in the chief cities, at any rate, he can obtain lodging and fuel on cheaper terms, and that every article of rational luxury which poor and rich alike desire, if their means permit, to indulge in, can be obtained vastly cheaper in England than here under the present Tariff. In one word, with the solitary exception of land and the leading food staples, I believe that every article largely consumed by the workingman is, at any rate, in cities, very seriously dearer here than in England, while I doubt exceedingly whether any comparison of wages between the two countries would now result in our favor. The hon. gentleman challenged us to show how his National Policy had injuriously affected the agriculturists of Canada. Now, I will admit that there is always a certain difficulty in getting at the true facts of the expenditure of the agricultural community. Comparatively but a small number of them keep accurate accounts, as everybody who has had experience in dealing with farmers knows; they often—especially the female members of the family—in many parts of the country, carry on a system of barter for many articles they consume. Their expenditure varies greatly year after year; they spend largely when there is a good crop, and spend less when there is an indifferent crop. But, nevertheless, the general results of inquiries which I have made at widely different points of the country all tend to show that the average expenditure on goods, not necessarily imported, but on goods increased in price under the Tariff of the hon. gentleman is for the average farmer, having a farm say of 100 acres, rarely less, on an average of years, than about $300; and on that $300 worth of manufactured goods the average tax imposed by the policy of the hon. Finance Minister varies from 30 to 35 per cent., because those identical articles which enter most largely into use of our agriculturists, are the articles most heavily taxed by our fostering paternal Government. I remember, when some months ago I called attention to the enormous injustice of the Tariff as it bore on the farmers of Ontario, that the hon. Finance Minister disputed very seriously the statement I made. What was the line of argument which he adopted to show that I was entirely wrong in my statement that the taxes on the Ontario farmers reached something like the limits I gave? Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman took the total taxes of Canada, and divided this by 4,000,000, and then he argued that because the average taxation of the whole population, men, women and children, amounted to between $4 and $5 per head, it was clear that the taxation of a particular class, and that a well-to-do class in a particular Province could, by no possibility, reach the limits I mentioned. There, as well as in other cases, the hon. gentleman was bent on showing that he had either forgotten, or had never taken the trouble rightly to understand, the effects of the protective policy of which he is the official exponent. When the hon. gentleman talked to us, not long ago, of the true incidence of his Tariff, he told us that all the people could lose was just the difference between this and the former Tariff in the duty on articles they import. That is a most mistaken view of a protective tariff. A protective tariff raises the price of all kinds of manufactured goods, whether imported through the Customs houses or manufactured in the country. What is the use of a protective tariff unless it excludes goods which would otherwise come into the country, and does it not by that very act at the same time add largely to the price of those manufactured in the country? Otherwise it would be a revenue tariff which could, by no possibility, protect any man or industry; and if he considers that fact he will see that we, on this side, are perfectly accurate in stating—whether we be accurate as to the amount or not—that it is quite possible that a protective tariff which has produced a revenue of $2,000,000 or thereabouts will inflict on the people at large a tax of three or fourfold that amount. I will not occupy the time of the House, to-night, by going into details to show the exact amount at which an average farmer of Ontario, having a hundred acres of fair land, is taxed under the hon. gentleman's Tariff; but I repeat that in my judgment the effect of his Tariff would very nearly, perhaps quite, equal a mortgage of $10 an acre on every such farm in Ontario; because of the goods that farmer consumes, probably not one third are imported goods, although the price of the whole is raised by the hon. gentleman's Tariff. I invite, Sir, the sharpest discussion of the fact of the true incidence of the Tariff on the agricultural population, and I invite it all the more because I am aware that the credit system which so largely prevails in Canada, has, up to this time, greatly concealed from the minds of farmers the true effect of the oppressive Tariff the hon. gentleman has subjected them to. Sir, all through the rural districts of Ontario the farmers are finding themselves, by the policy of the hon. gentleman, seriously handicapped, and the farmers of Ontario, as the statistics I quoted from the report of the Minister on education show, are going elsewhere, and the hon. gentleman and his policy, although not solely, are largely responsible for that unfortunate fact. Why, Sir, to-day, in all the old Provinces of Canada, the population is either stationary or diminishing in the rural districts. That fact was but too apparent to those who chose critically to scan the census returns of 1871; and if the census returns of 1881 be honestly taken, I fear that they will confirm a great many of the statements I have made. We have a very heavy taxation; we have a very keen competition with the United States, and although in some respects living may still be cheaper here than there, yet it is well known that in a great many employments wages there are higher and the chances of advancement are greater than here. Now, we know that to-day there is occurring a great upheaval in all European nations. Within the last few years several of these nations have been afflicted with severe scarcity, amounting almost to famine. In France, in Germany, in Austria, in Russia, and to a great extent in Italy, the people are groaning under the heavy burdens imposed on them by the necessity of keeping a large portion of their population under arms. They are desirous—and this remark we must apply also to a large portion of the population of the British Isles—of seeking new homes. We possess vast quantities of fertile land, only awaiting industrious laborers, and now within a comparatively short distance by rail of our own territory. Well, Sir, here are the means if wisely and discreetly used of obtaining a large addition to our population and improving the condition of Canada. How do the Government of Canada avail themselves of this favorable conjunction of circumstances? A few weeks ago the Government of Canada, in their wisdom, determined to lock up a vast quantity of their most valuable land. They determined, a year or two ago, enormously to increase our taxation. By so doing they have given every imaginable handle to our competitors and one which will be used to the utmost by the agents of the United States, who can point cut to immigrants coming to our shores that they come to a country where they will meet with a great land monopoly, a great railway monopoly, and a great trade monopoly, evils of which they have had bitter experience in their own countries. To every immigrant who comes to Canada, desiring to settle in our North-West, you, in effect, say that you will make everything he requires to purchase dear, and that, so far as in you lies, you will deprive him of a large part of the profit on everything he raises. The hon. gentleman told us, I suppose by way of anticipating the discussion that he knew would come, that he looked, of all things in the world, on the present position of the imports of coal as the best proof of the success of his policy. The present position of the imports of coal, says that hon. gentleman, is, to his mind, a proof that the duty on coal has succeeded in greatly fostering an international trade. In 1878, he says, and correctly enough, there were imported 863,000 tons of coal; in 1879, 889,000, and last year 973,000. And the fact that under his additional taxation we import nearly 100,000 tons more of coal is given by the hon. gentleman as evidence that he has succeeded in encouraging mining in Nova Scotia, seeing that he proceeded to show there is a greatly increased consumption of coal produced in Nova Scotia. Well, Sir, I have not access to his statistics, but I should like uncommonly to know, as he has got those statistics, of the 250,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal which is raised to-day and that was not raised before, how much came to Ontario to foster international trade? I rather think there are a good many more miles of railway in operation in the Maritime Provinces than there were a year or two ago, and I think there may have been a considerable increase in the consumption of coal in the Lower Provinces as the result. If he has not the statistics I think he would do well to be cautious in his assertions, but if he has them let him state to this House how many thousand tons of Nova Scotia coal have come to Ontario, and then he will be able to make some defence for one of the most odious sectional taxes which any Finance Minister ever ventured to impose on a country. I wonder, while he was about it, that he did not show the House the great benefits that have arisen from the tax on salt. Now, that is an industry in which I have some little concern as the representative of Centre Huron. In 1878, we imported 153,000,000 lbs. of salt. In 1879, though for a part of the year there was no tax, we imported 174,000,000 lbs.; in 1880, during which the tax has been in operation, we imported, by the Trade and Navigation returns, 212,000,000 lbs. of salt, free, I may remark, in all cases. Now, I think that was not exactly the sort of encouragement to the salt industry that my hon. friend behind me and my constituents understood was to result from the operation of the National Policy. I give this as an illustration of the mode in which those hon. gentlemen redeemed their promises by putting on a tax with such exemptions and limitations that it could by no possibility confer the smallest benefit on the industry they alleged they desired to foster. The hon. gentleman took credit to himself for an increase of trade from China and Japan. Now, I recollect that I was abused unmercifully for extinguishing, as was alleged, the vast and valuable tea trade from China and Japan which sailed up the St. Lawrence. I have been at the pains to see how many ships came from China and Japan to this country. I find by the Trade and Navigation Returns, that six ships came to British Columbia from China in ballast, and that, Sir, is the fruit of the trade with China and Japan. Certain Canadian merchants import, I believe, from China and Japan, in American vessels, delivering their cargoes at San Francisco and New York, certain quantities of tea, and that is the valuable trade which the hon. gentleman thought it so important to foster. Unless I am greatly misinformed by those engaged in the tea trade, the practical result has been to throw the trade more than ever into the hands of a few American importing houses. The hon. gentleman talks of his tax upon wheat. Well, Sir, I turn to the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I see that there were 1,000,000 bushels of wheat, or thereabout, imported into Canada and ground, I believe in bond, and afterwards I suppose an equivalent quantity under the regulations was re-exported. But I find that of all the wheat coming into Ontario, 4,558 bushels paid duty, a very great contribution, I have no doubt, to the farmers of Ontario. The hon. gentleman was good enough to give us a somewhat curious explanation, of the cause of the decline in sales of ships as to which I would like to hear my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Sir Albert J. Smith), pending the little duel which is to come off between them in that county, I understand, at some convenient day. Now, I find here in regard to the ship-building industry that we were able to sell $1,236,000 worth in 1878; and only $464,000 worth in 1880. Were I to adopt the same line of argument as the hon. gentleman, I would accuse him, as the hon. Minister of Railways—whom I am sorry not to see in his place—was wont to accuse me, of trampling out that industry so vital and so dear to the Maritime Provinces, by his ruthless and remorseless Tariff. I think there would be much more ground for such an accusation coming from this side of the House than there was in that accusation when made against me. Then, the hon. gentleman diverges into a long discussion on the way in which his sugar duties have operated. Now, Sir, before I proceed to deal with the statement made by the hon. gentleman on that head, I would like to call his attention and the attention of this House to a very curious series of remarks made by that hon. gentleman respecting some statements made by my own on this head. The hon. gentleman and myself, some few months ago, took occasion to air our views on the general position of the country in the western part of Canada. In doing so I took occasion to remark that the facts, as disclosed by the Gazette, would show that the people of Canada were being seriously imposed upon in this matter of the sugar duties, and I spoke as follows:

"In 1878, the amount of revenue received by the Dominion for sugar was $2,567,000. During 1879, in which year the Tariff had hardly come into operation, it was $2,554,581. During the present year, making allowance for all that British Columbia could consume, our total revenue from that article was only $2,015,000, a decrease of no less than $539,000 in the space of that one year. It must be remembered further that 25 per cent. was added to the Tariff on this article, and this must be included to show the actual difference between what the people had to pay and what the Treasury actually received. Adding this 25 per cent., which amounted to $638,000 they had a total amount of $1,177,000, which was being taken out of the pockets of the people of Canada to sustain one great monopoly in Montreal."

Now, Sir, I think that statement was tolerably clear and intelligible. I stated that the Ministry had increased the taxation 25 per cent., and that the people had lost $1,177,000, which is as nearly as possible the exact equivalent of one cent per pound. I gave details showing how these facts had been arrived at. I showed that the country got about $2,000,000 in duty and that it lost the sum that I named. What is the answer of the hon. Minister to that statement? I will read it from the Mail, so that there may be no dispute about the authority:

"Sir Richard Cartwright said that the duty on sugar was increased 25 per cent., that the price was increased to the consumer 3 to 3½ cents a pound, that every family of five or six using 250 to 300 lbs. a year, paid, in consequence of the increase of the price by three or three and a-half cents a pound, no less than from $7.50 to $9.50 per annum; as a tribute to sugar monopolists. Let me say that the duty has not increased 25 per cent.; that the increased price to the consumer is not three or three and a-half cents a pound, and that families do not use from 250 to 300 pounds of sugar per annum."

Now, as the hon. gentleman has invited this discussion, I call attention to the very extraordinary statement in which he has indulged. He says that he did not increase the duty 25 per cent. If you have a duty on any article of 10 per cent., and raise it to 12½, then you increase that duty undoubtedly 25 per cent.; and if he will go to the Tariff and perform the delicate arithmetical operation of multiplying the duty by four, he will find that, whereas the sugar duty was 40 per cent. under my regime, and he raised it 10 per cent., he has added exactly 25 per cent. to the duty. I do not say that he has put on a new tax of 25 per cent., but that he has increased the old 25 per cent. I hope this explanation will satisfy the hon. gentleman that I was within the record in stating that he had increased the duty 25 per cent. So in making this other statement that I had declared that each family in Canada had latterly to pay three cents per pound more for its sugar than before, surely the hon. gentleman, who had evidently my figures before him—because he declares in another part of his speech that I knew the total importation was about 116,000,000 lbs.—must have known that when I defined the loss as $1,177,000, it was quite impossible that that could represent more than one cent per lb. He appears to be unable to distinguish between these two simple propositions: that the loss to the people of Canada over and above the money that goes into the Treasury is one cent per lb., and that the duty on the sugar consumed by the people of Canada is 3 cents to 3½ cents per lb. These are not difficult things to distinguish. They were very clearly set forth in my speech, and have been clearly set forth in this House again and again. Then we come to the other point on which the hon. gentleman took exception to my argument, the farmers' consumption of sugar in Ontario. He declares that I gave a totally exaggerated estimate of the consumption in Ontario, when I stated that families of five or six, of the class of artisans or farmers, used, annually, about 250 to 300 lbs. Now, the hon. gentleman had recourse to a very common but very stupid mode of reply to that argument. He took the total consumption of sugar for the whole Dominion, which he rightly put at 116,000,000 lbs. Then he proceeds to divide that quantity by four millions, and finding that the result is about 30 lbs. per head, he says to me: "You, Sir, asserted that a particular class in a particular Province consumed a particular quantity of sugar, per family; that is quite impossible, because the whole Dominion at large, under totally different circumstances, only averages 30 lbs. per head." It is quite clear that the hon. gentleman has paid very little attention indeed, in this, as in most other matters, to the incidence of the Tariff on particular classes in particular Provinces. Had he looked a little closer into his own Trade Returns, and consulted the census, and called to mind, what he must have known of the habits of the people of his own and the other Maritime Provinces, he would have recognized three things: first, in the Province of Quebec there always has been a comparatively enormous production of maple sugar, which is largely used by many habitant families; in the next place the average consumption of sugar by the families of its farmers is nothing like so large as the average consumption of the corresponding class in Ontario, wholly apart from the question of maple sugar; and thirdly that in the Maritime Provinces there is a very large consumption of molasses, which takes the place of sugar, and is an article which is not used to any appreciable extent in Ontario. Had he considered these things, and remembered that the two classes in Ontario that I have mentioned are known to use large quantities of sugar, he would have seen that it was perfectly accurate to say what I did; or, at any rate, that he must use a different sort of argument to refute my assertion that the farmers and artisans of Ontario use a considerably larger portion of sugar than is used by the inhabitants of the Dominion at large. All these things appear to be new light to the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman has attempted to escape from one statement which is explicit enough, that he added 25 per cent. to the sugar duties, and has lost 20 per cent. of the revenue, by entering into a long and elaborate argument to show that, because we brought so much coal to Montreal, and because we employed so many coopers to make barrels for certain articles, that, therefore, in some mysterious way, the tax which he levied on the consumers of Ontario is fully returned to them, because it goes to benefit certain artisans in Montreal. I am glad that this enormous tax is not wholly productive of bad results; that when we lose one and a quarter million dollars a year, we get at least a very paltry return by giving employment to some 300 or 400 people somewhere. But I protest against his assuming that it is any particular consolation to my constituents or to the people of Ontario generally, that they are compelled to pay a million more for their sugar than a certain factory, may be kept in employment in Montreal. I do not dispute the hon. gentleman's statement that the average price of sugar in New York, free in bond, without the duty, is $6.30 to $6.50 for granulated sugar and qualities akin to that. But the price as sold by Redpath in Montreal amounts to about $9.75 per cwt., leaving $3.25 per cwt. to represent the incidence of the tax to our people; and as the great bulk of the sugar that they consume, when allowed to consume it according to their own choice, is not No. 14, but a very much higher quality, it is perfectly clear at this moment that the people of Canada are paying 3½ millions a year as a tax on the sugar they consume, of which about two-thirds goes to the Treasury, and the remainder is either wasted or absorbed by his pet monopolists of Montreal. And now let me say a word or two as to the hon. gentleman's estimates: For 1881 including supplementals, the total expenditure is placed at $25,773,000. To that, if we want to make a comparison with other years, I think we might fairly add the $400,000 which he claims for Dominion lands, which he now charges to Capital account, and which expenditure, in former years, was set down to Income account. Were we to do that we should find that the total Estimates amount to $26,173,000, and that does not include the sums carried forward under Orders in Council. With reference to the Supplemental Estimates I will only observe that I see in them no less than $140,000 more required for the Rivière du Loup Branch of the Intercolonial, $212,000 for the Indians, $43,000 for the Post Office, an additional $100,000 on Capital account for Dominion lands. I shall not at present detain the House by commenting upon some of those points further than to remark that they show very conclusively indeed how thoroughly unjustifiable were the charges made, not perhaps by the hon. gentleman himself, but by his supporters, against the late Administration for extravagance in the administration of affairs. But let us come to the Estimates for 1882, which amount to $26,389,000; allowing $200,000 which he tells us were accidentally omitted in the Estimates brought down, you have an increase mostly permanent of $884,000 in the course of a single year. You have, besides, a very heavy addition to be made to our debt of about $14,000,000; and I have observed that the hon. gentleman has neglected to close the Intercolonial Railway capital account, so there are still heavy sums which, owing to this neglect, can be charged to that account from time to time. I will take occasion, when the Estimates are considered, to discuss the question whether it would not be highly in the public interest that this account should be closed once for all, for I believe that so long as it remains open, it will be found an extremely easy mode of providing for charges which the hon. gentleman would not venture to make if compelled to charge it to Revenue account. I notice that no reference is made to the various sums in which the country may be mulcted on account of the extra charges on this Intercolonial Railway. I invite comparison, Mr. Speaker, between these Estimates and the Estimates brought down by the hon. Minister himself in 1879. Then the hon. gentleman thought that $23,427,000 would amply suffice for the expenditure of Canada. Now, Sir, within two years, we find that the hon. gentleman demands just $3,000,000 more than he stated with his own lips would be sufficient for the expenditure of 1880.

Well, Sir, $3,000,000, capitalized at 4 per cent., would be equivalent to $75,000,000 added to our gross debt, and, I say, that shows tolerably conclusively with what spirit of economy the hon. gentleman and his friends are bent on administering the affairs of this country. Let us compare the expenditure of 1878 with the amount which the hon. gentleman now demands. In that year we contrived to make $823,000 suffice for the Civil Government of this country. To-day the hon. gentleman demands $960,368, an increase of about $157,000 on Civil Government alone, as between the actual expenditure for 1878 and the estimated expense the hon. gentleman demands. Then for superannuation, of all things in the world—the superannuation which was grievously abused, for which we were so gravely denounced, not only by the hon. member for North Simcoe, but by a colleague of the hon. gentleman's—in 1878, we spent $106,588. This year I see that these economical gentlemen, who came in pledged to do away with our extravagance, want $155,000 for that service. Let me tell the hon. gentleman this, and he may do well to bear it in mind, that there is a grave and growing dissatisfaction throughout the length and breadth of Canada, at the steady increase of this charge, and the result may be that the people will insist on the whole system of superannuations being abolished altogether, and as I think it has, on the whole, answered well, I should be sorry to see his prodigal folly endanger a provision to which so many deserving civil servants look forward. For Indians we spent in 1878, $421,000. Last year the hon. gentleman expended $694,000, and he expects to spend $852,000 in the present year. There may be good cause for that expenditure. I reserve, until I hear full explanations, judgment upon it, but prima facie a change from an actual expenditure of $421,000 in 1878, to an estimated expenditure of $852,000 for Indians alone, is one which the hon. gentleman will find, perhaps, harder to justify than he now expects. I remember that the Post Office expenditure was made a subject of grave reproach to my hon. friend (Mr. Huntington) when he administered that Department in 1878. I find in that year he spent $1,724,000. To-day $1,943,000 are demanded—an increase of nearly a quarter of a million on a service which we were told had been extravagant to a degree. I find that, in Excise, with which we were also very seriously reproached, our actual expenditure in 1878 was $215,000, while to-day we are asked for $271,000 for the self-same service. Briefly, what has the hon. gentleman done? Coming into office with an expenditure of $23,500,000, ascertained expenditure—and his own estimate was slightly under that figure—he proposes to increase it to $26,389,000, and provides for additional charges which, as he well knows, will amount in a few years to $2,000,000 a year more added to our annual fixed charges. I do not say this is all unnecessary, but I do say that a good deal of it is needless, that a great deal of our prospective charges are wholly and entirely unnecessary, and I call the attention of the House, as I have more than once before, to the excessive disproportion which the fixed charges on the revenue of Canada bear even to the large receipts which the hon. gentleman anticipates obtaining. I find that our charges for interest, for subsidies, for charges of management, all fixed charges, amount to no less than $12,847,555 a year. I see that what are known as Charges on Revenue amount to $5,592,000, and these are charges which, as the House knows, can hardly be discontinued or even considerably reduced. The fixed charges for Indians—exclusive of the extraordinary charges to which I have alluded—amount to $500,000 more. So we have about $18,966,000 of fixed charges. This may be borne in good times, but the hon. gentleman will find it a very grave burthen if it be his unfortunate lot, as it was mine, to have to contend with times of general depression. Then he will find reduction most difficult, and his successors will find it difficult. This is but a repetition of that old folly which induced the hon. gentleman's predecessors and his colleagues to avail themselves without the slightest consideration of every temporary increase of revenue to make enormous additions to the fixed charges of the country. Even if the hon. gentleman should be successful in maintaining the revenue at the standard he expects, he runs a great danger, in any unexpected emergency of finding himself crippled by that large addition to our fixed charges. It must be expected in the ordinary course of events that what are known as the ordinary charges will increase from time to time. We have the hon. gentleman's own estimate of revenue at $27,000,000, and of fixed charges $19,000,000, with a certainty that the fixed charges will be increased before many years are over by from one to two millions more. Although, without doubt, there is a very considerable amount of prosperity, and consequent increase of the revenue, at the present time, the condition of things shown by that statement of facts is very far, indeed, for being as reassuring as I could wish, and very far from warranting us in making such a large addition to the fixed charges of this country. Were I to venture upon any forecast in reference to this matter, I would say that there is, in my judgment, considerable danger that one or other of these things may happen—that our manufacturers may manufacture a large proportion of the goods we now import, and that consequently the hon. gentleman may find his revenue very largely reduced from that cause; or, we may have, as we have had before, extraordinary depressions of various interests, such as the lumbering interest, and the export of cattle and animal products, and then may come in consequence of over-production all over this continent, or better seasons in Europe, a period of difficulty and contraction; and then, all these large expenditures which the hon. gentleman is now indiscreetly lending his authority and countenance to, will become very difficult to reduce, either by him or any one else. In many cases they cannot be reduced at all, and he is preparing for a period when, with far less recuperative power, we may have a worse condition of things than that which he so severely condemns, which existed when the late Administration was in power. There are two or three other questions, which I can hardly sit down without alluding to to some small extent, and notably among these is the question of our trade relations with the United States. Now, I confess, Sir, that it was with some feelings of astonishment and surprise that I heard the hon. gentleman read, from the Trade and Navigation Returns, the statement of our imports from the United States, and heard him point out to the House that there had been the enormous reduction of $14,000,000 in the imports from the United States in 1879-80. Now, I do not desire to accuse the hon. gentleman of deliberately misleading the House, I will therefore suppose that his own attention has not been called to the point, but I think the hon. Minister of Customs, who sits beside him could tell him that had these trade and navigation returns been compiled in the same way in 1880 as in 1879 the difference between our nominal imports from the United States in 1880 and in 1879, instead of being $14,000,000 would have read as $1,000,000. Had the imports been stated in the same way in 1880 as in 1879, our imports from the United States would have been $42,000,000 instead of $29,000,000. The hon. gentleman ought to know, and he must know, that a very large proportion of the $43,000,000 he spoke of in 1879 were goods in transit through Canada from the United States to Great Britain, and that it is quite absurd to talk of a reduction of $14,000,000 in two years when it was in all probability a matter of but $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 at the outside. Now, Sir, what is the actual fact? I know these trade and navigation returns contain the figures the hon. gentleman gives, but I know how they are made up, and I think the hon. gentleman ought to have informed the House of the material difference which had occurred in the mode of making these returns, which might otherwise mislead; not only himself, but other persons in this country. In 1880 we find our imports of dutiable goods from the United States amounted to $19,560,000 in round numbers; in 1879 they were $23,693,000. Now, that is a very material reduction, but vastly smaller than anybody not conversant with the mode of making up the trade and navigation returns would gather from the statement of the hon. gentleman. What was our trade with Great Britain in these several years? Well, Sir, in 1880 we imported $28,038,000 of dutiable goods, and in 1879, $27,026,000. Now, our exports to Great Britain in 1880 were $45,000,000, and when you deduct the amount of American goods in transitu the exports were $35,208,000. And in like manner in 1879, though the nominal amount of our exports was $36,500,000, our real exports were $29,333,000. The consequence is that the great improvement in our trade with Great Britain, of which the hon. gentleman speaks, resulted in this, that of our own goods in 1879, we sold to Great Britain 29½ millions and bought 31 millions, and of our own goods we sold in 1880 35½ millions and bought 34½ millions. I do not think that shows a very great development of our trade with Great Britain, 1½ millions more bought than sold in one year, and in the other year three-quarters of a million less. I am not discussing whether that is a good or a bad thing; I am discussing simply the fact whether it is a proof of a relative increase in our trade with Great Britain. Well, Sir, turn to the exports to the United States. You will find that of our own goods, deducting coin and bullion and American goods which passed through Canada from one part of the United States to the other, we exported $29,566,000. The total imports from the United States, dutiable and non-dutiable, including coin, which amounted to $1,100,000, is $29,346,000. In other words, deducting the coin, we sold to the United States 29½ millions approximately, and we bought from the United States 28½ millions approximately. But, Sir, if the hon. gentleman, in his zeal for statistics, would direct a little attention to ascertain approximately or even roughly, the amount of smuggled goods brought in from the United States to this country, I am afraid the hon. gentleman will find the trade balance, of which he thinks so much, is very seriously against us in favour of the United States. It need not be necessarily a loss to us, according to my way of looking at it; but I can assure the hon. gentleman that if he chooses to make inquiries as to what is going on in the Eastern Townships, at the fishing ports and villages of the Maritime Provinces, along the River St. Lawrence and at various other points at which our frontier approaches the American frontier, the hon. gentleman or the Minister of Customs, I have no doubt, could ascertain facts enough to show that I am within the mark in saying that the total amount of goods we import from the United States is very considerably in excess of those we sell them. And I may add that the nominal reduction in our imports from the United States arises mainly from the fact that, to our own great loss as a people, we persist or insist on manufacturing our own sugar, in the place of importing it, as we did before, through the United States. That is a point on which the hon. Minister of Finance and myself may agree to differ. I do not think it is good policy to spend nearly $1,250,000 for the purpose of employing 300 or 400 hands. The hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) truly said the other day, it would pay us well to pension off these people at $300 or $400 a head, and then we would gain all these miscellaneous benefits which he believes would flow from giving employment to that number of people in Montreal, and would save about a million to the revenue. The hon. Minister of Finance estimates, I perceive, that we have added 14,000 people to the number employed in the various manufactories he has enumerated. With the exception of the article of cotton, the hon. gentleman was rather careful not to give us in detail the number of hands. I do not object to that particular statement. I think he is likely to be accurate in the number of hands employed in the cotton factories; but I would ask him if he has the information to give it to us in a little more detail, and lay it on the Table of the House, in such a way as to show the number of factories, the date at which they were opened, and the number of hands employed. When he stated that 14,000 additional hands are employed I cannot doubt that the hon. gentleman was in full possession of all these details, and surely the House might fairly expect to be put in possession of them too. The fact of the matter is this, that a very large amount indeed of the increased production and employment which the hon. Minister of Finance talks of, and which I dare say exists, arise simply from the causes to which I alluded in the early part of my speech. Our people have gained in the last year a great deal of money. They have sold more raw products, they have been able to buy more goods, and from that most natural cause wholly apart from the National Policy, or any policy, there arose a considerable expansion of domestic manufactures. The hon. gentleman need not go far afield to find that which is plain and clear. The hon. Minister says: "I have other tests of the good effects of my policy; look how the stocks have risen within the last few months!" Why could not the hon. gentleman, when comparing the prices of stocks, take September 18th, 1878, for instance, and compare the prices then with the prices to-day. I doubt if the hon. gentleman would have found very material difference between the prices of our leading stocks on those dates and their prices to-day; and I may tell the hon. gentleman that I would like to know, not so much whether the prices had gone up as whether the dividends had increased, if I was desirous of ascertaining how far the prosperity of the country had really benefitted those institutions. The fact is there has been a great reduction in the rate of interest on money; there has been an abundance of money at the various great centres of the world and the consequence is that a portion of it has overflowed here, and the price of these securities has risen, not because the hon. gentleman is Finance Minister, or because I have been out of that department, but from other causes which were beyond his or my control. He takes another test. He calls attention to the price of our securities, and to the relative condition of our taxation and that of the Australian Colonies. That is a subject which had engaged my attention in former years, and a good deal too. I remember very well, when I had occasion to visit London, making an inquiry into the condition of those Australian Colonies. The hon. gentleman's figures, as he gives them, may be true enough. They correspond substantially with the figures I obtained a few years ago. But the hon. gentleman forgot two or three things. When he talks of the debts of the Australian Colonies, and compares them with the debt of Canada, he would do well to tell the House that their debt presses much lighter on them than ours does on us, because a great many of their public works are highly productive, and afford a very considerable portion of the revenue. The consequence is that the money which has been spent in building those works is not dead capital from which there is no return, but an investment from which a very fair return is derived, directly as well as indirectly by the Australian Governments. That is a factor which cannot be eliminated in comparing the debts of those colonies with ours. No more can the fact be disregarded that their export and import trade per head is very much larger than ours; they are very considerably richer than we are, from certain natural advantages which they possess. But the hon. gentleman further took occasion to contrast the price of Government securities. Well, Sir, I have here the prices of United States and Canadian securities on the 29th of January, 1881. The hon. gentleman appears to have been perfectly correct in saying that the United States 4 per cents. were quoted at 115½ to 116, which, as he very truly said, did not differ very much from the value of Canadian 4 per cents. at 103 to 104; but how was it that the hon. gentleman forgot to read the next line, in which United States 4 per cents. are quoted at 116½ to 117 in the same identical column of the same identical price current. Now, the fact is that for certain reasons, the 4½ per cents. having a shorter time to run, and not being a large security, are not in such favor in the market; but the United States 4 per cents. at 116 to 117, are much higher than our 4 per cents. at 103 to 104. I am glad that our 4 per cents are quoted so well, but the next time the hon. gentleman goes to compare our securities with American securities, he would do well to quote the prices of the two identical securities. I perceive that the hon. gentleman is not altogether without bowels of compassion for us. He has heard that many of us were suffering from this tariff, and he does give us some little reduction, some little encouragement. I have not time, although the Minister of Customs was kind enough—and I am very much obliged to him—to give me a copy of these resolutions, to go through all these changes, particularly as we shall have opportunities to do so hereafter, so I shall say very little about the increases he proposes, especially as most of them are practically modifications of the existing law or explanations of it; but I think we may thank the hon. gentleman for what he has done for us in the way of additions to the free list. No doubt the House and the country will be glad to know that, from and after this date, manilla beans will be free, and nux vomica will be free too. Has the hon. gentleman any designs on this side of the House? Does he think that, overwhelmed at the success of the National Policy, we shall, in sheer despair, have recourse to the old Roman mode of ending our troubles, that he consents to make nux vomica free? Moreover, I see cocoa nuts are to be admitted free also, and thereby, as the trade returns show, the communication between the West Indies and this country is to be greatly improved. I see we imported 266,000 cocoa nuts in 1880, value about six or eight thousand dollars. I am not aware exactly what the cocoa nut weighs, but I am inclined to think this would represent a net import of about 150 tons, speaking roughly, and doubtless an import of 150 tons of cocoa nuts from the West Indies will go a long way to encourage intercolonial trade between those dependencies of Great Britain and Canada. For one thing I thank him or the Syndicate—he has given us one year longer free steel. After all, he thought it was impossible to propose that the Syndicate should be permitted to import those articles free, and all others compelled to pay duty, and, therefore, my thanks are divided between the Finance Minister and the Syndicate for that boon. Now, these hon. gentlemen were good enough on all occasions to promise us that whatever else they might or might not do, they would take care that from this time out Canada should be for the Canadians. That was their battle cry. That was the motto they inscribed on their banner on all the hustings they attended, and we have had, not specially to-night, but since this Parliament met, the most remarkable illustration of the practical mode in which these gentlemen give effect to the statement that Canada, from henceforth, is to be for the Canadians. To-day, by Royal assent lately given, some of the most valuable portions of our whole North-West Territory are absolutely the property of a foreign corporation, with power to transfer it to-morrow to any other foreigners they please in any part of the world, with such monopolies and advantages as no corporation ever dreamed of obtaining or ever succeeded in obtaining before. We were to have Confederation solidified. We were to have all the various jarring elements of our widely extended Dominion brought into harmony. The hon. gentleman insisted that the great benefit of his policy would be found in this, that he would remove dissatisfaction between these widely separated communities—that he was going to bring the east close to the west—that the privilege of paying 60 cents additional for Nova Scotian coal was going to endear the Nova Scotian miner to the artisan of Toronto—and in one sense it has—and that the effect of this Tariff was to give all possible inducements to every portion of the Dominion to submit peaceably to the taxation which he imposed. I would like, Sir, by way of illustration of the mode in which it strikes our distant brethren, to read to the hon. gentleman a resolution passed at a meeting of the constituents of the present Prime Minister, no longer ago than the 24th of November last :

RESOLVED—“That the Dominion tariff, however beneficial it may be to the Eastern Provinces, is an injury to British Columbia as it weighs heavily on the great producing interests of the Province and has destroyed the large trade previously done by Victoria in British goods with the adjoining States and territories of the United States, and has failed to create or encourage any new industry.”

That, Sir, taken in connection with the petition that was not long ago presented to the hon. gentleman himself from the city of St. John, affords a tolerably clear evidence of the mode in which his exertions are bearing fruit in the furthest portions of this Dominion. The hon. gentleman told us that he was going to give us a home market, and, by way of practical fulfilment, I tell him that whether the United States statistics be correct or not, there is no doubt that an enormous number of the people of Ontario have been obliged to remove from that Province and seek employment and occupation elsewhere. Sir, we find our debt accumulating at a very rapid rate. That debt to-day may or may not be a little more than $160,000,000, but the hon. gentleman shows quite clearly that within the space of a very few years that debt will reach not less than $200,000,000; and although I will not say that that is a greater burden than the people of Canada can bear, yet I do say it is a great debt to lay on the people, more particularly when the policy of the hon. gentleman is deliberately preventing us from bringing into this country a population which would share that burden with us. Of all the great industries his policy was intended to benefit, I ask again, which one has he succeeded in showing that he has assisted in the least degree? Even he cannot pretend that the lumber trade, from the expansion of which we have derived most of our new revenue, has benefitted at his hands; even he can only plead that he has not damaged it much. For the agriculturists, I have the farmers and their representatives on the floor of this House; for shipbuilding, his friends from the Maritime Provinces, and his own Trade Returns, will bear ample testimony to his efforts. What has been done for the fisheries? What has been done for mining? Where and when and how can he show that he or his Tariff has, in any shape or way, conferred any real serious benefit on any of those industries upon which a greater number of people depend for their subsistence than on any manufactories which have been, or are at all likely to be, encouraged or created in this country? Sir, I wish I could believe that this policy had been entered upon by this gentleman, or his colleagues, from an honest enthusiasm, or from a real belief that they were doing, on the whole, the best thing they could do for their country; but although I do not know what the hon. gentleman's sentiments may have been before Confederation, I do know what were the sentiments afterwards expressed by many of his colleagues on this subject, and I say this: that I do not believe I do them any injustice when I say that this thing has been taken up wholly and solely as a political cry, not because they honestly believe protection to be right and free trade to be wrong, but because they saw that it afforded them a better opportunity of making a successful raid on the Treasury benches than they otherwise would have possessed. I say if the hon. gentleman's object be to disgust our people, to incline our people to alter their political relations by preparing them first to enter into a commercial Zollverein, and afterwards into a political union with the United States, the hon. gentleman is likely to attain his end, as not a few of those gentlemen who encourage him know and believe. If, on the other hand, his object is merely to maintain himself in place, I tell the hon. gentleman that he and his colleagues have failed, not so much in this particular matter as from the odious measure which they have forced on an unwilling country a short time ago. But if his object be, as he says it is, to establish an important nation on this continent, I say from first to last his conduct, and the conduct of his friends, is marked by a perverse ingratitude which that is scarcely imaginable, although I hope in spite of his policy, in spite of those mistakes, in spite of the errors he has committed, Canada may become a great and important State; although I hope that—and I say in some respects it is hoping against hope—it is not by a policy involving the grossest possible injustice to every Province and every community, that we can expect to create a great and important state under the conditions which surround us here. Sir, I am sorry, indeed, to see my native country committed to a policy of retrogression which can only lead in the long run to the degradation of our people and to their serious injury; a policy which is not merely retrograde in its fiscal aspect, but is retrograde in every imaginable shape and way; a policy which has assisted in introducing to this country not merely trade monopolies which would disgrace the days of the Plantagenets and Tudors, but land monopolies worse than those from which the older countries of Europe are trying harder and harder, day by day, to emancipate themselves—and in addition those new monopolies of modern growth which the neighboring Republic finds it so difficult to deal with. I have to apologize to the House for having detained them so long, and I shall take an early opportunity to discuss in detail those minor proposals.

Mr. PLUMB moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to; and (at 11:55 o'clock, p.m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MONDAY, 21st February, 1881.

PRAYERS.

BILL INTRODUCED.

The following Bill was introduced and read the first time:—

Bill (No. 63) to incorporate the Montreal Board of Trade and Exchange (from the Senate).—(Mr. Girouard, Jacques Cartier.)

CRIMINAL JUSTICE IN DISPUTED TERRITORY.

Mr. McDONALD (Pictou) introduced a Bill (No. 64) to continue in force for a limited time the Act passed in the forty-third year of Her Majesty's reign, intitled: “An Act respecting the administration of Criminal Justice in the Territory in dispute between the Government of the Province of Ontario and the Dominion of Canada.”

Mr. BLAKE. For how long?

Mr. McDONALD. For only one year.

Mr. ANGLIN. That has not become part of Ontario.

Mr. McDONALD. Not yet.

Bill read the first-time.

INDEPENDENCE OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. BLAKE, in introducing a Bill (No. 65) to secure the independence of Parliament, said: The object of the Bill is to accomplish a result which I suggested in the debate on the Address, to prescribe as an act which is inconsistent with the retention of the seat of a member, his acting for profit or reward as the representative of persons in an application to the Government or in the settlement of differences between persons and the Government of Canada, or any of the departments of that Government.

Bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

The following Bill was considered in Committee, and reported:—

Bill (No. 7) to incorporate the Wrecking and Salvage Company of Canada—(Mr. Gault.)

The following Bill was considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed.—

Bill (No. 40) to incorporate the Bay of Quinté Railway and Navigation Company—(Mr. White, Hastings.)

The following Bill was read the second time:—

Bill (No. 61) to incorporate the Peace River Railway Company—(Mr. Macdougall.)

THE GEOLOGICAL MUSEUM.

Mr. GAULT enquired, Have the Government given instructions to the staff presently engaged in removing the Geological Museum from the city of Montreal, to leave behind them the duplicate specimens, and into whose hands are they committed for safe keeping?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is the intention of the Government that duplicates shall remain at Montreal, but it has not yet been decided in whose hands they shall be left.

WHEAT ON THE SHIP "BOYNE."

Mr. GAULT enquired, Have the Government collected the duty on a cargo of wheat wrecked on board the ship Boyne; and if so, what is the amount collected?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I am unable to give my hon. friend an answer to that question. I have telegraphed to Quebec to ascertain whether the duty was paid, and what amount, but I have not yet received an answer.

CULTIVATION OF THE BEET ROOT.

Mr. BOURBEAU enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to procure the publication of pamphlets on the cultivation of the beet root, and to cause the said pamphlets to be distributed among farmers?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is now under the consideration of the Government.

THE PACIFIC RAILWAY LAND.

Mr. BLAKE enquired, Has any application been made on behalf of the Syndicate for an alteration in the free grant and pre-emption system at present in force as to the alternate blocks along the line of the Pacific Railway? Has any understanding been reached on the subject? Has the Government decided on any change in this matter?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No application has been made on the part of the Syndicate for any alteration. No understanding has been reached on the subject, and the Government have not decided to make any change in the present arrangement.

LICENSES FOR THE SALE OF CANADIAN TOBACCO.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to issue licenses to merchants who should wish to buy Canadian tobacco in leaf?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. No application has so far been made to that effect; but were merchants to apply for licenses to buy Canadian tobacco in leaf, their application would be favorably entertained; but they would not be allowed to retail such tobacco; leave to buy tobacco in leaf would be only granted them as agents or middlemen between growers and manufacturers.

MAILS BETWEEN ST. JOHN AND BANGOR.

Mr. BURPEE (Sunbury), in the absence of Mr. WELDON enquired, Whether the Government intend to arrange for mails being carried on the night trains on the St. John and Maine Railway, between St. John and Bangor?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Arrangements have been made with the St. John and Maine Railway Company by the Postmaster General for carrying the night mail.

IMPORTATION OF TOBACCO SEED.

Mr. VANASSE enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to import tobacco seed from France or other countries, with a view of improving the culture of that plant in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. MOUSSEAU. The Government has not any such intention.

CARBURETTED HYDROGEN.

Mr. LANDRY enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to cause an examination to be made, by the Geological Commission, of that part of the Province of Quebec in which large quantities of carburetted hydrogen issue from fissures in the soil, and more particularly at Varennes, Louiseville and Yamachiche, and along the St. Maurice?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. This is the first time this matter has been brought to the notice of the Government; they will take it into consideration.

EXPROPRIATIONS ON THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. SCHULTZ enquired, Whether it is the intention of the Government to settle at an early date with parties whose lands have been expropriated at the Red River crossing of the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. It is the intention of the Government to do so.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES TROUBLE.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved for copies of the correspondence between the Governments of Great Britain and the United States, concerning the alleged violation of the rights of United States' citizens by Newfoundland fishermen. Also, copies of correspondence between the Newfoundland Government and the Imperial Government. Also, copies of all correspondence between the Imperial and Dominion Governments respecting that subject. He said: I first beg to express my acknowledgments to the House for their kindness in permitting this motion to remain on the paper during my absence. It may be supposed, from the terms of the motion, that I am asking for some papers which do not strictly fall within the scope of this Government and to Parliament; but as I look upon all matters respecting the fisheries of Newfoundland as seriously affecting the whole fishing interest and the interests of the Dominion, I take it for granted that

The Government have secured copies of the correspondence that I have asked for, besides any that may have passed between this Government and the Imperial Government. It is tolerably evident, from the spirit manifested in the United States Congress, that they are disposed to push matters to extremes, and to insist upon the attainment of their object by the violation of municipal laws in our Dominion. Although Newfoundland is no part of the Dominion, I think it is the duty of this Government to watch with extreme care all that passes with relation to the fisheries of that Province, as concessions may be made, or principles admitted, which may very materially affect the other Provinces in British North America at a very early date. I would be glad to know from the Government what correspondence there is, and what ground the Government have taken on the subject, or if any representation has been made of the character I have referred to.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. At the time it was expected that the hon. gentleman's notice would be moved, the leader of the Government was in his place and was ready to give an answer. As he is not here I am not in a position to state as clearly as he would have stated the nature of the correspondence. I can only say to my hon. friend that any correspondence that may have taken place, and that can be submitted, I am quite sure will be submitted.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Can the hon. gentleman say whether the Government of Canada have taken the ground to sustain the action of the Newfoundland Government?

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Speaking from memory, I am under the impression that no special action was taken by Order in Council on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

HARBOR DUES AT MONTREAL.

Mr. McCUAIG, in the absence of Mr. RYKERT, moved for a return of all correspondence between the Government and the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal in reference to the dues at said port, and the charges for towage of vessels towed to and from the said harbor; also, all correspondence in connection with the enlargement of the canals and the opening up of communication between the seaboard and the inland waters of the Dominion, for sea-going vessels; also, all correspondence and petitions in connection with the reduction of tolls on the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLAKE. I suppose this is because the hon. member in whose name the notice stands is absent. If it is to be understood that this is a sufficient reason for adjourning the debate, we had better drop the rule which requires these motions to be proceeded with after they remain. I think the motion ought to be dropped altogether or else proceeded with.

Mr. McCUAIG. The hon. member, Mr. Rykert, asked me to move this motion and then allow it to stand.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I think we ought to treat this motion fairly. No doubt the hon. member who is absent desires to give his reasons for asking for this correspondence. It seems to me to be regular enough, since a debate has been commenced.

Mr. MILLS. I do not think that observation is suitable under the circumstances. The hon. gentleman put a notice on the paper and is not here to move it when it is called. According to our rule that notice should be dropped. As the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) has said, we might as well abrogate the rule altogether as to adopt this practice of evading it.

Mr. MACKENZIE.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The hon. member has a right to put that motion to the House, and then if another hon. member asks for the adjournment of the debate, I think it is quite regular.

Mr. BLAKE. I did not say it was irregular, but I asked why it was to be adjourned, and the answer came that it was because the hon. gentleman was absent. I stated that that proceeding was an evasion of the rule of the House, and I say so still.

Mr. McCALLUM. This is a question of great importance to the trade of the country, and I would like to see the debate adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

THE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. BERGIN moved for a return shewing the revenue derived from the Weights and Measures Branch of the Inland Revenue Department, and the expenditure on account of that branch since its establishment; also, accounts in detail of all instruments purchased for the use of the Weights and Measures Department, and of the expenses, on two occasions, to England, of the Commissioner of Inland Revenue; also, of the salaries paid to officers of the said branch. He said: In asking for this return I shall draw attention to the expenses of this branch of the Inland Revenue Department since its establishment, in 1873. I do so, not with the intention of casting blame either upon the late or the present Government, but for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House to the frightful cost of this branch, and the comparatively small revenue derived from it. I say comparatively because, although it was not anticipated in the first instance that any very large revenue, at all events, in excess of the expenditure, would be derived from it, it was always hoped the revenue would, at least, nearly balance the expenditure. Since 1873-4 we find that the expense has amounted to $529,823, and the revenue to but $123,911, or an excess of expenditure of $406,000. I ask the House, cui bono? No department of the public service is so odious to the people as this branch of the Inland Revenue Department. Nothing but complaints are heard in every town and hamlet. That arises not from the law, but from the administration of the law, which has been bad since the outset, and though the administration has improved during the last year or two, the law would, if it the feelings of the people were consulted, be struck off the Statute-book. Extravagance has ruled in that department since its initiation down to to-day. I find that $95,141.63 have been paid for instruments, almost one-tenth of which would have been sufficient for the absolute requirements of the department. There are over one hundred instruments for these deputy inspectors to go about the country with annoying people without conferring any benefit in return. The number of inspectors is sixty under the present system, and under the old ninety-three, with salaries ranging from $500 to $1,200. I would like to see some substantial proof of the benefit the country has derived from their labors. The returns show that inspections have been made in every county, township and town in this Dominion, and almost without exception the reports show that the weights and scales were correct. If I understand the law correctly, the inspectors had no right to make any charges against these people, if their weights, scales and measures proved to be correct, yet we know that extortion of the worst kind has been practiced on many, the charges in some instances amounting to from $20 to $25, not for adjusting the scales, weights and measures, because they were found to be correct, but to put money into the pockets of people who had no right, under the law, to make those extortionate charges. I think it is well that some means should be taken to protect people against dishonest traders, but it is also well that the public should be protected against dishonest officers. In direct contravention of the rules of the department, these officers order dealers to bring their weights and measures to the hotel, or to the place at which they are stopping, where those weights and measures are sometimes kept a whole week whilst being adjusted, thus stopping the business of some towns and villages for that time. In the county where I reside, after the weights and measures had been adjusted by one inspector, another inspector came in the same year and had the weights and measures all inspected over again, at a varying charge of from $1 to $8 00. Is that the object for which the department was instituted? On looking over the list of instruments purchased in the old country, I am astonished at the prices paid for some of them. To Sir Joseph Whitworth, a great gun maker, I find we paid $260.86 for a measuring machine. That instrument, which was purchased in 1878, has, I think, never been used and never will be used. For thermometers we paid $19.22; they could have been bought here much cheaper. For standard barometers, we paid $217.22, that might have been bought here just as good at less money. In 1874 and 1875 we bought engraving machines, and we bought measuring instruments and standard balances, the whole amounting to $9,929.47. I would like to have an explanation of this expenditure. One may make the tour of this Inland Revenue Department, and will find instruments that cost thousands of dollars, and that have never been used, lying idly behind tables and curtains. I do not think it is worth while to read through this long list of instruments purchased, nor would it be well, perhaps, to shock the country too much by reading the list and prices paid. The apparatus of the gas branch cost $30,096.34. We have gas inspectors in some parts of the country who have nothing to do. I believe in this district, except in the city, there is no gas at all. In connection with the purchase of these instruments in England, it is worth while to direct the attention of the House to the fact that these instruments should have been guaranteed perfect by the manufacturers, instead of our having had to pay for their verification. To H. W. Chisholm, for verification, we paid $713.85, and an advance on account of $486.67; to T. D. King we paid $200; to H. J. Chancey, for books for verification, $88.73; to H. W. Chisholm, for verification expenses, $1,192.33; due by him, $486.67; for sundries, $28.55; or total charges in connection with verification, $3,196.53. With the exception of $288.73, the whole amount was paid to H. W. Chisholm, and this was for work which ought to have been paid for by the manufacturers. When we pay at the rate of $100,000, the least the manufacturers should do, would be to guarantee their correctness. The country is not at all satisfied with the manner in which this inspection is performed. It would be well if the Government could revert to the old system, which it cannot, that of each county appointing its inspecting officers, great satisfaction would result, and a system which the people entirely disapprove of, and which brings the Government into greater disrepute than almost any other, would be done away with. I speak feelingly on this point, and because every man who uses weights, measures and scales in my constituency and in the neighbouring counties, feels that I should not mince matters in dealing with this subject. So I say to the House what these people say to me: that they look upon this as a scheme of robbery on the part of the officers of this department. I think that they go entirely too far, because I believe that many of those officers are honest, and err through ignorance; I know that those officers who force the dealers to bring their scales to their offices for inspection, act in direct violation of the regulations of the department, because they are instructed not to do so, but to go to the stores and inspect the scales, and not put the dealers to any inconvenience in the matter. And if we look to the salaries paid to the officers in the different districts, and compare them with the small amounts they return to the department, we must say that most of the money is expended in keeping employes in office, who do next to nothing in return for their salaries. I am not putting it too strongly when I say there is a feeling in the country of intense dissatisfaction with the management of this department. It is believed that this branch of the Inland Revenue Department was established mainly to please the whim of the deputy head, who is looked upon, shall I say it, as almost a monomaniac on this point. There is no concealing the fact that he is a strong man, who has ruled almost every head of the department, and been the only man who has made anything by it. He had a large addition made to his salary for the purpose of conducting that branch, and he has a son or two in the department assisting him in its management. These are the people who are making money out of this system, and not the poor district officers after all, because they are paid by salaries, and their fees come back to the department. I think I am doing the Government a great service in bringing up this matter, because the heads of the department have been in the habit of relying upon the deputy head all along for faithful and honest reports as to everything that concerns the department. But it is not in the interest of the officers who are drawing large salaries and have whims, crutches, and designs to draw the attention of the Government to grievances which are rapidly injuring the Government in the estimation of the people. Unless something is done by the Government to remedy this matter, a great deal of trouble will be created in the country. There will be protests before this Parliament has expired from almost every section against this weights and measures branch of the Inland Revenue Department, and I think it would be well, even at the cost of superannuating the deputy head of the department, to get rid of the odium that the operation of this measure entails.

Mr. RYAN (Montreal). I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. friend from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) with reference to the effect of this law, than which, I think, there has been none more important passed of late years. I believe that it works well and is growing in the favor of the people every day. As a representative of the first commercial city in the Dominion, I have heard of no such dissatisfaction with the Act, as the hon. gentleman reports. If the deputy head of the department is a monomaniac, he has a method in this madness, because he takes good care to provide for several members of his family in the department. I believe there is not on the Statute-book a law more in the interest of the country than the Weights and Measures Act. Every honest trader must approve of the inspection of weights and measures. With regard to the alleged enormous expenditure in connection with this Act, it never was contemplated by any Government—certainly not by that of 1873, which introduced it, nor by the late Government, which put the Act into force—that the revenue derived from its administration would be sufficient to cover the expenses in connection with it. As a proof of that statement, I may say the present Government have reduced the charge to a minimum sum. The charge before was rather excessive, but was reduced by the late Minister of Inland Revenue, Mr. Baby. I believe that all that is required is a little more efficiency in the working of the Act, when the people would be in favor of it as it stands. Mistakes may have been made, more instruments obtained and more expense incurred than necessary, but I hope the Government will not change the law in consequence, but continue it. If there is any friction in the working of the law, I hope the present Minister will make it as acceptable to the people as possible.

Mr. BERGERON. I differ in opinion, on this subject, with the member for Montreal Centre. No doubt the law is a very important one, but I think its administration has not been good. What the hon. member for Cornwall says about it, I find from my experience in my own constituency, is right. I have heard our merchants say they have been very much annoyed by the inspection of the weights and measures. One merchant from Beauharnois says that his weights and measures were inspected in 1879, and that they were inspected again the other day, when the officer only verified the weights and measures, charging for the four sets $4.35, a pretty high charge for the work. In 1879, before the present Act came into force, he had his set of weights carried away by the inspector, who assigned no reason for his conduct. I contend that while the law is in the right direction, its administration is far from perfect and it ought to be amended.

Mr. BECHARD. In my district, and in fact through the whole Province of Quebec, the Act has been unpopular, and although the Act was passed by hon. gentlemen opposite, I have felt it my duty to defend it in principle though its working was defective in some cases, as we were responsible for it in a measure, by putting it in operation. One complaint which is very commonly made against it, is that when a merchant's weights are inspected the second time, even if they are found correct, the expense of the inspection falls upon him. I suggested to the Minister of Inland Revenue in Committee of the Whole last year that the law should be so amended that if on a second inspection a merchant's weights or measures are found correct, he should not be called on to bear the expense, and upon that occasion the Minister said he would act upon the suggestion.

Mr. WHITE (Hastings). I contend that it is the right and the duty of those members who come from districts in which their inspectors have not done their duty, to complain of the conduct of these officers. If inspectors require merchants and others to call upon them at their hotels and bring their weights and measures with them, then I say they are violating the spirit and intention of the Act. I must say with regard to the district which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bergin) represents, either the people there are dishonest or the officer is not doing his duty; one or the other must be the case. In my district the chief and his officers go to every store, grain warehouse, ashery and other such establishment in which scales and measures are used, and stamp them, and they only charge the amount which the Government allows. It is said that the Act was passed by the present Government when they were in power before, that it was put in force by their predecessors, and that it has been amended by the present Administration. The late Government did what they believed to be right; but they appointed officers who required merchants and others to bring their scales to them, and then if any repairs had to be made they hired men to execute their repairs, and the people had to pay too much for them. I would not be surprised to learn that the hon. gentleman who complains appointed the officer who, he says, is not discharging his duty, and if that be the case he should have him removed, and have one appointed who would act according to the law. With regard to the loose way in which test measures have been bought in London, I believe that is wrong, and I believe the Government should keep a closer hand on their deputy heads and see that they discharge their duties better than some of them are now doing. It is a fact that these deputy heads of departments are trying to rule and control the whole country, and unless they are made to feel the determined check of the people's representatives, the evil will increase and result in ruin to the country. These gentlemen are constantly whining and complaining that they have not high enough salaries, that they have not sufficient influence—in fact, as I said before, their desire seems to be to have general control. I am happy to say that in the district from which I come no one complains, except those who have been using false measures and robbing the country, and they are brought up in the police court, and very properly made to suffer the consequences of their dishonesty. I trust the Government will try to amend the law, and that these members who have been the means of having the wrong sort of men appointed as officers will endeavor to have them removed. If the Government do not remove such officers they are certainly deserving of censure; but I do not believe the Government will keep any officer unless he thoroughly discharges his duty.

Mr. FARROW. I desire to say a few words on this question. I think that the Act has worked admirably well; and in cases where it has not worked as smoothly as might be desired, it will be found that the trouble is that the people do not understand its operation. I find, however, that the people are beginning to comprehend the meaning of the Act; that they are, in other words, drinking in its spirit; and I am confident that before long the measure will work with general satisfaction. I desire to give a few figures, which will enable the House to compare the operation of the present system with that which preceded it. My district comprises the counties of Leeds, Kent, Lambton, Perth, Huron and Bruce. I find that the actual work of inspection under the new system began on the 6th January, 1880. The contingent expenses during that year were $1,400; salaries $2,000; total expenditure, $3,400. The receipts were $3,000, leaving a deficit of only $400. I believe these counties may be taken as a fair criterion of the working of the Act, and I will now show how the figures stood under the old system which was in operation in 1879. In that year the expenses were $3,855, the receipts only $682; showing a deficit of $3,173, or about eight times the deficiency of last year. Now what do the people complain of? The people complain of nothing when they understand it. They did complain of the arbitrary action of the inspectors. They would enter places of business and order the dealers to take all their scales to certain places for inspection. They were not sufficiently accommodating to go to the stores. Now, however, the inspectors were accommodating, and visited the stores; and I can assure the House that the Act is working with much less friction than under the old regime. Now, as to the necessity of the Act. In making purchases, people wanted proper weights and measures. In my district out of the number of weights examined 80 per cent. were light, and only 5 per cent. too heavy. The House can judge from that fact how the people were cheated—I do not say cheated wilfully—but the fact I have stated remains. Another change made was from wine to imperial measure. This involved expense to the merchants in compelling them to obtain new measures, and, of course, they grumbled; but when they got their customers inoculated into the new order of procedure, everything worked smoothly, and the Act is now running like clock-work. I hope the measure will not be repealed or tampered with, because I am confident that within a year or two everybody will be satisfied with this Act, which reflects great credit on the Government.

Mr. HESSON. As a representative from the same district as the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I desire to express my concurrence in his remarks, for my personal knowledge coincides with his statements as to the working of the present Act. It is true that the first attempt to improve the old system, which was inaugurated by counties, towns and villages, which formerly controlled the inspection of weights and measures, resulted in the passing of an Act which was very unpopular. Speaking from personal knowledge, I am safe in saying that one half of the business men who had their weights and measures inspected, would have voted against the Government, although their friends, on account of the working of the Act. I am not prepared to say that the late Government was entirely responsible for that feeling, because all new Acts are unpopular for a time. As the public became cognizant of the provisions of the measure, they recognized the benefit intended to be conferred, and began to like the Act better. It is true there are some districts still where it works very badly and where it fails to give satisfaction; I refer more especially to the inspection of hides. I know with certainty that under the regulations instituted by the department, the Act is working in a very unsatisfactory manner, and a large petition was forwarded to me for presentation to the House, but which I have not presented, because I received information that led me to withdraw it, viz: that certain changes would be made which would prove satisfactory. The difficulty lies here. In some districts inspectors are given control of large sections of country, and sub-inspectors should be appointed in the villages. The result of this arrangement has been that the large towns where the inspectors are appointed have been deprived of a large business in hides. These are now sold in the country stores and tanneries, and they do not reach the towns where formerly the trade was conducted, and where the inspection is now very severe indeed, and where the parties who bring hides to market are subjected not only to a certain fee, I believe five cents per hide, for the inspector, but three or four pounds of refuse are cut off, which the inspector claims to be his perquisite. The inspector, moreover, has the authority of putting his own brand as to the quality of the hides. In the case of sales made to American buyers the inspector is not considered sufficient evidence of the value of the hides, and the market price is not thereby settled. Nevertheless, I think the Act will work well, and it is in the interests of the public that it should be continued for a time. It was unfortunate that the measure was introduced too soon, because it was only attempted in a few counties, whereas it should have been made as nearly as possible uniform, in order to give general satisfaction. I presume that arose from the fact that the late Government was not in possession of all the standards of weights and measures required to establish the various districts; consequently, they were given a great deal of blame. I trust the Act will be continued, and it will be the duty of the Government to improve it. The hon. mover of the resolution, the member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), explained that the Act was working badly in his section of the country, and I think the attention of the Ministry should be drawn to that, and, if necessary in that particular locality, to keep a sharp look out that the gentleman there does his duty, and then I believe the Act will be a success.

Mr. McCUAIG. I wish to bear my testimony to the meritorious manner in which the officer in my county did his duty, though he lost his position under the new arrangement. He is opposed to me politically, but he told me that all the additional expense had arisen in consequence of the impracticability of the law. He said that if he had not been interfered with by the head office at Ottawa there would have been no difficulty in my county. In my opinion this Weights and Measures Act is necessary to guard the public against dishonest tradesmen. But I am satisfied that since the changes were made in the law last year it has not worked well, particularly in the County of Prince Edward. The present law groups several counties together, under the charge of one inspector and two deputy inspectors, to look after five or six counties. I am of opinion that the additional travelling expenses incurred by these deputy inspectors in going from one county to another will exceed in amount what we would have to pay for the services of one inspector in each county. In my district we were paying, under the old system, $2,500 a year for one local inspector for each of the counties of Northumberland, Durham, Hastings, Prince Edward and Peterborough; I understand that the inspector now receives $1,200 a year, and the two deputies, $600 each, to say nothing of their travelling expenses. Under the former system, we had an inspector in each county, and it cost us less than we now pay three men for five counties. In the County of Prince Edward there are men who have been in the Customs for twenty-five years, who are only receiving $250 a year, yet, in point of education and social position, are certainly equal to any inspectors I am acquainted with. I think it would be better that there should be one local inspector in each county, and if necessary the salaries might be reduced to make the total five equal to what is now paid to three inspectors. To show the working of the present law, I am informed that some traders, after receiving visits from the inspectors to whom they show the new standards, immediately resume the use of the old standards after the inspectors have departed. This could not take place so easily if there were a resident inspector in each county.

Mr. DECOSMOS. While the subject of weights and measures is before the House, I desire to call the attention of the Government to the fact that before British Columbia was united to the Dominion, it had a law respecting weights and measures. That law has been repealed, and although application has been made every Session by the members from British Columbia, for the appointment of an inspector of weights and measures, and for the enforcement of the Dominion law, nothing whatever has been done. I sincerely trust that the Government will put the law in operation by appointing an inspector.

Mr. MOUSSEAU. This is the first time the Government have been informed that British Columbia has no inspector, and that the law is not enforced in that Province, and I shall enquire into the matter. With reference to the observations which have been made on the motion of the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), I may say that a law for the inspection of weights, measures, gas, and so forth, is always at first very unpopular, because it has to deal with numerous abuses and to incur the dislike of people who live by those abuses. The hon. member's first complaint is that we expend on this law half a million foolishly. I must challenge that assertion, and say that it is one of the most useful expenditures a Government can make. Why was this Inspection Law passed? It was because there was much cheating and deception in trade, and because the grocer did not give full weight to the laborer, and because grain buyers frequently bought grain from farmers with improper measures. I know of one town in Western Ontario where the farmers, on account of the dishonest or erroneous weights of the grain buyers, lost five cents a bushel on their grain, and this was in the centre of a district where hundreds of thousands if not millions of bushels of grain is raised. In some cases people lost and in other cases people gained by the operation of this law. The hon. gentleman says the officers are sometimes unoccupied. If they are they are none the less useful, because it is the knowledge that these officers are in existence watching the operation of the law, that induces the people to put the law into execution. When the Estimates come before the House, the Government will be in a position to answer all the questions raised by the hon. member for Cornwall, with reference to the expenditures, the increase of the salaries, and the whole machinery of the law. When the hon. gentleman says no benefit has been derived from the operation of this law, commensurate with the large expenditure incurred to enforce it, he made a reckless assertion, for great benefits have been derived from its operation all over the Dominion. I know many counties where at first there was strong opposition to the enforcement of the law, but where it is now looked upon most favorably, and I was glad to hear many members of the House testifying to the good results which have followed its enforcement. It has been alleged that the officers of the Inland Revenue Department have been guilty of extortion. Well, that is a very serious charge against an officer of the Government, and if my hon. friend will send to the department the names of any officers who have used their positions to extort money, I think the Government would at once deal most severely with these officers. But if there was extortion, I think it was not attributable to the officers, and it is precisely because the inspection of weights and measures puts a stop to these extortions and deceits and errors that the law is so unpopular in some quarters. I think, then, the law will gain in popularity through practice. It may require to be amended in one or two ways, but even according to the speeches made by hon. members, the law is more practiced than criticized. I do not like these attacks which have been made on the Deputy Minister. None but serious specific charges should be preferred against a gentleman holding that position. We must not forget the importance of those officers. Mr. Brunel is a very efficient officer, well posted in all the details of his office, and one of the best officers in the Government employ. It is not fair to attack him because he is anxious to do his duty and see that the law is enforced. A deputy head of a department occupies a very peculiar position. He is the man who, according to the Yankee expression, runs the machine. What would Ministers be without deputies? Ministers enter and go out of office on the wave of public opinion and are seldom long enough at the head of a department to become entirely master of its business; so that they must have somebody on whom they can depend, and that person is the Deputy Minister. Mr. Brunel is well entitled to be defended from the attacks made on him. He has been long in office, and is a clever officer, who always does his duty in a most conscientious manner. I do not wish to be understood to say everything is done admirably in the department. Inspection laws are always unpopular, because their enactment entails the correction of abuses. I have not the slightest objection to the motion being adopted.

Mr. BERGIN. I only wish to say a few words in reply to some four or five hon. gentlemen who have said the law has worked well. As I said, in asking for these returns I found fault not so much with the law as with its administration; and that so few have been found to bear testimony to its good administration, proves conclusively that my strictures were quite correct. I was astonished to find the hon. member for Montreal bearing such strong testimony in favor of the administration of the law in his constituency. The Montreal papers are full of complaints about its administration. Over and over again depositions from the manufacturers of scales and weights and the wholesale dealers in that city have complained of the maladministration of the law by the deputy head who controls the department. We were told by the hon. member for North Huron (Mr. Farrow), and I was glad to hear the statement, that instead of the dealers in his county bringing their scales to the inspection officer to be adjusted, the officer visited the establishments. I wish that were the case in the county I have the honor to represent. The chief argument advanced in support of the law is that it provides honest weights and measures. I deny that; for the moment the inspector leaves the store the store keeper can put a little bit of wax on one side of the balance and down it goes. It is impossible, under the present system of inspection, that anything like accuracy can be provided in the case of dishonest traders. The hon. member for East Hastings said the traders in my county were dishonest, because they complained against the inspection of weights and measures. It may be that in his county only dishonest traders complain, but in mine there is not a trader who has a reputation for dishonesty. I know the men who have complained to my constituency. They are men of unimpeachable integrity, who, unless the enforcement of the law were unnecessarily oppressive, would in no instance make a complaint against it. With regard to the charge of extortion which I made, I repeat that charge. It may be that the officer who exacted these fees acted under authority, but I do not think that under the law he had a right to exact the fees he did. I stated distinctly he had no right to make the dealers come to his hotel or stopping place, nevertheless he did so. I say that the Deputy Minister does not see to the proper enforcement of the law. I would call the attention of the House to the feeling of the country with regard to the deputy head of the department. It may be the first time in eight years the hon. Minister has heard such charges made, but it would be in the interest of the country they had been made before. I believe it would contribute very much to the improved administration of the department, if the deputy head, upon whom so much depends, would manage it more in the interest of the country and less in his own interest. In connection with this subject, I trust when the Minister brings down his return, he will not omit to produce the full vouchers for the expenditure of that Deputy Minister during his two trips to England, because I imagine the people will think he could have very well gone to England for a much smaller sum than $4,000. That was rather an expensive holiday trip for this country.

Mr. CURRIER. I have always been opposed to this Inspection Law from its first introduction, and see no reason to retrace my steps. The $500,000 that the member for Cornwall mentions has been a tax on our people, and the $150,000 a year besides, is an additional impost. The question is, whether they obtain the benefits they ought to receive for this expenditure? I do not think so. I think that, under the old system, when the inspection was under the municipalities, the people were as well satisfied as they have been since. My experience is, that the people in these matters look out for themselves and see that they are served from good weights and measures. I know of no class sharper in looking after their rights than the farmers; and I do not think it would be possible for a merchant long to carry on his business with them if he used dishonest weights and measures. The people have to bear the burdens of this law. For a few years after it came into force there were many complaints of it, but latterly there have been but few, the people having become accustomed to it. I believe it would be as well to return to the old system of leaving this matter in charge of the municipalities.

Mr. WRIGHT. I must say that I have heard no complaints under the new system. Under the old system I heard very many complaints. The people whom I represent have been treated as though they were the inhabitants of a conquered country. The inspectors went about taking possession of their weights and measures, and behaving in the most rude, insolent, and tyrannical manner. I have statements to this effect from almost every respectable merchant throughout the length and breadth of the county of Ottawa, without distinction of politics. I might mention Mr. Prentiss and Mr. Devlin, of Aylmer, belonging to the Liberal party, and all the Conservative merchants throughout this constituency. I think the member for Cornwall deserves a great deal of credit for bringing this matter before the House, and I think that the deputy heads of departments ought to be occasionally well watched and have checks imposed on them by the House in matters of this kind, in the interest of the public.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Under our parliamentary practice, notices of motions for papers which hon. gentlemen assume will be refused, affords them a good opportunity for airing grievances, and I think this a very good arrangement, because it affords us an opportunity of expressing the feelings and views of our constituents with reference to the operation of laws which we pass; and it is also fair to Ministers who, by the multiplicity of their engagements in the administration of affairs, have not the same opportunity that we enjoy, of ascertaining the practical operation of the laws which operate over the whole country. I am very much pleased that my hon. friend the member for Cornwall has, in his somewhat demonstrative manner, brought this matter under the notice of the Government, because I think that those who have had an opportunity of witnessing the operation of this law, and of hearing the complaints made, not by those engaged in trade, and who might be presumed to be partial to their own objects, but by other persons who have been observing its effects, and who feel the importance in a public point of view of making its administration as efficient and economical as possible. These are complaints which deserve our attention. Certainly, I have heard complaints of this law in districts of Ontario which I have visited—I will not attempt to speak for any other Province. I suppose we must admit, in the first place, that, under our Constitution, the laws with reference to weights and measures in the Dominion must be enacted by this Parliament. The Constitution has imposed upon us this duty, having withdrawn it from the Local Legislatures and municipalities to which it previously belonged. A law defining what weights and standards shall prevail in the Dominion, must be enacted by this Parliament. Measures to this effect passed by any other authority would be inoperative. There must, besides, be provisions in any such law for the punishment of its violation. All that is necessary under our system. Our law appears too voluminous, and possibly may be too complicated, and consequently the cause of great expense. But that we must have inspection and ready means of punishing those who defraud their neighbors by a non-compliance with the law in respect of weights and measures, must be admitted on all hands. This question is, I think, a very proper one for consideration by the Government. Whether, even with the amendments that have been made in the original Act, it is not yet too expensive—whether this enormous amount expended every year, and which represents, say the interest on a very large capital, because it is annual expenditure, could not be diminished—whether some simpler, and at the same time more effective method of inspection could not be devised. I have heard practical men say our system is a total failure, as, when the inspector has turned his back, the fraudulent dealer may resume his evil practices and continue in them till the inspector makes another visit. So there may be only a seeming compliance with the law; and so we are paying annually a large sum for securing the public against fraud, when, in point of fact, we are but deceiving ourselves as to the results. I think, in view of the complaints made, not by those who wish to avail themselves of the laxity of the law, for the purpose of cheating their neighbors, but by honest, intelligent citizens who desire to see simple and inexpensive laws enacted and administered, it becomes necessary for those in charge of the department to enquire into this matter and devise a remedy—first, in the direction of economy, and, second, in the direction of efficiency. I am not satisfied with the operation of this law. I think it fails to meet the great objects which such a law should accomplish. It is well, therefore, that members conversant with any defects in the administration of the law should present them on the arena where discussion may take place, information be given, and Ministers and their subordinates in the departments be instructed and advised in regard to the complaints of the public. But we must maintain the law in the Statute-book, with the provisions that punish fraud, which policy must involve some expense. If the expense be greater than necessary, it is the duty of the Government and the House to lessen it, if possible, at the earliest day.

Mr. ROCHESTER. I have so repeatedly brought this question to the House, that I did not intend to have referred to it to-day, but for some remarks made by the President of the Council (Mr. Mousseau). The hon. member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright) has stated that a great many grievances have been experienced by the business men of his county—

Mr. WRIGHT. Under the old system I said.

Mr. ROCHESTER. All I can say is that I can corroborate the remarks of the hon. gentleman, for the same thing is true of the city of Ottawa, of the county of Carleton, and I believe of every county in Canada. It was not anticipated that the law would be very popular at first, but it has been rendered more unpopular than it otherwise would have been by abuses in its administration. By instructions from the department, the inspectors walk into a man's place of business, and whether he has one set of scales or ten, they are taken away. I know of some firms in the city of Ottawa, who, the year before, paid over $100 in England for the best weights and measures, and they were taken away by the inspector and, as he said, by the order of the department, or rather I should say by the deputy-head of the department. The deputy head of that department is known from one end of the Dominion to the other. He was not very well known some years ago—in fact, until this Act came in force. I said then, on the floor of the House, that that gentleman would be pretty well known in twelve months, and events have shown that I prophesied truly. Members from every part of the Dominion are crying out against the abuses which are taking place in the administration of the law. The President of the Council (Mr. Mousseau) has eulogized the Deputy of the Minister of Inland Revenue in language which that gentleman does not deserve, for if there is one man in this Dominion detested above all others, by those who know him, that gentleman is the man. I will mention an instance to show his conduct towards those whose servant he is. A large and respectable delegation went to the Department of Inland Revenue, with regard to some matter pertaining to that branch of the public service. Upon applying to the Minister, who, of course, is not so well up in all the details of the department, and who has to depend a good deal upon the deputy, they were requested to call upon the latter, and then see the Minister again. The deputation—who, if I chose to give their names, would be pronounced as respectable a body of men as ever visited Ottawa—accordingly called upon the deputy-head of the department; their spokesman related their grievance to that gentleman, who sat in his arm chair like a lord; and the only reply he condescended to make was, that they had better take the next train home, or he would make it worse for them. That is the conduct and the language of a gentleman whom the President of the Council has eulogized as being so efficient an officer. This happened some years ago; I cannot now give the date, but I could very soon ascertain.

An hon. MEMBER. He has more weight now.

Mr. ROCHESTER. The worse it is for the country then. I think the Act itself is a good one if it was properly administered, and, though I have heard some complaints within the past twelve months, they have not been nearly so numerous as before. Some complain that the inspectors require merchants and others to bring their scales to them for inspection, and I think if that is the case the complaint is well founded, as it should be the duty of the inspector to go to the merchants instead of having the merchants come to him. One abuse of the Act is in requiring that all the scales, &c., should be of one particular character, and I know of cases where business men have had to expend hundreds of dollars on that account. I remember that at one time no measures were allowed by the department except a certain kind which were manufactured at Hamilton, but I believe that that regulation does not exist now. I did not intend to have said anything on the subject, but for the remarks made by the President of the Council with regard to the deputy head of the department, which I think were uncalled for and out of place, for a more uncivil man is not to be found in these buildings than the Deputy of the Minister of Inland Revenue. I think in such cases as this it would be well for the Government to appoint a Committee to investigate the causes of the abuses which have arisen with regard to the administration of the law.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I think it is pretty generally the opinion that some such measure as the present Weights and Measures Act is necessary to prevent the interests of buyers and sellers from being interfered with by dishonest traders. What we have to consider is whether the law is as economically administered as possible, and in such a manner as to render it as popular as possible. With regard to my own county I must say that the deputy inspector of weights and measures discharges his duties in such a manner as to increase the popularity of the Act. He has done as little as possible to interfere with the rights of traders in that county; and it seems to me that if these officers were to interpret their instructions as they should be interpreted, and as they ought to be interpreted, the law might be carried out with no inconvenience whatever to the honest trader. It is true that traders may feel that the inspection fee is to some extent a burden upon them, but we all feel that with regard to taxes of every kind; when the Stamp Act was under discussion, some said that it ought to be abolished, but we must all bear our proportion of the taxes which are imposed for the proper administration of the laws of the country, and this law being a necessary one, I do not think that traders ought to complain of the amount of the fees imposed upon them. It has been said by the member for Halton (Mr. Macdougall) that under the present system there is no guarantee that the inspection of weights and measures will be effective in preventing dishonesty. Under the old Act, as it was administered by the officers of the different municipalities, no greater guarantee existed than that which exists under the present Act. As this House is aware, we have no power to impose on the municipalities the duty of appointing officers to carry out the provisions of this Act. I know that under the old system of appointing country officers by the municipalities, those officers performed their duties in a very perfunctory manner. I think since the present system has been introduced the inspection has been performed more effectively in the interest of the country, and with more satisfaction to the traders than it was under the old system. I am pleased to hear the President of the Council state that he will be prepared to give details of the expenditure for the standards when the Estimates are under discussion, because I am one of those who believe that a much greater sum of money has been expended in procuring those standards than was absolutely necessary. I do not think the duties of inspectors would be satisfactorily discharged for a less sum than those gentlemen now receive. The deputy inspector in my county has a very large area of territory to go over, and he receives but $500 per annum. He discharges his duties properly and efficiently, and I do not think any person could be secured for a less sum who would discharge them so well.

Mr. LONGLEY. I think this subject is of sufficient importance to justify a little more being said. I have not one word to say against any person connected with that department. Probably they discharge their duties very well, but in regard to the department itself, of Weights and Measures, I never have believed in it, though I have heard those who know more about the matter than I do, say that it was highly important for the protection of the people. However, I hold a very strong opinion that the people here never got anything like an equivalent for the money they have paid. I share, to a large extent, the opinions expressed by the hon. member for Cornwall. I would not go the length of advocating the abolition of the office, and yet I would not say that I would not do so to-morrow. The hon. member for North Hastings (Mr. White) said that his officers do but as little as they can possibly do, and then he went on to talk about seeking to make the law acceptable, &c. Now, I believe it can scarcely be denied that, looking back over the interval of a few years, the officers of the Weights and Measures Branch of the Inland Revenue Department have done just as little as they could do, for the simple reason that the law was obnoxious, and the Government, instead of inducing them to discharge their duties, rather held them back. I think it will continue to do so until some means are devised by which the odium attached to that department can be mitigated to some extent, and until the expenses connected with it are greatly reduced. I believe the popular sentiment of the country will be decidedly against this service. I am going to say something now which I think will apply to all the departments. I shall be a little mistaken if we do not before many years reach this point, that there will be an all-pervading conviction in the minds of the members of this House of the necessity of economy, not in reference to one branch of the public service, but in reference to every branch. I hold a strong opinion that when we do begin that we should begin with ourselves, because the country will not give us much credit, if we go to work and reduce the salaries of Civil servants and others while leaving our own salaries untouched. I said last year upon this subject, that I believe we could save a million dollars annually without impairing the public service, and, having given a little attention to this branch of the subject, I am prepared to reiterate that statement to-day. We are not going to live many years before the country will demand this of us. I believe it will be very useful to invest a few thousand dollars in distributing some of these Blue-books over the country, so that the people would have an opportunity of showing how much money is paid for the support of the various departments of the Government, beginning with the administration of justice, and going down through the collection of customs and into every branch of the public service.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is wandering from the subject.

Mr. LONGLEY. If you turn your attention to the Blue-book you will see that I am quite in order. Now, let us begin with the Commissioner, who receives $3,200 a year.

Mr. PLUMB. He receives $4,000.

Mr. LONGLEY. So much the worse. I am being guided by the figures before me. The Assistant Commissioner receives $2,400 a year; £600 a year is a very fair salary for an assistant. Then the first clerk gets $1,837. When we compare these salaries with those received by quite as good men outside, to say the least, one is greatly impressed with the vast disparity that prevails. Four senior clerks, $4,000; five first-class clerks, $3,750; then four senior second-class clerks, $4,437; seven junior, $6,200, all footing up to $28,150. Although the officers of this department are distributed all over the country, they do very little for their salaries. The more they do, the more unpopular the Act becomes. Unless the department is revolutionized and made more generally useful and less obnoxious, the sooner it is abolished the better.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Hamilton). I desire to endorse what some hon. gentlemen have said on this question, and to state that this law, as administered, has been giving a great deal of dissatisfaction in the constituency I represent. Formerly it gave very much greater dissatisfaction than it is giving at present, although there is great room for improvement yet. We have in Hamilton two or three large scale factories, and the rules and regulations of the department require that before any scales leave an establishment they must be inspected and made ready for use. After that is done and the fees are paid upon them, and they are shipped to another part of the country, the deputy inspector of weights and measures there insists on re-inspecting these articles and charging another fee. This is a great grievance, which the Government should remove. The inspection of the scales at the factory ought to be sufficient until they are set up for use and the ordinary visit of the inspector at the place where used is made. I am surprised to hear the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Rochester) say that only measures made in Hamilton are received. Why, it has been complained in Hamilton that only measures made in Toronto are inspected. The difficulty arises in this way: There is a regulation of the department requiring all measures to be made of a particular kind of material. But that is not carried out in all cases. In Toronto, for instance, the inspector will accept a class of material which will not be accepted by the inspector in Hamilton, and the Hamilton manufacturers of measures complain that they are at a disadvantage because they are not permitted to use as cheap material as the Toronto manufacturers. Another absurd regulation is that when goods are brought to market for sale, such as berries, which are usually packed in boxes, they must not be sold unless the packet is sold with them. If a woman comes to market with a pail of berries, she cannot sell the berries unless she sells the pail also. But that regulation is so unpopular that it is broken every day.

Mr. BOWELL. Why must she sell the pail?

Mr. ROBERTSON. It is the rule of the department.

Mr. BOWELL. Oh, no.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I can assure the hon. gentleman that is the fact. It is one of Mr. Brunel's rules, whether it is the law or not, but my recollection is that it is a statutory provision. There is no doubt a great deal of truth in what my hon. friends from Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) and Carleton (Mr. Rochester) say with reference to the deputy head. I have nothing to say of that gentleman, except that he has the credit of making the most extraordinary rules and regulations and of changing them in a week, so that, with such constant changes, people do not know what to do. That he has made the law a most obnoxious one, there is no doubt, and I think the Minister should have a thorough overhauling of the rules and regulations of his department with the view of making the law, which is a good one, work more smoothly.

It being Six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

AFTER RECESS.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The discussion has taken a very wide range, including the cost of the civil government of the Dominion, and we have had the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue dragged into it because he sat on his seat like a lord. I am not much acquainted with lords; they do not grow very plentifully in the part of the country from which I come. They may grow more plentifully in the County of Carleton; but the few I have seen were most unpretentious men, who sat in their seats like very ordinary citizens. In justice to the Deputy Minister, with whom I have but a limited acquaintance, I must say that when I had occasion to go to the department, I found he dealt with me in a prompt, business like manner. I do not think this is the proper place for personal attacks on the deputy. I do not think he occupies a very enviable position. In fact, taking one consideration with another, the life of a deputy head is not a very happy one. He stands between the hon. Minister and the politicians. He has got to refuse a great many things; he has to bear the odium of things which properly should attach to his political chief, and in many instances his salary is altogether inadequate. The hon. member for Annapolis embodies in his attack on the method of administration of weights and measures in his part of the country, an attack on the Department of Inland Revenue in the matter of officials' salaries. But from what I have been able to glean from the Public Accounts, my opinion is that the great revenue producing departments are the departments that are the least paid in the public service; and in a department, such as the Inland Revenue Department, which produces a revenue of about $5,000,000, we cannot expect to get gentlemen to combine the pay of a porter with the responsibility of a bank manager. I think there are other departments the expenses of which can more properly be cut down, and I will be very happy to second any effort of the hon. member for Annapolis in striving to curtail the public expenditure in such branches. If the hon. member wishes to commence with ourselves, I will support him in that also. I shall but make one exception, and that is in favor of the hon. member for Annapolis himself, for an hon. gentleman who puts himself to the inconvenience of changing his abode, even temporarily, from Paradise to Ottawa, as he has done, should, I think, not be mulcted, in addition to his other sufferings, of his public indemnity. I can quite corroborate the remarks of the hon. member for North Huron with reference to the working of this measure in the district in which I live. I have heard no complaints made there. That district has been thoroughly and efficiently inspected—if the efficient carrying out of the law is what is necessary. As far as the Act itself, I think now, as I always thought, that it is premature, that it is not needed in our sparsely settled country. We cannot put on the Mackenzie Administration the responsibility of the working of that law because the most objectionable feature came into operation under this Government. That was the substitution of the Imperial measure for the wine measure. To connect ourselves more closely with our neighbors on this continent, we adopted their system of decimal coinage; and to separate ourselves from them we introduced the imperial and rejected the wine measure. I do not know how the change will operate in the interior of the Dominion, but it causes great inconvenience in the border counties. I think the responsibility should be thrown where it belongs, not on the deputy head of the department, but on the Government which introduced the scheme and are now carrying it out. The inspectors, I believe, as a whole, perform their duty faithfully. I do not think a Minister or a Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue can be popular. They have, especially the deputy, to sacrifice popularity to duty. I am satisfied the present deputy has strength of mind to do this. The only popular Minister of Inland Revenue that I ever heard of, and he was only a prospective Minister, was Jack Cade. He promised that a pint measure would contain a quart, but we never had an opportunity of testing whether he would fulfil his promise or not. That wave of popularity of which the vicarious Minister of Inland Revenue, the hon. President of the Council, speaks, sent poor Jack Cade high and dry, and we never realized the pint measure that would contain a quart. As a matter of fact, the inspectors are trying to do their duty, and should not be blamed for the unpopularity of this measure.

Mr. ARKELL. I believe this Act has been unpopular from its initiation. It was more unpopular under the late than under the present Government, because the charges were then more excessive. I believe we have got them now down to a more reasonable figure. All the counties in general were not thoroughly inspected. From some of the divisions the receipts were very small compared with the large expenditure. If the Deputy Minister would see that the inspection officers discharged their duty in the different divisions, the measure would become self-sustaining in twelve months. I would be sorry, after this Act had been in force some time, to see it repealed. If the officers are not competent to discharge their duties they will make the Act very unpopular, but if competent, it will become popular. I shall be very sorry to see the Act repealed until it has had a fair trial as now working.

Mr. ROSS. I do not rise to find fault with the Department of Inland Revenue, or with the deputy head, so far as the administration of the Weights and Measures Act is concerned. In the discussion this afternoon it would appear that this little difficulty is merely a family quarrel; and, perhaps, I should have rested content to allow gentlemen on the opposite side to settle this little difficulty for themselves. I will give those hon. gentlemen a chance. I remember when the administration of the Weights and Measures Act was in the hands of the late Administration, and when there was no end of complaint. Of course, now that it is administered by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves, they are becoming familiar with those complaints, as we were when we sat on the Ministerial side. I think there is a great retribution, however, in the troubles which annoy hon. gentlemen opposite in this matter. The Act was one of their own making, and the large amount of trouble which now confronts them arose from their wholesale dismissals of the inspectors who had served for several years in the administration of the Act as it existed previous to 1878. It appears now, at least from my limited observation, that the chief trouble arising under the Weights and Measures Act is from the incompetence of the gentlemen recently appointed inspectors. In my own district we had an inspector who, although he enforced the law vigorously, still did it in such a way as not to create any discontent. Besides, his administration of his department was, I think, in conformity with the law. I have in my desk a number of letters received since the visit of the present inspector to the town in which I live, containing complaints, not against the law itself—for I think the people of Ontario, generally, are pretty much satisfied with the law—but against its mode of administration. It would appear the present inspector has had no training for his position, and is not acquainted with the proper mode of doing his work, and is, it seems to me, somewhat indifferent as to whether he does it well or not. I will just read a portion of one of the letters I have received—from one of the largest dealers in the town, a man in the dry goods trade, who has some large scales in his shop, besides weights and measures. He says:

"I have one equal armed balance. He went down stairs and looked at it, tilted it with his finger, and said it was all right. The twelve weights belonging to it were sent over to his room to be tested. They all needed adjusting except one.

"He next passed up to the shop and counted the yard measures on the counter, of which I have nine. He did not test them in any way.

"He made me out my certificate, charging me full tariff rates as under, which I paid, besides an additional sum of $1.10 to the man who did the adjusting."

Then he gives the amount of fees he paid. Here is a man testing measures and balances by simply tilting them with his finger, or looking at them; yet he makes his full charges for the work whether he does it or not, and, contrary to the law, brings with him, from place to place, a man who is called an adjuster, and makes it appear to the public that this man is, par excellence, the person to adjust and set all wrong weights and measures right. He charges certain fees for adjusting, which are, in many cases, higher than the fees for testing; and I have a statement from a gentleman worthy of credence, to the effect that the adjuster in one case collected $40 for three and a half days' work in adjusting, while the inspector collected about $100 for his fees. Moreover, the inspector, in cases where he should rebate one-fourth of the fees when he finds the weights and measures correct, makes a full charge. I do not object to this officer so long as he does his work according to law. But I think the President of the Council should see when an officer does not understand his business, that he be informed of its nature, and that no unjust charges be made—that he should distinctly understand he is not to bring round from place to place an adjuster, at liberty to charge extravagant fees for his services. I am willing to suppose that the President of the Council is as anxious as any gentleman can be to see that the department is managed with as little annoyance to himself, and as little damage to the Government as possible. Unless he informs the Minister of Inland Revenue, in regard to the conduct of some of the inspectors of weights and measures, we shall have such a revulsion of feeling against this Act as I fear will necessitate its repeal altogether. I believe that this would be a misfortune, and that we should have an Act of this kind for the adjustment of weights and measures, to protect the public from being defrauded. We should have an Act insuring us a pound when we buy a pound of any commodity. I see no difficulty whatever in securing this result if the department be properly administered with proper officers. By the Department of Inland Revenue Report we see several thousand dollars paid for the travelling expenses and salaries of gentlemen who go up and down, instructing the inspectors of weights and measures in their duties. This amount of money might be saved. When we had inspectors who did not understand their duties they were dismissed. Although my sympathies are with the Government in their difficulties, I do not begrudge them a certain amount of annoyance, consequent upon their own acts.

Mr. GIGAULT. There is no uniform law in regard to the measurement of cordwood. When persons ask me what is the proper or requisite measure I cannot answer them. Information has been asked for also, as to the authority which operates, and I think the answer was that the law does not sanction any particular measure for cordwood. The Government should settle that question one way or another, so as to secure uniformity in the measurement of cordwood, which is sometimes measured by French and sometimes by English feet. I think the member for Iberville was perfectly correct in saying that the greatest cause of complaint among merchants was that when weights and measures were verified a second time and found to be correct, the inspector charged full fees as if they had not been correct. There is also a cause of complaint with the farmers, on account of grain traders demanding, in some places, 40 lbs. of oats for a bushel and in others 35 lbs., while I think the number fixed by the Statute is 34 lbs. The same thing is done with regard to barley and other grain. The farmer would like the traders to conform to the Statute, and exact in every case only the number of pounds which are fixed by the Statute.

Mr. MERNER. This law I must say was very unpopular in my county, but I cannot say anything with regard to the working of the new regulations, because the assistant inspector for Waterloo spends his whole time in Hamilton. Judging by the return which has been brought down, the expense attending the administration of the law, especially in the cities, is very high compared with the returns. Here are a few of the figures:

	Expenses.	Revenue.
Montreal.....	$3,994 25	$3,349 52
Quebec.....	2,623 98	564 00
St. John.....	1,575 53	578 41

Toronto.....	3,859 99	1,853 79
Ottawa.....	2,914 63	2,104 49
Kingston.....	2,576 43	1,341 41
Belleville.....	2,111 90	1,063 75
Hamilton.....	2,311 50	1,912 12
London.....	1,836 16	578 05

The inspector should be made attend to his duties for the whole year, instead of for three months each year, and he should be paid by percentage instead of by a salary.

Mr. GAULT. The hon. gentleman has been misinformed with regard to the figures for Montreal. The collections there have been $3,165.60, and the expenses $3,619.88 leaving a deficiency of only $454.20. No city in the Dominion can show the same record, and I am happy to say that our collector is doing his duty, and that though at the outset the measure was unpopular, now, with the co-operation of the people, all the difficulties which were encountered at first are being removed.

Mr. BOWELL. I am quite sure the Government can have no objection to this discussion; on the contrary, for it has brought out a number of complaints which, if ascertained to be correct, will impose upon the Government the duty of providing remedies as speedily as possible. I was rather surprised to hear the member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) say that in his city the inspector had refused to allow a woman to sell a pailful of berries, unless she sold the pail as well. I interrupted the hon. gentleman at the time, and told him I thought it was impossible, but the hon. gentleman persisted in his statement. I have since made inquiry, and have found that no regulation has been issued by the department which would justify the inspector in doing anything of the kind. In all probability, either the hon. gentleman or the inspector has been confused with regard to a clause in the Weights and Measures Act which provides that a person selling any article contained in an unstamped measure shall not be liable to the penalties of the Act unless the person disposing of the article represents the quantity to be greater than it really is. In other words, if a person came upon the market with a pail of berries and said: "There is a pail of berries, you can have it for so much," there is nothing in the Act which would impose a penalty upon her or compel her to sell the vessel in which the berries were contained. I can only say that if the inspector at Hamilton, or his assistants, have acted as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Robertson) states, they have grossly misunderstood their duty, and have entirely misinterpreted the Act. The member for West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) says that this Act was the creation of the Conservative party in 1873. That is the fact, but the Government of that day never put the Act into force. It remained on the Statute-book until the hon. gentleman's friends came into power, and they issued a proclamation by which its provisions were enforced. Our friends deserve credit for their independence in speaking plainly of the working of the Act; but if, as the hon. member for West Middlesex says, he and his friends knew it was unpopular when they were in power, it is to be regretted that they did not make their complaints with equal candor and plainness.

Mr. ROSS. The Act was better administered then than now.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the Act, but speaking from personal knowledge with regard to my own district, I can only say that such is not the fact. The officer who he complains was dismissed, was in the habit of acting in the manner described by the member for Ottawa County (Mr. Wright). He would go into shops in different parts of the county, and if the weights did not suit him—if they were not exactly correct—he would unceremoniously toss them into the lake. Since the law has been administered by the present officer it has become more popular than any law which was ever been attempted to be enforced in that part of the Province. Some of the grain buyers were found to have measures which were properly stamped but had false bottoms in them, by means of which they were able to cheat every farmer who sold to them, out of five cents on every bushel of his wheat. It has been my experience, and I believe it has been the experience of every other hon. gentleman, if he would only admit it, that to a very large extent it has been these who have been cheating the public by false weights and false measures who are at the bottom of the agitation against the law, and who are constantly spreading the report that it is an unpopular and improper Act. I know that there may be instances—as in the case mentioned by the hon. member for Hamilton—in which the inspectors have misunderstood their duties; but I know this, that so anxious has the department been that these officers should understand their duties, that they sent a man from Ottawa to teach them, not only the law, but the duties they were expected to perform in administering it. And they carried it further—something which the late Government never did, whether they thought of it or not—for they insisted on every inspector and deputy inspector in the Dominion passing an examination and obtaining a certificate of qualification. I do not know how much further the Government could go in order to instruct their officers in the proper performance of their duties. I might state to the hon. member (Mr. Giguault) who raised the question respecting cordwood, that the Weights and Measures Act makes no provision whatever for the measurement of cordwood, but the general law provides for it. Everyone knows of what a cord consists, and if dealers sold short measure the purchaser had the remedy in their own hands.

Mr. GIGAULT. Is it French or English measure?

Mr. BOWELL. I am speaking now of English measure. The Statute declares what a cord is in French measure as well as English measure, and though the Weights and Measures Act does not refer to it, if there be cases in which people are being imposed upon the law would step in and find a remedy. Reference has been made to the general dismissal of inspectors of weights and measures. In the proper sense of the word there were no dismissals.

Mr. ROSS (West Middlesex). Hear, hear.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." He forgets the action of the Government, of which I think he is an employee, in Ontario in matters of this kind, and which has passed Acts legislating parties out of office, appointing, in most instances, their own friends. If it was found necessary for the proper working of this law that a new measure should be introduced by which all the divisions should be abolished and new ones established, and that all the officers should be relieved of their positions, the act was nothing more than what the hon. gentleman's friends had done; and in making the new appointments the Dominion Government appointed gentlemen fully qualified for the performance of their duty.

Mr. ROSS. That does not alter the fact.

Mr. BOWELL. It alters the fact this far, that what was right in one case cannot be far wrong in the other.

Mr. ROSS. Besides, the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as to my relations with the Ontario Government.

Mr. BOWELL. I am very glad to hear it. It is well I have given the hon. gentleman an opportunity to place himself right, so that it may be thoroughly understood what his position towards the Ontario Government is.

Mr. ROSS. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman was wrong in respect to my position.

Mr. ROCHESTER. My information is that an order was issued by the department to their officers that all measures required should be obtained at Hamilton. There was no doubt, an excellent reason for that order, which the House could well judge. The hon. member for Essex (Mr. Paterson) has complained that the Commissioner and Deputy Minister were paid very inadequate salaries. I hardly think so. The salary is, I think, $4,000 a year, which is good pay.

Mr. PATTERSON. What I said was that the officers of the three great revenue producing departments of the public service are not paid in proportion to other departments which are more ornamental, and are not producing any revenue.

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed that no such regulation as has been mentioned by the hon. member for Carleton has been issued. It may be presumption on my part, as a layman, to interpret the law, but I certainly cannot place the same interpretation on the clause referred to by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) as he has placed. It provides this: that if a party sells an article purporting to contain a certain quantity, and it does not contain that quantity, then the party is subject to a penalty; but if he sells an article contained in a vessel, but which does not purport to contain any specified quantity then the Act does not apply. If it is a pail, and it is not represented to contain any particular quantity, then it is not subject to the law. It says:

"Nothing in this Act shall prevent the sale, or subject a person to a penalty under this Act for the sale of an article in any vessel, such vessel being included in the sale, when such vessel is not represented as containing any amount of Dominion measure, nor subject a person to a penalty under this Act for the possession of a vessel, when it is shown that such vessel is not used nor intended to be used as such measure."

To my mind it is clear enough.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The hon. Minister of Customs says that, to his mind, this clause "is clear enough."—to my mind it is "clear enough" too, but not in the sense that the hon. Minister wishes to convey—the meaning is clear, that the penalty is only to be inflicted when the sale of the "articles in any such vessel" is made without selling the vessel also, or go to escape the penalties, the sale of the article contained in the vessel, must include the sale of the vessel also. I think, Sir, my case is made out by the law produced by the hon. Minister, who has produced it, to prove that I am wrong.

Mr. BLAKE. One thing has been made clear during this discussion, and that is that the observation I ventured to make at an early period of this Session is well founded, that we ought to have the Minister of Inland Revenue a member of this House. We could have made his life miserable in this House for the last two or three hours. The hon. President of the Council, who represents him here, only hears his punishment vicariously, but it does not seem to hurt him much. As it is, that is no real and proper sense of parliamentary responsibility on this subject unless we have that Minister here.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF LAND IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. BLAKE, in moving for any Order in Council, correspondence or papers, not already brought down, touching any sale of land in the North-West to any railway company, said: At an early period of the Session I moved for some papers connected with railways to which it was rumored grants or sales of land had been made. Among these was a grant to a railway company with a reference to which it is now asserted that an arrangement has been made by which it shall have a further grant equivalent to the former one. We are all aware that there are several charters before the House for railways in the North-West, and I take it that it would be well for the House to have these papers. I hope they will be speedily brought down, as well as those asked for in a former address, so that we may be able to deal intelligently with the policy to be presented to us.

Mr. ROCHESTER.

THE DOMINION CITY POST OFFICE.

Mr. ROYAL moved for copy of all the evidence taken before the Assistant Postmaster of Winnipeg, in the course of the year 1880, with regard to complaints made against the working of the Post Office at Dominion City; also for copy of the report made by that official. He said: Mr. Speaker, my object in making this motion is to find out how far the occult influence of a mere postmaster weighs with the higher authorities towards preventing the residents of a locality from obtaining redress of their just grievances. If country postmasters have the right of forming their own opinions with regard to the policy of the Government of the day, they must, at least, fulfil their duty toward the public. It is principally by the details of departmental administration that a Government is brought in direct and daily contact with the people. It is that army of officials which, at a given time, may become a powerful instrument either to destroy the effect of a law or to render it popular. It is but a few moments ago that enthusiastic praises were awarded to certain officials of a department which numbers many of them. The Post Office Department, Mr. Speaker, can likewise boast of a very large number of officials. These officials are in daily intercourse with the population of the country, and if a Ministry has the means of becoming popular through its administration, it is especially through the legions of officials which it scatters throughout our country districts. Now, in a certain part of my county, there is one who is protected, perhaps not by the Government, but—and I say this, reserving to myself the right of retraction when the documents I have asked for shall have been laid before the House—by certain officials high up in the Department. In 1879 serious complaints were made against this official of Dominion City. This locality is merely a railway station, which, like all small localities in the North-West, takes the name of "City" as soon as there are one or two houses built in it; the place is really a very humble village, possessing a post office kept by an individual who has not always fulfilled his duties towards its residents. This post office is open to all comers; everyone is free to enter at any hour of the day, look at the papers, and take either his own or his neighbors' letters. Complaints were made to the Post Office Department, and the Minister was compelled, much to his dislike, I think, to cause an investigation to be held as to the conduct of that official. A first investigation was held, which must have cost the Government four or five times as much as the salary of that individual; in other words, this postmaster was receiving $10 per annum, and the investigation into his conduct must have cost the Government four or five times that amount. This first investigation, it would appear, established the truth of the accusations made, but for some reason or the other—and this still remains a mystery to me—this postmaster, who has all-powerful friends in the department which employs him, was retained in his position. Renewed complaints were made as the abuses complained did not cease; I complained myself, in the name of the population of the locality, and a new investigation was ordered to be held. Nevertheless, I regret to have to say, Mr. Speaker, that that gentleman is still postmaster in the important city called Dominion City, and the that same abuses take place every day. I have no particular reason for being soft-hearted towards that individual, whom I do not, moreover, know, but I demand and insist that justice should be done to the residents in that locality. If the charges preferred against him, and which called for two investigations, are untrue, well, then, let it be publicly known, so that those who complain of his conduct be taught that they have preferred groundless accusations. On the other hand, if the charges are true, I would like to know through what mysterious influence an individual like that should be retained at his post in spite of his mal-administration, and in spite of the just protests of residents in the locality. I do not wish to hold the Postmaster-General responsible for all the acts of mal-administration of his officials; but I say that in this case, as in many others, there exist two kinds of government; there is the responsible government of which we are a part; and, outside of that, there is an irresponsible government composed of certain Deputy Ministers, whose arrogance, prejudices and narrow-mindedness are known to everyone. Now, we are directly responsible to the people for this irresponsible government. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to bring these Deputy Ministers to trial; it was done, but a moment ago, far more eloquently than I could do it, but I pretend that in the present case, you may have every reason for considering yourself in the right, but if the department says you are not, you will never get justice, even were the whole Government to support you. It is far easier to overthrow a Government than to overthrow the head of a department or a Deputy Minister, when supported by his employees. No doubt, it is not fair to expect Ministers to exercise a greater control than they are able to; but I think that they should descend somewhat from the higher regions, where they govern the affairs of the country, so as to give more attention to the details of their respective departments. I cannot repeat it too often, if the officials do not wish that a law should be popular, there is not a Ministry in the world able to maintain itself in power; whilst, on the contrary, if a Ministry exercises its influence on its subordinates with due impartiality, so as to cause laws to be respected, there is no doubt that these laws become agreeable, instead of being a burden. Mr. Speaker, my object in making this motion is to have copies of all documents relating to this Dominion City post office business, and to find out whether really this postmaster is guilty of all the infamous charges laid at his door, and if so, to learn why a man who earns $10 a year is practically protected by the Government in spite of the just complaints of a whole population.

Motion agreed to.

POINT PELEE SQUATTERS.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for copies of all correspondence respecting the rights of squatters on the naval reserve on Point Pelee Reef, in the County of Essex, said this naval reserve formerly belonged to the Imperial Government, and when it was ceded to the Dominion Government, it was understood that the rights of squatters who had been there for sixty or seventy years should be respected, and that they should be secured in their property. They have made several attempts to have their lots laid out and their patents granted to them, but hitherto unsuccessfully, and they are alarmed now because they are informed that the Government are about to grant a license to a company to shoot over that portion of land. On their behalf I must protest against any such action. Not only are there a number of French squatters there, but also a number of Indians, who are drawing nothing from the Indian fund. I do not know what band they belong to, but they themselves claim to be the descendants of Chief Caldwell, who fought on behalf of the British Government in 1812. I hope the Minister of the Interior will give instructions to some surveyor to lay out that land, and ascertain the quantity belonging to each squatter, and that no company will be licensed to shoot over these grounds.

Motion agreed to.

ANDERDON INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for copies of all correspondence respecting the abatement of interest made to the purchasers of lands on the Indian Reserve, in the township of Anderdon, in the County of Essex, said: These lands were sold at a public sale in 1873, and owing to the sale having been conducted in such a manner as would have vitiated it, had it been a sale by a private individual of his own property, people were induced to pay exceptionally high prices. I have urged this matter on the attention of the department for about two years and thought I had succeeded in obtaining an abatement of interest, and now I find that parties who have borrowed money on their land at a high rate of interest, in order to obtain their patents, have not been treated on as favorable terms as parties who paid neither principal nor interest. Representations have been made to me by persons who have purchased lands and who think that so unfavorable a distinction should not be drawn between themselves and those who are defaulters.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN GROWN TOBACCO.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex), in moving for a return showing the amount of inland revenue collected for Canadian grown tobacco, for the year ending 31st December, 1880, said: Perhaps the members of this House may not be aware that the county I represent, owing to its being almost surrounded by water, and being one of the most southern points in the Dominion, in former years produced a tobacco which commanded a very high price in Montreal. But, owing to the amended Act at present, no sale can be obtained for it. Perhaps I can best explain myself by reading from some communications I have received from gentlemen interested in the trade in Canadian tobacco. A gentleman, who is the only person licensed to have a tobacco warehouse in the county, writes:

"Enclosed you will find two letters, one from A. D. Porcheron Esq., Manufacturer of Tobacco, Montreal, the other from Messrs. Kirkpatrick & Cookson, Corn Merchants, who have sold nearly all of our leaf tobacco for the last seventeen years. During this time a number of changes in the law have been made, but never before has the law been so that it is impossible to sell Essex leaf tobacco. I have one hundred thousand pounds (100 hhds) on hand which I have held for the last five or six years, with the hope that I might get my money out of it, but have never had an offer for it that would pay for the labor of growing it. The Government will see by looking over the returns which we are required to make every three months, that tobacco growing is completely killed. I sent sixty hogsheads to Messrs. K. & C. last year, they sold five hogsheads, but wrote a few days ago that the person who purchased it, is selling it for one cent per pound less than he paid for it. I have (as I said before) 100,000 lbs. paying storage, insurance, interest &c., on it and likely be compelled to allow it to waste away unless some change is made in the law. I would not pay two cents per pound for it now, when it actually costs five cents per pound to grow it, as none is being grown for sale in this Province. I think the Government ought to devise some means by which I can sell what I have on hand. I am satisfied that the Government would not intentionally pass an Act to embarrass a licensed buyer."

This gentleman encloses to me the following letter from Mr. Porcheron, of the Canadian Tobacco Works, Montreal:

"MONTREAL, January 14th, 1881.

"Messrs. Kirkpatrick & Cookson,

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your inquiry as to my views, as a manufacturer, on the effect of the new law concerning home grown tobacco, I beg to state that I have manufactured thousands of pounds of Canadian tobacco, principally from Essex County, but have been compelled to discontinue owing to the new law which compels manufacturers of foreign tobacco to pay twenty cents duty while the growers only pay four cents and sell their tobacco in rolls and twists to customers, at from twelve to fifteen cents per pound. If the Government wishes to create a new industry why not leave the manufacturing part to experienced manufacturers, and then we could get up an article which could be introduced through the whole Dominion. As it is, no one outside the Province of Quebec would think of buying Canadian tobacco at any price.

"For your own information I may as well tell you that the moment Western tobacco is shipped for the Province Quebec 'the only market for Ontario,' that it is subjected to a duty of fourteen cents, if manufactured by a specially licensed manufacturer for home grown tobacco; but as there is but one of them in Montreal, who has been compelled to shut up, Ontario tobacco can only be warehoused and to remain so until rotten.

"The new law is positively a mistake, it may suit the Quebec growers very well as they only pay duty on less than one half of their crop, but I do not think it fair to manufacturers. As one of them, I think we should be allowed the same privilege as the grower, then Ontario would be on equal footing with this Province."

The following is a letter from the Montreal agents of the licensed bonded warehouse in Essex:

"Referring now to your favor of 5th instant, we regret equally with yourselves that we can make no progress in selling your tobacco. As the law works at present, Ontario leaf tobacco is altogether excluded from being manufactured in this market; and although many are anxious to work on it as formerly, they are practically prohibited. Growers are allowed to manufacture into twist or rolls on payment of four cents per pound duty; but the manufacturers must pay fourteen cents (14) per pound for the same privilege. This is practically a protection for the Quebec farmer of ten (10) cents per pound against the Ontario farmer, as the Ontario farmer has to seek a market for his surplus in this Province, where alone it is wanted. The Quebec farmer can afford to sell for actually less than the duty the manufacturers must pay on yours. The law not only works an injustice against your growers but, we believe, the Quebec farmers are also becoming dissatisfied with the working of the law, as it prevents their selling the raw leaf to manufacturers, who would buy larger quantities than they can otherwise dispose of. We feel assured that a reduction of the duty to four cents per pound on all Canadian-grown tobacco, manufactured either into twist, roll or cut, would cause a revival of the trade and protect the home grower against American-grown tobaccos, and open this, the best market in the Dominion for Canada leaf, again to your growers. At the present the Quebec farmers have the monopoly."

Now when this amended law was introduced, I asked the late Minister of Inland Revenue for explanations on the subject. He may have misunderstood my question, but I certainly did not misunderstand his answer. My question was: would the manufacturer of American tobacco be allowed to attach to his factory in Ontario a bonded warehouse for the purpose of storing Canadian grown tobacco upon which he would only be required to pay the 14 cents per pound inland revenue duty. At present as the law stands, if a farmer in Essex goes to sell tobacco to a manufacturer in Windsor or in Ontario, that manufacturer has to pay the same duty as he would upon American imported tobacco, 20 cents per pound. If a bonded warehouse were allowed to be attached to the manufactory, as I understood would be the case, the difficulty would be got over, and it would be a very easy matter for the officers of the Inland Revenue to calculate the duty on the Canadian and American tobacco respectively, if they were kept in different warehouses. At present, the farmers of Quebec who bring their tobacco to market, can afford to sell their twist, known as "tabac blanc en torquette," for a lower price than the duty imposed upon Essex grown tobacco. There is an injustice in this. I am sorry that the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue is not here, but I trust that the acting Minister will feel the importance of this question. It is a matter of very great importance, especially to the farmers in the Lake Erie townships of Essex. I do not think it is fair they should be compelled to sell their tobacco at a sacrifice. The same laws should be obtained for the Ontario farmers as are obtained for the Quebec farmers. If the duty were reduced to four cents, the increased production would make up for the decreased revenue. Increased production would increase the revenue and keep down prices. I would urge upon the hon. President of the Council to give the matter his consideration.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. I have listened with a good deal of attention to the hon. member. I fail to ascertain that there is any provision in this Act that affects one Province more favorably than another. Its provisions are universal as far as the Dominion is concerned. The hon. gentleman refers to me in the matter as one who has had something to do with the National Policy. All I can say is that I have found the people of Ontario as ready, if not more ready, to take hold of the various manufacturing enterprises as the people of any part of the Dominion. I do not see, therefore, why Quebec here can have any advantage that is not enjoyed by Ontario. With reference to the proposal to allow home grown tobacco to be used in manufactures where they import foreign tobacco, the difficulty is, the very moment we allow home grown tobacco to enter their manufactures, we lose all control against smuggling or other illegal proceedings. I know of no provision in the Bill that does not affect one Province as it does another. Of course, if the manufacturers in Ontario do not think proper, in the form that is required, to give them the benefit of the low rate of duty, that is their fault. We cannot legislate on the subject for the inhabitants of a portion of the Dominion who do not think proper to take advantage of a reasonable law.

Motion agreed to.

DIFFERENCES BETWEEN H. McMICKEN AND T. J. LYNKEY, C. P. R.

Mr. ROYAL, in moving for copies of all letters, telegrams, instructions, accounts for law expenses and other documents in relation to the difficulties which occurred last summer (1880), between one Ham McMicken, a carter in the service of the Pacific Railway, at Winnipeg, or T. J. Lynskey, Superintendent, or both of them, and Robert Tait, Esquire, a ferry-man licensed by the Local Government, with reference to the ferry between St. Boniface and Winnipeg, said: One of the great results that may be anticipated from the happy solution of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway will be that private individuals will be enabled to seek reparation before courts of justice, and will no longer have to go to the Supreme Court to seek remedy for the injustice done to them by officials. This is one instance: at the time Manitoba was struggling for existence, and fighting bad roads, a high tariff of transport, bad immigration regulations, and the grasshoppers, the Local Government which had only a small pittance of a subsidy, passed a law to license ferries on the various rivers of the Province. Tenders were asked, and amongst others a steam ferry was established between Winnipeg and St. Boniface. It was then thought such a ferry would not be a very profitable enterprise, and rather great advantages were offered to tenderers. The present ferryman, Mr. Robert Tait, got his license for ten years, and put on the river a first-class steam ferry boat. The law gave him exclusive privileges for one or two miles above and below the point of crossing. Last year, however, the Superintendent of the Pembina section of the Canadian Pacific Railway took upon himself, when he saw he could not get Mr. Tait to reduce his rates to his own figures, or those of his own contract, to induce a certain H. McMicken to establish a ferry within twenty feet of the route of the licensed ferryman, stating he was authorized to do so by the authorities in Ottawa. It put at defiance the law enacted by the Provincial Legislature, and was equivalent to setting at naught the contract entered into by the Minister of Public Works of the Province. However, McMicken or Lynskey proceeded with his ferry, and commenced to carry across the river all the freight transported thither by the Emerson Branch Railroad. The other ferryman took out an injunction to prevent Lynskey's interfering with his rights. The fight then went on in the Courts, and it was only after two months that Lynskey was peremptorily ordered to cease ferrying; but then, Tait's losses amounted well nigh to fifteen hundred dollars besides the law costs. How is Tait to get indemnified? When I state these facts it will be seen that, as I have said, one of the good results that will accrue from the construction and ownership of the Canadian Pacific Railway by a Company, will be, that instead of private individuals seeking, in vain, for redress from the Government, having to fight officials to get justice, they will but have to fight a company upon whose officers writs can be served. We have tried to get to the bottom of Lynskey's transaction; but now that the transfer of the Canadian Pacific Railway is about to be made to a company, I believe my motion would be fruitless. However, it has enabled me to show that in this instance private rights were set at defiance by a Federal officer pretending to act under instructions from his own Government. I will make this motion so as to enlighten other parties in similar circumstances.

Motion agreed to.

DISTRICT INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Mr. COCKBURN, in the absence of Mr. WHEELER, moved for copies of instructions issued by the department to district inspectors of weights and measures, defining their duties for adjusting beams, scales, weights and measures, in their several districts, and regulating the charges therefor, under the authority of the Act regulating the inspection of weights and measures.

Mr. BAIN. I understand that the member for North Ontario (Mr. Wheeler) desires to make a statement upon his motion, and I therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

UNIFORM CURRENCY FOR THE DOMINION.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved the House into Committee of the Whole to consider the following Resolution:

"That it is expedient to extend the Act 34 Victoria, chapter 4, establishing one uniform currency for the Dominion of Canada to the Provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island."

Mr. ANGLIN. Will the hon. Minister explain the purport of the Bill? I thought Prince Edward Island was within the purview of the old Currency Acts, and that a Prince Edward Island dollar was a Dominion dollar.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. No; the matter has been overlooked. The Act establishing the currency was passed previous to the admission of Prince Edward Island, and it has not been extended either to the Island or British Columbia; and as we are now sending a considerable amount of silver to British Columbia, owing to the difficulty that has existed there with respect to their currency, we thought it desirable for that and other reasons that those portions of the Dominion should be excluded. The Government will probably send in a month or two $100,000 worth of silver to British Columbia, and there is no provision by which it will become a legal tender.

Mr. BLAKE. There is not any provision for increasing the currency over there.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Not at all. There has been difficulty about the currency in British Columbia, and American silver has been imported. A quantity of Canadian silver has been ordered there. At the present time a sovereign is a legal tender there at \$4.85. Everywhere in the Dominion it is a legal tender at \$4.86 $\frac{2}{3}$. The changes which will be effected by the Act are that Canadian silver will be made a legal tender at certain rates, and it will establish the value of the sovereign at \$4.86 $\frac{2}{3}$. The Bill to be introduced on this resolution will go into operation on the 1st of July next. Every engagement and contract entered into, as far as the value of the sovereign is concerned, will be paid under the conditions and legal obligations with which they were made.

Mr. DECOSMOS. The extension of the Statute will by no means raise the value of the sovereign beyond $4.75, nor increase the value of Canadian silver. Our business connection with the neighboring Republic is so close that we have to adopt the American value. I do not believe that the popular use of money will be increased one cent in value.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We do not desire to increase it, but it will have that effect as far as the sovereign is concerned.

Resolution considered in Committee, read a second time and reported.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY then introduced a Bill (No. 66) to extend the Act establishing one uniform currency for the Dominion of Canada, to the Provinces of British Columbia and Prince Edward Island.

Bill read the first time.

MOTIONS FOR RETURNS.

The following motions for Returns were severally agreed to:—

Correspondence between the British Government and the Government of Canada with reference to the United States cattle passing through Canada, in transit from one United States port to another United States port; also statement of number of cattle so passing through Canada; also, copies of all arrangements between the railways carrying such cattle and the Canadian Government, and all Orders issued by the Government to such railway managers.—(Mr. Wiser.)

Copy of the contract entered into by the Government in 1880, with J. G. Baker & Co., of Fort Benton, for furnishing supplies for the North-West Mounted Police.—(Mr. Tassé.)

Copy of charges made against Horatio Nelson Tabb, formerly deputy inspector of weights and measures, of the evidence taken on the enquiry into such charges, and of the finding of the officer who made such enquiry, together with any correspondence in relation to such charges, and to the decision of the Department of Inland Revenue upon them.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Copies of all documents relating to improvements to be made on the shoals of the St. Lawrence, off Point St. Pierreles Becquets, and of the reports and plans of the Government Engineers in relation to the said works.—(Mr. Méthot.)

Copies of any contract or agreement between one Ham McMicken, acting for himself or in the name of a pretended company or as an agent, and T. J. Lynskey, Superintendent of the line of the Canadian Pacific Railway from Emerson to St. Boniface, in relation to the carrying and delivery in Winnipeg of freight carried by the railway; also, copies of any tariff adopted by the two parties, and of the surety bonds which must have been required by the said T. J. Lynskey, from the said H. McMicken.—(Mr. Scott.)

Statement shewing the number of licenses called warehouse licenses, for leaf tobacco cultivated in Canada, granted since the 1st May, 1880, and at what price such licenses were granted.—(Mr. Bourbeau.)

Statement of all legal fees paid by the Department of Justice, from June 30th, 1879, to June 30th, 1880, to whom paid, and for what services.—(Mr. Macmillan.)

Copies of all leases granted by the Government to any persons or company, for the use of water-powers and for certain privileges in relation to the construction of wharves or warehouses on the Beauharnois Canal.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY moved that Government business shall have precedence on Thursdays, during the remainder of the Session.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. BLAKE. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will inform us whether it is intended to proceed this Session with the Act to extend the boundaries of Manitoba. I will also mention that it would be well to put before the House, as soon as possible, the Act which stands in the name of the Minister of Railways, as to have been introduced on the 28th of January, in order that the House may become acquainted with its provisions. It is a very important measure, and we ought to have it before us as soon as possible.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. Owing to the illness of the Minister of Railways, and to the fact that we have the Tariff and the Estimates before us, the two Bills to which the hon. gentleman refers will be introduced in the Senate and discussed there.

Mr. BLAKE. As to one of these Bills I say nothing, but as to that Bill upon the promise of which we passed the Pacific contract and which was promised to us here, I think we ought to have it here and have an opportunity of discussing it before the Session is over.

Sir LEONARD TILLEY. We introduce it into the Senate in order that we may get it as soon as we get through the Tariff debate, which may last three or four days.

House adjourned at 10:10 o'clock, p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 22nd February, 1881.

PRAYERS.

ELECTION CASES.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the said Court, in the election appeal relating to the Electoral District of Charlevoix, "Simon Xavier Cimon vs. Joseph Stanislas Perrault," together with a copy of the evidence brought before that Court.

And also, a certified copy of the judgment and decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the election appeal to the Electoral District of Bellechasse "Achille Larue vs. Alexis Destaurier," together with a copy of the evidence brought before that Court.

Mr. SPEAKER also informed the House that, in conformity with the Act 37 Victoria, Chapter 10, Section 36, he had issued his warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out new writs of election for the said two Electoral Districts.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McCUAIG. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the House to a statement made in the Ottawa Citizen this morning. It reads as follows:—

"In the course of his remarks, Mr. McCuaig fell into the error of saying that whereas under the late arrangement, five inspectors in his district received $2,500 ($500 each). Three under the present system received $2,400—one officer $1,200 and two $600. The salary paid to the inspectors is $1,000, and the assistants $500 each."

That statement is in regard to the Weights and Measures Act. The correspondent of the paper is quite correct, but I omitted, or he omitted, to state that last year $8,000 were appropriated for the inspection of gas, and out of that sum the inspector at Belleville received $150, making his salary $1,150; one of the deputy inspectors received $250, making his salary equal to $750; and another deputy inspector $150, bringing his salary to $650; all these sums being taken from the gas appropriation. So, in point of fact, I understated what they received from those sources. I make this explanation as I do not wish a wrong impression to go abroad. I am still of the same opinion, that the old system had its advantages, over the present one, because we had a resident inspector of weights and measures in every one of the five districts, at about the same cost for salaries.

WAYS AND MEANS.—THE BUDGET.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Leonard Tilley, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty."

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the duty of addressing the House at this stage of the debate has not fallen into abler hands. I think the whole House, without exception, will lament with me the reasons why that duty has devolved upon me to-day. The illness of the hon. the Minister of Railways cannot but be regretted deeply by hon. members, and every one throughout the country will join with me in the hope that he may at no distant day be restored to health and be able to take that part in the business of the country which he has taken so well and so acceptably for so many years. Apart from this, the duty which I have undertaken is an agreeable, as well as an easy one. I rise for the purpose of speaking upon a subject in which the whole country feels the deepest interest—that of the development of the policy which has been inaugurated by this Government, and especially by my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance—and for the purpose of contrasting the success and the consequences of that policy with that which preceded the accession of the present Government. Sir, I listened with the greatest possible interest to the statement made by the hon. Finance Minister on Friday last. We were all prepared to hear that he had met with a moderate degree of success; we were all prepared for a statement which should be acceptable to the country, but I fancy that even the most sanguine among us was scarcely prepared for the results which were presented in the figures brought before the House by that hon. gentleman. It will be remembered that even the late Finance Minister, in a speech in this House, said it was unreasonable to expect that a policy like that of my hon. friend could develop itself in one or two years. He did not join in the cry of those who said that because the elections of 1878 had gone overwhelmingly in favor of the Conservative party, therefore the whole country, to fulfil our promises, must blossom like the rose immediately. He did not join in the cry of those who echoed that of the Globe, who said that there was no trouble at all in at once inaugurating a great change in the fiscal policy of the country, that there was no trouble in altering the Tariff, that any expert in the Service could frame our proposed tariff in all its difficult details in a day, and that it ought to show its results the next morning. But that hon. gentleman, having been face to face with the difficulties which beset my hon. friend, was candid enough—he is not often candid enough to acknowledge such things—to say that the country would have to wait before the fruits of the policy of my hon. friend would appear. What does my hon. friend the Finance Minister tell us? He tells us that in the space of two years he has converted deficits into surpluses; he tells us that for two years he has legitimately stimulated the industries of the country to such a favorable extent that now, at least 14,000 people are employed in new manufactures, and the employment of these 14,000 people involve, not only the sustenance of 40,000 or 50,000 more, but involve largely the consumption of the products of the country, and also indirectly affect its entire business condition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PLUMB. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say "hear, hear," with a smile; but they will find that the effect of this stimulus on the industries of the country cannot be reckoned by a mathematical calculation, nor can we reduce to an axiom its effect to encourage the people and remove their feeling of depression—its effect to show the country that there is a disposition to embark in new enterprises, and its effect to restore confidence to those already in business. He tells us that by certain legislation on this side of the House, a great stimulus has been given to manufactures, that the shipping industry has been benefited, that those cities which depend largely upon the ocean trade for their prosperity—Montreal, Halifax, St. John, and Quebec—have all felt the beneficial effect of the policy which has been adopted by the gentlemen on this side of the House—and adopted against the most persistent and the most unfair tactics of those who have opposed this policy by a system of obstruction from beginning to end. This policy has been fought tooth and nail by the gentlemen on the opposite side, and I venture to say that in the course of this discussion we shall have the same old story over and over again, which has been repeated in this House and upon every platform in the country since we nailed our flag to the mast, and made "Canada for the Canadians" our war cry in the campaign of 1878. It is very well for hon. gentlemen to have political beliefs and adhere to them, and it is better for us that the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side should have their beliefs and should adhere to them with a blind bigotry. But I may here quote an author whom the late Finance Minister is very much in the habit of quoting:

"A genuine statesman must be on his guard,
If he must have beliefs, not believe them too hard."

My hon. friends on the opposite side have their beliefs, and they have believed them a little too hard for their own comfort, for the good of their own party, and for their own prospects of success for some time to come. My hon. friend tells us that he will have, next year, as the result of the revenue-producing power of his Tariff, a surplus of over $2,100,000. That must be gratifying to everyone who had watched for three or four years the gradually increasing deficits of the hon. gentlemen opposite, those deficits for which no provision was made, and which amounted in the aggregate to the enormous sum of nearly $6,000,000. As they appear in the Public Accounts they amount to $5,826,073, and they would have been much larger but for the ingenious devices resorted to for the purpose of keeping them down. Why, Sir, in one year the Militia Estimates were cut down to $450,000. At the same time the expenditure on public works chargeable to income was cut down about $550,000, I believe for no other reason in the world except to prevent the estimated expenditure, amounting to $24,000,000 or $25,000,000, from swelling up to $26,000,000. There was at that time no excuse for so rapid an increase in the interest on the public debt, and for other charges which necessarily grow with the increased prosperity of the country. But these devices were resorted to in order to prevent the increase of those deficits which were alarming the country and seriously threatening the public credit. The hon. the Finance Minister also tells us that he has been able, through his negotiations, largely to reduce the rate of interest on the public debt. The reductions which he has made in that regard within the last two or three years amount to a sum equal to the interest upon over $28,000,000, as large a sum as it is anticipated will be given as a subsidy for the construction of the Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman also tells us that while large manufactures have been established throughout the country, there has been practically no increase in the prices of those commodities manufactured here, as compared with the imported goods of the same character and quality. That contention was disputed by the hon. member for Centre Huron, (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is, however, easily susceptible of proof. The House and the country will be willing to accept the assertions of the hon. Finance Minister—assertions that are always given with calmness, in the judicial spirit in which a Finance Minister ought to deal with economic questions, and not with the shriek of a partizan and the blindness of party fury. The country will, I say, accept the statements of the hon. Finance Minister before it will those of an unscrupulous opponent who is endeavoring to make the worse appear the better reason. The hon. Finance Minister tells us also that the effect of the Tariff has not been to impose a burdensome tax on the public, as has been stated by Opposition authority—though by authority which has not been endorsed, even by the late Finance Minister. It was asserted in the Tariff debate here, and the hon. leader of the Opposition repeated the statement upon the hustings in West Toronto that for the sake of getting $2,000,000 increased revenue, $7,000,000 were added to the burdens of the people. I had occasion to look up the speech of the hon. gentleman from which that statement was taken and upon whose authority it was given to the country. That hon. gentleman may be a financial authority, and he has ever been so considered, although he was quoted by the hon. leader of the Opposition, and I notice that the hon. the ex-Finance Minister is by no means sure that he can endorse that statement. That hon. gentleman says that it would be very hard to arrive at any definite conclusion upon a subject which it was so difficult to reduce to mathematical demonstration; he could not stake his reputation on such a vague and incomplete statement. The hon. gentleman who made the statement has only given figures in detail amounting to something like $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, and put the rest on the very convenient form of an "etc." If the statement rests on no better authority than that, we can agree with my hon. friend that it is another fallacious statement. There is no proof to be found of it anywhere. The very figures given in its support are fallacious. The hon. gentleman does not even attempt to give a basis for the whole of his calculation, but says there are certain other items that will swell the amount up to $7,000,000. That cannot be possible, unless the operation of the Tariff has the effect of greatly raising the prices of the home manufactured articles; and if, as has been shown, cottons, woollens, agricultural implements, tools, such as are made by my hon. friend for Gananoque, (Mr. Jones,) boots and shoes, and even sugars have not been affected by the Tariff to any such extent as the hon. gentleman claims, there is no foundation, whatever, for his contention. Even under the best aspect, supposing his contention to be correct, he has overstated the amount by more than double. I would not have referred to this, had it not been made the staple of arguments against the present policy of the Government, by the hon. member for West Durham, during the summer of 1880, in the special election in West Toronto, where the whole question was fought out and where the hon. gentleman suffered a signal defeat. The hon. the Finance Minister has shown that one of the effects of the Tariff has been largely to increase the inter-provincial trade between the eastern part of the Dominion and the great west, to increase it so largely as to more than quadruple it. That statement ought to be received with the greatest satisfaction by all those who do not think it is in the interest of the country to deal with foreigners rather than with our own people. If it can be shown, as it can be shown, that the large trade in agricultural implements carried on between the Provinces of Ontario and Manitoba, is one which has not in the slightest degree increased the burdens of those who have made their purchases from Ontario, then, in that respect alone, we ought to congratulate our Finance Minister upon the success he has achieved. I understand that all the manufacturers of agricultural implements throughout the country assert that they are not getting any better prices than they got before the Tariff, but are increasing their profits by making larger sales. When hon. gentleman argue against the Tariff, they forget that one of its chief effects is to increase business by giving the manufacturers a larger trade. The reason why we were made a slaughter market for the United States was that the manufacturers there wished to keep every man employed, and would sell to us at less than home prices, rather than allow their fires to go down and their people to be idle. And hon. gentlemen may apply precisely the same argument to the manufacturers in Canada, for it is precisely the same argument. But there is another feature of the returns which has application to the present case. I find that New Brunswick in 1876, paid to the revenue $7.76 per head, including all taxes; and it was said when this Tariff was under discussion, that it would increase her burdens at least $2.50 per head. Now I find from the return of the Customs duties that the contribution of New Brunswick, per head in 1875, was $4.79; and in 1878 before this Tariff was passed, it was $5.07, and last year it was but $3.05. Does that look like increasing the burdens of poor, neglected New Brunswick? Well, Sir, the percentage of duties on the total imports of goods entered for consumption in 1877 was $28.74, and in 1880, $21.83. In 1875 the return of Customs duties for the Dominion was $4.19 per head, and in 1880, $3.83. Yet we had in the last year a Tariff, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, that was certainly to increase the cost of many articles 60 to 70 per cent., and to tax the people $7,000,000. It has done no such thing in either case. The total percentage of duty from the whole of the goods entered for consumption has increased from $14.03 to $19.70; but on the total imports, only from $13.74 to $16.04. Well, in 1879 I remember the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) made a point which was cheered to the echo by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches, in respect to the value of bank stocks which, according to his statement, had declined since the election of 1878, notwithstanding that it was falsely asserted that my hon. friend, the leader of the Government, who, I am most happy to see, is in his place to-day, had stated that immediate prosperity would follow the elections, if they resulted in favor of the Conservative party. The hon. Minister of Finance has now produced a statement showing that the aggregate increase in values upon the stocks quoted on the Stock Exchange in Canada, amounted to an enormous sum. That statement has been questioned on the other side of the House by the hon. Finance Minister, who said: "We do not know anything about the increase in the value of stocks, but we want to know whether the Banks have increased their dividends?" I can tell him that, after a period of depression like that through which we have been passing, no bank well managed would suddenly increase its dividend; but the measure of the public confidence in those stocks is, how much the people will pay for them—what percentage they will bear in the market? As the hon. member for South Brant desired to make a point against our policy out of the prices of those stocks in 1879, I will give the quotations on the day of the election. They did fall subsequently; but I will compare them on the day of the elections with their quoted prices to-day, making use of the Montreal Gazette, of last night, and of the Mail, in order to give the hon. gentleman an idea of the increase in the value of those securities, and to see whether his argument is worth anything in regard to the results following the success of the Conservative party on 16th September, 1878. The stock of the Bank of Montreal then sold at 171, it sells now at 182; increase, $1,320,000. The Bank of Toronto at that date, 16th September, 1878, sold at 138, now 147; increase, $180,000. Bank of Ontario, 83; now 97; increase, $420,000. Merchants Bank, 94; now 118; increase, $1,438,000. Bank of Commerce, 113; now 138; increase, $1,500,000. Dominion Bank, 117; now 150; increase, $330,000. Bank of Hamilton, 99; now 120; increase, $210,000. Standard, 80; now 105; increase, $125,000. Federal Bank, 104½; now 138; increase, $340,000. Imperial

Mr. PLUMB.

Bank, 104; now 118; increase, $140,000. Molson's, 93; now 108; increase, $300,000. I cannot find the prices of the stock of the Quebec Bank, but I am quite certain that they will be found to have advanced in the average ratio. In the case of the Canada Permanent Building Society, of which my hon. friend opposite, the leader of the Opposition, will probably have some cognizance, I can congratulate him on the fact that its stock sold at 181 in September, 1878, and that it sells now at 203, and upon its aggregate capital there is an increase in value of $440,000. The Freehold sold at 150; it now sells at 157; increase, $12,000. The Western Canadian Loan and Savings Stock was at 150 then; now it is worth 165; increase, $150,000. The Union, 139; now 149; increase, $50,000. Building and Loan, 119; now 120; increase, $7,500. Imperial, 113; now 119; increase, $36,000. Farmer's, 114½; now 128; increase, $63,000. London and Canadian, 144; now 152; increase, $320,000. Huron and Erie, 137½; now 153; increase, $150,000. As to the Dominion Savings Institution, I suppose there has been an increase of capital, for I cannot conceive any other reason why it shows a decline of 6 per cent., or a loss of $60,000. The Ontario Savings Society is probably in a similar position, having declined 11 or 12 per cent., or suffered a falling off of $96,000. I wished, however, to give the whole statement, and must include them. The Hamilton Provident has increased from 114 to 115, or $110,000. The National Investment, from 103 to 108, or $70,000. The British American Insurance Company, from 112 to 153. The Western Insurance Company from 153 to 213. The Confederate Life from 126 to 203; and the Canada Life from 193 to 316. The total increase for the banks and savings and investment companies quoted amounts to $7,791,500. When my hon. friend from South Brant made his computation, he neglected to tell the House that he produced it after the severest shock ever given to bank stocks and investments had been suffered by the failure of the Bank of Glasgow and the West of England Bank. That hon. gentleman probably did not know that the shareholders of these banks had been so mulcted by the losses which these institutions sustained that a perfect panic was created in Bank stocks—a panic which extended to this country—a panic which was taken advantage of by those who make it their business to trade in the misfortunes of joint stock companies—to an extent never before known in this country; and the great fall of stocks had nothing whatever to do with the coming in of the party who are now in power. The hon. gentleman either did know the facts or he did not, and I do not wish to give him credit for his ignorance at the expense of his candor. There have been evidences throughout the country of returning confidence. That evidence is patent to everyone who walks through the streets of any of our cities. Anyone who looks at the returns of trade, or knows anything about the movements of business, or watches the course of the bankruptcies in the country, cannot fail to see that there has been a return of prosperity. Hon. gentlemen opposite may argue as they like; they may say it is due to this cause or to that, but the fact must be accepted that the croakers on the opposite side have at last had their mouths shut, and we shall hear very little more about the great depression which used to elicit cheers from these hon. gentlemen when it was referred to in the strongest terms at their command, during the last two years. The course of business in the country has been prosperous; the manufacturing and other interests have revived notwithstanding the constant threats of hon. gentlemen upon the other side, that they intended, if they came back to power, to reverse the trade policy of the country. The people knew perfectly well that they would be entirely safe in making any investments they chose, for despite the threats of what would happen to them by the coming in of the hon. gentlemen opposite, to reverse the policy of the present Government. They knew quite well that, so far as they were concerned, it was an empty threat, and they have shown exactly how they regard the possibility of this country being subjected to what it was compelled to undergo during the five years of misrule between 1873 and 1878. My hon. friend the Finance Minister, when he came into office, found himself face to face with the necessity of making a loan. He had to make a loan when the money market was in a condition which, as I have just suggested, was brought about by the failure of those great moneyed institutions, the City of Glasgow and the West of England Banks, which resulted in a severe shock to public confidence. The late Finance Minister, engaged as he was in his election campaign, neglected to make provision, as he ought to have made provision, for £1,000,000 sterling of our debt coming due in January, 1879. The part of prudence, the part of financial care, the part which should have been taken by any one who is entrusted with the delicate task of managing the finances of a country, would have been to take advantage of the low state of the money market even at the risk of a slight loss of interest, and to make his arrangements for such an obligation in ample time in advance of its maturity. Why, Sir, in 1876 the late Finance Minister told us that had he been a few days later in making his loan of £2,500,000 in the month of November—which he did not want until the following July—he would have had to pay “several per cent.” more for money—certainly rather a loose way of speaking, when one per cent., or even a-half of one per cent., makes an enormous difference in calculating the result of a loan. On the other hand, when he was questioned as to his neglect to provide for the debt due in January, 1879, by a new loan, his reply was that there was no hurry; there was plenty of time. The hon. gentleman knew that if the elections went against him in September, he could not go to England and negotiate a loan, pending the formation of a new Government. He knew that the moment the people pronounced against him as a Finance Minister, he could not appear in the money market; he knew that the delays incidental to the formation of a new Government were hazardous, taken in connection with the negotiation of a loan. But my hon. friend, the present Finance Minister, at the first instant he could leave the country, went to England to negotiate that loan, and he was brought face to face with a time of disaster so great that he was advised to accept subscriptions for half the sum required, and withhold his proposals for the remainder until the distrust subsided. He did not do so, and what was the result? What was the measure of the confidence of the financiers of England—the men who control the money markets of the world in respect to the accession of the Conservative party to power, with its protective tariff, and its promise to keep Canada for the Canadians? The result was that whereas the previous Finance Minister made a loan which did not net 87½—I repeat the assertion, and I challenge contradiction—his successor effected a loan of the same character (that is a four per cent. loan) with the same sinking fund, and the same number of years to run, which yielded nine per cent. more in the money markets of England, in spite of the period of depression in which it was floated. And those very securities which my hon. friend negotiated now stand in the market at 102 to 103, if I understood him aright when he delivered his Budget speech on last Friday. The present financial position of the country is one in which, of course, every man feels the deepest and gravest interest. We have been rescued from deficits; and it was necessary, in order to bring about that result, to increase the Tariff whatever might be the policy of the Government. The hon. gentleman from Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) has argued that if his policy of masterly inactivity had been let alone the country would have righted itself; that he would have had a surplus even out of his bungling Tariff of 1874. Why, Sir, that Tariff left the hon. gentleman with a severe disappointment as to its revenue results the first year; it left him with a deficit the second year, and the third year, and the fourth year, and it left the legacy of another deficit to my hon. friend the present Finance Minister when he came to frame his Tariff. Not only so, but he would have had a large deficit on his second year, the result of the disastrous policy of the hon. gentleman opposite, but for the fact that his Tariff made an increase of some $1,300,000 on the receipts of the previous year. The hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) always asserts that when he came into office he found that enormous unjustifiable burdens had been imposed upon him by the outgoing Administration. We have heard that cry repeated by every platform speaker on the other side, from the leader of the Opposition down to the smallest whipster that echoes his voice—the cry that their predecessors had increased the public expenditure from $13,500,000 to $23,16,000 before they went out of office. I have shown by statements made in this House which are uncontradicted, that the contention is an utterly dishonest one. I have shown item by item—and the Finance Minister will corroborate my statements—that over $950,000 was added to the expenditure of 1873-74 by the Government which succeeded the Administration which went out of office at that time. It ought to have been chargeable to the year 1874-75. I have the items. I have challenged those items to be controverted, and until some statement is made whereby they are controverted, I say we have a right to state that nearly $1,000,000, charged, after he went out of office, against my hon. friend's, estimated expenditure for 1873-74 are chargeable to the next year, and should swell up the total of the expenditure of that year. The actual expenditure of 1873-74 should be $2,450,000. As it stands now upon the Public Accounts, the expenditure was $23,316,515. That of 1874-75 appears as $23,713,071. It should be about $24,660,000, and the receipts of that year being $24,648,615, there would have been a small deficit. But the hon. gentleman says that the expenditure was increased nearly $10,000,000 between 1867 and 1873; my hon. friend the late leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mackenzie—who I am also glad to see in his place and I congratulate him upon his recovery, because there is a feeling of satisfaction throughout the whole House to see him once more facing us in the courageous way in which he has faced us for many years, for we respect a straightforward manly opponent—that hon. gentleman has also made the same statement—I estimate that between 1867 and 1873 there was an increase of about $6,000,000—I have stated that increase, item by item, I have challenged hon. gentlemen on the other side to show a single item which they would have reversed if they had been in power. I have shown that through all the debates prior to 1873, no man lifted up his voice against these increases, because every man knew that they were necessary consequences of the development of the country, of laying the foundation, for of our union of preparing for Confederation, of improving the harbors, building lighthouses, making preparations for the administration of justice and opening up the North-West, creating the Province of Manitoba, bringing in Prince Edward Island and British Columbia. They were all in a proper direction, and such expenditures must necessarily go on as the country develops and improves. The note of the country's prosperity will be an increased expenditure of the country; but we must look to it that that increase is in a legitimate direction and not covered up by cooking of accounts, or by a policy which may keep down the present nominal expenditure, but swell the expenditure at the expense of expenditure hereafter. I have said that it was right and just and fair to increase the public expenditure in the manner in which it was done, and our opponents are careful not to give a bill of particulars when they object to it in gross. No contention can be more unfair than the one made by the hon. gentleman on Friday night, (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), that my hon. friend, (Sir Leonard Tilley), left a deficit when he went out of office. He did no such a thing. The hon. gentleman stated that his expenditure would be what I have just stated, namely $22,400,000. He did not make provisions for whatever might be added by those who came after him. He did not make provisions for the $100,000 for the election which took place, for which he was not responsible. He did not make provision for the fact that $500,000 was taken from the capital account of the Intercolonial, and stuck into the revenue for the purpose of swelling up the expenditure of 1873-74, or for other items of which he could know nothing. He provided that there should be a sufficient income to meet the expenditure, and there was a surplus of $850,000. It cannot be contended that that surplus was entirely made out of the result of the Tariff which was passed late in the month of April, 1874. The hon. gentleman (Sir Leonard Tilley) said, in his Budget speech of 1873, that he expected to find, in consequence of large additional charges to the public expenditure in 1873, that a provision must of necessity be made at the next Session for meeting that increased charge upon the public purse. But he said: "I will not deal with it this year, next year I will do so." He was begged by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) to move in the direction of a protective Tariff in April, 1873, when that hon. gentleman said he was disappointed that nothing had been done to bring about a protective Tariff; and when my hon. friend said: "Next year, if I deal with this subject, I will probably deal with it in the direction of protecting the industries of the country." The hon. gentleman then virtually pledged himself to do what has been done by the Conservative party now that he is again Minister of Finance. There was no deficit, there could have been no danger of a deficit then, except for the addition made to the expenditure by his successor, for which my hon. friend is not in the slightest degree responsible. But it is convenient for the hon. gentleman, who represents the financial talent of the other side of the House (Sir R. J. Cartwright) to claim that in one case his Tariff was borrowed, as he may say, largely from the revenue of the succeeding year and added to the receipts of 1873-74. But when my hon. friend (Sir Leonard Tilley) claims, with incontrovertible evidence, the same privilege, he is met with an argument which stultifies the hon. member for Centre Haron, by that gentleman himself. I have the words that the hon. gentleman used when he was claiming that he had a right to consider that his Tariff of 1874 had taken from the revenues which properly belonged to 1875, and he added them to the revenue of the year before. The hon. gentleman knew well that there could be no possible deficit in 1873-74, even admitting that his contention had been true, if he had not added largely to the expenditure of that year by putting upon it items which did not belong to it. But when my hon. friend (Sir Leonard Tilley) claimed legitimately that he was entitled to $1,300,000 of the income of 1873-79 for the year 1879-80, every gentleman on the opposite side has refused to allow him that contention. Here is what the late Finance Minister said when he made a similar claim:

"In the period from the 11th to the 20th of April, as against $336,000 in 1872-73, we received $1,171,000 in 1873-74."

He went on to say that we thus gained as nearly as possible $1,700,000 under the operation of his new Tariff in that year. Again, he says:

"Speaking of the increased revenue of April, May and June, 1874, the House will remember that this was to a certain extent borrowed from the revenue of 1875."

That statement was accepted with cheers by the hon. gentleman on the opposite side of the House. I heard it when it was made, and I heard the reception it met with by hon.

Mr. PLUMB.

gentlemen opposite. In 1876 that hon. gentleman said again:

"I may further observe that, as I explained at some length in the Budget speech of 1875, a considerable proportion of the receipts for 1873-74 properly belong to the year 1874-75; and it may be as well, at the same time, to observe that the receipts for Customs, although in excess of the Estimates, do not fully represent the sum properly due for the year 1874-75, but it is also caused by the operation of the Tariff of 1874."

I do not think it becomes the late Finance Minister (Sir Richard J. Cartwright) to make any statement which implies that my hon. friend's estimates have not been correct, and have not been borne out to the letter. Let us see how accurately the late Finance Minister made his Estimates and forecasts. In 1878, the hon. gentleman stated that he would receive $23,850,000; he actually got $22,517,382, and he was wrong on every item of his estimated receipts. His expenditures for that year were $24,455,381, notwithstanding that he had cut off from the Militia and Public Works chargeable to income, $1,250,000 in order to cut down the Estimates, without which device they would have been about $27,500,000. I am glad to see no such misleading plan has been resorted to by my hon. friend the Finance Minister; that whatever Estimates he has brought down are based upon a fair and open statement of items without any attempt at concealment. We know exactly where we are; we are face to face with the facts. I regret to say that the public expenditure is increasing; but I challenge hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to question the different items of which the Estimates are made. I believe our friends on the Treasury benches will show in Supply that every item is perfectly justifiable, and that the House and the people will sustain them.

Mr. HUNTINGTON. We will condemn it by your own speeches.

Mr. PLUMB. My own speeches do not condemn it. I never have condemned anything in the way of proper expenditure. I have complained of this: that the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Huntington) and his friends taught the people to believe they would institute a system of economy and reform in the public expenditure. And the result of their reform was, what? An increase to $4,500,000 in the expenditure; indeed, if legitimately and properly stated, it would be nearly $26,000,000, and that in the face of a depression in the country greater than ever known before. That is what I blame hon. gentlemen opposite for. I have never contended that they would carry out their schemes of economy; I knew they were delusive and fallacious; but I had the right to take the hon. gentlemen at their own word and on their own promises, and to compare their promise before they came into power with the fruition of their promises when they seized the Public Treasury. The hon. gentlemen cannot claim that I have been in the slightest degree unfair or inconsistent in making the statements I make here. I have said from the beginning that no country like Canada can fail to have an increase of expenditure. I say it would be perfectly suicidal to attempt to revert to the policy which has been urged by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), that it would be perfectly unpatriotic and suicidal to attempt to go back as he has urged to the expenditure of 1872. Why, it means cutting off Prince Edward Island, doing away with the North-West, driving out British Columbia, stopping the Public Works, and severing connection with the North-West, in fact, isolating ourselves; and I tell the hon. gentlemen that the people of Canada are not disposed to accept that kind of policy. The people of Canada are a progressive, and, to a certain extent and within proper limits, a speculative people. They like to see the opening up of new territory and the inauguration of new projects, and they have no sympathy with the cold-blooded policy propounded by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr.

Blake). No greater mistake was ever made by a public leader than to suppose he can, by any possibility, induce the young men of Canada to take the back track, and to throw away all they have gained from 1872 to 1881. Why, Sir, I know that the public pulse beats in unison with the progressive march of the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman's interruption having led me into a little digression—and I am much indebted to him for having given me the opportunity to offer these remarks—I will now return to the main subject under consideration. I admit there was pressure brought to bear on hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. I admit that when they came into office it was impossible that they could fulfil their predictions; I knew they would find it impossible. Everyone who knew any thing about the position in which they had placed themselves was perfectly satisfied that the noble army of contractors and jobbers who had brought hon. gentlemen into power, would demand their wages; and that they were only waiting until hon. gentlemen got into their seats on the Treasury benches to demand them. We had a little inkling of it—probably given in an unguarded moment—from the hon. member for Centre Huron (Sir Richard J. Cartwright), who said:

"The gentlemen from Halifax gave me so much trouble last year and succeeded greatly to my disgust in compelling me to insert one or two items like the service from Halifax to Cork, which greatly increased the total."

The hon. gentleman who led the late Government and his colleagues were, after all, only human. It is a very hard thing to resist the pressure of those who had supported him, the pressure of those who contributed largely to the elections, the pressure of those who had helped the hon. gentleman to elevate the moral standard, the standard of purity which we saw so well exemplified in the election trials of 1874 and 1875, which may be fresh in the recollection of a good many hon. gentlemen who were sufferers on those occasions. Yes; it was not surprising that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues could not pay their pledges. They were insolvent before they commenced business. I hope every possible economy will be practised by this Government; I hope within all proper limits they will keep down the public expenditure. They are bound to do it; but they did not make the kind of pledges given by hon. gentlemen opposite before they came into power, pledges which bankrupted them before they acceded to office, and which went to protest almost before hon. gentlemen had taken their seats in the Ministry. Mr. Speaker, we have another gratifying statement made by the Finance Minister, and that is as to the condition of the public works, the saving which has been effected in their management and the increase in income. It must be remembered, in connection with any increase in the public expenditure upon public works, that it represents, in part, that which is an absolute necessity in getting larger earnings. The expenditure will increase year by year. If the income of the public works is increased it may become a very large item—an item which may at the first step alarm those who see a gradual increase; yet there may be no more legitimate increase than this one which brings earnings with it. Then we have an increase in the public debt. We are told constantly that the policy of the Government of 1873 added enormously to the fixed charges of the country. That is one of the contentions which we hear from those who have taken a leaf out of the late Finance Minister's book, and which is echoed on the public platforms everywhere. That hon. gentleman says we increased the public debt enormously prior to 1874, and left on him immediately pressing obligations to the amount of some $130,000,000. There were no such obligations upon him. He had to renew a portion of the public debt, and he had to provide for enlarging the canals. He had to make an addition to the public debt of something like $27,000,000 or $28,000,000, under the engagements of his predecessors. But the hon. gentleman was not obliged to carry out any of the schemes of his predecessors in connection with the building of the Pacific Railway. He was not bound to assume it as a public work or to change the policy of handing it over to a private company. He was not bound to build the road from Fort William to Red River, and to leave a gap of 180 miles in the centre. There was no legislation which required that there should be an outlay of some $17,000,000 or $18,000,000 in that direction, or an outlay of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 on surveys. These hon. gentlemen came into office perfectly unpledged, perfectly untrammelled. They were not obliged to take up any scheme that they did not approve which had been proposed by their predecessors—and they did not take them up. They took up much greater and more extravagant ones, and if the public debt has been increased by that means, perhaps the hon. gentleman will remember that on a certain occasion the late leader of the Government insisted that I should insert in a certain report I was making that the contracts in British Columbia, and for the 188 miles between English River and Keewatin, were made under his direction and responsibility. But the late Finance Minister has contended, day after day, and week after week, that we added $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 to the fixed yearly charges by the legislation of 1873. Well, there was an item for the compensation of New Brunswick for having yielded a claim she had, for certain lumber dues. I would like to hear the hon. gentlemen from New Brunswick contend that it was a reckless and improper thing for my hon. friend to recognize that claim. Then the admission of Prince Edward Island and of British Columbia involved an additional charge on the revenue. I have not heard any hon. gentleman on the opposite side, except perhaps one, venture to say that he wished to have British Columbia excluded from this Confederation, and I have certainly not heard any hon. gentleman say that he wished to exclude Prince Edward Island. There were increases of subsidy to which I have not heard objections from our critical opponents from the Maritime Provinces. These charges were incident to the maturing of the great scheme of Confederation, and I trust the day may not be far distant when other charges will be added for the admission of another portion of British America into the Confederation. Large increases in the expenditure have been made for the development of the North-West. Can any one criticize these expenditures if they have been legitimately made? Does any one wish for one moment to repudiate or recede from a bargain which, through the far-reaching statesmanship of the right hon. leader of the Government, gave us for £300,000 a domain more magnificent and full of promise than any virgin soil owned by any other country under Heaven. It would be perfectly proper to take any charges which have been made against the North-West, and transfer them to a special account, and not consider the yearly charges incident to the protection and development of that a part of the general yearly expenditure; and I say the sale of lands and the value of that country to us will amply recoup us. I have made a calculation as to how much has been and may be paid for that country by the Government. In the North-West for the three items of land survey, Dominion forces and the North-West Mounted Police, there has been an expenditure altogether of $4,610,316; the original cost of that domain was $1,500,000; making a total of $6,100,000. Now, assuming that that country contains 250,000,000 acres of arable land, it is worth, according to a statement of an hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills) whom I see on the opposite benches, $2,500,000,000, a trifle more than the whole public debt of the United States, because he placed the value of the lands at $10 an acre before he finished his very exhaustive speech on the Pacific Railway contract. But I will not accept such an enormous exaggeration; I will say that the land is worth $1 an acre, and that there are 225,000,000 acres left, after we have squandered, as our opponents term it, 25,000,000 acres in assisting to build the Pacific Railway, and even then we shall have a moderate little property which will more than pay the whole debt of Canada, and leave a very handsome sum in the Treasury, either for the purpose of illustrating the reforms of the hon. gentleman, if they ever get into power again, or of helping my hon. friend here to carry out his engagements. The sum which we shall be obliged to expend in order to have these lands brought into the market, in order to fulfil our obligation with British Columbia, and in order to carry out the pledges made by successive Governments, will be $25,000,000 for the subsidy to the contractors of the Pacific Railway, and $3,000,000 for the construction of the line, for which the Government will have to pay, in all, $28,000,000. That does not include the expenditure already made, but that which we are committed to for the future. Hon. gentlemen opposite had sent their rails to British Columbia; they had led British Columbia to believe, as she had a right to believe, that her part of the road was to be gone on with. The hon. gentleman who led the late Government (Mr. Mackenzie) had intimated that he was prepared to let the 128 miles between English River and Keewatin. Our bargain therefore involves a new expenditure of $28,000,000 which is an addition of $1,120,000 to our yearly interest account, and the sinking fund is one-half of one per cent, or $140,000 more, making $1,260,000 yearly outlay, which represents the interest and sinking fund of the whole cash subsidy to be paid to the Syndicate for the completion of the road and its maintenance forever. That does not look to me as if it was such a ruinous affair. There are half a dozen western States that have undertaken a great deal more than that. Even to-day there are no less than three roads being pushed through and over the mountains of Colorado, some of them carried to an altitude of 12,000 feet above sea level to compete with each other for the business of the mines, and nobody considers them such tremendous undertakings; yet, according to the statements of hon. gentleman opposite, the whole Dominion stands aghast at the idea that for the sake of getting through communication over our own territory forever, for the sake of laying foundations for a vast empire, for the sake of bringing to market millions of acres of our lands which hon. gentlemen opposite contend will be worth from $3 to $5, we are going to add to our debt, in the course of ten years, $28,000,000, which will cost for interest and sinking fund $1,260,000 a year. I believe I have very good authority for stating that before ten years will have elapsed, we will have received, from the increased population of that country, over $3,000,000 addition to the revenue. My authority is the Toronto Globe. We have been told by the late Finance Minister who, I am surprised to see, is not in his place—it is quite in accord with his usual courtesy not to be there—that we ought to dispense with the sinking fund in our loans, and he contended, two years ago, when trying to defend his deficits, that there was no necessity to charge the sinking fund against the current expenditure. I never heard in my life so audacious a contention. It was a desperate attempt to glaze over his deficits. It was, he said, not imperative upon him to charge against the year's expenditure that which we had solemnly pledged to make a part of the year's expenditure, the sinking fund upon which the credit of our securities rested, and he argued that it should be deducted from his yearly deficit. Had the hon. gentleman remained in office, and had that argument been quoted against him, I undertake to say he could not have negotiated a security in the English market. It was enough to ruin our credit. I never heard, in the whole course of my life, any contention of a more reckless character from a man pretending to be a financier; and the hon. gentleman must be driven to sore straits when he is compelled to take
