With a Preface by Harl Harles

Edited by Ben Zeene. For Sale at this how it was that Frederick the Great came to Dresden, and how the chain of circumstances ensued connected with the Blue Vase that gives its tile to our tale.

When the Prussian king was at Dresden he went to Meissen to see the porcelain factory. This factory belonged to the king of Saxony, and the secret of the art was hedged about with the most severe, oven Draconian, laws, and the most cruel punishments were threatened against such as divulged the secret. The secret had only been discovered in 1710 how to make pure white transparent porcelain, and the royal factory was established in 1711. The prices paid for the articles that issued from it were high. In 1720, the court of Vienna, by bribery, induced one of the workmen to escape from Meissen and carry the precious secret to the capital by the Danube. And now, in 1745, Frederick, as conqueror, entered the factory and watched the workmen engaged in modeling, burning, painting, gilding.

Frederick was not a man to neglect his opportunity, and he at once made a domand that some of the master workmen and of the best artists should be delivered over to him, that he might establish a royal porcelain factory of his ownharf Berlin. Among the former was Wegell/wha became the actual master and founder of the Berlin porcelain, and among the latter was a young girl named Sophio Mansfeld. While Frederick was reliage over the factory at Meissen, he was believed over the painter was Sophie Mansfeld—should accompany the detachment which he singaged to come to Berlin, and make and paint porcelain for the replenishing of his private purse.

Sophie was a girl of freeproachable character, the daughter of a pastor in the Erz Gebirge, the eldest of a large family, and as the records were as neiped, said Aldoury.

"I think," said the young officer, "if she were to draw up a humble petition to his majesty, stating the hardness of her case, he might listen to it. He is good at heart, and just."

"Who would present it?"

"I would."

A few days later the inconsiderate, hot headed, warm hearted young man actually did present to Frederick the Great a memorial from Sophie Mansfeld, entreating permission to be allowed to return to her home in the Saxon mountains. The king took it from his hand, grunted, cats a glance down the page, turned an angry eye at the youth and put the paper in his pocket.

That evening there was a recoption as the Serlin, and Countess Lazinka, who was it also and the serling and Countess Lazinka, who was it also mose specimens of the Russian manufacture. The king was curious about these latter, and took them up and looked at their marks.

"Sire, you do me too much honor."
"Humph" he said, "unless my men work better I shall not allow any figure on their productions—not the Brandenburg eagle—no, nor a B crowned, nothing but Wegeli's initial; perhaps, if our porcelain becomes famous, I may allow the orb and sceptre to stamp it, not otherwise. I don't know," he said, roughly, "but that Wegeli's W may pass for badly drawn crossed swords, as on certain Dresden pots." He looked sulkily at some fine Meissen china, "When my factory is in working order," he said, "I shall put a prohibitive duty on all Dresden and otherchina, and every one who is a good citizen prohibitive duty on all Dresden and otherchina, and every one who is a good citizen and a patriot and loves his king will buy

As the ting spoke no one else uttered a sound, all remained in respectful silence and attention. Frederick looked round, and saw the young man, the son of his hostess, and said, with a significant glance, "It cannot understand how any one with respect for the country and his sovereign can wish to deprive there of the services of the best artists and work men." Then with his elbow, accidentally, be and his sovereign can wis't to deprive them of the services of the best artists and work men." Then with his elbow, accidentally, he knocked over a magnificent and enormous y costly vase, which fell on the floor, and was dashed to a thousand pieces. The king was himself a little disconcerted; not so the countess, who, with perfect readiness, said; "Sire, you do me too much honor." "Honor, how so?" "The vase was precious before; it is incalculably more precious to me now!" Frederick grunted, and went away. The guest looked at the countess, then at the control of the counter of the control of the counter of the coun

On the back was written in the king's own hand:

"Whoever of the artists in the porcelain factory at Berlin de date in one month shall pains a was as a beautiful as that we broke yesterday evening at the Countees Laginka's palace, shall have our gracfous permission to marry or not to marry, to go back to Saxony or to stay at Berlin, as shall best please him or her; and we further promise that we will graciously give that person an annual salary of $500 should it content him or her to remain in our service, in our royal manufactory. Given at Sanssouci, this March 28, 1746.

The offer of such a salary was liberal for Frederick the Great.

No sooner did Sophie Mansfeld receive the answer to her petition than she was fired with hope, and her enthusiasm for her art rekindled. She asked permission, and received it, to see the fragments of the vase the king had broken. When shown them, a light smile played over her lips.
"It was superb," said the countiess. "Never was the equal seen, in delicacy of execution, or beauty of invention."

"Gracious lady," answered Sophie with a smalle, "it was of my own painting, and I can excel it. Buoyed with hope of revisiting my home, and with desire to acknowledge my obligation to your son, I shall certainly surpass it."

CHAPTER III.

The appointed day arrived on which the vases were to be exhibited. The king's promise and offer were not limited to Sophie, and some rivalry existed among the artists in the royal factory.

During the month Lazinka had visited the workshop repeatedly to inspect progress, and he was confident in the success of his fair protege. The vase-stood eighteen inches high without its cover; it was gracefully shaped. Sophie had herself sketched its outline. It was paixed a deep purple blue, of the most superb richmess, over which rocceoc ornaments in gold, part dull, part burnished week is unifered grace and were etched with extraordinary case and sequences of the stations of the following letter from a Frenchman and to and from Boston and is the fastest steamer plying between Nova between Nova Cannot in the Come up and pay me my money.

On each side was a space where the white porcelain showed, and on the one side which was to be the back was a beautifully painted view of Potsdam, and on the other, the front, was Frederick the Great scated on his charger, waving his sword, wearing his cocked hat and coat of dark blue with cuffs and lining of scarlet. His waiscoat was yellow. He wore high boots, and on his breast a star. In the rear were the Prussian soldiers charging, and the smoke of battle. Beneath the picture was a scroll on which was inscribed:

"A l'eternelle gloire de Frederic le grand," The vases had been brought to the palac at Potsdam, and were unpacked and placed on selves for exhibition by the sub-director, Hirsch.
